

Short Bio – Joseph Murphy

Joseph Murphy is a Case Attorney serving in the New York State Department of Environmental Conservation's Natural Resource Damages Section. In that position, he works with a team of lawyers, scientists and an economist to recover damages from responsible parties when natural resources are injured and use such damages to restore or replace those resources. Prior to his work with the DEC, he was an environmental policy analyst with the Anam Earth Center for Sustainability and Culture, an environmental education and policy non-profit based in Albany County. After earning his J.D. from St. John's University School of Law in 2007, he worked in private practice in New York City and Albany, focusing on commercial litigation, health care and energy law. He also holds a master's degree in economics from The George Washington University and a bachelor's degree in journalism from West Virginia University.
