8. On the facts presented – i.e., that the client at one time expressed a desire to exonerate the co-defendant – it is possible to discern an authorization to disclose on the happening of some future event which would conclude the client's case, or at least place the client in a situation where disclosure would not redound to the client's detriment. Whether the client gave such express authorization is a question of fact beyond the jurisdiction of this Committee to resolve. If, in fact, the client instructed the inquiring attorney to reveal information necessary to exonerate the co-defendant, and if the client persisted in this instruction after he had been "informed" of the relevant considerations, the lawyer could disclose the information pursuant to the exception in Rule 1.6(a)(1) for "informed consent."

6 If disclosure would be "detrimental to the client" it would be confidential for that reason (even if not privileged) under Rule 1.6.

9. Even if the client did not personally and explicitly provide informed consent to the disclosure, the inquiring attorney may still disclose the information if informed consent is given by someone who is legally entitled to waive the deceased client's attorney-client privilege and has legal authority to provide informed consent to waive the attorney's ethical obligation of confidentiality. Cf. N.Y. State 970 (2013) ("If the executrix is legally entitled to the same access that the decedent had when alive, then the former attorney should ordinarily provide the executrix access to all the files"). Whether and under what circumstances this authority can be exercised by the deceased client's personal representative is uncertain. The issue is, however, ultimately a matter of law beyond the jurisdiction of this Committee.

Whether Disclosure Is Impliedly Authorized

10. Rule 1.6(a)(2) adopts the concept of implied authorization to disclose client confidential information. Comment [5] to Rule 1.6 explains:

> Except to the extent that the client's instructions or special circumstances limit that authority, a lawyer may make disclosures of confidential information that are impliedly authorized by a client if the disclosures (i) advance the best interests of the client and (ii) are either reasonable under the circumstances or customary in the professional community. In some situations, for example, a lawyer may be impliedly authorized to admit a fact that cannot properly be disputed or to make a disclosure that facilitates a satisfactory conclusion to a matter. In addition, lawyers in a firm may, in the course of the firm's practice, disclose to each other information relating to a client of the firm, unless the client has instructed that particular information be confined to specified lawyers. Lawyers are also impliedly authorized to reveal information about a client with diminished capacity when necessary to take protective action to safeguard the client's interests.

11. Where there is reason to believe that the now-deceased client would have wanted the co-defendant to be exonerated under the current circumstances, the concept of implied authorization to disclose in Rule 1.6(a)(2) would permit the lawyer to make such disclosures as may be necessary to accomplish that end.

CONCLUSION:

12. Statements made by a deceased client that may exonerate a co-defendant are protected as confidential information. The client may have expressly authorized disclosure of the information by personally giving informed consent to the disclosure, or authorization to disclose it may be implied if the disclosure is consistent with the client's best interests and is reasonable under the circumstances.

TOPIC: Conflict checks

DIGEST: When a firm is aware of parties adverse to a prospective client but has only incomplete identifying information for those parties, such as street names, it may be necessary for the firm's conflict check to go beyond checking its written records of engagements, by consulting its lawyers who may have represented those adverse parties. A lawyer's duty to avoid conflicts is not limited to the requirement of an adequate conflict-checking system. Thus when a lawyer acquires new information about adverse parties during the course of a representation, it may be advisable, even though not required by the rule on conflict-checking systems, for the lawyer to perform a new conflict check based on that new information.

RULE: 1.0(h), 1.7(a), 1.9(a), 1.10(a), (e) & (g), 5.1(a)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a law student permitted to practice, pursuant to court order, under the supervision of a law school clinic (the "Clinic"). The Clinic represents a person who was convicted of a crime (the "Client"), and the Clinic wishes to seek post-conviction relief on the ground that the Client was a victim of human trafficking. To that end, the Clinic has gathered information on the alleged traffickers, but has not been able to determine their legal names; the information is limited to their "street names" and general areas of residence.

2. The inquirer believes that the Client's alleged traffickers potentially constitute "adverse parties," because they may be adversely affected by (and potentially subjected to further prosecution based on) the Clinic's motion for post-conviction relief. Consequently, the inquirer believes it is necessary to include the alleged traffickers in a conflict check.

3. The inquirer also notes that the issue of street names "may arise in other situations where a party's legal name is not available," such as when attorneys represent parties in cases involving drugs, gangs, or organized crime, and other groups where the use of street names is common.

QUESTION:

4. In representing the Client, is it sufficient to run a conflict check with the "street names" of human traffickers who are potentially adverse parties and to repeat the check if the inquirer later discovers more information about the traffickers?

OPINION:

5. The inquiry appears motivated by concern that certain kinds of conflicts of interest could arise without being detected by the Clinic's existing conflict-checking procedures. In particular, the Clinic might currently be representing, or might have represented in the past, an alleged human trafficker of the Client. If so, the Clinic may have a record of that alleged trafficker's legal name but not informal identifiers such as the trafficker's street names. The interests of the Client and the alleged trafficker are likely to be sharply adverse. Thus, if the Clinic is currently representing the alleged trafficker, even in an unrelated matter, that would give rise to a conflict.[7] And a conflict would arise even from a past representation of the alleged trafficker in a matter that was the same as or substantially related to the matter in which the Clinic will be representing the new Client.[8]

6. The New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") limit the ability of a lawyer to represent a client when the lawyer has a conflict of interest. The Rules also impose two requirements of affirmative measures to help detect potential conflicts before a lawyer or law firm accepts a new engagement, or as soon as possible thereafter. Those requirements are imposed on a "law firm," and that term would include the Clinic. See Rule 1.0(h) (defining "law firm" to include "lawyers employed in a qualified legal assistance organization") and Cmts. [2] & [4] (explaining definition of "firm"); N.Y. State 794 ¶ 2 (2006) (interpreting predecessor provisions to the Rules and opining that "[s]o long as the clinic's students work in a common space and have shared access to physical files, the entire legal clinic, including the project in question, is a law firm" within the meaning of the Code of Professional Responsibility).

7. The two affirmative requirements for detecting conflicts are set forth in Rule 1.10(e). First, a law firm "shall make a written record of its engagements, at or near the time of each new engagement."

8. Second, a law firm "shall implement and maintain a system by which proposed engagements are checked against current and previous engagements" upon any of four triggering events. The triggering events occur when "(1) the firm agrees to represent a new client; (2) the firm agrees to represent an existing client in a new matter; (3) the firm hires or associates with another lawyer; or (4) an additional party is named or appears in a pending matter."

9. Under Rule 1.10(g), if a violation of Rule 1.10(e) by a law firm is a substantial factor in causing a violation Rule 1.10 (a)[9] by a lawyer in the firm, the law firm, as well as the individual lawyer, is responsible for the violation of Rule 1.10(a).

10. The purpose of the system required by Rule 1.10(e) is to "render effective assistance to lawyers in the firm in avoiding conflicts of interest," and the system "must be adequate to detect conflicts that will or reasonably may arise" upon any of the four triggering events. Rule 1.10, Cmt. [9].

11. The required records of engagements must be in written form, but in some cases, the lawyer performing the conflict check may have reason to believe that the written records are insufficient to allow an adequate check. Thus, for a conflict-checking system to be effective, it "may also need to supplement written information with recourse to the memory of the firm's lawyers through in-person,

7 See Rule 1.7(a)(1) (unless the conflict is properly waived, a lawyer shall not represent a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that "the representation will involve the lawyer in representing differing interests"); Rule 1.7, Cmt. [6] ("The duty to avoid the representation of differing interest prohibits, among other things, undertaking representation adverse to a current client without that client's informed consent.").

8 See Rule 1.9(a) ("A lawyer who has formerly represented a client in a matter shall not thereafter represent another person in the same or a substantially related matter in which that person's interests are materially adverse to the interests of the former client unless the former client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing.").

9 "While lawyers are associated in a firm, none of them shall knowingly represent a client when any one of them practicing alone would be prohibited from doing so by Rule 1.7, 1.8 or 1.9, except as otherwise provided therein."

telephonic, or electronic communications." Rule 1.10, Cmt. [9B]. "At a minimum . . . a firm must record information that will enable the firm to identify (i) each client that the firm represents, (ii) each party in a litigated, transactional or other matter whose interests are materially adverse to the firm's clients, and (iii) the general nature of each matter." Rule 1.10, Cmt. [9C] (emphasis added).

12. A law firm must check for conflicts before initially agreeing to represent a new client in a matter (and before agreeing to represent an existing client in a new matter). The firm may also need to check for conflicts after agreeing to represent a client if relevant new information is obtained in the course of the representation. We analyze both these requirements in turn.

Checking for conflicts before accepting a new matter

13. First, before agreeing to represent a new client, a firm must check that proposed engagement against current and previous engagements. If the firm discovers current or previous clients whose interests may be adverse, the firm may have to conduct further inquiry into the nature of the possibly conflicting representations to determine whether a conflict really exists and, if so, whether the conflict is waivable.

14. Checking the proposed engagement against current and previous engagements must include a check against the written records of such engagements that Rule 1.10(e) requires the firm to maintain. The firm should check the names of all known materially adverse parties. When the materially adverse parties are known only by street name, then the effectiveness of the check against written records will depend on whether the records include the street names of current and previous clients. As noted in paragraph 20 below, there is a question as to whether a firm's conflict checking system should contain not only the legal names but also the street names of current and previous clients. But the inquiry at hand concerns the conflict check that the firm needs to undertake when considering representation of the particular new client at issue here.

15. Determining the required scope of a conflicts check turns on whether the check against written records is sufficient by itself, or whether the check against written records must be supplemented with other information (such as recourse to the memory of the firm's lawyers, or to client files not reflected in the firm's standard conflict-checking database). We believe that the answer depends on circumstances. Law firms and lawyers checking for conflicts are not routinely required to go beyond checking the written records in their conflict-checking system. If there is no reason to believe that the firm has ever represented clients with interests materially adverse to those of the prospective client, then there may be no need to supplement the check of written records. For example, the firm may know it has never represented a human trafficker. On the other hand, a lawyer or law firm checking for conflicts in a particular case could be aware of facts raising a substantial prospect that current or prior engagements might involve clients with materially adverse interests. In that case, for the conflict-checking system to be effective, the law firm should make reasonable efforts to contact lawyers and students who were involved in those current or prior engagements to inquire about street names of potentially adverse parties. But such further inquiry may not be feasible if, for example, those involved in prior engagements were students who no longer attend the school, for whom the school has no forwarding addresses.

Checking for conflicts after accepting a new matter

16. The second part of the analysis is about whether the Clinic, having a conflict system that contains only legal names of clients and having already agreed to represent the Client, has any continuing conflict-checking obligations if relevant new information is obtained in the course of the representation, or if information already in the Clinic's possession unexpectedly turns out to be useful in the matter.

17. This question does not appear to involve any of the four events that trigger a requirement to check for conflicts. The acquisition of new information during the course of a representation is not one of those events. See Roy Simon, Simon's New York Rules of Professional Conduct Annotated 728 (Thomson Reuters, 2016 ed.) (stating that the Rule "does not require law firms to devise a system for detecting conflicts that arise between two or more current clients after engagements are accepted," even though "individual lawyers remain responsible for any improper conflicts even if the conflicts arise during a representation").

18. Nor would a new conflict check be necessitated by the plan to use the new information in a motion for post-conviction relief. It is true that a triggering event occurs when a lawyer names an additional party or when an additional party otherwise appears in a pending matter. But when a lawyer files motion papers in the Client's post-conviction proceedings alleging that an identified person is a human trafficker, the lawyer is not naming that person as a party, and it does not mean that the person has appeared.

Helpful practices in checking for conflicts

19. While acquiring new information such as the legal names of the alleged human traffickers does not trigger a Rule 1.10(e) requirement to perform a new conflicts check, it may nevertheless be advisable for the Clinic to do so. Performing a new conflict check may help the assigned lawyers comply with their ethical duty to avoid conflicts. See Rule 1.10, Cmt. [9A] ("a lawyer who knows or should know of a conflict in a matter that the lawyer is handling remains individually responsible for the violation of these rules, whether or not the firm's conflict-checking system has identified the conflict"). It may also be an appropriate way for the Clinic to discharge its own responsibility to help those lawyers avoid such conflicts. See Rule 5.1(a) ("A law firm shall make reasonable efforts to ensure that all lawyers in the firm conform to these Rules."); Roy Simon, Simon's New York Rules of Professional Conduct Annotated 728 (Thomson Reuters, 2016 ed.) (opining that in light of underlying conflict rules, a law firm system ought "to continue monitoring possible conflicts that arise during a representation," and that a firm's records should "ideally" include the names of all adverse parties "who become involved in the matter as it actually develops").

20. Finally, we note that steps may be taken to minimize the kinds of potential problems that motivated the inquiry. As set forth above, a law firm is required to "make a written record of its engagements, at or near the time of each new engagement," and part of that requirement is to record information that will enable the firm to identify "each client that the firm represents." At the time of new engagements, the firm could seek to learn and record not only legal names but also more informal identifiers such as street names. The more names the Clinic has recorded for its clients, the more effective its conflict-checking system is likely to be. We were not asked, and we do not address, whether Rule 1.10(e) requires a law firm to obtain and record informal identifiers in addition to legal names. But it is fair to say that including such information in the records of engagements may be of substantial assistance in checking for conflicts in a law firm whose matters sometimes involve human traffickers, gang members, or others who use street names.

CONCLUSION:

21. When a firm is aware of parties adverse to a prospective client but has only incomplete identifying information for those parties, such as street names, it may be necessary, depending on circumstances, for the firm's conflict check to go beyond checking its written records of engagements, by consulting its lawyers who may have represented those adverse parties.

22. A lawyer's duty to avoid conflicts is not limited to the requirement of an adequate conflict-checking system. Thus when a lawyer acquires new information about adverse parties during the course of a representation, it may be advisable, even though not required by the rule on conflict-checking systems, for the lawyer to perform a new conflict check based on that new information.

TOPIC: Referral fee from investment advisor

DIGEST: An attorney may not accept a fee or commission from an investment firm for referring the client to such firm where the money to be invested arises from an engagement in which the lawyer represented the client because the fee creates a non-consentable conflict.

RULES: 1.7(a)(2), 1.7(b), 1.8(f)

FACTS:

1. The inquiring attorney represents clients in workers' compensation and personal injury matters. Some of the attorney's clients receive large sums of money as a result of their cases, and when that happens, clients commonly ask the attorney for advice regarding how to manage the settlement funds.

2. When clients ask about managing their settlement funds, the inquiring attorney would like to refer them to a licensed investment professional with whom he has a relationship and receive a fee or commission from the investment firm. The inquirer represents that he may receive such a fee or commission because he holds a number of securities and insurance licenses.

3. The inquirer states he would make the referral only after all legal work has concluded, the client's case has closed and the inquirer has fully disclosed to the client that the inquirer will financially benefit from the referral.

QUESTION:

4. May an attorney refer clients to an investment firm with whom the attorney has a professional relationship and receive a fee or commission from the investment firm for the referral?

OPINION:

5. We note at the outset that the Committee does not opine on questions of law, and thus, does not opine on whether the proposed fee or commission violates any statute or regulation. In the event the proposed fee or commission is illegal and reflects adversely on the lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness as a lawyer, it would violate Rule 8.4(b). See also N.Y. State 845 (2010); N.Y. State 667 (1994); N.Y. State 595 (1988); N.Y. State 576 (1986); N.Y. State 461 (1977). For purposes of the following analysis, we assume that the investment firm may legally pay the attorney a fee or commission and that such payment is not otherwise illegal.

Applicable Rules Provisions

6. Whether a lawyer may accept a referral fee from a third party service provider generally involves analysis of New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") 1.7(a)(2) and 1.8(f).

7. Rule 1.7(a)(2) governs conflicts involving a lawyer's personal interests and generally prohibits a representation in which there is a significant risk that the lawyer's personal interests would have an adverse effect on the lawyer's exercise of professional judgment, unless the conflict can be and is waived under Rule 1.7(b).

8. Rule 1.8(f) provides that "a lawyer shall not accept compensation for representing a client, or anything of value related to the lawyer's representation of the client, from one other than the client unless: (1) the client gives informed consent; (2) there is no interference with the lawyer's independent professional judgment or with the client-lawyer relationship; and (3) the client's confidential information is protected as required by Rule 1.6."

9. A number of our prior opinions have permitted a lawyer to accept a referral fee or commission from a third-party service provider for referring a client to the service provider under very limited circumstances. See, e.g., N.Y. State 981 (2013) (referral fee not prohibited by Rule 1.7 where the service is not related to the lawyer's legal services and the lawyer makes no recommendation to use the service); N.Y. State 667 (1994) (lawyer may accept referral fee from mortgage broker notwithstanding predecessors to Rules 1.7(a) and 1.8(f) as long as client consents and all proceeds are credited to client if client so requests); N.Y. State 626 (1992) (lawyer for lender may retain fees from a title insurance company as long as client consents and amount of the fee is disclosed to the borrower who will pay the cost of the insurance and the total amount of the lawyer's fee is not excessive); N.Y. State 576 (1986) (lawyer may act as agent for title insurance company and also represent the buyer, seller or mortgagee in a real estate transaction consistent with the predecessors to Rules 1.7(a) and 1.8(f) as long as lawyer credits client with amount received from title insurer or the client expressly consents to the lawyer retaining the fee paid by the insurer); N.Y. State 461 (1977) (lawyer may accept part of a fire adjuster's commission consistent with predecessor to Rule 1.7(a) if client consents and all proceeds thereof are credited to client); and N.Y. State 107 (1969) and N.Y. State 107(a) (1970) (both permitting lawyer to accept a referral fee from a financial company where the lawyer invests the client's funds in certificates of deposit, if client consents after disclosure and lawyer remits the fee to client if client so requests).

10. On the other hand, a number of our prior opinions have prohibited a lawyer from accepting a referral fee or commission from a third-party service provider for referring a client to the service provider. Where our opinions have held that a lawyer may not accept a fee from a third-party service provider, we often have found that the lawyer's personal conflict of interest is so great that disclosure to and consent from the client will not cure the conflict. See, e.g., N.Y. State 682 (1996) (lawyer may not accept a fee from an investment adviser for referring a client under predecessor to Rule 1.7 because disclosure and consent would not cure the lawyer's direct and substantial conflict); N.Y. State 671 (1994) (lawyer engaged in estate planning may not accept referral fee from insurance company for referring client under predecessor to Rule 1.7 because disclosure and consent could not cure the direct and substantial conflict between the client's and the lawyer's interests); N.Y. State 619 (1991) (where estate planning lawyer's remuneration from the third party would vary with the quantity of the product or services recommended, receipt of the referral fee was impermissible under predecessors to Rules 1.7 and 1.8(a) [business transaction with client] because the lawyer's substantial financial interest conflict could not be cured by disclosure and consent).

11. N.Y. State 682 identifies two factors that determine whether the lawyer's financial interest in a referral fee[10] is so great that disclosure and client consent will be ineffective. A client may give informed consent for a referral fee when (1) the transaction at issue concerns a product or service that is fairly uniform among providers and is required in an objectively determinable quantity or (2) when the product or service is fairly uniform among providers and is unconnected to any particular legal services.

Application to the Inquirer's Proposal

12. The first questions under our prior opinions are (i) whether the products or services that are the subject of the referral are fungible in nature, (ii) whether the required amount is objectively determinable, and (iii) whether the product or service is unconnected to the legal services provided by the lawyer.

13. In N.Y. State 682 (1996) we determined that an attorney may not accept a fee from an investment advisor for referring a client to the advisor, because the services of advisors vary substantially among different providers and the amount of funds that should ideally be entrusted to any particular adviser is not objectively determinable. Consequently, we said, the potential exists that "the attorney might increase the referral fee by recommending that more of the client's funds be entrusted to the advisor without appropriate regard to the client's interests." Accordingly, we found that meaningful consent was not possible, even where the client is offered the choice to claim the referral fee and the attorney purports to exercise independent judgment in framing the initial recommendation to consult an advisor.

14. Similarly, in N.Y. State 1043 (2015), we opined that a lawyer representing a client in a real estate transaction could not ethically accept a referral fee from the real estate broker in lieu of charging legal fees. Opinion 1043 followed from our prior opinions generally holding that a lawyer may not act as a lawyer and a broker in the same real estate transaction because the "lawyer's pecuniary interest in the broker's success and attendant commission . . . irredeemably interferes with the lawyer's distinct obligation to exercise independent professional judgment on the client's behalf."

15. Here, as in N.Y. State 682, the services of the investment advisors are not uniform nor is the amount of funds that should ideally be entrusted to any particular adviser objectively determinable. The lawyer here, when asked by the client to recommend an investment advisor, should be making that recommendation based on the needs of the client. That means recommending an advisor based on the services the advisor provides or even recommending more than one advisor in order to meet the client's needs. However, under these circumstances, we do not believe that the lawyer will be able to exercise independent judgment in making a recommendation given the prospect of receiving a referral fee based on recommending a particular advisor. Further, under these circumstances, our prior opinions provide that disclosure to and consent of the client is impermissible because the interests of the client and attorney are in such direct conflict that the client cannot give meaningful consent.

10 We see no distinction between the fee or commission proposed here and a "referral fee". The proposed fee or commission would result from the attorney recommending that the client consult with an investment professional with whom the lawyer has a professional relationship.

16. Thus, a non-waivable conflict under Rule 1.7(b) exists here. Accordingly, we need not reach the issue of whether the lawyer could meet the requirements of Rule 1.8(f), which include both informed consent and the absence of interference with the lawyer's independent professional judgment, in order to accept a payment in connection with representing a client from one other than the client.

17. Additional facts present under the circumstances here also support our conclusion that a non-waivable conflict exists. For example, in the course of the representation, the attorney might decide to recommend a settlement rather than risk going to trial because a settlement will not only produce a definite legal fee, but also is likely to produce a referral fee from the investment advisor. Conversely, if the attorney sees the possibility of a large jury verdict but the client prefers the "bird in the hand" of a settlement, the attorney might steer the client toward trial in hopes of generating a larger pool of funds on which to collect a commission from the investment advisor. Thus, where the lawyer is counseling (or should be counseling) a client on whether the client should settle or proceed to trial, the prospect of a larger referral fee from an investment advisor produces exactly the kind of conflict that we have said is non-consentable in other contexts.

18. Similarly, when counseling a client about the payment options for a potential settlement, the attorney may be likely to steer the client toward a lump sum payment rather than another option, such as a structured settlement, in order to maximize the opportunity for a referral fee. Again, the lawyer's advice to a client would be affected by the prospect of a referral fee, rather than the course that is in the best interest of the client.

19. We recognize that the inquiring attorney has stated that the referral to the investment firm would only be made after the representation of the client concluded. However, if clients frequently ask the lawyer to recommend an investment adviser, the lawyer's judgment in structuring a settlement may be affected even if the recommendation is not made until after the settlement has been agreed upon. Moreover, in some instances, particularly, as we understand it, in workers' compensation matters, the client's case remains subject to review at future proceedings, and the client therefore may require representation on an ongoing basis over an extended period of time. Under these circumstances, it would be difficult to identify a particular moment when the representation concludes. Thus, our holding in N.Y. State 1043, that a conflict exists regardless of whether the referral fee is offered before or after the representation concludes, also applies to the facts here.

CONCLUSION:

20. An attorney may not accept a fee or commission from an investment firm for referring the client to such firm where the money to be invested arises from an engagement in which the lawyer represented the client because the fee creates a non-consentable conflict.

TOPIC: Charge for cancelling meeting with lawyer

DIGEST: A lawyer may ethically charge a nominal amount to a person who cancels an appointment for an initial consultation without reasonable notice, provided the lawyer informs the person (orally or in writing) what will trigger the cancellation charge and the charge either represents the cost incurred by the lawyer as a result of the late cancellation or the client has given advance consent to the amount of the charge.

RULES: 1.5(a) & (d)

FACTS:

1. A law firm wishes to discourage the cancellation of initial consultation appointments (usually by potential divorce or Family Court clients), without reasonable advance notice, and the resulting reduction of its ability to schedule appointments for and meet with other clients and prospective clients. The firm, which charges $150 for initial consultation appointments, proposes to take a credit card account number upon scheduling the appointment, and to explain that it will charge $25 if the potential client cancels the appointment without reasonable notice.

QUESTION:

2. May a law firm ethically charge $25 if a potential client cancels an initial appointment without reasonable advance notice?

3. If it is permissible, must the law firm communicate the policy to the potential client in writing?

OPINION:

4. Under the facts here, a lawyer-client relationship has not yet been formed. Thus it may not be obvious that the rules respecting a lawyer's fees and expenses, as provided in Rule 1.5 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") are applicable to the relationship between the lawyer and the potential client. However, Rule 1.5(a) does not reference a "client;" it simply says: "A lawyer shall not make an agreement for, charge, or collect an excessive or illegal fee or expense."

What Constitutes an Excessive Fee or Expense

5. The question here is whether the proposed $25 charge to a person who cancels an initial appointment without reasonable advance notice is "excessive." That question is highly fact specific. For a fee, relevant considerations include review of the factors enumerated in Rule 1.5(a)(1) – (8), among others. See Rule 1.5, Cmt. [1] (the factors specified in paragraphs (a)(1) though (a)(8) are not exclusive.) For an expense, the lawyer is authorized to charge the client only the actual cost incurred, plus administrative expenses, unless the client consents and the amount is not excessive. See Rule 1.5, Cmt. [1] ("lawyer may seek payment for services performed in-house . . . either by charging an amount to which the client has agreed in advance or by charging an amount that reflects the cost incurred by the lawyer, provided in either case that the amount charged is not excessive"); N.Y. State 1050 (2015) (citing Rule 1.5, Cmt. [1] and other bar association opinions); N.Y. City 2006-3 (regarding expenses, lawyers may charge only the direct cost and a reasonable allocation of overhead expense); ABA 93-379 (1993) (same).

6. A person's cancellation of an initial consultation without adequate notice may cause the lawyer to forego other opportunities for gainful employment, as well as creating administrative expense. If the cancellation charge is deemed a fee, the factors for determining whether it is excessive include "the likelihood, if apparent or made known to the client, that the acceptance of the particular employment will preclude other employment by the lawyer." Rule 1.5(a)(2). We think it is apparent to any person that cancelling an appointment without reasonable advance notice may deprive the lawyer of the ability to fill the time slot.

7. If the cancellation charge is deemed an expense, as noted above, the amount must either reflect the cost to the lawyer or be agreed to by the client and in either case not be excessive. In the facts posed by the inquirer, the inquirer would explain the proposed cancellation charge and request a credit card, so that the giving of the credit card number may be deemed consent to the charge.

8. Moreover, the proposed cancellation charge – $25 – is nominal. Rule 1.5(a) provides: "A fee is excessive when, after a review of the facts, a reasonable lawyer would be left with a definite and firm conviction that the proposed charge is excessive." We have no such definite and firm conviction. On the contrary, the proposed cancellation charge is less than 17% of the lawyer's usual $150 charge for a consultation.

Must the Cancellation Charge be Communicated in Writing?

9. The fact that some of the potential clients that are the subject of this inquiry have divorce matters may have special significance to whether the communication is oral or in writing. Rule 1.5(d) provides that a lawyer may not enter into an arrangement for, charge or collect a fee in a domestic relations matter if "a written retainer agreement has not been signed by the lawyer and client setting forth in plain language the nature of the relationship and the details of the fee arrangement." Thus, if the cancellation charge is a "fee," it would seem to be prohibited by Rule 1.5(d) in a domestic relations matter before a written agreement has been signed.

10. There are also court rules that require retainer agreements in domestic relations matters (22 NYCRR 1400.3) and certain non-domestic relations matters (22 NYCRR 1215). Interpreting the court rules is a question law that is beyond the scope of our jurisdiction. We note, however, that in each case the court rule applies when an attorney "undertakes to represent a client" and, in a non-domestic relations matter, if the fee is expected to be $3,000 or greater and the services are not of the same kind that the client has previously received and paid for.

11. Comment [2] to Rule 1.5 advises that, "[e]ven where not required, it is desirable to furnish the client with at least a simple memorandum or copy of the lawyer's customary fee arrangements that states the general nature of the legal services to be provided, the basis, rate or total amount of the fee, and whether and to what extent the client will be responsible for any costs, expenses or disbursements in the course of the representation." Nevertheless, where the matter involved is not a domestic relations matter, the Rules do not require that agreements as to fees be in writing.

12. As noted above, in the case of expenses, the amount must either reflect the cost to the lawyer or be agreed to by the client. The Rules do not require such agreement to be in writing unless law otherwise requires.

CONCLUSION:

13. A lawyer may ethically charge a nominal amount to a person who cancels an appointment for an initial consultation without reasonable notice, provided the lawyer informs the person (orally or in writing) what will trigger the cancellation charge and the charge either represents the cost incurred by the lawyer as a result of the late cancellation or the client has given advance consent to the amount of the charge.

TOPIC: Confidentiality; Identifying clients

DIGEST: A lawyer may include in advertising the names of clients regularly represented by the attorney provided each client has given prior written consent. Absent prior consent after full disclosure to the client, a lawyer may not disclose the identity of a client or the fact of representation, if this information constitutes "confidential information" under Rule 1.6(a). If the client has not requested that the lawyer keep the client's name and the fact of representation confidential, then the lawyer must determine whether such information is publicly known and, if not, whether disclosing the information is likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client. This will depend on the client and the specific facts and circumstances of the representation, and, if the lawyer is not reasonably confident of the client's views, it may require the lawyer to consult with the client.

RULES: 1.6(a), 7.1(b)(2),

FACTS:

1. The inquirer has been asked by a potential client, a co-op board, to disclose the names of other co-op apartment building boards that the inquirer has represented to assist the potential client in deciding whether to retain the inquirer.

QUESTION:

2. May a lawyer disclose to a potential client the names of other current or past clients?

OPINION:

3. The New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") provide that an attorney may include in advertising the names of clients regularly represented by the attorney provided the client has given prior written consent. Rule 7.1(b)(2). The attorney may have obtained a client's consent to advertise the lawyer's representation of the client as part of the original engagement letter, during the representation, or after the conclusion of the representation. If so, the inquirer may rely on Rule 7.1 to make the requested disclosures. But Rule 7.1(b) is only an illustrative list of examples of permissible advertising content. It does not exhaust the circumstances under which a lawyer may disclose client names.[11]

4. Absent specific client consent, a lawyer must consider whether a client's name and the fact of representation is confidential information under Rule 1.6(a), which ordinarily prohibits a lawyer from knowingly revealing confidential information, or using confidential information to the disadvantage of the client or the advantage of the lawyer or a third person, unless the client gives informed consent. (Various exceptions to this general rule are not relevant here). "Confidential information" is defined in Rule 1.6(a) as "information gained during or relating to the representation of a client, whatever its source, that is (a) protected by the attorney-client privilege, (b) likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed, or (c) information that the client has requested be kept confidential." Under the definition, "confidential information" does not include information that is "generally known in the local community or in the trade, field or profession to which the information relates."

11 See N.Y. City Bar Committees on Professional & Judicial Ethics and Professional Responsibility, Commentary on New York's Ethics Rules Governing Lawyer Advertising and Solicitation (March 2009) at 43 (noting that Rule 7.1(b)(2) is a safe harbor for listing client names in attorney advertising with written permission but does not preclude listing client names without written permission under other circumstances).

5. The identity of a client is information gained during the representation of the client. The client's identity generally is not information protected by the attorney-client privilege. In N.Y. State 720 (1999), we addressed whether the identities of former clients must be disclosed by a moving attorney in the course of performing a conflict check at the new law firm. We stated:

> Although the fact that the client consulted a lawyer and the general nature of the consultation will not usually be privileged, . . . the client's name, the fact that the client consulted a lawyer and the general nature of the consultation may nevertheless constitute 'secrets' of the client which the lawyer may not disclose."[12]

Accord N.Y. State 645 (1993) (the identity of the client generally is not deemed attorney-client privileged because disclosure does not reveal the content of any communications and the identity was not provided for the purpose of obtaining legal advice, but the client's identity may constitute a secret because disclosure may be embarrassing or detrimental to the client).

6. If a client has requested that lawyer keep the client's identity confidential, then the lawyer is duty-bound not to disclose the client's name to potential clients.

7. If the client has not requested that the lawyer keep the client's name confidential, then the lawyer must determine whether the fact of representation is generally known and, if not, whether disclosing the identity of the client and the fact of representation is likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client. This will depend on the client and the specific facts and circumstances of the representation.

8. In N.Y. State 991 (2013), we stated that information is "generally known" within the meaning of Rule 1.6(a) only if it is known to a sizeable percentage of people in the local community or in the trade, field or profession to which the information relates. See also Jamaica Pub. Serv. v. AIU Ins., 92 N.Y. 631 (1998) (information is "generally known" when it is "readily available in such public materials as trade periodicals and filings with State and Federal regulators"). If the lawyer has represented the client in publicly reported litigation or is identified on client websites as representing them, the fact of representation may be readily available in public materials. More broadly, if the fact that the law firm represents its co-op board clients is widely known in the local real estate industry, then the information would be considered to be generally known. If information is generally known, then it is not confidential and the lawyer may freely disclose it. If the information is not generally known, however, then the law firm may disclose it only if it concludes that the information would not be embarrassing or detrimental to the client. This determination is necessarily fact specific.

12 As support for the lack of privilege, Opinion 720 cited Colton v. United States, 306 F.2d 633 (2d Cir. 1962), cert. denied, 371 U.S. 951 (1963). Opinion 720 construed Disciplinary Rule 4-101(A) in the New York Code of Professional Responsibility, which is the predecessor to current Rule 1.6(a) in the Rules of Professional Conduct. DR 4-101(A) defined "confidences" to include information protected by the evidentiary privilege, and "secrets" to include information likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed, or that the client has requested by held inviolate. The definitions of "confidences' and "secrets" under former DR 4-101(A) have been incorporated into the definition of "confidential information" under Rule 1.6(a).

9. The client is more likely to find that disclosure of the fact of a current or prior representation by a lawyer is embarrassing or detrimental where the representation involves or involved criminal law, bankruptcy, debt collection, or family law. The instant inquiry concerns representations of co-op boards and does not immediately suggest a reason that current or prior clients may deem the representation by the inquirer to be embarrassing or detrimental. However, unless the lawyer is reasonably confident that he or she knows that the co-op board clients would not consider disclosure of their identities and/or the fact of representation to be embarrassing or detrimental, the lawyer must consult with these clients before disclosing their names to the potential client. See Nassau County 98-5 (where lawyer receives government subpoena for client names, lawyer should consult with client "unless the lawyer is justifiably confident that he or she already know[s] all of the pertinent facts and already is sensitive to all of the possible nuances of the client's circumstances").

10. A number of factors other than the subject matter of the representation may enable the lawyer to determine that the client would not object to being identified as the lawyer's client. For example, the client may have identified the lawyer to individuals who were not involved in the representation as the lawyer who represented the client in a matter, or the lawyer may hear from individuals not involved in the client representation that the client has given the lawyer's name as the person who had represented him or her in a matter.

CONCLUSION:

11. A lawyer may include in advertising the names of clients regularly represented by the attorney provided that each client has given prior written consent. Absent prior consent after full disclosure to the client, a lawyer may not disclose the identity of a client or the fact of representation, if this information constitutes "confidential information" under Rule 1.6(a). If the client has not requested that the lawyer keep the client's name and the fact of representation confidential, then the lawyer must determine whether such information is publicly known and, if not, whether disclosing the information is likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client. This will depend on the client and the specific facts and circumstances of the representation, and, if the lawyer is not reasonably confident of the client's views, it may require the lawyer to consult with the client.

TOPIC: Retired lawyer's use of "Esq."

DIGEST: A lawyer who is retired from the practice of law under Section 118.1(g) of the Rules of the Chief Administrative Judge and who therefore may render legal services only without compensation may use the title "Esq.", but must indicate the retired status or the limitations on his or her right to practice if there is a risk of confusion regarding his or her role.

RULES: 8.4(c).

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is retired from the practice of law. Pursuant to Section 118.1(g) of the Rules of the Chief Administrative Judge of the State of New York, the inquirer qualifies for an exemption from payment of the annual registration fee for attorneys. Under that rule, a retired lawyer may render legal services only without compensation.

QUESTION:

2. May a retired attorney use the term "Esq." after his or her name on business cards and stationery in connection with a non-legal business?

OPINION:

May a retired lawyer use the term "Esq."?

3. Under Section 118.1(g) of the Rules of the Chief Administrative Judge, 22 NYCRR § 118.1(g), an attorney who certifies that he or she is retired from the practice of law is exempt from the biennial registration fee (currently, $375). A retired attorney also is exempt from the continuing legal education requirements applicable to practicing lawyers. 22 NYCRR § 1500.5(b)(4). An attorney is "retired" for this purpose "when, other than the performance of legal services without compensation, he or she does not practice law in any respect and does not intend ever to engage in acts that constitute the practice of law." 22 NYCRR § 118.1(g) (emphasis added). As the definition indicates, a retired attorney may continue to render legal services without compensation.[13]

4. As the ethics committee of the New York City Bar Association observed in N.Y. City 1994-5:

> The title "esquire" does not legally designate an individual as a lawyer because it is not conferred in this country as an academic degree or license. It has, however, been adopted by lawyers by convention as a form of designation. Thus, one using the title in the United States is identifying himself or herself as a lawyer.

13 An alternative to claiming "retired" status is voluntary resignation from the Bar. See generally App. Div., 2d Jud. Dept., Attorney Matters: Voluntary Resignation from the Bar of the State of New York, available at http://www.nycourts.gov/courts/ad2/attorney-matters_VoluntaryResignation.shtml. A lawyer who has not resigned from the bar remains subject to the Rules of Professional Conduct. We express no opinion about whether a person who has resigned from the Bar entirely can use the term "Esq."

5. At the same time, Opinion 1994-5 noted that the term "Esq." does not have precisely the same connotation as, for example, "Attorney-at-Law." Opinion 1994-5 also opined that lawyers acting in a nonlegal capacity—there, at a nonprofit organization in public relations, administration or communicating with members about the organization's positions—could use the term "Esq." without qualification, but identifying themselves as "Attorney-at-Law" might lead the recipient of a communication to conclude that the lawyer was acting in a legal capacity.

6. Rule 8.4(c) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct prohibits lawyers from engaging in "conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation." A New York lawyer is bound by the New York Rules of Professional Conduct, not only with respect to law practice but also with respect to nonlegal activities, both personal and professional. The ethical question thus is whether a retired lawyer's use of the term "Esq." violates Rule 8.4(c). Under New York's regulatory scheme, a lawyer who has opted for "retired" status remains a lawyer, even if his or her practice must be limited to unpaid legal work. Thus, to that extent at least, the use of the term "Esq." after his or her name is accurate.

Must a retired lawyer indicate limitations on the right to practice law?

7. A related question is whether a retired lawyer who uses the term "Esq." must indicate the restrictions on his or her right to practice or must indicate that he or she is "retired." In Rhode Island Opinion 96-24, the Rhode Island Ethics Advisory Panel opined that a retired lawyer placed on "inactive" status could use "Attorney at Law" or "Esquire" on letterhead "as long as the notation 'Retired' is included." New York's regulatory regime is different; New York has no "inactive" status. In any case, we conclude that whether a retired lawyer must indicate the limitations on his or her status, and how the lawyer must indicate those limitations, depends on the particular circumstances and, in particular, whether there is risk that the lawyer's clients or the public will be confused regarding that status.

8. This Committee and others have opined that when a lawyer engages in a non-legal business, it is not misleading for the lawyer to identify himself or herself as a lawyer – but a lawyer who does so must take care to avoid confusion. The lawyer must ensure that any relevant audience is not misled to believe that the lawyer is acting as a lawyer. Ethics committees have recognized various ways to dispel any such confusion.

9. In N.Y. State 170 (1970), for example, this Committee opined that it was not improper for an employee of a professional search organization dealing primarily with placement of lawyers to use the term "esquire," on his or her business card, but we "recommended" that the card also indicate the employee's position with the business "so as to negate any possible interpretation that he is a practicing attorney or general counsel to his employer." In N.Y. State 832 ¶ 9 (2009), the Committee concluded that where a lawyer sold shelf corporations to persons who were not law-firm clients and advertised his or her status as a lawyer (such as by use of the term "Esq."), there was "a substantial risk that the purchaser of the shelf corporations will be misled as to whether an attorney-client relationship exists." The Committee also opined that "one way for a lawyer to avoid application of the Rules to the sale of nonlegal services would be to give the purchaser in writing [a] . . . disclaimer stating that no legal services are being rendered and that the protection of an attorney-client relationship does not exist."

10. Our opinion is consistent with the ethics opinions of several other committees outside New York. See, e.g., California Opinion 1999-154 (lawyer acting as investment adviser and not rendering legal advice," but who used "Esq." on her promotional material and stationery, could avoid confusion by "an express disclaimer that [she] is not offering and does not intend to provide legal services or legal advice"); Maine Opinion 91 (1988) (the use of "Esq." after name of attorney shareholder on the letterhead of a business corporation did not suggest "an intent to mislead or deceive the public" and was permissible "for whatever prestige value it may hold"); D.C. Opinion 149 (1985) (lawyer employed by nonlegal governmental-affairs consulting business could use "Esq." provided no reasonable likelihood the public would be misled that the business is a law firm).

11. Here, we do not think the use of the term "Esq." by a retired lawyer indicates that he or she is acting as an attorney. Nor do we think a retired lawyer's use of the term "Esq." necessarily leads to any confusion about his or her status or role and thus a clarifying term or disclaimer is not always required. In many circumstances, such as in social interactions, a lawyer using the term is simply invoking "whatever prestige value [the term] may hold," as the Maine ethics committee put it. Cf. N.Y. State 105(a) (1969) (lawyer may identify his or her professional degree in a social context). There is nothing misleading in that context: the precise limitations on the lawyer's right to practice just do not matter. The same is true in many business contexts far removed from the rendition of legal advice.

12. In sum, just as a lawyer engaged in a non-legal business who may not provide legal advice to the customers of that business need only qualify the use of the term "Esq." if there is a risk of confusion, so here we do not think a retired lawyer needs to qualify his or her use of the term unless there is risk of confusion.

13. That risk could take a number of forms, including, for example, confusion over whether the lawyer is rendering legal advice to the customers of the business and confusion over whether the lawyer is acting as in-house counsel to the business. In each case, if a risk of such confusion arises, the lawyer must take steps to indicate the limited nature of his or her practice. This could include, for example, using the term "retired" in conjunction with "Esq." or indicating that his or her practice is limited to performing legal services without compensation.

CONCLUSION:

14. A lawyer who has taken "retired" status may use the term "Esq." on business cards and letterhead, but if there is a risk of confusion about his or her role, the lawyer must indicate the retired status or the limitations on his or her ability to practice.

OPINION 1090 (03/31/2016)

TOPIC: Billing client for work performed by an unpaid student-intern

DIGEST: A law firm may bill a client for work performed by a student-intern despite the fact that the law firm does not pay the intern, because the intern receives academic credit for the work, as long as (i) the internship program complies with applicable law, (ii) the educational institution does not object to the client charges, and (iii) the charge is not excessive.

RULES: 1.5(a) & (b)

FACTS:

1. A law school has a student-intern program in which student interns work for local law firms and receive academic credit for their work in lieu of monetary compensation. A law firm asks whether it may bill clients for work performed for its clients by student-interns, despite the fact that the law firm does not pay the interns.

QUESTION:

2. May a law firm bill a client for work performed by a student-intern despite the fact that the law firm does not pay the interns, because they receive academic credit for their work?

OPINION:

3. Our jurisdiction extends only to interpretations of the Rules of Professional Conduct. We do not interpret otherwise applicable laws or render factual determinations. Consequently, we assume that the proposals of the law firm to bill clients for the services of the interns and to hire those interns without compensation comply with applicable laws. (In that latter regard, we note that the 2010 standards of the U.S. Department of Labor concerning internship programs prohibited a private sector employer from deriving an immediate advantage from the activities of the intern. However, that standard was rejected by the Second Circuit Court of Appeals in Glatt v. Fox Searchlight Pictures, Inc., 791 F.3d 376 (2d Cir. 2015) in favor of a non-exhaustive set of considerations that focus on the what the intern receives in exchange for his work.) We also assume that the educational institution that sponsors the internship program allows the law firm to charge its clients for the services of the intern.

4. Rule 1.5(b) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") enjoins a lawyer to communicate to a client not only the scope of a representation but also "the basis or rate of the fee and expenses for which the client will be responsible." (Whether that communication must be in writing is a question of law dependent upon the provisions of Part 1500 of the Rules of the Judiciary, 22 N.Y.C.R.R. Part 1215. See also, 22 N.Y.C.R.R. Part 1400, governing fee and retainer arrangements in matrimonial matters.)

5. A lawyer is further enjoined by Rule 1.5(a) not to "make an agreement for, charge, or collect an excessive or illegal fee or expense." The test of whether a fee is excessive is whether "a reasonable lawyer would be left with a definite and firm conviction that the fee is excessive." While expenses are not specified in the definition of "excessive," Comment [1] to Rule 1.5 makes clear the New York

State Bar Association's intent that expenses should be subject to the same limitation. See N.Y. State 1087 (2016). See also N.Y. State 1050 (2015) (relating to credit card processing fees as a client-reimbursable expenses).

6. Whether the charge for a given service, such as the service of a paralegal, recent law school graduate or law clerk, to all of which a student-intern may be likened, is a fee or an expense is a question that need not be resolved in order to answer the present inquiry. We note, however, that courts have in some instances treated the charges for the services of paralegals as fees. See Missouri v. Jenkins, 491 US. 274 (1989) (in fee shifting, it is proper to pay for the time of paralegals, law clerks and recent law graduates at market rates rather than at cost).

7. We find nothing in the Rules that would prohibit a sponsoring law firm from billing for the services of a law student-intern on a fee basis, even if the sponsoring firm is compensating neither the intern nor the sending law school, provided that the client has been advised of the firm's intent to charge for the intern's services and the basis of the charge (e.g., per task or per hour or some fraction thereof) and provided, further, that the fee is neither excessive nor illegal.

8. If the cost of a student-intern is charged as an expense, the lawyer may charge the client "either . . . an amount to which the client has agreed in advance or . . . an amount that reflects the cost incurred by the lawyer" to sponsor the intern (e.g. the cost of supervising the intern), subject to the same provisos. See Rule 1.5(a) and (b) and Rule 1.5, Comment [1]; N.Y. State 1087 [35-15], supra, N.Y, State 1050, supra.

CONCLUSION:

9. A law firm may bill a client for work performed by a student-intern despite the fact that the law firm does not pay the intern, because the intern receives academic credit for the work, as long as (i) the internship program complies with applicable law, (ii) the educational institution does not object to the client charges, and (iii) the charge is not excessive.

TOPIC: Misconduct – Duty to Report

DIGEST: A New York lawyer who knows that a person admitted to the bar in another state, but not admitted or authorized to practice law in New York, has represented clients in the courts of New York must report that knowledge to a tribunal or other authority empowered to act if the lawyer concludes that the other person's failure raises a substantial question as to the other person's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness as a lawyer. Rule 8.3 applies even though the other person is neither admitted nor authorized to practice law in New York and even if the conduct is no longer occurring. Failure of the other person to comply with applicable rules on authorization to practice – whether generally, temporarily, or pro hac vice – ordinarily will raise a substantial question as to the other lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness as a lawyer. A good faith belief is not enough to trigger the reporting obligation.

RULES: 3.4(c), 5.4, 5.5 (a) & (b), 7.3, 8.3

FACTS:

1. A lawyer admitted in New York State "believes" that an individual admitted to the practice of law in another state has appeared before New York courts without being admitted or authorized to practice law in New York. The Inquirer also "believes" that the individual lawyer is no longer appearing in New York Courts.

QUESTION:

2. (a) Does a New York lawyer have an obligation to report the belief that an individual admitted to practice outside New York but not admitted or authorized to practice (whether generally, temporarily or pro hac vice) in New York State has improperly appeared in the past in New York Courts?

(b) Does it matter that the conduct is no longer occurring?

OPINION:

3. At the outset, we note that our jurisdiction extends only to interpreting the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"). We do not opine on any duties that a lawyer may have to the courts under the rules of individual courts or under new Part 523 of the Rules of the Court of Appeals ("Part 523") authorizing the temporary practice of law in New York by out-of-state and foreign attorneys.[14]

4. Two Rules may be relevant in examining the question: Rule 8.3 and Rule 5.5.

5. Rule 8.3 sets forth the standards for reporting professional misconduct by another lawyer. It provides:

> A lawyer who knows that another lawyer has committed a violation of the Rules of Professional Conduct that raises a substantial question as to the lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness as a lawyer shall report such knowledge to a tribunal or other authority empowered to investigate or act upon such violation.

6. Rule 5.5 states:

> (a) A lawyer shall not practice law in a jurisdiction in violation of the regulation of the legal profession in that jurisdiction.
> (b) A lawyer shall not aid a nonlawyer in the unauthorized practice of law.

Meaning of "Lawyer" in "Another Lawyer has Committed a Violation"

7. The term "lawyer" is used throughout the Rules but is not defined. Does it mean "a person admitted or authorized to practice in New York," or is it broader than that? Certain rules and our prior opinions indicate that the term "lawyer" may mean different things in different rules.

8. For example, Rule 7.5(d) permits partnerships between "lawyers" licensed in different jurisdictions as long as the firm's letterhead notes their jurisdictional practice limitations. See also N.Y. State 806 (2007). Rule 7.3(i) specifically applies the solicitation provisions of Rule 7.3 to "a lawyer . . . not admitted to practice in this State who shall solicit retention by residents of this State". In N.Y. State 864 (2011), we held that a lawyer admitted in another state is not a "nonlawyer" for purposes of Rule 5.4(a), which prohibits a lawyer from sharing legal fees with a nonlawyer. Rule 1.15(e) specifies that only a lawyer admitted to practice in New York State may be an authorized signatory of an attorney trust account.

14 Effective December 30, 2015, the New York Court of Appeals adopted a new Part 523 of the Rules of the Court of Appeals, which authorized the temporary practice of law in New York by out-of-state and foreign attorneys. Part 523 is similar to the American Bar Association's Model Rule 5.5, which permits temporary practice of law by attorneys licensed in other U.S. jurisdictions under certain prescribed circumstances. (The ABA's Model Rule 5.5, or substantially equivalent language, has been adopted in more than 45 other jurisdictions but not as part of the Rules of Professional Conduct in New York.) Under Part 523.2, a non-New York lawyer in good standing where he or she is admitted may provide legal sevices in New York on a temporary basis where such services (i) are undertaken in association with a lawyer admitted to practice in New York who actively participates in and assumes joint responsibility for the matter, (ii) are in or reasonably related to a pending or potential proceeding before a tribunal in New York if the lawyer or a person the lawyer is assisting is authorized to appear in such proceeding or reasonably expects to be so authorized; or (iii) are not within the preceding paragraph and arises out of or are reasonably related to the lawyer's practice in a jurisdiction in which the lawyer is admitted to practice. Because the inquiry before us is dated shortly after the Part 523 Rules became effective and refers to the other lawyer's past conduct, we assume that the other lawyer was not relying on the Part 523 Rules.

9. In other Rules, it is less clear that the rule was intended to apply to a person not admitted in New York. For example, Rule 8.5 – the choice of law rule for disciplinary matters – addresses lawyers admitted elsewhere only if they are also admitted in New York.

10. Consequently, the answer to the first question posed here depends on whether the definition of "another lawyer" in Rule 8.3 – which requires a lawyer who knows that "another lawyer" has committed a violation of the Rules of Professional Conduct that raises a "substantial question as to that lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness as a lawyer" must report that knowledge to a tribunal or other authority authorized to investigate or act upon such violation – includes a person admitted to practice law in one or more other jurisdictions but not admitted or authorized to practice law in New York (a "non-New York lawyer").

11. Comment [1] to Rule 8.3 explains the rationale for the Rule: "Self-regulation of the legal profession requires that members of the profession initiate disciplinary investigation when they know of a violation of the Rules of Professional Conduct. . . . An apparently isolated violation may indicate a pattern of misconduct that only a disciplinary investigation can uncover." Since the courts control whether an out-of-state lawyer may be admitted pro hac vice, and since New York disciplinary authorities can always refer violations by a non-New York lawyer to the disciplinary authorities in the admitting jurisdiction or jurisdictions outside New York, we believe that violations of the Rules by a non-New York lawyer that raise a substantial question as to the lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness implicate the policy goals articulated in Comment [1] to Rule 8.3. Consequently, we believe the term "another lawyer" in Rule 8.3 should be read to include a lawyer not admitted in New York who engages in misconduct in New York.

12. This conclusion is supported by 22 NYCRR § 523.3, which expressly refers to "complaints" against non-New York lawyers. Section 523.3 provides as follows:

> A [non-New York] lawyer who practices law temporarily in this State pursuant to this Part [523] shall be subject to the New York Rules of Professional Conduct and to the disciplinary authority of this State in connection with such temporary practice to the same extent as if the lawyer were admitted or authorized to practice in New York. A grievance committee may report complaints and evidence of a disciplinary violation against a lawyer practicing temporarily pursuant to this Part to the appropriate disciplinary authority of any jurisdiction in which the attorney is admitted or authorized to practice law. [Emphasis added.]

13. Our conclusion is also supported by court rules governing disciplinary matters that pre-dated Part 523, some of which applied misconduct rules not only to lawyers admitted in New York but also to lawyers who "commit acts," or "in any way participate in any action or proceeding," or "transact business" or "practice" in New York. See, e.g., 22 N.Y.C.R.R. Part 603.1(a) (First Dep't), 22 N.Y.C.R.R. Part 691(a) (Second Dep't), 22 N.Y.C.R.R. Part 806.1 (Third Dep't), 22 N.Y.C.R.R. Part 1022.17 (Fourth Dep't).

Must the Inquirer Report on the Other Lawyer?

14. Although we have concluded that the term "another lawyer" in Rule 8.3 applies to a non-New York lawyer, there is still a question whether the inquiring lawyer has a reporting obligation under Rule 8.3 in the particular circumstances posed in this inquiry. That depends on two independent factors.

15. First, the inquirer must "know" that the other lawyer has committed a violation of the Rules – here a violation of Rule 5.5(a) – by practicing without being admitted generally in New York or without being authorized pro hac vice by a New York state or federal court. For this purpose, "know" means actual knowledge, although knowledge may be inferred from circumstances. Rule 1.0(k). A good faith belief falling short of knowledge is not enough to trigger the reporting obligation.

16. Assuming that the inquirer has the requisite knowledge under the reporting rule, the inquirer must conclude that the other lawyer's conduct raises a substantial question as to the other lawyer's "honesty, trustworthiness or fitness as a lawyer." Comment [3] to Rule 8.3 explains this phrase: "The term 'substantial' refers to the seriousness of the possible offense and not the quantum of evidence of which the lawyer is aware." We believe that, in most circumstances, representation of a client in New York by a non-New York lawyer without becoming authorized or associating with a New York lawyer will implicate the honesty, trustworthiness or fitness of the non-New York lawyer.[15] Although it is true that over 45 other jurisdictions have adopted some version of ABA Model Rule 5.5, neither that rule nor any state equivalent authorizes lawyers to appear in the courts in jurisdictions where they are not admitted or authorized to practice. Every lawyer knows or should know that appearing in court requires either general admission in that jurisdiction, pro hac vice admission, or authorization under the jurisdiction's temporary practice rules. A lawyer who appears in a New York court without any authorization either has failed to research the rules or has deliberately flouted those rules. Consequently, we believe that appearing in court in a jurisdiction without being authorized generally, temporarily, or pro hac vice evinces a lack of trustworthiness or fitness. See Rule 3.4(c) (a lawyer shall not disregard a standing rule of a tribunal).

17. If the inquirer has the requisite knowledge of a violation and concludes that the violation raises the required "substantial question," the inquirer's belief that the violation has ceased is immaterial. See Rule 8.1, Cmt. [1] ("An apparently isolated violation may indicate a pattern of misconduct").

18. Because we have concluded that Rule 8.3 applies to misconduct in New York by a lawyer who is not admitted or authorized to practice in New York, we need not reach the issue of whether the inquirer is obligated to report the non-New York lawyer's unauthorized practice under Rule 5.5. In any event, whether particular conduct constitutes the unauthorized practice of law, which is a crime in New York (see New York Judiciary Law §§ 478, 484, and 485-a), is a legal question.

CONCLUSION:

19. A New York lawyer who knows that a person admitted to the bar in another state, but not admitted or authorized to practice law in New York, has represented clients in the courts of New York

15 We generally do not give opinions about the conduct of lawyers other than the inquirer, since applying the Rules usually depends on the facts and circumstances and we cannot make an informed determination without all the facts.

must report that knowledge to a tribunal or other authority empowered to act if the lawyer concludes that the other person's failure raises a substantial question as to the other person's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness as a lawyer. Rule 8.3 applies even though the other person is neither admitted nor authorized to practice law in New York and even if the conduct is no longer occurring. Failure of the other person to comply with applicable rules on authorization to practice – whether generally, temporarily, or pro hac vice – ordinarily will raise a substantial question as to the other lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness as a lawyer. A good faith belief is not enough to trigger the reporting obligation.

TOPIC: Duty to Disclose Malpractice of Co-Counsel

DIGEST: A lawyer must disclose to the client information that the lawyer reasonably believes reveals that another lawyer, also representing the client, has committed a significant error or omission that may give rise to a malpractice claim.

RULES: 1.4(a) & (b), 1.7(a), 1.16(b), 8.4(c)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer was engaged to represent a client on the eve of trial. The client's prior counsel is serving as co-counsel. In preparing the case, the inquirer has learned that co-counsel conducted virtually no discovery and made no document requests, although the inquirer believes correspondence and emails between the parties could be critical to the case. The inquirer believes this was a significant error or omission that may give rise to a malpractice claim against co-counsel. The outcome of the case, however, has yet to be decided. The inquirer is concerned about disclosing this situation to the client because it would undermine inquirer's relationship with co-counsel, but the inquirer also believes it is in the client's best interests to disclose the facts as soon as possible.

QUESTION:

2. Is a lawyer ethically obligated to disclose to a current client the lawyer's belief that a current co-counsel to the client has engaged in a significant error or omission in representing the client?

OPINION:

3. Our opinions have consistently held that a lawyer must report to a client a significant error or omission by the lawyer in his or her rendition of legal services. See N.Y. State 734 (2000), N.Y. State 295 (1973), N.Y. State 275 (1972). See also ABA Informal Op. 1010 (1967).

4. Most of these opinions are based on two principles in the former Code of Professional Responsibility – the lawyer's obligation to keep the client fully informed, and the lawyer's obligation to withdraw from representation where the lawyer has a personal conflict of interest. Those two principles are now embodied in Rule 1.4 and Rule 1.7.[16]

5. Rule 1.4 governs the ethical obligations of a lawyer regarding communication with the client:

16 In re Tallon, 447 N.Y.S.2d 50 (App. Div. 1982), a case often cited for the principle that a lawyer must disclose the lawyer's errors and omissions to the client, also cites the predecessor to Rule 8.4(c), which provided that "a lawyer must not engage in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation." However, in Tallon, the lawyer had not only failed to disclose to the client the fact that he had let the statute of limitations run on her claim, but also obtained a general release from the client without advising the client of the claim against him. Other courts and ethics committees that have addressed the issue have also based their conclusions on the two principles cited here. See the authorities cited in notes accompanying ¶ 10 infra.

> (a) A lawyer shall (1) promptly inform the client of . . . (iii) any material developments in the matter . . . ; (3) keep the client reasonably informed about the status of the matter; and
> (b) A lawyer shall explain a matter to the extent reasonably necessary to permit the client to make informed decisions regarding the representation.

6. Comment [1] to Rule 1.4 reveals the touchstone for the lawyer's obligation: client autonomy in decision-making. Comment [1] says: "Reasonable communication between the lawyer and the client is necessary for the client to participate effectively in the representation." See also Comment [3] ("paragraph (a)(3) requires that the lawyer keep the client reasonably informed about the status of the matter, such as significant developments affecting the timing or the substance of the representation").

7. The second principle reflected in our opinions on the lawyer's own malpractice is whether the significant error or omission results in an inherent conflict between the interest of the client and the lawyer's own interest. In that case, Rule 1.16(b) may require the lawyer to withdraw. Rule 1.7(a)(2) provides:

> Except as provided in paragraph (b), a lawyer shall not represent a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that . . . there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests.[17]

8. Although the personal conflict of interest may be more obvious in the case of a lawyer dealing with his or her own malpractice, here there may be a personal conflict concern because the inquirer notes that "exposing counsel's malpractice would undermine our relationship with co-counsel." The inquirer does not state whether the inquirer was brought into the case by the client or by co-counsel, or whether co-counsel has referred matters to the inquirer in the past, or the inquirer expects co-counsel to be a potential source of referrals in the future. The desire to maintain a good relationship with co-counsel would only implicate a personal conflict of interest under Rule 1.7(a) if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that "there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected" by the lawyer's financial or personal interests. For example, if the desire for harmony with co-counsel is motivated by the goal of avoiding harm to this client's case, such desire would clearly not be a "personal interest" within the meaning of Rule 1.7(a)(2). That is an issue that the inquirer must determine in the first instance.

9. In N.Y. State 734 (2000), this Committee opined that a lawyer "must report to the client a significant error or omission by the lawyer that may give rise to a possible malpractice claim . . . ." We cited N.Y. State 275 (1972), which said that a lawyer who failed to file a claim within the statute of limitations period "had a professional duty to notify the client promptly that the lawyer had committed a serious and irremediable error, and of the possible claim the client may have against the lawyer for damages." Opinion 734 also pointed out, however, that not every possible error creates a possible claim for malpractice:

> Some errors can be corrected during the course of the representation. Others are not particularly harmful to the client's cause. In some cases, it may be questionable whether the lawyer acted erroneously at all. Therefore, when a lawyer makes a mistake in the representation of a client, the likelihood that the lawyer's representation will be affected adversely because of the lawyer's interest in avoiding civil liability will depend upon all the relevant facts.

10. Several bar association ethics opinions have opined that lawyers have an ethical obligation to disclose their own malpractice.[18] Numerous court cases and disciplinary opinions concur.[19] Legal writers have also discussed the obligation.[20] Finally, a lawyer's duty to inform the client of his or her own malpractice is also supported by the Restatement (Third) of The Law Governing Lawyers § 20 cmt. c (2000) (Am. Law Inst. 1998) ("If the lawyer's conduct of the matter gives the client a substantial malpractice claim against the lawyer, the lawyer must disclose that to the client," citing In re Tallon, 447 N.Y.S.2d 50 (App. Div. 1982)).

11. The lawyer's obligation to keep the client fully informed under Rule 1.4(a) applies equally to a significant error or omission by co-counsel that may give rise to a malpractice claim. See Estate of Spencer v. Gavin, 946 A.2d 1051 (N.J. Super. A.D. 2008). In Estate of Spencer the New Jersey court held that a lawyer who did not report co-counsel's theft of client funds could be liable for malpractice. The court in Estate of Spencer based its decision in part on New Jersey Rule 1.4(a).

12. As in the case of the lawyer's own malpractice, the inquirer has a duty to inform the client of co-counsel's malpractice if the inquirer concludes that co-counsel's error or omission was significant. It is not clear from the inquiry whether the inquirer has spoken to the co-counsel to determine his or her strategy for the matter (i.e., why co-counsel took "virtually no" discovery and made no document requests). Co-counsel's decision may have been negligent, but it may have been strategic. In any event, determining whether co-counsel's actions indicate a significant error or omission that may give rise to a malpractice claim involves questions of fact and law that are beyond the jurisdiction of this Committee.

13. If the inquirer determines that co-counsel has engaged in a significant error or omission that may give rise to a malpractice claim, then the lawyer must inform the client. This is particularly so because the client needs the information when the lawyer who has committed the significant error or omission is continuing to represent the client. As one writer has described it:

> Among the most critical decisions that the client has to make regarding the representation in that situation are (1) whether the client has a viable malpractice claim arising out of the representation, and, if so, whether to pursue it now or later, and (2) whether to continue the current representation.[21]

14. Here, if co-counsel has committed a significant error or omission that may give rise to a malpractice claim, the client may choose among many options, such as (i) continuing the attorney-client relationship with co-counsel and reserving any possible malpractice claim for later, (ii) terminating co-counsel while keeping the inquirer (or hiring a different lawyer), or (iii) bringing a malpractice action against co-counsel now. The client may want to seek independent advice regarding these options. Rule 1.4(b) requires a lawyer to "explain a matter to the extent reasonably necessary to permit the client to make informed decisions regarding the representation." However, the client can only make an informed choice among those options if the lawyer gives the client the relevant information about co-counsel's past conduct. Accordingly, Rule 1.4(b) requires that the lawyer disclose to the client the facts that the lawyer has learned about co-counsel.

15. The Bar has traditionally been leery of situations where the client seeks to replace one lawyer with another (sometimes referred to as "encroaching on professional employment of other lawyers"). See N.Y. State 305 (1973) ("A prospective substitute lawyer should . . . take special care to avoid suspicion that he may be using improper means to have himself substituted for the previously retained attorney. Thus he must not wrongfully or improperly disparage the other lawyer in an endeavor to supplant him . . . ."); N.Y. State 310 (1973) (lawyer retained to review work of another lawyer must have sufficient information respecting the work being evaluated to give a good faith opinion which will be completely fair to the other lawyer"). The source of this reticence may have been a concern over "solicitation" of employment, which does not apply with the same force to co-counsel whom the client has already employed. Nevertheless, the overriding concern of these opinions is fairness to other lawyers, including co-counsel, so Rule 1.4's concern with the best interests of the client indicates that the inquirer should not report misgivings about co-counsel to the client unless the inquirer reasonably believes co-counsel has committed a significant error or omission that may give rise to a malpractice claim. This standard is lower than the "knowledge" standard that triggers a lawyer's duty under Rule 8.3(a) to report another lawyer's disciplinary violation, but we do not think a lawyer should report co-counsel's shortcomings absent a well-grounded belief that the client needs the information to make informed decisions about the representation.

16. In N.Y. State 275 (1972), the error was not only significant, but irremediable, since the statute of limitations had passed. We do not believe the action of co-counsel must be irremediable before the inquirer should report it to the client.

CONCLUSION:

17. A lawyer must disclose to the client information that the lawyer reasonably believes reveals that another lawyer, who is currently co-counsel to the client, has committed a significant error or omission that may give rise to a malpractice claim.

TOPIC: Foreign jurisdiction practice; separate partnership with non-lawyer

DIGEST: A New York lawyer who is also admitted in a foreign jurisdiction and is practicing with non-lawyer partners in that jurisdiction may also practice in a separate New York law firm without violating the New York Rules of Professional Conduct as long as the lawyer (i) principally practices in the foreign jurisdiction or (ii) the predominant effect of the lawyer's practice with the foreign firm is in the foreign jurisdiction and (iii) the New York firm includes representations by the UK firm in its conflict of interest system.

RULES: 1.10(a) & (e), 5.4(b) & (d), and 8.5(b)(2)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a lawyer resident in the United Kingdom ("UK") and admitted to practice law both in England and New York. He serves as chief executive officer ("CEO"), director, and majority shareholder of an English law firm regulated by the Solicitors Registration Authority as an alternative business structure (the "UK ABS"). Consistent with English law, the UK ABS has a non-lawyer director and non-lawyer shareholders. The inquirer practices English law and has not practiced New York law since the UK ABS was formed.

2. The inquirer wishes to become a partner of a New York law firm, in addition to continuing with the UK ABS. The inquirer will continue to serve as CEO of the UK ABS, and will practice English law in the UK for that firm, representing primarily UK-based clients. The inquirer represents that the role with the New York law firm will be limited to management and administrative activities, and asserts that these activities do not involve practicing either New York or English law with the New York law firm. The inquirer asserts that the UK ABS and the New York law firm will be separate law firms; the New York law firm will not hold shares in the UK firm, and the UK firm will not be a member of the New York law firm.

QUESTION:

3. May a lawyer with a UK firm that has non-lawyer partners and shareholders also become a partner of a New York law firm?

OPINION:

4. Rule 5.4 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") addresses the professional independence of a lawyer. Rule 5.4(b) provides that "A lawyer shall not form a partnership with a nonlawyer if any of the activities of the partnership consist of the practice of law." Rule 5.4(d) also provides that "a lawyer shall not practice with or in the form of an entity authorized to practice law for profit if . . . (1) a nonlawyer owns any interest therein . . . (2) a nonlawyer is a member, corporate director or officer thereof . . . or (3) a nonlawyer has the right to direct or control the professional judgment of a lawyer."

5. Comment [2] to Rule 5.4 explains that the rationale for these prohibitions – they express the "traditional limitations on permitting a third party to direct or regulate the lawyer's professional judgment in rendering legal services to another."

Practice Solely in a UK Alternative Business Structure

6. To answer the question posed, we must determine whether Rule 5.4 applies to the inquirer's conduct. This, in turn, depends on Rule 8.5, entitled "Disciplinary Authority and Choice of Law," which provides as follows:

> (a) A lawyer admitted to practice in this state is subject to the disciplinary authority of this state, regardless of where the lawyer's conduct occurs. A lawyer may be subject to the disciplinary authority of both this state and another jurisdiction where the lawyer is admitted for the same conduct.
> (b) In any exercise of the disciplinary authority of this state, the rules of professional conduct to be applied shall be as follows:
> (1) For conduct in connection with a proceeding in a court before which a lawyer has been admitted to practice (either generally or for purposes of that proceeding), the rules to be applied shall be the rules of the jurisdiction in which the court sits, unless the rules of the court provide otherwise; and
> (2) For any other conduct:
> (i) If the lawyer is licensed to practice only in this state, the rules to be applied shall be the rules of this state, and
> (ii) If the lawyer is licensed to practice in this state and another jurisdiction, the rules to be applied shall be the rules of the admitting jurisdiction in which the lawyer principally practices; provided, however, that if particular conduct clearly has its predominant effect in another jurisdiction in which the lawyer is licensed to practice, the rules of that jurisdiction shall be applied to that conduct. [Emphasis added.]

7. In N.Y. State 889 (2011), we concluded that a New York lawyer who "principally practices" in another jurisdiction that allows partnership with a non-lawyer may ordinarily conduct litigation in New York because the other jurisdiction's ethics rules, rather than New York's ethics rules, would govern the fee sharing with respect to the New York matter:

> The inquirer principally practices in the District of Columbia. Unless the formation of the [D.C.] partnership or the division of compensation arising from New York litigation clearly have their predominant effect in New York those matters are subject only to the District of Columbia ethics rules.

8. Similarly, in N.Y. State 1041 (2014), we concluded that a New York lawyer based in the UK, who is not formally admitted to practice in the UK, may ethically practice there with an entity that includes non-lawyer owners or supervisors provided that such conduct is permitted under the rules of that country and "the predominant effect of the lawyer's practice is not in New York." Our conclusion was based on Rule 8.5(b)(2)(ii).

9. In N.Y. State 911 (2012), in contrast, we held that a New York lawyer may not practice law principally in New York as an employee of an out-of-state entity that has non-lawyer owners or managers. That conclusion was also based on Rule 8.5(b)(2)(ii), but in Opinion 911 New York's ethics rules applied because the inquirer was practicing principally in New York. The implication of Opinion 911 is that a foreign law firm with non-lawyer members or managers may not have a branch in New York.

10. Here, the inquirer is admitted to practice both in New York and the UK. Currently, the inquirer is practicing principally (and apparently exclusively) in England, with a UK ABS. The inquirer's UK law firm has non-lawyer directors and shareholders, but non-lawyer directors and shareholders are lawful there. Accordingly, under the present circumstances, the UK rules apply to the inquirer's practice with the UK ABS.

Partnership in a New York law firm

11. If the inquirer becomes a partner in a New York firm, the inquirer must once again determine which rules will apply. This requires determining the jurisdiction in which the lawyer "principally practices" within the meaning of Rule 8.5(b)(2)(ii). Unlike the case in N.Y. State 911, the inquirer is not seeking to practice in a New York branch of the UK firm. (We assume that the New York law firm will not be managed in such a way as to operate as a branch of the UK ABS. We also assume that the two firms do not have a profit-sharing arrangement, which would implicate many of the same concerns.)

12. The inquirer says that the inquirer's role with the New York law firm will be limited to management and administrative activities, and maintains that this will not be "practicing" New York law. Determining what constitutes the practice of law is a question of law that is outside our jurisdiction. Even if we had jurisdiction to decide the issue, the inquirer has not provided us with enough information about this management and administrative role for us to determine the extent to which the role involves the practice of law. While some law firms hire managers who are non-lawyers and whose role is limited to purely administrative matters, many other law firms employ full-time managing partners who are lawyers admitted to practice in New York. Although some of these managing partners do not represent any clients, they may play active roles in determining which clients their firms should represent, including assessing whether representation would involve conflicts of interest and evaluating the merits of cases, and they may actively oversee the conduct of matters being handled by the firm to ensure that the firm complies with law and professional standards. We therefore cannot rule out the possibility that a New York lawyer managing a New York law firm will be exercising legal judgment. This is one plausible reason that the New York firm would make the person handling management and administrative activities a partner rather than an employee.

13. Consequently, after becoming a partner in the New York firm, the inquirer will need to determine whether the inquirer still "principally practices" in the UK. See N.Y. State 1027 ¶14 (2014) (setting forth factors for determining where a dual-licensed lawyer principally practices); N.Y. State 1041 (2014) (applying factors from Opinion 1027). In N.Y. State 1041 and N.Y. State 1027, we stated:

> Given the increase in law practice over the internet and the corresponding decrease in the importance of a lawyer's physical location, the jurisdiction in which a lawyer "principally practices" for purposes of Rule 8.5(b)(2)(ii) is becoming less certain and we should consider a lawyer's significant contacts with all jurisdictions, not solely the jurisdiction in which the lawyer is most often physically present.

14. N.Y. State 1027 and N.Y. State 1041 also state that one of the factors in determining where a dually-admitted lawyer "principally practices" is whether the activities the lawyer performs in each jurisdiction constitute "legal work for clients," as opposed to "administrative work for the law firm." We believe there is a difference between purely administrative work (e.g., handling personnel matters, hiring and managing clerical staff, and ordering office equipment) and other management work for the firm that may involve legal judgment (e.g. determining what matters to accept, including whether a new matter would create a conflict of interest and evaluating the merits of cases; supervising legal work; and evaluating whether a given legal claim or motion would be frivolous). See Rule 5.1(b)(1) ("A lawyer with management responsibility in a law firm shall make reasonable efforts to ensure that other lawyers in the law firm conform to these Rules."). Managerial work that involves legal judgment should be counted in determining the place where the lawyer "principally practices."

15. If the inquirer is still practicing principally in the UK, then the UK ethics rules will continue to apply to the inquirer's activities, unless particular conduct clearly has its predominant effect in New York. See N.Y. State 889 (2011) (When a New York-admitted lawyer principally practices in the District of Columbia, unless the formation of the DC partnership or the division of compensation arising from New York litigation clearly have their predominant effect in NY, those matters are subject only to the District of Columbia ethics rules.) For example, the "predominant effect" of the inquirer's work as a manager and administrator of the New York firm will clearly be in New York.

16. Conversely, if the inquirer's managerial duties as a partner in the New York firm constitute the practice of law in New York, and if that law practice is substantial enough that the inquirer is deemed to be principally practicing in New York, then the New York Rules will apply to all of the lawyer's activities globally, unless particular conduct of the inquirer "clearly has its predominant effect" in the UK. Thus, the New York Rules would apply to the "conduct" of managing the New York law firm, but if the predominant effect of being a partner of the UK ABS is in the UK, then Rule 5.4 would not prohibit the lawyer from being a partner in the UK ABS because that "conduct" would be governed by UK Rules.

17. Determining whether the conduct of the inquirer in serving as a partner of the UK ABS has its predominant effect in the UK is a factual question that is beyond the jurisdiction of the Committee to determine. Rule 5.4(d) prohibits a member of a New York law firm from permitting nonlawyers to affect the members of the New York firm or jeopardize their independent professional judgment. We see no indication that any of the non-lawyer directors and shareholders in the inquirer's UK ABS would (1) own any interest in the New York law firm, (2) be a member, corporate director or officer thereof, (3) share legal fees with the New York law firm, or (4) have the right to direct or control the professional judgment of the inquirer or any other lawyer in the New York firm. However, this is a determination that the inquirer must make.

Conflict implications of practicing in two law firms simultaneously

18. The inquirer has told us, and we assume, that the New York and UK offices will be "unrelated." However, the two firms must still comply with the conflict provisions of Rule 1.10(a), which will impute conflicts of each firm to the other. Rule 1.10(a) provides:

> (a) While lawyers are associated in a firm, none of them shall knowingly represent a client when any one of them practicing alone would be prohibited from doing so by Rule 1.7, 1.8 or 1.9, except as otherwise provided therein.

19. We described the effect of Rule 1.10(a) in N.Y. State 876 (2011):

> For decades, both this Committee and various New York courts have consistently stated that where a lawyer is "associated" with more than one law firm within the meaning of the imputation rule, all of the law firms with whom that lawyer is associated are treated as one law firm for purposes of conflicts of interest. Accordingly, under Rule 1.10(a), all conflicts in each firm are imputed to all lawyers in all of the firms associated with a common lawyer. See, e.g. N.Y. State 807 (2007) (lawyer working part-time at two firms); N.Y. State 794 (2006) (lawyer working at law firm and law school clinic); N.Y. State 793 (2006) (lawyer with "of counsel" relationship with two firms at the same time); N.Y. State 715 (1999) (contract lawyer for two firms); N.Y. State 388 (1975) (sole practitioner and member of partnership) N.Y. City 2000-4 (2000) (affiliated law firms*); Cinema 5, Ltd. v. Cinerama, Inc*., 528 F.2d 1384 (2d Cir. 1976).

20. Rule 1.10(e) requires a New York law firm to check all proposed engagements against current and previous engagements. As N.Y. State 876 indicates, when two firms share a common partner or other member, they are treated as one for conflicts purposes. Consequently, in order to comply with Rule 1.10(e), the New York firm must include engagements of the UK firm in its conflict checking system.

CONCLUSION:

21. A New York lawyer who is also admitted in a foreign jurisdiction and is practicing with non-lawyer partners in that jurisdiction may also practice in a separate New York law firm without violating the New York Rules of Professional Conduct as long as the lawyer (i) principally practices in the foreign jurisdiction or (ii) the predominant effect of the lawyer's practice with the foreign firm is in the foreign jurisdiction and (iii) the New York firm includes representations by the UK firm in its conflict of interest system.

TOPIC: Client file – Access by lawyer to file of former client

DIGEST: Lawyer may not provide a copy of client's file to previous counsel if the client objects, unless an exception to the duty of confidentiality applies.

RULES: 1.2(g), 1.6(a) & (b), 1.15(c)

FACTS:

1. The inquiring lawyer represents an alien who is attempting to reopen removal proceedings on the grounds of ineffective assistance by the client's former counsel. The client has brought an ethics complaint against the former counsel. The former counsel has asked the inquiring lawyer to give him access to the file in order to respond to the client's ethics complaint, but the inquirer's client has refused to grant consent. (The former counsel previously turned over the client file to the inquiring lawyer, apparently without retaining a copy of the file.)

QUESTION:

2. May a lawyer give a client's former counsel access to the client's file so that the former counsel may defend against an ethics complaint by the client if client has refused consent to allow the inquiring lawyer to provide access?

OPINION:

3. The question of a lawyer's access to a file is generally a question of law and not a question of ethics under the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"). See N.Y. State 766 (1993); Sage Realty Corp. v. Proskauer Rose Goetz and Mendelsohn, 91 N.Y.2d 30 (1997). This Committee generally does not have jurisdiction to decide matters of law.

4. In New York State 780 (2004), which interpreted the former Code of Professional Responsibility, we stated, "Nothing in the Code prohibits a lawyer from retaining copies of the file." That proposition is still true under the Rules. Here, it appears that the previous lawyer did not retain a copy of the file.

5. A client's file ordinarily constitutes "confidential information" of the client within the meaning of Rule 1.6(a) because it consists of "information gained during or relating to the representation" of the client that the client "has requested be kept confidential." See N.Y. State 1032 (2014). The fact that the client's former counsel previously had access to the client's file does not take the file out of the definition of "confidential information."

6. The former counsel now needs access to the file to defend against an ethics complaint made by the former client. Under Rule 1.6(b)(5)(i), a lawyer may reveal or use confidential information to defend the lawyer against an accusation of wrongful conduct. "Implicit in that rule is the lawyer's right to retain copies of the file . . . to defend against an accusation of wrongful conduct." N.Y. State 780 (construing former DR 4-101(C)(4)). Had the former counsel retained a copy of the file, there is no question that he/she would have had the right to access that file for purposes of defending against the ethics complaint. See N.Y. State 1032 (2014) (explaining limits of the "self-defense" exception to the duty of confidentiality). But Rule 1.6(b)(5) gives a lawyer only the right to retain the client's file – it does not give a former counsel an independent right to obtain the file after relinquishing it.

7. Here, the client has refused consent to allow the former counsel access to the file. The situation thus falls squarely within the definition of "confidential information" in Rule 1.6(a), which includes information that the client "has requested be kept confidential." Absent an applicable exception to confidentiality under Rule 1.6, the entire file remains confidential and the inquirer therefore may not turn over the file.

8. Rule 1.6(b)(6) articulates one of the exceptions to the duty of confidentiality: a lawyer may reveal or use confidential information to the extent that the lawyer reasonably believes necessary "to comply with other law or court order." Thus, the inquirer could ethically allow access to the file, even over the client's objection, if other law or a court order required him/her to do so. Because what is necessary to comply with other law or a court order raises questions of law beyond our jurisdiction, we will not speculate on whether a subpoena or other law would qualify for the exception in Rule 1.6(b)(6) and allow the inquirer to give previous counsel access to the file.

9. So far we have focused exclusively on Rule 1.6. For the sake of completeness, we add that no other provision of the Rules requires the inquirer to turn over the file without the client's consent. Rule 1.2(g) provides "a lawyer does not violate these rules by . . . treating with courtesy and consideration all persons involved in the legal process," but it does not obligate the inquiring lawyer to share the file in the face of the client's refusal. Similarly, Rule 1.15(c)(4) requires a lawyer to "promptly pay or deliver to the client . . . properties in the possession of the lawyer that the client . . . is entitled to receive," but it contains no reciprocal language requiring the client to deliver anything to the lawyer.

CONCLUSION:

10. Nothing in the Rules of Professional Conduct permits or requires a lawyer to provide a client's file to the client's former lawyer in the face of the client's instructions to the contrary, unless an exception to the duty of confidentiality applies.

TOPIC: Advertising; firm name

DIGEST: When a law firm changes its name by adding the name of a partner, it has a reasonable time to change its existing advertising to the new firm name. What is a reasonable time depends on multiple factors, including whether the existing ads are misleading, and on the cost and ease of making the changes. Website domain names are not required to reflect the legal name of the firm, and large building signs that constitute branding rather than advertising are not subject to the advertising rules.

RULES: 7.1(a) & (h), 7.5(a), (b), & (e)

FACTS:

1. A law firm changed its name from A & B to A, B & C by adding the name of C, an existing partner.

2. Some of the firm's existing advertising – including television commercials and bus shelter advertisements – uses A & B, the firm's old name. The firm also uses the firm's old name on large signs on two sides of the firm's office building, and the domain name of the firm's website continues to reflect the firm's old name.

QUESTION:

3. When a law firm changes its name must it immediately change all of its advertising and branding material to the new firm name?

OPINION:

4. Rule 7.1(a)(1) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") prohibits a lawyer or law firm from using an advertisement that contains statements "that are false, deceptive or misleading." Rule 7.1(h) requires that all advertising, among other matters, include "the name of the lawyer or law firm whose services are being offered." Rule 7.5(a) permits a lawyer or law firm to "use internet web sites, professional cards, professional announcement cards, office signs, letterheads or similar professional notices or devices, provided the same do not violate any statute or court rule and are in accordance with Rule 7.1." Rule 7.5(b) prohibits a lawyer from practicing under "a name that is misleading as to the identity of the lawyer or lawyers practicing under such name."

5. Having these Rules in mind, we turn to their application to the facts here – that the firm has added an existing partner's name to the firm name. (For the purposes of this opinion we assume that the law firm as a partnership or LLC has complied with any provisions of law that apply to the firm's change of name.)

Television Commercials and Bus Shelter Advertisements

6. Television commercials and bus shelter advertisements are both advertisements within the meaning of Rule 1.0(a) because they are public communications made by a lawyer about the law firm's services, the primary purpose of which is for the retention of the lawyer. Thus, they are subject to the requirements of Rule 7.1, including the requirement in Rule 7.1(a)(1) that they not contain statements that are false, deceptive or misleading, and the requirement in Rule 7.1(h) that they include the name of the lawyer or law firm whose services are being offered.

7. Here, the law firm's television and bus shelter advertisements do not contain the full and current name of the firm. In N.Y. State 1030 (2014), we held that a law firm that changed its firm name by adding the name of a new partner could continue to use its old letterhead and old checks while the remaining stock was being depleted, as long as the firm was either the same firm (with a new name) or a legal successor to the business and property of the original firm. We said: "[W]e do not believe use of the old letterhead would be misleading while the remaining stock is being depleted merely because it does not reflect the new name of the firm." We believe a similar grace period applies here, and that the firm has a reasonable period to change its advertising to reflect its new name.

8. A law firm with a changed name should take into account a number of factors in determining what is a reasonable time to change its advertising to reflect its new name. The first factor is whether the existing advertising is misleading. See N.Y. State 1030 (quoting Rule 7.5's prohibition against a law firm practicing under a name that is misleading as to the identity of the lawyer or lawyers practicing under the name). Law firm names are not required to contain the names of all the firm's partners, so the fact that a given partner's name does not appear in the firm name is not itself misleading. See N.Y. State 1030 (use of old letterhead while old stock is being depleted would not be misleading because it is common for law firm names not to include the name of all partners in the firm).

9. A different situation may exist if a name partner leaves the firm to practice in another firm or to go into the government; in that case, continuing to use the old name may mislead the public as to the lawyers who practice in the firm, making it unreasonable to fail to correct the firm's advertising as soon as possible.

10. Another factor is the ease of correcting the firm name. For example, in N.Y. State 1030, we were asked if the firm could continue to use checks from its general account and its trust account. We opined that, as long as the firm was the same or a successor firm, the firm could continue to use the old checks until they ran out. We also said that it would be desirable to indicate the change in the firm name on the old checks, but we recognized that changing bus shelter advertisements and television commercials is significantly more difficult than making a simple written or rubber-stamped change on a check, and the law firm cannot simply make those changes itself as it can on a check. Accordingly, a reasonable time to change bus shelter advertisements or television advertisements will depend on how long it takes to create and arrange to substitute new advertisements.

11. A related factor is the cost of making the changes on the firm's advertising. Here, using the old commercials and bus shelter advertisements is somewhat analogous to using the old letterhead and checks. We believe a reasonable period to make the change will ordinarily be measured by the period covered in the advertising contract. For example, if the period for which the bus shelter ads will run is 90 days, then the firm should correct the firm name in its ads at the end of the 90-day period. If the firm makes new television commercials or bus shelter advertisements before the contractual period ends, the new ads clearly should use the new name.

Large Building signs.

12. Comment [6] to Rule 7.1 points out that not all communications made by a lawyer or law firm are advertising. Comment [8] to Rule 7.1 explains:

> Some communications by a law firm that may constitute marketing or branding are not necessarily advertisements. For example, pencils, legal pads, greeting cards, coffee mugs, T-shirts or the like with the law firm name, logo, and contact information printed on them do not constitute "advertisements" within the definition of this Rule if their primary purpose is general awareness and branding, rather than the retention of the law firm for a particular matter.

We believe that the large building signs with the old firm name do not constitute "advertisements." Rather, they are for the purpose of general awareness and branding and thus are not subject to Rule 7.1. Accordingly, the firm may continue to use its old name on branding materials. We recognize that Rule 7.5(a) permits a firm to use "office signs" as long as they comply with Rule 7.1, but we think that refers to small office signs on or near a firm's entrance. Those small office signs must be changed within a reasonable time. But large signs on the side of a building are mere branding, not advertising, and need not be changed to reflect the firm's new name.

Firm's Internet Domain Name

13. Similarly, a law firm domain name need not be the firm's full legal name. Under Rule 7.5(e) "[a] lawyer or law firm may utilize a domain name for an internet website that does not include the name of the lawyer or law firm" provided certain conditions are met. As further explained in Cmt. [2] to Rule 7.5: "As long as a law firm name complies with other Rules, it is always proper for a law firm to use its own name or its initials or some abbreviation or variation of its own name as its domain name." See also N.Y. State 1003 ¶ 12 (2014) (concluding that a lawyer who practices under his full name "may use a law firm name that includes only the lawyer's middle name initials and last name, without including his first name."). Accordingly, we conclude on the facts here that the law firm is permitted to use A & B, which is the firm's old name, as the firm's domain website name. It need not change the domain name to reflect the new name.

CONCLUSION:

14. When a law firm changes its name by adding the name of a partner, it has a reasonable time to change its existing advertising to the new firm name. What is a reasonable time depends on whether the old ads are misleading, and on the cost and ease of making the corrections. Website domain names are not required to reflect the legal name of the firm and large building signs that constitute branding rather than advertisements are not subject to the advertising rules.

TOPIC: Lawyer declining attorney fees awarded to client

DIGEST: A lawyer may allow a civil rights client to keep some or all of the statutory attorney fees awarded to the client even if the client is not a lawyer. Because statutory attorney fees in civil rights cases are awarded to the "prevailing party" (i.e., to the client) rather than to the lawyer, allowing a civil rights client to keep part of the court-awarded fees does not fall within the prohibition against sharing legal fees with a nonlawyer.

RULES: 5.4(a) and 8.5(b)(1)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a lawyer who is admitted to practice law in Florida but has been admitted pro hac vice to represent a client (the plaintiff) in a civil rights suit pending in a court in New York. The client is not a lawyer. The client prevailed in the suit on the merits, so the court ordered the defendant to pay statutory civil rights attorney fees to the client. The inquirer believes that the damages award to the client is too low. To make up for the low damages award, the lawyer would like to let the client keep some of the court-awarded attorney fees.

QUESTION:

2. May a lawyer allow a civil rights client who is not a lawyer to keep some or all of the court-awarded statutory attorney fees when the client is the prevailing party in a civil rights suit?

OPINION:

A. Which Jurisdiction's Rules of Professional Conduct Apply?

3. A preliminary question is which jurisdiction's Rules of Professional Conduct apply to this inquiry. The inquirer is admitted to practice law generally in Florida, but has been admitted pro hac vice in a New York court. With respect to the Rules of Professional Conduct, Rule 8.5(b)(1) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") provides as follows:

> (b) In any exercise of the disciplinary authority of this state, the rules of professional conduct to be applied shall be as follows:
> > (1) For conduct in connection with a proceeding in a court before which a lawyer has been admitted to practice (either generally or for purposes of that proceeding), the rules to be applied shall be the rules of the jurisdiction in which the court sits, unless the rules of the court provide otherwise . . . .

4. The inquiry before us involves "conduct in connection with a proceeding in a court before which a lawyer has been admitted to practice . . . for purposes of that proceeding" (i.e., pro hac vice). Consequently, the rules to be applied are the rules of the jurisdiction in which the court sits (i.e., New York), "unless the rules of the court provide otherwise" (which they do not, since all New York state and federal courts apply the New York Rules of Professional Conduct). Thus, the applicable ethics rules are the New York Rules of Professional Conduct.

B. The Prohibition Against Sharing Fees with a Nonlawyer

5. For centuries, the legal profession has prohibited lawyers from sharing legal fees with nonlawyers. See Roy D. Simon, Fee Sharing Between Lawyers and Public Interest Groups, 98 Yale L.J. 1069, 1076 (1989) ("The rule against sharing legal fees with nonlawyers traces back to a 1729 English Act of Parliament"). In New York, as in most jurisdictions, the prohibition against sharing legal fees with nonlawyers is contained in Rule 5.4 ("Professional Independence of a Lawyer"). Specifically, Rule 5.4(a) prohibits a lawyer or law firm from sharing legal fees with a nonlawyer, with three exceptions not relevant here.

6. Since none of the express exceptions to Rule 5.4 apply to the facts of the present inquiry, the situation might at first glance appear to be governed by the general rule prohibiting lawyers from sharing legal fees with nonlawyers. However, the reach of the rule against fee sharing with nonlawyers is not unlimited, and a lawyer declining to accept some or all of the statutory fees the court has awarded directly to a client who is a nonlawyer is not the type of fee sharing encompassed in Rule 5.4(a)'s command not to "share legal fees with a nonlawyer" who is a stranger to the attorney-client relationship.

7. The dispositive point in our analysis is that most statutory fee awards are to the prevailing "party," not directly to the lawyer. That is the case in federal civil rights cases. See, e.g., Evans v. Jeff D., 475 U.S. 717 (1986) ("Congress bestowed on the 'prevailing party' a statutory eligibility for a discretionary award of attorney's fees in specified civil rights actions") (emphasis by the Court). The same is true of New York State fee-shifting statutes. See, e.g., N.Y. Gen. Bus. Law § 349(h) (court may award reasonable attorney fees to a "prevailing plaintiff"); N.Y. State Finance Law §§ 187-194 ("prevailing plaintiff" in a False Claims Act case is entitled to recover attorney fees and costs).[22] The statutory fees are awarded to the party, not to the lawyer. Accordingly, the party (the client) would be "sharing" the fee award with the lawyer, not the other way around. Accordingly, we believe that the prohibition against sharing fees with a nonlawyer does not bar a lawyer from allowing a civil rights client to keep some or all of the legal fees awarded by the court to the prevailing party (i.e., to the client) in a civil rights case.

8. We understand that a lawyer's retainer agreement in a civil rights case typically contains a clause assigning the client's statutory fee award to the lawyer, but the award is still made in the first instance to the client, not the lawyer. Even if the retainer agreement assigns the fee award to the lawyer, the lawyer may ethically waive that assignment, in whole or in part. Waiving the assignment of fees is equivalent to offering the client a discount on fees, a practice that is undoubtedly permitted because it does not implicate the underlying concern of Rule 5.4, which is to avoid interference with the lawyer's professional judgement. See Rule 5.4, Cmt. [1] ("limitations on sharing fees" with nonlawyers "protect the lawyer's professional independence of judgment").

9. Our opinion in N.Y. State 906 (2012) does not require a different conclusion. There, a lawyer employed by a not-for-profit organization that was not a law firm asked if it would be ethical to share legal fees with the not-for-profit employer. We responded that to do so would violate Rule 5.4(a). That situation is distinguishable from the one presented here. In Opinion 906, the lawyer employed by the not-for-profit organization was apparently representing third parties, such as civil rights plaintiffs, and was not representing the not-for-profit organization itself. The not-for-profit corporation was the lawyer's employer, not the lawyer's client. Thus, the lawyer in Opinion 906 wanted to share statutory fee awards not with the client but instead with a nonlawyer not-for-profit corporation that sponsored litigation to advance the public interest. Here, the lawyer wants to allow a civil rights client to keep some or all of the court-awarded statutory attorney's fees. Opinion 906 does not govern that scenario.

CONCLUSION:

10. A lawyer may allow a civil rights client to keep some or all of the statutory attorney fees that are awarded to the client, even if the client is not a lawyer.

TOPIC: Non-legal employment; misrepresentation of lawyer's professional status.

DIGEST: If a lawyer is hired as a debt collector, and not as a lawyer, to make phone calls to collect commercial debts, the lawyer is not required to disclose his or her status as a lawyer. But if a debtor asks whether the caller is a lawyer and the lawyer answers the question, the response must be truthful and not misleading.

RULES: 8.4(c)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a New York lawyer employed by a debt collection agency as a commercial debt collector. The inquirer is responsible for making routine phone calls to collect debts on behalf of the agency. The inquirer is admitted to practice law but is not engaged as a lawyer on behalf of the agency.

2. During these phone calls, a debtor often asks whether the inquirer is a lawyer. Currently, the inquirer responds, truthfully, "I happen to be a lawyer but I am neither acting in a legal capacity nor representing either the collection agency or the client who owns the debt."

3. The collection agency prefers that the inquirer not disclose the inquirer's status as an attorney or even deny that the inquirer is an attorney (since the inquirer is not acting as one).

QUESTION:

4. May a lawyer who is hired by a debt collection agency to make collection calls to debtors but who is not retained as a lawyer refuse to identify his or her status as an attorney when asked by the debtor?

OPINION:

5. Lawyers often work for businesses that provide nonlegal services[23] but whose activities may trigger legal questions. See, e.g. N.Y. State 1081 (2016) (debt management company), N.Y. State 951 (2012) (letter writing service), N.Y. State 832 (2009) (selling shelf corporations over the Internet); N.Y. State 803 (Lawyer may engage in debt collection activities outside New York that do not constitute the unauthorized practice of law, as long as the firm avoids misleading debtors); cf., N.Y. State 898 (2011) (lawyer who sends a legally mandated notice regarding the expiration of the statute of limitations on a debt is not giving legal advice to an unrepresented person in violation of Rule 4.3).

6. We assume for purposes of this opinion that the debt collection agency is not providing legal services. We also assume that the debt collection agency does not represent to its customers that it is providing legal services, does not appear in court on behalf of the customers and does not provide lawyers for its customers. We have no authority to determine whether the services of the debt collection agency are legal services because what constitutes the practice of law is a legal question that is beyond this committee's jurisdiction to answer.

23 Rule 5.7(c), which applies when lawyers or law firms provide "nonlegal services" to clients, defines "nonlegal services" as "those services that lawyers may lawfully provide and that are not prohibited as an unauthorized practice of law when provided by a nonlawyer."

7. As we noted in N.Y. State 1081, if a lawyer is providing nonlegal services (and the clients do not believe they are legal services) then the only applicable ethical rules in the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") would be the rules that apply even where the lawyer is not representing a client, such as Rule 8.4(c), which prohibits a lawyer from engaging in "conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation." This obligation exists whether or not the activities of the lawyer constitute the practice of law. Compare Rule 4.1 ("In the course of representing a client, a lawyer shall not knowingly make a false statement of material fact to a third person.")

8. When the debtor specifically asks if the inquirer is a lawyer, the inquirer is not obligated to answer the question. The inquirer may, for example, decline to answer or avoid responding to the question by changing the subject or ignoring the question. However, if the inquirer answers the question, the answer must be truthful and not misleading. A truthful statement should make clear that the lawyer is a lawyer but is acting as a debt collector only and not as a lawyer. Cf., N.Y. State 803 (2006) (a lawyer providing non-legal debt collection services must avoid suggesting to debtors in such communications that the firm or its representatives are functioning as lawyers engaged in the representation of the creditor-client or that the firm or its representatives might undertake legal action on the creditor-client's behalf.)

CONCLUSION:

9. If a lawyer is hired as a debt collector, and not as a lawyer, to make phone calls to collect commercial debts, the lawyer is not required to disclose his or her status as a lawyer. But if a debtor asks whether the caller is a lawyer and the lawyer answers the question, the response must be truthful and not misleading.

OPINION 1098 (06/10/2016)

TOPIC: Criminal law; prosecutor conditioning plea bargain on defendant's waiver of ineffective assistance of counsel claims

DIGEST: A prosecutor may not ethically require, as a routine condition of a plea bargain, that a defendant waive ineffective assistance of counsel claims.

RULES: Rule 8.4(d)

FACTS:

1. In N.Y. State 1048 (2015) we considered whether a defense lawyer may ethically advise a defendant whether to accept a plea bargain that includes a waiver of future claims of ineffective assistance of counsel ("IAC"). We concluded that a per se personal-interest conflict under Rule 1.7(a) does not arise. Instead, we concluded that determining whether advising as to an IAC waiver creates a personal-interest conflict for the defense lawyer – and whether any such conflict is waivable – requires a case-by-case inquiry. We expressly left open the question, however, whether a prosecutor is ethically prohibited from routinely requiring IAC waivers as a condition of a plea bargain. We now consider that open question.

QUESTION:

2. May a prosecutor ethically require, as a routine condition of a plea bargain, that a defendant waive IAC claims against a defense lawyer?

OPINION:

3. At the outset, we note that prosecutors often insert into a plea bargain agreement a general waiver of any right to appeal or otherwise make a collateral attack on the conviction. Although such a waiver does not specify an appeal based on ineffective assistance of counsel, the courts have read such general waivers as including at least some IAC claims. See People v. Abdullah, 122 A.D.3d 958 (3d Dept. 2014) (appeal waiver foreclosed an IAC claim that did not "impact the voluntariness" of the plea). Consequently, when this opinion refers to IAC waivers, it includes a general waiver of the right to appeal, unless it specifically excludes an appeal based on a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel.

4. Rule 8.4(d) provides that a lawyer or law firm shall not "engage in conduct that is prejudicial to the administration of justice." Comment [3] to Rule 8.4 states that this prohibition generally is applicable when the conduct at issue "results in substantial harm to the justice system comparable to those caused by obstruction of justice, such as advising a client to testify falsely, paying a witness to be unavailable, altering documents, repeatedly disrupting a proceeding, or failing to cooperate in an attorney disciplinary investigation." While the examples provided by the comment all involve willful malfeasance, we have not interpreted Rule 8.4(d) to apply only to instances involving bad faith. Instead, if the conduct in question is likely to cause substantial individual or systemic harm to the administration of justice, regardless of the motivation of the party, we have interpreted Rule 8.4(d) to apply. Rule 8.4(d), of course, applies to all lawyers, including prosecutors. Examples of the rule's particular application to prosecutors are useful. Thus, for example, we have repeatedly interpreted Rule 8.4(d) – and its predecessor under the former N.Y. Code of Professional Responsibility, Disciplinary Rule 1-102(A)(5) – to prohibit prosecutors from engaging in partisan political activity. See N.Y. State 1071 (2015) (municipal attorney employed by Civilian Complaint Review Board); N.Y. State 696 (1997) (examining attorney for Department of Investigations); N.Y. State 675 (1995) (Assistant District Attorney or Assistant County Attorney); and N.Y. State 568 (1985) (District Attorneys and their assistants). The result reached in those opinions was supported by the recognition that "prosecutors have a duty to seek justice," see N.Y. State 683, and by the conclusion that partisan political activity by prosecutors has the potential to cause systemic harm to the administration of justice because such activity risks creating the appearance that prosecutors are not exercising their discretion in an independent, disinterested fashion.

5. Other jurisdictions have applied their 8.4(d) analog, in the context of plea proceedings, to the conduct of prosecutors that, while not motivated by bad faith, risked harming the administration of justice. For example, in In the Matter of Nancy J. Flatt-Moore, 959 N.E.2d 241 (Ind. 2012), the Indiana Supreme Court concluded that a prosecutor violated 8.4(d) by allowing the victim of a crime to have unfettered veto power in plea negotiations, including insisting on terms the court would not be authorized to impose. The Flatt-Moore Court concluded that, at the very least, this practice gave the appearance that the resolution of the case would not turn on the equities of the case. Id. at 245. The Court reached this result notwithstanding its conclusion that the prosecutor "did not act out of any selfish or dishonest motive . . . ." Id. at 246.

6. Similarly, in In re Complaint as to the Conduct of Roger Rook, 556 P. 2d 1351 (Ore. 1976), the Oregon Supreme Court concluded that it was prejudicial to the administration of justice for a prosecutor to refuse to offer a plea bargain to a group of criminal defendants as long as they remained represented by either of two particular criminal defense attorneys. The Court concluded that, while the prosecutor did not act out of any motive for personal gain or profit, the prosecutor's conduct risked unduly burdening the plea bargaining process, and was therefore prejudicial to the administration of justice. Id. at 1356. Cf. United States ex rel. United States Attorneys v. Kentucky Bar Ass'n, 439 S.W.3d 136 (Ky. 2014) (finding that routine use of IAC waivers by prosecutors violates Rule 3.8 because a prosecutor is charged with seeing that the defendant is accorded procedural justice, "and we simply do not believe the use of IAC waivers lives up to that lofty expectation").

7. Various ethics opinions from state bars around the country have concluded that a per se personal conflict of interest arises when defense attorneys are asked to advise their clients as to an IAC waiver. A number of those opinions have also concluded that a prosecutor derivatively violates Rule 8.4(d) by requiring an IAC waiver because the demand for an IAC waiver creates a conflict of interest for the defense lawyer. See, e.g., Ariz. Op. 15-01 (2015); Fla. Op. 12-1 (2012); Mo. Op. 126 (2009). Although N.Y. State 1048 rejected the per se rule adopted by those other state bars, we nonetheless now conclude that the harms attributable to a prosecutor's routine conditioning of plea bargains on the waiver of IAC claims are sufficiently substantial as to prejudice the administration of justice in violation of Rule 8.4(d). Those harms are chiefly associated with the undue burdens on defense lawyers, defendants, and the court system that arise from a prosecutor's routine use of IAC waivers in an already overburdened criminal justice system.

8. We concluded in N.Y. State 1048 that a personal-interest conflict does not automatically arise every time a defense lawyer counsels a defendant as to the waiver of an IAC claim, but we also recognized that ascertaining whether or a not a conflict of interest exists in a particular case (and whether any such conflict is waivable) is often a difficult, complex task. First, a defense lawyer must review the representation and assess the likelihood that a successful IAC claim exists. Critically, when a lawyer actually did provide ineffective assistance of counsel, the lawyer will typically be unaware of the deficient performance. After making this initial, performance-based assessment, the defense lawyer will need to assess the likelihood that continued representation will be adversely affected by the defense lawyer's self-interest in securing an IAC waiver. While many lawyers may be relatively unconcerned about the risk of an IAC claim, other lawyers will be concerned about the time and anxiety that would be involved in defending against any IAC claim.

9. The routine insistence on IAC waivers by prosecutors similarly burdens the courts. When a defense lawyer concludes that a personal conflict exists but is waivable (and has been waived), the court will have to conduct its own independent inquiry to ascertain whether the defendant's waiver of the conflict is knowing, intelligent, and voluntary. See, e.g., People v. Gomberg, 38 N.Y.2d 307 (1975) (holding that a defendant's waiver of any conflict must be "knowing and intelligent"). When a defense lawyer concludes that the conflict created by a prosecutor's demand for an IAC waiver is not a waivable conflict, the defense lawyer will have to move to withdraw. In that situation as well, the court will have to expend resources to ascertain whether a conflict exists, and the court typically will need to balance the defendant's right to counsel of choice against defense counsel's duty to avoid potential conflicts of interest. See People v. Watson, 26 N.Y.3d 620 (2016) (noting that when potential conflicts of interest arise in criminal cases, courts often must engage in sensitive inquiries and weigh competing interests). If the court concludes that the danger of the conflict outweighs the defendant's right to choice of counsel, the court will need to allow time for the defendant to locate substitute counsel. Substitution of counsel usually will delay the proceedings and cause additional financial costs. But if the court denies the defense lawyer's motion to withdraw, then the defense lawyer will be forced to proceed despite a belief that there is an unwaivable (or unwaived) conflict of interest. That result may undermine public confidence in the fairness of the proceedings and often will trigger further litigation.

10. Given the large volume of cases in the criminal justice system, and the high caseloads carried by many defense lawyers (see, e.g., Hurrell-Harring v. State of New York, 15 N.Y.3d 8 (2015)), a prosecutor's routine insistence on IAC waivers carries a substantial cost in time and money. Even more worrisome, these costs create enormous pressure for courts and defense lawyers to ignore the potential conflicts created by IAC waiver demands. Defense lawyers will reasonably fear that raising the conflict-of-interest issue at the point where a plea deal is about to be consummated will aggravate the court (or the prosecutor). Moreover, courts undoubtedly will be confused as to why the IAC waiver does not present a conflict as to some of the cases before it but does present a conflict as to other cases. To avoid aggravating and confusing the courts, defense lawyers will be sorely tempted to ignore conflicts they believe exist. (Indeed, we are concerned that, given the current, widespread use of these waivers, that is exactly what is going on now.) And, if a defense lawyer believes that raising the conflict-of-interest issue will jeopardize a beneficial plea bargain for the client, the defense lawyer will be placed in the untenable position of deciding between ignoring ethical obligations and undermining the client's interests.

11. IAC waivers also cause substantial, unacceptable harms to criminal defendants. The Sixth Amendment entitles criminal defendants to the effective assistance of counsel. But when defense lawyers unwittingly have provided ineffective assistance of counsel (i.e., when defense lawyers have been ineffective but do not know it), IAC waivers effectively leave these defendants without counsel as to the impact of the as-yet-undiscovered ineffectiveness.

12. Another problem is that the scope and impact of IAC waivers are uncertain. See, e.g., People v. Abdullah, 122 A.D.3d 958 (3d Dept. 2014) (appeal waiver foreclosed an IAC claim that did not "impact the voluntariness" of the plea). Accordingly, defendants are unlikely to comprehend the effect of these waivers. And, defendants who are informed that the waiver will foreclose all future claims of ineffectiveness may mistakenly believe that they will be unable to bring any IAC claim even when cases like Abdullah might allow them to do so. Finally, in contrast to parties suing for malpractice in civil litigation, criminal defendants who waive IAC claims but who were harmed by their lawyers have little recourse to malpractice litigation, both because the very conviction that resulted from the ineffectiveness will usually bar any relief at all – and because even in the rare instances when criminal defendants succeed in proving malpractice, nonpecuniary damages are not available. See Dombrowski v. Bulson, 19 N.Y.3d 347 (2012) (when a convicted criminal defendant sues the former criminal defense attorney for legal malpractice, nonpecuniary damages are not available).

13. One final harm caused by IAC waivers is that they create an incentive for prosecutors to employ them to conceal IAC claims that are known to prosecutors but unknown to defendants and their lawyers. An experienced prosecutor may well witness an inexperienced defense lawyer's unwitting ineffectiveness. A prosecutor's use of an IAC waiver to cover up an IAC claim would result in a substantial injustice.

14. These substantial harms that the routine use of IAC waivers cause to the administration of justice are not outweighed by any identifiable benefits. While appeal waivers that apply to other issues may promote finality, IAC waivers do not achieve finality because the scope of an IAC waiver is so uncertain. As suggested earlier, IAC waivers that "impact the voluntariness" of the plea are not waivable (see People v. Abdullah, 122 A.D.3d 958). But almost all IAC claims arising from plea cases arguably impact the voluntariness of the plea. Consequently, most IAC claims will be subject to future litigation, notwithstanding the presence of a waiver. That the cost of foregoing IAC waivers is not substantial is demonstrated by the United States Department of Justice's 2014 decision to prohibit federal prosecutors from using IAC waivers. See Deputy Attorney General James Cole, Memorandum for All Federal Prosecutors (Oct. 14, 2014). No negative effects have been reported as a result of the nationwide implementation of this policy.

15. Notably, the Massachusetts Supreme Court, apparently drawing the same conclusion about the impact of IAC waivers that the United States Department of Justice drew, amended the Massachusetts Rules of Professional Conduct effective April 1, 2016 explicitly to prohibit prosecutors from seeking IAC waivers. See Mass. R. Prof. C. 3.8(h) ("The prosecutor in a criminal case shall: . . . (h) refrain from seeking, as a condition of a disposition agreement in a criminal matter, the defendant's waiver of claims of ineffective assistance of counsel or prosecutorial misconduct."). While the New York Rules of Professional Conduct do not contain an explicit bar against IAC waivers, we believe that, under the totality of the circumstances, these waivers are prohibited under Rule 8.4(d) because of the substantial harms they cause to the administration of justice.[24]

16. In this opinion, we have considered whether the "routine" requirement of IAC waivers is prejudicial to the administration of justice. Because many of the harms that we have identified are connected with the broad use of IAC waivers in an already over-burdened criminal justice system, we believe that there may well be case-specific scenarios in which a bargained-for waiver of IAC claims does not raise the same concerns. The ABA House of Delegates Resolution and Report 113E (2013), which also condemned the general use of IAC waivers in criminal cases, noted one such example: a defendant who has been advised by an independent lawyer may waive an identified instance of ineffectiveness. Similarly, when a particularly sophisticated client has retained a lawyer of the client's choosing, a negotiated disposition that includes an IAC waiver would not necessarily implicate the same concerns as those addressed in this opinion.

CONCLUSION:

17. A prosecutor may not ethically require, as a routine condition of a plea bargain, that a defendant waive ineffective assistance of counsel claims.

24 Because, prior to this opinion, prosecutors were not on notice that Rule 8.4(d) prohibits prosecutors from routinely conditioning a plea bargain on the waiver of ineffective assistance of counsel claims, we do not believe that a prosecutor's prior use of this practice should be subject to discipline.

OPINION 1099 (07/12/2016)

TOPIC: Obligation to Report Judicial Misconduct

DIGEST: A New York lawyer is not required to report a violation by a judge of the Rules of Judicial Conduct, but is free to do so if it is consistent with the lawyer's duty of confidentiality to the lawyer's client.

RULES: 1.6, 8.3(a), (b) & (c), 8.4(f)

FACTS:

The inquirer believes that he has knowledge that a judge who sits in, and is a member of the bar of, New York has engaged in unethical conduct in a judicial capacity. The inquirer seeks advice on whether this knowledge obligates the inquirer to report the judge to the New York State Commission on Judicial Conduct (or "CJC").

QUESTION:

1. Must a lawyer report to the Commission on Judicial Conduct knowledge of a judge's violation of the Rules of Judicial Conduct?

OPINION:

2. We assume, for purposes of this opinion, that the judge's unethical conduct constitutes a violation of the Rules of the Chief Administrative Judge Regarding Judicial Conduct, 22 N.Y.C.R.R. Part 100 (the "Rules of Judicial Conduct" or "RJC") and does not also violate the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "RPC"), which are applicable to all New York lawyers.

3. The question is an issue of first impression for this Committee. Rule 8.3 of the RPC, entitled "Reporting Professional Misconduct," provides in part:

> (a) A lawyer who knows that another lawyer has committed a violation of the Rules of Professional Conduct that raises a substantial question as to that lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness as a lawyer shall report such knowledge to a tribunal or other authority empowered to investigate or act upon such violation.
> (b) A lawyer who possesses knowledge or evidence concerning another lawyer or a judge shall not fail to respond to a lawful demand for information from a tribunal or other authority empowered to investigate or act upon such conduct.

4. Rule 8.3(a) imposes a duty to report; Rule 8.3(b) imposes a duty to cooperate. Rule 8.3's duty to report arises when a lawyer knows of conduct by another lawyer which violates the Rules and raises a substantial question about that other lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness. Rule 8.3(b)'s duty to cooperate arises when a lawyer has knowledge or evidence that a tribunal or other authority lawfully demands concerning another lawyer or a judge. Had the drafters intended the duty to report to include conduct by a judge that violates the Rules of Judicial Conduct, they easily could have said

so. That 8.3(a) does not refer to judges, while Rule 8.3(b) does, suggests an intention not to impose an obligation to report alleged judicial misconduct. Rule 8.3(a) contrasts with the analogous provision of the RJC. See RJC Part 100.3(D)(1) ("A judge who receives information indicating a substantial likelihood that another judge has committed a substantial violation of this Part shall take appropriate action.")

5. To characterize the omission from the RPC as an oversight is difficult. Rule 8.3 is substantially the same as Disciplinary Rule ("DR") 1-103 of the former Code of Professional Responsibility ("the Code"). When the New York State Bar Association's Committee on Standards of Attorney Conduct, known as COSAC, proposed a revision of the Code to conform to the format, and in many instances the substance, of the American Bar Association's Model Rules of Professional Conduct ("Model Rules"), COSAC recommended that DR 1-103, which was to become Rule 8.3, be amended to extend the duty to report to a lawyer who "knows that a judge has committed a violation of the applicable rules of judicial conduct that raises a substantial question as to the judge's fitness for office." See L. Emanuel, "Major Differences Between COSAC Proposals & Current N.Y. Lawyer's Code of Professional Responsibility," New York Legal Ethics Reporter (April 1, 2006) (quoting the COSAC report). In adopting the RPC, the courts did not accept this recommendation.

6. Of the 51 jurisdictions in the United States that regulate lawyer conduct, 48 explicitly address a lawyer's duty to report alleged judicial misconduct, in most instances with language either tracking Model Rule 8.3(b), e.g., N.J. Rule 8.3(b); Ill. Rule 8.3(b), or tailored to the judicial oversight committee authority of a particular jurisdiction, e.g., Ark. Rule 8.3(b). At least two states – Washington and Georgia – provide that a lawyer "should" do so; Georgia is express in saying that a violation of this suggestion is not a disciplinary violation, see Ga. Rule 8.3. In addition to New York, two other states do not address the matter: California has no parallel to Rule 8.3, even in regard to reporting lawyer misconduct. See D. Karpman, "New Professional Rules Generate Plenty of Disagreement," Cal. L.J. (September 2010) (California rules impose no duty to report misconduct by other lawyers). Alabama requires lawyers to report any violation of its Rule 8.4, which, like New York's, refers only to lawyers, not judges, and yet contains a provision identical to New York's 8.3(b). These comparisons indicate that, when regulators want to impose a whistleblower provision, they know how to phrase it.

7. In this State, at least above the municipal court level, judges are invariably lawyers, which invites the possibility of interpreting Rule 8.3(a)'s reference to the conduct of "another lawyer" to include judges. Certainly the temptation exists to impose a duty to report serious ethical violations by members of the judiciary who are central to the fair administration of justice. Yet for this Committee to do so would require us to ignore (1) Rule 8.3's predecessor (DR 1-103), (2) the evolution of Rule 8.3 from COSAC (which believed an amendment was desirable if not necessary) to the courts that adopted the Rules (which did not agree), and (3) the rules in most other jurisdictions that adopted variations of Model Rule 8.3 specifically imposing an obligation, on pain of disciplinary sanction, for failing to report judicial misconduct. We believe that ignoring these considerations would be overreaching. In any event, we have assumed for purposes of this opinion that the judge's conduct does not violate the RPC.

8. To say that a lawyer is not subject to discipline for failure to report judicial misconduct is not to say that a lawyer should not make such a report. Subject only to the following caveat, nothing in the Rules may be read to discourage a lawyer from reporting to an appropriate authority (including the CJC) knowledge that a judge has engaged in conduct raising substantial questions about the judge's fitness to occupy a judicial post. The most important restraint on a lawyer's right to report is Rule 1.6, which obligates a lawyer to preserve confidential information acquired in the course of an attorney-client relationship, which includes not only privileged communications but any information the disclosure of which would be embarrassing or detrimental to the client or is inconsistent with the client's wishes. Rule 8.3(c) makes clear that a lawyer's duty to report does not require disclosure of information that Rule 1.6 protects (or is obtained by a lawyer or judge while participating in a bona fide lawyer assistance program). These constraints exist regardless whether the lawyer has a duty to report. Thus, when a lawyer's knowledge of judicial misconduct consists of confidential information within the meaning of Rule 1.6, a lawyer wishing to report the misconduct may require the consent of the client to do so.

9. It bears noting that the Constitution of New York authorizes the CJC to "receive, initiate, investigate and hear complaints with respect to the conduct, qualifications, fitness to perform or performance of official duties of any judge or justice of the unified court system." N.Y. Const., Art. VI, § 22, subd. a. To this end, the Legislature has provided the CJC with broad investigatory and enforcement powers. See Judiciary Law §§ 41, 42, 44. Although our State Constitution vests the CJC with this power, a lawyer has the right, subject to any restrictions that Rule 1.6 imposes, to report the alleged judicial misconduct to the CJC or to other authorities, such as a district attorney (for violations of law) or to a grievance committee (for violations of applicable Rules of Professional Conduct).

10. This opinion does not address a lawyer's obligation to report criminal conduct by a judge. Such conduct involves questions of law, such as misprision of a felony, which are beyond our jurisdiction to confront. See Rule 8.4(f) (a lawyer may not knowingly assist a judge "in conduct that is a violation of the rules of judicial conduct or other law").

CONCLUSION:

11. A New York lawyer has no duty, at risk of disciplinary sanction, to report a violation by a judge of the Rules of Judicial Conduct, but the lawyer is free to do so consistent with the lawyer's duty of confidentiality to the lawyer's client.

TOPIC: Specialization; Use of the designation "Accredited Estate Planner®" on an attorney's website and business cards

DIGEST: An attorney who obtains the designation "Accredited Estate Planner®" from the National Association of Estate Planners & Councils may not use that designation on the attorney's website or business cards because, even though the American Bar Association has approved a different specialization program of the sponsoring organization, the ABA has not approved its "Accredited Estate Planner®" program.

RULES: 7.4(a) & (c)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is pursuing the designation "Accredited Estate Planner®" ("AEP") through the National Association of Estate Planners & Councils ("NAEPC"). Both attorneys and non-attorney professionals (such as Chartered Life Underwriters® and Certified Public Accountants) may earn this designation. According to the inquirer, the designation reflects a commitment to a "team approach" to estate planning and does not connote being a "specialist" in estate law. The inquirer says he would not hold himself out as a specialist, but wishes to use the designation on his website and business cards.

QUESTION:

2. May a lawyer's website and business cards use the designation "Accredited Estate Planner®" if the lawyer obtains that designation through the National Association of Estate Planners & Councils?

OPINION:

3. The question involves the permissible ways for an attorney to claim to be certified as a specialist in a particular practice area of law. Rule 7.4 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"), which addresses identification of practice areas and specialization, states:

> (a) A lawyer or law firm may publicly identify one or more areas of law in which the lawyer or law firm practices, or may state that the practice of the lawyer or law firm is limited to one or more areas of law, provided that the lawyer or law firm shall not state that the lawyer is a specialist or specializes in a particular field of law, except as provided in Rule 7.4(c).
> (c) A lawyer may state that the lawyer has been recognized or certified as a specialist only as follows:
> > (1) A lawyer who is certified as a specialist in a particular area of law or law practice by a private organization approved for that purpose by the American Bar

> Association may state the fact of certification if, in conjunction therewith, the certifying organization is identified and the following statement is prominently made: "This certification is not granted by any governmental authority."
> (2) A lawyer who is certified as a specialist in a particular area of law or law practice by the authority having jurisdiction over specialization under the laws of another state or territory may state the fact of certification if, in conjunction therewith, the certifying state or territory is identified and the following statement is prominently made: "This certification is not granted by any governmental authority within the State of New York."
> (3) A statement is prominently made if:
> (i) when written, it is clearly legible and capable of being read by the average person, and is in a font size at least two font sizes larger than the largest text used to state the fact of certification; and
> (ii) when spoken aloud, it is intelligible to the average person, and is at a cadence no faster, and a level of audibility no lower, than the cadence and level of audibility used to state the fact of certification.

4. The inquirer states that the designation "Accredited Estate Planner®" does not connote being a "specialist," but we do not agree. The terms "accredited" and "certified" imply expertise. We have previously held that a lawyer may not claim to be an "expert" in any area of the law, other than as permitted by Rule 7.4(c). See N.Y. State 1021 (the word "expert" is an obvious synonym for the word "specialist"); N.Y. State 757 (no support in rules for use of "expert"); N.Y. State 722 (if membership in a professional organization implies certification in a legal field, the reference must comply with [the former Code's equivalent to Rule 7.4(c)]). When used in conjunction with "a particular area of law or law practice," the term "accredited" is a synonym for specialist.

5. This conclusion is supported by the NAEPC website, which asserts that one of its goals is to "encourage specialization programs to increase recognition and acceptance of estate planning as a specialty. . . . NAEPC administers two separate and distinct specialization programs." (Emphasis added.) One of the programs NAEPC administers is the AEP program, and the other program is the "Estate Planning Law Specialist (EPLS)" program. The EPLS program has been approved by the ABA, but the AEP program has not received such approval.

6. We do not opine here on whether enforcement of Rule 7.4 would pass constitutional muster, since that question is one of law that is beyond the jurisdiction of this Committee. The U.S. Supreme Court held in Peel v. Attorney Registration and Disciplinary Commission of Illinois, 496 U.S. 91, 110 (1990), that States may not categorically restrict attorneys from making claims of certification and specialization, but the Court also said that "[t]o the extent that potentially misleading statements of private certification or specialization could confuse consumers, a State might consider screening certifying organizations or requiring a disclaimer about the certifying organizations or standards of specialty."

7. In Rule 7.4, New York has created criteria for screening certifying agencies. Specifically, Rule 7.4(c) prohibits a lawyer from claiming specialty certification unless the certification is issued by either (i) a private organization approved for the purpose of certifying attorneys in particular practice areas by the American Bar Association ("ABA"), or (ii) an authority having jurisdiction to do so in another state or territory. The inquirer has not met either of these standards. According to the ABA's website, the ABA has approved the NAEPC's Estate Planning Law Specialist program, but the ABA has not approved the NAEPC's Accredited Estate Planner program. Moreover, to our knowledge, the AEP program has not been certified by any authority with jurisdiction to certify estate planners in another state or jurisdiction.

CONCLUSION:

8. An attorney may not use the term "Accredited Estate Planner®" on the attorney's website or business cards. The issuer of the designation is a private organization and its AEP program has not been approved by the ABA for the purpose of accrediting specialization as required by Rule 7.4(c)(1).

TOPIC: Advertising; dual practice; link from law firm's website to real estate brokerage information

DIGEST: A lawyer may place a link on the lawyer's website to a page describing the lawyer's separate status as a real estate broker, as long as the content of the lawyer's website and of the page reached by the link comply with the advertising rules. The lawyer also should be mindful of Rule 5.7, which addresses lawyer involvement in ancillary nonlegal businesses.

RULES: 1.0(a) & (c), 5.7(a), 7.1(a) & (f)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is both a lawyer and real estate broker, pursuing the latter as a part-time associate broker through a separate real estate brokerage firm. The inquirer wishes to create a link on the inquirer's law firm website to a real estate profile page that would display (i) the inquirer's real estate background, (ii) real estate listings, and (iii) contact information for the real estate agency.

QUESTION:

2. May a lawyer who is also a real estate broker create a link on the lawyer's website to a real estate profile page that would display (i) the inquirer's real estate background, (ii) real estate listings, and (iii) contact information for the real estate office?

OPINION:

3. Our opinions since the late 1970s have permitted a lawyer to advertise a law practice and a business as a real estate broker together. See, e.g., N.Y. State 933 (2012) (lawyer may conduct law practice and real estate brokerage in same office and advertise them together if the ads are not false or misleading); N.Y. State 493 (1978) (lawyer may conduct law practice and real estate brokerage from same office, but may not solicit employment as a lawyer in violation of any statute or court rule and may not act as lawyer and broker in the same transaction). This contrasts with our opinions before the Supreme Court's lawyer advertising opinion in Bates v. State Bar of Arizona, 433 U.S. 350 (1977). See, e.g., N.Y. State 206 (1971) (lawyer may not publicize a law practice together with a non-legal occupation, since such publicity might involve improper solicitation or the use of the non-legal business as a "feeder" to the law practice).

4. N.Y. State 933 concerned only mailing advertising material (such as greeting cards, business cards, refrigerator magnets and the like) to both law firm and brokerage clients, but nothing in the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") prohibits the link proposed here, as long as it complies with the advertising rules. See N.Y. State 915 (2012) (if relevant advertising rules are adhered to, a law firm's website may link to the website of a related nonlegal entity); N.Y. State 888 (2011) (lawyer website may include links to other businesses if neither the link nor the linked material involves misrepresentation or causes confusion).

5. In N.Y. State 915, we noted that the definitions of "advertisement" and "computer-accessed communication" in Rule 1.0(a) and (c) were broad enough that, if the primary purpose of a particular link were to facilitate the retention of the services of the lawyer or law firm, the link and the related text would be "advertisements" under the Rules and therefore must comply with Rule 7.1, governing advertisements. Thus, for example, the linked website must not contain "false, deceptive, or misleading" statements, see Rule 7.1(a)(1), and the notation "Attorney Advertising" must appear on the home page of the website, see Rule 7.1(f).

6. In addition, our prior opinions have pointed out a number of restrictions that apply when a lawyer provides both legal and nonlegal services to a client. While it seems unlikely that the inquirer could provide both legal and nonlegal services to the same client, it is useful to repeat some of those restrictions here.

7. First, the lawyer's personal interest in receiving a brokerage commission has led us to point out that a lawyer-broker may not in most instances act as both a lawyer and a real estate broker in the same transaction. See N.Y. State 1043 (2015) (lawyer who represented client in selling real estate may not accept a referral fee from the real estate broker even if the lawyer does not charge a legal fee); N.Y. State 1015 (2014) (lawyer may serve as both a lawyer and real estate broker only if the brokerage services are compensated by a flat fee paid in advance rather than in a commission-based payment contingent upon closing); N.Y. State 933 (lawyer may not act as a lawyer and broker in the same transaction); N.Y. State 919 (lawyer may not act as attorney for any party to a real estate transaction in which the lawyer is acting as a broker); N.Y. State 493 (1978) (lawyer may not act as a lawyer and a real estate broker in the same transaction). The personal interest conflict of a lawyer acting in receiving the brokerage commission is ordinarily not a consentable conflict. See N.Y. State 933 at ¶ 7.

8. Second, Rule 5.7 applies to lawyers or law firms providing nonlegal services to clients or other persons, such as the inquirer here. In particular, Rule 5.7(a) provides that the nonlegal services are subject to the Rules of Professional Conduct where (1) the nonlegal services provided to a person are not distinct from legal services being provided to that person by the lawyer or law firm, (2) the nonlegal services are distinct from the legal services being provided by the lawyer but the person receiving the services could reasonably believe that the nonlegal services are the subject of a client-lawyer relationship, or (3) the lawyer is an owner or agent of, or otherwise affiliated with, the provider of nonlegal services, and the persons receiving the services could reasonably believe that the nonlegal services are the subject of a client-lawyer relationship.

9. Under Rule 5.7(a)(4), for purposes of paragraphs (a)(2) and (a)(3) of Rule 5.7:

> [I]t will be presumed that the person receiving nonlegal services believes the services to be the subject of a client-lawyer relationship unless the lawyer or law firm has advised the person receiving the services in writing that the services are not legal services and that the protection of a client-lawyer relationship does not exist with respect to the nonlegal services, or if the interest of the lawyer or law firm in the entity providing nonlegal services is de minimis.

10. The inquirer is unlikely to provide both legal and nonlegal services to the same client (because, as noted, a lawyer may not serve as lawyer and real estate broker in the same transaction). However, if the inquirer plans to link the legal and brokerage web pages, the inquirer may wish to avoid confusion about whether the brokerage services are subject to a client-attorney relationship by providing, on the linked pages describing the nonlegal services, the warning quoted above from Rule 5.7(a)(4). Opinion 933 ¶ 8, which draws upon Rule 5.7, explains the problem:

> If the brokerage services provided to a . . . brokerage client are not distinct from legal services provided to that same client, albeit in different matters, or could be perceived by that client to be the subject of a client-lawyer relationship, those [brokerage] services will be subject to the Rules of Professional Conduct. Moreover, 'it will be presumed that the person receiving [the brokerage] services believes' them to be the subject of a client-lawyer relationship 'unless the lawyer or law firm has advised the person receiving the services in writing that the services are not legal services and that the protection of a client-lawyer relationship does not exist with respect to the nonlegal services . . . ."

CONCLUSION:

11. If the content of the lawyer's website and of the page reached by a link therein comply with the advertising rules, a lawyer may place a link on a law firm website to a page describing the lawyer's separate status as a real estate broker. The lawyer, however, should also be mindful of the restrictions of Rule 5.7(a) on ancillary businesses.

TOPIC: Insurance counsel; sharing office space with nonlawyers

DIGEST: The lawyers in an insurance company's in-house department who provide legal services to the insurance company's policy holders must take reasonable steps to protect client confidential information of the insureds and to avoid conflicts of interest, and must comply with other applicable Rules.

RULES: Rule 1.0(h), 1.1, 1.6(a) & (c), 1.8(f), 5.3

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a salaried employee of an insurance company. The inquirer's practice is limited to the defense of the insurance company's policy holders. The lawyers in the inquirer's department are setting up an office within the building that houses the insurance company and have asked if there are any ethical requirements regarding the layout and function of the office.

QUESTION:

2. What ethical rules govern the office of an insurance company's in-house department that provides legal services to the insurance company's policy holders?

OPINION:

3. This Committee has long held that a lawyer may be retained or employed as "house counsel" to an insurance company to defend the insurance company's assureds. See N.Y. State 519 (1980); N.Y. State 109 (1969) (citing ABA Opinion 282). N.Y. State 109 notes that the contract of insurance gives the insurance company control over the defense of any action brought against the assured. Opinion 109 also notes that, since the interests of the insurance company and the assured are usually the same (i.e., to defeat claims that the insurance company might be required to pay), an insurance company's in-house lawyer's representation of an insured normally does not present a conflict of interest.[25] But see N.Y. State 519 (1980) (insurance company's staff counsel may not represent assured when company disclaims coverage). When the insurance company designates counsel for the assured, whether the designated counsel is inside or outside counsel, the lawyer's client is the insured and not the insurance company. See N.Y. State 716 (1999) (the lawyer's primary allegiance is to the client, the insured); N.Y. State 73 (1968) (attorney employed by carrier has superior duty to assured, the client); American Employers Insurance Co. v. Goble Aircraft Specialties, Inc., 205 Misc. 1066, 131 N.Y.S.2d 393 (1954) (although the insurance company has retained the lawyer under its contractual duty to defend the policyholder, the client is the policyholder, not the insurance company). Cf. Rule 1.8(f) (lawyer shall not accept compensation for representing a client from one other than the client unless there is no interference with the lawyer's independent professional judgment or with the client-lawyer relationship).

25 In N.Y. State 109, the inquirer also asked whether such an arrangement would constitute the unauthorized practice of law by the insurance company. We declined to answer that question, on the grounds that identifying the unauthorized practice of law is a question of law, and thus is outside the jurisdiction of this Committee. See generally Derek A. Denckla, Nonlawyers and the Unauthorized Practice of Law: An Overview of the Legal and Ethical Parameters, 67 Fordham L. Rev. 2581 (1999), available at: http://ir.lawnet.fordham.edu/flr/vol67/iss5/32.

4. In N.Y. State 726 (2000), we held that a group of lawyers who are salaried employees of an insurance company and whose practice is exclusively to defend the company's policyholders may hold themselves out as a law firm, as long as (i) they undertake to act consistently with the professional responsibilities of a law firm and (ii) they disclose to insureds and others they are employees of the insurance company. We noted there that these responsibilities include compliance with the rules on confidentiality and conflicts of interest. However, all of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") would apply to the lawyers in the legal department, since the department constitutes a "law firm" under the Rules, whether or not the lawyers in the department hold themselves out as such. See Rule 1.0(h) (the term "firm" or "law firm" includes the legal department of a corporation or other organization).

5. Regarding the design of the office space of the in-house department (the "Department"), the requirement to safeguard the confidentiality of client information informs that issue. Rule 1.6(a) provides: "A lawyer shall not knowingly reveal confidential information . . . or use such information to the disadvantage of a client or for the advantage of the lawyer or a third person" unless the client gives informed consent. Rule 1.6(c) provides: "A lawyer shall exercise reasonable care to prevent the lawyer's employees, associates, and others whose services are utilized by the lawyer from disclosing or using confidential information of a client . . . ." (Emphasis added.) Here, the "others" include employees of the insurance company outside the Department, including the management of the insurance company and the insurance company's claims investigators. See N.Y. State 987 (2013) (absent consent from the insured, staff counsel may not permit review of the confidential information in the client's file by non-attorney employees of the insurance company); N.Y. State 716 (1999) (lawyer representing insured may not submit legal bills to an independent audit company employed by the insurance carrier without the consent of the insured after full disclosure because legal bills may contain confidential information of the client).

6. We have previously opined on the requirement of confidentiality where a lawyer shares office space with non-lawyers or lawyers not in the lawyer's own firm. See N.Y. State 643 (1993) (where a bar association provides volunteer lawyers to a legal service organization, client files may be kept at the offices of the bar association as long as client confidential information is protected from unauthorized disclosure and the files are stored in a secure location available only to (i) the client, (ii) the client's present or former lawyer, or (iii) another person for whom the client has given informed consent); N.Y. State 939 (2012) (independent lawyers who share office space must take reasonable measures to ensure the confidentiality of client confidential information).

7. We believe the requirement of confidentiality mandates that the work space of the lawyers who represent assureds must be separated from the work space of other insurance company managers and employees, so that conversations about clients of the Department may not be overheard by persons outside the Department. In addition, client papers should be secured so that persons outside the Department cannot access them absent the client's informed consent.

8. The inquirer must determine whether use of the insurance company's computer system would adequately safeguard confidential information of the assureds. For example, in N.Y. State 939 (2012), we discussed lawyers who shared office space as well as a single computer. Each of the lawyers had a separate administrative password to the computer that was not known to the other. We said:

> The fact that the lawyers have separate computer passwords is certainly an appropriate precaution. Whether it is sufficient would depend on further factors. Some password systems may be more resistant to unauthorized access than others. Protection of the password is also important; for example, a password kept on a piece of paper stuck to the computer and readily visible to any user does not provide much protection. On the other hand, if a robust password system provides a degree of protection similar to that of locked file cabinets, then its proper and consistent use may well constitute reasonable care.

See also Rule 1.1, Cmt. [8] (a lawyer should "keep abreast of the benefits and risks associated with technology the lawyer uses to provide services to clients").

9. Here, if the insurance company's technical administrators have access to the Department's client files and are not prohibited from sharing them with persons outside the Department, the lawyers in the Department will be violating their duty to preserve the confidentiality of client information.

10. Finally, the lawyers in the Department have an obligation under Rule 1.6(c) and Rule 5.3 to supervise the work of nonlawyers in the Department to ensure that it is consistent with the lawyers' responsibilities under Rule 1.6. See Rule 5.3, Cmt. [2] (law firm must ensure that assistants are given appropriate instruction and supervision concerning the ethical aspects of their employment, particularly regarding the obligation not to disclose information relating to representation of the client.)

CONCLUSION:

11. The lawyers in an insurance company's in-house department who provide legal services to the insurance company's policy holders must take reasonable steps to protect client confidential information of the insureds and to avoid conflicts of interest, and must comply with other applicable Rules.

TOPIC: Conflicting interests; representation of competing enterprises; substantial relationship

DIGEST: An attorney who previously represented Corporation A may undertake the representation of Corporation B in litigation with Corporation X that is unrelated to the attorney's prior representation of Corporation A, notwithstanding that Corporations A and B are competitors in the same industry and that it is in Corporation A's economic interest for Corporation B to lose the litigation with Corporation X. Corporation A's threat to sue Corporation B in a matter unrelated to the attorney's prior representation of Corporation A similarly does not bar the attorney from representing Corporation B in the threatened litigation.

RULES: 1.0(l), 1.7(a) and 1.9(a) & (c)

FACTS:

1. Corporation A and Corporation B are competitors. They are engaged in the same industry, in the same geographic area, providing similar services to the same customer base. The inquirer previously represented Corporation A in a matter that has been concluded ("Matter 1"). The inquirer now proposes to represent Corporation B in litigation with Corporation X ("Matter 2"). The inquirer states, and we assume for purposes of this opinion, that Matter 1 and Matter 2 are not factually related. However, if Corporation B is unsuccessful in this suit, it might be forced to cease operations, which would benefit Corporation A.

2. Also, Corporation A has recently threatened to sue Corporation B on a matter ("Matter 3") that is not factually related to Matter 1.

QUESTIONS:

3. May a lawyer undertake to represent a client, Corporation B, in litigation with Corporation X, where it is in the economic interest of a former client, Corporation A, for Corporation B to lose the litigation?

4. May a lawyer undertake to represent a client, Corporation B, in litigation threatened against it by the lawyer's former client, Corporation A, when the threatened litigation is not related to the lawyer's former representation of Corporation A?

OPINION:

Applicable Rules

5. The inquirer states that Matter 1 has concluded. Consequently, we assume that Corporation A is a former client of the inquirer. But see N.Y. State 1008 (2014) for an example where the client argues it is a current client despite the fact that the matter has concluded. Whether the client is a current or former client is a mixed question of fact and law that is outside our jurisdiction to determine.

6. We have held that a lawyer's duty of loyalty to a client ends with the termination of the representation. See N.Y. State 638 (1992), N.Y. State 628 (1992) (although the duty to preserve confidences remains, the duty of loyalty ends with the termination of the lawyer-client relationship).

7. The limitations on a lawyer's right to oppose a former client are defined mainly by Rule 1.9(a), which provides:

> (a) A lawyer who has formerly represented a client in a matter shall not thereafter represent another person in the same or a substantially related matter in which that person's interests are materially adverse to the interests of the former client unless the former client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing. [Emphasis added]

Thus, even assuming that the former client has not consented, Rule 1.9(a) does not prohibit a lawyer from representing a new client unless both prongs of Rule 1.9(a) are satisfied – (i) the new matter must be the "same" matter or "substantially related" to the prior matter, and (ii) the new client's interests must be "materially adverse" to the interests of the former client.

8. The term "matter" is defined in Rule 1.0(l):

> "Matter" includes any litigation, judicial or administrative proceeding, case, claim, application, request for a ruling or other determination, contract, controversy, investigation, charge, accusation, arrest, negotiation, arbitration, mediation or any other representation involving a specific party or parties.

9. Comment [2] to Rule 1.9 helps to understand the meaning of the terms "matter" and "materially adverse":

> [2] The scope of a "matter" for purposes of this Rule depends on the facts of a particular situation or transaction. The lawyer's involvement in a matter can also be a question of degree. When a lawyer has been directly involved in a specific transaction, subsequent representation of other clients with materially adverse interests in that transaction clearly is prohibited. On the other hand, a lawyer who recurrently handled a type of problem for a former client is not precluded from later representing another client in a factually distinct problem of that type, even though the subsequent representation involves a position adverse to the prior client. . . . [Emphasis added]

10. Comment [3] to Rule 1.9 explains what is meant by "substantially related":

> [3] Matters are "substantially related" for purposes of this Rule if they involve the same transaction or legal dispute or if, under the circumstances, a reasonable lawyer would conclude that there is otherwise a substantial risk that confidential factual information that would normally have been obtained in the prior representation would materially advance the client's position in the subsequent matter. . . . [Emphasis added]

11. Even if the legal issues involved in two matters are the same, it would not make the matters substantially related. As we noted in N.Y. State 1029 (2014):

> The mere circumstance that the current representation may involve legal issues that were also involved in the Litigation does not make the matters substantially related. Interpretations of the ethical rules have long distinguished between conflicts involving the same matter and conflicts involving the same legal issue. Such "issue" (or "positional") conflicts tend to be more problematic in the case of concurrent representation than in the case of former representation. Even as to concurrent representation, a lawyer may ordinarily "take inconsistent legal positions in different tribunals at different tribunals at different times on behalf of different client," although there can be circumstances in which an issue conflict arises because "there is a significant risk that a lawyer's action on behalf of one client will materially limit the lawyer's representation of another client in a different case."

See also Rule 1.9, Cmt. [2] (quoted in ¶ 8 above).

12. The fact that the current client and the former client have competing economic interests does not create a conflict of interest under Rule 1.9(a). Even if Corporations A and B were both current clients of the inquirer, their economic competition would not prohibit the inquirer from representing both of them. As Comment [6] to Rule 1.7 explains, with respect to simultaneous representation of two clients:

> [S]imultaneous representation in unrelated matters of clients whose interests are only economically adverse, such as representation of competing economic enterprises in unrelated litigation, does not ordinarily constitute a conflict of interest and thus may not require consent of the respective clients. [Emphasis added.]

See also, Charles W. Wolfram, Competitor and Other "Finite Pie" Conflicts, 36 Hofstra L. Rev. 539, 550-55 (2007) (discussing cases in which lawyers represent economic competitors). Since a lawyer may simultaneously represent current clients who are economic competitors, then a fortiori a lawyer may represent a client whose interests are contrary to the interests of a former client who competes economically with the current client.

May the inquirer represent Corporation B in Matter 2?

13. The inquirer has told us, and we are assuming, that Matter 1 (the completed matter in which the inquirer previously represented Corporation A) is not "substantially related" to Matter 2 (Corporation B's contemplated suit against Corporation X). We thus assume that Matter 1 and Matter 2 do not involve the same transaction or legal dispute. Because the contemplated and former matters are not the same or substantially related, Rule 1.9 would not bar the inquirer from undertaking the proposed representation. We therefore do not need to determine whether Corporation B's interests in Matter 2 are materially adverse to the interests of Corporation A. Rule 1.9(a) requires that both prongs of the test be met – same or substantially related, and materially adverse – and here the first prong is not met.

14. Nevertheless, it is worth noting that Corporation B's interests in Matter 2 would not be materially adverse to the interests of Corporation A under Rule 1.9. Just as competing economic interests do not create "differing interests" within the meaning of Rule 1.7(a)(1), so they do not create a "materially adverse" interest within the meaning of Rule 1.9(a). Here, the fact that Corporation A will benefit if Corporation B is unsuccessful in Matter 2 (because Corporation B is likely to be forced to go out of business if it loses, thus eliminating a competitor), does not create a materially adverse interest under Rule 1.9(a). That would stretch the meaning of "materially adverse" too far.

15. However, the inquirer remains bound by Rule 1.9(c) even if Rule 1.9(a) does not apply. Rule 1.9(c) prohibits a lawyer from using or revealing a former client's confidential information that is protected by Rule 1.6 except as the Rules would permit or require with respect to a current client.

May the inquirer represent Corporation B in Matter 3?

16. Corporation A's threat to sue Corporation B, even if the threat matures into a lawsuit, does not disqualify the inquirer from representing Corporation B in Matter 3, as long as Corporation A remains a former client and Matter 1 and Matter 3 are not the same or substantially related. See, e.g., N.Y. State 1008 (2014) (discussing whether a client is a current or former client as well as the conflicts rules applicable in each situation). Since the inquirer has stated and we are assuming that Corporation A is a former client and that Matter 3 is not substantially related to Matter 1, Rule 1.9(a) does not bar the inquirer's representation of Corporation B in Matter 3 because the first prong of the test in Rule 1.9(a) is not met. In addition the second prong of the Rule 1.9(a) test is not met. The fact that Corporations A and B have generally competing economic interests does not create a "materially adverse" interest within the meaning of Rule 1.9(a).

17. If the inquirer's representation of Corporation B in Matter 3 were substantially related to the former representation of Corporation A in Matter 1, then Rule 1.9(a) would prohibit the inquirer from defending Corporation B in the litigation brought by Corporation A unless the inquirer obtained Corporation A's informed consent, because the "materially adverse" prong of Rule 1.9(a) is always met when a former client is on the opposite side of a lawsuit involving the same or a substantially related matter, whether as plaintiff or defendant.

CONCLUSION:

18. Where an attorney had previously represented Corporation A, the attorney may undertake the representation of Corporation B in litigation unrelated to the attorney's representation of Corporation A, notwithstanding that the two corporations are competitors in the same industry and that Corporation B's failure in the litigation would indirectly benefit Corporation A by eliminating a competitor. Corporation A's bringing suit against Corporation B in a matter unrelated to the attorney's prior representation of Corporation A is similarly not barred by Rule 1.9(a).

TOPIC: Legal fees; lien; mortgage; securing legal fees by having client sign promissory note secured by a mortgage against the client's property.

DIGEST: A lawyer may secure legal fees by having the client sign a promissory note or other instrument, secured by a mortgage against the client's property, provided that (i) the promissory note or instrument and mortgage are fair and reasonable to the client, (ii) the terms of the transaction are fully disclosed to the client in language that the client reasonably can understand, (iii) the client provides informed consent to the essential terms of the note and mortgage and the lawyer's role in the transaction, and (iv) the client is advised in writing to seek independent legal advice and given sufficient opportunity to obtain such advice.

RULES: 1.8(a)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer's law firm wishes to secure legal fees for estate planning and Medicaid planning legal services by having the client sign a promissory note secured by a mortgage against the client's property.

QUESTION:

2. May a law firm secure legal fees for estate planning and Medicaid planning by having the client sign a promissory note secured by a mortgage against the client's property?

OPINION:

3. Rule 1.8(a) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") prohibits a lawyer from entering into a business transaction with a client if they have differing interests therein and if the client expects the lawyer to exercise professional judgment for the protection of the client, unless:

> (1) the transaction is fair and reasonable to the client and the terms of the transaction are fully disclosed and transmitted in writing in a manner that can be reasonably understood by the client;
> (2) the client is advised in writing of the desirability of seeking, and is given a reasonable opportunity to seek, the advice of independent legal counsel on the transaction; and
> (3) the client gives informed consent, in a writing signed by the client, to the essential terms of the transaction and the lawyer's role in the transaction, including whether the lawyer is representing the client in the transaction.

See also Rule 1.0(j) (explaining "informed consent").

4. Comment [4C] to Rule 1.8(a) explains that the Rule does not apply to ordinary fee arrangements between a client and a lawyer entered into at the inception of the lawyer-client relationship, but that it will apply "when the lawyer accepts an interest in the client's business or other nonmonetary property as payment of all or part of the lawyer's fee." The Comment explains that Rule 1.8(a) applies in this situation because of the risk that the lawyer's judgment will be skewed by the financial interest in a way that may affect the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client. See also ABA Formal Op. 02-427 (lawyer who acquires a contractual security interest in a client's property to secure payment of fees earned or to be earned must comply with Rule 1.8(a)), N.Y. City 1988-7 (July 14, 1988) (finding that securing a fee with a mortgage on a client's home was a business transaction governed by DR 5-104(A), the predecessor to Rule 1.8(a)); cf. Rule 1.8(i) (prohibiting a lawyer from acquiring a proprietary interest in a cause of action or subject matter of a litigation the lawyer is conducting for a client, but permitting the lawyer to "acquire a lien authorized by law to secure the lawyer's fees and expenses").

5. Rule 1.8(a) by its terms applies only if the client expects the lawyer to exercise professional judgment for the benefit of the client in the matter. The determination of this issue turns on several factors, including the sophistication and expectations of the client, the complexity of the proposed promissory note and mortgage, and the relationship of those instruments to the estate and Medicaid planning services to be provided (for example, whether the purpose of the planning services is to ensure that the real property passes to the client's heirs). See N.Y. State 1051 (2015) (where contingent fee agreement provides for the fee to be calculated on the amount of the recovery "by settlement or judgment" and the lawyer wishes to amend the agreement to allow taking a percentage of an amount loaned to the client by a third party, the amendment would be subject to scrutiny under Rule 1.8(a); N.Y. State 910 (2012) (setting forth factors that determine whether an amendment to a fee agreement warrants scrutiny as a business transaction under Rule 1.8(a)).

6. Here, the client may be looking to the lawyer's professional judgment to understand the significance of the proposed mortgage and promissory note to the services for which the lawyer is being engaged. Further, although the mortgage that will secure the promissory note will not, in the first instance, be relied upon to pay legal fees, the attorney may seek to foreclose on the mortgage in order to recover legal fees if the client fails to make timely and complete payment. The lawyer and client have conflicting interests in the promissory note and associated mortgage because, if the client fails to pay legal fees on a timely basis, the client would want to prevent the lawyer from enforcing rights against the client under the promissory note and mortgage. Accordingly, the lawyer ordinarily will have to comply with Rule 1.8(a) in connection with entering into the promissory note and mortgage.

7. We note also that Rule 1.5(d)(5)(ii) prohibits a lawyer from entering into an arrangement to collect a fee in a domestic relations matter if "the written retainer agreement includes a security interest, confession of judgment or other lien without prior notice being provided to the client in a signed retainer agreement and approval from a tribunal after notice to the adversary." However, this Rule is applicable only to domestic relations matters, and has no bearing on an engagement to provide Medicaid and estate planning services.

8. Because the inquirer has not asked, we do not in this opinion discuss the ethical considerations with respect to executing on the note and mortgage. See Rule 1.5(f) ("Where applicable, a lawyer shall resolve fee disputes by arbitration at the election of the client pursuant to a fee arbitration program . . . approved by the Administrative Board of the Courts"); 22 N.Y.C.R.R. Part 137; N.Y. State 684 (1996) (reporting a client to a credit bureau); N.Y. State 608 (1990) (lawyer may use a collection agent after determining that fee is justly owed and considering other factors); N.Y. State 591 (1988) (before engaging a collection agent, lawyer must first determine that fees billed are justly owed for services properly rendered); N.Y. State 567 (1984) (lawyer may protect the right to retain papers or property until the client pays the fees or provides adequate security with a statutory retaining lien, subject to the need to protect against immediate harm to the client).

CONCLUSION:

9. A lawyer may secure legal fees for Medicaid and estate planning services by having the client sign a promissory note or other instrument, secured by a mortgage against the client's property, provided that (i) the promissory note or instrument and mortgage are fair and reasonable to the client, (ii) the terms of the transaction are fully disclosed to the client in language that the client reasonably can understand, (iii) the client provides informed consent to the essential terms of the note and mortgage and the lawyer's role in the transaction, and (iv) the client is advised in writing to seek independent legal advice and given sufficient opportunity to obtain such advice.

TOPIC: Imputed conflict of interest

DIGEST: Conflicts of a partner in a private law firm are imputed to all of the lawyers associated with the private law firm. Consequently, absent informed, written consent, if the public defender's office in which the lawyer is a part-time public defender is prevented by a conflict from representing a person, then neither the part-time defender nor any lawyer in the part-time defender's private law firm may represent the person.

RULES: 1.0(t), 1.7(a) & (b), 1.10(a) & (b)

FACTS:

1. The inquiring lawyer ("Lawyer A") is "of counsel" to a law firm and maintains a large caseload of family court assignments and criminal court assignments, including misdemeanors and felonies, from the local county and city courts. Lawyer A handles exclusively assigned matters and does not discuss them with any other lawyer in the firm.

2. Lawyer A does not accept assignments from town or justice courts that hold court in the evening. Lawyer A receives case assignments from the local courts when the public defender's office has a conflict of interest.

3. Recently, one of the partners of the firm ("Lawyer B") accepted a part time position with the county public defender's office. Lawyer B's caseload for that office consists of misdemeanors and violation level offenses, but not felonies, before town and justice courts with evening appearances.

QUESTION:

4. May the inquiring lawyer continue to receive assigned family court and criminal court matters when (i) the public defender's office has a conflict of interest and (ii) a partner in the firm where the inquiring attorney is "of counsel" is also a part-time public defender?

OPINION:

Applicable Rules

5. This inquiry directly implicates Rules 1.7 and 1.10(a) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules").

6. Rule 1.7 provides:

> (a) Except as provided in paragraph (b), a lawyer shall not represent a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that either:
> > (1) the representation will involve the lawyer in representing differing interests; or

(2) there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests.

(b) Notwithstanding the existence of a concurrent conflict of interest under paragraph (a), a lawyer may represent a client if:

(1) the lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client;

(2) the representation is not prohibited by law;

(3) the representation does not involve the assertion of a claim by one client against another client represented by the lawyer in the same litigation or other proceeding before a tribunal; and

(4) each affected client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing.

7. Rule 1.10(a) provides: "While lawyers are associated in a firm, none of them shall knowingly represent a client when any one of them practicing alone would be prohibited from doing so by Rule 1.7, 1.8 or 1.9, except as otherwise provided herein." (emphasis added)

Imputation Within the Public Defender's Office

8. Under Rule 1.10, when lawyers are associated in a firm, none of them may undertake a representation when any of them practicing alone would be prohibited from undertaking the representation as a result of a conflict of interest. Comment [2] to Rule 1.10 explains that the rule of imputed disqualification gives effect to the duty of loyalty to the client, as applied to lawyers who practice in law firms. Some courts, for purposes of disqualification motions, will allow this presumption to be rebutted. See, e.g. Hempstead Video, Inc. v. Incorporated Village of Valley Stream, 409 F.3d 127 (2d Cir. 2005). But imputation under Rule 1.10(a) is absolute unless waived by the client.

9. Therefore, the initial questions under Rule 1.10 are (i) whether the public defender's office constitutes a law firm and (ii) whether a part-time public defender is "associated" with the firm. Regarding the first question, Comment [1] to Rule 1.10 states that the term "firm" includes lawyers employed in a legal services organization. Comment [4] to Rule 1.0 notes that, with respect to lawyers in legal aid and legal services organizations, depending upon the structure of the organization, the entire organization or components of it may constitute a firm or firms for purposes of the Rules. This is a factual question that is beyond the jurisdiction of our Committee. However, for purposes of this opinion, we assume that the public defender's office is structured in such a way that the entire office is considered a single law firm. See N.Y. State 1036 (2014) (local sections of a national legal services project are considered a single law firm for conflict of interest purposes where, among other things, the local sections share a single case management system and there is supervision across the local sections); N.Y. State 862 (2011) (public defender's office is a "firm" for purposes of Rule 1.10); N.Y. State 975 (2013) (county public defender office is a firm for imputation purposes even if its lawyers work independently).

10. Regarding the second question, we have previously held that a part-time attorney is "associated" with a firm for purposes of the conflict rules. See N.Y. State 862 (2011) (a part-time assistant public defender is "associated" with that firm). In N. Y. State 862, we noted that the imputation rule applies to all lawyers in a firm, regardless of practice area or department.

Imputation from the Public Defender's Office to Lawyer B's Private Practice

11. Where two "law firms" have a common lawyer, a conflict of interest is imputed to both firms. See Cinema 5, Ltd. V. Cinerama, Inc., 528 F.2d 1384, 1387 (2d Cir. 1976) (counsel disqualified from representing client because a partner in his NYC law firm is also a partner in a Buffalo firm that represents the client's opponent). Thus, in N.Y. State 862 (2011), we opined that a lawyer who was a part-time assistant public defender could not, in the lawyer's private practice, represent a client that another full-time or part-time assistant public defender in the same public defender's office could not represent because of a conflict of interest, unless the conflict could be and was waived.

12. N.Y. State 862 makes it clear that Lawyer B – the part-time public defender – cannot represent a client in private practice where another lawyer in the public defender's office is disqualified from undertaking the representation, unless the conflict may be and is waived.

Imputation from the Lawyer B to Lawyer A

13. Under Rule 1.10(a), if Lawyer B is disqualified from a representation, then, unless the conflict may be and is waived, the conflict is imputed to all lawyers who are "associated" in Lawyer B's firm. We have long held that a lawyer who is "of counsel" with a firm is "associated" with that firm. See N.Y. State 615 (1991); cf. Rule 7.3(a)(2)(v) (affiliated as a partner, associate or of counsel). Thus, if Lawyer B is disqualified from the representation, then Lawyer A is disqualified by imputation. Consequently, absent a waiver, if the public defender's office has a conflict that prevents it from undertaking a representation, then neither Lawyer B nor Lawyer A may undertake the representation in their private practice.

Exceptions to Imputation

14. The inquirer notes that Lawyer B's cases as a part-time public defender involve solely misdemeanors and violation level offenses before town and justice courts with evening appearances and that Lawyer A does not handle any cases in such courts. Rule 1.10 applies to law firms. Consequently, unless the public defender's office is organized so that matters heard in daytime and evening session or in different courts were handled by different "firms," the fact that Lawyer A and Lawyer B practice in different courts would be irrelevant.

15. Even if the public defender work of Lawyer A and Lawyer B are effectively screened from the work of the other lawyer, New York does not recognize screening to eliminate conflicts of interest, except where the original disqualification occurs under Rule 1.11, 1.12 or 1.18. See Rule 1.0, Cmt. [8]. This inquiry does not arise under one of those Rules.

16. Finally, Rule 6.5 contains an exception to the application of Rules 1.7, 1.8 and 1.10 for lawyers who participate in "limited pro bono legal services programs," which involve short-term limited legal services to a client without expectation by either the lawyer or the client that the lawyer will provide continuing representation in the matter. See N.Y. State 1012 (2014). This inquiry does not involve such a program.

Consent

17. In N.Y. State 862 (2011) we concluded that a conflict of interest could be waived if the conditions set forth in Rule 1.7(b) were met. Assuming that the representation was not prohibited by law and that the lawyer reasonably believed the lawyer would be able to provide competent and diligent representation to the assigned client, we provided additional guidance on obtaining consent:

> To cure a conflict, Rule 1.7(b) requires informed consent from "each affected client." Which clients are affected depends on why the conflict arises. If the imputed conflict arises under Rule 1.7(a)(1) because of another current client, then the inquirer (or some other attorney in the Public Defender's office) must obtain informed consent, confirmed in writing, from both the inquirer's assigned client and the conflicted Assistant Public Defender's current client. If the conflict arises under Rule 1.7(a)(2) because of the conflicted Assistant Public Defender's personal interests, then consent is required only from the inquirer's own assigned client, because no other client is affected. If the conflict arises under Rule 1.9 because of the conflicted Assistant Public Defender's former client, then the inquirer must obtain consent from the conflicting former client. (Since the inquirer did not personally represent the former client, we assume that the inquirer does not personally possess any confidential information of the former client. If the inquirer were in possession of any of the former client's confidential information that has not become generally known, further analysis would be necessary.)

18. However, when the lawyer seeks consent from a client who is receiving free legal services, the lawyer must consider whether such consent would be freely given. See N.Y. State 490 (1978) (when a legal aid office seeks consent to share client confidential information with board members of the organization, "the staff should be particularly sensitive to any element of submissiveness on the part of their indigent clients; and . . . the staff [must be] satisfied that their clients could refuse to consent without any sense of guilt or embarrassment.")

CONCLUSION:

19. Conflicts of a partner in a private law firm are imputed to all of the lawyers associated with the private law firm. Consequently, absent informed, written consent, if the public defender's office in which the lawyer is a part-time public defender is prevented by a conflict from representing a person, then neither the part-time defender nor any lawyer in the part-time defender's private law firm may represent the person.

TOPIC: Advice on non-legal issues; allocation of authority

DIGEST: An attorney may render advice that includes considerations such as the benefits and risks of entering a drug treatment program. The attorney must act competently and must adequately explain to the client the material risks of the proposed course of conduct and reasonably available alternatives. However, once the client decides to take a certain course of action, the attorney must follow the directives of the client even if the client's directive conflicts with what the lawyer believes to be in the best interest of the client. If the client is eligible for a diversion program, the attorney must be mindful of confidentiality concerns since treatment records may be provided to judges, prosecutors and program staff. The attorney must provide the client with full disclosure and obtain informed consent before asking the client to execute any release authorizing disclosure of confidential information to the judge or prosecutors.

RULES: 1.1(a), 1.2(a), 1.4(a) & (b), 1.6, 2.1

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a criminal defense attorney whose clients sometimes have underlying substance abuse issues. The inquirer is concerned that a failure to address the client's substance abuse issues could result in recidivism, or even the client's death.

2. The client may be eligible to participate in a court-sponsored diversion program. In an effort to break the cycle of addiction, criminal activity and recidivism, New York State has instituted judicial diversion programs and has set up drug courts to address the issues emanating from drug abuse.[26] The mission of drug courts is to end the abuse of alcohol and other drugs and related criminal activity. See Problem Solving Courts – Drug Treatment Courts – Overview, available at http://www.nycourts.gov/courts/problem_solving/drugcourts/overview.shtml. Specifically, pursuant to Criminal Procedure Law Article 216, courts are authorized to divert eligible felony offenders into substance abuse treatment programs. The defense lawyer's traditional role as zealous advocate for the client may be at odds with the focus of drug courts and diversion programs, which utilize a "nonadversarial, collaborative approach" among the prosecutor, defense attorney, judge and others. See National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers, America's Problem-Solving Courts: The Criminal Costs of Treatment and the Case for Reform, September 2009 p.30.

3. Often, the defendant may receive two plea offers from the prosecution. One involves diversion to a treatment program, and the other does not involve diversion. The penalty for failure to complete the treatment program successfully may be greater than the sentence offered for conviction without diversion.

26 Drug courts combine drug treatment with ongoing judicial supervision. In this way, drug courts seek to break the cycle of addiction, crime, and repeat incarceration. While practice varies widely from state to state (and county to county), the outlines of the drug court model are that: addicted offenders are linked to treatment; their progress is monitored by a drug court team composed of the judge, attorneys, and program staff; participants interact directly with the judge, who responds to progress and setbacks by providing a range of rewards and sanctions; and successful participants generally have the charges against them dismissed or reduced, while unsuccessful participants are generally convicted and incarcerated. See The New York State Drug Court Evaluation – Center for Court Innovation 2003 page ix.

4. For purposes of this opinion, we will assume that the procedures detailed in CPL Article 216 regarding the judicial diversion program apply:

- At any time before the entry of a guilty plea or commencement of trial, the court, at the defendant's request, may order an alcohol and substance abuse evaluation.

- The defendant must, in writing, authorize disclosure of the results of such evaluation to the defense attorney, the prosecutor, the local probation department, the court, and authorized court personnel.

- After receipt of the evaluation, the court may hold a hearing on the issue of whether the defendant should be offered treatment pursuant to Article 216, and, upon completion of such a hearing, will make findings about whether the defendant's participation in judicial diversion could effectively address the defendant's substance abuse or dependence.

- Before the court issues an order granting judicial diversion and releasing the defendant into the diversion program, unless an exception applies, the eligible defendant must plead guilty to the charge or charges.

- The defendant must agree on the record or in writing to abide by the release conditions set by the court, which will include participation in a specified period of treatment, and may include periodic court appearances and urinalysis, to enable the court to monitor the defendant's progress in treatment.

- If the court determines that the defendant has violated a condition of his or her release under the judicial diversion program, the court may impose any sentence authorized for the crime for which the defendant has been convicted in accordance with the plea agreement, although the court will consider the extent to which persons who ultimately successfully complete a treatment regimen sometimes relapse by not abstaining from alcohol or substance abuse or by failing to comply fully with all requirements imposed by a treatment program and may use graduated and appropriate responses or sanctions designed to address inappropriate behaviors. See CPL Article 216.

QUESTIONS:

5. Under this backdrop, the inquirer raises several questions:

a. May a defense attorney ethically counsel the client regarding the client's drug addiction? In particular, may the defense attorney suggest that the client enter a drug rehabilitation program, even if such participation is not required to resolve the client's criminal case?

b. May defense counsel advise a client to request a substance abuse evaluation and enter a rehabilitation program in connection with a court-sponsored diversion program, even if there are negative consequences if the client is not successfully discharged?

c. May a defense attorney permit a client to sign a release authorizing a court-supervised program to receive information regarding the client's performance in treatment?

OPINION:

Rendering advice on non-legal matters, such as drug addiction

6. The initial question is addressed by Rule 2.1 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"). Rule 2.1 ("Advisor") reads:

> In representing a client, a lawyer shall exercise independent professional judgment and render candid advice. In rendering advice, a lawyer may refer not only to law but to other considerations such as moral, economic, social, psychological, and political factors that may be relevant to the client's situation. [Emphasis added.]

7. The Comments to Rule 2.1 provide further guidance. Comment [2] to Rule 2.1 specifically states that "[it] is proper for a lawyer to refer to relevant moral and ethical considerations in giving advice."

8. Comment [5] to Rule 2.1 states: "In general, a lawyer is not expected to give advice until asked by the client. However, . . . it may be advisable under Rule 1.4 to inform the client of forms of dispute resolution that might constitute reasonable alternatives to litigation."

9. A lawyer is not required to give advice on medical or other non-legal matters. However, when rendering "candid advice" as required by Rule 2.1, the lawyer "may" refer to considerations beyond the law. Thus, a lawyer may discuss with the client the client's substance abuse/addiction and provide advice regarding the pros and cons of entering a treatment program. If the lawyer believes that continued substance abuse may lead to adverse legal consequences for the client, such as subsequent charges or arrest, the lawyer should discuss the consequences with the client. See Rule 2.1, Cmt. [5]; Rule 1.4. As advisor, the lawyer may point out the potential consequences of the client's actions or inaction related to the treatment of the underlying substance abuse, including recidivism and death.

10. This Committee has previously addressed the lawyer's role as advisor and has said that a lawyer's advice need not be confined to purely legal considerations. In N.Y. State 769 (2003), quoting EC 7-8, the Committee said:

> A lawyer should exert best efforts to ensure that decisions of the client are made only after the client has been informed of relevant considerations. A lawyer ought to initiate this decision-making process if the client does not do so. Advice of a lawyer to the client need not be confined to purely legal considerations. A lawyer should advise the client of the possible effect of each legal alternative. A lawyer should bring to bear upon this decision-making process the fullness of his or her experience as well as the lawyer's objective viewpoint.

11. N.Y. City 2011-2 (2011) also discussed the lawyer's role as advisor, saying: "In providing candid advice, a lawyer should advise the client to consider the costs and benefits [of a course of action], as well as possible alternatives." Opinion 2011-2 added that "lawyers must be cognizant of the various ethical issues . . . and should advise clients accordingly. The issues may include the compromise of confidentiality and waiver of attorney-client privilege, and the potential impact on a lawyer's exercise of independent judgment."

12. In sum, the inquirer ethically may counsel the client regarding the client's drug addiction, including recommending that the client enter a drug rehabilitation program.

The Duty to Advise the Client About Diversion Programs

13. If the client has been charged with a drug-related crime and is eligible for a court-sponsored diversion program, then the lawyer must advise the client about the pros and cons of entering such a program. See Rule 1.4(a)(2) ("A lawyer shall . . . reasonably consult with the client about the means by which the client's objectives are to be accomplished."); Rule 1.4(b) ("A lawyer shall explain a matter to the extent reasonably necessary to permit the client to make informed decisions regarding the representation").

14. This mandated consultation requires that the lawyer be familiar with the procedures of the diversion program or drug court, the sanctions that may apply for failure to complete the program, as well as the options and alternatives available to the client, so that the lawyer can explain to the client the options, alternatives, and possible consequences. See Rule 1.1(a) ("[t]he lawyer should provide the client with competent representation," which "requires the legal knowledge, skill, thoroughness and preparation reasonably necessary for the representation"; see also Rule 1.1, Cmt. [5] ("Competent handling of a particular matter includes inquiry into and analysis of the factual and legal elements of the problem"); Cf. Padilla v. Kentucky, 559 U.S. 356 (2010) (lawyer advising a non-U.S. citizen whether to plead guilty to a felony must advise that felony conviction would make client subject to deportation).

15. The objective of most individuals charged with a drug offense may be to avoid a criminal conviction or to minimize or avoid incarceration or other penalties. A diversion program may achieve those objectives. However, one risk of a diversion program (which may include progressive sanctions or incarceration) is that sanctions for violating the terms of the program may be more severe than the penalty offered by the prosecutor for conviction without participation in a diversion program. Thus, entering into a diversion program may conflict with the client's stated objective of minimizing penalties. The attorney must therefore advise the client of the nature of the drug court or diversion program, the consequences of abiding or failing to abide by the rules, and how participation in a diversion program will affect the client's interests. In addition, the lawyer should provide information and advice on alternative courses of action, including legal and treatment alternatives available outside of the drug court program, the opportunity to plea bargain, and the right to go to trial. The lawyer should then discuss these options with the client.

16. The inquirer asks if it is ethical to recommend a diversion program that would include the imposition of sanctions against the lawyer's client. If the lawyer believes there is a reasonable possibility that the client will succeed in the rehabilitation program, the lawyer may not only explain but may actually recommend a rehabilitation program even though the program could result in the imposition of harsh sanctions against the client if the client fails in the program.

Determining Client's Best Interest

17. The ultimate decision whether to enter a program with sanctions, to which the client will be subject if the client violates the terms of the program, rests with the client. Rule 1.2(a) states:

> (a) Subject to the provisions herein, a lawyer shall abide by a client's decisions concerning the objectives of representation and, as required by Rule 1.4, shall consult with the client as to the means by which they are pursued. A lawyer shall abide by a client's decision whether to settle a matter. In a criminal case, the lawyer shall abide by the client's decision, after consultation with the lawyer, as to a plea to be entered, whether to waive jury trial and whether the client will testify.

18. Comment [1] to Rule 1.2 states: "Paragraph (a) confers upon the client the ultimate authority to determine the purpose to be served by legal representation, within the limits imposed by law and the lawyer's professional obligations." Once the lawyer presents the relevant considerations and alternatives pursuant to Rule 1.4 and the client makes a decision as to the desired course of action, Rule 1.2 compels the lawyer to pursue the client's stated objective.

19. As this Committee stated in N.Y. State 1037 (2014), "Rule 1.2(a) requires a lawyer to abide by a client's decisions concerning the 'objectives' of a representation, and to consult with the client as to the 'means' by which those objectives are to be pursued. Rule 1.4(a)(2) reinforces that provision by providing that a lawyer shall reasonably consult with the client about the means by which the client's objectives are to be accomplished." Thus, the lawyer must sufficiently explain a matter to a client so that the client can make informed decisions.

20. Where the sanctions for failing the rehabilitation program may be more severe than the criminal penalties offered to the client for pleading guilty to a drug charge, the client may prefer a criminal penalty rather than being monitored for upwards of a year in a drug treatment program. Even if the lawyer believes it would be in the 'best interests of the client' to obtain treatment for addiction, the decision is not the lawyer's to make. Under Rule 1.2(a), a lawyer must abide by the client's decision concerning the objectives of representation, and, in a criminal case, must abide by the client's decision (after consultation with the lawyer) as to the "plea to be entered, whether to waive jury trial and whether the client will testify." Once the client makes his or her choice, whether it be to attend a treatment program or to go through the traditional criminal justice system, the lawyer must abide by that decision.

Confidentiality

21. Typically, as a condition of entry into a diversion program, the client is required to consent to the release of health and treatment information to the judge, attorneys and other personnel of the court.[27] This treatment and monitoring information raises confidentiality concerns.

22. Rule 1.6 generally bars a lawyer from knowingly revealing "confidential information" unless the client gives "informed consent." See Rule 1.6(a)(1). The Rule defines "confidential information" as "information gained during or relating to the representation of a client, whatever its source, that is (a) protected by the attorney-client privilege, (b) likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed, or information that the client has requested be kept confidential." The client's treatment

27 Whether the contract or release signed by the client complies with the Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act of 1997 ("HIPAA"), which prohibits release of health information by certain agencies, and whether the contract or release complies with 42 CFR Part 2, which prohibits the release of alcohol or drug use information, is a matter outside the jurisdiction of this committee – but pursuant to Rule 1.4, a lawyer advising a client about a drug rehabilitation program, whether in response to criminal charges or otherwise, should counsel the client about the client's rights under those laws.

information would be "confidential information," as it is likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed. Although it would not be the lawyer who discloses it, by recommending that the client agree to be diverted to a drug program, the lawyer is in effect asking the client's consent to the disclosure of confidential information. Thus, the defense lawyer must counsel the client on how those disclosures could undermine the attorney client privilege or otherwise be detrimental to the client, and must ensure that the client has enough information to give informed consent before executing confidentiality waiver forms.[28]

23. The lawyer, where possible, should also seek to limit the scope of the release, such as specifying the persons to whom information will be provided, the uses to which such disclosures may be put, the nature of the information that will be disclosed and the time period in which disclosures may be made. See also N.Y. State 1059 (2015) (lawyers for clients in immigration proceedings may disclose the names and certain procedural information regarding the clients' cases where the clients give voluntary, informed consent to the disclosure). Whether the lawyer should recommend the client to sign a release for the court/attorneys to receive the client's treatment information depends on the client's stated objectives.

Other Considerations

24. Finally, whether, the plea agreement signed by the client as a condition for diversion may be used as evidence against the client in future criminal or civil proceedings is an evidentiary question that is beyond the jurisdiction of this committee.

CONCLUSION:

25. An attorney may render advice that includes considerations such as the benefits and risks of entering a drug treatment program. The attorney must act competently and must adequately explain to the client the material risks of the proposed course of conduct and reasonably available alternatives. However, once the client decides to take a certain course of action, the attorney must follow the directives of the client even if the client's directive conflicts with what the lawyer believes to be in the best interest of the client. If the client is eligible for a diversion program, the attorney must be mindful of confidentiality concerns since treatment records may be provided to judges, prosecutors and program staff. The attorney must provide the client with full disclosure and obtain informed consent before requesting the client to execute any release authorizing disclosure of confidential information to the judge or prosecutors.

Boldt, Rehabilitative Punishment and the Drug Treatment Court Movement, 76 WASH U.L.Q. 1205, 1289-1290 (1998) ("[I]f the choice to enter treatment is to be genuine, defendants must be helped to understand the potential costs and benefits involved, including the potentially harmful consequences that can result from the disclosure to judges or prosecutors of personal and sometimes incriminating information gained in the course of substance abuse treatment. Defendants must be informed of the considerable benefits in terms of confidentiality to which defendants are entitled if they enter treatment on their own without mandate from the criminal justice system. In other words, a genuine choice with respect to the waiver of confidentiality requires that defendants be informed of the unusually generous privacy protections already in place, which their consent will extinguish.")

TOPIC: Law firm name; use of "legal services" in firm name.

DIGEST: A law firm that is not a qualified legal assistance organization may not use the name "Jane Doe Legal Services, PLLC" without violating Rule 7.5(b), which prohibits law firms from using certain names that are associated with legal assistance organizations.

RULES: Rule 7.5(b)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer, a lawyer we will call "Jane Doe", is an attorney who is forming a new law firm and wants to know if she can use her name in the title together with the phrase "Legal Services, PLLC."

QUESTION:

2. May a private law firm use the name "Jane Doe Legal Services, PLLC?"

OPINION:

3. Rule 7.5(b) contains prohibitions relating to the naming of law firms engaged in private practice. Relevant to the current inquiry, the rule states that "[s]uch terms as 'legal clinic', 'legal aid', 'legal service office', 'legal assistance office', 'defender office' and the like may be used only by qualified legal assistance organizations, except that the term 'legal clinic' may be used by any lawyer or law firm provided the name of a participating lawyer or firm is incorporated therein." [emphasis added] The question then is whether the title "legal services" is "like" the terms "legal aid," "legal service office," "legal assistance office," or "defender office."

4. The title "legal services" is almost identical to the title "legal service office." Cf. N.Y. State 869 (2011) (use of the title "Smith Law Firm" does not violate Rule 7.5); N.Y. State 732 (2000) (use of the title "The [Attorney Name] Group" does not violate Rule 7.5). In addition to this facial similarity, the term "legal services," like the other terms on the list, is often used by qualified legal assistance organizations (e.g., "Bronx Legal Services", "Legal Services of Central New York", "Prisoner's Legal Services of New York", "MFY Legal Services", "Neighborhood Legal Services"). Thus, the use of the term "legal services" in a title is likely to cause the public to believe that the law firm at issue is a legal assistance organization. Preventing this type of misunderstanding by the public is the very purpose of Rule 7.5(b).

5. That the term "legal services" is joined with the name of one of the lawyers in the firm does not save the title. Notably, Rule 7.5(b) allows one term – "legal clinic" – to be used by private law firms when it is joined with the name of one of the lawyers in the firm, but this safe harbor does not apply to any of the other terms. Thus, any term that is "like" the other terms cannot take advantage of the legal clinic safe harbor. Moreover, since legal assistance organizations sometimes use one of the terms on the Rule 7.5(b) list together with the name of an individual as their title – either in memoriam or to recognize a sponsoring donor (e.g., "Hiscock Legal Aid Society", "Jerome N. Frank Legal Services Organization", "WilmerHale Legal Services Center"), the risk of confusion remains.[29]

6. Although Rule 7.5(b) prohibits the use of "legal services" in the name of a law firm, the provision of legal services is, of course, central to what lawyers do. Consequently, nothing in this opinion is meant to prohibit a lawyer from indicating, other than as part of the name of a firm, that the lawyer renders legal services.

CONCLUSION:

7. A law firm that is not a qualified legal assistance organization may not use the name "Jane Doe Legal Services, PLLC" without violating Rule 7.5(b), which prohibits law firms from using certain names that are associated with legal assistance organizations.

29 We recognize that restrictions on a law firm's use of a trade name may raise constitutional issues. Compare Friedman v. Rogers, 440 U.S. 1 (1979) (upholding a Texas law prohibiting optometry trade names), with Alexander v. Cahill, 598 F.3d 79, 95 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 131 S. Ct. 820 (2010) (distinguishing Friedman on its facts but also noting doubt as to Friedman's continued validity). As of now, however, the courts have not struck down Rule 7.5(b). Nor was that provision challenged in Alexander v. Cahill. If the constitutionality of the prohibition on the use of trade names by private lawyers is someday litigated, one of the issues may be the potential for deception that we have mentioned above. Ultimately the courts may or may not see that potential as sufficient to justify the restriction, but the constitutionality of the prohibition on trade names is a question of law beyond our Committee's jurisdiction.

TOPIC: Financing legal fees in litigation, third-party funding

DIGEST: A lawyer representing clients in criminal defense matters may refer potential clients to third-party financing for the lawyer's legal fees and expenses, even though the lawyer pays certain fees to the lender in connection with that financing program and is informed by the lender whether the client has qualified for a loan and in what amount, as long as the lawyer obtains informed consent from the client and otherwise complies with Rule 1.8(f), and as long as the fees the lawyer pays to the lender do not constitute financial assistance to the client. If the lawyer is not advising on the risks and benefits of procuring such financing, the lawyer should so inform clients.

RULES: 1.2(c), 1.4(b), 1.8(e) & (f)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a sole practitioner exclusively engaged in criminal defense work. Some potential clients ask for payment plans to pay the inquirer's legal fees and expenses. The inquirer would like to refer such clients to a particular third-party financing company.

2. The inquirer would either give potential clients a link to the financing company or post the link on his website, which would lead clients to the financing company's loan application forms. The inquirer might also put a banner on the website indicating that potential clients can finance the fees for legal representation. If a client completes the application, the financing company would decide whether to lend the client money and on what terms. The loan funds would be disbursed directly to the client, but the inquirer would be provided with a "portal" on which to find out whether a potential client had applied for a loan, and when and in what amount funds were disbursed to the client. The financing company's website advertises maximum lines of credit of varying lengths in amounts ranging from $10,000 to $25,000, with interest rates ranging from 10.9% to 29.99%, depending on the borrower's credit score. The loans would be based on the creditworthiness of the client (and any co-signer) and would not be non-recourse (i.e., the client would be responsible to repay the loan whether or not the client prevailed in the case).

3. In order to participate in these programs, the inquirer would pay fees to the financing company of several hundred dollars either in the form of one-time "registration fees" or in the form of monthly "subscription fees."

QUESTION:

4. May a lawyer bring a third-party lender to the attention of potential clients by giving the link directly to clients or by posting the link on the lawyer's website, in order to assist potential clients in obtaining funding for legal fees and expenses?

OPINION:

5. This Committee has previously opined that a lawyer may refer clients to third-party sources to finance legal fees under certain conditions, including that (1) the confidentiality of client information provided to the lawyer is maintained, (2) the lawyer does not own an interest in the financing company, (3) the lawyer does not receive any referral fee (except under certain circumstances), and (4) the transaction is not illegal. N.Y. State 769 (2003); N.Y. State 666 (1994). See also N.Y. City 2011-2 (addressing issues raised by non-recourse litigation financing arrangements).[30]

6. The proposed financing arrangements here raise three particular issues that we discuss below.

Advice on financing alternatives and related conflicts of interest

7. The first issue is the extent to which the inquirer should or must advise the client on the costs and benefits of the financing arrangements and the alternatives. In N.Y. State 769, which dealt with non-recourse litigation financing in which a financing company takes an interest in the proceeds of litigation, we noted that a lawyer facilitating such a transaction should ensure that the client is informed of relevant considerations. N.Y. City 2011-2 cautioned that the lawyer may have a personal conflict of interest in rendering such advice where, for example, "the client cannot afford to commence or continue litigation absent a third party advance of the lawyer's fees," because of the lawyer's personal interest in being paid.

8. This situation is different, and these concerns are considerably diminished, because these are not non-recourse loans. In non-recourse litigation financing, the financing company generally needs to know a great deal about the litigation in order to determine whether to take the lending risk, and the involvement of the financing company with the litigation raises significant legal questions on which clients generally need advice. By contrast, the financing at issue here is a relatively straightforward lending transaction based on ordinary commercial terms. Further, the lawyer's involvement here is less than in the typical case of non-recourse litigation financing.

9. Nonetheless, the lawyer does owe the client a certain level of disclosure. Rule 1.8(f) says:

> A lawyer shall not accept compensation for representing a client, or anything of value related to the lawyer's representation of the client, from one other than the client unless:
> (1) the client gives informed consent;

30 As in those opinions, we express no opinion as to whether the proposed financing here would be a violation of usury or other laws. If the lawyer knows that the financing arrangements are illegal, the lawyer must not facilitate them. See N.Y. Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") Rule 1.2(d) (a lawyer shall not "assist a client, in conduct that the lawyer knows is illegal"); N.Y. City 2011-2; N.Y. State 769 (2003). Under New York law, charging interest rates of more than 16% per year on loans to an individual of less than $250,000 constitutes civil usury. N.Y. Gen. Oblig. L. § 5-501(1), (6); N.Y. Banking L. § 14-a. Charging interest or taking any money or other property as interest on a loan of any money, at a rate exceeding 25% per year is a criminal offense. N.Y. Penal L. § 190.40. Some lenders take a position that a non-recourse extension of credit is not a loan. See Odell v. Legal Bucks, LLC, 665 S.E.2d 767, 777 (N.C. Ct. App. 2008 ("[A] transaction in which the borrower's repayment of the principal is subject to a contingency is not considered a loan because the terms of the transaction do not necessarily require that the borrower repay the sum lent"); Plaintiff Funding Corporation d/b/a LawCash v. Echeverria, No. 1014040/2005 (N.Y. Sup. Ct. 2005) (declaratory judgment that contract was valid and not covered by New York's usury statutes). It is our understanding that the loans at issue here are based on the creditworthiness of the client and are not non-recourse. Although any illegality might be on the part of the lender and not the client, the lawyer's providing of the information about the lender might be viewed as a recommendation of the transaction and the lawyer's payment of registration or subscription fees might be viewed as participation in the loan transaction.

> (2) there is no interference with the lawyer's independent professional judgment or with the client-lawyer relationship; and

Here, while the money advanced is a loan, it is closely tied to the representation. For all practical purposes, the lawyer is accepting fees "from one other than the client" (the lender). Moreover, although the funds are not paid directly to the lawyer, the lender informs the lawyer when the funds are disbursed, presumably to help ensure that the lawyer gets paid. When the lender gives the lawyer information about disbursement, that information is something "of value" that triggers Rule 1.8(f). As part of obtaining the client's "informed consent" to the funding arrangement pursuant to Rule 1.8(f)(1), the lawyer should ordinarily ensure that the client understands the pros and cons of the funding arrangement and understands that the client may have alternatives to obtaining funds from this particular litigation funding company.

10. However, if a potential client might believe that the lawyer is exercising professional judgment in recommending a funding source appropriate for that particular client, or if the client might believe that lawyer has evaluated the loan terms, the lawyer should ensure that the client understands the limited role the lawyer is playing. As provided in Rule 1.2(c): "A lawyer may limit the scope of the representation if the limitation is reasonable under the circumstances [and] the client gives informed consent. . . ." Rule 1.2(c) is consistent with N.Y. State 769, where we said that a lawyer may limit the scope of the engagement to exclude advice with respect to litigation financing. We stated:

> The lawyer should consider that an unsophisticated client may reasonably assume that by facilitating the [non-recourse litigation financing] transaction, the lawyer is also endorsing the entering into of the proposed transaction and/or the terms thereof. To address this possibility, the lawyer must either disclaim such responsibility, see N.Y. City 2001-3 ("[T]he scope of a lawyer's representation of a client may be limited in order to avoid a conflict"), or advise the client of the costs and benefits of the proposed transaction, as well as possible alternative courses of action.

Similarly here, the inquirer may limit the scope of the engagement to exclude advising on financing options. For example, the lawyer could state on the website near the link to the financing company's application page, and in the initial discussion with the client about financing, that the lawyer has not evaluated the loan terms and is not recommending the loan or advising clients on whether the loan is appropriate for any particular client.

Disclosure to lawyer of loan status

11. The second issue we address is raised by the proposal for the funding company to give the lawyer access to a portal to inform the lawyer whether a potential client has applied for and whether and in what amount the funding company has extended a loan. This portal presumably is important to the lawyer because the lawyer's purpose in referring the client to the financing source is to provide a source of funds for the lawyer to be paid, so the lawyer needs to know whether the funds are available. This provision does not concern the lawyer's disclosure to a third party of client confidential information, so it does not implicate Rule 1.6 or other Rules regulating confidentiality. Nevertheless, a client's financial and banking affairs usually are protected by privacy laws. Because a potential client might believe that dealings with the third-party financing company will be kept confidential, the lawyer should inform the client that the finance company will give the lawyer access to information about the status of the loan application and timing and amount of the loan. See Rule 1.4(b) ("A lawyer shall explain a matter to the extent reasonably necessary to permit the client to make informed decisions regarding the representation").

Fee payments by lawyer

12. The lawyer's payment of "registration fees" or "subscription fees" raises questions under Rule 1.8(e), which prohibits advancing or guaranteeing financial assistance to clients in litigation matters, with certain exceptions. That Rule provides:

> While representing a client in connection with contemplated or pending litigation, a lawyer shall not advance or guarantee financial assistance to the client, except that:
> (1) a lawyer may advance court costs and expenses of litigation, the repayment of which may be contingent on the outcome of the matter;
> (2) a lawyer representing an indigent or pro bono client may pay court costs and expenses of litigation on behalf of the client; and
> (3) a lawyer, in an action in which an attorney's fee is payable in whole or in part as a percentage of the recovery in the action, may pay on the lawyer's own account court costs and expenses of litigation. In such case, the fee paid to the lawyer from the proceeds of the action may include an amount equal to such costs and expenses incurred.

In this case, none of the exceptions applies. Paying registration or subscription fees does not involve contingent fees or advancing of costs and expenses of litigation that are repayable only upon success, so Rule 1.8(e)(1) and (3) do not apply. See generally Rule 1.5(d) (barring contingent fees in criminal defense matters). The inquirer advises that the clients who inquire about payment plans do not qualify to be represented by a public defender, so we assume that they are not "indigent" within the meaning of Rule 1.8(e)(2).

13. Whether the registration or subscription fees constitute "financial assistance" to the client depends on the purpose of the registration or subscription fees. If these fees compensate the financing company for the risk of lending to the attorney's potential clients, the lawyer's payment of the fees would appear to be financial assistance to the clients: the fees may be seen as in the nature of "points" that mortgage companies charge or as a way for the finance company to charge extra interest. On the other hand, if the purpose of the fees is to pay for the "portal" by which the lawyer can track the financing status of potential clients, that is something in which the client has no particular interest, and the financing company's fees would not be financial assistance to clients. We do not have sufficient facts to resolve this factual question definitively, so we opine only that if the fees do constitute financial assistance to clients in obtaining financing, the lawyer is barred from participating in the programs unless the lender waives the fees or the client pays the fees.

CONCLUSION:

14. A lawyer may bring a third-party financing program to the attention of clients to assist them in funding the lawyer's legal fees and expenses, as long as the fees the lawyer pays to the lender do not constitute financial assistance to the client and the lawyer complies with the other conditions set forth herein.

OPINION 1109 (11/15/2016)

TOPIC: Use of Pre-Paid Debit Cards to Transmit Funds to Clients

DIGEST: A lawyer may use a fully-loaded pre-paid debit card to pay a client funds to which the client is entitled, provided that the lawyer, upon adequate disclosure of the relative merits of the payment method, follows the client's instructions.

RULES: 1.15(c)(4), 1.15(e), 1.4(a), 1.4(b), 1.0(j).

FACTS:

1. The inquirer represents clients in personal injury actions under contingency fee arrangements. The amounts in controversy in many of the lawyer's matters tend to be small, as are the amounts obtained in those cases in which the lawyer achieves a settlement. The majority of the lawyer's clientele consists of unsophisticated consumers of legal and financial services lacking in both economic wherewithal and any sustained relationship with a financial institution such as a banking or checking account. As a result, the inquirer explains, the clients resort to check-cashing service companies, which, for a fee, will redeem the check and pay the client-customer.

2. The inquirer would like to offer clients the choice between receiving the client's settlement (or judgment) proceeds by a pre-paid debit card rather than by check. If the client opts for the card, then the client would receive a card fully loaded with the total amount owed the client. The firm would charge no fee for this option, nor retain any amount due the client. The law firm would remit the entire amount due the client to the account of the card-issuing entity.

QUESTION:

3. May a lawyer give a client the option of receiving payment of money due the client by a fully-loaded pre-paid debit card rather than by check?

OPINION:

4. Judgment and settlement checks often are made out to the lawyer and the client. In many cases, the lawyer deposits the check in an attorney trust account, withdraws the amount to which the lawyer is entitled and issues a check in favor of the client in the amount to which the client is entitled. The client then must cash the check to gain access to the funds. Clients who do not have a banking relationship often use a check-cashing service. They may then maintain funds on a pre-paid debit card.

5. A study by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation (FDIC) found that approximately 28% of U.S. households either do not have bank accounts or are underbanked. FDIC, 2013 National Survey of Unbanked and Underbanked Households (Oct. 2014). Although in the past, the demographic of these households tended to be economically challenged, the increasing popularity of technological options has attracted many younger adherents to supplant conventional cash for other forms of currency. See K. S. Rogoff, The Curse of Cash (Princeton U. Press 2016). We make these observations not to endorse any trend but to recognize its existence.

Alternative Financial Services

6. A very brief and general description of the alternatives may be useful to place the inquiry in context.

7. The New York Department of Financial Services ("DFS") describes cash-checking as a "business that charges consumers a fee for cashing a check, draft or money order." In New York, the providers of these services must be registered and are subject to assorted regulations. NY Banking L §367 (2012). The DFS has regulations on the amounts that may be charged. See 3 NYCRR §400.11. As of March 2016, the maximum check cashing fee that may be charged to an individual is 2.01% of the face amount of the check.

8. According to the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau ("CFPB"), a pre-paid debit card is a card used to access money a consumer has loaded onto the card in advance. Most cards allow the consumer to spend money on the card at merchants that accept the card or to withdraw cash from an ATM. See CFPB website, at http://www.consumerfinance.gov/askcfpb/search/?selected_facets=category_exact:prepaid-cards. Each card has its own set of rules and fees. It often is difficult to ascertain the terms of the cards before purchase. Some issuers offer no-fee cards; many charge fees that may be opaque to the consumer, especially those unsophisticated in their use. Fees include some or all of the following: monthly usage or transaction fees, reload fees, bill payment fees, ATM withdrawal fees, balance inquiry fees and inactivity fees. Even where the issuer provides for free ATM withdrawals at certain ATMs, these may not be the locations most convenient to the holder.

9. Pre-paid cards may be issued by firms that are not financial institutions. Although the DFS licenses non-bank issuers of prepaid debit cards, many widely used debit cards are issued by banks that are not New York State-chartered and therefore are not regulated by the DFS. Although the CFPB recently finalized regulations that will provide added protections to consumers of prepaid debit cards, those regulations will not become effective until October 1, 2017. http://www.consumerfinance.gov/policy-compliance/rulemaking/final-rules/prepaid-accounts-under-electronic-fund-transfer-act-regulation-e-and-truth-lending-act-regulation-z/. At present, these cards offer consumers fewer safeguards than bank-issued debit cards linked to a checking account.

The Rules of Professional Conduct

10. The issue, then, is simple: Is there anything wrong with a lawyer using a fully-loaded pre-paid debit card to disburse client funds to a client if the client gives informed consent?

11. We do not think so. Rule 1.15(c)(4) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") says that a lawyer must "promptly pay or deliver to the client or a third person as requested by the client or third person the funds, securities, or other properties in the possession of the lawyer that the client or third person is entitled to receive." The inquiry here does not implicate any issues about third parties, client entitlement, or other questions that Rule 1.15(c)(4) may occasionally raise. The lawyer is holding money that unquestionably belongs to the client, and the sole issue, one of first impression, is whether the lawyer may transfer those funds to the client with a fully-loaded pre-paid debit card rather than a check.

12. We believe that Rule 1.15(c)(4)'s direction that the lawyer pay funds due the client "as requested by the client" obligates the lawyer to seek the client's consent before using a pre-paid debit card to do so, as the inquirer intends to do. We believe, too, that Rules 1.4(a)(1)(i) & 1.4 (a)(2), and Rule 1.4(b) – each concerned with communicating with the client about matters material to the representation which require the client's informed consent as defined in Rule 1.0(j), including matters relating to settlement – obligate the lawyer to explain to the client, in the words of Rule 1.0(j), "the material risks of the proposed course of action and reasonably available alternatives." This means, at a minimum, that the lawyer should be prepared to explain to the client the options available for payment, and the relative risks and rewards of each, including the charges associated with each option. If the client is thus informed, we see nothing in the Rules that would prohibit a lawyer from remitting settlement funds to a client by means of a fully-loaded pre-paid debit card.

13. We note that Rule 1.15(e) says that all "special account withdrawals shall be made only to a named payee and not to cash. Such withdrawals shall be made by check or, with the prior written approval of the party, by bank transfer." Thus the lawyer is obligated to assure that the card issuer will accept transfers by one of these means, and, if a wire transfer is used, then the client must approve of the transfer in writing.

14. We also are aware that some issuers of prepaid debit cards may compensate persons who assist in the issuance of cards. See J. Silver-Greenberg and S. Clifford, "Paid via Card, Workers Feel Sting of Fees," N.Y. Times (July 1, 2013) at p. A1. If the lawyer were being compensated by the card issuer for steering customers, the lawyer would have a personal conflict of interest within the meaning of Rule 1.7(a). See N.Y. State 1086 (2016) (an attorney may not accept a fee or commission from an investment firm for referring the client to such firm where the money to be invested arises from an engagement in which the lawyer represented the client because the fee creates a non-consentable conflict.)

CONCLUSION:

15. A New York lawyer may use a fully-loaded pre-paid debit card to pay a client funds to which the client is entitled, provided that the lawyer, upon disclosure of the relative merits of the payment method, follows the client's instructions.

TOPIC: Advertising; solicitation; educating lay persons

DIGEST: Lawyer may (i) organize and participate in online webinars and live seminars for non-lawyers on topics within lawyer's fields of competence, (ii) publicize the same by individual invitation, social media or other lawful means, and, (iii) following a webinar/seminar, discuss representation with participants, all subject to compliance with applicable rules on advertising and solicitation.

FACTS:

1. The inquirer, an intellectual property lawyer practicing in New York, plans to conduct online webinars and live seminars on topics within his principal fields of practice for persons who may have a business interest in those topics and a need for legal services. Inquirer contemplates identifying persons fitting that description by use of commercially available business listings, including such listings on government agency web sites, such as business entity lists. Admission to the webinars and seminars may be free or may be for a fee.

QUESTIONS:

2. The inquirer asks a number of questions:

   A. May the lawyer attract possible attendees to seminars and webinars by sending invitations to addresses found on commercially available business entity lists?

   B. May the lawyer advertise the seminars on social media using social media-provided filters to target a specific audience?

   C. Does it matter whether the lawyer charges a fee for the seminars and webinars?

   D. May the lawyer solicit prospective clients to register for the seminars?

   E. May the lawyer notify webinar/seminar participants of future webinars/seminars?

   F. May the lawyer solicit webinar/seminar participants for legal representation after the program ends?

OPINION:

Sponsoring Seminars for Non-lawyers

3. This Committee has explained that, under both the current Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") and the former Code of Professional Responsibility (the "Code"), lawyers may participate in legal seminars designed for non-lawyers. See N.Y. State 918 (2012), citing N.Y. State 830 (2009) (under the Rules) and N.Y. State 508 (1979) (under the Code). We noted in N.Y. State 918 that "participation in such programs is not only permitted but encouraged." Id. See Rule 7.1, Cmt. [9]. Under the Rules, there is no difference in this regard between seminars conducted in person and those conducted over a website. Consequently, in this opinion, we will refer generically to "seminars" to include both live programs and web-based programs.

4. Before the Supreme Court's holding in Bates v. State Bar of Arizona, 433 U.S. 350 (1977), which extended First Amendment protection to lawyer advertising, the Code prohibited lawyers and law firms from organizing legal seminars for nonlawyers. Rather, sponsorship was allowed only by a "bar association, school or other responsible public or private organization." N.Y. State 508, supra. The post-Bates amendments to the Code removed restrictions on lawyer sponsorship of such seminars and programs. Id.

5. If such seminars were to be available and useful to significant numbers of people, lawyers needed to publicize them. Therefore, we held that a lawyer may ethically mail notices of such seminars. See N.Y. State 508 (1979) (absent a judicial holding that mailing of advertisements violates §479 of the Judiciary Law, law firm may organize and promote by mail a legal seminar designed for non-lawyers).

Publicizing the Seminars – Does the Seminar or the Publicity for the Seminar Constitute Advertising?

6. The inquirer's questions regarding the means a lawyer may use to publicize proposed seminars involve more than just the mail. Under the Rules, the answers to the inquirer's questions depend on whether the seminar itself (or the advertising for the seminar) would constitute "advertising" within the meaning of Rule 1.0(a) that is subject to Rule 7.1 or "solicitation" within the meaning of Rule 7.3(b) that is subject to Rule 7.3. If the seminar (or the publicity for the seminar) does not constitute advertising, then the provisions of Rule 7.1 will not apply (and, since solicitation is a subset of advertising, neither will the prohibitions of Rule 7.3). If the seminars (or the publicity for the seminars) do constitute advertising, the inquirer must adhere to Rule 7.1. If the seminar constitutes solicitation, then the provisions of Rule 7.3 will apply, and if it also involves in-person or telephone contact or interactive computer-accessed communication, then the seminar will be prohibited unless it is advertised only to current and former clients and close friends or relatives of the inquirer.

7. We begin with what constitutes advertising and what constitutes solicitation under the Rules. Rule 1.0(a) defines an "advertisement" as follows:

> "Advertisement" means any public or private communication made by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm about that lawyer or law firm's services, the primary purpose of which is for the retention of the lawyer or law firm. It does not include communications to existing clients or other lawyers. [Emphasis added.]

8. A solicitation is a particular kind of advertisement defined in Rule 7.3(b) as follows:

> (b) For purposes of this Rule, "solicitation" means any advertisement initiated by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm that is directed to, or targeted at, a specific recipient or group of recipients, or their family members or legal representatives, the primary purpose of which is the retention of the lawyer or law firm, and a significant motive for > which is pecuniary gain. It does not include a proposal or other writing prepared and delivered in response to a specific request of a prospective client. [Emphasis added.]

Significantly, under this definition, what differentiates a solicitation from a garden variety advertisement is that a solicitation is "directed to, or targeted at, a specific recipient or group of recipients." Furthermore, if a communication is not an advertisement, it is not a solicitation. Thus the first issue to resolve here is whether the inquirer's proposed publicity constitutes advertising subject to Rule 7.1.

9. In order to answer the questions posed, we must address whether the proposed seminars constitute advertising. In N.Y. State 848 (2010), which considered whether an educational newsletter constituted advertising, we weighed three factors: (1) the intent of the communication, i.e., whether it is primarily educational or whether instead a substantial or significant purpose is to secure the retention of the lawyer or law firm publishing the newsletter; (2) the content of the communication; and (3) the targeted audience of the communication.

10. Scholars have suggested that, in determining the primary purpose of publicity, courts are likely to interpret the "primary purpose" to mean "substantial" or "significant." Roy Simon & Nicole Hyland, SIMON'S NEW YORK RULES OF PROFESSIONAL CONDUCT ANNOTATED 23 (Thompson Reuters 2016 ed). The determination of the "primary purpose" of publicity is subjective and judged in light of all the circumstances. See N.Y. State 1009 (2014), citing N.Y. State 873 (2011); see also N.Y. City 2015-7 (2015) ("We conclude that the 'primary purpose' standard refers to the subjective intent of the lawyer who makes the communication, but that this intent may be inferred – at least in certain instances – from other factors, including the content of the communication and the audience for the communication.").

11. To determine whether retention of the lawyer is the primary purpose of a communication, we must consider what other purpose the lawyer might have. The comments to Rule 7.1 address the application of the primary-purpose test to educational programs:

> A lawyer's participation in an educational program is ordinarily not considered to be advertising because its primary purpose is to educate and inform rather than to attract clients. Such a program might be considered advertising if, in addition to its educational component, participants or recipients are expressly encouraged to hire the lawyer or law firm. Rule 7.1, Cmt. [9].

12. In N.Y. State 918 (2012), we discussed the primary purpose test in the context of educational programs as follows:

> [I]f a program goes beyond education to discuss the lawyer's skills or reputation, or give other reasons to hire that lawyer, then the lawyer may need to comply with the rules on advertising. But absent the inclusion of some such hiring pitch, a legal seminar will generally not be considered advertising as long as it is a bona fide educational program. N.Y. State 918, ¶5.

On the other hand, in N.Y. State 848 ¶9 we said, "Contact or biographical information about the lawyers or the law firm . . . does not, without more, transform an otherwise educational communication into advertising." See Rule 7.1, Cmt. [8]; cf., Rule 7.1, Cmt. [10]. The same reasoning would apply to publicity about a legal seminar or webinar.

13. The second factor considered in N.Y. State 848 is the "content" of the communication. The Committee pointed to Comment [7] to Rule 7.1, to the effect that newsletters or blogs focused on current developments in the law generally are not considered advertising, but that one that discusses developments in the law primarily as a vector for delivering information about the lawyer or law firm's personnel, clients, skills and achievements "would be considered advertising."

14. The third factor considered in N.Y. State 848 is the "audience." Communications that might otherwise be considered advertising subject to Rule 7.1 are excluded from the ambit of that Rule if directed to a close friend, a relative, an existing or former client, or a lawyer.

15. Assuming that the seminar and the communications used to publicize the seminar do not go beyond education to discuss the lawyer's skills or reputation, or give other reasons to hire the inquirer, we believe they would not constitute advertising, and, therefore, would not involve solicitation. In that case, the inquirer could use any of the methods proposed in questions to publicize the seminar.

16. The remainder of this Opinion, however, assumes that the seminar and the publicity for the seminar is not so limited, but that a substantial or significant purpose of the seminar or the publicity for the seminar is to encourage prospective participants to retain the inquirer. They therefore would constitute advertising.

Publicizing the Seminars for Non-Lawyers – Does the Seminar or the Publicity for the Seminar Constitute Solicitation?

17. If a communication constitutes an "advertisement" subject to the requirements set forth in Rule 7.1, the question then arises whether it also constitutes a "solicitation" subject to Rule 7.3.

18. As noted above, an advertisement constitutes "solicitation" under Rule 7.3(b) if it "is directed to, or targeted at, a specific recipient or group of recipients". Two Comments to Rule 7.3 – Comments [3] and [4] – provide gloss on the interpretation of the phrase "directed to, or targeted at, a specific recipient or group of recipients."

19. Comment [3] states that an advertisement may be considered to be "directed to, or targeted at, a specific recipient or group of recipients" in two different ways: (1) if it is made by in-person or telephone contact or by real-time or interactive computer-accessed communication, or (2) if it is addressed so that it will be delivered to the specific recipient or recipients, as in the case of letters, emails and express packages. The Comment points out that advertisements made by in-person or telephone contact or by real-time or interactive computer-accessed communication are prohibited unless the recipient is a close friend, relative, former client or current client. Advertisements not delivered by those means, but addressed so that they will be delivered to a specific recipient or recipients, may be sent to a broader group of recipients, but they are subject to additional rules, including a filing requirement, to make them more easily subject to disciplinary oversight and review.

20. Comment [4] makes clear that, unless an advertisement falls within Comment [3], if it appears in public media such as newspapers, television, billboards, web sites or the like is presumed not to be directed to or targeted at a specific recipient or group of recipients, simply because it is intended to attract potential clients with needs in a specified area of the law. For example, the Comment notes that an advertisement by a patent lawyer is not directed or targeted within the meaning of the definition solely because the magazine where it is placed is geared toward inventors.

21. With this background, we now turn to the inquirer's questions on the method of conducting and publicizing the seminars, assuming that the seminar and the materials used to publicize it are advertising.

Seminars and Webinars

22. A seminar is conducted in person. A webinar is usually conducted via real-time or interactive computer-accessed media. In each case, if the inquirer included a pitch for his own services, it would constitute solicitation that is in-person or using real-time or interactive computer-accessed media. See Rule 7.3(a); Comment [3] to Rule 7.3. For guidance on what constitutes real-time or interactive computer-accessed communication, see Rule 1.0(c); Simon and Hyland, supra at 1769-1770. Thus, Rule 7.3(a) would limit participants to close friends, relatives and former or existing clients of the inquirer.

23. If the webinar were not real-time or interactive, then the inquirer would not be limited in the invitees, but the seminar would be considered solicitation and subject to the filing and other requirements of Rule 7.3(c).

Invitations Addressed to Particular Persons

24. The inquirer proposes to send seminar invitations to prospective attendees whose contact information appears on government lists.[31] Simon and Hyland state:

> As a quick rule of thumb, letters and emails are always "directed to, or targeted at" specific recipients — they have an address on them. . . . Likewise, every advertisement delivered in-person to an individual known in advance, and every telephone call (live or recorded), is to a "specific recipient."

Simon and Hyland, supra at 1791. Thus, if the communications contain a "hiring pitch" or other advertising, they constitute solicitation and must comply with Rule 7.3.

Soliciting Prospective Participants by Other Means

25. The inquirer asks about "soliciting" prospective clients to register for the seminars, without defining "soliciting." As in the case of sending communications to prospective attendees on commercially available mailing lists, if the communication constitutes an advertisement, any form of solicitation must comply with Rule 7.3.

31 Questions of law are outside our jurisdiction, so we do not opine on whether using government agency or commercial business lists to develop a list of invitees may violate any federal or state law, e.g., with respect to privacy. Cf., Driver's Privacy Protection Act 18 U.S.C.A. §§2721-2725; Maracich v. Spears, 133 Sup. Ct. 2191 (2013).

Communications to Former Seminar Participants

26. The answer does not differ where the recipients are former seminar participants, whether the inquirer wishes (i) to send notices of future seminars that constitute advertising or (ii) to offer former participants legal representation on IP matters. Thus, the inquirer may not solicit in person or by real-time or interactive computer-accessed communications unless the recipient is a close friend, relative, former client or existing client – and the fact that a person participated in a webinar does not turn the participant into a client or close friend. And any solicitation not involving personal or real-time or interactive computer-access communications would have to comply with Rule 7.3.

Charging for Seminars

27. The inquirer asks if it makes a difference if the lawyer charges those who attend the seminars. There is nothing inherently unethical about charging for educational seminars. However, when a lawyer charges for seminars targeted at lay people, the lawyer should make clear that the seminar cannot give individualized legal advice. As expressed in Rule 7.1, Cmt. [9]:

> A lawyer who writes or speaks for the purpose of educating members of the public to recognize their legal problems should carefully refrain from giving or appearing to give a general solution applicable to all apparently similar individual problems, because slight changes in fact situations may require a material variance in the applicable advice; otherwise, the public may be misled and misadvised. Talks and writings by lawyers for nonlawyers should caution them not to attempt to solve individual problems on the basis of the information contained therein.

Otherwise, the attendees may believe that their payments entitle them to receive legal advice.

Communications Using Social Media with Target Filters

28. The inquirer asks whether it is ethically permissible "to advertise the webinars/seminars on social media, using social media provided filters to target a specific audience." In N.Y. State 1016 (2014), we discussed a lawyer's sending advertisements through internet message boards for specific groups, such as parenting groups, neighborhood specific groups and parents of children with special needs and concluded that advertisements sent through such message boards would not constitute solicitation. We assumed that such messages would not be individually addressed, but rather would be posted on the message board. We therefore concluded that the advertisements were akin to public media and would not be deemed to be directed to or targeted at a specific recipient. We also concluded that the internet message boards did not involve real time or interactive computer-accessed communications. Because the proposed advertisement was not directed to, or targeted at, a specific recipient or group of recipients, and was not sent using real time or interactive computer communications, we concluded it would not be a solicitation.

29. Here, the inquirer has not provided information on the nature of the social media that the inquirer would use in the proposed communications. Consequently, we cannot determine whether the advertisements would be individually addressed or sent using real time or interactive computer-accessed media.

CONCLUSION:

30. A lawyer may organize and participate in online webinars and live seminars for non-lawyers on topics within the lawyer's fields of competence, publicize the same by individual invitation, social media or other lawful means, and following a webinar or seminar discuss representation with webinar/seminar participants, all subject to compliance with applicable rules on advertising and solicitation as discussed in the body of this opinion.

TOPIC: Client representation; discrimination

DIGEST: A lawyer is under no obligation to accept every person who may wish to become a client unless the refusal to accept a representation amounts to unlawful discrimination.

RULES: 8.4(g)

FACTS:

1. A lawyer has been requested to represent a person desiring to bring a childhood sex abuse claim against a religious institution. The lawyer is of the same religion as the institution against which the claim is to be made. Because of this religious affiliation, the lawyer is unwilling to represent the claimant against the institution.

QUESTIONS:

2. Is a lawyer ethically required to accept every request for representation?

3. Does the refusal to accept a representation under the facts of this inquiry amount to illegal discrimination?

OPINION:

Lawyer's Freedom to Decide Which Clients to Represent

4. It has long been a principle of the practice of law that a "lawyer is under no obligation to act as advisor or advocate for every person who may wish to become a client . . ." EC 2-35 [formerly EC 2-26] of the former Code of Professional Responsibility (the "Code"). Although this language was not carried over to the current Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"), the principle remains sound. The principle that lawyers have discretion to determine whether to accept a client has been "espoused so repeatedly and over such a long period of time that it has virtually reached the level of dogma." Robert T. Begg, Revoking the Lawyer's License to Discriminate in New York, 7 Geo. J. Legal Ethics 280, 280-81 (1993). See also Restatement (Third), The Law Governing Lawyers §14 cmt. b (Am. Law Inst. 2000) ("The client-lawyer relationship ordinarily is a consensual one. Lawyers generally are as free as other persons to decide with whom to deal, subject to generally applicable statutes such as those prohibiting certain kinds of discrimination"); Henry S. Drinker, Legal Ethics 139 (1953) ("[T]he lawyer may choose his own cases and for any reason or without reason may decline any employment which he does not fancy"); Canon 31, ABA Canons of Professional Ethics (1908) ("No lawyer is obliged to act either as advisor or advocate for every person who may wish to become his client. He has the right to decline employment."); George Sharswood, An Essay on Professional Eth- ics 84 (5th ed. 1884) (stating, in one of the earliest American works on legal ethics, that a lawyer "has an undoubted right to refuse a retainer, and decline to be concerned in any cause, at his discretion").

5. We applied this principle in N.Y. State 833 (2009), where we held that a lawyer ethically was not required to respond to an unsolicited written request for representation sent by a person in prison.

Prohibition Against Unlawful Discrimination

6. However, a lawyer's unfettered ethical right to decline a representation is subject to federal, state and local anti-discrimination statutes.

7. For example, N.Y. Exec. Law §296(2)(a) provides: "It shall be an unlawful discriminatory practice for any person, being the owner, lessee, proprietor, manager, superintendent, agent or employee of any place of public accommodation . . . because of the race, creed, color, national origin, sexual orientation, military status, sex, or disability or marital status of any person, directly or indirectly, to refuse, withhold from or deny to such person any of the accommodations, advantages, facilities or privileges thereof . . . ." In Cahill v. Rosa, 674 N.E.2d 274, 277 (N.Y. 1996), a case involving a dentist in private practice who refused to treat patients whom he suspected of being HIV positive, the Court of Appeals held that a dental practice is a "place of public accommodation" for purposes of the Executive Law. At least one scholar has argued that Cahill v. Rosa prohibits lawyers from discriminating as well. See Robert T. Begg, The Lawyer's License to Discriminate Revoked: How a Dentist Put Teeth in New York's Anti-Discrimination Disciplinary Rule, 64 Albany L. Rev 153 (2000) (discussing whether discrimination by New York lawyers is illegal after Cahill); but see G. Chin, Do You Really Want a Lawyer Who Doesn't Want You?, 20 W. New Eng. L. Rev. 9 (1998) (arguing that a lawyer should not be required to undertake representation where the lawyer cannot provide zealous representation).

8. Rule 8.4(g) recognizes that anti-discrimination statutes may limit a lawyer's freedom to decline representation, stating that a lawyer or law firm "shall not . . . unlawfully discriminate in the practice of law . . . on the basis of age, race, creed, color, national origin, sex, disability, marital status or sexual orientation. . . ." What constitutes "unlawful discrimination" within the meaning of Rule 8.4(g) is a question of law beyond the jurisdiction of this Committee. Consequently, we do not opine on whether a lawyer's refusal to represent a prospective client in a suit against the lawyer's own religious institution constitutes "unlawful discrimination."

CONCLUSION:

9. A lawyer is under no obligation to accept every person who may wish to become a client unless the refusal to accept a person amounts to unlawful discrimination. Whether a lawyer's refusal to represent a particular client amounts to unlawful discrimination is a question of law beyond this Committee's jurisdiction.

TOPIC: Attorneys' Fees: Credit Card Payments

DIGEST: A lawyer's retainer agreement may provide that (i) the client secures payment of the lawyer's fees by credit card, and (ii) the lawyer will bill the client's credit card the amount of any legal fees, costs or disbursements that the client has failed to pay within 20 days from the date of the lawyer's bill for such amount, as long as the credit card charge complies with the requirements previously set forth in our opinions, including that the client is expressly informed of the right to dispute any invoice of the lawyer (and to request fee arbitration) before the lawyer charges such amount, and the lawyer does not charge the client's credit card account for any disputed portion of the lawyer's bill.

RULES: 1.5(a) & (b); 1.15

FACTS:

1. A firm wishes to add to its retainer agreement the following provision:

> "In the event of your failure to pay any bill for legal fees, costs and/or disbursements in excess of 20-days from the date of the bill, you hereby authorize the undersigned attorney to bill your credit card for the full amount of the unpaid balance of the bill, without further notice to you. Your credit card information is as follows: ."

QUESTION:

2. May a law firm impose through its retainer agreement a 20-day time limit for payment upon clients, after which the law firm may automatically bill the client's credit card for the full amount of the unpaid balance of the moneys outstanding?

OPINION:

3. It is well-established that, in certain circumstances, New York lawyers may allow their clients to pay their attorneys' fees by credit card. See, e.g., N.Y. State 1050 (2015); N.Y. City 2014-3; Nassau County 13-5 (2013); N.Y. State 763 (2003); N.Y. State 362 (1974), as modified by N.Y. State 763 (2003).

4. A lawyer may accept credit card payments of legal fees so long as: (i) the amount of the fee is reasonable; (ii) the lawyer complies with the duty to protect the confidentiality of client information; (iii) the lawyer does not allow the credit card company to compromise the lawyer's independent professional judgment on behalf of the client; (iv) the lawyer notifies the client before the charges are billed to the credit card and offers the client the opportunity to question any billing errors; and (v) in the event of any dispute regarding the lawyer's fee, the lawyer attempts to resolve all disputes amicably and promptly and, if applicable, complies with the fee dispute resolution program set forth in 22 N.Y.C.R.R. Part 137. Id. See also N.Y. State 763 (2003) and nn. 3&4.

5. It is not appropriate for a lawyer to charge a credit card for any disputed portion of the lawyer's bill. See N.Y. City 2014-3; Nassau County 13-5 (2013); cf. Rule 1.15(b)(4) of the New York

Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") (if the client disputes the lawyer's right to funds, the lawyer may not withdraw the disputed funds from the lawyer's special account until the dispute is finally resolved). Consequently, the proposed 20-day provision would be consistent with the Rules only if the retainer agreement also expressly informed the client of the right to dispute any invoice (and to request fee arbitration in accord with applicable court rules, prior to the imposition of any disputed credit card charges).

CONCLUSION:

6. A lawyer's retainer agreement may provide that (i) the client secures payment of the lawyer's fees by credit card, and (ii) the lawyer will bill the client's credit card the amount of any legal fees, costs or disbursements that the client has failed to pay within 20 days from the date of the lawyer's bill for such amount, as long as the credit card charge complies with the requirements previously set forth in our opinions, including that the client is expressly informed of the right to dispute any invoice of the lawyer (and to request fee arbitration) before the lawyer charges such amount and that the lawyer does not charge the client's credit card for any disputed portion of the lawyer's bill.

TOPIC: Per diem lawyers; online legal directories

DIGEST: A lawyer may participate in a non-lawyer owned online legal directory that permits lawyers needing per diem lawyer services to select lawyers available to provide those services, where the directory does not recommend or select the participating lawyers, the service is available only to lawyers (not to prospective non-lawyer clients) and the participating lawyers pay a flat fee for listing their availability in and having access to the lawyers listed in the online directory. Client consent is not necessary if the purpose of the per diem representation is routine and non-substantive. Both the hiring lawyer and the per diem lawyer are responsible for checking for conflicts.

RULES: 1.1, 1.2(c), 1.3(a), 1.4(a), 1.5(b), (c) & (g), 1.6(a), 1.7, 1.8, 1.9, 1.10(a) & (e), 3.3(f), 4.1, 4.2, 5.1, 7.1, 7.2(a) & (b)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer wishes to use the services of an online service that connects litigators to per diem lawyers (the "Service"). The Service provides users (referred to herein as "hiring lawyers") with a list of lawyers who are available to handle court appearances and calendar calls on a per diem basis ("per diem lawyers"). (We refer to both the hiring lawyers and the per diem lawyers as "participating lawyers").

2. The Service is operated by non-lawyers. It charges a flat fee to participating lawyers, whether as hiring lawyers or per diem lawyers.

3. Participating per diem lawyers provide their rates, availability and areas of practice to the Service. A hiring lawyer sends a request to the Service indicating the date, time and location of the requested appearance, as well as the case caption. The Service generates a list of attorneys who are available to act at the time and place specified, and sends that list to the hiring lawyer, along with information as to each per diem lawyer's rate. The hiring lawyer then may choose an attorney from the list to retain on a per diem basis. The per diem lawyers set their own rates.

4. The Service does not permit non-lawyer clients or other non-lawyers to access the listings or to hire per diem lawyers directly. The Service and the services provided by per diem lawyers in the directory are strictly lawyer-to-lawyer services.

QUESTIONS:

5. May a New York lawyer use an online service owned by non-lawyers to request and hire per diem lawyers to cover court appearances for the lawyer's clients?

6. May a prospective per diem lawyer ethically arrange to be listed in an online legal directory owned by non-lawyers and accept assignments to cover court appearances for other lawyers?

7. Must a hiring lawyer obtain client consent before hiring a per diem lawyer to cover a court appearance?

OPINION:

8. Lawyers throughout New York State sometimes need the services of per diem lawyers. Lawyers and law firms may have unavoidable scheduling conflicts or may be obliged to appear in distant courts for routine, non-substantive calendar calls. While some courts permit telephone appearances by counsel for ministerial or routine matters, courts do not permit telephone participation in all circumstances.

9. One solution has been the creation of a market for per diem lawyers to appear on behalf of the attorneys of record. Some providers of per diem legal services are law firms. This inquiry, however, involves a service that would be provided by an entity owned by non-lawyers. The inquirer asks whether a hiring lawyer or a per diem lawyer seeking assignments may use the Service.

Background: The Per Diem Relationship

10. Per diem lawyers are hired by the attorneys of record, not by the clients. Per diem lawyers typically do not have client contact and are unlikely to have ongoing involvement in the pending matter after appearing on the specific date for which they are hired. They may or may not be privy to confidential client information. Per diem lawyers may be hired to cover a court appearance to assure that record counsel is not defaulted or to ensure that the client is not prejudiced for failing to appear on a scheduled date. Sometimes, per diem lawyers are hired for more substantive appearances, including for status conferences or for arguments on particular motions.

11. Although per diem lawyers are hired by the attorney of record, they represent the client and are being hired to "appear" on behalf of the client. See N.Y. City 1988-3 (the relationship between the temporary lawyer and the client is no different from the traditional lawyer-client relationship); ABA 88-356 (temporary lawyer who works on a matter for a client of a firm "represents" that client for purposes of the conflicts rules). As such, they have professional obligations under the Rules of Professional Conduct and other court rules. Per diem lawyers, although hired for a limited purpose, owe duties to clients, adversaries, and courts. The nature and extent of those duties depends on the circumstances.

12. We will not attempt to catalog all of the ethical duties of per diem lawyers, but we will suggest several. Under Rule 1.1, they should be competent, and thus should obtain whatever knowledge is necessary to handle an appearance. Under Rule 1.3(a), they must be diligent, and must be on time for the matters they have been retained to handle. Under Rule 1.4(a)(3), they must keep the client (through the client's agent, the hiring lawyer) reasonably informed about the status of the matter. Under Rule 1.6, they must preserve the confidentiality of any client confidential information to which they are privy. As further explained below, under Rule 1.10(e) they must check for conflicts and, if consentable, obtain consent or decline the proffered representation. See generally D.C. Op. 284 (1998) (a temporary lawyer has the same ethical obligations as any other lawyer to be competent to handle the matter tendered, to exercise independent professional judgment, to devote undivided loyalty to the client, and to preserve the client's confidences and secrets, and temporary lawyers and their employing lawyers each have an obligation to ensure that the appropriate standards are met); ABA 88-356.

13. Per diem lawyers also owe duties to adversaries. For example, under Rule 4.1, they must not make a false statement of fact or law to an adversary or other third person. Under Rule 4.2, they must not communicate on the subject of the representation with a party they know to be represented by counsel unless they have that counsel's prior consent.

14. In addition, per diem lawyers owe duties to courts. Rule 3.3(f)(1) provides that, in appearing before a tribunal, a lawyer shall not fail to comply with local customs of practice of a particular tribunal, so per diem lawyers must comply with the relevant court rules for the courts and parts in which they appear. As noted below, court rules may impose additional obligations, but interpreting those rules is beyond our jurisdiction.

Distinction Between an Online Directory and a Legal Referral Service

15. The answer to the questions posed here depends on whether the Service is a "directory" or a "referral service." This matters because Rule 7.2(b)(3) generally prohibits a lawyer from being recommended by or cooperating with a "lawyer referral service" unless the service is "operated, sponsored or approved by a bar association or authorized by law or court rule."

16. In N.Y. State 799 (2006), this Committee discussed the differences between a legal "directory" and a legal "referral service" and attempted to determine at what point an online directory becomes a referral service. For example, we said that an online version of the "yellow pages" that was available to ultimate clients could provide tools by which a potential client can filter a list of attorneys by geography and/or practice area (e.g., to create a list of attorneys in a particular geographical area who do a particular kind of legal work) without becoming a referral service. We noted, however, that the line would be crossed if the website recommended a particular lawyer or lawyers for the prospective client's problem. Consistent with this distinction, we assume that the Service gives a hiring lawyer access to the names of all of the per diem lawyers who meet the requirements of the hiring lawyer (e.g., time, jurisdiction, area of expertise, and billing rate) without winnowing down the list in any manner other than using criteria supplied by the hiring lawyer. If our assumption is correct, then the Service would not be making recommendations, and would not be a referral service. Compare N.Y. State 976 (2013) (if payments to the non-lawyer would include not only a monthly fee but other fees that could constitute payments for recommendations, those payments would violate Rule 7.2(a)); N.Y. State 902 (2012) (lawyer may not base marketing fee on number of actual or potential clients the marketer introduces to the lawyer).

17. Even if the Service is not a "referral service," however, Rule 7.2(a) prohibits a lawyer from compensating a person or organization "to recommend or obtain employment by a client" or as a reward for having made a recommendation resulting in employment by a client. Rule 7.2 appears in a section of the Rules relating to advertising and solicitation. Although the definition of "advertisement" in Rule 1.0(a) specifically excludes communications to other lawyers, Rule 7.2 is not limited to advertisements and does not exclude communications to other lawyers. Consequently, Rule 7.2 applies to a lawyer-to-lawyer service such as the one here. But paying a fee to the Service to be listed in does not violate Rule 7.2(a) if the Service is a "directory" rather than a "referral service." As Comment [1] to Rule 7.2 points out, paragraph (a) "does not prohibit a lawyer from paying for advertising and communications permitted by these Rules, including the costs of . . . online directory listings."

Conflicts of Interest

18. We assume that in the typical case the per diem lawyer is retained by the hiring lawyer to represent a client of the hiring lawyer. Consequently, conflict of interest rules regarding current and former clients will apply. Rule 1.7, 1.8, 1.9. See N.Y. State 715 (1999) (contract lawyers, like other lawyers, must comply with the conflicts rules with respect to current and former clients).

19. Even if the per diem lawyer is hired solely to cover a specific appearance or to argue a specific motion, a per diem lawyer could not later appear on behalf of the other side in that case or one that is substantially related. See Rule 1.9 ("Duties to Former Clients"). See also ABA 88-356; N.Y. City 1996-8, 1989-2, 1988-3 and 1988-3A.

20. Moreover, under Rule 1.10(e), both the hiring law firm and the per diem lawyer must maintain a written record of engagements, at or near the time of each new engagement, and maintain a system by which proposed engagements are checked against current and previous engagements. Under Rule 1.10(e)(3), this conflict check must be performed by the hiring firm whenever the firm hires or associates with another lawyer. Although the Service may assist participating lawyers in identifying conflicts by obtaining information about the case caption and about the hiring lawyer, the obligation under Rule 1.10 to check for and identify conflicts falls on both the hiring lawyer and the per diem lawyer.

21. Although the direct conflict rules apply to the per diem lawyer, vicarious disqualification would not apply in the case of a one-off representation by a per diem lawyer. Rule 1.10(a) provides: "While lawyers are associated in a firm, none of them shall knowingly represent a client when any one of them practicing alone would be prohibited from doing so by Rule 1.7, 1.8 or 1.9" (Emphasis added.) In the case of a one-off representation arranged by the Service here, the per diem lawyer would not be "associated" with the hiring law firm for purposes of Rule 1.10(a). See N.Y. State 715 (whether vicarious disqualification applies depends upon whether the relationship of the contract lawyer to the employing law firm rises to the level of an "association" with the firm); D.C. Opinion 352 (2010) (whether a temporary contract attorney is "associated with" the hiring law firm will depend on the scope and nature of the temporary contract attorney's relationship with the firm and the potential for exposure to the confidences of the firm's clients for matters on which the temporary lawyer is not working); ALI, Restatement, The Law Governing Lawyers, Section 123, Comment c(iii) (co-counsel who associate for purposes of handling a particular case are not subject to vicarious disqualification). Consequently, Rule 1.10(a) does not impute to a per diem lawyer or hiring firm whatever conflicts the other may have under Rules 1.7, 1.8, or 1.9 with respect to matters not related to the per diem representation.

Sharing Fees with Non-lawyers

22. The inquirer states that the Service would charge flat fees for attorneys' participation in the Service. Assuming that the fees collected by the Service are not related to the amount of the fees charged by the per diem lawyers, the inquiry does not involve a lawyer sharing legal fees with a non-lawyer. See N.Y. State 976 (2013) (arrangement could constitute impermissible fee sharing if the lawyer's payment to the intermediary is insufficiently related to the value of the company's services);

N.Y. State 885 (2011) (finding improper fee sharing where there appeared to be no relation between the funds to be received by the non-lawyer company and the value of the services performed.)

Lawyer Ratings and Reviews

23. The inquiry states that hiring lawyers will choose per diem lawyers based on various factors, including "the per diem lawyer's rate, rating and reviews," but it does not state whether the Service will provide for such ratings and reviews. This Committee has issued several opinions on ratings and reviews, focusing on lawyers who advertise such ratings or reviews. See N.Y. State 1052 (2015) (lawyer may give clients a credit on their legal bills if they rate the lawyer on an internet website, if the credit is not contingent on the content of the rating and the ratings and reviews are done by the clients, not the lawyer); N.Y. State 1007 (2014) (lawyer may advertise inclusion in "best lawyers" publication if the lawyer's assessment of the methodology used to determine inclusion demonstrates that it is an unbiased, nondiscriminatory and defensible process); N.Y. State 877 (2011) (lawyer's website may accurately quote bona fide professional ratings or comments from any ratings publication if the ratings or comments are factually supportable when published and are not be false, deceptive or misleading). Consistent with these opinions, we believe that, if the Service publishes ratings and reviews of a per diem lawyer, the per diem lawyer should ensure that they are accurately described. See generally Rule 7.1, Cmt. [13] (Bona Fide Professional Ratings).

Limited Scope Representation

24. A per diem lawyer usually is hired for purposes of a single court appearance, and typically has no ongoing involvement in the matter once the court appearance is over. Rule 1.2(c) permits limited scope representations under prescribed circumstances: "A lawyer may limit the scope of the representation if the limitation is reasonable under the circumstances, the client gives informed consent and where necessary notice is provided to the tribunal and/or opposing counsel." See N.Y. State 856 (2011). However, we do not believe that the inquiry before us implicates Rule 1.2(c), because the per diem lawyer is contracting with the hiring lawyer, not with the client. The hiring lawyer is not entering into a limited scope representation with the client. The hiring lawyer is simply outsourcing a particular, discrete task to a lawyer outside the lawyer's own office.

Considerations Under Relevant Court Rules

25. As noted above, Rule 3.3(f)(1) provides that, in appearing before a tribunal, a lawyer shall not fail to comply with local customs of practice of a particular tribunal. Thus per diem lawyers must comply with the relevant court rules for the courts and parts in which they appear. While it is outside our jurisdiction to interpret court rules, we note that the Uniform Rules for the Supreme Court and the County Court, 22 NYCRR §202.12(b), require attorneys appearing at preliminary conferences to be "thoroughly familiar with the action and authorized to act on behalf of the party" and to be "sufficiently versed in matters relating to their clients' technological systems to discuss competently all issues relating to electronic discovery." See also Rule 1(a) of the Commercial Division, 22 NYCRR §202.70(g), (which requires all counsel who appear to be fully familiar with the case and authorized to enter into substantive and procedural agreements on behalf of their clients).

26. Failure to comply with these court rules may result in the imposition of sanctions and professional discipline. See 22 NYCRR §130-2.1(a) (imposing sanctions or awarding costs and legal fees upon attorney who, without good cause, fails to appear at a court-scheduled matter); Commercial Division Rules 1(a) & 12, 22 NYCRR §202.70(g) (authorizing sanctions, including dismissal, for failure of fully authorized counsel to appear); Alveranga-Duran v. New Whitehall Apartments, LLC, 40 A.D.3d 287, 836 N.Y.S.2d 24 (1st Dep't 2007) (appearance of per diem lawyer without settlement authority at conference required imposition of sanction). Such failure may also violate Rule 1.3(a) ("A lawyer shall act with reasonable diligence and promptness in representing a client").

Client Consent to Hire a Per Diem Lawyer

27. The inquirer asks whether a hiring lawyer must obtain client consent before hiring a per diem lawyer to cover a court appearance. Ethics opinions decided under the Code of Professional Responsibility were based largely on DR 2-107(A) (prohibiting a lawyer from dividing a fee for legal services with another lawyer not in the lawyer's law firm without client consent), EC 2-31 [formerly EC 2-22] (prohibiting a lawyer, without the consent of the client, from associating in a particular matter another lawyer outside the lawyer's firm) and EC 4-2 (prohibiting a lawyer from associating another lawyer outside the first lawyer's firm in the handling of a matter with client consent). Although the prohibition against dividing fees now appears in Rule 1.5(g), which also requires client consent where there will be a division of fees, we do not believe that Rule 1.5(g) applies where a hiring lawyer is hiring a per diem lawyer on an hourly or fixed fee basis that is based on the fair value of the work and that is similar to what the hiring lawyer would pay an employee of the firm. Rather, as we noted in N.Y. State 715, whether a hiring law firm needs to disclose to the client and obtain consent for the participation of a contract lawyer depends upon whether confidences will be disclosed to the lawyer, the degree of involvement of the per diem lawyer in the matter and the significance of the work the lawyer will perform.

28. In 2015, the New York State Bar Association amended the Comments to Rule 1.1 to address the outsourcing of legal work by law firms to lawyers outside the firm. As explained by Professor Simon, "To help ensure that outside lawyers perform legal work competently [the State Bar Association expanded] the Comments to New York Rule 1.1 ("Competence") to provide greater guidance and clarity regarding a lawyer's responsibilities when engaging outside lawyers to provide legal services to clients." Roy D. Simon, Simon's New York Rules of Professional Conduct Annotated 65 (Thompson Reuters 2016 ed.)

29. The most relevant new comment provision is Rule 1.1, Comment [6A], which says:

> Client consent to contract with a lawyer outside the lawyer's own firm may not be necessary for discrete and limited tasks supervised closely by a lawyer in the firm. However, a lawyer should ordinarily obtain client consent before contracting with an outside lawyer to perform substantive or strategic legal work on which the lawyer will exercise independent judgment without close supervision or review by the referring lawyer. For example, on one hand, a lawyer who hires an outside lawyer on a per diem basis to cover a single court call or a routing calendar call ordinarily would not need to obtain the client's prior informed consent. On the other hand, a lawyer who hires an outside lawyer to argue a summary judgment motion or negotiate key points in a transaction ordinarily should seek to obtain the client's prior informed consent.

30. Thus, where the hiring lawyer reasonably expects a court appearance to involve a simple scheduling matter, the hiring lawyer need not obtain client consent. However, if the hiring lawyer knows (or reasonably should know) that a court appearance is likely to involve substantive or strategically significant issues or the sharing of client confidences, then the hiring lawyer ordinarily must obtain client consent to use a per diem lawyer. See Rule 1.1, Comment [7A] ("if the outside lawyer will have a more material role and will exercise more autonomy and responsibility, then the retaining lawyer usually should consult with the client"). Comment [7A] also provides that "whenever the retaining lawyer discloses a client's confidential information to lawyers outside the firm, the retaining lawyer should comply with Rule 1.6(a)." See also N.Y. State 715 (1999) (whether client consent is necessary before contracting to have work done by a temporary or contract lawyer depends on whether (i) the lawyer will receive confidential client information, (ii) whether the work to be done by the temporary lawyer will involve strategic decisions or other work that the client would expect of the senior lawyers working on the client's matters, and the work will not be supervised by the hiring lawyer); D.C. Op. 284 (1998) (lawyer should advise and obtain consent from client whenever proposed use of a temporary lawyer to work on client's matter appears reasonably likely to be material to the representation or to affect the client's reasonable expectations).

Billing the Cost of a Per Diem Lawyer.

31. Rule 1.5(b) enjoins a lawyer to communicate to a client "the basis or rate of the fee and expenses for which the client will be responsible." If the law firm wishes to bill the client for the cost of the per diem lawyer, the lawyer should communicate this possibility to the client. The issues of whether the hiring lawyer may mark up the cost of a per diem lawyer or charge the cost of a per diem lawyer as an expense in a contingent fee matter are beyond the scope of this opinion. On the other hand, the fee paid to the Service may not be included in the legal fee charged by the law firm to its client. Rather, if the law firm wishes to pass it on to the client, it must separately bill it as a disbursement. See N.Y. City 1989-2.

Supervising the Per Diem Lawyer

32. In N.Y. State 715, we noted several different models for using temporary lawyers. In one model, the temporary lawyer is an independent contractor with discretion on how to accomplish the assigned task. In another, the hiring lawyer provides the same type of supervision he or she would provide to an employee. In that opinion, we noted, citing ABA 88-356, that if a temporary lawyer is performing independent work for a client involving substantive or strategic issues without the close supervision of a lawyer associated with the law firm, the hiring lawyer must inform the client. As noted above, in 2015, the comments to Rule 1.1 were amended to provide that "[c]lient consent to contract with a lawyer outside the lawyer's own firm may not be necessary for discrete and limited tasks supervised closely by a lawyer in the firm."

33. Rule 5.1(b)(2) provides: "A lawyer with direct supervisory authority over another lawyer shall make reasonable efforts to ensure that the supervised lawyer conforms to these Rules." However, even if the work that the per diem lawyer will perform does not involve discretion and is not closely supervised by the hiring lawyer, we believe that the hiring lawyer must (i) determine that the per diem lawyer is competent to perform the assigned task, (ii) ensure that both the firm and the contract lawyer perform conflict checks before hiring the per diem lawyer to determine that the per diem lawyer has not formerly appeared for the opposing party in the same or a substantially-related matter, and (iii) confirm that the per diem's assignment was performed satisfactorily by obtaining a report on the assignment from the per diem lawyer.

CONCLUSION:

34. A lawyer may participate in a non-lawyer owned online legal directory that permits lawyers needing per diem lawyer services to select lawyers available to provide those services, where the directory does not recommend or select the participating lawyers, the service is available only to lawyers (not to prospective non-lawyer clients) and the participating lawyers pay flat fees for listing their availability in and having access to and hiring the lawyers listed in the online directory. Client consent is not necessary if the purpose of the per diem representation is routine and non-substantive. The hiring lawyer has direct supervisory authority over the per diem lawyer and must make reasonable efforts to ensure that the per diem lawyer conforms to the Rules, including by maintaining a system by which the proposed engagements are checked for conflicts of interest.

TOPIC: Trust or special accounts; IOLA; authorized signature on special account checks

DIGEST: Attorneys may electronically sign checks issued from their law firm's "special," trust or IOLA account, provided that an authorized signatory who is a New York lawyer personally reviews and approves the issuance of the check with his or her digitized signature.

RULES: 1.15(b), (d) & (e)

FACTS:

1. A multi-state law firm with offices in New York has a centralized out-of-state location for issuing checks from the attorney special or trust account that the firm maintains in a New York bank.

2. In accordance with Rule 1.15(e) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"), the firm has designated firm lawyers who are admitted to practice law in New York and are based in its New York offices as "authorized signatories" of the special or trust account. Currently, when a check is to be issued from the account, the requested check is printed locally utilizing a MICR (magnetic ink character recognition) printer. The check is then presented to an authorized signatory, along with all supporting documentation regarding the transaction, for review and execution. After review, if the documentation complies, the authorized person manually signs the check (sometimes referred to as a "wet ink signature"). The check and supporting documentation is then given to a second authorized signatory for review and execution. Presently, all checks from the account are signed in ink by two authorized signatories.

3. The firm would like to move to an electronic approval and signing process. In the new process, the firm would notify the authorized signatories electronically of one or more pending checks to be issued from the attorney special or trust account. The authorized signatories would be provided with all supporting documentation and would conduct the same review that is currently being conducted with respect to wet ink checks. However, rather than signing the checks manually in ink, the authorized signatory would electronically approve the issuance of the check. After an authorized signatory approves, the check will be printed. Just as with the current process, checks would be printed in the firm's local office (here, the New York office) utilizing the MICR printer. The printed checks would also contain the electronically-affixed digitized (machine readable) signature of each authorizing signatory.

QUESTIONS:

4. A. May a law firm utilize MICR (magnetic ink character recognition) digitized signatures on checks issued from its IOLA account in lieu of manual (wet ink) signatures?

   B. May the approval process for checks issued from the law firm's IOLA account utilize a batch process to authorize the MICR signatures?

OPINION:

MICR Signatures on IOLA Checks

5. Rule 1.15(b) requires a lawyer who is in possession of funds belonging to another person incident to the lawyer's law practice to maintain those funds in a "special account", also known as "trust account." Under Judiciary Law Section 497(4)(b), where the lawyer receives moneys incident to the lawyer's practice that the lawyer believes are too small in amount (or will be held for too short a time) to generate sufficient interest income to justify a separate account, the lawyer is required to place them in an interest-bearing account, also known as an Interest on Lawyers Account or IOLA Account. Court rules contain several requirements regarding IOLA Accounts. See 21 NYCRR Part 7000. However, that rule contains no requirement regarding authorized signatories of special account checks. Only Rule 1.15(e) governs authorized signatories.

6. Rule 1.15(a) specifies that an attorney who possesses client funds has a fiduciary obligation with respect to those funds. Moreover, Rule 1.15(e) states that "[o]nly a lawyer admitted to practice law in New York State shall be an authorized signatory of a special account." The answer to the question here thus hinges on what is encompassed by the term "signatory."

7. Recently, the State of North Carolina amended its version of Rule 1.15 to include a provision that specifically prohibits trust account checks from being signed utilizing "signature stamps, preprinted signature lines, or electronic signatures". See North Carolina Rules of Professional Conduct, 1.15(s). New York, however, has no such prohibition.

8. Rule 1.15(e) in New York provides that only a New York attorney may be an authorized signatory, but it does not specify how a trust or special account check may be signed. Rule 1.0(x) defines what constitutes a writing for purposes of Rules that require the client's written consent. It was amended effective January 1, 2017 to include electronic records within the meaning of a writing. As amended, Rule 1.0(x) provides: "A 'signed' writing includes an electronic . . . process attached to . . . a writing and executed or adopted by a person with the intent to sign the writing." (Emphasis added.) As the New York State Bar Association's Committee on Standards of Professional Conduct ("COSAC") explained when it proposed this change, "COSAC recommends clarifying the definition of 'writing' to make clear that it encompasses evolving forms of electronic communications." However, the term we must interpret here is not "writing" but "signatory." Consequently, the recent amendment is instructive but not dispositive.

9. In N.Y. State 693 (1997), this Committee stated that it was permissible for a lawyer, as part of a real estate closing, to delegate to a paralegal the task of signing the lawyer's name on an escrow account check utilizing a rubber stamp, as long as the lawyer supervised the delegated work closely. The rationale underpinning that opinion was that it was the attorney, not the paralegal, who ultimately approved the transaction – the attorney was merely delegating the task of affixing the signature for a discrete and limited purpose.

10. Here, no delegation would be involved. Therefore, if the law firm's procedures for authorizing checks from the special or trust account and for affixing the digitized signature of each authorized signatory assure that only an authorized signatory or signatories may initiate these steps, and if using the MICR signature renders the check negotiable within the meaning of banking laws and regulations, then Rule 1.15 neither requires a law firm to use a "wet ink signature" nor prohibits a law firm from using electronic or digitized signature media such one affixed by an MICR printer.

11. The law firm also must ensure that the electronically-generated records of the special or trust account are maintained in accordance with Rule 1.15(d).

Batch Processing of IOLA Checks

12. The inquirer also asks whether the firm may utilize a "batch process" to authorize the MICR signatures. The inquiry does not define "batch processing," but we understand that the term can mean two different things. The first involves running a series of computer steps with minimum human interaction. The second involves scheduling a series of activities for the same time, so as to use computer time most efficiently. As this Committee has stated, "responsibility for client funds may not be delegated . . . ." See N.Y. State 693 (emphasis added). As long as (i) the firm's authorized signatories approve the issuance of each individual check from the firm's special or trust account, and (ii) the firm's computer system saves information about authorization of checks to be printed and signed digitally and prints out the digitally signed checks in a single batch, the firm would be in compliance with Rule 1.15.

CONCLUSION:

13. A law firm may issue electronically signed and approved checks from its trust account provided that an authorized signatory who meets the requirements of Rule 1.15(e) personally reviews and approves the issuance of each check.

TOPIC: Public defender; part-time judge; conflict of interest

DIGEST: A member of a public defender office may not represent a client in the same court where another member of the public defender office serves as a part-time judge because it would violate Rule 8.4(f), which prohibits a lawyer from causing a judge to violate his or her own ethical obligations under the Rules of Judicial Conduct not to "permit his or her partners or associates to practice law in the court in which he or she is a judge".

RULES: 1.0(h), 1.0(p), 1.10(a), 7.2(b), 8.4(f)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer lives in a locality where City Court judges serve on a part-time basis. These part-time judges may also practice law. See 22 N.Y.C.R.R. 100.6(B) (a part-time judge may accept private employment or public employment in a Federal, State or municipal department or agency, provided that such employment is not incompatible with judicial office and does not conflict or interfere with the proper performance of the judge's duties). The inquirer here is a member of a public defender office. Another member of the public defender office is a part-time judge in the City Court.

QUESTION:

2. May a lawyer who is a member of a public defender office appear in the court where another member of the public defender office serves as a part-time judge?

OPINION:

Current Law and Court Rules

3. Although the jurisdiction of this Committee does not include interpreting laws or court rules, the question posed here is affected by law and court rules.

4. Section 471 of the Judiciary Law provides:

> A law partner of, or person connected in law business with a judge, shall not practice or act as an attorney or counsellor, in a court, of which the judge is, or is entitled to act as a member. . . . [Emphasis added]

Similarly, Section 100.6(B) of the Rules of Judicial Conduct, 22 N.Y.C.R.R. §100.6(B)(3), provides:

> A part-time judge:
> * * *
> (2) shall not practice law in the court on which the judge serves, or in any other court in the county in which his or her court is located, before a judge who is per> mitted to practice law, and shall not act as a lawyer in a proceeding in which the judge has served as a judge or in any other proceeding related thereto;

> (3) shall not permit his or her partners or associates to practice law in the court in which he or she is a judge, and shall not permit the practice of law in his or her court by the law partners or associates of another judge of the same court who is permitted to practice law, but may permit the practice of law in his or her court by the partners or associates of a judge of a court in another town, village or city who is permitted to practice law. . . . [Emphasis added]

5. Whether a lawyer is "connected in law business" with a judge or is an "associate" of a judge within the meaning of Section 471 of the Judiciary Law or Section 100.6(B) of the Rules of Judicial Conduct are legal questions beyond the jurisdiction of this Committee.

6. Under the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"), attorneys who are members of the same public defender office usually are considered to be part of the same firm. Rule 1.0(h) defines the terms "firm" or "law firm" to include "lawyers employed in a qualified legal assistance organization." Rule 1.0(p) defines a "qualified legal assistance organization" as an "office or organization of one of the four types listed in Rule 7.2(b)(1)-(4) that meets all of the requirements thereof." Finally, Rule 7.2(b)(1) lists the following types of qualified legal assistance organizations:

> a legal aid office or public defender office: (i) operated or sponsored by a duly accredited law school; (ii) operated or sponsored by a bona fide, non-profit community organization; (iii) operated or sponsored by a governmental agency; or (iv) operated, sponsored, or approved by a bar association. [Emphasis added.]

7. Comment [4] to Rule 1.0 indicates that the structure of a legal services organization may determine whether the entire organization, or rather some components of an organization, constitutes a "firm" for purposes of the Rules. The precise scope of a "firm" within a legal services organization is a factual question that is beyond the jurisdiction of our Committee. See N.Y. State 1104 (2016); N.Y. State 1036 (2014); N.Y. State 862 (2011).

8. Rule 1.10(a) provides as follows: "While lawyers are associated in a firm, none of them shall knowingly represent a client when any one of them practicing alone would be prohibited from doing so by Rule 1.7, 1.8 or 1.9, except as otherwise provided therein." (Emphasis added.) The lawyers in a public defender office are considered "associated" even if assistant public defenders work on a part-time basis. See N.Y. State 862 (2011) (the phrase "associated" in Rule 1.10(a) "includes part-time attorneys as well as full-time attorneys"). This Committee has previously concluded that members of a county public defender office may be considered to be "associated" in the same firm for imputation purposes under Rule 1.10(a), even if the lawyers in the public defender office work independently. Compare N.Y. State 975 (2013) (involving a county with a single public defender having a central role in providing legal services under County Law §701 and concluding that all assistant public defenders should be considered to be associated in the office) with N.Y. State 914 (2012) (a panel of lawyers established to provide legal assistance to indigent clients when the Legal Aid Society has a conflict and whose members did not have a common supervisor or share files or confidential information with Legal Aid Society Lawyers was not part of the same "firm" as the Legal Aid Society). The remainder of this opinion assumes that the inquiring public defender would be considered to be associated with the part-time judge because they are both members of the same public defender office.

Prior Opinions of this Committee Regarding Associates of Part-Time Judges

9. We have issued a long line of opinions dealing with the ethical constraints placed upon associates of part-time judges. See, e.g. N.Y. State 701 (1998) (lawyer who is co-counsel with a part-time judge in a civil case may not appear before another judge on the part-time judge's court because the public might perceive that the administration of justice is not fairly and impartially served), N.Y. State 670 (discussing practice restrictions on a part-time City Court judge and a part-time DA who are associated with each other in private practice); N.Y. State 118 (1970) (under the Canons of Judicial Ethics, a village police judge may not sit on criminal matters if his partner is an assistant district attorney); N.Y. State 65 (1967) (Judicial Canons prohibit partners of an acting village judge from appearing before a regular judge of the court); N.Y. State 29a (1967) (even if it does not violate the law, an associate in the law firm of a part time judge may not ethically appear before the other judges on that court, since it is not conducive to building public confidence in the courts). These opinions were based on various sources, including §471 of the Judiciary Law, the Code of Judicial Conduct, and the prior Canons of Judicial Ethics, as well as Canon 9 of the Code of Professional Responsibility and several Ethical Considerations in the Code of Professional Responsibility prohibiting the appearance of impropriety or the appearance of undermining the impartiality of a tribunal. N.Y. State 701 also took the position that, if an appearance before a part-time judge was illegal under §471 of the Judiciary Law, it was also unethical. That view was based on former DR 1-102(A)(4), which considered it misconduct for a lawyer to engage in "illegal" conduct.

10. Some of these bases no longer apply to opinions issued by this Committee. The Canons of Judicial Ethics were replaced by the Code of Judicial Conduct, and, later, the Rules of Judicial Conduct of the Chief Administrator of the Courts. In any case, as noted above, interpreting statutes and court rules is beyond our jurisdiction.

Application of Rule 8.4(f)

11. Rule 8.4(f) provides that a "lawyer or law firm shall not . . . knowingly assist a judge or judicial officer in conduct that is in violation of applicable rules of judicial conduct or other law." Under this provision, a lawyer may not knowingly undertake a representation when doing so would cause a judge to violate his or her own ethical obligations under the Rules of Judicial Conduct (such as the obligation in §100.6(B)(3) not to "permit his or her partners or associates to practice law in the court in which he or she is a judge").

12. For this reason, if the associated part-time City Court judge does not take steps to prevent other lawyers who are members of the same public defender office from practicing before the City Court, then the other public defenders must on their own initiative decline to make such appearances or withdraw.

13. Opinions in other jurisdictions have reached similar conclusions based upon the interplay between a Rule of Judicial Conduct and a lawyer's duty under Rule 8.4(f). See Phila. Op. 91-33 (1991) (holding that inquiring attorney could not appear before a member of the Tax Review Board where a retired member of the firm was a member of the Tax Review Board, because the Code of Judicial Conduct would require the Tax Review Board member to recuse himself – and if he failed to do so, then the inquirer would be in violation of Rule 8.4(f) if the inquiring lawyer participated in the hearing because it would be assisting a judge in conduct in violation of the applicable Rules of Judicial Conduct); S.C. Op. 94-05 (1994) (considering whether a lawyer could hire a probate judge as a part-time attorney and noting that, while the question presented might be directed more appropriately to the Advisory Committee on Standards of Judicial Conduct, because the inquirer was the lawyer who would hire the judge and because the applicable South Carolina ethics rule prohibited the lawyer from knowingly assisting a judge in conduct that violated applicable rules of judicial conduct or other law, the inquiry also fell within the purview of the Ethics Committee.)

CONCLUSION:

14. A member of the public defender's office may not represent a client in the court where another public defender is a part-time judge, because to do so would violate the public defender's duties under Rule 8.4(f).

(39-16)

TOPIC: Nonlegal services, fee-sharing with nonlawyers, payment for referrals, billing practices, disclosing use of nonlawyer assistants, multidisciplinary practice

DIGEST: A lawyer may enter into an arrangement with a nonlawyer "foreign migration agent" whereby the nonlawyer hires the lawyer on behalf of the client and assists the lawyer in communicating with the client, as well as gathering and translating documents that are required in connection with the representation, as long as (1) the relationship between the lawyer and the nonlawyer is not exclusive, (2) the nonlawyer does not interfere with the lawyer-client relationship, (3) the client consents to the potential conflict of interest resulting from the referral relationship between the lawyer and the foreign migration agent, and (4) the lawyer is not paying the foreign migration agent for referrals. The lawyer must bill the client separately for fees and expenses and must inform the client of the name and amount charged by the foreign migration agent for nonlegal services.

RULES: 1.0(i) & (j), 1.4(a), 1.5(a), (b) & (d), 1.7(a) & (b), 2.1, 5.3(a)&(b), 5.4(a), 5.5(b), 5.8(a)&(c), 7.2(a)&(b)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a law firm with a principal office outside New York and a small office in New York. The firm has several partners and associates admitted in NY. It practices US immigration law, and one of its services involves helping clients to obtain lawful permanent residence in the U.S. (also known as obtaining a green card), using the so-called EB-5 Program (the "EB-5 Program"). This Program allows a foreign investor ("EB-5 investor") to qualify for a green card by investing $1 million in a U.S. commercial enterprise ($500,000 if the investment is made in a targeted area with high unemployment) and creating or preserving at least 10 full-time jobs for qualifying U.S. workers.

2. Part of the EB-5 Program allows foreign investors to make passive investments in qualifying projects under the auspices of a Regional Center ("Regional Center") designated by US Citizenship and Immigration Services ("USCIS"). Regional Centers sponsor capital investment projects for investment by EB-5 Investors. Many real estate projects in New York are funded by EB-5 investors through a Regional Center.

3. In the Immigrant Visa Petition on Form I-526, the applicant must demonstrate that he or she has invested the required amount and is the legal owner of the capital invested, that the funds are from a lawful source and that the investment directly or indirectly created 10 jobs. If the Form I-526 is approved, the investor obtains conditional lawful permanent residence for two years. Prior to the end of the 2-year period, another petition must be filed to remove the conditional status of the visa by establishing that the investor has continued to meet all the conditions of the EB-5 program, including that the EB-5 investment is ongoing.

4. Many EB-5 investors who invest through Regional Centers rely upon foreign migration agents ("FMAs"), who live in such investors' country, to assist them in understanding the projects offered by various Regional Centers, and in navigating the EB-5 Program. Although the petition on Form I-526 is filed by a U.S.-licensed lawyer, an FMA may assist the EB-5 investor in establishing that the requirements of the EB-5 Program have been met, including that the investor has invested the required amount, that the investor is the legal owner of the capital invested, and that the investment has created the requisite number of direct or indirect jobs.

5. The services provided by FMAs to investors may include the following:

a. Translating the investor's documents for the EB-5 process

b. Assisting the law firm to collect all documents required for the process from the investor, organizing the financial documentation for the initial submission to USCIS and responding to any requests for additional information

c. Monitoring the status of all processes and filings of the investor

d. Assisting the law firm in communicating with the investor and participating in calls between the investor and the law firm.

6. The FMA may also assist the EB-5 investor by advising on ancillary relocation matters, such as purchasing a home and selecting schools for children.

7. Finally, the FMA may market the projects of various Regional Centers to investors and may participate in the development of the projects. In addition, the FMA may assist a Regional Center in communicating with the investor. It may receive fees from the Regional Center when the investment is made in the Center's project, including (i) a finder's fee, (ii) a proportion of the proceeds of the deal, and (iii) part of the administrative fee paid by the EB-5 Investor.

8. The FMA does not prepare and file the Immigrant Visa Petition. Rather, it directs its clients to U.S. immigration lawyers. Depending on the size of the project and the FMA, the FMA may have dozens of EB-5 investors invest in a single project, who may all be represented by one U.S. law firm or by different law firms. The lawyer, as preparer of the Petition, affirms that he or she has prepared the petition at the request of the EB-5 investor and that it is based on all information of which he or she has knowledge. The engagement letter of the law firm often provides that the EB-5 investor consents to deal with the law firm through the FMA as the investor's agent.

9. Because the EB-5 investor is in a foreign country and may not speak English, the lawyer or the EB-5 investor must hire agents, including accountants and translators, to prepare and translate the necessary papers to document the source of the investment funds and how they were transferred from the investor's control to the project. Here, the FMA is proposing that the law firm engage the FMA to provide the services that would otherwise have to be performed by a foreign-language speaking accounting firm or staff of the law firm. The inquirer represents that the FMA would charge the same fixed fee that an outside firm or the law firm would charge. The FMA also proposes to serve as the point of contact with the client in the client's home country and to liaise with the lawyer in obtaining necessary documentation, for which the FMA would charge the lawyer an additional fee.

10. The law firm asks whether it may charge the client for such nonlegal services, whether it must disclose to the client that any portion of the fees charged to the client are being used to retain a nonlawyer to perform services in connection with the visa application, and whether it must disclose that the FMA is providing these services.

QUESTIONS:

11. May a law firm charge the client for nonlegal services?

12. May the lawyer charge the client a single fee that includes a flat fee for the lawyer's services and a flat fee for the services of the nonlawyer?

13. Must the lawyer disclose to the client either the identity of the nonlawyer or the amount paid to the nonlawyer?

14. What other considerations apply when a law firm participates in an arrangement with a nonlawyer whereby the nonlawyer assists the lawyer in communicating with the client, and manages all document gathering and translation in connection with the representation?

OPINION:

Nonlawyer Assistants

15. Lawyers often hire nonlawyers to help them provide legal services. These nonlawyers may be employees of the law firm or outside service providers. See New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"), Rule 5.3, Comment [3] ("A lawyer may use nonlawyers outside the firm to assist the lawyer in rendering legal services to the client. Examples include . . . an investigative or paraprofessional service, . . . a document management company, . . . a third party for printing or scanning, and . . . an Internet-based service to store client information").

16. Ordinarily, when use of a communication agent is necessary for effective communication with a client, use of such an agent is ethically required. See N.Y. State 1053 (2015) (use of sign language interpreter to assist communication with a deaf client). As we said in N.Y. State 1053, under Rule 1.4, a lawyer must, among other things, apprise the client of material developments in the client's matter and consult with the client about the means by which the client's objectives are to be accomplished. However, there is also a danger, when the intermediary is the sole source of communication with the client without appropriate participation by the lawyer, that the intermediary could interfere with the lawyer's obligation under Rule 1.4 to communicate with the client. Consequently, the lawyer must ensure that the intermediary is facilitating and not controlling communication with the client.

17. As Rule 5.3, Comment [2] explains, the lawyer must ensure that the conduct of nonlawyers that the lawyer employs or retains is compatible with the lawyer's professional obligations:

> [2] With regard to nonlawyers, who are not themselves subject to these Rules, the purpose of the supervision is to give reasonable assurance that the conduct of all nonlawyers employed by or retained by. . . the law firm . . . is compatible with the professional obligations of the lawyers and firm. Lawyers . . . may employ nonlawyers outside the firm to assist in rendering those services. . . . A law firm must ensure that such nonlawyer assistants are given appropriate instruction and supervision concerning the ethical aspects of their employment, particularly regarding the obligation not to disclose confidential information. . . . A law firm should make reasonable efforts to ensure that the firm has in effect measures giving reasonable assurance that nonlawyers in the firm and nonlawyers outside the firm who work on firm matters will act in a way compatible with the professional obligations of the lawyer.

Charging the Client for Legal and Nonlegal Services

18. The inquirer asks whether the lawyer may charge a single fee for legal and nonlegal services. Even if the inquirer were willing to be liable for the nonlegal services under the Rules, we believe including the expense for nonlegal services in the fee for legal services would be inappropriate. Rule 1.5(b) enjoins a lawyer to communicate to a client "the basis or rate of the fee and expenses for which the client will be responsible." [Emphasis added]. See also 22 N.Y.C.R.R. Part 1215.1(b) (Written Letter of Engagement Rule requires that the lawyer's letter of engagement address the scope of the legal services to be provided and an explanation of attorney's fees to be charged, expenses and billing practices). This information must be communicated to the client before or within a reasonable time after commencement of the representation and must be in writing where required by statute or court rule. Consequently, in order for the inquirer to bill the client for the expense of services provided by the FMA (or, for that matter, the expenses of third-party accountants and translators), the inquirer must communicate this possibility to the client and the nature of the charges that will be billed to the client.

19. Since these expenses would not constitute legal fees of the lawyer, they would appropriately be listed separately on any legal bill as expenses of the matter. Like legal fees, expenses are subject to the requirements of Rule 1.5(a) that they not be excessive. Moreover, without the consent of the client, the lawyer may bill only the exact amount of the expenses. See N.Y. State 1050 (2015) (citing ABA 93-397 (1993) and N.Y. City 2006-3); Cf. Rule 1.5, Comment [1] (discussing in-house expenses). Since the inquirer states that the FMA would charge the same amount that would be charged by a third-party provider or by the law firm for in-house staffers, these charges may not be not clearly excessive. However, the lawyer would have to determine that the FMA provides services of the same quality as those the lawyer's firm could provide itself or through third party providers.

Must the Lawyer Disclose the Identity of the Nonlegal Services Provider?

20. The inquirer asks whether it is necessary to disclose that nonlegal services are being provided by the FMA or another nonlawyer provider. We assume this means that the nonlegal expenses (e.g. for accounting and translation) would be listed as expenses but the provider would not be identified.

21. The answer to this question is governed by Rule 1.4 on communication with the client. Rule 1.4(a)(2) requires the lawyer to "reasonably consult with the client about the means by which the client's objectives are to be accomplished" and Rule 1.4(a)(4) requires the lawyer to "promptly comply with a client's reasonable requests for information." Comment [5] explains that the client should have "sufficient information to participate intelligently in decisions concerning the objectives of the representation and the means by which they are to be pursued" and that the lawyer must act in the client's best interests. Thus, the answer depends upon whether it is reasonable to withhold the name of the provider.

22. In any representation, outside service providers may fall within a spectrum of importance to the client. In the case of an outside photocopy service, the name of the service provider likely is unimportant to the client, and the lawyer could reasonably conclude that its name need not be provided on the legal bill (although the client is always entitled to request copies of the bills for nonlegal services received by the lawyer).

23. Here, for several reasons, we believe it would not be reasonable to withhold the name of the provider. First, the FMA will have significant contact with the client, both in the collection of the necessary documents and in assisting in communication with the lawyer. Consequently, we believe it is important that the client be aware that the personnel providing these services are not employees of the lawyer but rather employees of the FMA.

24. Second, since the inquiry lists services that the FMA normally provides directly to the EB-5 investor, it is not clear whether the services for which the law firm would be paying are services for which the EB-5 investor is already being charged. We believe the EB-5 investor is entitled to a listing of services for which the lawyer is charging disbursements and the identity of the service provider, so that the investor may judge whether the charges are reasonable and appropriate and are not duplicative.

25. Third, the FMA here has a potential conflict of interest, which the client is entitled to assess. According to the inquirer, the FMA may be working for itself and a Regional Center, as well as for the law firm and the investor. For itself and the Regional Center, the FMA may (i) participate in the development of Regional Center Projects, (ii) market the projects of various Regional Centers to investors, and assist a Regional Center in communicating with the investor. It may receive fees from the Regional Center when the investment is made in the Center's project, including (i) a finder's fee, (ii) a proportion of the proceeds of the deal, and (iii) part of the administrative fee paid by the EB-5 Investor to the Regional Center. The FMA may also assist the EB-5 investor by advising on ancillary relocation matters, such as purchasing a home and selecting schools for children. We assume this may also involve a fee. In addition, the FMA is proposing to provide services to the law firm, for which it will be paid additional fees. We believe the client is entitled to understand the extent of the total fees that will be paid to the FMA, and to assess whether the FMA is exerting pressure on the client to "close the deal" on a particular Regional Center investment.

26. Fourth, informing the client of the name and compensation of the FMA also enables the client to determine whether the compensation contains an element of payment for the FMA's referral of the lawyer. The client may be the only person in a position to determine whether its interests are served by having the FMA perform the many functions it would be performing in connection with the visa application.

27. Finally, if the reason for failure to disclose the fact that the nonlegal services were provided by the FMA is to hide from the client the fact that the FMA is being paid additional amounts in connection with the immigration visa application, then the bill might be fraudulent within the meaning of Rule 1.5(d)(3) (a lawyer shall not enter into an arrangement for, charge or collect "a fee based on fraudulent billing."); Rule 1.5, Cmt. [1A] ("A billing is fraudulent if it is knowingly and intentionally based on false or inaccurate information"); Rule 1.0(i) ("fraud" or "fraudulent" includes conduct that has a purpose to deceive).

28. For all these reasons, we believe the lawyer must disclose to the client the roles and compensation of the FMA.

Other Considerations When a Lawyer has a Relationship with a Nonlawyer

29. Both the Rules and our opinions note several concerns when lawyers and nonlawyers join to provide legal and non-legal services. These include ensuring that (A) the lawyer does not allow the nonlawyer to affect the lawyer's independent professional judgment on behalf of the client, (B) the client consents to any potential conflicts of interest; (C) the lawyer does not share legal fees with the nonlawyer, (D) the lawyer does not pay the nonlawyer for referrals, (E) the lawyer adequately supervises the work of nonlawyers who assist in the provision of legal services, and (F) the client understands the scope of the representation. See N.Y. State 1068 (2015) (lawyer joining with a claims recovery firm which would assemble documents necessary to file the client's claim and monitor the process of applications filed on behalf of the client); N.Y. State 992 (2013) (lawyer and nonlawyer establishing disability office to help with government benefit matters); N.Y. State 976 (2013) (lawyer and nonlawyer performing forensic mortgage analysis and legal services); N.Y. State 885 (2011) (lawyer and nonlawyer working together on property tax reductions). See also N.Y. City 2014-1. We summarize those issues below.

A. Interference with Lawyer's Independent Professional Judgment

30. Rule 5.8(a) prohibits, except in certain limited circumstances, a "contractual relationship with a nonlegal professional or nonlegal professional service firm for the purpose of offering to the public, on a systematic and continuing basis, legal services performed by the lawyer or law firm as well as other nonlegal professional services," (emphasis added). The exceptions provided for in Rule 5.8(a) involve relationships with firms in professions contained on a list maintained by the Appellate Divisions under Section 1205.3 of the Joint Appellate Division Rules. FMAs are not in one of those professions. Consequently, an exclusive relationship with any FMA is prohibited by Rule 5.8.

31. Under Rule 5.8(c), the provisions of Rule 5.8(a) do not apply to "relationships consisting solely of non-exclusive reciprocal referral agreements or understandings" between a lawyer and a nonlegal professional or nonlegal professional services firm. This opinion assumes that the inquirer and the FMAs with which the inquirer deals do not have an exclusive relationship. Nevertheless, since the inquiry suggests that FMAs are one of the major ways attorneys in this field obtain their clients, the inquirer must be wary of a relationship that is non-exclusive in name only. Our opinions express concern for referral relationships that are effectively exclusive. See N.Y. State 992 (2013) (lawyer may not effectively form a partnership with a nonlawyer disability office).

32. Even when Rule 5.8(a) does not apply, other Rules require complete professional independence and uncompromised loyalty of the lawyers to the client. See Rule 2.1 ("In representing a client, a lawyer shall exercise independent professional judgment and render candid advice"); Rule 5.4(a) ("Unless authorized by law, a lawyer shall not permit a person who recommends, employs, or pays the lawyer to render services for another to direct or regulate the lawyer's professional judgment in rendering such legal services.") Because an FMA who is entitled to fees upon closing of an investment may have an economic interest in ensuring that the closing occurs, where the FMA has a continuing role in the representation of the client, we believe there is a significant risk of interference with the lawyer's independent judgment. Cf. Matter of Greene, 54 N.Y.2d 118, 429 N.E.2d 390, 444 N.Y.S.2d 883 (1981), cert. denied, 455 U.S. 1035 (1982) (lawyer may not ask a real estate broker to solicit clients for the lawyer, because the broker has a conflict of interest that may affect the recommendation). Consequently as noted in the next paragraph, the lawyer must take steps to ensure that the lawyer's duty of loyalty will not be compromised.

B. Client Consent to Potential Conflicts of Interest.

33. Rule 1.7(a)(2) prohibits a lawyer from representing a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business or other personal interests.

34. Here, because the lawyer may receive continuing referrals from the FMA, there is a significant risk that the lawyer's judgment on behalf of the client will be affected. The FMA has an economic interest in the client's investing in a particular Regional Center project as the basis of the visa application. If the lawyer believes the investment is not in the best interests of the client, the lawyer may nevertheless be reluctant to so advise the client, because acting contrary to the interests of the FMA may affect future referrals from the FMA. See Matter of Lefkowitz, 47 AD3d 326, 328 (1st Dep't 2007) (upholding findings of liability against an immigration lawyer on conflicts grounds, among others, when referee found that lawyer was dependent on an immigration agent for case referrals, but never informed clients of this conflict).

35. Rule 1.7(b), however, allows the lawyer to represent the client as long as the lawyer reasonably believes he or she will be able to provide competent and diligent representation and the client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing. Although some of the language of Rule 1.7(b) seems more suited to representation of two clients with differing interests, Comment [2] to Rule 1.7 explains that it also applies to a client whose representation might be adversely affected by the lawyer's personal interest. Rule 1.0(j) indicates that "informed consent" denotes that the client must agree to the proposed course of conduct after the lawyer has communicated information "adequate for the person to make an informed decision, and after the lawyer has adequately explained to the person the material risks of the proposed course of conduct and reasonably available alternatives."

36. We believe that the lawyer's potential personal conflict of interest here is consentable, as long as the lawyer believes he or she will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to the client, and the representation is not prohibited by law, within the meaning of Rule 1.7(b)(2). Consequently, we believe the lawyer must make the determination that he or she will be able to provide competent and diligent representation, and, if the lawyer is able to make such determination, must obtain the client's informed consent.

37. We note that the inquiry states that the lawyer's engagement letter often provides that the EB-5 investor consents to deal with the law firm through the FMA as the investor's agent. We do not believe the lawyer may rely on that authorization until the client has provided informed consent to the lawyer's personal conflict. Nor should the lawyer rely on the FMA to explain the conflict and obtain consent.

C. Fee-Sharing

38. Our prior opinions have identified two concerns involving the fee paid to a nonlegal services provider – whether the lawyer is sharing legal fees with the nonlawyer and whether the lawyer is paying the nonlawyer for referring legal business.

39. Subject to exceptions not applicable here, Rule 5.4(a) prohibits a lawyer or law firm from sharing legal fees with a nonlawyer. Rule 5.4(a). The inquirer states that both the lawyer and the FMA would charge flat fees for their services. Moreover, the inquirer would pay the FMA the same fixed fee that the law firm would otherwise have to pay foreign-language speaking accounting firm or staff of the law firm speaking that language. Assuming that the fees of the FMA are not related to the amount of the fees charged by the immigration lawyer, and that the lawyer has not reduced the fees the lawyer normally charges in order to cover the fees of the nonlawyer, the inquiry would not involve a lawyer sharing legal fees with a nonlawyer. See N.Y. State 1068 (2015) (as long as the claims recovery firm provides substantial assistance in the proceedings and the compensation of the claims recovery firm is commensurate with the services it provides, then the lawyer would not be improperly sharing legal fees with a nonlawyer); N.Y. State 976 (2013) (arrangement could constitute impermissible fee sharing if the lawyer's payment to the intermediary is insufficiently related to the value of the company's services); N.Y. State 885 (2011) (finding improper fee sharing where there appeared to be no relation between the funds to be received by the nonlawyer company and the value of the services performed and stating that the lawyer may not reduce fees as part of an arrangement to accept referrals from a nonlawyer who provides services to clients).

D. Payment For Referrals

40. Rule 7.2(a) prohibits a lawyer from compensating or giving anything of value to a person to recommend or obtain employment by a client or as a reward for having made a recommendation resulting in employment by a client. As we said in N.Y. State 942 (2012), "it would violate this rule if the inquirer would be giving something of value to [the nonlawyer] in exchange for client referrals." As long as hiring the FMA is not a condition (express or implied) of the referral, and the compensation to the FMA for the services does not exceed the reasonable value of its services, the lawyer does not appear to be paying a prohibited referral fee in violation of Rule 7.2(b). On the other hand, if the lawyer chooses to hire the FMA rather than another service provider that the lawyer believes would be better at performing the required tasks, then the choice of the FMA may reflect compensation for referring the client.

E. Supervision of Nonlawyers

41. As we noted above, the lawyer must ensure that the conduct of nonlawyers employed by or retained by the law firm is compatible with the professional obligations of the lawyer. See Rule 5.3, Comment [2].

42. Rule 5.3(b) provides that "A lawyer shall be responsible for conduct of a nonlawyer employed or retained by or associated with the lawyer" if the lawyer "orders or directs the specific conduct or with knowledge of the specific conduct, ratifies it." The immigration lawyer here is undoubtedly ordering the work and "ratifies" that work by incorporating it into the EB-5 visa application. Accordingly, the lawyer must supervise the work of the FMA and ensure that the work of the FMA is consistent with the lawyer's professional obligations to the client and that the lawyer – not the FMA – is controlling the representation.

F. Scope of Representation

43. The inquiry indicates that the FMA is referring the EB-5 client for the purposes of preparing the EB-5 investor's immigration application. Since the EB-5 investment is an integral part of the immigration application, we believe a reasonable client would expect that the lawyer will give advice on whether the proposed investment meets the EB-5 visa criteria. If there is any disagreement between the lawyer and the FMA in this regard, the lawyer must ensure that his or her advice is transmitted accurately to the client.

CONCLUSION:

44. A lawyer may enter into an arrangement with a nonlawyer foreign migration agent whereby the nonlawyer hires the lawyer on behalf of the client and assists the lawyer in communicating with the client, as well as gathering and translating documents that are required in connection with the representation, as long as (1) the relationship between the lawyer and the nonlawyer is not exclusive, (2) the nonlawyer does not interfere with the lawyer-client relationship, (3) the client consents to the potential conflict of interest resulting from the referral relationship between the lawyer and the foreign migration agent, and (4) the lawyer is not paying the foreign migration agent for referrals. The lawyer must bill the client separately for fees and expenses and must inform the client of the name and amount charged by the foreign migration agent for nonlegal services.

TOPIC: Conflict of interest; serving as lawyer and broker in same real estate transaction

DIGEST: A lawyer who receives a broker's commission in a real estate transaction may not also serve as the lawyer for the buyers, even if the buyers are long-time clients and friends and have requested both kinds of services

RULE: 1.7(a) & (b)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is an attorney and licensed real estate broker. A married couple, long-standing clients and friends of the inquirer, seek to buy real estate and have asked the inquirer to represent them as both broker and attorney in that real estate purchase.

2. The inquirer proposes to serve in both of those capacities in the real estate transaction. As broker, the inquirer would receive a brokerage commission from the seller (which we assume would be a percentage of the sale price of the real estate). As attorney, however, the inquirer would provide the requested legal services pro bono, because the buyers have limited resources.

QUESTION:

3. May a lawyer who is serving as a broker in a real estate transaction also provide pro bono legal services to the buyers in that transaction?

OPINION:

4. The general provisions on conflicts of interest are set forth in Rule 1.7 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"). A lawyer with a conflict of interest under Rule 1.7(a) may not represent a client unless the conflict is waivable and is properly waived by the client under Rule 1.7(b). One kind of conflict, a "personal interest" conflict, arises when a reasonable lawyer would conclude that "there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests." Rule 1.7(a)(2).

5. Such personal interest conflicts are generally present when a lawyer provides brokerage services as well as legal services in the same real estate transaction. We have opined on numerous occasions that a lawyer may not act as an attorney on behalf of any party to a real estate transaction in which the lawyer is also acting as a broker. See, e.g. N.Y. State 1013 ¶ 1 (2014); N.Y. State 933 ¶ 7 (2012); N.Y. State 919 ¶ 3 (2012). In N.Y. State 753 (2002), we explained our reasoning:

The rationale for these opinions is that a lawyer should not have a personal stake in the advice rendered, and a broker who is paid only if the transaction closes cannot be fully independent in advising the client as a lawyer.

See also N.Y. State 1015 (2014) (quoting N.Y. State 753 and citing later opinions).

6. Moreover, while many conflicts may be waived by the client, that is not the case when a lawyer serves as both broker and attorney. "[T]he personal interest of a lawyer-real estate broker in the brokerage fee that will be generated by a closing of a real estate transaction so conflicts with the lawyer's responsibility to provide independent legal judgment with respect to that transaction as to preclude the dual roles and to make the conflict non-consentable by the client." N.Y. State 933 ¶7 (2012).

7. This per se rule that serving as both broker and attorney in a real estate transaction creates a non-consentable conflict does not apply in certain situations involving non-standard arrangements for broker compensation. For example, the per se rule does not apply when the broker is to be compensated by a flat fee not dependent on the closing of the transaction,[1] or when the broker credits the full amount of the brokerage commission to the client.[2] But here, as we understand the inquiry, the broker compensation would be the usual kind of commission and would be retained by the inquirer. Accordingly, this matter is subject to our longstanding per se rule, and the conflict is non-consentable.

8. The fact that the inquirer would provide the legal services pro bono does not change this conclusion. See N.Y. State 916 (2012) ("A lawyer may not offer free legal services as an add-on bonus to a party to a real estate transaction in which the lawyer is acting as broker"). Indeed, underlying the per se rule is the materiality of a standard brokerage commission. See N.Y. State 1015 ¶7 (2014) ("The risk that legal judgment would be adversely affected is heightened by the common circumstance that the broker's contingent fee will be substantially greater than the fee of the lawyer representing the seller."). When the amount of the legal fee is zero, the relative importance of the brokerage fee becomes even greater, and so does the risk it poses to the lawyer's independent legal judgment, because the only way the lawyer can make money in this scenario is to close the real estate transaction and obtain the broker's commission.

9. Seeking to avoid application of the per se rule discussed above, the inquirer asserts certain distinctions from the facts of our prior opinions. The inquirer points out that the provision of both kinds of services would result from a request by the clients, who are long-time clients and friends of the inquirer, rather than from the attorney's suggestion. The inquirer also notes that the brokerage commission would be paid by the seller and would result in no financial burden to the inquirer's clients.

10. We do not think that these distinctions change the result. The lawyer's interest in the commission is the same no matter who suggested the provision of brokerage services and no matter who pays that commission. The fact that the broker's commission will be paid by the seller rather than by the lawyer's client (the buyer) does not diminish the risk of an adverse impact on the lawyer's independent professional judgment. A large commission is a large commission.

1 The per se rule of a nonconsentable conflict applies whenever the brokerage services are compensated in the usual way, as a commission contingent on the transaction being closed. We have also considered the context of an alternative fee arrangement in which when brokerage services are compensated by a fixed and non-refundable fee, not contingent on closing. We found that such a fee arrangement did not give rise to a conflict, and while there could be other foreseeable conflicts in such a situation, those other conflicts could be subject to waiver by informed consent. N.Y. State 1015 ¶¶ 8-10 (2014).

2 When a lawyer who is also acting as a real estate broker remits or credits the entire brokerage fee to the client, then the brokerage fee typically would not give rise to the kind of personal-interest conflict described above. See N.Y. State 845 part C (2010) (a lawyer who will be compensated as a broker may share part of her brokerage commission with a referring lawyer who represents a buyer or seller in the transaction if the referring lawyer remits or credits the referral fee to the client).

11. In N.Y. State 1043 (2015), we rejected the argument that the benefit to the client from receiving free legal services eliminates the conflict. There, the inquirer represented an estate in the sale of real property through a real estate broker the lawyer had recommended to the executors. The broker later offered to pay the lawyer a referral fee (25% of the broker's commission), which the lawyer proposed to accept in lieu of charging legal fees to the estate for services rendered in the real estate transaction. We disapproved, saying:

> The disabling conflict that [our prior] opinions identify is a lawyer's pecuniary interest in the broker's . . . commission . . . which irredeemably interferes with the lawyer's distinct obligation to exercise independent professional judgment on the client's behalf. That the estate beneficiaries may benefit from the arrangement does not remedy this circumstance, any more than a lawyer/broker's waiving a legal fee, which is also of benefit to the client, can do so.

12. Conceivably the friendship between the lawyer and the clients could be so strong as to serve as an adequate counterweight to the lawyer's interest in the commission, but the test in the Rules does not turn on so subjective an assessment. Rather, it turns on these objective standards: whether "a reasonable lawyer" would find a significant risk that personal interests would compromise professional judgment, and whether the actual lawyer "reasonably" believes there will be competent and diligent representation. We continue to believe that application of these objective standards supports the per se rule set forth in our prior opinions that renders a conflict such as this one non-consentable.

CONCLUSION:

13. In a real estate transaction, even when a lawyer provides pro bono legal services at the request of clients who have long been clients and friends of the lawyer, the lawyer may not also serve in that transaction as a broker compensated by commission. The conflict cannot be cured by the client's consent because it is non-consentable.

TOPIC: Confidential information; disclosure to collect a fee

DIGEST: A lawyer may disclose confidential information reasonably necessary to collect a fee, but must take all reasonable measures to limit the disclosure to information that is objectively necessary for that purpose.

RULES: 1.6(a) & (b)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer represented a client in a court action that ended in a settlement before trial. Shortly before the settlement, the client advised the lawyer of certain facts that, if disclosed, would be detrimental or embarrassing to the client. The settlement was ultimately disbursed to successor counsel, and a litigated fee dispute arose among the client, the inquirer and other lawyers who had been engaged on the matter. In connection with the fee dispute, the inquirer believes that disclosure of some of confidential information may be necessary to show the work he did in order to support a quantum meruit recovery.

QUESTION:

2. May a lawyer disclose confidential information reflected in time sheets by providing the time sheets to support a quantum meruit recovery?

OPINION:

3. Rule 1.6(a) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") imposes a general duty on a lawyer not to knowingly reveal confidential information or use such information to the disadvantage of a client or for the advantage of the lawyer, but Rule 1.6(b) provides several exceptions to that general duty. Rule 1.6(b)(5)(ii) provides: "A lawyer may reveal or use confidential information to the extent that the lawyer reasonably believes necessary . . . to establish or collect a fee . . . ."

4. Comment [14] to Rule 1.6 emphasizes that "a disclosure adverse to the client's interest should be no greater than the lawyer reasonably believes necessary to accomplish the purpose." Initially, the lawyer must determine how much disclosure the lawyer believes "necessary" to collect the fee, but the lawyer's determination must be reasonable. Rule 1.0(r) specifies that a lawyer "reasonably believes" something when "the lawyer believes the matter in question and . . . the circumstances are such that the belief is reasonable." While Comment [6A] to Rule 1.6 notes that the lawyer's "exercise of discretion" conferred by other exceptions in Rule 1.6(b)[1] "requires consideration of a wide range of factors and therefore should be given great weight," the Comments contain no such exhortation to defer to the lawyer's judgment in the case of disclosures to collect a fee. Recognizing the lawyer's self-interest in collecting the fee, and the potential of threatened disclosure as a bludgeon to coerce payment, the lawyer should be particularly careful to ensure that disclosure is truly "necessary" – and objectively so – to collecting the fee. See also In re Starbrite Properties Corp., 2012 WL 2050745, at *11 (E.D.N.Y. Bankr. June 5, 2012) (court referred to Disciplinary Committee a lawyer who unnecessarily disclosed client's fraudulent conduct in seeking to enforce a subpoena to support application for fee that client had refused to pay); In re Gonzalez, 773 A.2d 1026 (D.C. 2001) (lawyer admonished for disclosing, in connection with withdrawal motion, not only that fees were owed but also extraneous and embarrassing client information).

1 Comment [6A] refers to the lawyer's exercise of discretion under subparagraphs (1) to (3) of Rule 1.6(b), which deal with disclosures to prevent bodily harm or to prevent the commission of a crime or potential injury to third persons arising out of a lawyer's prior representations.

5. In N.Y. State 980 (2013), we noted that "[t]he Rules do not define 'necessary,' but WEBSTER'S UNABRIDGED DICTIONARY at 1200 (2nd ed. 1983) says that the word means 'unavoidable, essential, indispensable, needful.'" N.Y. State 980 n.1. In that opinion, which addressed the disclosure of confidential information to collect a fee in a bankruptcy proceeding, we distilled several principles that are helpful in making that determination:

> First, a lawyer should not resort to disclosure to collect a fee except in appropriate circumstances. Second, the lawyer should try to avoid the need for disclosure. Third, disclosure must be truly necessary as part of some appropriate and not abusive process to collect the fee. Fourth, disclosure may not be broader in scope or manner than the need that justifies it, and the lawyer should consider possible means to limit damage to the client.

N.Y. State 980 ¶ 6.[1]

6. Applying these principles here, the inquirer should take all reasonable measures to limit the disclosure of confidential information to information that is objectively needed to prove entitlement to the fee (assuming that the claim to the fee is also objectively reasonable). For example, it may be that the fact that work was done at a particular time could be shown by revealing only redacted time entries or redacted communications with the client. If disclosure to the Court would not itself be harmful to the client, or would be less harmful, the inquirer should consider approaching the Court for guidance.[2] See, e.g., ABA Formal Op. 476 (2016) (noting availability of redaction and in camera submission to preserve confidentiality of information in making motion to withdraw for nonpayment of fees) (citing In re Gonzalez, 773 A.2d at 1032).

1 N.Y. State 980 ¶ 9 also cautioned that the attorney should consider whether the information from the client was not only confidential under the rules of ethics, but also subject to the attorney-client privilege. We do not opine on the rules of privilege, but Opinion 980 noted authority for the proposition that an exception to the privilege may apply to information reasonably necessary to collect a fee. Id. n.8, citing Alexander, CPLR §4503 PRACTICE COMMENTARIES, C4503:5(b) (McKinney) (discussing, as an exception to the privilege, "the rule that permits a lawyer to reveal confidences in order to collect a fee from the client"), and RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF THE LAW GOVERNING LAWYERS §83(1) (2000) ("attorney-client privilege does not apply to a communication that is relevant and reasonably necessary for a lawyer to employ in a proceeding . . . to resolve a dispute with a client concerning compensation or reimbursement that the lawyer reasonably claims the client owes the lawyer").

2 Comment [14] to Rule 1.6 advises:

> If the disclosure will be made in connection with an adjudicative proceeding, the disclosure should be made in a manner that limits access to the information to the tribunal or other persons having a need to know the information, and appropriate protective orders or other arrangements should be sought by the lawyer to the fullest extent practicable.

If the Court should affirmatively order disclosure, the inquirer would be permitted under Rule 1.6(b)(6) to disclose the confidential information to the extent necessary to comply with the Court's order.

CONCLUSION:

7. The inquirer may disclose confidential information reasonably necessary to collect a fee, but must take all reasonable measures, such as redaction or seeking Court guidance, to limit the disclosure of confidential information to information that is objectively reasonable to prove his entitlement to his fee.

TOPIC: Former partner or associate of district attorney; criminal law; conflict of interest

DIGEST: A lawyer who is a former associate of the newly elected district attorney may represent criminal clients being prosecuted by the district attorney, provided that (i) the district attorney has severed all ties with the firm and (ii) a reasonable lawyer would not conclude that there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the clients will be adversely affected by the lawyer's former relationship with the district attorney (or the lawyer's personal interest conflict is consentable and the client has consented, confirmed in writing).

RULES: 1.0(e), 1.7(a) & (b), 1.11(d), 8.3

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is an attorney who works in the law firm where the newly elected district attorney of the county was once a partner. The inquirer seeks to represent defendants in criminal matters in the county.

2. The office of district attorney is a full-time position and the district attorney no longer works at the firm.

QUESTION:

3. May a lawyer who practices in the law firm where the newly elected district attorney of the county was formerly a partner represent defendants in criminal matters in that county?

OPINION:

4. The New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") regulate the conduct of the inquirer as well as the district attorney. We answer questions only if they concern the conduct of the inquirer and do not give opinions about the conduct of third parties such as the district attorney here. Nevertheless, in representing defendants in criminal matters, the inquirer should be familiar with the rules applicable to the prosecutor.

Rules Governing the Inquirer's Conduct

5. Rule 1.7(a)(2) prohibits a lawyer from representing a client if "a reasonable lawyer would conclude that . . . there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's . . . personal interests", unless, under Rule 1.7(b), the conflict is consentable and the lawyer has obtained client consent, confirmed in writing. Thus, the inquirer must determine whether a reasonable lawyer would conclude that the inquirer's personal relationship with the district attorney (by virtue of being a former associate of the district attorney) would adversely affect the representation of clients in criminal matters for which the district attorney's office is responsible.

6. If the inquirer reasonably believes that a reasonable lawyer would not reach such a conclusion, then there is no conflict under Rule 1.7 and the inquirer may proceed without seeking consent from any client. If the inquirer believes that a reasonable lawyer would conclude that the inquirer's prior personal relationship with the district attorney creates a "significant risk" that the inquirer's professional judgment on behalf of a criminal defendant in the county where the former partner is now the district attorney will be adversely affected, then a conflict exists under Rule 1.7(a)(2).

7. If a conflict exists under Rule 1.7(a)(2), then the inquirer make not undertake the representation unless the inquirer determines, under Rule 1.7(b)(1), that the conflict is consentable, because:

> (1) the lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client; [and]
> (2) the representation is not prohibited by law.

8. If the inquirer determines that the conflict is consentable, then the inquirer may proceed with the representation, as long as the inquirer obtains the consent of each affected client and the consent is "confirmed in writing" within the meaning of Rule 1.0(e).

Rules Governing the District Attorney's Conduct

9. Rule 1.11(d)(1) addresses the conduct of the district attorney as a public official. It provides:

> Except as law may otherwise expressly provide, a lawyer currently serving as a public officer or employee shall not . . . participate in a matter in which the lawyer participated personally and substantially while in private practice or nongovernmental employment, unless under applicable law no one is, or by lawful delegation may be, authorized to act in the lawyer's stead in the matter . . . .

10. If the inquirer knows that the district attorney participated personally and substantially in a matter while in private practice, the inquirer may wish to explore the provisions of applicable law and may have an obligation or discretion under the Rules to report such knowledge to the tribunal. See Rule 8.3(a). However, since the inquiry does not state that the newly elected district attorney, while at the firm, was involved in any of the matters on which the inquirer proposes to work, we assume that the matters that are the subject of this inquiry do not include any matters on which the district attorney "participated personally and substantially" while at the firm. See N.Y. State 638 (1992) (proper for newly elected district attorney to prosecute a client of the prosecutor's former law firm in the same case if the prosecutor had no personal and substantial participation in the firm's representation and did not otherwise obtain confidential client information relevant to the matter; whether the district attorney's staff is disqualified depends upon application of the rule of necessity and on the source of the district attorney's disqualification).

11. This inquiry is distinguishable from our prior opinions concerning part-time government lawyers with prosecutorial responsibility, which are based on the rules against representing differing interests in governmental and private practice (currently found in Rule 1.7(a)). We have consistently held that a part-time prosecutor who is also engaged in private practice is barred from representing defendants in criminal matters anywhere in New York State. See, e.g., N.Y. State 1073 (2015), N.Y.

State 859 (2011); N.Y. State 544 (1982). We also have extended that disqualification to a partner or associate of the part-time prosecutor. See N.Y. State 859 (2011), N.Y. State 40 (1966) (applying the former Canons). But those opinions do not apply here because the district attorney here is not part-time and has severed all ties with the inquirer's law firm.

CONCLUSION:

12. A lawyer may represent criminal defense clients being prosecuted by the district attorney who was once a partner at the lawyer's firm, provided that the district attorney has severed all ties with the firm and that a reasonable lawyer would not conclude there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the clients will be adversely affected by the former relationship with the district attorney (or the lawyer's personal interest conflict is consentable and the client has consented, confirmed in writing).

TOPIC: Reporting Misconduct

DIGEST: If a lawyer for a government agency knows of a violation of the Rules by another agency lawyer, and the wrongdoer's conduct raises a substantial question as to the wrongdoer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness to practice law, the government lawyer must report the information to a tribunal or other authority authorized to investigate and act on the conduct, unless the information constitutes confidential client information, and the agency does not consent to its disclosure. If a report to a tribunal or other authority is required, the lawyer must determine if the government agency's ethics office is a "tribunal" or "other authority empowered to investigate or act upon such violation." If the ethics office is not a tribunal or such other authority, the government lawyer may report initially to the ethics office of the government agency, but the lawyer may not defer to a decision by the ethics office not to report unless the reporting obligation involves an "arguable question of professional duty" and the decision of the ethics office not to report is a reasonable resolution.

RULES: 1.0(w), 1.6, 5.2, 8.3(a) & (b)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer represents a government agency (the "Agency") in federal administrative and court proceedings. The inquirer has come to know of a violation of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") by another lawyer at the Agency that the inquirer believes raises a substantial question as to the other lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness as a lawyer.

2. The Agency has an internal process by which violations of the Rules must be reported first to an internal ethics office for review. The inquirer reported the facts to the internal ethics office but, although a reasonable period of time has elapsed, the internal ethics office has not responded to the inquirer's inquiries as to the status of its review of the report.

QUESTION:

3. If a lawyer for a government agency reports misconduct by another agency lawyer that meets the reporting requirements of Rule 8.3(a) to an internal ethics office of the lawyer's employer, has the lawyer satisfied the requirements of Rule 8.3(a)?

OPINION:

4. Rule 8.3(a) provides:

> (a) A lawyer who knows that another lawyer has committed a violation of the Rules of Professional Conduct that raises a substantial question as to that lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness as a lawyer shall report such knowledge to a tribunal or other authority empowered to investigate or act upon such violation.

However, under Rule 8.3(c), this reporting obligation does not require the disclosure of "confidential information" otherwise protected by Rule 1.6, i.e., information gained from any source during or relating to the representation of a client (a) that is protected by the attorney-client privilege, (b) that is likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed, or (c) that the client has requested to be kept confidential.

5. Thus, in determining whether the inquirer has a reporting obligation under Rule 8.3, the following elements must be satisfied:

(i) There must be a violation of the Rules by the wrongdoer,

(ii) The inquirer must know of the violation,[1]

(iii) The wrongdoer's conduct must raise a substantial question as to that lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness to practice law, and

(iv) Disclosure of the wrongdoer's conduct must not reveal client confidential information, unless the client consents to such disclosure.

6. Here, the inquirer advises that the first three elements have been satisfied. That leaves the fourth element, which raises two issues: (1) whether the facts known by the inquirer constitute confidential information of the client, and, if not (2) whether the inquirer's report to the government agency's internal ethics office satisfies the requirement of the Rule that the lawyer report knowledge of another lawyer's misconduct to a "tribunal or other authority empowered to investigate or act upon such violation."

Client Confidential Information

7. Our opinions make clear that a lawyer's obligation to report misconduct is limited by the lawyer's obligation to protect client confidential information, unless the lawyer has obtained the informed consent of the client to disclosure of otherwise confidential information. See, e.g., N.Y. State 649 (1993) (where one lawyer knows that another lawyer who is executor for an estate proposes to engage or has engaged in wrongdoing, whether the first lawyer must disclose the wrongdoing depends on whether the information is legally privileged or whether applicable law requires disclosure of an otherwise protected "secret"), N.Y. State 635 (1992) (before reporting misconduct, lawyer must consider whether any knowledge that would be included in the report is a client confidence or secret). See also N.Y. City 2017-2 (reporting duty is limited by the lawyer's duty not to reveal client confidences without the client's informed consent after full disclosure, including disclosure that, once a report of misconduct is made to the disciplinary agency, the disciplinary agency may unilaterally decide to release the client's information without the client's knowledge or further consent).

8. Under Rule 1.6, information constitutes "confidential information" of the client if it was gained from any source (whether from the client or elsewhere) during or relating to the representation of the client and (a) the information is protected by the attorney-client privilege, (b) it is likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed, or (c) the client has requested that it be kept confidential. Here, the client is the Agency. If disclosure of the wrongdoing would be embarrassing or detrimental to the Agency, or if the Agency has requested that the information not be disclosed, then there is an apparent tension between the goals of Rule 1.6 and 8.3: (1) the obligation of all lawyers to assist courts and disciplinary authorities in policing members of the bar, and (2) the obligation to maintain the confidentiality of client information. In addition, government lawyers (such as the inquirer here) also have a duty to seek justice. See Rule 3.8, Cmt. [6B]. However, since Rule 8.3 specifically exempts information protected as confidential, the Rules themselves resolve the tension in favor of confidentiality. See Rule 1.6, Cmt. [2] ("A fundamental principle in the client-lawyer relationship is that, in the absence of the client's informed consent, or except as permitted or required by these Rules, the lawyer must not knowingly reveal information gained during and related to the representation, whatever its source. . . . The lawyer's duty of confidentiality contributes to the trust that is the hallmark of the client-lawyer relationship.").

9. The definition of "confidential information" allows the client to ask the lawyer to treat information as "confidential information" for any reason. However, it is not always clear in an organizational context who speaks for the client. Here, the inquirer must determine whether the ethics office has the authority to speak for the client in asking that the information be kept confidential. If the ethics office does have that authority, that determination will be binding on the inquirer. While the Agency is not required to provide the inquirer with reasons for a determination that its information should be treated as "confidential information," there are many benign reasons why the Agency might do so, at least at this point. For example, the information may be protected by law as private information; or the Agency may have referred the matter to a prosecutor, whose investigation is confidential and protected by law.

Tribunal or Other Authority Empowered to Investigate or Act on Violations

10. Under Rule 8.3(a), if a report of misconduct is required, it must be made to a tribunal or to "other authority empowered to investigate or act upon such violation."

11. The term "tribunal" is defined in Rule 1.0(w) as follows:

> (w) "Tribunal" denotes a court, an arbitrator in an arbitration proceeding or a legislative body, administrative agency or other body acting in an adjudicative capacity. A legislative body, administrative agency or other body acts in an adjudicative capacity when a neutral official, after the presentation of evidence or legal argument by a party or parties, will render a legal judgment directly affecting a party's interests in a particular matter. [Emphasis added.]

The Agency here may act in an adjudicative capacity when determining litigated matters before the Agency. That would probably be the case, for example, if an administrative law judge or similar "neutral" quasi-judicial officer in the Agency hears a matter. If so, then a report to the administrative law judge about a lawyer for a party would satisfy Rule 8.3's requirement to report to a "tribunal." However, the inquiry here does not state that the Agency's ethics office meets the definition of a tribunal, and it seems more likely that it does not constitute a tribunal within the meaning of Rule 1.0(w). However, this is a factual question that the inquirer must determine.

12. In N.Y. State 822 (2008), we discussed what might constitute "other authority" to which a report might be made, in the context of DR 1-103(A), the predecessor to Rule 8.3(a). We noted that the phrase "investigate or act" in that disciplinary rule suggested that the tribunal or authority must be a court of competent jurisdiction or a body having enforceable subpoena powers. This would include a grievance or disciplinary committee operating under the powers granted by the Appellate Division of the State Supreme Court under Section 90 of the New York Judiciary Law and related court rules. We therefore said the report could be filed with the grievance committee in the Appellate Department in which litigation is pending or with the grievance committee in the Department where the wrongdoer is admitted or where the prohibited conduct occurred. See also Nassau County 98-12 (if reporting is required, the lawyer may report to the court or to a grievance committee); N.Y. City 1995-5 (a lawyer should report misconduct to the appropriate disciplinary or grievance committee).

13. Here, as with the question whether the Agency's internal ethics office is a tribunal, the question whether the Agency's ethics office qualifies as "other authority empowered to investigate or act upon" a violation of the Rules is a factual question that the inquirer must determine.

Timing of Report

14. If a report under Rule 8.3 is required, the Rule does not specify the timing of the required report. In N.Y. State 822 (2008), we said: "The report need not be made immediately or without some reasonable effort at remediation, particularly where the consequences of reporting the violation may be more harmful to the lawyer's client than some alternative course of action." See U.S. v. Cantor, 897 F. Supp. 110 (S.D.N.Y. 1995) ("DR 1-103 must be read to require reporting . . . within a reasonable time under the circumstances"); N.Y. City 1990-3 ("While it may be permissible in certain limited circumstances to postpone reporting for a brief period of time, we reiterate our caution that 'once a lawyer decides that he or she must disclose under DR 1-103(A), any substantial delay in reporting would be improper'"). Evaluation of the timing of a required report will entail considering the facts and circumstances of the underlying misconduct, whether there is ongoing harm to any affected person, and whether the misconduct can be remedied or mitigated, among other factors.

15. Thus, we believe that the inquirer's initial reporting to the ethics office is consistent with Rule 8.3. However, making a report to the internal ethics office does not automatically relieve the inquirer of the responsibility for making the report required by Rule 8.3 or ensuring that the Agency's ethics office makes such a report when the requirements of the Rules are met.

16. Rule 5.2(b) provides that a subordinate lawyer "does not violate these Rules if that lawyer acts in accordance with a supervisory lawyer's reasonable resolution of an arguable question of professional duty." The inquirer believes that a violation of the Rules that meets the requirements of Rule 8.3(a) has occurred, and the Agency apparently has not stated that the facts surrounding the wrongdoer's conduct constitute confidential information. Nevertheless, it is possible that the ethics office, after investigation, may conclude that the wrongdoer's conduct need not be reported to a tribunal or other authority, or may decide that the information necessary to make a report is "confidential information" within the meaning of Rule 1.6(a). In order for the inquirer to rely on the decision of the Agency's ethics office in matters of professional responsibility, the question of a duty to report must be "arguable" and the resolution by the ethics office not to report must be "reasonable."

CONCLUSION:

17. If a lawyer for a government agency knows of a violation of the Rules by another agency lawyer, and the wrongdoer's conduct raises a substantial question as to the wrongdoer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness to practice law, the government lawyer must report the information to a tribunal or other authority authorized to investigate and act on the conduct, unless the information constitutes confidential client information, and the agency does not consent to its disclosure. If a report to a tribunal or other authority is required, the lawyer must determine if the government agency's ethics office is a "tribunal" or "other authority empowered to investigate or act upon such violation." If the ethics office is not a tribunal or such other authority, the government lawyer may report initially to the ethics office of the government agency, but the lawyer may not defer to a decision by the ethics office not to report unless the reporting obligation involves an "arguable question of professional duty" and the decision of the ethics office is a reasonable resolution.

TOPIC: Fee sharing between lawyers and nonlawyers; aiding the unauthorized practice of law

DIGEST: Where an insurance carrier has paid a claimant corporation's attorney fees in an arbitration directly to the company's in-house counsel as attorney of record, and where the company is entitled to recover reasonable attorney fees under relevant New York law, the in-house counsel may remit the attorney fees to the company without violating the rule against fee-sharing.

RULES: 5.4(a), 5.5(b)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is in-house counsel to XYZ Corporation ("XYZ"), an equipment manufacturer that provides medical equipment to individuals through prescribing physicians. The physicians typically file a claim with the patient's insurance company, seeking payment to XYZ for the cost of the prescribed equipment under provisions of New York's no-fault insurance law and the applicable regulations thereunder. The insurance company either approves the claim and pays XYZ for the prescribed equipment, or preliminarily denies the claim, in which event XYZ contests the denial at an arbitration.

2. The inquirer, an in-house lawyer at XYZ, handles general corporate matters on behalf of XYZ and also litigates arbitrations regarding denied insurance claims on behalf of XYZ. XYZ wants its in-house counsel to represent it at more of these arbitrations instead of engaging outside counsel. XYZ's in-house counsel perform no legal work on behalf of third parties. They receive a salary and do not receive any bonus or other amount relating to the volume or value of successful arbitration awards.

3. If a claimant such as XYZ recovers money as a result of an arbitration, settlement or award after litigation, the amount is paid in a bifurcated remittance: (1) principal and interest on the medical equipment cost denied incorrectly by the insurance company is paid to XYZ; and (2) attorney fees and, where applicable, reimbursement of the arbitration filing fee is paid to XYZ's counsel of record. The insurance company draws from no-fault funded accounts to pay the principal and interest, and from a separate account to cover attorney fees. The inquirer states that insurance companies generally require the attorney fee award be issued to the attorney of record, and will not pay the attorney fee portion directly to the applicant, XYZ company.

QUESTIONS:

4. A. May in-house counsel for XYZ remit the entire attorney fee portion of the arbitration award to the claimant, XYZ, or would such a remittal constitute fee-sharing?

   B. Would a remittal of attorney fees to XYZ constitute aiding a nonlawyer (XYZ) in the unauthorized practice of law?

OPINION:

Remitting Legal Fees to the Client

5. Rule 5.4(a) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") prohibits a lawyer from sharing legal fees with a nonlawyer, except under certain circumstances that are not applicable here involving deceased lawyers and retirement plans.

6. It is our understanding that, as a condition to providing medical equipment to an individual, XYZ requires the individual to assign to XYZ his or her claim against the insurance company by way of subrogation. Thus, XYZ is the owner of the claim against the insurance company and is the appropriate "party" to the claim against the insurance company.

7. This Committee has interpreted the applicability of the fee-sharing prohibition in Rule 5.4(a) in several inquiries involving remitting attorney fees to a nonlawyer client or employer. In N.Y. State 1096 (2016), we concluded that an outside lawyer could permit a non-lawyer client to keep some or all of the statutory attorney's fees awarded in a civil rights lawsuit, because the statutory fees were awarded to the "prevailing party" rather than to the lawyer and therefore did not fall within the prohibition against sharing legal fees with a nonlawyer. We observed that a lawyer's decision to decline or waive the right to some or all of the statutory fees awarded directly to a client was not the type of fee-sharing encompassed in Rule 5.4(a). The analysis in Opinion 1096 turned in large part on the fact that the statutory attorney fee award was to the "prevailing party," and thus to the client rather than directly to the lawyer. See N.Y. State 1096 ¶7 (citing various New York State fee-shifting statutes). Thus, if the client gave any part of the fee award to the lawyer, the client would be sharing attorney fees with the lawyer, rather than the other way around.

8. In N.Y. State 906 (2012), this Committee addressed whether an in-house lawyer employed by a not-for-profit organization that was not a law firm could share legal fees with the not-for-profit. We noted that New York did not adopt ABA Model Rule 5.4(a)(4), which expressly permits a lawyer to share court-awarded attorney fees with non-profit public interest organizations where the lawyer has prevailed in a litigated matter on behalf of the organization, and we therefore concluded that sharing fees with a not-for-profit is prohibited under New York's Rule 5.4(a). In distinguishing Opinion 906, N.Y. State 1096 (2016) explained that, in Opinion 906, the inquirer was a lawyer employed by a not-for-profit organization that was representing third parties, such as civil rights plaintiffs, and not representing the not-for-profit organization itself. Thus, in Opinion 906, the inquirer proposed to share fees not with the client who had won fees for itself (as in Opinion 1096), but rather with a not-for-profit organization that had sponsored the litigation on behalf of a prevailing third party.

9. The facts in this inquiry are distinguishable from those in both Opinion 1096 and Opinion 906. Here, the inquiring lawyer is an in-house counsel employed by the prevailing plaintiff (unlike the outside lawyer in Opinion 1096), and in-house counsel litigates the claim on behalf of the for-profit employer and not on behalf of third parties (unlike the staff lawyers employed by the non-profit representing prevailing third parties in Opinion 906). In addition, settlements and arbitral awards are bifurcated into a remittance of the principal and interest on the medical equipment claim to XYZ, and a separate remittance of attorney fees to the attorney of record in the proceeding. However, the statute authorizing the attorney fee award here convinces us that the analysis in Opinion 1096, not Opinion 906, applies to this inquiry.

10. New York insurance law provides that, where the claimant proves a valid claim, "the claimant shall also be entitled to recover his attorney's reasonable fee for services necessarily performed in connection with securing payment of the overdue claim . . . ." N.Y. Ins. Law §5106: Fair Claims of Settlement (emphasis added).[1] Although the inquirer states that the arbitration panel remits payment of principal and interest to XYZ when XYZ recovers on its claims, and a separate attorney's fee check to the attorney of record, the statute provides that the claimant is "entitled" to the attorney fee award – not the attorney. Similarly, the rules of the AAA for New York no-fault claims governing the form and scope of the award (which may apply here) separately designate the portion reimbursable to the claimant for the filing fee, reasonable attorney's fees, and interest on the claim. Thus the claimant is entitled to payment of all components of the award, including the attorney fees, notwithstanding that the check for attorney fees is made out to the attorney of record. Because the claimant is entitled to the attorney fees under both New York Insurance Law and AAA rule, we conclude that in-house counsel may sign over to XYZ the attorney fee portion of the award without violating Rule 5.4(a)'s prohibition on fee-sharing.

Aiding in Unauthorized Practice of Law

11. The inquirer also asks if turning over the attorney fee awards here would aid a nonlawyer in the unauthorized practice of law. Rule 5.5(b) prohibits a lawyer from aiding a nonlawyer in the unauthorized practice of law. Section 495 of the New York Judiciary Law generally prohibits a corporation from practicing or appearing as an attorney-at-law for any person, soliciting any claim, or taking an assignment of a claim for the purpose of representing any person in the pursuit of a civil remedy.

12. Whether particular activity constitutes the unauthorized practice of law is a legal question that is beyond the jurisdiction of this Committee. However, the inquirer may wish to consider two exceptions to the prohibitions of Judiciary Law §495 that may apply here. First, Section 495(2) allows a moneyed corporation authorized to do business in New York to receive an assignment of a claim under a subrogation agreement. Second, Section 495(5) allows a corporation to employ attorneys in its own immediate affairs or in any litigation to which it is a party.

CONCLUSION:

13. Where an insurance carrier has paid a claimant corporation's attorney fees in an arbitration directly to the company's in-house counsel as attorney of record, and where the company is entitled to recover reasonable attorney fees under relevant New York law, the in-house counsel may remit the attorney fees to the company without violating the rule against fee-sharing.

TOPIC: Personal conflict of interest

DIGEST: A lawyer who serves as a foster parent may maintain a practice as an Attorney for Children and as the representative of other persons in proceedings in the Family Court of the same county. But if a reasonable lawyer would conclude, in relation to any given client, that a significant risk exists that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will be adversely affected by his or her personal interest as a foster parent, the lawyer may not represent the affected client unless the lawyer reasonably believes that he or she can provide competent and diligent representation and the affected client gives informed consent confirmed in writing.

RULES: 1.7(a) & (b)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer, a family law practitioner, is considering serving as a foster parent under various provisions of the Family Court Act and the Social Services Law. The inquirer practices in the same county where she resides (and where she would serve as a foster parent).

2. The county commissioner of social services, as head of the county department of social services, or his or her delegate (collectively, the Commissioner) appears on behalf of the county in many of the family law actions in the inquirer's practice, including proceedings under Article 10 (Child Protective Proceedings) and Article 10-A (Permanency Hearings for Children Placed Out of Their Homes) of the Family Court Act. Consequently, both the Commissioner and the inquirer appear on behalf of their respective clients in all Article 10 and 10-A proceedings concerning children for whom inquirer has been named attorney.

3. The county also acts as the foster care agency. The Commissioner, as legal custodian of children who have been removed from their family home, has broad and continuing responsibility for the welfare of those children and, consequently, an active role with respect to the recruitment, training and licensure of foster parents, their selection and appointment as such by the court, oversight and compensation of the foster home, and termination of the foster relationship in favor of another or the conversion of the relationship to a permanency proceeding, among other duties.

QUESTION:

4. May a lawyer (i) maintain a practice as an Attorney for Children (f/k/a a Law Guardian) and as a representative of other parties in proceedings under Articles 10 and 10-A of the Family Court Act and (ii) concurrently serve as a foster parent in a jurisdiction in which the county department of social services acts as the foster care agency?

OPINION:

5. As Attorney for a Child, the inquirer's duty is to exercise professional judgment solely in the best interests of the child, both as a matter of ethics, see Rule 1.7 and Comment [1] thereto, and as a matter of law, see, e.g., Family Court Act §§1016, 1033-b.) As a would-be foster parent, as a current foster parent, or as a current foster parent desirous of becoming the adoptive parent of a foster child, inquirer has a personal interest in preserving and strengthening the foster relationship and in satisfying the Commissioner.

6. Rule 1.7(a)(2) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") provides that, without the consent of the client, a lawyer may not represent a client (or, if the risk becomes apparent only after the representation has been commenced, continue the representation, if:

> a reasonable lawyer would conclude that . . . there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property, or other personal interests.

7. Often, the inquirer's role as a foster parent will have no effect on her professional judgment on behalf of clients in her role as an Attorney for Children (or other parties to Family Court proceedings). However, from time to time, the dual roles may raise potential conflicts of interest. Although both the inquirer and the Commissioner must act in the best interests of the child in proceedings under the Family Court Act, at times, their professional interests or their views of the child's best interests may differ. In addition, there may be circumstances where the interests of the inquirer as Attorney for a Child and the inquirer's personal interests might differ. For example, such a circumstance might occur if the social worker overseeing inquirer's foster care were to testify in another proceeding adversely to inquirer's client in that other proceeding, thereby requiring inquirer to cross examine (or to forbear from cross examining) the social worker. See N.Y. State 790 (2005).

8. The Committee believes that, in many instances, a reasonable lawyer would deem the conflict between the inquirer's personal interests as a foster parent and her professional responsibility to a client in Article 10 and Article 10-A proceedings to be theoretical and remote and unlikely to affect the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the child (or another client) for which she is attorney. If there is "no significant risk" of an adverse effect, objectively determined, an attorney who is a foster parent may undertake and continue representations of children and adults in Article 10 and Article 10-A proceedings without the need to obtain informed client consent. See N.Y. State 790 (2005).

9. If, to the contrary, a reasonable lawyer would conclude there is a significant risk that the inquirer's professional judgment on behalf of any client will be affected by her interests as a foster parent, the inquirer would be required either to decline or to withdraw from representation of the client or, where permissible, seek client consent to the representation notwithstanding the conflict.

10. While the issue of whether an individual, adult or minor, has the capacity to give the necessary informed consent is beyond the scope of this opinion, the reader's attention is invited to the helpful discussion of the issue of a minor's capacity to give informed consent in N.Y. State 1069 (2015) ¶¶20-27. See also Roy D. Simon, Simon's New York Rules of Professional Conduct Annotated (2016 ed.) pp. 467-468.

CONCLUSION:

11. A lawyer who serves as a foster parent may maintain a practice as an Attorney for Children and as the representative of other persons in proceedings in the Family Court of the same county, unless a reasonable lawyer would conclude, in relation to any given client, that a significant risk exists that the lawyer's professional judgment will be adversely affected by his or her personal interest as a foster parent. If a reasonable lawyer would conclude that such a significant risk exists, the lawyer may, nevertheless, represent the affected client, provided that the lawyer reasonably believes that he or she can provide competent and diligent representation and the affected client gives informed consent confirmed in writing.

TOPIC: False evidence; remedial measures

DIGEST: A divorce lawyer who learns that a client omitted a material asset in a sworn Statement of Net Worth has a duty to take reasonable remedial measures that are available, even after the conclusion of the proceeding. What measures are reasonable will depend on the facts and circumstances. They will begin with remonstrating with the former client to correct the Statement. If the client refuses, they may include withdrawing the lawyer's certification of the incomplete statement and withdrawing the statement. Disclosure of client confidences is required only "if necessary."

RULES: 1.0(i) & (k), 1.6(b), 3.3(a), (b) & (c)

FACTS:

1. After a divorce case resulted in a decree of divorce and property distribution, the inquiring lawyer's client revealed the existence of an asset that was omitted from the client's sworn Statement of Net Worth ("SNW"). The omitted asset was legally required to be included in the SNW and was subject to equitable distribution in the divorce. The client now wishes to use the omitted asset to pay off other obligations under the judgment of divorce. The value of the omitted asset is material to the size of the estate.

QUESTION:

2. When a lawyer who represented one of the parties in a divorce action learns, post-judgment, that the lawyer's client omitted an asset from the mandatory Statement of Net Worth, is the lawyer ethically obligated or permitted to reveal the omission?

OPINION:

Offering Material Evidence that is False

3. We begin with Rule 3.3(a)(3), which provides, in relevant part:

> If a lawyer, the lawyer's client, or a witness called by the lawyer has offered material evidence and the lawyer comes to know of its falsity, the lawyer shall take reasonable remedial measures, including, if necessary, disclosure to the tribunal. [Emphasis added.]

The language of the rule raises at least five subordinate questions: Was the SNW "evidence"? Was it "material"? Was it "false"? Does the inquirer now "know" of its falsity? What "remedial measures" are necessary?

4. The SNW plays a central role in a divorce case. Section 236 of the N.Y. Domestic Relations Law ("DRL") provides for compulsory disclosure by both parties to the divorce of their respective financial states and prohibits the concealment of any property, if demanded by the other party. DRL § 236 also requires that a completed SNW be sworn before a notary under penalty of perjury. The court relies on the SNW in determining the equitable distribution of assets and liabilities, and in awarding maintenance. Thus, we believe the SNW is "evidence" and that the omission of an asset renders the SNW "false." Further, the inquiry states that the inquirer has knowledge of the omission. See Rule 1.0(k) (defining "knows" and "knowledge").

5. The question of whether evidence is "material" can be a more complicated question of law and fact. Although the term "material" or its variants is used as an adjective or adverb more than 200 times in the Rules and their Comments, it is not defined there. Black's Law Dictionary defines "material evidence" as evidence that "goes to the substantial matters in dispute, or has a legitimate and effective influence or bearing on the decision in the case." In a useful discussion of Rule 3.3, the New York City Bar Committee on Professional Ethics explained the importance of the materiality standard:

> Rather than imposing a duty to remedy every possible falsity that might later be discovered after the close of a proceeding, Rule 3.3(a)(3) imposes a duty to act only when evidence that was "material" to the underlying proceeding is later discovered to be false. Determining whether the evidence is material is fact specific, depending on the factors relevant to the ruling in the particular matter, and particularly whether the evidence is of a kind that could have changed the result.

6. We agree that evidence is material if it could have materially changed the result in the matter – i.e. it has a consequence and is not merely an inconsequential omission. Here, evidence is material if it would have materially changed the equitable distribution of property, which will depend on the value of the asset that was not disclosed. This is a factual question that is beyond our jurisdiction to determine. However, for purposes of the remainder of this opinion, we will assume that the value of the asset is material.

7. Rule 3.3(b) may also apply here. It states, in part, that a lawyer who represents a client before a tribunal and who knows that a person has engaged in criminal or fraudulent conduct related to the proceeding "shall take reasonable remedial measures, including, if necessary, disclosure to the tribunal." Rule 1.0(i) defines "fraud" as denoting conduct that is "fraudulent under the substantive or procedural law of the applicable jurisdiction or has a purpose to deceive," unless it lacks an element of scienter or a knowing failure to correct misrepresentations that can be reasonably expected to induce detrimental reliance by another. If the inquirer concludes that the client's omission was knowingly made with a purpose to deceive, Rule 3.3(b) would also be implicated.

Duty to Take Remedial Measures

8. As noted above, under Rule 3.3(a)(3), if the lawyer or the lawyer's client has offered material evidence and the lawyer comes to know of its falsity, the lawyer must take "reasonable remedial measures, including, if necessary, disclosure to the tribunal." Similarly, Rule 3.3(b) requires a lawyer who knows that a client has engaged in fraudulent conduct relating to a proceeding before a tribunal to take "reasonable remedial measures, including, if necessary, disclosure to the tribunal."

9. The rule does not contain a time limitation on the lawyer's duty to take remedial measures. In this respect, it differs from Rule 3.3(c) of the ABA Model Rules of Professional Conduct, which states "The duties stated in paragraphs (a) and (b) continue to the conclusion of the proceeding . . . ." (Emphasis added.) New York omits the phrase "continue to the conclusion of the proceeding," and does not specify any other time limit. Since the marital proceeding here has concluded, it is important to determine whether New York's omission of the phrase "continue to the conclusion of the proceeding" is significant.

10. In N.Y. State 837 (2010), we concluded that the difference between the NY version of Rule 3.3 and the ABA version of the same rule is significant:

> The New York State Bar Association recommended that New York Rule 3.3(c) track ABA Model Rule 3.3(c), and thus include the proviso that "[t]he duties stated in paragraphs (a) and (b) continue to the conclusion of the proceeding. . . . But the State Bar's proposal was not embodied in New York Rule 3.3(c) as adopted by the Appellate Divisions. Therefore, the duration of counsel's obligation under New York Rule 3.3(c) as adopted may continue even after the conclusion of the proceeding in which the false material was used. [Emphasis added.]

Consequently, the fact that the divorce case here has concluded does not, by itself, terminate the lawyer's obligation of remediation.

11. How long does the obligation to remediate endure? We said in Opinion 837:

> [T]he endpoint of the obligation . . . cannot sensibly or logically be viewed as extending beyond the point at which remedial measures are available, since a disclosure which exposes the client to jeopardy without serving any remedial purpose is not authorized under Rule 3.3. See N.Y. State 831, n.4 (2009).

See also N.Y. State 980 (2013) (a lawyer who learned in a prior proceeding that a then-client imparted material and false information about the client's finances to the tribunal has a duty to take reasonable remedial reassures that may still be available, including, if necessary, disclosure to the tribunal); N.Y. City 2013-2 ("because the rule only requires an attorney to take reasonable remedial measures, the duties imposed by Rule 3.3(a)(3) should end when a reasonable 'remedial' measure is no longer available"). Cf. N.Y. State 781 (2004) (matrimonial lawyer who learns that a financial statement submitted by the lawyer to family court omitted material information and perpetrated a fraud on the tribunal must call upon client to rectify and, if client refuses, lawyer must withdraw the financial statement).

12. N.Y. City 2013-2 concludes that Rule 3.3(a)(3) imposes a duty to take remedial action either before the tribunal to which the false evidence was presented, or before a tribunal that could review the decision of the tribunal to which the false evidence was submitted, as long as the tribunal is in a position to consider the new evidence and provide a basis for reopening the matter and/or amending, modifying or vacating the prior judgment. See also N.Y. City 2013-2, note 8 (discussing the bases for reopening a judgment under CPLR 5015(a)).

13. It is not uncommon to re-open divorce decrees due to changed circumstances. Consequently, if it is still possible here to remediate the omission, the lawyer must pursue remediation.

14. What action does remediation require? Comment [10] to Rule 3.3 sets out the contours of that obligation.

> The advocate's proper course is to remonstrate with the client confidentially, advise the client of the lawyer's duty of candor to the tribunal, and seek the client's cooperation with respect to the withdrawal or correction of the false statements or evidence. If that fails, the advocate must take further remedial action. If withdrawal from the representation is not permitted or will not undo the effect of the false evidence, the advocate must make such disclosure to the tribunal as is reasonably necessary to remedy the situation . . . .

15. In N.Y. State 837 (2010) we discussed the concept under Rule 3.3(a) and (b) that disclosure is required only "if necessary." Counsel's knowledge came from the client, constituted confidential information under Rule 1.6, and did not fall within any of the exceptions contained in Rule 1.6(b). Consequently, we stated that, if disclosure was not "necessary" under Rule 3.3, it would not be permitted under Rule 1.6. Rather, we said, "if there are any reasonable remedial measures short of disclosure, that course must be taken." Id. at ¶ 19. Moreover, we noted that, in the criminal sphere, Rule 3.3's mandate to disclose may be limited or prohibited by the Fifth Amendment (self-incrimination) and/or the Sixth Amendment (ineffective assistance of counsel) to the U.S. Constitution.

16. Here, counsel's knowledge of the falsity of the SNW also comes from the client. It may be confidential because it is protected by the attorney-client privilege or because its disclosure is likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client. What information is protected by the attorney-client privilege and whether any exceptions to the privilege apply are questions of law that are beyond the jurisdiction of this Committee. See, e.g. the discussion of continuing crimes in Rule 1.6, Cmt. [6D].

17. Because the proceeding has ended, the lawyer's withdrawal from the representation will not remediate the false evidence. Therefore, the lawyer's duty to remediate begins with remonstrating with the client to amend the SNW to disclose the unreported asset. Moreover, the lawyer should inform the client that, if the client does not voluntarily correct the false SNW, the lawyer will be required to take reasonable remedial measures.

18. If the client refuses, we believe that, consistent with N.Y. State 837, there are measures short of disclosure that may achieve remediation. For example, if the lawyer has certified the client's SNW or has referred to it in court proceedings, and the lawyer believes the SNW was materially inaccurate and is still be relied upon by the client's spouse or by the tribunal, Rule 1.6(b)(3) would allow the lawyer to withdraw the certification:

> A lawyer may reveal . . . confidential information to the extent the lawyer reasonably believes necessary . . . to withdraw a written or oral . . . representation previously given by the lawyer and reasonably believed by the lawyer still to be relied upon by a third person, where the lawyer has discovered that the . . . representation was based on materially inaccurate information or is being used to further a crime or fraud.

Because withdrawing the certification or representation is likely to trigger follow-up action by the tribunal or by the former spouse, it is likely to satisfy the "reasonable remedial measure" requirement of Rule 3.3(a)(3) and (b). It could also result in another exception to confidentiality under Rule 1.6(b)(6), which is disclosure to comply with a court order.

19. Similarly, the lawyer might withdraw the SNW or state that it should not be relied upon, which also should lead the court or former spouse to request further explanation. See N.Y. State 781 (2004) (where divorce proceeding apparently had not yet ended, withdrawing a false financial statement would be sufficient under the Code predecessor to Rule 3.3).

20. Because identification of remedial measures depends on the facts and circumstances of the case, we cannot set out a definitive roadmap in this opinion. We believe the inquirer is in the best position to determine what steps are "reasonable" and "necessary."

CONCLUSION:

21. A divorce lawyer who learns that a client omitted a material asset in a sworn Statement of Net Worth has a duty to take reasonable remedial measures that are available, even after the conclusion of the proceeding. What measures are reasonable will depend on the facts and circumstances. They will begin with remonstrating with the former client to correct the Statement. If the client refuses, they may include withdrawing the lawyer's certification of the incomplete statement and withdrawing the statement. Disclosure of client confidences is required only "if necessary."

TOPIC: Communication with opposing counsel; communication with opposing party

DIGEST: Lawyer may ethically communicate with opposing counsel in any manner lawyer desires regardless of request of opposing counsel. But opposing counsel is not required to respond to the lawyer's chosen method. With the prior consent of opposing counsel, a lawyer may (but is not required to) send to opposing counsel's client copies of written communications to opposing counsel.

RULES: 1.2(e), 1.4(a)(3), 4.2(a) & (c)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is representing himself in a litigated matter. Opposing counsel has advised the inquirer not to communicate with him by telephone, but rather to communicate with him only in writing, and has instructed the inquirer that all emails and writings sent to opposing counsel by the inquirer should be copied to the opposing party.

QUESTIONS:

2. The inquirer asks two questions:

A. Must a lawyer abide by opposing counsel's direction that the lawyer not communicate with him by telephone?

B. May or must a lawyer a lawyer comply with opposing counsel's direction to send copies of all emails and other writings to opposing counsel's client?

OPINION

3. As to opposing counsel's direction not to communicate by telephone, no provision in the Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") mandates how lawyers must communicate with each other. Nor does any provision in the Rules either prohibit a lawyer from placing a telephone call to opposing counsel or require opposing counsel to accept a telephone call from another lawyer. Common sense dictates that lawyers, as members of an honorable profession, should work out between themselves the methods of communication that will best facilitate resolution of the matter at hand. In this era, email in many instances is the most efficient mode of communication.

4. As to opposing counsel's instruction to copy opposing counsel's client on every written communication to opposing counsel, Rule 4.2(a), sometimes called the "no-contact" rule, provides:

> (a) In representing a client, a lawyer shall not communicate . . . about the subject of the representation with a person the lawyer knows to be represented by another lawyer in the matter, unless the lawyer has the prior consent of the other lawyer or is authorized to do so by law.

5. Rule 4.2(c) makes clear that this prohibition applies when a lawyer is representing himself pro se:

> (c) A lawyer who is acting pro se . . . in a matter is subject to paragraph (a), but may communicate with a represented person . . . provided the lawyer . . . gives reasonable advance notice to the represented person's counsel that such communications will be taking place.

See also Comment [12A] to Rule 4.2 ("When a lawyer is proceeding pro se in a matter. . . , the lawyer's direct communications with a counterparty are subject to the no-contact rule, Rule 4.2.")

6. Thus a lawyer may not communicate with a party the lawyer knows to be represented by counsel without the prior consent of the represented party's counsel or without giving the notice required by Rule 4.2(c). Here, however, the opposing party's counsel has directed the lawyer to send copies of communications to the opposing party, thus furnishing the prior consent required by Rule 4.2(a). See also Rule 1.2(e) ("A lawyer may exercise professional judgment to . . . accede to reasonable requests of opposing counsel, when doing so does not prejudice the rights of the client.")

7. That still leaves the question whether the lawyer is required as opposed to permitted to send copies to the represented client. We find nothing in the Rules that require a lawyer to communicate with opposing counsel's client. It is not the lawyer's responsibility to keep the opposing counsel's client "informed about the status of the matter" as required by Rule 1.4(a)(3). That is opposing counsel's obligation under that Rule. See N.Y. State 1076 ¶4 (2015) ("A lawyer is required to communicate regularly with the client on the status of the matter for which the lawyer has been retained. . . . Rule 1.4(a)(3) requires the lawyer to keep the client reasonably informed about the status of the matter.").

CONCLUSION:

8. A lawyer may communicate with opposing counsel in any manner he chooses, including by telephone, regardless of the instructions of opposing counsel. But opposing counsel is not required to respond to the lawyer's chosen method. With the prior consent of opposing counsel, a lawyer may (but is not required to) send to opposing counsel's client copies of written communications to opposing counsel.

TOPIC: Confidential client information

DIGEST: The New York Rules of Professional Conduct do not require a lawyer to communicate with an individual who is neither a client in the matter nor a party to a document drafted by the lawyer in the matter.

RULES: Rules 1.4, 1.6, 1.9(c), 4.1, 4.2, 4.3 and 4.4.

FACTS:

1. The inquirer drafted a will in which the testator disinherited one of his sons. The disinherited son contacted the inquirer and asked her to confirm that she drafted the will, of which the son has a copy. The lawyer's signature is on the will. The inquirer asks whether she has an obligation to respond to her former client's son, who is neither an executor nor a beneficiary.

QUESTION:

2. Must a lawyer respond to a query from an individual who is neither a client in the matter nor a party to the document that is the subject of the query?

OPINION:

3. One of the lawyer's principal obligations under the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") when representing a client is to maintain the client's confidential information – information gained in or relating to the representation that is protected by the attorney-client privilege, or the disclosure of which would be embarrassing or detrimental to the client or that the client has asked to be maintained in confidence. See Rule 1.6. Although information that is generally known in the local community is not protected as confidential information, information is not "generally known" simply because it is in the public domain or available in a public file. See Rule 1.6, Cmt. [4]. The lawyer is also prohibited from using or revealing the confidential information of a former client that is protected by Rule 1.6, except to the extent the Rules would permit with respect to a current client. Rule 1.9(c). A deceased client is by definition a former client.

4. Several rules in the New York Rules of Professional Conduct ("the Rules") directly address a lawyer's obligations and limitations regarding communications with others.[1] For example, Rule 1.4 ("Communication") sets out a lawyer's obligations concerning communicating with clients. It contains a robust list of requirements, but they are limited to communications with clients. Rule 4.2 ("Communication with Person Represented by Counsel") strictly limits the situations in which a lawyer may communicate with represented individuals, but it contains no affirmative obligation to communicate with them. Rule 4.3 ("Communicating with Unrepresented Parties") limits, under specified circumstances, a lawyer's authority to provide legal advice to unrepresented individuals and it prohibits a lawyer, who is communicating with an individual on behalf of a client, from stating or implying that a lawyer is a disinterested party. Again, this rule establishes no affirmative obligation to communicate. Rule 4.1, which expressly applies to communications with "third parties," also establishes no obligation to communicate; instead, it simply requires a lawyer who represents a party to refrain from "knowingly making a false statement of fact or law" when communicating with a third party. Rule 4.4 ("Respect for Rights of Third Persons") limits a lawyer's authority to embarrass, harm or violate the rights of third parties, and it creates a very narrow communicative obligation – i.e., a lawyer who "receives a document relating to the representation of the lawyer's client and knows or reasonably should know that the document was inadvertently sent shall promptly notify the sender."

5. What the above survey of the Rules regarding communications makes clear is that, absent two narrow exceptions – dispelling a third party's impression of a lawyer's disinterest and notifying a third party regarding receipt of a misdelivered document – a lawyer has no independent ethical obligation to communicate with third parties.[1]

6. Our prior opinions are consistent with this reading of the Rules. Thus, in N.Y. State 833 (2009), we concluded that a lawyer was not ethically required to respond to an unsolicited written request for representation sent by a person in prison. Specifically, we held that no provision of the Rules "imposes a general obligation upon a lawyer to promptly answer unsolicited mail – or to answer at all." Id. More recently, in N.Y. State 1078 (2015), we considered whether a lawyer was permitted, consistent with Rule 1.6 ("Confidentiality of Information"), to disclose to the son of a former client that the lawyer did not draft a will for the deceased client. We concluded that, under limited circumstances, the lawyer was permitted to disclose this information (i.e., when it advanced the best interests of the former client). Id. Implicit in that conclusion was that the lawyer was not required to share information with the son of the former client.

7. Here, the disinherited son is not a client of the inquirer and is not a party to the document drafted by the inquirer.[2] Accordingly, as a survey of the relevant rules makes clear and consistent with our holding in N.Y. State 833, the inquirer has no ethical obligation to respond to the son's query. Indeed, sharing the information would likely not be in the client's best interest and therefore would not be permitted by Rule 1.6(a).

CONCLUSION:

8. The New York Rules of Professional Conduct do not require a lawyer to respond to a query – about a document previously drafted by the lawyer – from an individual who is neither a client in the matter nor a party to the drafted document.

1 In 1998, the Office of Court Administration adopted the New York State Standards of Civility, which set forth principles of behavior to which the bar, the bench and court employees should aspire. They are not intended as rules to be enforced by sanction or disciplinary action, nor are they intended to supplement or modify the Rules of Professional Conduct. The first section of these Standards discusses the lawyer's duties to other lawyers, litigants and witnesses and Standard IV in this section states that "A lawyer should promptly return phone calls and answer correspondence reasonably requiring a response." 22 NYCRR Part 1200, app. at IV (emphasis added). These standards by their terms do not seem to apply here. In any event, their applicability is beyond the purview of our Committee.

2 We do not have occasion to address what obligation, if any, the lawyer would have to respond to a query from a party to the drafted document. See N.Y. State 833.

TOPIC: Confidential information; prospective client

DIGEST: A lawyer may not disclose a prospective client's confidential information without the informed consent of the prospective client or some other exception to the Rules governing a lawyer's duty of confidentiality.

RULES: 1.0(j), 1.6(a) & (b), 1.9(a) & (c), 1.18(a) & (b)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer jointly represented Husband and Wife in drafting a joint revocable trust. The retainer agreement signed by both clients provided that the lawyer could not withhold information from either client.

2. The trust agreement provided that (i) upon Wife's death, her share of the trust estate would be distributed to a credit shelter trust for the benefit of Husband during his lifetime, and (ii) upon Husband's death, the funds in the credit shelter trust would be distributed to Wife's children from a prior marriage. After Wife died, Husband met with the inquirer to review what needed to be done to administer the trusts, but declined to retain the inquirer to assist him with the administration.

3. Recently, Husband died, and Husband's sister (Sister), who is named in the trust instrument as Husband's successor trustee, contacted the inquirer. She disclosed that Husband did not fund the credit shelter trust, but put those assets in his own name for the benefit of Sister, effectively disinheriting Wife's children.

4. The inquirer informed Sister the inquirer cannot represent her in the administration of the trust estate. The inquirer asks whether he may or must advise Wife's children that the trust established by their mother has not been administered according to the trust agreement.

QUESTION:

5. May or must the lawyer disclose, to Wife's children, who are the beneficiaries of a trust, that their step-father, as trustee of the trust, did not adhere to the provisions of the trust agreement and misappropriated trust property?

OPINION:

6. Although the inquiry does not state that Sister sought legal advice from the inquirer, the clear implication of the inquirer's informing Sister that the inquirer could not represent her is that, at the time of the call from Sister to the inquirer, Sister was a "prospective client" within the meaning of Rule 1.18(a) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"), i.e. "a person who consults with a lawyer about the possibility of forming a client-lawyer relationship with respect to a matter." As Comment [2] to Rule 1.18 points out, whether a person who communicates with a lawyer is a "prospective client" depends on, among other things, whether that person is communicating unilaterally to the lawyer without any reasonable expectation that the lawyer is willing to discuss the possibility of forming a client-lawyer relationship, and thus is not a "prospective client." Nothing in the facts suggests the Sister did not have that reasonable expectation. Therefore, while the question whether Sister is a prospective client is one of fact that is beyond the jurisdiction of this Committee, the remainder of this opinion assumes that Sister was a prospective client.

7. Under Rule 1.18(b), the lawyer has confidentiality obligations to a prospective client. Rule 1.18(b) provides:

> Even when no client-lawyer relationship ensues, a lawyer who has learned information from a prospective client shall not use or reveal that information, except as Rule 1.9 would permit with respect to information of a former client.

8. Rule 1.9(c) prohibits a lawyer from using confidential information of a former client that is protected by Rule 1.6 to the disadvantage of the former client, unless the Rules would permit or require disclosure with respect to a current client. Thus, the effect of Rule 1.18(b) is that the inquirer may not reveal or use the information provided by Sister unless (i) Sister gives informed consent, confirmed in writing or (ii) the disclosure is permitted by Rule 1.6(b). Neither exception applies here.

9. Central to this inquiry are the Rules of Professional Conduct concerning confidential client information. Under Rule 1.6, confidential information "consists of information gained during or relating to the representation of a client, whatever its source, that is (a) protected by the attorney-client privilege, (b) likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed, or (c) information that the client has requested be kept confidential." See Rule 1.6(a).

10. If Sister reasonably believed that the inquirer represented her as successor trustee to Husband – which is a factual question that we cannot resolve – then the information that she conveyed to the inquirer regarding Husband's failure to fulfill his obligations under the trust agreement may be protected by the attorney-client privilege. In any event, it is information that is likely to be embarrassing to Sister and detrimental to her, to the extent it affects her right to assets as a beneficiary of Husband's estate.[1]

11. Rule 1.6(a) further provides:

> A lawyer shall not knowingly reveal confidential information, as defined by this Rule, or use such information to the disadvantage of a client or for the advantage of the lawyer or a third person, unless:
> (1) the client gives informed consent, as defined in Rule 1.0(j);

1 The provisions of the trust agreement and information that H did not fulfill his obligations under the trust agreement may also be confidential information of the inquirer's former client, H. However, analyzing the inquirer's confidentiality obligations to H is more difficult than analyzing the inquirer's confidentiality obligations to S. H apparently waived confidentiality vis a vis W. But it is not clear whether anyone stands in W's shoes in that regard and the answer to that question is one of law that is beyond the jurisdiction of this Committee. Cf. N.Y. State 970 (2013) (whether executrix for will of former client is entitled to lawyer's files of the former client's matter depends on whether executrix is legally entitled to the files). Moreover, it is not clear that any of the exceptions to confidentiality in Rule 1.6(b) would apply to H. Even if H's actions in failing to comply with the provisions of the trust were criminal, they would constitute a past crime. Although Comment [6D] to Rule 1.6 notes that some crimes are continuing in nature, we think it is unlikely this provision applies given that the lawyer was not involved with H's misuse of the trust assets.

(2) the disclosure is impliedly authorized to advance the best interests of the client and is either reasonable under the circumstances or customary in the professional community; or

(3) the disclosure is permitted by paragraph (b).

12. The first two exceptions do not apply here. The inquirer does not say that Sister has given informed consent to the inquirer's disclosure of the information to Wife's children. Moreover, the disclosure will not advance the best interests of Sister, and thus is not "impliedly authorized." Accordingly, the inquirer may not disclose the information unless disclosure is permitted by Rule 1.6(b).

13. None of the exceptions in Rule 1.6(b) seems to apply here. For example, Rule 1.6(b)(2) allows for disclosure to prevent the client from committing a crime. But it is not clear what actions Sister intends to take or whether those actions would constitute a crime (a question of law that is beyond the jurisdiction of this Committee to determine).

14. Thus, the inquirer may not disclose the information learned from Sister to Wife's children.

CONCLUSION:

15. A lawyer who assisted a married couple with establishing a trust must not disclose information he learns about one spouse's misappropriation of trust assets, when he learns of the misappropriation from a successor trustee who was seeking legal advice as a prospective client. A lawyer may not disclose a prospective client's confidential information without the informed consent of the prospective client or some other exception to the Rules governing a lawyer's duty of confidentiality.

TOPIC: Attorney Escrow Account; Attorney Special Account; Attorney Trust Account

DIGEST: Settlement proceeds must be deposited into an attorney's Special Account and must be promptly paid to clients and to third persons to the extent such persons have an ownership interest in the settlement proceeds. Where a third person does not possess such an interest, but has only a claim against the lawyer, the lawyer may choose to pay such amounts either from the Special Account or from the attorney's operating account. Payment to the law firm of legal fees and expenses must be transferred from the Special Account to the firm's operating account by check or bank transfer.

RULES: 1.15(a), (b), (c) & (e)

FACTS:

1. A lawyer has received a settlement check that includes the funds due to the client and the funds due to the firm for its legal fees and expenses. The firm may be obligated to share its legal fees with a referring attorney or to pay a portion of the fees, as a bonus, to a staff attorney who was responsible for bringing the matter to the firm. The settlement check has been deposited in the firm's Special Account. Once the check clears, the firm intends to disburse the funds to others.

QUESTIONS:

2. A. When a law firm receives settlement funds, may or must the law firm distribute, directly from the firm's Special Account, the funds over and above those owed to the client, including amounts owing (i) to the referring attorney as a referral fee, (ii) to a staff attorney as a bonus, and (iii) to the law firm in payment of the firm's legal fees and expenses, or may or must the firm instead first transfer the settlement funds to the firm's operating account for further distribution?

B. How quickly must the distributions be made?

OPINION:

3. Rule 1.15(a) prohibits a lawyer from commingling funds belonging to another person with funds of the lawyer. Rule 1.15(a) provides:

> A lawyer in possession of any funds or other property belonging to another person, where such possession is incident to his or her practice of law, is a fiduciary, and must not misappropriate such funds or property or commingle such funds or property with his or her own.

Rule 1.15(b) requires that funds belonging to the client or another person be maintained in a special account or accounts (the "Special Account"), sometimes referred to as an "attorney trust account" or "attorney escrow account." See Rule 1.15(b)(2).

4. Whether the funds from a settlement check that the lawyer will use to pay third persons must be paid from the Special Account depends on the meaning of the phrase "funds belonging to another person" in Rule 1.15(a). If the lawyer or the client has entered into a contract obligating the lawyer to pay a third person from the proceeds of the settlement, or if such right is granted by law, then some of the proceeds of the settlement check "belong" to such person, and the payments to such person must be made from the Special Account. See N.Y. State 717 (1996) (construing the phrase "entitled to receive the funds" in the predecessor to what is now Rule 1.15(c)(1) to include medical providers who have valid assignments or liens against proceeds, but excluding other unsecured creditors). They may not be transferred to the lawyer's operating account because a lawyer may not commingle funds "belonging" to others with the lawyer's own funds.

5. If the third person does not have a legal right to receive the proceeds of the settlement check, the third person may have a claim against the lawyer for the amounts owed. In this situation, where the settlement funds do not "belong" to the third person but the third person may have a claim against the lawyer for a portion of the funds, the lawyer has a choice. The lawyer may leave the amounts owed to the third person in the Special Account and pay the third person directly from that account. Alternatively, the lawyer may transfer the amount owed to the third person to the lawyer's operating account and make payments to the third person by writing checks on (or, where authorized, making bank transfers from) the operating account.

6. In many situations, a lawyer will owe money to third persons but will not have transferred an interest in the settlement proceeds. For example, amounts owed by the lawyer for rent, salaries and the expenses of third party suppliers are all legal obligations of the lawyer or law firm but do not give the landlord or employees or vendors a legal interest in specific settlement proceeds. Many lawyers will choose to pay such amounts from their operating accounts because it may be easier to keep track of payments from the operating account.

7. If a client or third person has a legal interest in funds in the Special Account, the lawyer must "promptly notify" the client or third person of the receipt of funds in which such person has an interest. Rule 1.15(c)(1). The lawyer also must "promptly pay" the funds to the person to whom the funds belong. See Rule 1.15(c)(4), N.Y. State 946 (2012). "Promptly" means within hours or days, not weeks. Although written notice is not required, it is the best means to ensure a record exists to confirm that the lawyer has met the requirements of Rule 1.15(c)(1). See Roy Simon, Simon's New York Rules of Professional Conduct Annotated 903 (Thomson Reuters 2016). If a person does not have a legal interest in the property in the Special Account, Rule 1.15(c)(1) does not apply. In that case, the timing of the lawyer's payment obligation is a matter of contract that is outside the Committee's jurisdiction.

8. Whether the lawyer pays the third person directly from the Special Account or instead first transfers the amount claimed by the third party into the lawyer's operating account, the lawyer must wait for the settlement check to clear before disbursing any of the funds. See N.Y. State 737 (2001) (lawyer may not draw on funds belonging to Client A for the benefit of Client B). See also In Re Sukhdeo, 47 A.D.3d 6 (2d Dept. 2007), In Re Rosenberg, 3 A.D.3d 52 (2d Dept. 2003), In Re Rudlin, 280 A.D.2d 200 (4th Dept. 2001). To do otherwise would result in a technical conversion because the lawyer would be using cleared funds belonging to others to cover the pending checks drawn on the uncleared settlement check.

9. As to the amount owed to the lawyer for legal fees and expenses, Rule 1.15(b)(4) states that funds belonging in part to a client or third person and in part currently or potentially to the lawyer must be kept in the Special Account, but when the portion belonging to the lawyer is not in dispute, "the portion belonging to the lawyer or law firm may be withdrawn when due unless the right of the lawyer or law firm to receive it is disputed by the client or third person, in which event the disputed portion shall not be withdrawn until the dispute is finally resolved." Transfers from the Special Account to the lawyer's operating account may be made by check or by bank transfer. Rule 1.15(e).

CONCLUSION:

10. Settlement proceeds in which a client or third person has an ownership interest must be paid to such persons from the attorney's Special Account. Where a third party does not possess such an ownership interest, but has a claim only against the lawyer personally, the lawyer may opt to pay such amounts either directly from the Special Account or from the attorney's operating account. Payment to the law firm of legal fees and expenses must be transferred to the firm's operating account by check or bank transfer.

TOPIC: Referral fees; Division of fees with estate and with other attorneys

DIGEST: A lawyer who undertakes to complete unfinished legal business of a deceased attorney may pay the deceased lawyer's estate that proportion of the total compensation that fairly represents the services (if any) that the deceased lawyer rendered in the matter. If the lawyer instead refers the matter to a third attorney, the lawyer and the third attorney may share legal fees provided they comply with Rule 1.5(g).

RULES: 1.5(g), 5.4(a)(2), 7.2(a)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer's friend, also a lawyer, recently passed away. The dying attorney had not made any agreement to share fees with the inquirer, but on his deathbed the dying attorney had informed his secretary that he wanted to refer three personal injury cases – Matters A, B and C – to the inquirer. The deceased lawyer's secretary gave the inquirer's name to each of the clients, who then each called the inquirer to discuss taking over their matters. The inquirer is in the process of reviewing the matters and assessing whether he can undertake the representations, each of which is subject to a standard contingency retainer. In Matter A, the deceased attorney had conducted a preliminary investigation, obtained a copy of the police report, requested and obtained some medical records, and had taken several notes, but had not commenced suit. The inquirer is still reviewing the other matters and does not know what, if any, work the deceased attorney performed on Matters B and C.

QUESTIONS:

2. A. If the inquirer accepts any of the matters, may he pay a referral fee to the deceased attorney's estate for the matters he accepts?

B. If the inquirer decides to refer any matters to a third attorney, may the inquirer receive a referral fee?

C. If the inquirer refers any of the matters to a third attorney, may the third attorney pay the deceased attorney's estate a referral fee?

OPINION:

3. Rule 7.2(a) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") provides that a lawyer may not pay a fee for the referral of business, with certain exceptions not relevant to this inquiry. Specifically, Rule 7.2(a) provides:

> (a) A lawyer shall not compensate or give anything of value to a person or organization to recommend or obtain employment by a client, or as a reward for having made a recommendation resulting in employment by a client.

4. Nevertheless, Rule 1.5(g) permits a division of legal fees between lawyers who are not associated in a firm when the division is in proportion to the services performed by each lawyer or the lawyers assume joint responsibility for the representation. Rule 1.5(g) provides:

> (g) A lawyer shall not divide a fee for legal services with another lawyer who is not associated in the same law firm unless:
> (1) the division is in proportion to the services performed by each lawyer or, by a writing given to the client, each lawyer assumes joint responsibility for the representation;
> (2) the client agrees to employment of the other lawyer after a full disclosure that a division of fees will be made, including the share each lawyer will receive, and the client's agreement is confirmed in writing; and
> (3) the total fee is not excessive.

Moreover, although Rule 5.4(a) generally prohibits a lawyer from sharing legal fees with a nonlawyer, an exception in subparagraph (a)(2) allows a division of fees between a lawyer who finished the work of a deceased lawyer and the estate of that lawyer. Rule 5.4(a)(2) provides:

> (2) a lawyer who undertakes to complete unfinished legal business of a deceased lawyer may pay to the estate of the deceased lawyer that portion of the total compensation that fairly represents the services rendered by the deceased lawyer . . . .

Assuming a Matter from a Deceased Lawyer

5. The Rules do not specifically cover the mechanics for assuming a matter from the estate of a deceased lawyer. Rule 1.4 requires a lawyer to explain a matter to the extent reasonably necessary to permit the client to make informed decisions regarding the representation. We believe this requires the inquirer to inform the clients that they are free to choose any lawyer to represent them and to have copies of the file with respect to the matter. Cf. Rule 1.17(c) (where a law practice is being sold, the seller and buyer must give joint written notice to each of the seller's clients, which notice must inform the client that the client is entitled to retain other counsel or to take possession of the file). See generally, N.Y. State Bar Association, NYSBA Planning Ahead Guide: How to Establish an Advance Exit Plan to Protect Your Clients' Interests in the Event of Your Disability, Retirement or Death (2016) (available at http://www.nysba.org/PlanningAheadGuide2016/).

Division of Fees Between the Inquirer and the Deceased Lawyer

6. Rule 1.5(g), quoted above, does not apply here. As the text of Rule 1.5(g) and Comment [7] to Rule 1.5 explain, the client must agree to the arrangement, including the share that each lawyer is to receive, and the client's agreement must be confirmed in writing. Here, the deceased attorney and the inquirer did not enter into an agreement to divide fees in any fashion for Matters A, B, and C, so they cannot satisfy the elements of Rule 1.5(g). In any event, because the referring attorney is deceased, any fees to be divided by the inquirer would not be shared with an attorney, but would be shared with a nonattorney – i.e., the estate of the deceased attorney. Rule 1.5(g) applies only to fee-sharing among lawyers, so it would not be applicable to any sharing of fees between the inquirer and the decedent's estate.

Division of Fees with Estate of Deceased Lawyer

7. Rule 5.4(a) prohibits a lawyer or law firm from sharing legal fees with a nonlawyer, with limited exceptions. The exception pertinent to this inquiry appears in subsection (a)(2) of Rule 5.4, quoted above, which permits a lawyer to pay to the estate of a deceased lawyer that portion of total compensation that fairly represents the services rendered by the deceased lawyer.

8. We apparently have never interpreted this Rule, or its predecessor in the Code of Professional Responsibility, DR 3-102(A)(2). Interpreting this provision in his book, Professor Simon quotes the language of the Rule – "pay the estate of the deceased lawyer that portion of the total compensation that fairly represents the services rendered by the deceased lawyer," and says:

> In the case of a contingent fee matter, Rule 5.4(a)(2) should permit the successor lawyer to agree to pay the estate either a fair proportion of the contingent fee at the conclusion of the matter or a quantum meruit payment at any time, before or after the matter is concluded. This parallels the law that applies to contingent fee matters when a client changes lawyers in the middle of a contingent fee matter.

Roy Simon, Simon's New York Rules of Professional Conduct Annotated 1424 (Thomson Reuters 2016) (analogizing to Cohen v. Grainer, Tesoriero & Bell, 81 N.Y.2d 655 (1993)). We agree with Professor Simon.

9. Regarding Matter A, in which the deceased attorney provided legal services before his death, the inquirer may ethically share legal fees with the referring lawyer's estate. Thus, under Rule 5.4(a)(2), the inquirer could, at the conclusion of Matter A, pay the estate a portion of the total compensation that represents the services rendered by the deceased attorney, or at any time pay an amount representing quantum meruit for those services. (As in the case of a lawyer who takes over a contingent fee case from a living attorney, the proportion of the total fees that fairly represents the services performed by the original attorney cannot be calculated until the matter ends, but the quantum meruit amount that represents fair compensation for those services could be calculated immediately.)

10. Regarding Matters B and C, however, if the deceased lawyer did not provide any legal "services" on those matters prior to his death, then the inquirer may not ethically pay the estate a portion of the fees. If there were such a division of fees between the inquirer and the estate when the deceased lawyer did not render any services, then the payment would constitute the payment of an improper referral fee under Rule 7.2(a) and a division of legal fees with a nonlawyer in violation of Rule 5.4(a). We do not take a position on whether merely executing and filing a retainer agreement, and thus assuming liability for a matter, constitutes "services rendered by the deceased lawyer" within the meaning of Rule 5.4(a)(2) that may be taken into account in calculating an amount that "fairly represents" the estate's reasonable share of legal fees.

Matters Referred to Another Attorney

11. If the inquirer decides to refer one or more matters to another attorney, the inquirer may ethically receive a share of the fees for such matters if the inquirer and the successor counsel comply with Rule 1.5(g).

12. To comply with Rule 1.5(g)(2), the inquirer must ensure that the clients in each particular matter agree to the employment of the other lawyer after disclosure that a division of fees will be made, including the share each lawyer will receive, confirmed by each client in writing, and the overall fee would have to be reasonable. In addition, any division of fees with the lawyer to whom a matter is referred either must be "in proportion" to the services each lawyer performs, or, in a writing given to the client, the inquirer and the new lawyer must assume "joint responsibility" for the representation. Comment [7] to Rule 1.5 provides: "Joint responsibility for the representation entails financial and ethical responsibility for the representation as if the lawyers were associated in a partnership. In N.Y. State 745 (2001), we said, without elaboration, that the joint responsibility standard in the predecessor to Rule 1.5(g) entailed more than financial accountability and malpractice liability.

13. Whether the successor lawyer (i.e., the lawyer to whom the inquirer refers the matters) could ethically share fees with the estate of the deceased lawyer depends on the same analysis contained in paragraphs 7 - 10 above.

14. The situation described here indicates that it would be helpful if the Rules of Professional Conduct (or court rules) addressed the question of succession planning by sole practitioners. Proposals for court rules regarding succession planning have been made in past years but have not been adopted.

CONCLUSION:

15. A successor lawyer who undertakes to complete unfinished legal business of a deceased attorney may pay the deceased lawyer's estate that proportion of the total compensation that fairly represents the services that the deceased lawyer rendered. If the inquirer refers the matter to a third attorney, the inquirer and the third attorney may share legal fees provided they comply with Rule 1.5(g). If the inquirer and the third attorney comply with Rule 1.5(g), the division of fees would not be an improper referral fee under Rule 7.2(a).

TOPIC: Attorney Newsletters

DIGEST: If the primary purpose of a law firm's newsletter is educational, it does not constitute an advertisement and may be sent to a larger audience than current and former clients without having to comply with Rules 7.1 and 7.3. However, if the primary purpose of the newsletter is to provide information or news about the lawyer or law firm (e.g., the firm's cases, personnel, clients or achievements) it generally will be considered advertising to generate business, and must comply with Rules 7.1 and 7.3. The law firm may accept newsletter content from a real estate brokerage firm, may acknowledge the source of the content and may accept payments from the real estate brokerage firm to defray the cost of publishing the newsletter, as long as the law firm does not accept money for referring business to the brokerage firm.

RULES: 1.0(a), 1.7(a) & (b), 7.1(a), (f) & (k), 7.3

FACTS:

1. A residential real estate law firm wishes to create and publish a newsletter to send to former and current clients. The newsletter would contain information about changes to local laws and also would contain relevant market data provided by a real estate brokerage firm (the "Brokerage Firm").

2. The law firm has no contractual or referral relationship with the Brokerage Firm. Additionally, the law firm will not be paying the Brokerage Firm for any market information. However, the Brokerage Firm has offered to pay the law firm to offset the cost of publishing the newsletter.

3. The law firm also wants to send the newsletter to customers of certain lenders that the law firm has represented on purchase or refinance transactions. (The customers of the lenders have provided written consent for the lenders to release their contact information.)

QUESTIONS:

4. The inquirer poses several questions:

   A. May a law firm that primarily handles real estate transactions send a newsletter to the firm's current and former clients?

   B. May the law firm send the newsletter to the customers of lenders, where the firm has previously represented the lenders?

   C. May the law firm's newsletter include (i) market data provided by a real estate brokerage firm, (ii) contact information for that brokerage firm or individual brokers, and (iii) credit to the real estate brokerage firm and/or its individual brokers for providing the market data?

   D. May the law firm accept payments from the brokerage firm to offset the cost of publishing the newsletter?

OPINION:

Newsletters as Advertising

5. In N.Y. State 848 (2010), we considered whether an attorney newsletter is an "advertisement" that is subject to the requirements of Rule 7.1 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"), including the requirement that the newsletter be labeled "attorney advertising" and the requirement to maintain copies of advertisements for a specified period. See Rule 7.1(f) & (k). In Opinion 848, we began our analysis with the definition of "advertisement" in Rule 1.0(a):

> "Advertisement" means any public or private communication made by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm's services, the primary purpose of which is for the retention of the lawyer or law firm. [Emphasis added.]

We noted that the determination of whether a newsletter constituted advertising depended on three factors: (i) the intent of the communication, (ii) the content of the communication, and (iii) the targeted audience for the communication.

6. Regarding the first factor – intent – we said that a newsletter constitutes advertising under Rule 1.0(a) only if its "primary purpose" is the retention of the lawyer or law firm. Including contact or biographical information about the lawyer or firm does not, without more, transform an otherwise educational communication into advertising. See generally Rule 7.1, Cmt. [8] ("Some communications by a law firm . . . are not necessarily advertisements. For example, pencils, legal pads . . . or the like with the law firm name, logo, and contact information printed on them do not constitute 'advertisements' within the definition of this Rule if their primary purpose is general awareness and branding, rather than the retention of the law firm for a particular matter").

7. Regarding the second factor – content – Opinion 848 cited the general rule in Comment [7] to Rule 7.1:

> Topical newsletters . . . intended to educate recipients about new developments in the law are generally not considered advertising. However, a newsletter, client alert, or blog that provides information or news primarily about the lawyer or law firm (for example, the lawyer or law firm's cases, personnel, clients or achievements) generally would be considered advertising." [Emphasis supplied.]

See also Rule 7.1, Cmt. [8] (distributing a report about the lawyer is "advertising" if the lawyer's primary purpose in distributing it is to obtain retentions).

8. Regarding the third factor – the audience – N.Y. State 848 noted that a newsletter directed to existing clients or to other lawyers by definition did not constitute advertising. The same would apply to communications to former clients germane to the earlier representation, and to communications to prospective clients who have expressed interest in, and requested information about, a lawyer's services.

Newsletters to Customers of Lenders for Whom the Law Office Has Performed Services

9. The facts as presented here do not provide sufficient information for us to determine whether the newsletter would be considered an advertisement if sent to persons other than the audience described above, but the questions raised by the inquiry are in many respects similar to those we discussed in N.Y. State 1110 (2016). In that opinion, we analyzed whether a lawyer could sponsor seminars and webinars in the inquirer's field and send invitations to addresses found on commercially available business entity lists. We noted that the answer to the inquirer's questions depended on whether the seminars, or the advertising for the seminars, would constitute "advertising" within the meaning of Rule 1.0(a), and "solicitation" within the meaning of Rule 7.3(b).

10. If the seminar (or the publicity for it) did not constitute advertising, we opined in N.Y. State 1110 that the provisions of Rule 7.1 would not apply. And if Rule 7.1 did not apply, then the prohibitions of Rule 7.3 would not apply either, because a communication cannot be a solicitation unless it first meets the definition of an "advertisement." However, we also opined that if the seminars (or the publicity for them) did constitute advertising, then the inquirer must adhere to Rule 7.1. Moreover, if the seminar (or the publicity) was targeted at specific recipients and a significant motive was the inquirer's pecuniary gain, then the seminars (or the publicity) constituted "solicitation" and the provisions of Rule 7.3 would also apply. If the seminar (or the publicity) also involved interactive computer-accessed communication, then they would be prohibited as in-person solicitation unless the seminar was advertised only to current and former clients and close friends or relatives of the inquirer.

11. Here, if the primary purpose of the newsletter is educational (i.e., to educate recipients about new developments in the law as opposed to attracting clients), then it may be sent to a larger audience than just current and former clients. However, if the content of the newsletter is primarily about the lawyer or law firm (e.g., the firm's cases, personnel, clients or achievements), then the primary purpose would be deemed to be the "retention of clients," and the newsletter generally would be considered to be advertising, so the law firm would have to comply with Rule 7.1. See N.Y. State 1001 (2014) (giving an example of a newsletter that we considered to be an "advertisement"). Moreover, because the newsletter would then be an "advertisement" targeted to a particular audience, it would constitute a "solicitation" within the meaning of Rule 7.3, and the law firm would also have to comply with all of the requirements and prohibitions in Rule 7.3.

Utilizing Information from a Third-Party Brokerage Firm and Providing Attribution

12. No Rule prohibits the law firm from including information in the newsletter provided by the Brokerage Firm. If the newsletter is advertising, however, the law firm must ensure that none of the content "contains statements or claims that are false, deceptive or misleading." Rule 7.1(a).

13. Similarly, the Rules do not prohibit the lawyer from truthfully identifying the source of the market data by attributing the data to the Brokerage Firm.

May the Law Firm Accept Payment from the Brokerage Firm to Offset Publication Costs?

14. In N.Y. State 1001 (2014), we determined that a law firm was permitted to sell third-party advertising in the law firm newsletter, as long as the law firm did not charge rates for the advertising suggestive of an improper referral fee and there was no other explicit or implicit understanding between the law firm and the advertiser suggestive of a referral arrangement. Here, the Brokerage Firm is not paying for advertising per se in the newsletter, but it is paying to help the law firm offset the costs of publishing the newsletter. We therefore think that the basic principles stated in Opinion 1001 apply here. The law firm may accept payment to defray the costs of publishing the newsletter, but the law firm may not accept payments in exchange for referring clients to the Brokerage Firm. Similarly, the law firm should ensure that the newsletter does not contain an express or implied recommendation of the Brokerage Firm's services.

15. If the Brokerage Firm is paying the law firm to include its data, then the law firm should disclose this fact to the readers of the newsletter.

16. The law firm must also consider whether accepting money from the Brokerage Firm will affect its ability to undertake representations of clients in transactions in which the Brokerage Firm provides real estate brokerage services. Rule 1.7 prohibits a lawyer from representing a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial or personal interests. If the payment from the Brokerage Firm to offset the publication costs of the newsletter are significant, then a reasonable lawyer would conclude there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be affected in a real estate transaction where the Brokerage Firm will receive a commission only if the transaction closes.

17. The question would then be whether the lawyer's personal conflict of interest is subject to client consent under Rule 1.7(b) with full disclosure of the lawyer's conflict. Under Rule 1.7(b) the lawyer may undertake the representation with the informed consent of the client, confirmed in writing, as long as the lawyer reasonably believes the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation and the other conditions of Rule 1.7(b) are met. We have issued a number of opinions concluding that client consent may be obtained where the lawyer receives compensation from a third party. See N.Y. State 958 (2013) (lawyer receives referral fee for introducing clients to prospective investors); N.Y. State 667 (1994) (lawyer receives referral fee from a mortgage broker); N.Y. State 461 (1977) (lawyer receives referral fee from fire adjuster). The inquirer will have to determine whether he reasonably believes he can provide competent and diligent representation to clients in matters where the Brokerage Firm's interests are also implicated.

CONCLUSION:

18. If the primary purpose of a law firm's newsletter is educational, it does not constitute an advertisement and may be sent to a larger audience than current and former clients without having to comply with Rules 7.1 and 7.3. However, if the primary purpose of the newsletter is to provide information or news primarily about the lawyer or law firm (e.g., the firm's cases, personnel, clients or achievements) it generally will be considered advertising to generate business, and must comply with Rules 7.1. Moreover, because copies of the newsletter sent to customers of the law firm's bank client would then be an "advertisement" targeted to a particular audience, it would constitute a "solicitation" within the meaning of Rule 7.3, and the law firm would also have to comply with all of the requirements and prohibitions in Rule 7.3. The law firm may accept newsletter content from a real estate brokerage firm, may acknowledge the source of the content and may accept payments from the real estate brokerage firm to defray the cost of publishing the newsletter, as long as the law firm does not accept money for referring business to the brokerage firm.

TOPIC: Conflicts; Town Attorney

DIGEST: A nonconsentable conflict exists when one member of a law firm acts as Town Attorney on, among other things, planning and zoning matters and another lawyer in the firm seeks to represent an applicant before the Town's planning board.

RULES: 1.0 (f), (r) & (w), 1.7(a), 1.7(b)

FACTS:

1. The inquiring law firm represents a Town. One of the firm's partners serves as Town Attorney, with principal responsibility for advising the Town Board, while another partner, as Deputy Town Attorney, chiefly advises the Planning Board and the Zoning Board of Appeals. Another lawyer affiliated with the firm ("Lawyer X") concentrates in, among other things, zoning matters for private clients.

2. The inquiry arises out of a plot of land located within the Town in close proximity to residential properties and a school. Another government entity (not the Town) once owned the plot but has since sold it. Upon this sale, the Town changed the zoning of the plot from Limited Industrial to Residential, apparently to prevent expanded industrial use of the plot owing to limited access to the plot. Apart from a railway line, the only access is over a residential street.

3. Recently, a company ("Owner") has acquired a portion of the plot and proposes to expand its existing business there in what the inquirer characterizes as a "low-intensity" use. The inquiry states that the Town Board supports this proposal as long as the Owner limits its use of the plot to the proposed low-intensity use, and therefore intends to return the plot's zoning to Limited Industrial. Lawyer X proposes to represent the Owner in the rezoning application to the Planning Board.

4. The plot cannot be rezoned unless the Town Board adopts a local law. Following referral to the County Planning Department for a review and recommendation, the matter will go to the Town Planning Board for a site plan review. The principal function of a planning board "is to approve site plans, subdivision plats, and conditionally permitted uses of property. Town Law §§ 274-a, 276." N.Y. State 630 (1992). Thus, two of the firm's lawyers would be acting for the Town and its Planning Board on the application, while another lawyer in the same firm would be acting for the Owner as applicant.

5. The inquirer expresses confidence that each lawyer will exercise independent professional judgment for the lawyer's clients, and states that each of the clients is prepared to sign a waiver of any conflict.

QUESTION:

6. May a lawyer in a firm act for a private client in applying to the Town Zoning Board for zoning changes, where other members of the firm currently serve as Town Attorney and Deputy Town Attorney, with responsibility for advising the Town on zoning and planning matters, as long as the Town and the private client each give informed consent?

OPINION:

7. This Committee interprets the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"). We assume for purposes of this opinion that the proposed representation would not violate any applicable law governing Town Attorneys and their firms, including, but not limited to, the Public Officers Law, General Municipal Law, the Town Law, and the Town's own Ethics Code. See, e.g., General Municipal Law §§ 800 – 812 (Conflicts of Interest of Municipal Officers and Employees). We do not opine on such questions.

Concurrent Conflicts of Interest

8. Absent informed consent from each affected client, Rule 1.7(a) prohibits concurrent representations when a reasonable lawyer would conclude that either:

> (1) the representation will involve the lawyer in representing differing interests; or
> (2) there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests. [Emphasis supplied.]

9. With exceptions not applicable here, when lawyers are associated in a firm, none of them may knowingly represent a client when any one of them practicing alone would be prohibited from doing so. Rule 1.10(a). This Rule applies to attorneys employed by the government, whether full-time or part-time. N.Y. State 1065 (2015) (imputing part-time prosecutor's conflict to entire firm).

10. "Differing interests" are defined in Rule 1.0(f) to include "every interest that will adversely affect either the judgment or the loyalty of a lawyer to a client, whether it be a conflicting, inconsistent, diverse or other interest." In N.Y. State 603 (1989) we declined to apply a per se rule of disqualification to all instances in which a part-time assistant city attorney represents a private client before city agencies. Instead, we employed a functional analysis of the relationship between the proposed representation and the nature of the lawyer's public function. Applying that functional test, we held in Opinion 603 that neither a part-time assistant city attorney nor any other lawyer in his private law firm could represent clients before the city agencies with which the attorney was associated. In contrast, N.Y. State 630 (1992) involved a lawyer who served a town as special counsel for particular subject matters not involving the town's planning or zoning boards. There, we said the lawyer could represent a private client before the planning and zoning boards because we were not persuaded that the interests of the private client were necessarily so conflicting, diverse or inconsistent with the interests of the town as to adversely affect the lawyer's judgment or loyalty to either client, i.e. the lawyer would not per se be representing "differing interests."

11. Nevertheless, in N.Y. State 630 (1992), we cautioned:

> A critical factor in our conclusion is that special counsel ordinarily has limited duties and responsibilities and does not have the town-wide responsibilities and influence of the town attorney or permanent member of his or her staff. A different rule would apply where the nature or volume of legal work handled by special counsel makes him or her the functional equivalent of a regular, ongoing member of the town attorney's > staff, or where the subject matter of the particular representation is of such overriding importance to the town that special counsel is perceived as having significant influence with the planning or zoning board of appeals. In those situations, . . . the duty of undivided loyalty and the heightened danger of compromising confidences and secrets, coupled with the "special sensitivity" required of lawyers for the public to "take special care not to accept employment which would tend to undermine public confidence in the integrity and efficiency of the legal system," would preclude representation of private clients before agencies whose legal representation is under the umbrella of the town attorney's office. [Citations omitted.]

12. This caveat in N.Y. State 630 teaches that a lawyer who is town attorney may not concurrently represent private clients whose interests are adverse to the town – and Rule 1.10(a) imputes the town attorney's conflicts to his entire firm. The duty of undivided loyalty, and the special sensitivity required of lawyers for the public not to accept employment that would tend to undermine public confidence in the integrity of the legal system, are paramount. See also Rule 1.11(f)(2) ("A lawyer who holds public office shall not . . . use the public position to influence, or attempt to influence, a tribunal to act in favor of . . . a client."); Rule 1.11, Cmt. [3] (Rule 1.11(f) is designed to "prevent the lawyer from exploiting public office for the advantage of another client").

13. Opinion 630 was decided under the predecessor to the current Rules: DR 5-105(A) of the New York Lawyer's Code of Professional Responsibility, which, like Rule 1.7(a), addressed conflicts of interest in concurrent representations. The language of the two provisions is not identical but the variances are immaterial to us here. By either standard, a conflict is present here. One of the lawyers in the firm represents the planning board and the zoning board of appeals. An application for a zoning change is essentially a negotiation between the Town and the Owner whereby each party seeks to optimize its own interests in the decision of whether to grant a variance and the terms of such variance. Moreover, a personal interest conflict is present, since there is a significant risk that the independent professional judgment of the lawyers involved will be affected by the personal interest of the attorneys for the Town in continuing representation with the Town or in the interests of the firm in remaining in the good graces of the Owner.

Exceptions to the Prohibition Against Concurrent Representation of Conflicting Interests

14. Concluding that a conflict of interest exists does not end the inquiry. We must also determine whether the conflict is consentable (i.e., waivable).

15. We have previously held that a governmental entity may consent to a conflict of interest as long as the conflict is consentable under the Rules. In N.Y. State 629 (1992), for example, we said that a lawyer in private practice who had previously represented a governmental entity could later represent a client with interests adverse to the government, as long as the lawyer obtained the consent of the governmental entity and (i) the lawyer was reasonably certain both that the entity was legally authorized to waive the conflict of interest and that all legal prerequisites to the consent had been satisfied, and (ii) the lawyer reasonably believed that the process by which the consent was granted was sufficient to preclude any reasonable perception that the consent was provided in a manner inconsistent with the public trust. But the conflict in Opinion 629 was a conflict with the private lawyer's former client, not with a current client, and therefore did not raise the question of "differing interests" that arises when a lawyer or law firm seeks to oppose a current client. Here, the inquiry revolves around a potential conflict between two current clients of the same law firm.

16. In Opinion 630, we did not expressly address whether informed consent could mitigate a government lawyer's conflict because we found no conflict. Here we have found a conflict, so we must analyze whether consent can cure the conflict.

17. Rule 1.7(b) provides:

> Notwithstanding the existence of a concurrent conflict of interest under Rule 1.7(a), a lawyer may represent a client if:
> (1) the lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client;
> (2) the representation is not prohibited by law;
> (3) the representation does not involve the assertion of a claim by one client against another client represented by the lawyer in the same litigation or other proceeding before a tribunal; and

Thus, the Rule authorizes consent to a conflict by the affected clients, unless one of the three circumstances in Rule 1.7(b)(1)-(3) applies, in which case the conflict is nonconsentable. If a conflict is nonconsentable, a lawyer may not even ask for a client's consent. As explained in Comment [14] to Rule 1.7: "If a lawyer does not reasonably believe that the conditions set forth in paragraph (b) can be met, the lawyer should neither ask for the client's consent nor provide representation on the basis of the client's consent. A client's consent to a nonconsentable conflict is ineffective." We must therefore examine the three circumstances in Rule 1.7(b).

18. The first circumstance, which is set out in Rule 1.7(b)(1), is that the lawyer "reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client." This "reasonable" belief standard is not purely subjective. See Rule 1.0(r) (reasonable belief, when used in reference to a lawyer, "denotes that the lawyer believes the matter in question and that the circumstances are such that the belief is reasonable.") Objective criteria, including public trust in the processes of government, are integral to the analysis. This analysis necessarily involves consideration of the public's reasonable view of a single law firm handling both sides of an issue that affects the public in a significant way, such as allowing industrial use of land abutting residential properties and an educational institution. Whether or not the issue provokes widespread controversy, we believe that our Opinion 630 correctly captures the ethical concerns that this inquiry raises. Where lawyers from a single law firm are both filing an application with a public agency on behalf of a private client and advising the government agency about the applied-for change in the town's current zoning and planning program, government decision-making is affected in ways that consent cannot ameliorate.

19. The second circumstance in Rule 1.7(b) that makes a conflict nonconsentable is that the representation is "prohibited by law." As noted above, whether the conflict here is prohibited by law is a legal question beyond the jurisdiction of this Committee, so we do not answer that question.

20. The third circumstance in Rule 1.7(b) that makes a conflict nonconsentable is that the representation involves the assertion of a claim by one client against another client represented by the lawyer in the same litigation or other proceeding before a tribunal. Here, there is a question about whether the matter before the planning board involves a "claim" by one client of the firm against another client. There is also a question about whether the planning board is a "tribunal" within the meaning of Rule 1.0(w) ("'Tribunal' denotes . . . an . . . administrative agency or other body acting in an adjudicative capacity," i.e. "when a neutral official, after the presentation of evidence or legal argument by a party or parties, will render a legal judgment directly affecting a party's interests in a particular matter."). See N.Y. State 838 (2010) (whether a rule-making or rate-making proceeding before an administrative agency should be considered as being before a "tribunal" is a question of fact; principles that would apply to the determination include whether the parties have the opportunity to present evidence and cross-examine other providers and whether the ultimate determination will be made by a person in a policy-making role or by an independent trier of fact such as an administrative law judge). Both questions involve issues of fact or law that are beyond our jurisdiction to determine. But if the representations here are prohibited by law, or if the planning board is a tribunal and the zoning application is a claim by one client against another client, then the conflict here is nonconsentable.

21. It does not matter that we lack power to resolve the issues raised by the second or third circumstances of Rule 1.7(b)(3), because Rule 1.7(b)(1) settles the question. A municipal zoning or planning board performs important functions which ordinarily involve public hearings. Typically, the advocate of any zoning change (here, presumably the counsel for the Owner) outlines the proposed change, while counsel for the board (here, a lawyer affiliated with the Owner's advocate) has the duty to question the proposal, raise concerns, and perhaps engage in direct negotiations with the party advocating the proposed change. During those negotiations, either the Owner or the Town may need to compromise or yield points. In addition, because the hearings are public, affected citizens – to whom the Town's counsel may owe duties – may voice their concerns about the proposed zoning change. The planning board must be neutral and free from bias when carrying out its duties. In these circumstances, lawyers from the same law firm who are representing potentially opposing parties could not reasonably conclude that each can provide competent and diligent representation to his or her client. This is especially true where the town attorney holds the heightened duties of counsel to the public, and the public will suffer if he provides anything less than competent and diligent representation to the Town.

22. For all these reasons, we believe the conflict here is nonconsentable.

CONCLUSION:

23. A nonconsentable conflict exists when one member of a law firm acts as Town Attorney on, among other things, planning and zoning matters while another lawyer in the same law firm seeks to represent an applicant before the Town's planning board.

Overrules N.Y. State 902 (2012) (as to payment of marketing fee)

TOPIC: Lead generation; lawyer paying for-profit company for leads DIGEST: A lawyer may pay a for-profit service for leads to potential clients obtained via a website on which potential clients provide contact information and agree to be contacted by a participating lawyer, as long as (i) the lawyer who contacts the potential client has been selected by transparent and mechanical methods that do not purport to be based on an analysis of the potential client's legal problem or the qualifications of the selected lawyer to handle that problem; (ii) the service does not explicitly or implicitly recommend any lawyer, and (iii) the website of the service complies with the requirements of Rule 7.1. A lawyer who purchases such a lead to a potential client may ethically telephone that potential client if the potential client has invited the lawyer selected by the service to make contact by telephone.

RULES: 1.0 (a) & (f), 1.5(g), 5.4, 7.1(a), (f) & (h), 7.2(a), 7.3

FACTS:

1. A lawyer wishes to pay a for-profit company that maintains an internet-based service (the "Service") directed at individuals or entities seeking a lawyer. Those who wish to be contacted by a lawyer submit their names and contact information (including the method the lawyer may use to contact them), their geographic locale, and the practice area in which they seek legal advice. The Service then searches its database of participating lawyers to identify all lawyers who state that they engage in the requested practice area in the requested locale. The Service selects a lawyer meeting the geographic and practice area criteria based on neutral (mechanical) criteria, such as the order in which the lawyers registered with the Service (the first lawyer to register gets the first lead; second lawyer gets the second lead, etc.). The selection method is clearly described to potential clients. The Service forwards the potential client's information to that lawyer.

2. The participating lawyer pays a fixed monthly fee to the Service or a fee for each such potential client, and the fee does not vary depending on whether the lead results in retention of the lawyer or the amount of the fee the lawyer charges the client if retained. If the potential client decides not to retain that lawyer or if the assigned lawyer has a conflict of interest and cannot represent the potential client, the potential client may request that the Service provide the client's information to another participating lawyer.

3. This opinion addresses the implications of this arrangement under the advertising, referral, and solicitation provisions in the New York Rules of Professional Conduct ("Rules").

QUESTIONS:

4. Does the Service's website constitute an "advertisement" by or on behalf of the lawyer for which the lawyer is responsible under the Rules?

5. Does the lawyer's payment to the Service for the names of potential clients constitute an impermissible payment for obtaining employment by the lawyer?

6. If the lawyer may use the Service, does the lawyer's outreach to the potential client constitute an impermissible "solicitation" or "advertisement' within the meaning of the Rules?

OPINION:

7. Because of the wide variation in the structure of the many web-based services operating in this area, this opinion does not attempt to address every factual permutation that may exist. This opinion also does not address whether the Service would implicate § 495(1)(d) of the Judiciary Law ("No corporation . . . shall . . . furnish attorneys or counsel"), which is a question of law beyond our jurisdiction.

Prior Committee Opinions

8. In N.Y. State 779 (2004) a lawyer wished to pay a marketing organization a fee in return for a bundle of pre-screened potential clients that might need representation regarding their federal income taxes. Applying the New York Code of Professional Responsibility (the "Code"), the predecessor to the current Rules, we concluded that accepting leads in this fashion was impermissible under DR 2-103(B), which provided, in pertinent part: "A lawyer shall not compensate or give anything of value to a person or organization to recommend or obtain employment by a client."

9. In N.Y. State 799 (2006), this Committee addressed whether a lawyer could ethically pay to participate in a website that forwarded inquiries from potential clients to lawyers who then contacted the prospect by telephone, where the service purported to analyze the prospective client's problem. N.Y. State 799 opined that, subject to the rules on attorney advertising, a lawyer may pay to be included in "an online 'directory' . . . that provides tools by which a potential client can filter a list of attorneys by geography and/or practice area," and opined that such an on-line directory did not violate DR 2-103(B). The Committee stated, however, that the line between a permissible "directory" and an impermissible "recommendation" would be crossed when the service purports to analyze the prospective client's problem:

> We find that the line is crossed . . . when a website purports to recommend a particular lawyer or lawyers for the prospective client's problem, based on an analysis of that problem. For example, if a potential client describes a slip-and-fall incident on an intake form and the website determines that the problem calls for a personal injury lawyer and then recommends one or more lawyers in that area, the website is 'recommending' those lawyers.

(Emphasis in original.) On that basis, Opinion 799 distinguished a searchable directory from the website service addressed in N.Y. State 779.

10. Finally, in N.Y. State 902 (2012) the Committee held that a lawyer could not pay a marketing company a fixed fee each time the marketer makes an introduction to a potential client.

11. The current inquiry implicates provisions whose language is in many respects identical to the provisions addressed in Opinions 779, 799 and 902, including Rule 7.2(a), which incorporates the above-quoted restriction of its predecessor, DR 2-103(B). The questions presented here are whether a New York lawyer who uses the Service runs afoul of the principles reflected in those opinions. We believe that such a lawyer would not violate the Rules if the lawyer abides by the conditions set forth in this opinion.

Advertising and Required Disclosures

12. Rule 7.1 governs lawyer advertisements. Rule 1.0(a) defines "advertisement" for purposes of the various advertising restrictions in the Rules. It provides:

> "Advertisement" means any public or private communication made by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm about that lawyer or the law firm's services, the primary purpose of which is for the retention of the lawyer or law firm.

Here, the Service's website is a communication "on behalf of" a lawyer "about" the lawyer's services for the "primary purpose" of retention of the lawyer. It is therefore an "advertisement" within the meaning of Rule 1.0(a).

13. Rule 7.1(a) prohibits a lawyer from participating in an advertisement that "(1) contains statements or claims that are false, deceptive or misleading; or (2) violates a Rule." Rule 7.1 also requires that certain advertisements contain prescribed disclosures, such as the label "Attorney Advertising," and information about the lawyer whose services are advertised. See Rules 7.1(f), 7.1(h). Even though the Service, not the lawyer, creates and disseminates the Service's website, each participating lawyer is "participat[ing] in the use and dissemination of" this advertisement within the meaning of Rule 7.1(a) and therefore has a duty to assure that the website is consistent with Rule 7.1. This means that a participating lawyer must determine that the website does not make false, misleading, or deceptive statements or claims, or otherwise violate the Rules.

14. Rule 7.1(h) requires that "[a]ll advertisements shall include the name, principal law office and telephone number of the lawyer or law firm whose services are being offered." We have previously concluded that lawyers may not engage in advertising on the internet, including "group advertising," without complying with this Rule. See, e.g., N.Y. State 839 (2010) ("Group radio advertisement that does not broadcast the lawyer's name, principal law office address and telephone number, but instead directs listeners to contact an agent who provides that information, is prohibited under Rule 7.1(h).").

15. The question raised by N.Y. State 839 is how the Service's website may operate consistently with Rule 7.1(h). N.Y. State 597 (1989) provides one possible solution. In that opinion, each lawyer was assigned a specific geographical area – either a county or a zip code. Applying the Code, the Committee said that it was irrelevant that the operator of the service had no discretion in choosing lawyers for potential clients. If the client was not choosing a particular lawyer, the referral was prohibited. Nevertheless, the Committee stated that the conclusion would be different if an advertisement not only contains an 800 number, but also "presents in a meaningful fashion the names of the lawyers or law firms participating in the group advertisement, along with their addresses and the geographical areas assigned to them, so that the potential client knows the identity of the lawyer to whom his call will be referred and there is no discretion in referrals on the part of the advertising agent."

16. Here, the Service can comply with Rule 7.1(h) by providing a link to either (i) a list of all participating attorneys with the required contact information or (ii) a list of all participating attorneys who fall within the geographic and practice area parameters that may be set by the potential client, along with the required contact information. In this way, the potential client will know the names and addresses of the lawyers from which the Service may designate a lawyer who will contact the potential client.

Referrals and Referral Fees

17. Rule 7.2(a) states that a lawyer shall not "compensate or give anything of value to a person or organization to recommend or obtain employment by a client, or as a reward for having made a recommendation resulting in employment by a client . . . ." The Rule contains three exceptions that are not relevant to this inquiry: (1) referrals without monetary rewards permitted by Rule 5.8, (2) referrals to another lawyer permitted by Rule 1.5(g), and (3) referrals by a qualified legal assistance organization (defined in Rule 1.0(p) as one of the types of organizations listed in Rule 7.2(b)(1) – (4)). The Service here is not operated or sponsored by a bona fide non-profit community organization or operated, sponsored or approved by a bar association and therefore does not constitute a qualified legal assistance organization.

18. Since the Service here does not qualify for any of the exceptions in Rule 7.2(a), Rule 7.2(a) is a problem if the lawyer pays the Service to "recommend" the lawyer or if the lawyer pays the Service to obtain employment by a client. Nevertheless, Comment [1] to Rule 7.2 makes clear that a lawyer may pay for advertising permitted by the Rules without violating the prohibition against "paying to obtain employment" within the meaning of Rule 7.2(a). Consequently, if the Service complies with the advertising rules and the lawyer's payment is reasonable for that form of advertising, a lawyer's using the Service will not run afoul of Rule 7.2 unless the Service is deemed to "recommend" the lawyer.

19. Comment [1] to Rule 7.2 includes a definition of the term "recommendation":

> A communication contains a recommendation if it endorses or vouches for a lawyer's credentials, abilities, competence, character, or other professional qualities.

20. As we observed in Opinion 799, to "recommend" also includes identifying a particular lawyer or lawyers to a potential client as "a right" or "the right" lawyer for the client's situation after an analysis of either the potential client's legal problem or the lawyer's qualifications to address that problem. We believe identifying "a right" or "the right" lawyer implies some qualitative, comparative assessment of the lawyers available to perform the services the potential client requires.

21. We believe that the Service would not constitute a "recommendation" as long as the Service's advertising does not state or imply that the Service is making a recommendation and makes clear that (i) being included on its list of participating lawyers requires only a payment and the Service does not vet the qualifications of such lawyers, other than, for example, confirming the lawyer's good standing with the licensing authority, if that is the case, (ii) the Service's selection of a participating lawyer from that list is the result of a neutral process that involves no evaluative judgment, and (iii) when a lawyer is chosen by the Service, it does not mean the selected lawyer is the "best" or "right" lawyer for the client's needs or that the lawyer is otherwise preferred over other lawyers. If these three conditions are met, a lawyer's payment to the Service to participate in its matching service as a lawyer available to contact potential clients is permissible under Rule 7.2(a).

22. These three conditions are consistent with Comment [1] to Rule 7.2, which was amended in 2015 to provide guidance on how the prohibition on paying for referrals or employment applies to paying for client leads. Comment [1] says, in part:

> [A] lawyer may pay others for generating clients leads, such as Internet-based client leads, as long as (i) the lead generator does not recommend the lawyers, (ii) any payment to the lead generator is consistent with Rules 1.5(g) (division of fees) and 5.4 (professional independence of the lawyer), (iii) the lawyer complies with Rule 1.8(f) (prohibiting interference with a lawyer's independent professional judgment by a person who recommends the lawyer's services), and (iv) the lead generator's communications are consistent with Rules 7.1 (Advertising) and 7.3 (Solicitation and Recommendation of Professional Employment). To comply with Rule 7.1, a lawyer must not pay a lead generator that states, implies, or creates a reasonable impression that it is recommending the lawyer, is making the referral without payment from the lawyer, or has analyzed a person's legal problems when determining which lawyer should receive the referral. See also Rule 5.3 (Lawyer's Responsibility for Conduct of Nonlawyers).

The New York State Bar Association's Committee on Standards of Attorney Conduct ("COSAC"), which recommended the amendment to Comment [1], explained the amendment as follows:

> The Internet and other technologies have made it possible for lawyers to find clients in ways that did not exist five or ten years ago, and have enabled nonlawyers to develop new ways to assist lawyers in finding new clients. COSAC recommends amending Comment [1] to Rule 7.2 to clarify the situations in which a lawyer may pay others for generating client leads gathered from the Internet or elsewhere.

See New York State Bar Association, Committee on Standards of Attorney Conduct, Proposed Amendments to the New York Rules of Professional Conduct and Related Comments 3 (December 23, 2014).

23. The first condition in amended Comment [1] is that the lead generator not recommend (or imply or create a reasonable impression that it is recommending) the lawyers. Thus, a lawyer using the Service must assure that neither the Service nor the advertising for the Services states or implies that the Service is recommending any lawyer, because false, deceptive or misleading communications violate Rule 7.1(a)(1). This means that the Service must be transparent about the methodology it uses to select lawyers. To ensure that the Service does not suggest to potential clients that the Service is comparing the relative merits of lawyers in order to choose a specific lawyer to contact the potential client, the Service must provide sufficient information to make clear that (i) lawyers pay to participate in the Service, (ii) the selection of a lawyer by the system is not based on an analysis of the potential client's legal problem, (iii) the selection is not a recommendation nor does it imply that the lawyer selected is the "right" or "best" or preferred lawyer to handle the problem, and (iv) the selection is not an evaluation of the quality of the selected lawyer's work. An element of the Service that is solely fact-based (for instance, that the Service accepts only participating lawyers who are in good standing in their jurisdiction of practice), unadorned by evaluative measures or ratings, likewise would not render the Service's selection of a lawyer a recommendation if the Service is indeed objective.

24. Another condition set out in the excerpt from Comment [1] quoted above is that any payment to the lead generator must be consistent with Rules 1.5(g) and 5.4. We see no issue under Rules 1.5(g) and 5.4 as long as the lawyer is paying the Service a fixed sum to participate, unrelated to the lawyer's retention or the amount the lawyer charges in legal fees. Paying a fixed fee to the Service is essentially paying a marketing fee. Our Opinion 902 (2012) is hereby overruled to the extent it prohibited payment of the marketing fee described in this opinion.

25. A final condition set out in Comment [1] to Rule 7.2 is that the lawyer must comply with Rule 1.8(f). Thus the lawyer must prevent interference with the lawyer's exercise of independent professional judgment. In our view, the Service's selection method and communication protocols described above raise no apparent risks in that regard.

26. Our conclusion that the Rules permit the type of arrangement at issue here also finds support in numerous ethics opinions issued by other ethics committees. See ABA/BNA Lawyers' Manual on Professional Conduct: Advertising and Solicitation 81:709; Zelotes v. Rousseau, N. 09-0412, 26 Law. Man. Prof. Conduct 134 (Conn. Statewide Grievance Comm. Feb. 8, 2010) (dismissing disciplinary complaints against Connecticut lawyers for participating in ClearBankruptcy.com and TotalBankruptcy.com, noting that the websites did not endorse participating lawyers but bore disclaimers to the contrary and required potential clients to initiate contact by visiting the websites and voluntarily providing information); Arizona Op. 11-02 (lawyer may join an internet group advertisement listing no more than one lawyer for each zip code if program does not imply endorsement, if it is labelled as advertising, and if lawyer has paid for exclusive zip code listing); District of Columbia Op. 302 (lawyers may pursue legal work through paying a fee to access web page where potential clients post requests for bids on legal work); Nassau County (N.Y.) Ethics Op. 01-4, 17 Law. Man. Prof. Conduct 123 (2001) (subject to the operational structure and content described in the opinion, a lawyer may affiliate with an online legal services website); Nebraska Op. 07-05 (lawyer may participate in internet lawyer directory which identifies itself as a directory, disclaims being a referral service and only lists basic information about lawyers without recommending specific lawyers and charges a reasonable, flat annual advertising fee); New Jersey Committee on Attorney Advertising Op. 36 (2006) (lawyer may pay flat fee to internet marketing company for exclusive website listing for particular county in specific practice area if listing includes prominent, unmistakable disclaimer stating the listings are paid advertisements and not endorsements or authorized referrals); North Carolina Op. 2004-1 (lawyer may participate in for-profit online service that is a hybrid referral service-legal directory, provided there is no fee-sharing with the service and communications are truthful); Oregon Op. 2007-180 (2007) (lawyer may pay nationwide internet referral service for listing if listing is not false or misleading and does not imply that the lawyer can represent clients outside jurisdictions of the lawyer's license, fee is not based on number of referrals, retained clients or revenue generated by listing and the service does not exercise discretion in matching clients with lawyers); Rhode Island 2005-01 (permitting website that enables lawyers to post information about their services and respond to anonymous requests for legal services in exchange for flat annual membership fee if website exercises no discretion over which requests lawyers may access); South Carolina 01-03 (lawyer may pay internet advertising service fee determined by the number of "hits" that the service produces for the lawyer provided that the service does not steer business to any particular lawyer and the payments are not based on whether user ultimately becomes a client); Texas Op. 573 (2006) (lawyer may participate in for-profit internet service that matches potential clients and lawyers if selection process is fully automated and performed by computers without the exercise of human discretion); Virginia Advertising Op. A-0117 (2006) (lawyer may participate in online lawyer directory in which publisher does not recommend or steer business to particular lawyers).

Solicitation and Permissible Contact

27. Finally, a lawyer who purchases leads must comply with applicable restrictions on the solicitation of potential clients. A solicitation, as defined by Rule 7.3(b), is an advertisement "initiated by or on behalf of a lawyer" that is targeted at a specific recipient or group of recipients and intended to secure the lawyer's retention for pecuniary gain. However, Rule 7.3(b) also contains an exception: a solicitation "does not include a proposal or other writing prepared and delivered in response to a specific request." If the potential client (the "lead") has specifically requested or consented to a phone call, then the lawyer's phone call is not a solicitation because it is not "initiated by or on behalf of" the lawyer. Rather the phone call is initiated in response to a specific "request" by the potential client. Although the exception in Rule 7.3(b) refers to a proposal or other "writing" delivered in response to a client's request, we think a writing is just one example and that the exception also applies to a request by a potential client to be contacted in any specified manner, including by telephone, text, email or otherwise. See N.Y. State 1049 (2015) (where a potential client posts a message on a website asking to be contacted by a lawyer about a legal problem, a lawyer may respond in the manner invited by the client); N.Y. State 1014 (2014) (where detainee communicates through another detainee that he desires to be contacted by a particular lawyer, the lawyer's response is not a solicitation, because the communication was initiated by the prospective client).

CONCLUSION:

28. A lawyer may pay a for-profit service for leads to potential clients obtained via a website on which potential clients provide contact information and agree to be contacted by a participating lawyer, as long as (i) the lawyer who contacts the potential client has been selected by transparent and mechanical methods that do not purport to be based on an analysis of the potential client's legal problem or the qualifications of the selected lawyer to handle that problem; (ii) the service does not explicitly or implicitly recommend any lawyer, and (iii) the website of the service complies with the requirements of Rule 7.1. A lawyer who purchases such a lead to a potential client may telephone that potential client if the party has invited a telephonic communication by the lawyer selected by the service.

OPINION 1132 (08/08/2017)

TOPIC: Paying nonlawyers for a recommendation or referral

DIGEST: A lawyer may not pay the current marketing fee to participate in Avvo Legal Services, because the fee includes an improper payment for a recommendation in violation of Rule 7.2(a).

RULES: 1.0(a), 5.4(a), 7.1(a), 7.1(b)(1), 7.1(f). 7.1(h), 7.2(a)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a lawyer who wishes to participate in Avvo Legal Services, which is a service of Avvo, Inc. Avvo, Inc. is a privately-owned corporation that describes itself as an online legal services marketplace. (Avvo, Inc. and Avvo Legal Services are sometimes each referred to in this opinion as "Avvo" and lawyers who offer Avvo Legal Services are referred to as "participating lawyers"). The inquirer would offer legal services through Avvo's website and pay the marketing fees that Avvo charges to lawyers who obtain clients via the Avvo website. The inquirer asks whether the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") permit New York lawyers to pay Avvo's marketing fees. Because Avvo's method of operation is crucial to our response, we will devote several paragraphs to describing the Avvo Legal Services product.

2. Avvo allows potential clients to choose participating lawyers in various practice areas for a fixed (i.e., flat) fee. The Avvo website (www.avvo.com) says: "Experienced lawyers on demand. Hire yours" and "Work with highly rated, local lawyers near you," and it contains a guide called "How to find and hire a great lawyer."

Avvo Ratings

3. Avvo assigns every lawyer in a jurisdiction an "Avvo rating." The rating is calculated based on information Avvo collects from lawyer websites and other public sources (such as the type of work the lawyer does and the number of years the lawyer has been engaged in that work), as well as on information the lawyer has chosen to add to the lawyer's Avvo profile (such as publications, CLE presentations, speaking engagements and positions with bar associations and their committees). Avvo's website says that each attorney's rating "is calculated using a mathematical model, and all lawyers are evaluated on the same set of standards. . . . At Avvo, all lawyers are treated equally." Avvo does not seek or accept any payment for an Avvo rating. However, lawyers who supply more information may receive higher ratings than lawyers who supply less information. Avvo says it scores all information objectively, and does not use subjective data such as client reviews. Although Avvo assigns a rating to all lawyers in a jurisdiction, lawyers cannot offer their services through Avvo unless they meet Avvo's minimum criteria and sign up with Avvo to be listed on the site and agree to Avvo's pricing schedule and marketing fees. According to Avvo, the criteria for participation include a minimum Avvo Rating, a minimum client review score, and a clean disciplinary history.

How a Prospective Client Chooses a Lawyer and Service

4. A prospective client seeking legal services through Avvo first chooses an area of law practice and a state or city. (Avvo lists all 50 states and the District of Columbia, and separately lists about 50 major cities.) The Avvo site says: "Choose an area of law to find top-rated attorneys near you." The site lists numerous areas of law practice, such as Business, Family, Government, Immigration, Bankruptcy and Debt, Criminal Defense, Landlord & Tenant, Employment & Labor, Real Estate, and Estate Planning.

5. Next, the prospective client chooses a type of legal service or "package." The Avvo website says: "Packages include advice sessions, document reviews, and start-to-finish support." Advice sessions (called "Avvo Advisor") come in two varieties – the prospective client may either (i) click on a specific lawyer, who is required by Avvo to call back within one business day, or (ii) click on "have a lawyer call me now," in which case Avvo sends a text message to all lawyers in the selected practice area and locale, and the first available lawyer calls the prospective client. When using the first of these varieties of advice session, the client is free to choose from the entire list of lawyers who are licensed in the client's state and who offer the service the client seeks to purchase.

6. Avvo's website does not say, "We recommend that you choose this lawyer," or "This lawyer is the best fit for your situation." Rather, Avvo furnishes information about lawyers (including client reviews, peer reviews, and Avvo ratings) and allows clients to choose the lawyer. Avvo describes its service as simply "facilitating a marketplace" where consumers can choose from among all of Avvo's participating lawyers.

7. Once the prospective client has chosen a lawyer (or opted for "have a lawyer contact me now") and selected a specified legal service, the client clicks on a button that says "Buy now." The lawyer then contacts the client. (Phone calls from a participating lawyer to a client initially go through an automated Avvo "switchboard" so that Avvo can time the calls, but Avvo asserts that it cannot listen to the calls.) Once the lawyer and client have completed a phone call of at least eight minutes, Avvo charges the client's credit card for the full amount of the fee for the selected legal service.

Avvo's Satisfaction Guarantee

8. Part of the Avvo product is that Avvo gives a "satisfaction guarantee" and will refund the fee to the client (or allow the client to choose a different participating lawyer at no additional charge) if (a) the lawyer does not deliver the services for which the client has paid, or (b) the client is not satisfied with the lawyer's services. Avvo's website describes the satisfaction guarantee as follows:

> If you're not 100% happy with the service you purchased, we'll make it right.
> We stand behind our services and expect our clients to be 100% satisfied with their experience. If you are unhappy with the service you purchased, we'll make it right. We will help you switch lawyers or services to make sure you get the legal help you need, at no cost to you. If you don't want to continue to solve your issue through Avvo Legal Services, we will fully refund your purchase.
> What if I don't get the results I expect?
> We guarantee the services listed on our website, but we can't guarantee any specific outcome. Every legal case is unique. The success of your case depends on many different factors.

> How do I request a refund or file a complaint?
> To file a complaint or seek a refund, contact customer care. . . . Depending on your situation, documentation may be needed. Your customer care rep will work with you to fix the situation to your satisfaction.

Avvo considers this satisfaction guarantee to be part of its marketing costs, reasoning that the satisfaction guarantee makes participating lawyers more attractive than lawyers who do not offer a satisfaction guarantee.

Avvo's Marketing Fee

9. At the beginning of each month, Avvo pays each participating attorney all of the legal fees generated through Avvo by that attorney in the previous month, and separately charges each attorney a "marketing fee" for each legal service the attorney has completed during the prior month (unless Avvo has refunded the client's payment). As an example, Avvo's website tells lawyers that "if a client purchases a $149 document review service with you, you will be paid the full $149 client payment into your deposits account. As a separate transaction, you will be charged a $40 marketing fee from your withdrawals account." See http://bit.ly/2fIlOxM ("Attorney FAQ for Avvo Legal Services").

10. The amount of Avvo's marketing fee depends on the service. For more expensive legal services, Avvo generally charges lawyers a higher marketing fee. An FAQ on Avvo's website explains the marketing fee as follows: "The amount depends on the service, and ranges from a $10 marketing fee for a $39 service, to $40 marketing fee for a $149 service, up to a $400 marketing fee for a $2,995 service." As these examples show, the marketing fee is not directly proportional to the price of the legal service – a $10 marketing fee is 25.6% of a $39 service and a $40 marketing fee is 26.8% of a $149 service, but a $400 marketing fee is only 13.4% of a $2995 service.[1] Thus, the marketing fee is not a fixed percentage of the legal fees, but it is generally greater for higher-priced services than for lower-priced services.

11. To understand Avvo's rationale in setting its marketing fees, this Committee posed various questions directly to Avvo. Avvo explained that the correlation between its marketing fees and the price of Avvo legal services reflects two interrelated concepts.

12. First, Avvo says that more expensive legal services cost more to market. For example, Avvo says that its ad placements on Google and on online advertising networks cost more for more expensive services, and cost more for more competitive keywords. Also, Avvo's marketing fee covers the credit card processing fee, which is a fixed percentage of the total legal fee, so a higher legal fee necessarily entails a higher credit card processing fee.

1 Avvo also provided this Committee with a list of many additional services, prices, and marketing fees. For example, marketing fees are generally $30 for a $99 service (33.3%); $50 for a $199 service (25.1%); $80 for a $295 service (27.1%); $125 for a $595 service (21%); and $150 for a $495 service (30.3%); and $200 for a $995 service (20%). Thus, while the marketing fee increases in absolute dollars as the price of the service increases, the marketing fee generally decreases in percentage terms as the price increases. But in a few instances, Avvo charges the same marketing fee for services of different prices – for example, filing for an uncontested divorce is $995, and creating an estate plan bundle for an individual is $795, but Avvo charges a $200 marketing fee for both. Also, Avvo charges a different marketing fee for some services of the same price – for example, Avvo charges $199 to review a non-compete agreement, to petition for an alien relative, or to create an employment offer letter, but Avvo charges $50, $55, and $60 respectively as a marketing fee for those services.

13. Second, Avvo says that its customer service costs are higher for more expensive services. For example, Avvo says that its "platform usage" and "customer care" expenses are higher for more expensive services, because clients raise more questions about more expensive services. Avvo employs a team of live customer care representatives who handle client inquiries via phone, email, and electronic chat – see https://support.avvo.com/hc/en-us/requests/new. In addition, Avvo says that requests for refunds, voids, chargebacks, and other forms of what it calls "breakage" are higher for more expensive services. We have not verified any of Avvo's facts or claims regarding its marketing expenses, but we accept them as true for purposes of our analysis in this opinion.

QUESTION:

14. May a New York lawyer pay Avvo's current marketing fee to participate in Avvo Legal Services?

OPINION:

Issues Not Decided Here

15. Avvo's mode of operation raises many questions under the Rules in addition to the marketing fee issue. For example:

- Avvo markets the services of participating lawyers. Rule 7.1(a) prohibits a lawyer from participating in an advertisement that "(1) contains statements or claims that are false, deceptive or misleading; or (2) violates a Rule." Rule 7.1(a) also requires that certain ads contain prescribed disclosures, such as the label "Attorney Advertising," and information about the lawyer whose services are advertised. See Rules 7.1(f), 7.1(h). Rule 1.0(a) defines an "advertisement" to mean "any public or private communication made by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm about that lawyer or law firm's services the primary purpose of which is for the retention of the layer or law firm." As we said in N.Y. State 1131 (2017):

  > Even though the Service, not the lawyer, creates and disseminates the Service's website, each participating lawyer is "participat[ing] in the use and dissemination of" this advertisement within the meaning of Rule 7.1(a) and therefore has a duty to assure that the website is consistent with Rule 7.1. This means that a participating lawyer must determine that the website does not make false, misleading or deceptive statements or claims, or otherwise violate the Rules.

- Under Rule 7.1(b)(1) and Comment [13] to Rule 7.1, lawyers may not use Avvo ratings (or any other ratings) in their advertising unless those ratings are "bona fide professional ratings." As noted in ¶ 19, the Avvo website constitutes advertising of lawyers who participate in Avvo Legal Services. Consequently, participating lawyers must determine whether the ratings provided by the service are bona fide. Comment [13] to Rule 7.1, headed "Bona Fide Professional Ratings," provides guidance, saying that ratings are not "bona fide" unless (among other things) the ratings "evaluate lawyers based on objective criteria or legitimate peer review in a manner unbiased by the rating service's economic interests," and are "not subject to improper influence by lawyers who are being evaluated." If the rating is not bona fide, it would be false and misleading in violation of Rule 7.1(a)(1). We lack sufficient facts to determine (and do not decide) whether Avvo's rating system meets the criteria for a bona fide professional rating.

- Many of the services under the Avvo Legal Services program involve limited services, such as a 15-minute advice session or review of a document and a 30-minute advice session but not revision of the document. Both the Rules and our opinions have approved limited scope representations under certain conditions that we do not repeat here. See Rule 1.2(c) and Cmts. [6] and [7], N.Y. State 856 (2011), N.Y. State 604 (1989).

- The fact that Avvo sets the amount of the legal fee for each service raises questions about whether a participating lawyer can deliver competent legal services for Avvo's chosen price and whether a lawyer is allowing Avvo to interfere in the lawyer's independent professional judgment regarding how much time to spend on a matter.

- The marketing fee raises questions about whether lawyers who participate in Avvo Legal Services are improperly sharing legal fees with a nonlawyer.[1]

- Avvo's satisfaction guarantee raises questions about confidentiality. If clients call Avvo to complain, does the "documentation" that Avvo asks for or receives include "confidential information" within the meaning of Rule 1.6(a)? How does Avvo avoid receiving confidential information when evaluating whether to refund the legal fee a client has paid through Avvo?

16. In this opinion, we do not address or answer any of those additional issues, because we believe our answer to the question posed by the inquirer is dispositive. Similarly, we express no opinion as to whether Avvo's operations implicate § 495(1)(d) of the Judiciary Law, which provides that "[n]o corporation . . . shall . . . furnish attorneys or counsel". That is a question of law beyond our jurisdiction. Instead, we focus in this opinion only on whether the marketing fee that Avvo charges to participating lawyers constitutes an improper payment for a recommendation (i.e., an improper referral fee) within the meaning of Rule 7.2(a) of the Rules.

Does the marketing fee constitute an improper payment for a recommendation?

17. Rule 7.2(a) sets forth the following general rule:

1 Several ethics opinions from other jurisdictions have concluded that lawyers working with Avvo or similar entities are engaged in improper fee sharing or are violating other Rules of Professional Conduct. For example, NJ ACPE 732 (2017) concluded that New Jersey lawyers "may not participate in the Avvo legal service programs because the programs improperly require the lawyer to share a legal fee with a nonlawyer," and Pennsylvania 2016-200 (2016) concluded that a hypothetical program similar to Avvo was engaged in "impermissible fee sharing under RPC 5.4(a)." Noting that the "primary policy underlying RPC 5.4(a) is the preservation of the lawyer's professional independence," Opinion 2016-200 said: "[T]he assumption that the lawyer's payment to a nonlawyer of marketing fees amounting to 20% to 30% of legal fees earned does not interfere with the lawyer's professional independence is, at a minimum, of questionable validity." See also Ohio 2016-3 (2016) ("A lawyer's participation in an online, nonlawyer-owned legal referral service, where the lawyer is required to pay a 'marketing fee' to a nonlawyer for each service completed for a client, is unethical," citing Rule 5.4). We express no opinion on whether those opinions reach the correct conclusions. Compare N.Y. State 1131 (2017), in which we determined that a flat fee constituted a payment for advertising and not a sharing of legal fees.

> A lawyer shall not compensate or give anything of value to a person or organization to recommend or obtain employment by a client, or as a reward for having made a recommendation resulting in employment by a client. . . . [Emphasis added.]

18. Whether paying Avvo's marketing fee complies with Rule 7.2(a) depends primarily on what a lawyer is purchasing when the lawyer pays Avvo's marketing fee. If the lawyer is paying the marketing fee solely to obtain advertising and marketing services from Avvo, then the lawyer is not giving Avvo something "of value" to recommend the lawyer, but is instead paying Avvo for marketing services, which does not violate Rule 7.2(a). If, however, the marketing fee also includes a payment to Avvo for recommending the lawyer, then the payment constitutes giving something "of value" for a recommendation, which does violate Rule 7.2(a).

1. Is the marketing fee solely a payment for advertising and marketing services?

19. A marketing fee is not per se prohibited by Rule 7.2(a). A lawyer may pay nonlawyers to advertise or market the lawyer's services. Comment [1] to Rule 7.2 says explicitly that Rule 7.2(a) "does not prohibit a lawyer from paying for advertising and communications permitted by these Rules," and that a lawyer "may also compensate employees, agents and vendors who are engaged to provide marketing or client development services, such as publicists, public-relations personnel, marketing personnel, business development staff, and web site designers." We believe Avvo's website is an "advertisement" within the meaning of Rule 1.0(a). The Avvo website is a public communication on behalf of each participating lawyer, about that lawyer, for the primary purpose of helping the participating lawyers obtain employment by potential clients who use the Avvo website. And the participating lawyers "use or . . . participate in use" of the advertisement within the meaning of Rule 7.1(a) because they must take action to participate in Avvo Legal Services.

20. We addressed payments to nonlawyers for advertising in N.Y. State 897 (2011), which addressed a "deal-of-the-day" service similar to Groupon or Living Social. There, the deal-of-the-day service negotiated with lawyers to obtain a discounted legal fee. Potential clients who wanted the lawyer's discounted services used a credit card on the deal-of-the-day website to purchase a voucher for the lawyer's services. The website then deducted "a percentage of the gross receipts as its compensation" and paid the balance to the lawyer. (Opinion 897 does not specify the percentage.) We asked "whether the money retained by the website is merely an appropriate payment for a novel form of advertising or is a compensation for the referral of a client." We concluded that the deal-of-the-day arrangement was an appropriate payment for advertising, and was not payment for a referral, and therefore did not violate Rule 7.2(a). To explain our rationale, we said (in ¶12):

> We note that the website has no individual contact with the coupon buyers other than collecting the cost of the coupon. The website has not taken any action to refer a potential client to a particular lawyer – instead it has carried a particular lawyer's advertising message to interested consumers and has charged a fee for that service.

21. Opinion 897 did not reach a categorical conclusion, however, because we were "not privy to the percentage amount retained by these various websites . . . ." We said: "[A]ssuming that it is a reasonable payment for this form of advertising, we conclude that there is no violation of Rule 7.2." We then qualified our opinion by saying: "Different arrangements between the lawyer and the website could lead to the opposite conclusion, i.e., that the lawyer is paying for a referral in violation of Rule 7.2."

22. Here, we again lack sufficient information to determine whether Avvo's marketing fee is "a reasonable payment for this form of advertising." We therefore do not decide this question.[1]

2. Is the marketing fee a payment for a recommendation?

23. Under Rule 7.2, although lawyers may ethically pay nonlawyers for advertising and marketing services, they may not pay for a "recommendation." Therefore, we must determine whether the marketing fee is or includes a payment to Avvo to recommend the participating lawyers.

24. The term "recommendation" is not defined in the text of the Rules. However, in March 2015, after we issued N.Y. State 897 (2011), the New York State Bar Association amended Comment [1] to Rule 7.2 to address, among other things, whether a third party that connects lawyers with clients or potential clients is "recommending" the lawyer, and to define a "recommendation." Comment [1] now states, in part:

> [1] . . . A communication contains a recommendation if it endorses or vouches for a lawyer's credentials, abilities, competence, character, or other professional qualities. [Emphasis added.]

See also N.Y. State 1131 ¶ 19 (2017), (to "recommend" includes identifying a particular lawyer or lawyers to a potential client as "a right" or "the right" lawyer for the client's situation after an analysis of either the potential client's legal problem or the lawyer's qualifications to address that problem, which implies a qualitative, comparative assessment of the lawyers available to perform the services the potential client requires).

25. Comment [1] to Rule 7.2 adds that recommendations by so-called "lead generators" are improper:

> . . . [A] lawyer may pay others for generating client leads, such as Internet-based client leads, as long as (i) the lead generator does not recommend the lawyer, (ii) any payment to the lead generator is consistent with Rule[] . . . 5.4 (professional independence of the lawyer), (iii) the lawyer complies with Rule 1.8(f) (prohibiting interference with a lawyer's independent professional judgment by a person who recommends the lawyer's services), and (iv) the lead generator's communications are consistent with Rules 7.1 (advertising) and 7.3 (solicitation and recommendation of professional employment). . . . [Emphasis added.]

1 A deal-of-the-day service differs in at least one significant respect from Avvo Legal Services. A lawyer participating in a deal-of-the-day program negotiates a discounted fee, but the fee is ultimately set by the lawyer. A lawyer who participates in Avvo, in contrast, must agree to charge the fee set by Avvo for each particular service.

Indeed, Comment [1] prohibits a lead generator not only from stating that it is recommending a lawyer, but also from implying or creating a reasonable impression that it is making such a recommendation:

> . . . To comply with Rule 7.1, a lawyer must not pay a lead generator that states, implies, or creates a reasonable impression that it is recommending the lawyer, is making the referral without payment from the lawyer, or has analyzed a person's legal problems when determining which lawyer should receive the referral. . . . [Emphasis added.]

We must therefore determine whether Avvo is "recommending" a lawyer or "implying or creating a reasonable impression" that it is making a recommendation.

26. As noted earlier, Avvo allows clients to choose from among all of the lawyers in a geographic area who have listed themselves as practicing the field of law in which the client wants legal services. (Avvo says lawyers are displayed randomly and the list is reshuffled at least once every hour.) Avvo says that it does not analyze (or even inquire about) a client's individual situation. No human being at Avvo talks directly to any prospective client to find out the facts or studies the prospective client's documents and then picks out a particular lawyer who is "right" for that client. Nor does Avvo's website suggest that a client hire any particular lawyer. Avvo is not "recommending" lawyers in that sense.

27. But Avvo does more than merely list lawyers, their profiles, and their contact information. Avvo also gives each lawyer an Avvo rating, on a scale from 1 to 10. As Avvo explains on its website, "It's as simple as counting to 10. Ratings fall on a scale of 1 (Extreme Caution) to 10 (Superb), helping you quickly assess a lawyer's background based on our rating." (Emphasis in original.) The Avvo ratings suggest mathematical precision – the rating for each lawyer is calculated to a decimal place (e.g., a rating of 6.7 or 8.4).

28. Moreover, some Avvo ads expressly state that the Avvo Rating enables a potential client to find "the right" lawyer, and Avvo's website claims that its ratings enable potential clients to choose the right lawyer for their needs:

> Why the Avvo Rating can help you find the right attorney:
> The model used to calculate the rating was developed with input from hundreds of attorneys, thousands of consumers, and many other legal professionals who deeply understand the work attorneys do. We created the Avvo Rating to reflect the type of information people have identified as important when looking to hire an attorney.

29. Even if Avvo ratings are "bona fide," within the meaning of Rule 7.1(b)(1), we must determine whether (i) Avvo's inclusion of Avvo Ratings in Avvo's advertising on behalf of participating lawyers, or (ii) Avvo's description of its ratings in its advertising, is or implies a "recommendation," i.e. whether the rating "endorses or vouches for a lawyer's credentials, abilities, competence, character, or other professional qualities."

30. Avvo's website never describes a rating as a recommendation, and it contains several warnings about the limitations of its ratings. The website says:

- "A rating is not an endorsement of any particular lawyer, and is not a guarantee of a lawyer's quality, competency, or character. . . . Rather, the Avvo Rating is intended to be a starting point to gather information about lawyers who may be suitable for your legal needs."

- "Keep in mind that these ratings speak to a lawyer's background, but do not evaluate their knowledge of the law, past performance on individual cases, personality, or communication skills. These are elements that the Avvo Rating cannot evaluate, but can be better described in the client reviews and peer endorsements found on an attorney's profile."

- "[W]e don't recommend the Avvo Rating as the only piece of information you use to evaluate whether an attorney is right for you. The rating is a tool that provides a snapshot assessment of a lawyer's background, and should be considered alongside other information such as client reviews and peer endorsements."

31. Nevertheless, the Avvo website also extols the benefits of being able to work with highly-rated lawyers:

- "Work with highly rated, local lawyers near you."

- "Search top-rated lawyers near you."

- "We only work with highly qualified attorneys who are licensed to practice in your state."

Through these statements and through Avvo's description of its rating system, Avvo is giving potential clients the impression that a lawyer with a rating of "10" is "superb," and is thus a better lawyer for the client's matter than a lawyer with a lower rating. Avvo is also giving potential clients the impression that Avvo's eligibility requirements for lawyers who participate in Avvo Legal Services assure that participating lawyers are "highly qualified."

32. We do not believe that a bona fide professional rating alone is a recommendation. But, even assuming that Avvo ratings are "bona fide professional ratings," we believe the way Avvo describes in its advertising material the ratings of participating lawyers either expressly states or at least implies or creates the reasonable impression that Avvo is "recommending" those lawyers.

33. In N.Y. State 799 (2011), in discussing the difference between an internet-based directory and a recommendation, we said that the line between the two was crossed when a website purports to recommend a particular lawyer or lawyers based on an analysis of the potential client's problem. Other jurisdictions also focus on the "particular lawyer" distinction. See, e.g., South Carolina 01-03 (lawyer may pay internet advertising service fee determined by the number of "hits" that the service produces for the lawyer provided that the service does not steer business to any particular lawyer and the payments are not based on whether user ultimately becomes a client); Virginia Advertising Op. A-0117 (2006) (lawyer may participate in online lawyer directory in which publisher does not recommend or steer business to particular lawyers). We believe Avvo's advertising of its ratings, in combination with its statements about the high qualifications of lawyers who participate in Avvo Legal Services, constitutes a recommendation of all of the participating lawyers.

34. Our conclusion is bolstered by Avvo's satisfaction guarantee, by which the full amount of the client's payment (including Avvo's portion of the fee) is refunded if the client is not satisfied. This guarantee contributes to the impression that Avvo is "recommending" the lawyers on its service because it stands behind them to the extent of refunding payment if the client is not satisfied.

35. This opinion does not preclude a lawyer from advertising bona fide professional ratings generated by third parties in advertisements, and we recognize that a lawyer may pay another party (such as a magazine or website) to include those bona fide ratings in the lawyer's advertisements. But Avvo Legal Services is different. It is not a third party, but rather the very party that will benefit financially if potential clients hire the lawyers rated by Avvo. Avvo markets the lawyers participating in the service offered under the Avvo brand, generates Avvo ratings that it uses in the advertising for the lawyers who participate in Avvo Legal Services, and effectively "vouches for" each participating lawyer's credentials, abilities, and competence by offering a full refund if the client is not satisfied. As noted earlier, Avvo says: "We stand behind our services and expect our clients to be 100% satisfied with their experience." Accordingly, we conclude that lawyers who pay Avvo's marketing fee are paying for a recommendation, and are thus violating Rule 7.2(a).

36. The questions we have addressed here have generated vigorous debate both within and outside the legal profession. The numbers of lawyers and clients who are using Avvo Legal Services suggest that the company fills a need that more traditional methods of marketing and providing legal services are not meeting. But it is not this Committee's job to decide policy issues regarding access to justice, affordability of legal fees, or lawyer quality. Our job is to interpret the New York Rules of Professional Conduct. Future changes to Avvo's mode of operation – or future changes to the Rules of Professional Conduct – could lead us to alter our conclusions, but at this point we conclude that, under Avvo's current structure, lawyers may not pay Avvo's marketing fee for participating in Avvo Legal Services.

CONCLUSION:

37. A lawyer paying Avvo's current marketing fee for Avvo Legal Services is making an improper payment for a recommendation in violation of Rule 7.2(a).

(29-16)

OPINION 1133 (10/03/2017)

TOPIC: Client Files: Lawyer's Right To Contact Prospective Clients

DIGEST: A lawyer who is the transferee and solely a custodian of client files arising from a transaction other than a sale of law practice may communicate with the prior lawyer's clients if the lawyer does not review confidential information in the files more than reasonably necessary to identify the contact information of the prior lawyer's clients and complies with the rules governing advertising and solicitation of prospective clients.

RULES: 1.0(a), 1.6(a), 1.15(c), 1.17(c), 7.1 and 7.3

FACTS:

1. The inquirer has custody of approximately eight hundred executed Last Will & Testaments, which the inquirer received when prior counsel, to accept employment elsewhere, closed his one-person private law practice. Before closing that practice, the prior attorney wrote to each affected client. In this letter, the prior attorney notified each client of the client's "right to" the client's files "in my possession," which, the letter noted, might include "your original Last Will and Testament, Power of Attorney, and/or Trust." The letter explained that the client had "the right to retrieve your files from my office – or to have them sent to another attorney of your choosing – at any time" up to a date approximately four months after the closing of the lawyer's practice, the office of which, the letter said, would remain "staffed to respond to your inquiries." The letter said that a failure to retrieve the files before this deadline would be deemed "consent to transfer of the files to" the inquirer.

2. In this same letter, counsel said that "arrangements" had been made with the inquirer "to assume responsibility for your files." The letter said that the author was "confident" that the inquirer was able to "to continue to serve you with the same level of care and expertise you have come to expect." The letter provided the address, telephone number, and email address of the inquirer. The letter also underscored that the client should retain a copy of the letter with the client's estate documents.

3. The "arrangements" between the inquirer and prior counsel included no exchange of consideration between them. No financial or other thing of value was a part of the inquirer's assumption of "responsibility" for the inquirer's custodial role in maintaining possession of those files not earlier retrieved by recipients of the prior counsel's letter, including, for instance, no arrangement for the prior counsel to share in future fees, if any, that the inquirer may receive from the prior counsel's clients. The inquirer did no more than take physical possession of client files previously held by a lawyer who was required to close an office that had held the documents and who notified clients both of their right to obtain their files and the location of the files once the prior counsel was no longer able to maintain them.

4. The inquirer now wishes to communicate with the individuals whose files the inquirer holds, and in doing so to offer the inquirer's legal services in such matters as the clients may desire.

QUESTION:

5. May a lawyer write to a prior lawyer's clients offering legal services, after the prior lawyer (a) transferred the clients' estate planning documents to the inquiring lawyer and (b) informed the clients of the transfer?

OPINION:

6. Comment is required on a number of issues that this inquiry raises.

7. One is whether the transfer of the files to the inquirer was the sale of a law practice within the meaning of Rule 1.17 of the New York Rule of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"), which regulates the transfer of a law practice through a sale. We conclude that, in the circumstances presented to us, no sale occurred. We note with approval that prior counsel's letter was consistent with various client-protection provisions of Rule 1.17, among them giving the clients the right to retain future counsel of their choosing or to take possession of their files, Rule 1.17(c)(1), providing that consent to the transfer to the second attorney would be presumed if not subject to objection within a comfortable period greater than that (90 days) set in Rule 1.17(c)(2), and providing, though incompletely, the identity and contact information of the inquirer, Rule 1.17(c)(5) (requiring information about bar admissions, years of practice, and disciplinary history). If the facts presented here amounted to a sale of a law practice, we would detect a failure of strict adherence to Rule 1.17.

8. That prior counsel complied, and in our view properly so, with many of Rule 1.17's provisions does not alter the character of the "arrangement" that prior counsel made with the inquirer. This was not a sale of a law practice but the creation of a custodial relationship. The inquirer was to hold the files pending further developments. Whether an attorney-client relationship exists is a mixed question of fact and law beyond our jurisdiction, but we can say with confidence that mere possession of files does not alone create one (a storage company does not become a person's lawyer by holding that person's client files).

9. We turn, then, to the inquirer's duties going forward. To start, ordinarily, a lawyer who comes into possession of the property of a third party has an ethical obligation under Rule 1.15(c) promptly to notify the third party; here, the prior counsel already did so, but the inquirer still has an ongoing duty to preserve that property. N.Y. State 1002 (2014). Thus, the inquirer must maintain the files unless and until a client retrieves them or the inquirer gives notice to the affected clients of some other disposition. The question remains whether the inquirer may contact these persons to offer the inquirer's legal services.

10. We conclude that the inquirer may do so if the inquirer complies with Rule 1.6(a) on protecting client confidential information, and with Rules 7.1 and 7.3, which govern, respectively, advertising and solicitation of prospective clients.

11. We have previously concluded that Rule 1.6(a), which dictates a lawyer's obligations to preserve confidential information, does not prohibit the inquirer from inspecting estate documents, but only as may be reasonably necessary to contact the affected person(s). N.Y. State 1035 (2014) (a lawyer who received wills in the sale of a law practice previously held by prior counsel, but who had not contacted the affected persons in accordance with Rule 1.17, could review the files only as reasonably necessary to communicate with those persons for directions on the disposition of the files); N.Y. State 1002 ¶ 9 (2014) (a lawyer who received wills as executor of an estate could "access or disclose the confidential information in the wills insofar as reasonably necessary to dispose of the wills"); see N.Y. State 341 (1974) (an "attorney who retires from practice may transfer executed Wills and other files to another attorney, but the receiving attorney holds them only as a custodian," it being "generally unethical" for the lawyer "to examine the Wills or files without the client's consent"). Hence, the inquirer, as custodian, may examine the files as may be reasonably necessary to ascertain the identity and addresses of the individuals who should be contacted about the files, but the inquirer may not, absent informed consent from the prior lawyer's clients or successors, review the files to recommend, for example, unsolicited advice about improvements in or updates to the estate planning.

12. Here, the inquirer wishes to go beyond merely contacting the prior lawyer's clients – the prior lawyer, after all, had already provided the inquirer's information to those clients – and wishes in addition to offer the inquirer's legal services. Because the purpose of the communication would be to promote the inquirer's legal services, the communication would be an "advertisement" within the meaning of Rule 1.0(a), which defines the term to mean "any public or private communication made by or on behalf of a lawyer" about that lawyer's services, "the primary purpose of which is for the retention of the lawyer." By reason of Rule 7.1, an advertisement may not contain statements that are "false, deceptive or misleading" or otherwise violate the Rules. Among these is Rule 7.1(f), which requires that any written advertisement identify itself as "Attorney Advertising," Rule 7.1(h), which requires that the advertisement contain the name of the lawyer and the lawyer's principal office address, and Rule 7.1(k), which requires that the advertisement be maintained for a period of three years. Other components of Rule 7.1 may also apply.

13. The inquirer's proposed communication would also fall within the meaning of "solicitation" under Rule 7.3, which defines the term to mean an advertisement "directed to, or targeted at," a specific recipient or group of recipients, or their family members or legal representatives, the primary purpose of which is the retention of the lawyer" and "a significant motive for which is pecuniary gain." Rule 7.3 sets forth various requirements on solicitations, among them the obligation to file the written solicitation with the disciplinary committee having authority over the lawyer (Rule 7.3(c)(1)), and to retain the names and addresses of all recipients for at least three years (Rule 7.3(c)(3)). If the inquirer abides by these Rules, together with those set forth above, then we conclude that the inquirer may proceed with the proposed communication with the prior lawyer's clients.

14. This opinion is intended to address only the obligations of a lawyer who receives client files in a custodial capacity other than in the course of a sale of a law practice. Nothing we say here is meant to alter the prescriptions of Rule 1.17 on such sales.

CONCLUSION:

15. A lawyer who is solely a custodian of client files arising from other a transaction than from a sale of law practice may communicate with the prior lawyer's clients if the lawyer does not review the confidential information in the files more than reasonably necessary to contact those prior clients and complies with the rules governing advertising and solicitation of prospective clients.

TOPIC: Attorneys' fees: Use of credit card to secure payment in domestic relations matter

DIGEST: Whether an attorney may use a client's credit card to secure payment of fees and expenses in a domestic relations matter presents a question on the meaning of 22 NYCRR Part 1400, which is an issue of law beyond this Committee's jurisdiction.

RULES: 1.5(d)(2).

FACTS:

1. The inquiring attorney represents parties in domestic relations matters. The attorney's standard retainer agreement complies, on the inquirer's view, with the provisions of 22 NYCRR 1400, which is a court rule requiring that engagement letters in domestic relations matters contain certain features. The inquirer now wishes to add to the inquirer's standard form of engagement a provision that, if any amount for which the client has been billed remains unpaid for a period of more than twenty days, then the attorney is authorized to charge the client's credit card, the pertinent information on which the client has previously supplied the lawyer, for the full unpaid amount.

QUESTION:

2. May an attorney's retainer agreement in a domestic relations matter authorize the attorney to charge the client's credit card for any amount for which the client has been billed but which remains unpaid more than twenty days after issuance of the bill?

OPINION

3. In N.Y. State 1112 (2017), we determined that a lawyer's retainer agreement may provide (a) that the client could secure payment of the lawyer's fee by credit card, and (b) that the lawyer could bill the credit card the amount of any unpaid legal fees, costs, or disbursements that the client failed to pay within twenty days after issuance of the lawyer's bill for those amounts, as long as the charge complies with requirements set forth in our prior opinions, including that the client is expressly informed of the right to dispute any of the lawyer's bills (and to request arbitration if court rules so require) before the lawyer charges the client's credit card, and that no charge is made for any disputed portion of the lawyer's bill. We did not address the implications of this conclusion with court rules governing fee arrangements, including those that apply in domestic relations matters. We now conclude that such court rules take precedence over the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") as interpreted in that Opinion.

4. Our role is limited to interpreting the Rules; we do not opine on issues of law. Rule 1.5(d)(2) provides that a "lawyer shall not enter into an arrangement for, charge or collect" a fee that is, among other things, "prohibited by law or rule of court." Thus, whether the lawyer's proposed use of a credit card to secure payment in a domestic relations matter depends on whether the practice would violate a law or rule of court.

5. In domestic relations matters, the New York courts have mandated certain client protections not necessarily applicable in other matters. Most notable of these is 22 NYCRR 1400.5, which says in relevant part:

> (a) An attorney may obtain a confession of judgment of promissory note, take a lien on real property, or otherwise obtain a security interest to secure his or her fee only where:
> (1) the retainer agreement provides that a security interest may be sought;
> (2) notice of an application for a security interest has been given to the other spouse; and
> (3) the court grants approval for the security interest after submission of an application for counsel fees.

6. For us to resolve the lawyer's inquiry would require us to decide whether the inquirer's proposed credit card arrangement constitutes a "security interest" within the meaning of this court rule. Under Rule 1.5(d)(2), whether a lawyer may include the proposed language in an engagement letter in a domestic relations matter depends on whether the language violates 22 NYCRR 1400.5. This question is solely an issue of law beyond our jurisdiction to decide.

CONCLUSION:

7. A lawyer may secure payment of legal fees and expenses in a domestic relations matter unless doing so violates a law or rule of court, which is a question of law beyond the jurisdiction of this Committee to resolve.

OPINION 1135 (10/10/2017)

TOPIC: Limitations on solicitation by solo practitioner who is both a lawyer and certified public accountant.

DIGEST: Professional services that are not distinct from legal services are subject to the prohibition against in-person and telephonic solicitation.

RULES: 5.7(a), (c), 7.1, 7.3(a), (b), (c)

FACTS:

1. The inquiring attorney is licensed in New York as both a lawyer and a certified public accountant. The inquirer plans to open a solo practice offering a range of state and local tax services, and to offer these services, both legal and accounting, as an integrated operation.

2. According to the inquirer, the vast majority of the services to be offered are those that either a lawyer or an accountant may legally perform. Each of these professions, for instance, may handle a tax audit defense or certain administrative matters before tax authorities. Limits exist, however: For instance, an accountant may not represent a person in court proceedings, which only a lawyer may do, and a lawyer may not conduct an audit of a company's financial statements, which, we are told, only an accountant may do.

3. The inquirer wishes to communicate by telephone to offer, unsolicited, his accounting services to persons or entities lacking any prior personal or professional relationship with the inquirer. We accept for purposes here the inquirer's statement that the accounting profession does not forbid an accountant to call a stranger to offer accounting services. The inquirer is prepared to disclose on each call that the inquirer holds a law license but, for purpose of the call, is proposing to be retained solely as an accountant. Nevertheless, the inquirer acknowledges that, in many tax disputes, an early and not insignificant tactical decision is whether to address the tax controversy through administrative channels or instead through legal proceedings. The inquirer seeks guidance on whether the proposed telephone calls, even though apparently permitted by the accounting profession, conflicts with the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules").

QUESTION:

4. May a lawyer who is also a certified public accountant make unsolicited calls to potential clients for matters that could be handled by either a lawyer or certified public accountant?

OPINION:

5. Rule 5.7 permits a lawyer to offer both legal and nonlegal services to the public. In N.Y. State 938 ¶ 5 (2012), we pointed out that Rule 5.7(c) defines "nonlegal services," for purposes of Rule 5.7, to mean "those services that lawyers may lawfully provide and that are not prohibited as an unauthorized practice of law when provided by a nonlawyer." Questions about services comprising the unauthorized practice of law are outside the orbit of this Committee's reach, and so we offer no opinion on that subject. To analyze the question presented, however, we accept without deciding that the aforementioned tax services do not constitute the unauthorized practice of law, and that a nonlawyer may lawfully provide these services.

6. Rule 5.7 distinguishes between two types of "nonlegal services." Rule 5.7(a)(1) addresses "nonlegal services" that a lawyer offers "that are not distinct from legal services" the lawyer offers to clients; Rule 5.7(a)(2) addresses "nonlegal services" that a lawyer offers "that are distinct from legal services" the lawyer offers to clients. The applicability of the Rules turns on whether the services are "not distinct" or "distinct" from each other. If the former, then the Rules apply to everything the lawyer does in performing those "not distinct" nonlegal services; if the latter, then the Rules apply only in certain circumstances with the use of disclaimers. The threshold question, then, is whether the nonlegal tax services the inquirer proposes to offer here are "not distinct" or "distinct" from the legal services the lawyer offers to potential clients.

7. The Rules do not define the word "distinct" but the dictionary does. To be "distinct" is to be "not alike, different, not the same, separate, clearly marked off." Webster's Unabridged Dictionary 534 (2d ed. 1979). These are terms of comparison. Rule 5.7(a)(1) identifies the subjects to compare: the service provider (the lawyer), the substance of the service to be provided (legal or nonlegal), the proposed recipient of the service (the potential client), and, by necessary implication, the manner or means by which the lawyer offers the service (the degree of integration of the two services). Our prior opinions teach that, when a substantial congruence of these factors exists, then the Rules apply to everything the lawyer does. See N.Y. State 1026 (2014) (services are "not distinct" when a lawyer offered nonlegal mediation services in domestic relations matters in which the retainer agreement offered to "represent the parties in drafting and filing the court papers to obtain a divorce if the mediation results in a settlement"); N.Y. State 832 ¶ 6 (2009) (even though, in offering the sale of shelf corporations, a nonlawyer may be entitled to provide advice about them without engaging in the unauthorized practice of law, "when a lawyer provides such advice it becomes the provision of legal services," in which event the Rules "would apply both to the legal advice and to the sale of the corporations"); cf. N.Y. State 992 ¶ 21 (2013) (a lawyer may not circumvent the Rules "and practice law by a designation that the attorney is employed in a 'non-legal capacity' even if a non attorney may perform the same legal services").

8. Here, the identity of the service provider, the substance of the services to be provided, the prospective recipient of the services, and the manner or means in which the lawyer wants to offer the services substantially overlap. In such circumstances, we read Rule 5.7(a)(1) to mean that the lawyer's accounting services are not distinct from those of the lawyer's legal services. As Comment [1] under Rule 5.7 explains, "The recipient of the nonlegal services may expect, for example, that the protection of client confidences and secrets, prohibitions against representation of persons with conflicting interests, and obligations of a lawyer to maintain professional independence apply to the provisions of nonlegal services when that may not be the case. The risk of confusion is especially acute when the lawyer renders both legal and nonlegal services with respect to the same matter." Accordingly, we believe that all the Rules apply to the inquirer's conduct even when the inquirer is offering tax services that an accountant as well as a lawyer may properly perform.

9. This includes the Rules' prohibition on the unsolicited in-person contact with potential clients. Rule 7.3(b) defines "solicitation" as "any advertisement of behalf of a lawyer or law firm that is directed to, or targeted at, a specific recipient or group of recipients, or their family members or legal representatives, the primary purpose of which is the retention of the lawyer or law firm, and a significant motive for which is pecuniary gain." Rule 7.3(a)(1) prohibits any "solicitation" by "in-person or telephone contact," with limited exceptions inapplicable here. Comment [9] to Rule 7.3 explains that, "in-person solicitation, which has historically been disfavored by the bar because it poses serious dangers to potential clients," among them "the risk that a lawyer, who is trained in the arts of advocacy and persuasion, may pressure a potential client to hire the lawyer without adequate consideration," a risk equally present "in telephone contact or in real-time or interactive computer-accessed communication."

10. On the facts before us, Rule 7.3(a)(1) prohibits the inquirer's proposed offering of services that are not distinct from the inquirer's legal services by way of unrequested in-person telephone communications to potential clients lacking any personal or professional relationship with the inquirer.

11. Rule 7.3 also contains in subdivision (c) several other restrictions on solicitations, which while not the subject of this inquiry, would apply to a lawyer in the inquirer's position. Among these is the duty to file the solicitation with the relevant disciplinary authorities, Rule 7.3(c)(1), and to retain a list of the names and addresses of all recipients for at least three years, Rule 7.3(c)(3). The regulations of lawyer advertising, set out in Rule 7.1, would also apply, including the requirement of Rule 7.1(a)(1) against communications that are "false, deceptive or misleading," and of Rule 7.1(f) that any written communication qualifying as a solicitation be labeled as "Attorney Advertising."

CONCLUSION:

12. Rule 7.3 prohibits a lawyer who is also a certified public accountant from offering by telephone unsolicited tax-related services to persons with whom the lawyer lacks any pre-existing relationship when the tax-related services are not distinct from legal services and offered by the lawyer as part of the lawyer's integrated practice.

OPINION 1136 (10/13/2017)

TOPIC: Law Firm Marketing: Sponsorship of Events

DIGEST: Subject to legal restraints, a law firm may sponsor parties, sporting events, or games of chance provided that the law firm complies with applicable rules governing lawyer advertising and solicitation.

RULES: 7.1, 7.3

FACTS:

1. The inquiring law firm concentrates in employment law matters, including workers' compensation and personal injury cases. To promote its name, the firm wishes to embark on certain activities. Specifically, the firm wants to hold a party or reception for members of a local labor union, and, in addition, to sponsor a sporting match for union members at which the players would wear uniforms or T-shirts bearing the firm's name. During the sporting event, the playing field would display a billboard or banner featuring the firm's name and contact information, and players and spectators could avail themselves of free refreshments at the firm's expense. For the more general public, the firm wants also to conduct a lottery or raffle with a prize such as tickets to concerts or sporting events, with the winner required to pick up the prize at the firm's office.

QUESTIONS:

2. May a law firm sponsor and bear the cost of a party or sporting event for targeted potential clients in which the firm's name is prominently displayed by various means?

3. May a law firm conduct a raffle or lottery for which the law firm pays the cost of any prize on condition that the winner retrieve the prize from the law firm's office?

OPINION:

4. This Committee's charter confines us to interpreting the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"). We do not issue opinions on questions of law. Whether the conduct of particular sporting events, raffles, or lotteries is lawful in this State is thus beyond the scope of this opinion. For our purpose, we assume without resolving that such activities comply with law, and limit ourselves to the ethical issues that the inquiry raises.

5. These ethical issues rest mostly on the implications of the proposed activities under the regulations of advertising and solicitation set forth in Rules 7.1 and 7.3, respectively. Because by definition under Rule 7.3 (a) a "solicitation" must be an "advertisement" within the meaning of Rule 1.0(a), the preliminary question is whether any of the proposed activities qualify as an "advertisement." Rule 1.0(a) says, in relevant part, that an "advertisement" consists of "any public or private communication made by or on behalf of a lawyer of law firm about that lawyer or law firm's services, the primary purpose of which is for the retention of the lawyer or law firm." Of significance here, however, is Comment [8] accompanying Rule 7.1's prescriptions on lawyer advertising, which notes that some "communications by a law firm that may constitute marketing or branding are not necessarily advertisements. For example, pencils, legal pads, greeting cards, coffee mugs, T-shirts or the like with the firm name, logo, and contact information printed on them do not constitute 'advertisements' within the meaning of this Rule [7.1] if their primary purpose is general awareness and branding, rather than the retention of the law firm for a particular matter."

6. Our prior opinions have lent weight to this Comment in scenarios not unlike those this inquiry presents. Of particular pertinence is N.Y. State 937 (2012), in which the inquirer wished to cooperate with a local hospital to provide a promotional gift, such as a calendar or a pen branded with the law firm logo, as part of the welcoming package given to all hospital patients. Focusing on Rule 1.0(a)'s emphasis on the "primary purpose" of the communication, we said there that "when the intent of a communication is to educate recipients about legal developments or to raise general brand awareness, that intent will be considered its primary purpose. Thus, even if such communications are more fundamentally motivated by the aim of increasing the lawyer's business, they are not advertising within the meaning of the Rules." Id. ¶ 4. Likewise, in N.Y. State 1095 (2016), we said that "large building signs" bearing the firm's name "do not constitute 'advertisements,'" but were instead "for the purpose of general awareness and branding and thus are not subject to Rule 7.1." Id. ¶ 12. See also N.Y. State 1017 ¶ 8 (2014) (use of a law firm's initials in sponsorship of a little league baseball team did not constitute an impermissible use of a trade name).

7. We have also previously considered and, subject to legal issues, approved the offering of a prize by a law firm when the primary purpose of doing so is other than retention of the lawyer in a matter. In N.Y. State 873 (2011), the inquiring lawyer proposed to give visitors connecting to the lawyer's social media outlets the chance to win a prize for doing so, untethered to any obligation to retain the lawyer. There we said that, although "business development might be the inquirer's ultimate goal in offering the prize," this alone "would not trigger the Rules on advertising any more than it would trigger those Rules if, for example, the inquirer were to join a local Chamber of Commerce, Kiwanis Club, or bar association, or if the inquirer were to take other steps to expand the inquirer's social circle with the aim of meeting potential new clients." Id. ¶ B1; see Rule 7.1, Comment [6] ("Not all communications made by lawyers about the lawyer or the law firm's services are advertising.")

8. Simply put, nothing in the Rules creates a barrier to lawyer networking among potential clients, heightening awareness of the lawyer or law firm's name in the community, conducting social events for discrete groups, or engaging in actions that may have the long-term beneficial effect of enhancing the lawyer or law firm's profile and profitability.

9. Nevertheless, Rules 7.1 and 7.3 erect boundaries on the comportment of a lawyer or law firm undertaking such activities. A law firm may hold a party or a sporting event to promote the firm's name, but its lawyers may not use those occasions to engage in in-person solicitation of its guests unless those guests fall within one of the exclusions in Rule 7.3(a)(1) (forbidding in-person or other real-time solicitation unless the recipient is "a close friend, relative, former client or existing client"). A written invitation to participate in those events, or in a lottery or raffle, may not seek the law firm's retention in a matter unless the communication complies with Rule 7.3(c)'s regulations on, among other things, submitting the written communication to local disciplinary authorities and retaining a list of the name and addresses of all recipients for a period of at least three years. The law firm may require the winner of any prize to retrieve the same from the law firm's office, but again may not use that opportunity to solicit the winner's legal matters (as opposed to, say, using the moment for a photo opportunity with the winner for release to the press to raise public awareness of the firm). Consequently, while the proposed sponsorships are alone untroubling under the Rules, the law firm's actions in conducting them could cross the line into advertising and solicitation requiring adherence to Rules 7.1 and 7.3.

CONCLUSION:

10. A law firm's sponsorship of receptions, sporting events, and raffles or lotteries, if permitted by law, constitute permissible branding activities outside the meaning of "advertising" under the Rules, provided that the primary purpose of the activities is enhancing the firm's name recognition and the activities do not involve solicitation of potential clients or ongoing advertisement of the law firm's services.

TOPIC: Law firm name; "of counsel" lawyers

DIGEST: A law firm with one principal and two "of counsel" lawyers may call itself "A & Associates" as long as the "of counsel" lawyers meet the test for the designation "of counsel," which requires a close, continuing, and personal relationship with the firm.

RULES: 1.10(a). 7.5(a), 7.5(b), 8.4(c)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer, Lawyer A, practices in a law firm, A&B that has two partners and two attorneys – C and D – designated "of counsel." Lawyer B plans to leave the firm at the end of the year. The inquirer asks whether it is permissible to call the new firm "A & Associates." The inquirer characterizes the relationship of the two "of counsel" lawyers as "continual day-to-day." Both are covered by the firm's malpractice insurance policy.

QUESTION:

2. May a lawyer designate the lawyer's firm "A & Associates" when the only other lawyers in the firm are designated as "of counsel" lawyers?

OPINION:

3. Rule 7.5(b) of the N.Y. Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") provides that "a lawyer in private practice shall not practice under a trade name" or "a name that is misleading as to the identity of the lawyer or lawyers practicing under such name."

4. Comment [1] to Rule 7.5 says that, "to avoid the possibility of misleading persons with whom a lawyer deals, a lawyer should be scrupulous in the representation of professional status."

5. Rule 8.4(c) provides that "A lawyer or law firm shall not . . . (c) engage in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation."

6. The question raised here is whether using the firm name "A & Associates" as the name of the law firm would be a trade name or misleading when the inquirer does not have any partners, and the other lawyers who work at the firm are "of counsel" to the firm.

"Of Counsel" Lawyers

7. For purposes of this opinion, we assume that the two lawyers who are designated "of counsel" are properly so designated. See Rule 7.5(a)(4) ("A lawyer or law firm may be designated 'Of Counsel' on a letterhead if there is a continuing relationship with a lawyer or law firm, other than as a partner or associate.") As we explained in N.Y. State 955 ¶ 6 (2005):

> Whether the relationship meets the "continuing relationship" test is fact-specific and no additional information is provided in this inquiry. Thus, as long as the inquiring firm is satisfied that the "continuing relationship" test is met, it may have an "of counsel" relationship with a lawyer.

See also N.Y. State 788 at note 5 (2005) ("We have interpreted the 'of counsel' relationship to mean that the of counsel lawyer is 'available to the firm for consultation and advice on a regular and continuing basis'"); N.Y. State 773 (2004) (quoting N.Y. State 262 (1972)); ABA Op. 90-357 (1990) (The use of the title "of counsel," or variants of that title, in identifying the relationship of a lawyer with another lawyer or firm is permissible as long as the relationship between the two is a close, regular, personal relationship and the use of the title is not otherwise false or misleading). See also Rule 7.5, Cmt. [1] ("Lawyers should not hold themselves out as being partners or associates of a law firm if that is not the fact, and thus lawyers should not hold themselves out as being a partners or associates if they only share offices.")

8. Whether lawyers C and D each have the close, regular, personal relationship required to merit the title "of counsel" is a question of fact that the inquirer must determine.

"Of Counsel" Lawyers as "Associated" with the Firm

9. If lawyers C and D are properly designated "of counsel," then the next question is whether they are "Associates" for purposes of calling the law firm "A & Associates." One objective of the Rules is to ensure that the public is not deceived about the identity, responsibility, or status of the individuals using a law firm name. See N.Y. State 732 (2000); N.Y. State 636 (1992); N.Y. State 459 (1977); N.Y. State 495 (1978); Matter of Shepard, 92 A.D.2d 978, 459 N.Y.S.2d 632, 633 (3d Dept. 1983); see also EC 2-11 (Ethical Considerations under the predecessor of the Rules provided that "[t]he name under which a lawyer practices may be a factor in the selection process. The use of a trade name or an assumed name could mislead non-lawyers concerning the identity, responsibility, and status of those practicing thereunder").

10. The Rules do not define the terms "associate" or "associated." The term "associate" often conveys the status of a junior lawyer who is not a partner or principal but is regularly employed by the firm. See ABA Formal Op. 90-357. Nevertheless, both the Rules and our prior opinions indicate that lawyers with other relationships to the firm are "associated" with the firm. For example, in N.Y. State 715 (2004), in which we considered the rules applicable to temporary lawyer working with a firm, we indicated that conflict rules apply to lawyers who are "of counsel" to a firm: "The Code does not define the term 'associated.' Although the concept extends beyond lawyers who are partners, associates or 'of counsel' in a firm, it does not apply to all lawyers who are in any way 'connected' or 'related.'"

11. Rule 1.10(a) provides that, while lawyers are associated in a firm, none of them may knowingly represent a client when any one of them, practicing alone, would be prohibited from doing so under Rule 1.7, 1.8 or 1.9. Both this Committee and the courts have concluded that "of counsel" lawyers are "associated" with a firm for purposes of the conflict of interest rules. See N.Y. State 876 (2004) (conflicts of interest will be imputed to all lawyers in all firms with which a lawyer is associated as a partner, associate or of counsel); N.Y. State 793 (2006) (under the former Code of Professional Responsibility, conflicts imputed to an attorney under DR 5-105(D), other than personal conflicts under DR 5-101(A), will also be imputed to all lawyers in any firm with which the attorney has an of counsel relationship); N.Y. State 788 (2005), N.Y. State 773 (2004) (lawyers who are "of counsel" to a law firm are "associated" with the law firm for purposes of former DR 5-105(D)); Nemet v. Nemet, 112 A.D.2d 359, 360, 491 N.Y.S.2d 810, 811 (2nd Dep't) (of counsel relationship leads to imputed disqualification), appeal dismissed, 66 N.Y.2d 602, 490 N.E.2d 554 (1985); Restatement (Third) of the Law Governing Lawyers § 123 cmt. c(ii) (1998) (same).

12. Accordingly, in the context of selecting a name for a law firm, we do not believe that the public would assume that the term "Associates" is limited to persons who are non-partner employees of the firm assigned the title of "associate." If, for instance, the inquirer elects to identify C and D on the firm's letterhead or website, the inquirer may fulfill the requirement of Comment [1] to Rule 7.5 to be "scrupulous in the representation of professional status" by clarifying that lawyers C and D are "of counsel." Compare N.Y. State 931 (2012) (name of law firm of solo practitioner cannot include "and Associates" based on employment of paralegal).

CONCLUSION:

13. A law firm with one principal and two "of counsel" lawyers may call itself "A & Associates" as long as the "of counsel" lawyers meet the test for the designation "of counsel" that they have a close, continuing, and personal relationship with the firm.

OPINION 1138 (11/08/2017)

TOPIC: Use of English language translation of lawyer's surname in law firm name.

DIGEST: A lawyer who is engaged in a solo practice and admitted to practice under the lawyer's given surname may not use an English language translation of that name in the name of the lawyer's law firm.

RULES: 7.5(b), 8.4(c)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a solo practitioner whose legal surname is the name that appears as the lawyer's name on the official roll of attorneys that the Clerk of the Court of the Appellate Division maintains. That name, is, on the inquirer's view, unduly alien to the ears and eyes of the English-speaking public whom the inquirer seeks to attract as clients. The inquirer wants to adopt an English language translation of this surname as the name of the lawyer's firm, while also identifying the lawyer, using the lawyer's real name, as an attorney "with" the firm. As a hypothetical example, if the inquirer appears on the official roll of attorneys as "Yohan Schmidt," and the English language translation of that name is John Smith, then the inquirer proposes to identify the firm as follows: "The Smith Law Office with Attorney Yohan Schmidt."

QUESTION:

2. May an attorney substitute an English language translation of the lawyer's surname in the name of the lawyer's firm when the lawyer is admitted to practice and listed on the roll of attorneys under the lawyer's actual surname?

OPINION:

3. Rule 7.5(b) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") provides in pertinent part that a "lawyer in private practice shall not practice under a trade name, a name that is misleading as to the identity of the lawyer, or lawyers practicing under such name, or firm name containing names other than those of one or more of the lawyers in the firm." This Rule serves to protect the public from being deceived about the identity, responsibility, or status of those who use the firm name. N.Y. State 732 (2000) (principal goal of predecessor of Rule 7.5(b) is to avoid misleading the public); Cmt. [1] to Rule 7.5 ("to avoid the possibility of misleading persons with whom a lawyer deals, a lawyer should be scrupulous in the representation of professional status. Lawyers should not hold themselves out as being partners or associates of a law firm if that is not the fact"); see Rule 8.4(c) (prohibiting conduct involving "deceit or misrepresentation").

4. In N.Y. State 740 (2001), this Committee concluded that "using a name that is not the legal name of one or more partners or former partners in the law firm constitutes use of a trade name" within the meaning of Rule 7.5(b). In N.Y. State 869 ¶ 7 (2011), we noted also that "the prohibition against tradenames is broad, permitting use of little beyond the names of lawyers presently or previously associated with the firm." In keeping with these opinions, this Committee has said that firm names may not include a variant on the lawyer's name created by conjoining the lawyer's initials with an abbreviation of the lawyer's surname because the proposed firm name deviated substantially from the lawyer's actual name and was therefore impermissible. N.Y. State 948 ¶ 4 (2012) (a lawyer may not use AbDoe Law as the firm name for a lawyer enrolled as Ann-Bonnie Doe).

5. N.Y. State 948 nevertheless recognized that some variations on names may deviate so slightly from the original as not to offend Rule 7.5(b). Thus, in N.Y. State 1003 ¶ 9 (2014), we concluded that a lawyer who practiced under the lawyer's full name may use a law firm name that includes only the lawyer's middle initials and last name, without including the lawyer's first name, provided that the proposed firm name does not violate the additional prohibition contained in Rule 7.5(b) against practicing under a firm name that is "misleading as to the identity of the lawyer or lawyers practicing under such name." Likewise, in, N.Y. State 872 ¶ 9 (2011), we said that a lawyer may use the English language translation of the lawyer's surname on business cards, in informal communications, and on the lawyer's website, if doing so was not misleading and was compliant with other applicable statutes and court rules regarding attorney firm names and name changes.

6. Here we face a different issue – whether an English language translation of the inquirer's surname, even if juxtaposed to the inquirer's actual surname to identify the lawyer individually – is a permissible proxy for the name of the law firm. We have little doubt that a law firm may in advertising accurately describe its lawyers, their names, and their areas of concentration in languages other than English. But these matters are not the issue here. The sole issue here is whether it is misleading for a law firm to use as its name an English language translation of the lawyer's actual surname, by which the lawyer is admitted to the bar and listed on the official roll of attorneys.

7. We conclude that the answer is yes. The English language translation of the inquirer's last name in the firm name is more than a slight deviation from the inquirer's actual surname. The English language translation of the surname has a greater possibility to mislead the public than simply translating a first name to English or dropping a lawyer's first name and using initials to identify the lawyer. In both N.Y. State 1003 and N.Y. State 872, the firm name used the lawyer's legal surname. The public could the readily see that the lawyer had the same name as the firm. Here, because the proposed firm name is different than the lawyer's legal last name under which the inquirer practices, it is far more likely to mislead the public. This is particularly so when, as here, the inquirer proposes to juxtapose the firm name containing the English language translation of the inquirer's last name next to the inquirer's chosen firm name. This placement could deceive the public into believing that the lawyer is not the sole lawyer in the firm – for instance, that two different lawyers named Yohan Schmidt and John Smith practice there – or that it is not the lawyer's firm. Cf. N.Y. State 869 ¶ 13 (2011) (Rule 7.5(b) permitted a solo practitioner named John Smith to use the firm name "The Smith Law Firm" because the name would clearly and accurately identify the one lawyer named Mr. Smith practicing under the firm name). By contrast, the proposed use of a translated surname here would not clearly and accurately identify the one lawyer practicing under the firm name.

CONCLUSION:

8. A lawyer who appears on the official roll of attorneys under the lawyer's given surname may not use a different name in the lawyer's firm name, even if the name is a reasonable English translation of the lawyer's actual surname.

TOPIC: Attorneys' Fees; Securing Fees and Expenses by Confessions of Judgment

DIGEST: Prior to conclusion of a pending matter, a lawyer may agree with a client to modify an engagement agreement with the client to provide, as security for legal fees and expenses already due and owing in a fixed amount on which the parties agree, for the execution and filing of a confession of judgment, and the execution and recording of a collateral mortgage with a security interest, if the lawyer complies with rules governing business transactions with a client and thereafter abides by the general rules governing conflicts.

RULES: 1.0(f), 1.0(j), 1.5(a), 1.5(d)(5) & (f), 1.7, 1.8(a), 1.16(c)(5) & (d)

FACTS:

1. The inquiring law firm represents two individuals and a company as defendants in a pending and hotly contested dissolution proceeding; the two individuals are principals of the client company, as to which the Court has appointed a Receiver. The law firm is owed a substantial amount in attorneys' fees and expenses incurred over more than a year in defense of the inquirer's clients. The Receiver holds funds consisting of, among other things, the proceeds from the sale of real property previously owned by one of the inquirer's clients. With the clients' joint consent, the firm has asked the Receiver and the Court to permit the Receiver to release funds to pay the inquirer's outstanding fees and expenses. The adverse party objects to the release of receivership funds for this purpose, and to date the firm remains unpaid.

2. The inquirer does not wish to abandon the clients, but is concerned that, in light of the likely expenses of the receivership, as well as creditors with potential claims with priority over any claim for defense fees and costs, there may be insufficient funds remaining to pay the inquirer's outstanding invoices. The firm recognizes that the clients are in a financially parlous condition, struggling to make ends meet, which is among the reasons why the inquirer does not want to impose the economic burden that the firm's withdrawal from the representation would impose on them. Having discussed the matter with the clients, the inquirer proposes to have each client execute, and to have the inquirer file or record as the case may be, client affidavits confessing judgment and a collateral mortgage with a security interest, in each instance limited to the fixed amount, on which the parties agree, currently due and owing to the law firm for services already performed.

3. The inquirer intends to notify the Receiver of these transactions, and anticipates that the Receiver will notify the Court and the adverse party. The law firm's engagement letter with the clients makes no provision for these security arrangements.

QUESTION:

4. May a law firm agree with its clients to amend its existing engagement letter with the clients during the pendency of a matter to provide for the clients to execute, and for the law firm to file or record, affidavits confessing judgment and collateral mortgages as security for accrued but unpaid attorneys' fees and expenses in a fixed amount on which the parties agree?

OPINION:

5. Our role is to interpret the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"), not to opine on issues of law, including laws addressing creditor rights. Accordingly, for our purposes, we assume without deciding that the proposed security arrangements, as well as the contemplated notice of them, do not violate any statute or rule governing Court-supervised receiverships, including the rights of any third parties or arrangements between the inquiring firm and clients subject to the receivership. We note, too, that nothing in this opinion is intended to apply to fee arrangements in a domestic relations matter, in which special rules control. Rule 1.5(d)(5)(iii) (a lawyer may not enter into an arrangement for any fee in a domestic relations matter that "includes a security interest, confession of judgment or other lien without," among other things, "approval from a tribunal after notice to the adversary"); see N.Y. State 1134 (2017) (whether a lawyer in a domestic relations matter may use a credit card to secure legal fees is a question of law under 22 N.Y.C.R.R. Part 1400).

6. In N.Y. State 910 ¶ 19 (2012), this Committee said that "[r]etainer agreements, like all contracts, may be amended with the agreement of the lawyer and the client." We cautioned, however, that "such an amendment raises ethical concerns, because [the] lawyer is often in a position to take unfair advantage of the client." There, as here, the inquirer sought to amend an existing retainer agreement to provide for, among other things, arrangements (including a confession of judgment) to secure payment of the lawyer's fees and expenses. We noted there that, though certain amendments could be considered "normal fee negotiations" subject only to the regulations of Rule 1.5, which govern all fee agreements, "others are considered a 'business transaction with a client'" that are subject to the "higher scrutiny of Rule 1.8." We identified a number of factors that determine whether a particular amendment warranted this heightened level of review. Id. ¶¶ 20-24; see N.Y. State 1051 ¶ 16 (2015) (applying factors to conclude that Rule 1.8(a) applies to a change in a contingency fee agreement enabling the lawyer to be paid out of the proceeds of a third-party loan made as an advance against the client's later recovery in a structured settlement).

7. The considerations germane to assessing the applicability of Rule 1.8(a) – among them, the timing and circumstances of the proposal, the sophistication of the client, the beneficiary of the amendment (lawyer or client), whether the client has deliberately disregarded an obligation to pay – are fact-intensive, but we need not resolve them, for the requirements of Rule 1.8(a) would apply to the inquirer's proposed security arrangements even if part of the original retainer agreement. Comment [16] on Rule 1.8 says as much: "When a lawyer acquires by contract a security interest in property other than that recovered through the lawyer's efforts in the litigation, such an acquisition is a business or financial transaction with a client and is governed by the requirements of paragraph (a)." See Cmt. [4C] (Rule 1.8(a) applies "when a lawyer accepts an interest in the client's business or other nonmonetary property as payment of all or part of the lawyer's fee"); N.Y. State 1104 (2016) (initial engagement letter securing legal fee with a promissory note is subject to Rule 1.8(a)); ABA 11-458 (2011) (amendment to fee arrangements that involve a lawyer acquiring an interest in client property is subject to Model Rule 1.8(a)). Thus, even if some of the factors outlined in N.Y. State 910 might justify an amendment here with reference only to Rule 1.5, the proposed security arrangements require adherence to Rule 1.8(a).

8. Rule 1.8(a) provides:

> A lawyer shall not enter into a business transaction with a client if they have differing interests therein and if the client expects the lawyer to exercise professional judgment therein for the protection of the client, unless:
> > (1) the transaction is fair and reasonable to the client and the terms of the transaction are fully disclosed and transmitted in writing in a manner that can be reasonably understood by that client;
> > (2) the client is advised in writing of the desirability of seeking, and is given a reasonable opportunity to seek the advice of independent legal counsel on the transaction; and
> > (3) the client gives informed consent, in a writing signed by the client, to the essential terms of the transaction and the lawyer's role in the transaction, including whether the lawyer is representing the client in the transaction.

9. Here, the interests of the inquirer and the clients are "differing" within the meaning of Rule 1.0(f), which defines "differing interests" as "every interest that will adversely affect either the judgment or the loyalty of a lawyer to the client, whether it be conflicting, inconsistent, diverse, or other interest." However much the parties may now view the arrangement as a means to maintain their attorney-client relationship, the entry of confessions of judgment and the recording of mortgages with a security interest places the lawyer in direct adversity to the clients. Similarly, while a client may not reasonably expect a lawyer to exercise professional judgment on the client's behalf in the negotiation of a routine retainer agreement, circumstances may exist in which such an expectation arises depending on the sophistication of the client, the complexity of the arrangement, whether the matter is ongoing, and whether the client has independent counsel to assess the transaction. See N.Y. State 1104 ¶ 5. That here the law firm is proposing a somewhat elaborate amendment to the parties' agreement amid an ongoing representation of otherwise unrepresented clients in a hotly contested litigation is likely to create a reasonable expectation that the law firm is exercising its professional judgment on the clients' behalf. See N.Y. State 1055 n. 1 (2015) (client expectation likely when, for example, client has no other counsel, and the lawyer is acting for the client in the matter); N.Y. State 913 ¶ 7 (2012) (client likely to rely on lawyer when lawyer is receiving equity in client's company as a fee).

10. Rule 1.8(a)(1) requires that the terms of the transaction be fair and reasonable to the clients. The fairness and reasonableness of the proposed arrangement depends primarily on "the circumstances reasonably ascertainable at the time of the transaction." N.Y. State 913 ¶ 12. This turns on facts and circumstances beyond our ability to evaluate based on the inquiry. For now, we note only that, as we said in N.Y. State 474 (1977), the amount of the confession of judgment (and by necessary implication, the amount of the mortgage) must be "commensurate with the value of the services rendered," which means that the fee may not be excessive in violation of Rule 1.5(a), and that the lawyer must "scrupulously observe the provisions" of ethical rules "bearing upon legal fees," including obtaining the clients' agreement to the amount. In addition, here, the inquirer intends to limit the amount of the security interest, whether by a confession of judgment or a collateral mortgage with a security interest, to the amount of fees and expenses currently due and owing for services already performed. We therefore need not address whether Rule 1.8(a) would permit the parties agree to agree on an amount higher than the accrued but unpaid invoices. Compare N.Y. State 910 ¶ 12 ("a confession of judgment to secure attorneys fees may be taken only as a form of security and not of payment, and that it may be taken only to secure payment for services previously rendered") with ABA 02-427 (2002) (not per se improper for a lawyer to take a security interest for the payment of fees "earned or to be earned").

11. Rule 1.8(a)(1) requires, too, that the law firm completely and lucidly explain the transaction in writing to the clients in language that the clients may reasonably grasp. This requirement is entwined with the requirements of Rule 1.8(a)(3), which says in part that the clients must give their "informed consent, in a writing signed by the client, to the essential terms of the transaction." Rule 1.0(j) defines "informed consent" as an "agreement by a person to a proposed course of conduct after the lawyer has communicated information adequate for the person to make an informed decision, and after the lawyer has adequately explained to the person the material risks of the proposed course of conduct and reasonably available alternatives." The "requirements for client consent to conflicts under [Rule] 1.8(a) are at least as stringent as those under Rule 1.7(b)," the rule on general conflicts. N.Y. State 1055 ¶ 8.

12. In Opinion 910, we approved a lawyer obtaining a confession of judgment provided that, among other things, "the client clearly understands the character, effect and purpose of the confession of judgment. This includes the potential effect of a confession of judgment on the client's credit standing and employment opportunities." Publicly-docketed confessions of judgment, and a UCC-recorded mortgage with security interest, are potent creditor tools that may have a substantial harmful impact on the client-debtors, among them an injurious effect on banking accounts, the ability to obtain or maintain credit lines, and to sustain business operations. Without attempting an exhaustive list of information that may be "adequate" in these circumstances, components of the information to be relayed may include: (a) whether the firm intends to seek entry of a judgment based on the client affidavits confessing judgment; (b) whether and to what extent the entry of a judgment starts the accrual of statutory post-judgment interest; (c) whether the clients' affidavits effect a waiver of their right, if any, to arbitration of fee disputes as set forth in Rule 1.5(f) and 22 N.Y.C.R.R. Part 137 et seq., a question of law on which we do not opine; and (d) whether a reasonable alternative exists to address the law firm's unpaid invoices – for instance, holding but not filing the security documents. Our concern is that the clients be fully advised of all the material consequences of the proposed course of conduct and any reasonably viable alternative to enable the client to make an informed choice.

13. We are mindful of the opposing interests at stake. Inhering in the concept of informed consent is freedom of choice, that is, circumstances that are not so coercive as to negate any meaningful election. Here, the clients' difficult financial position may leave them no option but to accede to the law firm's request if the only alternative is the law firm's withdrawal from representing them in the pending matter. Yet a law firm has a right to be paid for services rendered in accordance with the parties' agreement. Rule 1.16(c)(5) permits a law firm to withdraw from a representation when a client "deliberately disregards an agreement or obligation to the lawyer as to expenses or fees," albeit here, under Rule 1.16(d), only with permission of the Court if the rules of the Court so mandate. In our view, if a law firm has a right to withdraw from a representation consistent with Rule 1.16(c)(5) – the inquirer so assumes and we proceed on that assumption – then a proposed amendment to a retainer agreement securing the clients' existing obligations to the law firm does not create circumstances in which informed consent is beyond the contemplation of Rule 1.8(a).

14. The balance of Rule 1.8(a) reinforces the import of the provision for informed consent. Rule 1.8(a)(3) prescribes that, in the same writing setting forth the essential terms of the transaction, the lawyer must also describe the lawyer's role in the transaction, including whether the lawyer is representing the client in the transaction. See N.Y. State 958 ¶ 12 (2013) (lawyer's charging of a finder's fee must be fully set forth in writing to the client compliant with Rule 1.8(a)). Here, the lawyer's role is the preparation of the security documents, and the law firm appears poised to act for the client in effecting those transactions. The transactions are for the benefit of the law firm, no matter that the clients may wish the law firm to refrain from withdrawal. This fact enhances the significance of Rule 1.8(a)(2), which obligates the law firm to advise the clients, in writing, of the desirability of seeking, and giving the clients a reasonable chance to obtain, independent counsel to advise them on the proposed security arrangements. Although Rule 1.8(a)(2) does not require the clients actually to retain separate disinterested counsel, case law exists to suggest that the absence of one may facilitate challenges to business transactions with clients. See, e.g.¸ McMahon v. Eke-Nweke, 503 F. Supp. 2d 598, 604 (E.D.N.Y. 2007) (analysis under predecessor of Rule 1.8(a)).

15. The focus of the inquiry, and hence this opinion, is on the inquirer's ethical duties in obtaining the proposed amendment to the parties' existing engagement agreement. Nevertheless, one further consideration merits mention. If the parties agree to the proposed amendment consistent with Rule 1.8(a), the inquirer, in continuing to represent the clients, is still bound by Rule 1.7 governing general conflicts of interest. Rule 1.7(a)(2) provides that a lawyer shall not represent a client, except as permitted by Rule 1.7(b), if "there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests." Thus, the inquirer should consider whether the firm's security interests affect the firm's ongoing representation of the clients in the dissolution proceeding. It is possible, for instance, that in some circumstances either delay or expedition of the proceedings could enhance the value of the inquirer's security interests. See N.Y. City 2000-3 (2000) ("An attorney's inquiry into her potential ethical obligations arising out of a transaction in which the attorney accepts securities for fees does not end with [the rule on business transactions with clients]). Unique issues of potential conflicts of interest also may arise as a result of such arrangements."); see also Rule 1.8 Cmt. [4D] ("An exchange of securities for legal services will also trigger the requirements of Rule 1.7 if the lawyer's ownership interest in the client would, or reasonably may, affect the lawyer's exercise of professional judgment on behalf of the client").

CONCLUSION:

16. A law firm may seek its clients' agreement to modify its retainer agreement with the clients during the pendency of a current matter to secure payment, by confessions of judgment and collateral mortgages, of fully earned but unpaid legal fees and expenses in an amount on which the parties agree, if the law firm complies with the rules governing business transactions with clients and is mindful of ongoing obligations to avoid general conflicts of interest.

TOPIC: Conflicts; representation of testifying expert witness

DIGEST: A law firm may draft a will for a testifying service provider who treats individuals represented by the firm in workers' compensation claims. The law firm is not ethically required to volunteer disclosure of the firm's representation of the witness to others, although the law firm may be required to assure truthful testimony (or remediate false testimony) if the question emerges before a tribunal.

RULES: 1.0(f), 1.6, 1.7, 3.3(a) & (c), 4.1.

FACTS:

1. The inquiring law firm represents injured workers in workers' compensation matters. A health care service provider, who has both a professional and a long-time social relationship with the lawyers in the firm, has asked the firm to draft wills for him and his wife and will pay the firm's normal legal fees for this work. The service provider treats some of the injured workers who are represented by the law firm. There is no referral arrangement, formal or informal, between the service provider and the law firm.

2. Occasionally, the service provider is asked to testify at a hearing before a Workers' Compensation Law Judge about the treatment the service provider intends to render or has rendered to an injured worker whom the law firm represents, typically when, whether before or after the treatment has started, the insurance carrier denies coverage. The testimony usually addresses whether the provider's treatment falls within the Workers' Compensation guidelines and includes the scope of or need for the particular treatment the service provider renders to the injured worker. The law firm, representing the injured worker, calls the service provider as a witness on behalf of the firm's client.

QUESTION:

3. May a law firm draft wills for a testifying expert and his wife and, if so, must the firm disclose its attorney-client relationship with the witness to opposing counsel, the tribunal, or anyone else, in those matters in which the expert is called to testify on behalf of the firm's client?

OPINION:

4. Rule 1.7(a) of the New York Rule of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") provides:

> "[A] lawyer shall not represent a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that either:
> > (1) the representation will involve the lawyer in representing differing interests; or
> > (2) there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests.

Rule 1.0(f) defines "differing interests" to mean "every interest that will adversely affect either the judgment or the loyalty of a lawyer to a client, whether it be conflicting, inconsistent, diverse, or other interest."

5. Lawyers owe duties of loyalty and independent judgment to their current clients. Conflicts of interest may undermine and impair a lawyer's loyalty or exercise of independent judgment on behalf of a client. Comment [2] to Rule 1.7 provides that resolution of a conflict of interest problem "requires a lawyer, acting reasonably, to (i) identify clearly the client or clients, [and] (ii) determine whether a conflict of interest exists, i.e., whether the lawyer's judgment may be impaired or the lawyer's loyalty may be divided if the lawyer accepts or continues the representation." Comment [8] to Rule 1.7 says that the "mere possibility of subsequent harm does not itself require disclosure and consent. The critical questions are the likelihood that a difference of interests will eventuate and, if it does, whether it will adversely affect the lawyer's professional judgment in considering alternatives or foreclose courses of action that reasonably should be pursued on behalf of the client."

6. In our view, drafting a will for a person the inquirer employs as an occasional expert is not discordant with the firm's concurrent representation of clients whom the service provider treats and on whose behalf the service provider may testify. The proposed representation (drafting a will) does not implicate differing interests, is not adverse to the firm's representations workers' compensation claims matters, and is not factually or legally related to the claims of the firm's injured clients. No reason emerges to suppose that drafting of estate documents for the provider will adversely affect the firm's professional judgment in representing any other current client (unless the provider's testamentary plans affects one of the injured workers – a situation we imagine would rarely if ever arise). The "mere possibility" of a future conflict between the workers' compensation clients and the service provider and his spouse does not require disclosure and consent from the respective clients.

7. Neither the law firm's interest in receiving its routine fee for drafting wills or any follow-on work, nor its longstanding social relationship with the service provider, poses a "significant risk" of impairing the lawyer's ability to exercise professional judgment on behalf of its clients in workers' compensation matters – for instance, in deciding whether to call the service provider as a witness – so as to engender a "personal interest" within the meaning of Rule 1.7(a). N.Y. State 901 ¶ 12 n. 3 (2011) (concurrent representation of a corporation on business matters and of a corporate officer in acquiring a summer home in which the corporation has no stake does not constitute a personal interest conflict).

8. Nor does anything in the Rules require the law firm to disclose to anyone that the firm has represented the service provider in estate matters. Obviously, if a workers' compensation client or opposing counsel asks the law firm about any relationships between the law firm and the witness, the law firm has an obligation to assure that the response is truthful. See Rule 4.1 (a lawyer "shall not knowingly make a false statement of fact" to a third person). This obligation is subject to the confidentiality requirements of Rule 1.6(a), which may require the service provider's informed consent to disclosure, particularly because estate matters are often sensitive. In proceedings before a tribunal, however, Rule 1.6(a)'s duty of confidentiality may yield to other concerns. For example, if a tribunal asks about any relationship between the expert witness and the law firm, the law firm must be honest with the tribunal and must assure that the witness is honest as well, including correcting untrue testimony if necessary. See Rule 3.3(a) & (b) (a lawyer "shall not make a false statement of fact" to a tribunal, and must take "reasonable remedial measures" if lawyer comes to know that a witness offered by the lawyer has testified falsely). In the event of false testimony, Rule 3.3(c) overrides the duty of confidentiality; that Rule says the duties in Rules 3.3(a) & (b) "apply even if compliance requires disclosure of information otherwise protected by Rule 1.6." N.Y. State 1123 ¶¶ 8-10 (2017) (noting obligation to disclose confidential information if necessary to correct false information submitted to a tribunal). Subject to these considerations, however, we see nothing in the Rules that compels the voluntary disclosure of an attorney-client relationship between the law firm and its testifying expert.

CONCLUSION:

9. A law firm may draft wills for a testifying service provider who treats clients of the firm without disclosure to or consent of the respective clients. The law firm is not ethically required to disclose the firm's representation of the witness to others, although the law firm may be required to assure truthful testimony (or remediate false testimony) if the question emerges before a tribunal.

OPINION 1141 (12/15/2017)

TOPIC: Conflicts of Interest; imputation of conflicts to co-counsel

DIGEST: Separate law firms that act as co-counsel in discrete matters are not associated in the same firm for purpose of imputing all conflicts of each firm to the other.

RULES: 1.0; 1.6, 1.7, 1.8, 1.9, 1.10, 6.1, 7.2.

FACTS:

1. The inquiring attorney, who is admitted in New York, teaches at an accredited law school in New York. The attorney is involved in the law school's clinical education program, which considers itself a large law firm with different divisions working on particular types of matters. The inquirer supervises one of these divisions, which handles only one type of matter: engaged, pro bono publico, in pursuing claims on behalf of indigent clients at hearings before an administrative agency. The inquirer wishes to have the students in the inquirer's clinic division collaborate as co-counsel with a New York not-for-profit legal services organization. The clinic and the legal services organization are financially separate, operate out of different offices, maintain their own files, do not share any overlapping personnel, and represent numerous clients other than those in which they serve as co-counsel. Although the faculty supervisors' positions are constant, the students who participate in the clinic do so for only a semester or two, and thus turnover of student personnel is a characteristic of the program.

2. The inquirer is concerned that, if the legal clinic and legal service organization collaborate as co-counsel, then the N.Y. Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") may treat the law school's entire clinical program and the legal services organization as a single firm for conflicts purposes. Specifically, the inquirer seeks guidance on whether the clinic must clear all its clients with the legal service organization (and vice versa), or must instead check only those clients in matters in which the two serve as co-counsel.

QUESTION:

3. When a law school clinic acts as co-counsel with a legal services organization in particular matters involving the same types of claims, must the clinic clear conflicts for all of its clients with those of the legal services organization, or only those clients involved in the matters in which the two serve as co-counsel?

OPINION:

4. Rule 1.0(h) defines a law firm to include, among other things, any "association authorized to practice law" and "lawyers employed in a qualified legal assistance organization." Rule 1.0(p) defines a "qualified legal assistance organization" to mean one of the organizations listed in Rule 7.2(b)(1)-(4), the first of which is a legal aid office "operated or sponsored by a duly accredited law school." Under the forerunner of the Rules – the New York Code of Professional Responsibility (the "Code") – we said that a law school legal clinic qualifies as a "law firm," N.Y. State 794 ¶ 8 (2006) ("the rules governing law firms are equally applicable to the law school's legal clinic"), and that the clinic must be considered a single law firm for purposes of conflict imputation, despite separate divisions, if the students in the clinic share common offices, files, work areas, and information, N.Y. State 794 ¶ 16.

No changes in the Rules from the Code alter this conclusion. See N.Y. State 876 ¶ 6 (2011) (when the provisions of the Code and the Rules are similar or identical to each other on matters relevant to the inquiry, opinions under the Code apply with equal force). Accordingly, the question is whether two separate law firms acting as co-counsel on a series of matters implicates Rule 1.10, governing the imputation of conflicts when lawyers are "associated" in a law firm, specifically conflicts arising under Rules 1.7 (governing concurrent conflicts of interest in general), Rule 1.8, (addressing conflicts in specific circumstances), and Rule 1.9 (outlining duties to former clients).

5. In the circumstances presented, the answer is no.

6. Very briefly stated, Rule 1.7(a) prohibits a lawyer from representing a client if "a reasonable lawyer would conclude either" that the representation "will involve the lawyer in representing differing interests" or if a "significant risk" exists that a "lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests." This prohibition is subject to exceptions outlined in Rule 1.7(b), among them where the affected client gives informed consent confirmed in writing, Rule 1.8 is a litany of standards in specific conflict situations, none of which this inquiry raises. Rule 1.9 prohibits a lawyer to be "materially adverse" to a former client in "the same or substantially related matter" without informed consent confirmed in writing. Rule 1.10 says that, while "lawyers are associated in a firm, none of them shall knowingly represent a client when any one of them would be prohibited from doing so" by Rules 1.7, 1.8, or 1.9. Thus, the imputation standard in Rule 1.10 extends the conflicts provisions of the foregoing Rules only when lawyers are "associated" in the same law firm.

7. The Rules do not define the term "associated." In general, however, to be "associated in a firm" means to be a member of, employed by, "of counsel" to, or "affiliated" with the law firm, in each instance reflecting a close and continuing relationship with the firm to warrant imputation of the conflicts of any one lawyer in the firm to the other lawyers there. See N.Y. State 876 ¶ 13 (2011) (when "two law firms are both associated with lawyers at a third firm, the conflicts of each firm are imputed to the lawyers in all three firms as if they were a single law firm"); NY State 793 (2006) ("of counsel" relationship gives rise to imputation); N.Y. State 773 (2004) (same); ABA 90-357 (1990) (same); N.Y.C. 2000-4 (2000) (use of the term "affiliated" denotes relationship that is "close and regular, continuing and semi-permanent" requiring imputation of conflicts). Substance, not form, controls; merely maintaining separate practices, free of connective titles, does not invariably elude the concerns animating Rule 1.10's imputation provisions. Consolidated Theatres v. Warner Bros. Cir. Man. Corp., 216 F.2d 920, 927 (2d Cir. 1954) ("we have never believed that labels alone – partner, clerk, co-counsel – should control our decisions in so sensitive an area [as imputation of conflicts]").

8. Thus, for instance, an office sharing arrangement between two separate practitioners could give rise to imputing the conflicts of each practice to the other. Compare N.Y. City 80-63 (1980) (solo practitioners sharing an office in which each has ready access to information of the other's practice imputes the conflicts of each to the other) with N.Y. State 881 ¶ 12 (2011) (the "occasional use of" telephone lines or conference space "does not, by itself render the inquirer 'associated in'" another lawyer's firm "for purposes of the rule on imputation of conflicts"). See Rule 1.10, Cmt. [2] ("two practitioners who share office space and occasionally consult or advise each other would not ordinarily be regarded as constituting a firm," unless they "present themselves to the public in a way that suggests that they are a firm or conduct themselves as a firm").

9. Motions to disqualify law firms based on some form of association with counsel of record, though legal issues beyond our jurisdictional charter, afford some insight into the imputation rule. Some of these courts refer to their analysis as a "functional" approach, which is analytically indistinguishable from the ethics opinions of this and other Committees that stress the nature of the relationship not the names that the firms choose to characterize that relationship. Illustrations include: Cinema 5, Ltd. v. Cinerama, Inc., 528 F.2d 1384 (2d Cir. 1975) (disqualifying two law firms representing adverse interests while sharing a common partner such that shared confidences are presumed); The Fund of Funds, Ltd. v. Arthur Andersen & Co., 567 F.2d 225 (2d Cir. 1977) (disqualifying successor back-up counsel with which conflicted counsel had ongoing communications about the matter); Homestead Video, Inc. v. Village of Valley Stream, 409 F.3d 127 (2005) (denying disqualification where there was an "attenuated and remote" "of counsel" relationship between the lawyer and counsel acting for the adversary and holding that "no presumption of confidence sharing" arises between a firm receiving confidential information and "a separate firm serving as co-counsel," absent evidence to the contrary); Benevida Foods, LLC v. Advance Magazine Publishers, Inc., 2016 U.S Dist. LEXIS 81186 (June 15, 2016) (disqualifying co-counsel who conferred with a prospective client about a matter but did not comply with Rule 1.18 on protecting confidential information received in such consultation but denying disqualification of co-counsel who conferred with, but received no confidential information from, disqualified counsel about the matter); Dietrich v. Dietrich, 136 A.D.3d 461 (1st Dept. 2016) (denying disqualification when counsel of record is co-counsel with a potentially disqualified lawyer on an unrelated matter).

10. The predominant theme of these cases and ethics opinions is the protection of client confidential information within the meaning of Rule 1.6. The term "co-counsel" ordinarily means attorneys or firms jointly representing a client or clients with respect to a particular litigation or transaction. The relationship is episodic rather than enduring. Exchange of confidential information between co-counsel is a necessary incident to serving the interests of their mutual client(s). We see nothing in the proposed relationship to justify the merger of the two entities for all conflicts.

11. None of the criteria typically seen in merging firms for conflicts purposes – common personnel or finances, shared office space, ready access to client files, regular and substantial overlap of clients – is present in the co-counsel relationship contemplated here. That the legal clinic plans to bring in the legal services organization as co-counsel in only discrete types of matters does not change this result; in private for-profit practice, it is not at all unusual for a law firm litigating in a foreign forum regularly to choose the same local law firm to act as its local co-counsel in that forum, without fear that all the conflicts of one firm would be imputed to the other firm. See ALI, RESTATEMENT OF THE LAW GOVERNING LAWYERS (THIRD), § 123, Cmt. c(iii) (co-counsel who associate for purposes of handling a particular matter are not subject to vicarious disqualification). In light of the Rules' strong encouragement of voluntary pro bono legal services, codified in Rule 6.1, it cannot be said that the arrangement proposed here requires stricter standards.

CONCLUSION:

12. Serving as co-counsel in particular matters does not mean that a law firm legal clinic is "associated in" the same firm as a legal services organization for purpose of the imputation provisions of Rule 1.10. Consequently, when the clinic and organization serve as co-counsel in a matter, the Rules require the clinic and organization to clear conflicts individually and separately, only in matters in which the two serve as co-counsel. OPINION 1142 (01/05/2018)

TOPIC: Delivering client file to client, maintenance of client files in electronic form

DIGEST: Where a lawyer keeps client files received in electronic form in that form and a former client requests a copy of the file in paper form, the lawyer must take reasonable measures to deliver the electronic documents in a form in which the client can access them, but the lawyer may charge the client the reasonable fees and expenses incurred in printing out and delivering a paper copy.

RULES: 1.15.

FACTS:

1. The inquirer has a litigation practice in which most documents, such as discovery materials and transcripts, are received or generated in electronic form. The inquirer stores such documents in electronic form. In those instances in which the inquirer receives documents in hard-copy form, such as documents received from clients, he scans the documents and either returns the originals to the client or keeps them separate from the electronic file.

2. Generally, when a former client requests a copy of his or her file, the firm provides a link to a secure, password-protected cloud storage facility containing the client's file. One former client, who retained the firm to represent him in a criminal matter and who is now incarcerated, has requested that the firm send a printed copy of his electronic file to the former client's spouse. The inquirer states that it would be expensive to print out the electronic documents and send the printed copy to the client. The firm has no hard-copy documents for this client.

QUESTION:

3. To what extent must a lawyer provide a former client with the client file in the form in which the client requests it?

4. Where a law firm maintains its client files in electronic form, can the lawyer charge the former client for the costs of printing and mailing a copy of the client file to the client?

OPINION:

5. The principles that largely govern the answers to these questions have been set forth in a number of court and ethics opinions. First, except where original documents have particular evidentiary or similar value, a lawyer is not required to maintain the client file in any particular form. N.Y. State 940 ¶ 12 (2012) (except for "documents such as wills, deeds, contracts, and promissory notes" or other documents whose legal effect or evidentiary value may be impaired by destroying originals, "the Rules permit electronic copies to be kept in lieu of paper originals"); N.Y. County 725 (1998) ("[I]n some circumstances it may be appropriate for an attorney to record the contents of a client's file electronically or on microfilm instead of retaining the physical file, so long as the evidentiary value of such documents will not be unduly impaired by the method of storage."). See also N.Y. State 1020 ¶ 8 (2014) (a lawyer may use cloud-based data storage and sharing tools as long as the lawyer "takes reasonable steps to ensure that confidential information is not breached").

6. Second, it is well-established that, with some exceptions not relevant here, a former client is entitled to his or her client file. Sage Realty Corp. v. Proskauer Rose Goetz & Mendelsohn, 91 N.Y.2d 30, 37 (1997) (holding that a former client was presumptively entitled to both "end-product" documents and "work product materials, for the creation of which they paid during the course of the firm's representation"); N.Y. State 766 (2003) (overturning prior opinion in light of Sage Realty and concluding that "a former client is entitled to any document related to the representation unless substantial grounds exist to refuse access"). The lawyer's ethical obligation to deliver to the client the client file upon request derives from Rule 1.15(c)(4) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"), which requires a lawyer to "promptly . . . deliver to the client . . . as requested by the client . . . the funds, securities or other properties in the possession of the lawyer that the client . . . is entitled to receive." See N.Y. State 766.

7. Third, it is likewise well-established that a lawyer can generally charge a former client the reasonable fees and expenses of assembling and delivering to the former client those documents that the client is entitled to receive. Sage Realty, 91 N.Y.2d at 38 ("as a general proposition, unless a law firm has already been paid for assemblage and delivery of documents to the client, performing that function is properly chargeable to the client under customary fee schedules of the firm, or pursuant to the terms of any governing retainer agreement"). Where a lawyer gives a client the documents to which the client is entitled, the lawyer is generally entitled to retain a copy, but because the copy is for the lawyer's own protection and not to advance the client's interests, the lawyer must bear the costs of making that copy. N.Y. State 780 (2004) (finding that a lawyer generally has a "right to retain copies of the file in order to collect a fee or to defend against an accusation of wrongful conduct," but that the lawyer must pay for that copy).

8. Thus, it is clear that the inquirer must provide the client with a copy of his file, but we have not previously considered whether the lawyer must print out electronic documents if the client so requests. We conclude that where the client is unable to read electronic documents, the lawyer should make reasonable efforts to transmit the file in a form in which the client can access the documents. This conclusion is based on the premise that the property to which the client is entitled is not merely the physical medium on which the documents reside but the information contained thereon. Where a client is incarcerated, the client may not be permitted to receive a computer disk or drive containing the client file, or may not have the equipment to read the documents so they are usable in any further proceedings.

9. However, the lawyer is not obligated to pay the costs of printing out the documents. Rather, as the Court of Appeals concluded in Sage Realty, the costs of "assemblage and delivery of documents to the client" are properly chargeable to the client. 91 N.Y.2d at 38. The costs of preparing electronic documents for delivery to the client are analogous to the costs of assemblage of paper documents that were at issue in that case. See N.Y. City 2008-1 ("Although the Court of Appeals' Sage Realty decision principally related to paper documents, we do not see any principled reason why a lawyer's fees may not reflect the reasonable costs of retrieving electronic documents from their storage media and reviewing those documents to determine the client's right of access."). As in Sage Realty, however, a different answer on who pays for the printing might obtain where "the law firm has already been paid for" printing a copy of documents, as when a lawyer receives a transcript in hard copy form at a per-page fee that was charged to the client. Here, the inquirer states that there are no such hard copy documents for this client, so they are not the subject of his inquiry. Similarly, because the inquirer was retained by a paying client, we have no occasion to consider whether a different result might obtain where the lawyer was appointed by a court to represent an indigent client.

CONCLUSION:

10. Where a lawyer keeps client files received in electronic form in that form and a former client requests a copy of the file in paper form, the lawyer must take reasonable measures to deliver the electronic documents in a form in which the client can access them. The lawyer may charge the client the reasonable fees and expenses incurred in printing out and delivering a paper copy.

OPINION 1143 (01/18/2018)

TOPIC: IOLA accounts; court appointed referee; deposit of third-party funds

DIGEST: An attorney who is appointed as a referee to conduct foreclosure sales pursuant to Part 36 of the Rules of the Chief Judge may deposit funds received from those sales into an IOLA account or special account maintained by the lawyer's firm or by the lawyer.

RULES: 1.15, 5.1.

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is an attorney who is occasionally appointed as a referee to conduct foreclosure sales pursuant to Part 36 of the Rules of the Chief Judge (22 NYCRR Part 36). Most often, when the inquirer conducts these foreclosure sales, a bank representative is present at the sale to receive any sale proceeds, which are typically owed to a third party. At other times, no bank representative is present, so the sale proceeds are left in the possession of the inquirer.

2. The inquirer is a member of a law firm. The inquirer wishes to deposit the excess funds from foreclosure sales into the law firm's Interest on Lawyer Account ("IOLA"), but the inquirer's firm is reluctant to permit a deposit into the firm's IOLA account because only the inquirer, not the firm, was appointed as referee.

QUESTION:

3. When an individual member of a law firm, and not the law firm itself, is appointed pursuant to 22 NYCRR Part 36 as a referee to conduct a foreclosure sale, may the attorney/referee deposit sale proceeds funds owed to a third party into the IOLA account of the individual attorney's law firm?

OPINION:

4. Rule 1.15(b)(1) of the N.Y. Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"), which addresses the handling of client and third-party funds in the possession of an attorney, says in relevant part:

> A lawyer who is in possession of funds belonging to another person incident to the lawyer's practice of law shall maintain such funds in a banking institution within New York State. . . Such funds shall be maintained, in the lawyer's own name, or in the name of a firm of lawyers of which the lawyer is a member, or in the name of the lawyer or firm of lawyers by whom the lawyer is employed, in a special account or accounts, separate from any business or personal accounts of the lawyer or lawyer's firm, and separate from any accounts that the lawyer may maintain as executor, guardian, trustee or receiver, or in any other fiduciary capacity into such special account or accounts all funds held in escrow or otherwise entrusted to the lawyer or firm shall be deposited. [Emphasis added.]

5. An IOLA account is one such "special account." See Judiciary Law § 497. Our Committee opines only on ethical issues arising under the Rules and not on questions of law. Thus, we offer no view on whether the Judiciary Law, 22 NYCRR Part 36, or any other statute or rule relating to foreclosure sales, address the question presented. If so, then the requirements of law would govern. But if the law is not to the contrary, we see no reason under the Rules why the proceeds of a foreclosure sale belonging to a third party may not be placed into the IOLA account of the inquirer's law firm. (For convenience, we refer to trust accounts or escrow accounts as "special accounts" except when reference to IOLA accounts – a species of special accounts – is appropriate.)

6. By way of background, the appointment of a referee is usually set out in a judgment of sale entered following foreclosure. That judgment dictates the distribution of proceeds, which typically the referee computes. The referee cannot alter the terms of the judgment of foreclosure and sale. On the day of the sale, the referee announces the sale and reads its terms aloud. Following the sale, the referee is responsible for executing a referee's deed, obtaining the purchase deposit (or price), executing the memorandum of sale and the report of sale, calculating the final amount due, and distributing the funds in accordance with the judgment. Familiarity with these requirements is integral to service as a referee. Thus, although a person need not be a lawyer to act as a referee, courts often name lawyers to serve in that position.

7. Such service, in our view, is "incident to the lawyer's practice of law" within the meaning of Rule 1.15(a) even though non-lawyers are legally eligible to serve as foreclosure referees. The Rules may apply to a lawyer (or law firm) when engaged in activities that a non-lawyer may provide. We find support for this conclusion in our prior opinions applying the Rules to lawyers acting as referees in foreclosure matters. For instance, in N.Y. State 924 ¶¶ 4, 6 (2012), we concluded that an attorney could act as a referee in a mortgage foreclosure proceeding in which a client held a judgment on the mortgaged property, provided that the lawyer complied with the confidentiality provisions of Rules 1.6 and 1.8(b), as well as the conflicts provisions of Rules 1.7 and 1.9. Similarly, in N.Y. State 893 ¶ 5 (2011), we said that a prosecutor could accept appointment to a panel of foreclosure referees provided that the lawyer complied with the conflicts provisions of Rule 1.7. Cf. N.Y. State 979 (2013) (lawyers acting as mediators may be subject to the Rules). In light of the prevalence of lawyers appointed to referee foreclosure sales, we have no difficulty concluding that service as such is "incident to" the practice of law, and hence that Rule 1.15 applies.

8. It follows that a lawyer in possession of third-party funds yielded by the sale must assure their safekeeping in a special account segregated from the firm's own business or operating accounts. We know of no reason in the Rules why these funds may not be deposited into an IOLA account maintained by the firm of which the inquirer is a member if the funds qualify for deposit there under applicable laws and regulations. Rule 1.15(a) specifically says that funds so qualifying may be held in special accounts either "in the lawyer's own name, or in the name of a firm of lawyers of which the lawyer is a member." This means that, while the inquirer is not obligated to place the funds into a firm IOLA account, the inquirer is free to do so and the firm is free to accept them.

9. Alternatively, a lawyer in the inquirer's situation may set up a special account (including an IOLA account) in the lawyer's own name. We recognize that some law firms may have their own rules or agreements on such matters – for instance, a partnership provision prohibiting members of the firm from setting up special accounts in the lawyer's own name – but we have not been told of any such provision here. No ethics violation arises if a lawyer sets up a special account only in the lawyer/referee's name. But the inquirer need not do so if the firm will allow him to deposit the money into the firm's IOLA or other special account.

10. Under all circumstances a lawyer or law firm in possession of funds due a third party must maintain a special account to hold the third-party funds. Whichever course is selected, we note that, under Rule 5.1(a), the firm and its members are responsible to make "reasonable efforts to ensure that all lawyers in the firm conform" to the Rules, including proper maintenance of IOLA accounts and other special accounts.

CONCLUSION:

11. An attorney who is appointed as a referee to conduct foreclosure sales, and who is in possession of funds belonging to a third party received from those sales, may ethically deposit funds into either the attorney's firm's IOLA account or into a special account set up by the attorney/referee individually. In any case, the attorney or the law firm must hold such third-party funds in a special account separate from the firm's business or operating account.

TOPIC: Communications with Client; Withdrawal from Representation of Difficult Client

DIGEST: A lawyer may place time and manner limitations on communications with a client provided the lawyer promptly informs and consults with the client on matters within the lawyer's duty of communication. If a breakdown occurs in communications between a lawyer and client such that representation cannot be carried out effectively, the lawyer may seek to withdraw from representing the client subject to any applicable rule of court.

RULES: Rules 1.2(a), 1.4, 1.16, 1.14.

FACTS:

1. A court assigned the inquirer to represent an individual who has been charged with several criminal offenses. Prior to the inquirer's assignment, the client had been represented by a number of other lawyers. The client has unsuccessfully moved to have the inquirer relieved as counsel.

2. The client has ongoing mental health issues for which the client receives treatment. According to the inquirer, the client is physically intimidating, verbally abusive, and often non-responsive. The inquirer wishes to impose some restrictions on the time and manner in which the client may communicate with the lawyer, including limiting communications to scheduled appointments and written communications. If the client does not abide by these limits, or otherwise continues to disrupt communications, then the lawyer wishes to consider withdrawing from the representation.

QUESTIONS:

3. May a lawyer place reasonable restrictions on the time and manner of communications between the lawyer and client? Under what circumstances may a lawyer withdraw from representation of a difficult client?

OPINION:

4. The New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"), in Rule 1.4, entitled "Communication," sets out a lawyer's obligations concerning communicating with clients. The Rule says:

> (a) A lawyer shall:
> (1) promptly inform the client of:
> (i) any decision or circumstance with respect to which the client's informed consent, as defined in Rule 1.0(j), is required by the Rules;
> (ii) any information required by court rule or other law to be communicated to a client; and
> (iii) material developments in the matter including settlement or plea offers.

(2) reasonably consult with the client about the means by which the client's objectives are to be accomplished;

(3) keep the client reasonably informed about the status of the matter;

(4) promptly comply with a client's reasonable requests for information; and

(5) consult with the client about any relevant limitation on the lawyer's conduct when the lawyer knows that the client expects assistance not permitted by these Rules or other law.

(b) A lawyer shall explain a matter to the extent reasonably necessary to permit the client to make informed decisions regarding the representation.

5. Three core principles can be drawn from this Rule. First, a lawyer must keep the client apprised of material circumstances and developments in the matter. Second, a lawyer must comply with a client's reasonable requests for information. Third, a lawyer must reasonably consult with a client both about the means of accomplishing the client's objectives and about other decisions regarding the representation, some of which are within the client's province to decide. See Rule 1.2(a). On the first two of these – on developments in the matter and requests for information from the client – the lawyer must communicate promptly. Although a lawyer's obligations under this Rule are thus robust, neither Rule 1.4 nor other Rules prescribe a specific manner of communication, except when a Rule requires written instruments in specific circumstances, see, e.g., Rule 1.5(b), (c), (d)(5) (governing legal fees); Rule 1.7(b) (governing informed consent to conflicts); Rule 1.8(a) (governing business transactions with clients).

6. Rule 1.4's obligation that a lawyer keep the client "reasonably informed about the status of the matter" can be fairly read to require a lawyer to use methods of communication that are effective, timely, and not unduly burdensome to the client, but the Rule does not prevent a lawyer from selecting the manner of communication. Rule 1.4(a)(4) specifically indicates that a lawyer need comply only with reasonable requests for information, thereby allowing lawyers the flexibility to curtail conversations or meetings that stray beyond the relevant substance of the representation. This provision expresses the Rule's recognition that some clients may thrust upon their lawyers burdensome, immaterial requests for information and that lawyers need not meet such unreasonable demands.

7. Similarly, Rule 1.4 does not prohibit a lawyer from controlling the timing of client communications. Other than the general requirement that developments in the case and responses to reasonable requests for information be "promptly" communicated, the Rule does not curtail a lawyer's discretion to schedule the specific timing of lawyer-client communications. Notably, Comment [4] to Rule 1.4 provides that when a prompt response to a client's reasonable request for information is not feasible, the lawyer (or a member of the lawyer's staff) should "acknowledge receipt of the request and advise the client when a response may be expected." That Comment is consistent with the notion that a lawyer – often balancing competing obligations – needs to have reasonable latitude to schedule the timing of client communications.

8. Consistent with the foregoing, we believe that the Rules do not prohibit a lawyer from responding to a challenging client by limiting the time and manner of communications with the client as long as the lawyer fulfills the substantive communicative requirements contained in Rule 1.4. Cf. N.Y. State 1124 (2017) (noting that no provision in the Rules mandates how lawyers must communicate with each other and that lawyers should work out between themselves the methods of communication that will best facilitate resolution of the matter at hand). Hence, a lawyer may limit communications to scheduled appointments or to some form of written transmission readily accessible to the client.

9. Whether and when a lawyer may seek to withdraw from representing a difficult client is controlled by Rule 1.16, which governs "declining or terminating representation." Rule 1.16(c) provides, in relevant part, that "except as stated in paragraph (d), a lawyer may withdraw from representing when, among other reasons, the "withdrawal can be accomplished without material adverse effects on the interests of the client," Rule 1.16(c)(1), "the client fails to cooperate in the representation or otherwise renders the representation unreasonably difficult for the lawyer to carry out the representation effectively, Rule 1.16(c)(7), or "the lawyer believes in good faith, in a matter before a tribunal, that the tribunal will find the existence of other good cause for withdrawal" Rule 1.16(c)(12). Rule 1.16(d), in turn, provides that "if permission for withdrawal from employment is required by the rules of a tribunal, a lawyer shall not withdraw from employment in a matter before that tribunal without its permission. When ordered to do so by a tribunal, a lawyer shall continue representation notwithstanding good cause for terminating the representation."

10. Because the inquirer has already appeared as counsel for the client in the pending matter, the inquirer may withdraw only with the permission of the tribunal. The reasons for permissive withdrawal in Rule 1.16(c) are disjunctive, so any one of the reasons set forth there may suffice. The most obvious candidate emerging from the facts – and thus the most apparent reason why the inquirer may seek permission for withdrawal from the tribunal – is whether the client's conduct will prevent the inquirer from "carry[ing] out the representation effectively" under Rule 1.16(c)(7). In most representations, and certainly in defending against a criminal prosecution, effective representation requires meaningful communication between a lawyer and client. If the client's verbal abuse and non-responsiveness result in a collapse of meaningful communication, then effective representation is almost certainly not possible. See Roy D. Simon & Nicole Hyland, Simon's New York Rules of Professional Conduct Annotated, 959 (2017) (noting, as examples of client conduct that make it unreasonably difficult to carry out representation effectively, "a client's constant calls to talk about the case or request information beyond what is fruitful or reasonable" and "a client's abusive or threatening communications to the lawyer"); see also Cahill v. Donahoe, 2014 WL 3339787 (W.D.N.Y. 2014) (granting motion to withdraw where "the attorney-client relationship is no longer productive and . . . the discord that has characterized their relationship over many months appears irreparable."). If an irreparable disintegration in communication has occurred, the inquirer may ask the court for permission to withdraw.

11. That the client here has mental health issues for which the client is receiving ongoing treatments makes it appropriate to mention Rule 1.14, which governs a lawyer's responsibilities to clients with diminished capacity. See N.Y. State 949 ¶ 20 (2012). Under Rule 1.14, a lawyer must "as far as reasonably possible" maintain a normal lawyer-client relationship. That a client suffers from mental illness does not diminish the lawyer's responsibility to treat the client attentively and with respect. Rule 1.14, Cmt. [2]. Rule 1.14 permits a lawyer to take protective action when the lawyer reasonably believes that the client is at risk of physical, financial, or other harm unless such action is taken. "Any condition that renders a client incapable of communicating or making a considered judgment on the client's own behalf casts additional responsibilities on the lawyer." Rule 1.14, Cmt. [1]. "Before considering what measures to undertake, lawyers must carefully evaluate each situation based on all of the facts and circumstances." N.Y. State 986 ¶ 12 (2013). In N.Y. State 986, we added (at ¶ 13):

> Any protective action taken by the lawyer should be limited to what is essential to carry out the representation. Thus, the lawyer may consult with family members, friends, other individuals, agencies or programs that have the ability to take action to protect the client. The Rule does not specify all of the potential protective actions that may be undertaken, but it makes clear that seeking the appointment of a guardian is the last resort, when no other protective action will protect the client's interests.

12. If the inquirer remains on the case, the inquirer will need to maintain a normal lawyer-client relationship "as far as reasonably possible," but, in evaluating the situation, the inquirer may conclude that protective actions are available to facilitate communication with the client so that the lawyer may enhance the prospect of effective representation.

CONCLUSION:

13. A lawyer may place reasonable limitations on the timing and manner of client communications. When there is a breakdown of communications between a lawyer and client such that representation cannot be carried out effectively, the lawyer may seek to withdraw from representing the client.

OPINION 1145 (03/07/2018)

TOPIC: Litigation financing; conflicts of interest

DIGEST: Neither the lawyer nor the lawyer's firm may represent a client in litigation funded by a litigation financing company in which the lawyer is an investor.

RULES: 1.7; 1.8 (a), (e), (f) & (i), 1.10(a), (d)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is the managing partner of a law firm that represents plaintiffs in commercial litigation. The inquirer sometimes refers clients to a litigation financing company (the "Company") that provides money to the clients in exchange for a percentage of the prospective recovery.

2. The Company is structured as a limited partnership that privately raises money from qualified investors, among whom the inquirer seeks to be a direct and substantial one. The Company invests in a variety of lawsuits, including some brought by the inquirer's clients, and others brought by persons not represented by the inquirer. Investment decisions are made by a registered investment advisor. Neither the inquirer nor the inquirer's firm represents clients in their negotiations with the Company on the terms of the financing arrangements.

QUESTION:

3. May a lawyer or the lawyer's firm represent a client in litigation funded by a litigation finance company in which the lawyer is an investor?

OPINION:

4. The terms "alternative litigation finance" or "third-party litigation finance" refer to > the funding of litigation activities by entities other than the parties themselves, their counsel, or other entities with a preexisting contractual relationship with one of the parties, such as an indemnitor or a liability insurer. These transactions are generally between a party to the litigation and a funding entity and involving an assignment of an interest in the proceeds from a cause of action. These activities have become increasingly prominent in recent years, leading to significant attention in the legal and popular press, scrutiny by state bar ethics committees, and scholarly commentary.

ABA Commission on Ethics 20/20, Informational Report to the House of Delegates (Dec. 2011) ("ABA Report") at 1 (footnotes omitted); see also, e.g., Ethics Committee of the NYSBA Commercial and Federal Litigation Section, "Report on the Ethical Implications of Third-Party Litigation Funding" (2013); N.Y.C. Formal Op. 2011-2; A. Sebok, "Litigation Investment and Legal Ethics: What Are the Real Issues?," 55 Canadian Bus. L. Journal 111 (2014).

5. In two previous opinions, we have considered issues arising from alternative litigation finance based on the former New York Code of Professional Responsibility (the "Code"). N.Y. State 769

(2003); N.Y. State 666 (1994). Both opinions analyzed issues of legal ethics but noted that this Committee does not opine on issues of law such as the legality of alternative litigation financing arrangements, and we repeat that caveat here. Here, we focus on the specific ethics issues presented in the inquiry; we do not revisit in any detail the ethical considerations applicable to alternative litigation financing generally.

6. In N.Y. State 666, we opined that a lawyer may ethically refer a client to a litigation financing company, while noting that the lawyer must be careful not to compromise confidentiality by disclosing information to the lending institution without the client's informed consent. In N.Y. State 769, we added that, subject to various limitations, a lawyer may ethically represent a client in negotiations with the litigation financing company and charge an additional fee for doing so. Both opinions also stated limitations relevant to the current inquiry that are set forth in the analysis below.

7. That the inquirer seeks to be a direct and substantial investor in the Company is of consequence. We do not address other situations, such as when a lawyer's investment occurs indirectly through intermediate entities, of which the lawyer may not even be aware.

8. The lawyer's proposed investment in the Company implicates at least four conflict-of-interest rules. We will first discuss two provisions – Rules 1.8(a) and 1.7(a)(2) – which the requisite disclosure and consent could potentially satisfy, and will then discuss two other provisions that we think preclude the proposed conduct in all circumstances.

9. Rule 1.8(a) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") sets forth requirements that must be met when a lawyer enters into a business transaction with a client. This specific regulation, rather than the general conflicts provisions of Rule 1.7(a), governs the lawyer's conduct when a lawyer engages in a business transaction with a client. N.Y. State 1055 ¶ 13 (2015). Such a business transaction occurs when a client obtains funding from a source in which the lawyer has a financial interest, which funding will be used in part to pay the lawyer's fees. See N.Y. State 769 (citing the Code's predecessor to Rule 1.8(a) as one of bases for concluding that "the lawyer cannot own any interest in the financing institution"). The two other conditions to trigger Rule 1.8(a) are that the lawyer and client "have differing interests" in the transaction and that "the client expects the lawyer to exercise professional judgment therein for the protection of the client." Whether those circumstances are present will depend on the facts of particular cases. Here, we assume their presence, because the Company and the client have differing interests in the terms of the financing arrangements, s*ee* Rule 1.8, Cmt. [4C] (Rule 1.8(a) applies when lawyer obtains financial interest in client's claim except as Rules otherwise allow), and because the lawyer's financial stake in the Company could give rise to the client's reasonable expectation that the lawyer is exercising professional judgment on the client's behalf, see N.Y. State 769 ("an unsophisticated client may reasonably assume that by facilitating the transaction, the lawyer is also endorsing the entering into of the proposed transaction and/or the terms thereof"); cf. N.Y. State 1055 n. 1 (2015) (client expectation likely when, for example, client has no other counsel, and the lawyer is acting for the client in the underlying matter).

10. When Rule 1.8(a) applies, then the transaction must be "fair and reasonable to the client." This is a fact-intensive inquiry, N.Y. State 913 ¶ 11 (2012), for which we lack data to opine. Assuming the inquirer satisfies this standard, then the inquirer may meet the other requirements of Rule 1.8(a) by complying with the obligations to make full disclosure in a writing, using language the client may reasonably understand, including the lawyer's role in the transaction; to advise the client, and to provide the client the opportunity, to seek independent legal counsel; and to obtain informed consent in a writing the client signs. Rule 1.8(a) (1) - (3).

11. If the client is not to be represented by the inquirer in the litigation, but rather by another lawyer in the inquirer's firm, the inquirer's financial interest would still give rise to a conflict by imputation. Rule 1.10(a) ("While lawyers are associated in a firm, none of them shall knowingly represent a client when any one of them practicing alone would be prohibited from doing so by Rule 1.7, 1.8 or 1.9, except as otherwise provided therein."). Thus, even if the client is represented by another lawyer in the inquirer's firm, that representation, together with the inquirer's investment in the Company, would trigger the restrictions of Rule 1.8(a). But the imputed restriction could, in appropriate circumstances, be satisfied by informed consent and by meeting the other requirements of Rule 1.8(a)(1) - (3).

12. If the inquirer fully complies with Rule 1.8(a), then the inquirer must still abide by Rule 1.7(a) in connection with the ongoing representation of the client. N.Y. State 1139 ¶ 15 (2017). Rule 1.7(a)(2) provides that a lawyer shall not represent a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that "there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests," unless the affected client gives informed consent confirmed in writing. The inquirer's personal and financial interest in the Company could create such a risk. For instance, the Company may have an interest in expediting (or prolonging) the litigation to enhance the value of the Company's investment but which may not equate with the client's interests in going to trial (or reaching an early settlement). A continuing duty exists to protect the client from this risk. Nevertheless, in our view, this conflict may be adequately disclosed and waived under Rule 1.7(b) if the other requirements of Rule 1.7(b) are fulfilled. Rule 1.10 imputes this conflict to other lawyers in the inquirer's firm, but, like the underlying conflict, such an imputed conflict could be adequately disclosed and waived to allow the lawyer's firm to represent the client. See Rule 1.10(d).

13. There are, however, two other applicable Rules that informed consent cannot remedy. Rule 1.8(e) provides (subject to exceptions discussed below) as follows: "While representing a client in connection with contemplated or pending litigation, a lawyer shall not advance or guarantee financial assistance to the client." Underlying this Rule are two concerns: first, that such financial assistance "would encourage clients to pursue lawsuits that might not otherwise be brought," and second, that "such assistance gives lawyers too great a financial stake in the litigation." Rule 1.8, Cmt. [10].

14. The other provision (again subject to exceptions discussed below) is Rule 1.8(i): "A lawyer shall not acquire a proprietary interest in the cause of action or subject matter of litigation the lawyer is conducting for a client." This rule, too, "is designed to avoid giving the lawyer too great an interest in the representation. In addition, when the lawyer acquires an ownership interest in the subject of the representation, it will be more difficult for a client to discharge the lawyer if the client so desires." Rule 1.8, Cmt. [16].

15. We believe that the proposed conduct would violate both of these Rules. A violation of Rule 1.8(e) arises because the payments from the Company would constitute "financial assistance to the [inquirer's] client." We recognize that the inquirer would not be the only investor in the Company, and that the inquirer's client would not be the only litigant funded by the Company, but these facts do not alter the reality that money from the inquirer would be paid as financial assistance to the inquirer's client. Nor does it matter that the money is routed first as an investment in a limited partnership and only thereafter as litigation funding. See Rule 8.4(a) (lawyer shall not violate the Rules "through the acts of another"); Phila. Op. 91-9 ("an attorney generally may not loan funds directly to a client, nor may an attorney indirectly do so through a finance company in which such attorney has an interest."); cf. Fla. Op. 00-3 (2002) ("an attorney may not indirectly loan funds to clients in connection with pending litigation through a nonprofit corporation funded by attorney contributions.").

16. There are three exceptions to Rule 1.8(e) that allow limited assistance to clients in certain circumstances. Rule 1.8(e) (1) (advances of "court costs and expenses of litigation"), (2) (making such payments for indigent or pro bono clients) and (3) (making such payments in contingency matters). In those cases, the benefits of helping assure access to the courts outweigh the perils of such limited assistance. See Rule 1.8, Cmt. [10]. But even then, assistance is limited to "court costs directly related to litigation," such as "filing fees, expenses of investigation, medical diagnostic work connected with the matter under litigation and treatment necessary for the diagnosis, and the costs of obtaining and presenting evidence." Rule 1.8, Cmt. [9B]. Lawyers are never permitted to give litigation clients the more sweeping kinds of assistance – such as lawyer's fees billed on a non-contingency basis – that, under the inquiry, would apparently be provided by the Company. See N.Y. City 2011-2 (for commercial cases such as those at issue here, if the claim appears meritorious, "the financing company will advance amounts to cover attorneys' fees and the other costs of the litigation").

17. This result is consistent with our prior opinions, based on the Code, which indicated that the lawyer "cannot own an interest in the lending institution, as that would indirectly constitute a loan by the lawyer to the client." N.Y. State 666, cited in N.Y. State 769. Other jurisdictions agree. See N.J. Op. 691 (2001) (ethics rules do not prohibit lawyer from helping a client to obtain financial assistance from another "as long as the lawyer has no financial interest in the individual or entity which secures or provides that funding"); S.C. Op. 92-06 (approving attorney's interest in a loan company given that "the company would not make loans to the attorney's own clients"); Fla. Op. 00-3 (2002) ("The attorney shall not have any ownership interest in the funding company"); Phila. Op. 91-9 ("an attorney generally may not loan funds directly to a client, nor may an attorney indirectly do so through a finance company in which such attorney has an interest."); ABA Report at 16, 19-20 (alternative legal financing may be subject to non-waivable conflict rule prohibiting lawyer from "providing financial assistance to a client").

18. The proposed conduct would also violate Rule 1.8(i). By providing money to the inquirer's client in exchange for a percentage of the prospective recovery, the Company would acquire a proprietary interest in the client's claim. The inquirer, as a part owner of the Company, would also acquire such an interest, which the rule prohibits except in the cases of "a lien authorized by law to secure the lawyer's fee or expenses," Rule 1.8(i)(1), or "a reasonable contingent fee in a civil case," Rule 1.8(i)(2). Neither of those exceptions would apply to the inquirer's financial stake in the Company. Even if a client is to compensate the inquirer by contingent fee, such a fee payment would be different from the percentage of a recovery that would ultimately be paid to the Company, and in part indirectly to the inquirer, in exchange for litigation financing. See also ABA Report at 16, 20 (alternative legal financing may be subject to non-waivable conflict rule prohibiting lawyer from "acquiring a proprietary interest in the client's cause of action").

19. As we have said, the imputation provisions of Rule 1.10(a) apply to violations of Rule 1.8. Thus, the preclusion of the proposed conduct by Rule 1.8(e) and Rule 1.8(i) would apply not only to clients whom the inquirer personally represents, but also to those represented by other lawyers associated in the inquirer's firm.

20. These restrictions are not subject to waiver. Rule 1.10(a) applies its imputation standard to any breach of Rule 1.7, 1.8, or 1.9, "except as otherwise provided therein." Rule 1.10(d) says that a "disqualification prescribed by this Rule [1.10(a)] may be waived by the affected client or former client under the conditions stated in Rule 1.7." In the context of prohibited transactions under Rule 1.8(e) or Rule 1.8(i), however, there is no negatively affected client or former client. The concept of waiver makes no sense. What is imputed is not a "disqualification," but rather an outright prohibition of the transaction in question. There are no informed-consent exceptions specific to Rules 1.8(e) and 1.8(i). Accordingly, the prohibitions of financial assistance to a client, and of acquiring a proprietary interest in the subject matter of litigation, are not subject to client waiver, and the same is true of those prohibitions as imputed.

CONCLUSION:

21. Neither the lawyer nor the lawyer's firm may represent the client in a litigation funded by a company in which one of the firm's lawyers is an investor in the litigation financing company providing the funds.

OPINION 1146 (03/20/2018)

Modifies N.Y. State 808

TOPIC: Contingency Fees: Paying Fees in a Criminal Matter from Personal Injury Settlement

DIGEST: A lawyer who represents a client in a personal injury matter and proposes to represent the client in a contemporaneous criminal defense matter and apply any funds recovered in the personal injury matter toward payment of legal fees in the criminal defense matter has a differing interest in any recovery in the personal injury matter and must satisfy the requirements of fairness, full disclosure and written consent set forth in Rule 1.8(a) to enter into the proposed retention.

RULES: 1.0(f), 1.0(j), 1.5(a), 1.8(a), 1.8(i)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer's law firm represents clients in personal injury, criminal defense, and other matters. Occasionally, a client who has a personal injury case becomes involved in a criminal matter and asks the firm represent the client in the criminal matter as well. Clients who are unable to pay in advance for the criminal defense sometimes propose to secure the payment of fees for the criminal representation against the prospective monetary recovery from the personal injury settlement, judgment, or award.

QUESTIONS:

2. The inquirer poses three questions:

> (a) Is it permissible for a client to pay fees for services rendered by the firm in criminal defense matters from a settlement, judgment, or award obtained by the firm on behalf of the client in the personal injury matter?
> (b) Is it permissible to enter into a criminal retainer agreement with a current personal injury client which grants a lien against the client's potential personal injury award to cover fees earned on an hourly basis in the contemporaneous criminal representation?
> (c) If it is not permissible to enter into a criminal defense retainer agreement which purports to create a lien against the personal injury recovery, is it nevertheless permissible to enter into a retainer agreement for the criminal defense matter, and to create a charging lien against the personal injury settlement, papers, or other materials or funds related to the personal injury case, should the client ultimately fail to pay the fees for the criminal defense case?

OPINION:

3. We think the inquirer's first two questions pose the same issue, namely, whether the N.Y. Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") permit the inquirer to enter into an agreement with a client to have fees for services rendered in the criminal defense matter paid out of, or secured by, the proceeds of any settlement, judgment, or award obtained in a personal injury matter in which the firm also represents the client. We assume the inquirer will have the client sign an engagement letter in the criminal defense matter that provides for billing the client at a fixed rate, hourly or otherwise, but provides, too, that fees for the criminal defense matter may be paid out of funds obtained in any recovery in the representation of the client in the personal injury matter, thus establishing an additional source for payment of the fees. This is analytically indistinguishable from a scenario in which the lawyer acquires a lien on any recovery obtained in the personal injury matter as security against payment of fees earned on an hourly basis in the contemporaneous criminal representation. In each instance, the proceeds of any recovery in the personal injury matter will be used to cover legal fees in the criminal defense matter only if the client is unable to cover those fees through the client's own personal funds. This arrangement therefore differs from an arrangement in which payment of legal fees in the criminal matter is contingent on the outcome of that matter, which is expressly prohibited by Rule 1.5(d)(1) (a lawyer "shall not enter into an arrangement for, charge or collect" a "contingent fee for representing a defendant in a criminal matter"). Here, payment in the criminal matter is not contingent on its outcome, and thus not the product of the lawyer's defense of the criminal matter.

4. Rule 1.8(i) permits a lawyer "to acquire a lien authorized by law" to secure payment of the lawyer's legal fees or expenses. This differs from the predecessor of the Rules, the N.Y. Code of Professional Responsibility (the "Code"), which in DR 5-103(A) allowed liens only if "granted by law." In N.Y. State 808 (2007), which was decided under the Code, we contrasted DR 5-103(A) with Rule 1.8(i) of the ABA Model Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Model Rules"), which permitted liens "authorized by law." This led us to conclude that, under the Code, a lawyer could not obtain a security interest in a client's claim when the lawyer represents the client in that claim. But the change from "granted" to "authorized" is of consequence. In explaining the Model Rules, ABA 02-247 said that, "[b]y use of the word 'authorized' in place of the word 'granted' under former [Model] Rule 1.8(j), Rule 1.8(i) is intended to permit any legally recognized lien to secure fees to be acquired in property that is the subject of litigation." The Comments to Rule 1.8 echo this same sentiment concerning New York's adoption of Rule 1.8(i): Although Rule 1.8(i) generally prohibits lawyers from acquiring a proprietary interest in the cause of action or subject matter of a litigation the lawyer is handling, the Rule excepts "liens granted by statute, [] originating in common law and [] acquired by contract with the client." Rule 1.8, Cmt. [16]. Here, the inquirer proposes to enter into a contract with the client providing for a lien on recovery in the personal injury matter, which is permissible under the exception in Rule 1.8(i).

5. While a permitted exception to Rule 1.8(i), the inquirer's proposed arrangement for payment of fees in the criminal defense representation must abide by Rule 1.8(a), which governs business transactions with a client. See Rule 1.8, Cmt. [16] ("When a lawyer acquires by contract a security interest in property other than that recovered through the lawyer's efforts in the litigation, such an acquisition is a business or financial transaction with a client and is governed by the requirements of paragraph (a)."). Rule 1.8(a) provides that "[a] lawyer shall not enter into a business transaction with a client if they have differing interests therein and if the client expects the lawyer to exercise professional judgment therein for the protection of the client" unless the transaction is "fair and reasonable" to the client, the terms are fully disclosed to the client in writing, the client is advised and given an opportunity to seek independent legal counsel, and the client gives informed consent in writing signed by the client.

6. "Differing interests" are defined to "include every interest that will adversely affect either the judgment or the loyalty of a lawyer to a client, whether it be a conflicting, inconsistent, diverse, or other interest." Rule 1.0(f). Here, the interests of the inquirer and the client will differ in connection with the inquirer's representation of the client in the personal injury action because the client and lawyer may have differing interests with respect to the amount of recovery sought and the risk analysis each would apply to obtaining it. For example, the lawyer may advise the client to reject a settlement that would otherwise be acceptable to the client because it is insufficient to cover costs in the criminal defense matter, or advise that the client accept a settlement that provides certainty in payment of the criminal defense costs rather than risk pursuing the case to trial when a credible chance exists of a larger recovery for the client at trial. See N.Y. State 1139 ¶ 9 (2017). In addition, we have previously observed that when a client has no other counsel in the matter and is an individual, and when the lawyer is responsible for client matters in the subject area – which is true here – it is more likely that the client will expect the lawyer to exercise professional judgment on the client's behalf. See N.Y. State 1055 n.1 (2015); see also ABA 11-458 (2011) (amendment to fee arrangements that involves a lawyer acquiring an interest in client property is subject to Model Rule 1.8(a)).

7. The lawyer must determine whether the transaction is "fair and reasonable" to the client. Rule 1.8(a)(1). Determining whether a transaction is "fair and reasonable" to the client requires a fact-specific inquiry of the facts ascertainable at the time. See N.Y. State 913 ¶¶ 11-12 (2012); see also N.Y. State 1139 ¶ 10; ABA 00-418 (2000). In addition, the lawyer must satisfy Rule 1.8(a)'s disclosure and consultation provisions, including assuring that the engagement letter in the criminal defense matter fully discloses the transaction in a manner that can be reasonably understood by the client; that the client provides informed written consent to the terms of the transaction (including the lawyer's role in the matter) after the lawyer has adequately explained the material risks of the proposed fee arrangement and reasonably available alternatives (see Rule 1.0(j)); and that the client has been advised to seek, and has been provided a reasonable opportunity to obtain, the advice of independent legal counsel regarding the proposed engagement. If all of the steps outlined above are taken, we see no ethical prohibition to the proposed fee arrangement.

8. The inquirer's third question – whether the law firm may enter into a retainer in the criminal defense matter that creates a charging lien against the personal injury case if the client fails to pay the fees in the criminal defense matter – is moot unless the inquirer is unable to comply with Rule 1.8(a). If compliance with Rule 1.8(a) is not possible, then the question whether a charging lien may be created against the recovery in the personal injury matter is an issue of law that is beyond the scope of this Committee. See N.Y. State Judiciary Law §475.

CONCLUSION:

9. A lawyer who represents a client in a personal injury matter and proposes to represent the client in a contemporaneous criminal defense matter and apply any funds recovered in the personal injury matter toward payment of legal fees in the criminal defense matter may do so provided that the lawyer complies with the Rule concerning business transactions with a client.

TOPIC: Advertising: Use of "Esq." by a lawyer not admitted in New York.

DIGEST: A lawyer not admitted to practice in New York may use the term "Esq." in connection with a non-legal business conducted in New York, provided that care is taken to avoid confusion about the lawyer's status. A lawyer who performs pro bono immigration services for a nonprofit organization may be described to clients and others as a lawyer, as long as all communications disclose the lawyer's jurisdictional and practice limitations.

RULES: 5.5, 7.5(a) 7.5(d), 8.4(b) & (c).

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is admitted to practice law in California but not New York, where the inquirer currently resides. The inquirer works for a municipal agency in New York, but the scope of the inquirer's employment does not involve the practice of law; the municipal agency employs a New York lawyer who acts as the agency's counsel. The inquirer would like to use the term "Esq." on business cards relating to the municipal employment.

2. In addition, the inquirer is a volunteer immigration lawyer for a non-profit organization, representing individuals in proceedings before the federal immigration court, an administrative agency. The inquirer has registered with the court and is identified as counsel on the court's forms when representing clients before the court. The inquirer advises these clients that the inquirer is not admitted to the practice of law in New York but is admitted in California.

QUESTIONS:

3. The inquiry poses two questions:

   a. May a lawyer not admitted in New York use the honorific "Esquire," more commonly abbreviated as "Esq.," on business cards that the lawyer uses as a municipal employee performing non-legal services?

   b. When a lawyer not admitted in New York performs pro bono legal services to clients before a federal immigration tribunal, what disclosures of jurisdiction and subject matter limitations must the lawyer provide to clients?

OPINION:

4. In N.Y. State 1089 (2016), we addressed whether a "retired lawyer" within the meaning of Section 118.1(g) of the Rules of the Chief Administrative Judge, 22 NYCRR § 118.1(g), may use the title "Esq." in performing legal services that Section 118.1(g) allows for someone so designated. There (in ¶ 4), we cited with approval N.Y. City 1994-5, which says:

> The title "esquire" does not legally designate an individual as a lawyer because it is not conferred in this country as an academic degree or license. It has, however, been adopted by lawyers by convention as a form of designation. Thus, one using the title in the United States is identifying himself or herself as a lawyer.

5. In the same opinion, we added (in ¶ 5), "that the term 'Esq.' does not have precisely the same connotation as, for example, 'Attorney-at-Law,'" and that, while lawyers acting in a non-legal capacity such as working for a nonprofit organization in administration or public relations could use the honorific "Esq." without qualification, a lawyer may not lead the recipient of the communication "to conclude that the lawyer was acting in a legal capacity." Id. Thus, when someone who is not admitted to practice law in New York uses the term "Esq." on a business card or otherwise, the question is whether the use of that abbreviation is misleading under Rule 8.4(c) of the N.Y. Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"), prohibiting lawyers from engaging in "conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation."

6. We think the analysis in N.Y. State 1089 controls here. There, we noted that the retired lawyer remains a lawyer (although limited to performing unpaid legal work), and that while use of the term "Esq." is accurate, public perception must also be considered. A name on a business card containing solely a New York address and the honorific "Esq." could reasonably lead a member of the public to believe that the cardholder is a lawyer. A name on a business card with the honorific "Esq." but describing the person's position as one performing obviously non-legal services conveys a very different message. The issue, then, is not so much the use of "Esq." – provided the person is a lawyer – but the context in which the title appears. If the business transmits the message that the person is a lawyer but not performing legal services, then we see no reason under the Rules why the inquirer may not say as much. As long as the message is not misleading – as long as the lawyer who chooses to use the title takes care to avoid confusion and assure that the relevant audience is not misled to believe that the lawyer is acting as a lawyer – then we have no quarrel with its use on a business card.

7. The inquirer asks also if it is sufficient to explain to clients whom the inquirer represents as a volunteer immigration lawyer that the inquirer is admitted only in California and not in New York. Although we do not address questions of law, it has been our understanding that federal law permits a member in good standing of the bar of any state not under suspension or otherwise restricted in his or her practice of law may practice before federal immigration tribunals. See N.Y. State 863 ¶ 5 (2011).

8. In N.Y. State 863, applying the Rules to determine the disclosure that an attorney not admitted in New York must make, we said that a lawyer must note on letterhead and business cards that the lawyer is admitted to practice only in the state of admission, and that the lawyer's practice in New York is limited solely to immigration matters. We said, too, that prudence in that situation suggests that the lawyer add that the lawyer is "not licensed in New York State," in order to "avoid any possible confusion regarding whether the inquirer is or is not licensed in New York." See id. ¶ 14.

9. While the jurisdictional and subject matter limitations need not be included in an email signature block, nothing in an email or any communication may state or imply that the lawyer is admitted to practice in New York, because to do so would violate Rule 8.4(c), prohibiting a lawyer from engaging in misrepresentation. Id. ¶ 15.

CONCLUSION:

10. A lawyer not admitted in New York may use the term "Esq." on business cards as long as the card does not suggest that the lawyer is performing or qualified to perform legal services in this State. A lawyer may engage in a voluntary immigration practice with a nonprofit organization, and may refer to him or herself as a lawyer, provided that letterhead and business cards used in the practice fairly disclose applicable jurisdictional and subject matter limitations.

OPINION 1148 (04/02/2018)

TOPIC: Conflicts of Interest: Former government lawyer in private practice in matters involving former government employer

DIGEST: A lawyer formerly employed by a county department to handle child support enforcement proceedings may, after termination of such employment, represent respondents in such proceedings, provided that the lawyer was not personally and substantially involved in the same matter while a government employee.

RULES: 1.0(j), 1.6, 1.9(a) & (c), 1.11(a) & (c).

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a New York lawyer formerly employed by a county social services agency (the "Department") within New York State. Among the duties of a county social services department are to assist "the state in the location of absent parents, establishment of paternity and enforcement and collection of support" obligations of legally responsible relatives to contribute for the support of their dependents. N.Y. Social Services Law §111-c(1) (outlining Departmental duties). The Department employs an enforcement unit staffed, in part, by four or five attorneys, who seek to enforce alleged obligations to support dependents. We assume for our purposes that, in doing so, the attorneys represent the Department rather than individuals to whom the support payments may be owed.

2. The inquirer recently retired as one of the Department's enforcement unit attorneys, and has started a solo law firm in the same region. In this practice, the inquirer wishes to represent clients adverse to the Department, including opposing the Department's enforcement actions.

QUESTION:

3. May an attorney, formerly employed by a county department of social services, represent clients opposing the efforts of the attorney's erstwhile government employer, including representing clients challenging support enforcement proceedings brought by that employer?

OPINION:

4. This Committee's charter is limited to interpretation of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") and does not extend to opining on issues of law, statutes, county ethics codes, or other regulations that may govern the duties of current or former government employees in their relations with their current or former government employers. Accordingly, here, we proceed without deciding that the inquirer's proposed representation conforms to any such limitation on the inquirer's proposed conduct.

5. Nothing in the Rules creates an absolute bar to a former government attorney's representation of a client in opposition to the attorney's former employer. Rule 1.11(a)(2) is the principal Rule governing conflicts that may be faced by a former government attorney. N.Y. State 1029 ¶ 9 (2014). Rule 1.11(a) provides in pertinent part that "a lawyer who has formerly served as a public officer or employee of the government . . . shall not represent a client in connection with a matter in which the lawyer participated personally and substantially as a public officer or employee, unless the appropriate government agency gives its informed consent, confirmed in writing, to the representation." Hence, Rule 1.11(a)(2) allows a former government attorney to represent private clients on matters in which the attorney did not participate "personally and substantially" while in government service.

6. The history of Rule 1.11(a)(2) makes "clear that the disqualification must be based on the lawyer's "personal participation to a significant extent." N.Y. State 748 (2001). "[T]hat a former government lawyer was counsel for the government in unrelated matters at the same time that the defendant's case was investigated or prosecuted is not enough to demonstrate personal and substantial participation under DR 9-101," the precursor to Rule 1.11(a)(2) in the N.Y. Code of Professional Responsibility (the "Code"), "or to require disqualification under that rule." Id. "Neither the Code, nor its goal of promoting public confidence require so limiting the practice of former government lawyers that they may not, following their return to private practice undertake work involving the types of matters in which they have gained particular expertise while in public service." N.Y. State 453 (1976).

7. The aims of Rule 1.11(a), a rule specific to onetime government lawyers, are akin to, but significantly differ from, those of Rule 1.9(a), a rule more generally regulating a lawyer's duty to former clients. The goals of Rule 1.9(a) include preventing a lawyer from "switching sides" and "improperly using confidential information of the former client," Rule 1.9, Cmts. [3] &[4], whereas Rule 1.11(a) is designed not only to protect the former government client but also to "prevent a lawyer from exploiting public office for the advantage of another client," Rule 1.11, Cmt. [3]. An additional and important concern of Rule 1.11(a), however, is to avoid an undue deterrent on lawyers serving in a public position without forever forgoing private practice in the legal area in which the lawyer served the government. Rule 1.11, Cmt. [3]; N.Y. State 1029 ¶ 10. For this reason, the test applicable to Rule 1.9 is qualitatively different from the test applicable to Rule 1.11.

8. To be sure, underlying each Rule is a protection of the former client's confidential information. A government lawyer, like any lawyer, owes an ongoing duty to a former client to preserve the confidential information the lawyer garnered in the representation unless the former client releases the lawyer from that duty. Rule 1.11(a)(1) requires a lawyer who formerly served as a public officer or government employee to comply with Rule 1.9(c), which in turn provides that "a lawyer who has formerly represented a client in a matter" [in this case, a government or governmental agency] "shall not thereafter use confidential information of the former client protected by Rule 1.6 to the disadvantage of the former client" or reveal such information, in each case "except as these Rules would permit or require with respect to a current client." Among the exceptions in each Rule is the former client's "informed consent" within the meaning of Rule 1.0(j). Consistent with this proscription, Rule 1.11(a)(2) says that the government agency may consent if a former government attorney seeks to represent another party "in a matter in which the lawyer participated personally and substantially" while a government employee, subject always to the proscription in Rule 1.11(c) against the use of confidential government information against third persons, a ban that consent may not waive (and that is not an issue we address in this opinion).

9. Absent the former client's informed consent, the differing language of the two Rules reflects their different objectives. Rule 1.9(a) bars representation adverse to a former client "in the same or a substantially related matter" to the matter in which the lawyer previously represented a client. Rule

1.11(a) bars representation by a former government employee adverse to the former client only in the same specific matter as the matter in which the lawyer participated "personally and substantially" during the lawyer's government employment. As a result, the application of each Rule may diverge in practical ways. Solely by way of illustration, some courts apply Rule 1.9(a)'s "substantial relationship" test to disqualify lawyers who represented clients in specific types of matters. See, e.g., Panebianco v. First Unum Life Ins. Co., 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 7314 (S.D.N.Y. Apr. 27, 2005) (disqualifying law firm that represented former client in disability matters); Lott v. Morgan Stanley Dean Witter & Co., 2004 U.S. Dist. Ct. LEXIS 25682 (S.D.N.Y. Dec. 23, 2004) (disqualifying law firm that represented former client in ERISA matters); Mitchell v. Metro. Life Ins. Co., 2002 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 4675 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 21, 2002) (disqualifying law firm that represented former client in discrimination matters). Without endorsing these decisions – disqualification to appear in court is a question of law not ethics and governed by judicial standards outside our purview – a theme running through the opinions, sometimes labeled the "playbook" approach, is not practicable in the context of former government lawyers. Many state and sub-state legal departments represent the government only in specific types of cases. To use this "playbook" approach in interpreting Rule 1.11(a) is to disregard both its purpose of encouraging public service and the different language that Rule 1.11(a) uses to assess whether a government lawyer is able to represent a client against the lawyer's former employer.

10. Otherwise put, Rule 1.11(a) ousts the application of Rule 1.9(a) in the context of government lawyers. Rule 1.9(a)'s "substantial relationship" may extend its reach to encompass matters that Rule 1.11(a)'s requirement of "personal and substantial" involvement in the specific matters was not intended to embrace. We do not negate the possibility that the two may overlap in some instances, but neither do we believe that the two are necessarily congruent. That each Rule uses different language, that Rule 1.11(a) is specific to government lawyers in contrast to Rule 1.9(a)'s general application, and that Rule 1.11(a) serves public purposes beyond those animating Rule 1.9(a), fortify this conclusion. We note, too, that the considerations for determining whether Rule 1.11(a) applies are materially narrower than those customarily applied in analysis of a Rule 1.9(a) conflict. Compare Rule 1.11, Cmt. 10 (factors to be used in determining whether two matters are the same include "the extent to which (i) the matters involve the same basic facts, (ii) the matters involve the same or related parties, and (iii) time has elapsed between the matters") with Rule 1.9, Cmts. [2] & [3] (setting forth additional factors to be considered in making a decision about whether a conflict exists).

11. Consequently, we conclude that a onetime government lawyer may represent clients adverse to the lawyer's former government employer unless that lawyer had a personal and substantial involvement in the same specific matter in which the lawyer now proposes to challenge the government's position. This conclusion rests on the assumptions (a) that the inquiring lawyer does not possess confidential information about the specific matter obtained during the inquirer's government service, and (b) that the inquiring lawyer does not otherwise possess confidential information about the specific matter which, owing to the lawyer's confidentiality obligations, the lawyer could not competently represent the client in resisting the government's action without violating the lawyer's ongoing duty of confidentiality, see N.Y. State 901 ¶ 10 (2011) (a lawyer possessing non-disclosable confidential information relating to existing representation must assess whether the lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer may competently represent client). But merely knowing how the government agency usually handles such matters, untethered to personal and substantial involvement in or confidential information about the specific matter, is alone insufficient to prevent the former government lawyer from representing a private client against the lawyer's former government employer.

CONCLUSION:

12.A lawyer formerly employed by a county department to handle child support enforcement proceedings may, after termination of such employment, represent respondents in such proceedings, provided that the lawyer was not personally and substantially involved in, and possesses no confidential information acquired about, the same specific matter while a government employee.

TOPIC: Conflicts of interest: Agency shop lawyer who represents the government against union members

DIGEST: A lawyer who is an agency shop member of a union may represent a government employer agency in disciplinary matters against union-represented employees, unless, in a particular circumstance, a reasonable lawyer would conclude that a significant risk exists that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the government employer might be adversely affected by the lawyer's agency shop membership. If in a particular matter, a lawyer concludes that a conflict may exist, then the lawyer may undertake the representation if the lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer can provide competent and diligent representation and the government agency gives its informed consent, confirmed in writing.

RULES: 1.0(q), 1.7(a) & (b).

FACTS:

1. The inquiring lawyer is admitted to practice in New York and an employee of the State. The inquirer at times represents an agency of New York State in disciplinary proceedings initiated against union-represented employees. The inquirer was once a member of the particular union, but subsequently resigned membership, after which the lawyer became an agency shop member. As an agency shop member, the inquirer is required to pay union dues, but is excluded from membership benefits of the union and is unable to participate in union elections.

QUESTIONS:

2. Does a lawyer who is employed by a state government agency and pays union dues as an agency shop member, but is not a union member, have a conflict in representing the government agency in disciplinary cases against members of the union and, if a conflict exists, may the conflict be waived?

OPINION:

3. Rule 1.7(a) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") says in relevant part that, "[e]xcept as provided in paragraph (b), a lawyer shall not represent a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude" that "there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests." See Rule 1.7, Cmt. [10] (a lawyer's own "financial, property, business or other personal interests should not be permitted to have an adverse effect on representation of a client."). Rule 1.0(q) defines "reasonable lawyer" to be "a lawyer acting from the perspective of a reasonable prudent and competent lawyer who is personally disinterested in commencing or continuing the representation."

4. In N.Y. State 578 (1986), we concluded that, under the New York State Code of Professional Responsibility (the "Code"), the predecessor of the Rules, a lawyer who was a member of a union and subject to the same collective bargaining agreement as an employee involved in a disciplinary proceeding had a conflict in undertaking the representation of the employer in that proceeding. We added, however, that, "if the lawyer is simply an agency shop member, or if the collective bargaining agreement involved is not one to which the lawyer is subject, these concerns are not present to the same degree. Therefore, such a lawyer is not specifically prohibited from representing the State in a disciplinary proceeding brought under a collective bargaining agreement, except where the lawyer finds that he or she is unable to exercise independent professional judgment." Otherwise put, when a lawyer is not a union member, the disabling interests that might trigger Rule 1.7(a)(2) do not exist to the same extent that union membership entails Although we later modified N.Y. State 578 on other grounds (on which more below), we remain of the view that an agency shop member is in a different position than a union member for the purpose of conflicts analysis.

5. More recent opinions under the Rules presented questions in analogous situations in which we adopted similar themes. For instance, in N.Y. State 1119 ¶ 6 (2017), we considered whether a onetime associate district attorney could ethically represent defendants in prosecutions brought by the lawyer's former superior. To us, the issue rested on whether a reasonable lawyer would conclude that the inquirer's prior personal relationship with the district attorney created a "significant risk" that the lawyer's prior relationship with district attorney would adversely affect the independent professional judgment of the inquirer in pursuing a defense. Similarly, in N.Y. State 1122 ¶ 8 (2017), when considering whether a foster parent could maintain a practice as an Attorney for Children in Family Court proceedings, we said the conflict posed by an inquirer's status as a foster parent might well be "theoretical and remote," and that, were there "no 'significant risk' of an adverse effect [on the lawyer's professional judgment], objectively determined, an attorney who is a foster parent may undertake and continue representation of" parties in a Family Court proceeding without the need to obtain informed client consent." See generally N.Y. State 968 ¶ 17 (2013) (discussing personal considerations giving rise to a "significant risk" that the professional judgment of a government lawyer defending claims of colleagues subject to a government furlough would be adversely affected where the furlough program was also applicable to the inquiring lawyer).

6. Accordingly, each time the lawyer is asked to represent the agency in disciplinary actions against employees represented by the union, the lawyer must determine whether a reasonable lawyer would conclude that the lawyer's former union membership and/or current agency shop member status creates a significant risk that his representation of the State against union members would adversely affect the inquirer's independent professional judgment on behalf of the client (the government agency). On the facts presented to us, we do not believe that a reasonable lawyer would conclude that there is such a significant risk.

7. If in a particular situation, the inquirer reasonably believes that there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment would be adversely affected, then a curing mechanism appears in Rule 1.7(b), the exception to which Rule 1.7(a) refers. Rule 1.7(b) says that, notwithstanding a conflict under Rule 1.7(a), a lawyer may represent a client if:

> (1) the lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client; (2) the representation is not prohibited by law; (3) the representation does not involve the assertion of a claim by one client against another client represented by the lawyer in the same litigation or other proceeding before a tribunal; and (4) each affected client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing.

8. In N.Y. State 578, we stuck to the position, first set out in pre-Code N.Y. State 40 (1966), that a government could not give informed consent to a conflict. We abandoned that position in N.Y. State 629 (1992) – hence the foregoing reference to modification of N.Y. State 578 – and have since consistently said that a government may provide informed consent. See N.Y. State 1130 ¶ 15 (2017); N.Y. State 968 ¶ 22; N.Y. State 770 (2003). Thus, if the inquirer were to conclude that a conflict exists, the conflict is subject to waiver by the State.

CONCLUSION:

9. An agency shop member of a union of State employees union may represent a State agency in disciplinary matters against union-represented employees if the lawyer reasonably believes that no significant risk exists that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the State agency will be adversely affected by the lawyer's personal interests. If in a particular circumstance a reasonable lawyer would conclude that there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the government employer might be adversely affected by the lawyer's agency-shop membership, then the lawyer may undertake the representation if the lawyer reasonably concludes that the lawyer can provide competent and diligent representation and the agency gives its informed consent, confirmed in writing.

TOPIC: Solicitations and Referrals: Spouses in Related Businesses

DIGEST: A lawyer's spouse engaged in a non-legal business related to the lawyer's practice area may for ethics purposes be equated to the lawyer in certain circumstances. Thus, a real estate lawyer whose spouse is a real estate broker may receive referrals from the broker/spouse only if the broker/spouse is not involved in the real estate transaction and the broker/spouse fully complies with the rules governing lawyer solicitations. A real estate lawyer may refer clients to a broker spouse only if the lawyer is not involved in the real estate transaction and may be required, in some instances, to obtain informed consent from the referred client, confirmed in writing.

RULES: 1.7(a)(2); 1.7(b), 1.8(e), 1.8(i), 7.3(a)(1); 7.3(b), 8.4(a).

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a transactional real estate attorney whose spouse is a real estate broker. The couple wishes to refer matters to each other. In some circumstances, the inquirer would refer clients to the spouse as a broker; in others, the broker/spouse would recommend the inquirer to represent a party in the closing of a real estate transaction. The inquirer understands that the inquirer and broker/spouse may not participate in their respective roles in the same real estate transaction.

QUESTIONS:

2. The inquirer poses three questions:

(a) May a real estate attorney accept referrals from a broker/spouse who has no personal involvement in the real estate transaction?

(b) May a real estate attorney refer business to a broker/spouse if the attorney does not represent any party in the real estate transaction?

(c) May a real estate attorney representing a client in the sale of property refer the selling client to the broker/spouse in connection with the client's rental of an apartment in which the real estate attorney does not represent the selling client?

3. The inquirer recognizes that a lawyer may not represent a party to a real estate transaction if the attorney's spouse is involved in the transaction. This is consistent with a view we have long held. See N.Y. State 493 (1978); N.Y. State 340 (1974); N.Y. State 244 (1972), modified on other grounds in N.Y. State 340. Rule 1.7(a)(2) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") provides that a lawyer may not represent a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that "there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests." The reach of a "lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests" extends to the "financial, business, property or other personal interests" of the lawyer's spouse.

4. Such is the teaching of N.Y. State 855 (2011). There, the issue was whether a personal injury lawyer could permissibly refer a client to a litigation financing company in which the lawyer's spouse owned a controlling financial interest. We concluded that a lawyer could not ethically do so. We reasoned that a lawyer is not allowed (with exceptions inapplicable there) to subsidize a client's litigation, Rule 1.8(e), nor permitted to acquire a proprietary interest in a litigation, Rule 1.8(i). Id. ¶¶ 4-7. Thus, we said, under the Rules, the lawyer could not personally own an interest in the litigation financing company to which the lawyer referred clients for funding. Id. ¶ 5; see N.Y. State 1145 ¶¶ 13-20 (2018) (a lawyer may not refer clients to a litigation funding firm in which the lawyer is a direct and substantial investor). The unifying interest that marriage entails persuaded us that, if the lawyer could not directly violate Rules 1.8(e) and 1.8(i), then the lawyer could do not so indirectly with a an entity owned by a spouse. Accordingly, in interpreting Rule 1.7(a)(2), we consider any referral relationship between a lawyer and a lawyer's spouse to implicate the lawyer's own "financial, business, property or other personal interests." See N.Y. State 855 ¶¶ 11-12.

5. N.Y. State 855 relied, as we do here, on Rule 8.4(a), which forbids a lawyer a lawyer "to violate or attempt to violate" a Rule "through the acts of another." N.Y. State 855 ¶ 12. Rule 8.4(a) is of particular importance on the subject of the inquirer's first question – the proposed broker/spouse's referral of parties to the inquiring lawyer.

6. Rule 7.3 regulates solicitation and recommendation of professional employment. Rule 7.3(b) defines "solicitation" to mean, in part, "any advertisement initiated by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm that is directed to, or targeted at, a specific recipient or group of recipients," the "primary purpose of which is the retention of the lawyer or law firm, and a significant motive for which is pecuniary gain." Rule 7.3(a)(1) specifically forbids a solicitation "by in-person or telephone contact, or by real-time or interactive computer-accessed communication unless the recipient is a close friend, relative, former client or existing client." In any outreach by the broker/spouse initiated by or on behalf of the lawyer/spouse, the broker/spouse recommending the inquirer as a lawyer in a real estate transaction stands in the shoes of the inquirer as if the inquirer were personally making the outreach. Thus, for instance, the exception for persons who may be contacted in person or in real time – such as former or existing clients – refers to the inquirer's former or existing clients, not those of the broker/spouse. Likewise, Rule 7.3 sets forth other provisions on solicitations – such as recordkeeping and filing – for which the lawyer/spouse must assure compliance. By reason of Rules 1.7(a) and 8.4(a), these regulations apply to the actions of the broker/spouse as if done by the lawyer/spouse.

7. Whether a particular advertisement is a regulated solicitation "initiated by or on behalf of a lawyer" turns on the facts and circumstances of the communication. Rule 7.3(b) "makes an important distinction between communications initiated by the lawyer and those initiated by a potential client." N.Y. State 1049 ¶ 8 (2015); see Rule 7.3, Cmt. [2] ("A 'solicitation' means any advertisement" that is "initiated by a lawyer or law firm (as opposed to a communication made in response to any inquiry initiated by a potential client)"). A spectrum exists, on one end, between an unprompted question by a person on whether the broker/spouse knows any real estate lawyers, and, on the other, the broker/spouse's unprompted recommendation of the lawyer/spouse as a lawyer to handle a real estate transaction. See N.Y. State 1049 ¶ 17 (a web posting "directed to, or intended to be of interest only to, individuals" referring to a particular incident "would constitute a solicitation under the Rules"); N.Y. State 1014 ¶¶ 8, 10 (2014) (a current client's recommendation of a lawyer to a person in need of legal services, made without the lawyer's participation or knowledge, is not a solicitation "initiated by or on behalf of the lawyer").

8. The inquirer's second and third questions are really the same: May a lawyer refer a client to the lawyer's broker/spouse to act in a real estate transaction in which the lawyer is not representing the referred client? The Rules set forth no categorical ban on the lawyer making such a referral. Nevertheless, the lawyer owes ongoing duties of care and loyalty to an existing client, including the duty to exercise independent professional judgment on the client's behalf. Not every client request for a referral, no matter how unrelated to the subject of the lawyer's representation of the client, invariably occasions these duties of care and loyalty. Rather, in our view, whether a lawyer's referral of an existing client to a non-lawyer service provider implicates these duties depends on the circumstances. If, for example, a meaningful relationship is present between the subject matter of the lawyer's representation of the client in a particular matter and the nature of the referral the client seeks, then we believe that the client has a reasonable right to expect that, in making the referral, the lawyer will exercise independent professional judgment on the client's behalf. It follows that the duty to exercise independent professional judgment requires an assessment whether any conflict of interest may burden that judgment.

9. In the current inquiry, we believe that the client could reasonably believe that the subject matter of the lawyer's representation of the client and the client's referral request are not so attenuated as to release the lawyer from the duties of care and loyalty to the client. In our view, a reasonable lawyer could well conclude that referring a client to a broker/spouse creates a significant risk that the lawyer's own "financial, business, property or other personal interests" will adversely affect the exercise of professional judgment in making the referral. We believe, however, that this conflict is subject to waiver by the referred client upon informed consent, confirmed in writing, pursuant to Rule 1.7(b). The requirement of consent is not onerous. The lawyer needs to disclose, at a minimum, the marital relationship with the broker/spouse, and the possibility that, if retained, any commission the broker/spouse earns in the matter could benefit the referring lawyer. This disclosure may be oral. The requirement that consent be "confirmed in writing" – which may be written by either the lawyer or the client, by email or other form of written communication – need acknowledge only that, pursuant to the requisite disclosures, the client agrees to waive any conflict.

CONCLUSION:

10. A lawyer who is engaged in a transactional real estate practice and whose spouse is a real estate broker may receive client referrals from the lawyer's spouse provided that the broker/spouse is not involved in the real estate transaction and the lawyer assures that the broker/spouse fully complies with rules governing solicitation by lawyers. A real estate lawyer may refer a client to a broker/spouse provided that the lawyer does not represent the client in the real estate transaction and, if the circumstances suggest a conflict, the lawyer obtains the informed consent of the referred client, confirmed in writing.

TOPIC: Restrictive Covenants on Lawyers

DIGEST: A lawyer may not enter into an agreement with an employer restricting the lawyer's right to practice law following termination of employment, even when the employment does not involve the practice of law, but a lawyer may agree to a post-employment restriction expressly made subject to applicable ethical rules.

RULES: 5.6(a)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer, admitted to practice law in New York, is currently employed by an organization that does not render legal services. As an employee, the inquirer does not practice law, does not render legal advice to the organization or any of its constituents, and does not hold herself out as an attorney.

2. The organization's standard procedure is to ask its employees to sign an agreement with various provisions which the organization considers protective of its business interests. The contract, in nine single-spaced pages, deals with many matters, including, among other things, confidential information (meaning data the organization regards as proprietary as defined in the contract); ownership of intellectual property; business conflicts; and interactions with the organization's customers and contractors. Of particular relevance here is a provision – headed "Agreement Not To Solicit" – which says, in part, that an employee signatory "may not, directly or indirectly," communicate with or provide services to any current or prospective customer of the organization "relating in any way" to "any services related to the business" of the organization. The contract provides that this prohibition applies during the signatory's employment and for eighteen months following the end of employment.

3. The inquirer wishes to retain the option, at such time as her current employment ends, to engage in the practice of law. She is concerned that the post-employment 18-month tail on the "Agreement Not To Solicit" is so broad as to permit an interpretation imposing a restrictive covenant on her right to practice. In view of this concern, her employer offered to include a proviso that the clause is enforceable only "to the extent not inconsistent" with applicable ethical rules.

QUESTIONS:

4. May a lawyer enter into an agreement with an employer stipulating that, during the course of employment and for a stated period thereafter, the lawyer may not provide any services relating to the business of the employer when the employer is not engaged in, and the lawyer's employment does not involve, the rendition of legal services?

OPINION:

5. Rule 5.6(a)(1) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") says that a "lawyer shall not participate in offering or making" any "partnership, shareholder, operating, employment, or other similar type of agreement that restricts the right of the lawyer to practice after termination of the relationship, except an agreement concerning benefits upon retirement." "The main purposes of Rule 5.6(a)(1) are to protect the ability of clients to choose their counsel freely and to protect the ability of counsel to choose their clients freely." N.Y. State 858 ¶ 7 (2011); see Rule 5.6, Cmt. [1] ("An agreement restricting the right of lawyers to practice after leaving a firm not only limits their professional autonomy but also limits the freedom of clients to choose a lawyer."). Agreements prohibited by Rule 5.6(a)(1) limit the pool of available attorneys, a client's choice of legal counsel, and a lawyer's autonomy in accepting new engagements.

6. Rule 5.6(a)(1) applies no matter whether the employment agreement engages the lawyer to practice law. We have not previously had a chance to address this precise issue. Our prior opinions on Rule 5.6(a)(1) – including those issued under its substantially identical predecessor, DR 2-108 of the New York Code of Professional Responsibility (the "Code") – as well as the New York case law applying the ban on restrictive covenants, involve law partnership agreements, or agreements between practicing lawyers and their clients. See, e.g., N.Y. State 858 (confidentiality clauses in agreements with members of an in-house legal department may not extend so beyond a lawyer's duty to maintain confidential information as to restrict a lawyer's post-employment right to practice law); Cohen v. Lord, Day & Lord, 75 N.Y.2d 95 (1989) (striking down non-compete restrictions in a law partnership agreement). Nevertheless, the unambiguous language of Rule 5.6(a)(1), and the purposes it promotes, supply no basis to distinguish between a contract with a non-client employer (or any other party) restricting a lawyer's right to practice law after the relationship is ended. In each circumstance, the lawyer would be making or participating in the making of an agreement that, by restraining the lawyer's ability to practice law, constricts the freedom of the client to choose a lawyer and the lawyer to accept an engagement.

7. Hence, if the language set forth in the "Agreement Not To Solicit" clause "restricts the right of the lawyer to practice law after termination of" the inquirer's employment, then Rule 5.6(a)(1) forbids the lawyer to agree to that language. Whether contractual language amounts to such a restriction – a separate issue – is a fact-intensive inquiry that customary canons of contract construction control. Although arguments may exist that the employment agreement at issue here is not intended to restrict the inquirer's post-employment right to practice law, the inquirer believes, and we think reasonably so, that the sweeping language of the "Agreement Not To Solicit" clause is sufficiently broad to restrain the lawyer from engaging in the practice of law following termination of her employment. Accordingly, in these circumstances, we conclude that the inquirer may not enter into the employment contract as currently written.

8. Here, though, the inquirer has another option, which is to accept the employer's offer to include language in the agreement to the effect that the "Agreement Not To Solicit" clause is enforceable, and may be invoked, only to the extent that the language is consistent with Rule 5.6(a)(1) or other applicable Rule. This added language, in our view, would remove any doubt about whether the clause impermissibly impinges on the lawyer's right to practice law following the end of employment.

CONCLUSION:

9. A lawyer may not enter into an employment agreement that restricts the lawyer's right to practice law following termination of employment, even when the employment itself does not involve the practice of law, but a lawyer my agree to a post-employment restriction that is expressly made subject to applicable ethical rules.

OPINION 1152 (05/17/2018)

TOPIC: Law Firm Name: Use of Lawyer's First Name as Firm Name

DIGEST: A lawyer may not use only a first name as the sole name of the lawyer's firm.

RULES: 7.1, 7.5(b), 8.4(c).

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a New York lawyer who practices in both New York and other jurisdictions. The inquirer's surname, we are told, is shared by a number of other firms in New York and other places where the inquirer practices. To distinguish the inquirer's firm from these other firms, the inquirer proposes to use only the inquirer's first name – say, John or Jane – as the sole name of the firm, as in John's Law Offices LLC or The Jane Law Firm LLC. The inquirer asserts that this nomenclature would not only serve to differentiate the firm from others bearing the inquirer's surname but also effect efficiencies – such as how the staff answers telephone calls – with existing or prospective clients. The inquirer assures us that the inquirer's first name is the first name by which the inquirer is admitted to practice in New York.

QUESTION:

2. May lawyer use only the lawyer's first name as the name of the lawyer's firm?

OPINION:

3. The answer is no – that lawyer may not use solely the lawyer's first name as the name of a law firm under the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules").

4. Rule 7.5(b) provides, in pertinent part, that a "lawyer in private practice shall not practice under a trade name, a name that is misleading as to the identity of the lawyer or lawyers practicing under such name, or a firm name containing names other than those of one or more of the lawyers in the firm." "The prohibition against trade names is broad, permitting use of little beyond the names of lawyers presently or previously associated with the firm." N.Y. State 869 (2011) (lawyer may not use practice area in the name of the law firm). This Rule "serves to protect the public from being deceived about the identity, responsibility or status of the individuals using the name." N.Y. State 920 ¶ 3 (2012); accord, N.Y. State 732 (2000) (applying prohibition on trade names in DR 2-102(B) of the New York Code of Professional Responsibility (the "Code"), the predecessor of the Rules). "Using a name that is not the legal name of one or more partners or former partners in the law firm constitutes use of a 'trade name' within the meaning of the predecessor to Rule 7.5(b)." N.Y. State 740 (2001) (applying the Code). "This broad prohibition has been applied to disallow firm names adding even limited terms to the names of the lawyers in the firm." N.Y. State 869.

5. We recognize that here, the inquirer proposes to use the inquirer's real first name to identify the inquirer's firm. We have not previously had occasion to address this precise issue, nor can we find any other authority that has done so. Nevertheless, although the term "trade name" is not defined by the Rules, we have written numerous opinions that provide useful guidance in interpreting the meaning of that term. N.Y. State 948 ¶ 3 (2012) (so noting). In N.Y. State 948, for example, we concluded that a "law firm name may not include a variant on the lawyer's name that is created by conjoining the lawyer's initials with an abbreviation of the lawyer's surname." Id. ¶ 7. In N.Y. State 920 ¶ 5, we opined that a lawyer may not use a firm name comprised only of the lawyer's initials. In N.Y. State 861 ¶ 4 (2011), we considered the inclusion in a firm name of initials signifying the firm's practice area to constitute an impermissible trade name. In N.Y. State 740, decided under the identical language in the Code, we said that a lawyer may not insert an arbitrary letter in the firm name unconnected to the names of lawyers who practiced there. Most recently, in N.Y. State 1138 ¶ 7 (2017), we regarded the English translation of the inquirer's actual surname "more than a slight deviation from the inquirer's actual surname" and hence impermissible. See N.Y. County 677 (1990) (firm name may not include first name of one partner and contraction of surname of another partner, as such a name would violate requirement that lawyers practice only under names of lawyers in the firm).

6. Common to all these opinions – and to all the opinions we can locate on the meaning of "trade name" – is the presumption that, in requiring the use of only a lawyer's name in the name of a law firm, the Rules intend to refer to the lawyer's (or lawyers') surname(s). In our view, Rule 7.5(b) embeds an understanding that a law firm's name consists of surnames of lawyers who either practice there or once did. We are unaware of any authority or precedent that breaks from this pattern, and it cannot be denied that, at the time the Rules and their predecessors were adopted, the universal practice in this State was to confine the names of law firms to the surnames of its current or former lawyers. We cannot ignore this context in interpreting the meaning of "trade name." Rather, customary usage teaches us that the public in general and the legal profession in particular expect that the name of a law firm reflects the surnames of lawyers currently or formerly associated with the law firm. Cf. N.Y. State 148 (1970) (under the pre-Code Canon of Ethics, relying on local custom to determine that a firm may continue use of deceased partners in a firm name); N.Y. State 70 (1968) (to the same effect); N.Y. State 45 (1967) (same); see also N.Y. State 622 n.3 (1991) (citing the foregoing to reach the same result under the Code).

7. To disrupt that expectation would, in our view, undermine Rule 7.5(b) and therefore be misleading because of the universal convention on the use of surnames in the names of law firms. See Rule 7.1(a); Rule 8.4(c). To us, any firm name that does not include the surname(s) of lawyer(s) who either practice at the firm – or, "if otherwise lawful," as Rule 7.5(b) says, "the name or names of one or more deceased or retired members of the firm or of a predecessor firm in a continuing line of succession" – is inherently misleading. This does not preclude the inclusion of the inquirer's first name in the name of the firm, provided the surname appears there as well. See N.Y. State 1003 ¶ 9 (2014) (if not misleading, a lawyer may "drop his first name to formulate a firm name that includes his middle initials and legal surname").

8. We note that our conclusion refers only to the name of the inquirer's law firm. Subject to the advertising regulations of Rule 7.1, nothing in the Rules prohibits the inquirer from using the inquirer's first name as a motto, a means of branding, or other advertising. Thus, the inquirer may use only the inquirer's first name in branding the inquirer's law firm on websites and other media to create a distinct identity, provided always that the inquirer complies with Rule 7.1 and any other Rule regulating a lawyer's communications with the public. Rule 7.5, Cmt. [2]; Rule 7.1, Cmt. [8] (permissible to heighten brand awareness); see In re Von Wiegen, 63 N.Y.2d 163, 176-77 (1984) (allowing lawyer to accompany firm name with the logo "The Country Lawyer"); N.Y. State 1017 ¶ 8 (2014) (use of the firm's initials in sponsoring a local sports team did not constitute an impermissible use of a trade name); N.Y. State 937 ¶ 3 (2012) (firm may use firm logo on promotional gifts). We likewise find no obligation in the Rules that a law firm's staff must use the firm's full name in responding to telephone calls. N.Y. State 1017 ¶ 8 (allowing use of the firm's initials in answering telephone calls). There are, in short, various ways for the inquirer to establish a unique identity for the inquirer's law firm and to differentiate the law firm from others that may contain the same surname as the inquirer's. Our point here is that the use of a trade name, that is, one omitting the lawyer's surname, is neither consistent with Rule 7.5(b) nor longstanding expectations about law firm names.

CONCLUSION:

9. A lawyer may not use only the lawyer's first name as the name of the lawyer's firm but may use a first name, together with the lawyer's surname, in the name of the firm. A lawyer may use only the lawyer's first name in promoting the lawyer's practice as a motto or branding element consistent with the rules governing lawyer advertising.

OPINION 1153 (05/24/2018)

TOPIC: Conflicts of Interest: County attorney's service on the board of a county-sponsored community college

DIGEST: Whether a county attorney may also serve on the board of a county-sponsored community college may raise legal issues that overtake ethical concerns. If such dual service is legally permissible, then a lawyer occupying these roles must assess, in each instance when the interests of the county and community college overlap, whether a reasonable lawyer would conclude that the two positions create a significant risk that the lawyer's duty to one will adversely affect the lawyer's duty to the other. If the lawyer determines that such a condition exists, then the lawyer must decide whether the conflict is subject to waiver and, if so, whether the affected client(s) may give informed consent, either for the lawyer or another lawyer in the county attorney's office. In all events, the lawyer must assure that the affected client(s) is or are aware of the potential risk to evidentiary privileges that the lawyer's dual roles occasion.

RULES: 1.0(f), (h), (j), (q) & (r); 1.6(a) & (b); 1.7(a) & (b); 1.10(a) & (d).

FACTS:

1. A county legislature in New York appointed the inquiring lawyer, who is admitted in New York, as county attorney. In this particular county, the county attorney is a full-time position overseeing a staff of assistant county attorneys. Section 501 of the County Law provides that a county attorney "shall be the legal advisor to the board of supervisors [or legislature] and every officer whose compensation is paid from county funds in all matters involving an official act of a civil nature. The county attorney shall prosecute and defend all civil actions and proceedings brought by or against the county, the board of supervisors [or legislature] and any officer whose compensation is paid from county funds for any official act, except as otherwise provided by this chapter or other law." These duties engage the county attorney in representing the county, its officials, its agencies, and its personnel in litigated matters and administrative proceedings; preparing contracts between the county and others; drafting legislation; and generally acting as legal advisor to the county, its officers, its legislature, and its agencies. The county legislature sets the compensation of the county attorney.

2. The inquiring attorney also serves as a member of the board of trustees of the county-sponsored community college and currently chairs that board. Section 6306.1 of the Education Law says that a community college "shall be administered by a board of trustees" consisting, with exceptions not applicable here, of nine members serving seven-year terms, five of whom the legislature names, which may include one member of that body; and four of whom the governor names from among county residents. (A tenth member must be a student, elected by the student body for a one-year term.) Trustees receive no compensation for their service as such. Community college personnel are paid, at least in part, out of county funds.

3. Section 6306.2 of the Education Law directs the community college board to appoint a college president and to adopt curricula, in each case "subject to approval by the state university trustees." The board must also prepare an annual budget, which must be submitted to the local legislative body for adoption, and must discharge such other duties as may be appropriate under the "general supervision of the state university trustees." Section 6306.4 of the Education Law authorizes the community college board, among other things, to acquire by deed or lease any real or personal property to carry out the purposes of the college, subject to county legislative appropriation, and apply any proceeds to college purposes subject to the regulations of the state university trustees. Under the same section, title to personal property thus acquired vests in the board of trustees, while title to any real property vests in the sponsoring county. The county and the community college may be parties to other college-related contracts, either between each other or, together or separately, with third parties. The county legislature has the right to audit the community college's expenditures.

4. As the statutory arrangement evinces, the governance of a community college is triangular. Although a county (or, in less-populated areas, a group of counties) sponsors a community college, the county does so in coordination with and only upon approval of the state university system. Section 355 of the Education Law prescribes that the state university trustees shall provide standards and regulations for the organization and operation of community colleges, which the state university trustees have done (see 8 N.Y.C.R.R. §600 et seq.). Sections 202 and 207 of the New York State Education Law repose ultimate authority over state and community college programs in the New York Board of Regents. By law, then, the county, the community college, and the state university system each plays a role in running the community college.

5. We are told that, in any litigation involving the community college, its board, or its staff, the county attorney's office represents the community college and its constituents, either through the office's own staff attorneys or by selecting outside counsel. The county attorney's office supplies other legal services to the community college as well.

6. The inquirer's appointment as county attorney post-dated the inquirer's appointment to the community college board and election as its chair. The inquirer wishes to know whether ethical issues arise from remaining on the community college's board of trustees while acting as county attorney.

QUESTIONS PRESENTED:

7. Does a conflict of interest arise when an attorney simultaneously serves as a county attorney and as a member of the board of trustees of a county-sponsored community college and, if so, is the conflict subject to waiver by informed consent? What other considerations must a lawyer in these two roles take into account in discharging the lawyer's ethical obligations to each?

OPINION:

Introduction

8. The jurisdiction of this Committee is limited to interpreting the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"). We do not opine on issues of law. The current inquiry potentially raises legal issues under, among others, the County Law, the Education Law, the Public Officers Law, the Rules and Regulations of the New York State University Trustees, the Governance Rules of the Board of Regents, the County Ethics Code, and any ethics regulations of the community college. We note, too, that the so-called "doctrine of incompatibility" – in brief summary, disallowing dual public offices when the holder of one government position has a right to interfere with or subject to audit and review the holder of another government position – is embedded not only in specific statutes, see, e.g., N.Y. County Law §411 (elected county officer may not serve in any other elected county or municipal office or as county supervisor); N.Y. General City Law § 3 (member of common council may not hold appointed city office), and but also more generally in the common law, see, e.g., People ex rel. Ryan v. Green, 58 N.Y. 295, 304-05 (1874) (state legislator could not serve as court clerk); Dupras v. County of Clinton, 213 A.D.2d 952, 953 (3d Dep't 1995) (county legislator could not serve as senior clerk on board of elections); Held v. Hall, 191 Misc.2d 427, 432 (Supreme Ct., Westchester Co. 2002) (county legislator could not serve as police chief); Informal Op. 1039, 1999 N.Y. AG 45 (1999) (under common law, Town Supervisor could not serve as Town Librarian). Questions concerning the effect of any of these or other legal issues on the proposed conduct is best directed to persons with the statutory authority to render advice on such matters, such as the Attorney General of New York or the New York Joint Commission on Public Ethics. If the inquirer's proposed action does not comply with an applicable law or regulation, then the question to this Committee is moot because applicable laws or regulations take precedence over the Rules. See Rule 1.7(b)(2) (disallowing a representation prohibited by law when a concurrent conflict of interest is present). Here, we address solely whether the inquirer's proposed action gives rise to a conflict of interest or other concerns under the Rules.

9. Considerable literature exists on the wisdom of lawyers serving simultaneously as counsel for a corporate entity and as a member of the entity's governing board. See, e.g., Okray, Lawyers as Corporate Board Members: A Paradigm Shift, Fed.Lwy. 12 (Mar 2013); Litov, Sepe & Whitehead, Lawyers and Fools: Lawyer-Directors in Public Corporations, (Feb. 25, 2013) (available at ssrn.com/abstract=2218855); Frievogel, An Ethics Primer for Business Lawyers 8-9 (June 2009) (available at apps.americanbar.org/buslaw/newsletter/0085/materials/ethics.pdf); C. Wolfram, Modern Legal Ethics 738-40 (1986). Although debate on the wisdom of such service is robust, nothing in the Rules, in the ABA Model Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Model Rules"), or, as best we can determine, in any state ethics rules, prohibits the practice. See Restatement (Third) of the Law Governing Lawyers §135, Cmts. d and e (Am. Law. Inst. 1998). Nevertheless, common to all analyses is an acknowledgment that conflicts and confidentiality issues inhere in the occupation of two roles that implicate the lawyer/director's duties of care and loyalty to the organization.

10. In N.Y. State 589 (1988), we examined these issues under the predecessor of the Rules, the New York Code of Professional Responsibility (the "Code"). There, consistent with opinions from other jurisdictions we cited, this Committee said that no per se bar exists to concurrent service as a lawyer for an organization and service as a member of its board. We then identified three principal concerns, one of which – that a lawyer may not use board membership improperly to solicit matters for the lawyer's firm – is inapposite here in the context of a full-time government lawyer heading an office the purpose of which is to represent the organization. The other two concerns are applicable here, namely, the risk to the lawyer's exercise of independent professional judgment arising out of the lawyer's role as a director, a risk heightened, we said, when the lawyer serves as board chair; and the risk of loss of evidentiary privileges, in particular the attorney-client privilege. See ABA 98-410 (1998) (stating similar concerns under the Model Rules).

Conflicts of Interest

11. N.Y. State 589 was decided under DR 5-105 of the Code, which is the forerunner of Rule 1.7(a). The language of DR 5-105 differs somewhat from Rule 1.7(a), but we do not regard the differences as meaningful to our analysis. Rule 1.7(a) says in part that, subject to Rule 1.7(b), "a lawyer shall not represent a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude either" that the representation "involves the lawyer in representing differing interests" or that the representation poses a "significant risk" that the "lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests." Rule 1.0(f) defines "differing interests" to include "every interest that will adversely affect either the judgment or the loyalty of a lawyer a client, whether it be a conflicting, inconsistent, diverse, or other interest." Here, the inquirer's position on the community college board, acting solely in the capacity as trustee, is a personal interest that may differ from or adversely affect the inquirer's legal representation of the county and the county's constituents.

12. A Comment accompanying Rule 1.7 describes the potential conflicts arising from the dual roles of lawyer and director:

> A lawyer for a corporation or other organization who is also a member of its board of directors should determine whether the responsibilities of the two roles may conflict. The lawyer may be called on to advise the corporation in matters involving actions of the trustees. Consideration should be given to the frequency with which such situations may arise, the potential intensity of the conflict, the effect of the lawyer's resignation from the board, and the possibility of the corporation's obtaining legal advice from another lawyer in such situations.

Rule 1.7, Cmt. [35].

13. We can envision a variety of circumstances when a reasonable lawyer (on which more below) would conclude that "differing interests" may be involved in the lawyer's dual roles or that a "significant risk" may exist that the county attorney's obligations to the county, its board, and its officials will be adversely affected by the inquirer's personal interests as a member of the community college board. By way of illustration, the community college board must submit any proposed acquisition or leasing of real property to the county board. As a fiduciary of the community college, the inquirer owes a duty to the community college to promote the real estate plan as adopted by the community college board the inquirer chairs, while at the same time owing the county a fiduciary duty to exercise professional judgment in advising the county on that same matter. Whether the terms of any real estate transaction, in which the community college board chair presumably plays an active part in negotiating, accords with the county's interests, with title being vested in the county, is an issue on which the county is entitled to uncompromised independent judgment. The circumstances become more problematic if, as a board member, the inquirer opposed the transaction, yet as board chair must defend a decision to the county board which the inquirer personally disfavors. We have no difficulty determining that, in circumstances like these, a reasonable lawyer would conclude that a significant risk is present that the lawyer's interests as a community college board member imperils the lawyer's independence as attorney for the county.

14. The inquirer must make this determination in each instance in which the interests of the county and the community college intersect. The exercise is necessarily a case-by-case analysis, including, but not limited to, budget matters, audits, contract matters in which the two entities are co-parties or counter-parties, state-directed mandates, or in the event that the inquirer is personally named in any litigation or other proceeding against the community college trustees. This last event may create special tension: When the subject is the potential liability of the college board or one or more of its members, the lawyer must assure that the lawyer can render independent professional judgment, free of overt or subtle influences that the lawyer's own potential exposure or the lawyer's collegial relationships with other board members may incite.

15. In any circumstance, if the lawyer determines that the conditions of Rule 1.7(a) appear, then the lawyer must decide whether, in the particular instance involved, the conflict is subject to waiver by informed consent under Rule 1.7(b), which says that, notwithstanding "the existence of a concurrent conflict of interest under paragraph (a), a lawyer may represent a client if:

> (1) the lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent represent to each affected client;
> (2) the representation is not prohibited by law;
> (3) the representation does not involve the assertion of a claim by one client against another represented by the lawyer in the same litigation or other proceeding before a tribunal; and
> (4) each affected client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing.

Waiver of Conflicts

16. "The requirements of informed consent are set forth in Rule 1.0(j)." N.Y. State 1055 ¶ 12 (2015). We have previously opined that a lawyer may accept "consent by a government entity if he or she is reasonably certain that the entity is legally authorized to waive a conflict of interest and the process by which the consent was granted was sufficient to preclude any reasonable perception that the consent was provided in a manner inconsistent with the public trust." Id.; N.Y. State 629 (1992). The inquirer should not participate in the decision whether to consent or advise the county or community college on this issue of consent. See N.Y. City 1988-5 (1988) (an attorney who is a member of a cooperative apartment board may not participate in "any decision of the [board] that will reasonably affect the lawyer's own personal" interests as counsel to the board).

17. There remain the other three elements of Rule 1.7(b). As we have said, if the law prohibits the representation under Rule 1.7(b)(2), then no ethics issue need be considered, for the law transcends the Rules. If no law erects a barrier to the representation, then, under Rule 1.7(b)(1), the lawyer must reasonably believe, that is, both subjectively and objectively, that the lawyer is able "to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client." See Rule 1.0(r) (defining reasonable belief); Rule 1.0(q) ("When used in the context of conflict of interest determinations, 'reasonable lawyer' denotes a lawyer acting from the perspective of a reasonably prudent and competent lawyer who is personally disinterested in commencing or continuing the representation"); N.Y. State 1048 ¶ 20 (2015) (Rule 1.7(b)(1) "has both a subjective and an objective component"). Situations may occur in which, despite the existence of a disqualifying "significant risk" under Rule 1.7(a), a disinterested lawyer could well conclude that the lawyer is able to provide the representation that Rule 1.7(b)(1) requires. In other instances, the facts may preclude such a conclusion, in which event the remedy of informed consent is unavailable.

18. In the latter instance, the question arises whether a lawyer in the county attorney's office other than the county attorney may represent the county or community college in the matter in which a conflict prevents involvement of the county attorney. Rule 1.0(h) includes a "government law office" as a "law firm" within the meaning of the Rules. Rule 1.10(a) says that, while lawyers are associated in a law firm, "none of them shall knowingly represent a client when any one of them practicing alone would be prohibited from doing so" by, among other things, Rule 1.7. Thus, if Rule 1.7 disqualifies the county attorney based on a conflict, then the conflict is imputed to all other lawyers in the county attorney's office who are aware of the conflict. Rule 1.10(d), however, says that a "disqualification prescribed by this Rule [1.10(a)] may be waived by the affected client" under the conditions set forth in Rule 1.7. This means that, though the disqualification of the county attorney is imputed to the entire county attorney's office, the applicable entity (whether the county, the community college, or, more likely, both) may consent to representation by another attorney in that office notwithstanding that attorney's knowledge of the conflict. N.Y. State 968 ¶ 25 (2013). Otherwise put, if that other attorney reasonably believes that the attorney may "provide competent and diligent represent to each affected client," then the attorney may proceed with the informed consent of the affected client(s), confirmed in writing.

19. One situation may not allow informed consent no matter the foregoing. Rule 1.7(b)(3) forbids a lawyer to represent a client in "the assertion of a claim by one client against another represented by the lawyer in the same litigation or other proceeding before a tribunal." A county and a community college may find themselves in litigation opposed to each other. We leave for a later resolution, on concrete facts, whether circumstances may exist in which the county attorney or a member of the county attorney's may appear with informed consent in such a dispute or whether the parties would have no recourse but to retain separate independent counsel. See N.Y. State 968 ¶ 28 (leaving open the question whether consent is possible in comparable circumstances).

Protection of Confidential Information

20. The other major risk identified in N.Y. State 589 is the preservation of a client's evidentiary privileges, especially the attorney-client privilege. The county attorney acts as counsel to the county and to the community college, but does not represent the community college merely by reason of membership on the college board. Although evidentiary privileges are questions of law beyond our purview, N.Y. State 789 ¶ 4 (2005), Rule 1.6(a) forbids a lawyer to reveal "confidential information" – the definition of which in that Rule includes information "protected by the attorney-client privilege" – unless the client gives informed consent, the disclosure is impliedly authorized, or the disclosure is permitted by Rule 1.6(b), the elements of which need not detain us here. Our concern – one resonant in the literature to which we alluded at the outset – is that the multiple roles may create confusion about, and threaten the ability to assert, the attorney-client privilege.

21. The Comment to Rule 1.7 is again instructive:

> The lawyer should advise the other members of the board that, in some circumstances, matters discussed at board meetings while the lawyer is present in the capacity of trustee might not be protected by the attorney-client privilege and that conflict of interest considerations might require the lawyer's recusal as a trustee or might require the lawyer and the lawyer's firm to decline representation of the corporation in a matter.

Rule 1.7, Cmt. [35].

22. We do not trespass the limits of our jurisdiction to recognize that, ordinarily, an attorney's confidential communications with a client in pursuit of legal advice are subject to a claim of attorney-client privilege, whereas communications by one board member with fellow board members on matters of corporate policy are not. When the board member communicating on matters of organizational policy is also the lawyer for that organization, the communication is pregnant with potentially perplexing privilege problems – that is, whether the lawyer is communicating as a lawyer to a client or to fellow policymakers as a board member. The consequence is that, when the attorney is also serving as a board member, a danger exists that the attorney-client privilege may not protect the attorney's communications with the board on legal matters. This may be so even if the lawyer is explicit in distinguishing between the lawyer's provision of legal advice and business advice as a board member, because others (such as courts) may disagree.

23. Juggling the competing responsibilities and overlapping roles of government lawyer and board member thus demands acute alertness to the capacity in which the lawyer is acting in a particular setting and to the audience's understanding of the lawyer's communications. Among other things, the lawyer should advise the other members of the community college board that, in some circumstances, matters discussed at board meetings while the lawyer is present in the capacity as trustee might not be protected by the attorney-client privilege, and a parallel disclosure is required when the lawyer is acting as county attorney before county officials in matters involving the community college. At every meeting and during every discussion, clarity is essential on whether the lawyer is participating as counsel or as a board member. That the inquirer is chair of the board enhances this need. As we said in N.Y. State 589, owing to "the chair's more extensive involvement in decision-making concerning the management of the organization," it is possible "if not, indeed, more likely that the responsibilities of the two roles will conflict more frequently than in the case of a mere director." Hence, when the lawyer is participating as counsel, the lawyer must assure that precautions are taken to protect the client's privilege, including safeguards against public disclosure of privileged communications in board minutes or the presence of third parties whose knowledge of the communication might endanger the privilege.

CONCLUSION:

24. If no law or regulation prohibits the dual roles, an attorney may serve as both county attorney and chair of a county-sponsored community college to which the county attorney's office provides legal services if, in each circumstance when the interests of the county and the community college overlap, a reasonable lawyer would conclude that the dual roles do not involve a significant risk that the lawyer's interests as a board member would adversely affect the discharge of the lawyer's independent professional judgment on behalf of the county. If the lawyer cannot so conclude, then the lawyer may seek a waiver of the conflict from each the county and the community college if the lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer may provide competent and diligent representation to the county and the lawyer obtains informed consent, confirmed in writing. Absent such a reasonable belief and accompanying informed consent, another lawyer in the county attorney's office may generally act for the affected client upon informed consent confirmed in writing that the other attorney in the office may provide the requisite representation. In all events, the county attorney must take special precautions to assure the protection of evidentiary privileges that the lawyer's dual roles might imperil.

TOPIC: Third-Party Payor: Duty to communicate with client of insurance-assigned counsel

DIGEST: An attorney assigned by insurance carrier to represent an insured owes a duty of loyalty to the insured, and may not restrict or limit communications to the insured concerning the representation, notwithstanding attorney's concerns that insured may use such information adversely to financial interests of insurance carrier.

RULES: 1.2(a), 1.4; 1.6; 1.7(a)(2); Rule 1.7(b), Rule 1.8(f).

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a New York attorney whom an insurance carrier chose to defend an indemnification counterclaim stemming from a fatal car collision.

2. The automobile accident killed the driver husband and passenger wife. The Surrogate's Court appointed one of the couple's children as Executor of the Husband's Estate and the Wife's Estate. The Executor retained both an Estate Counsel and a Litigation Counsel. The Litigation Counsel commenced a wrongful death action on behalf of the Executor, acting for the Estates, as well as the Executor and the couple's other children in their individual capacities and as Beneficiaries of the Estates. Defendants in the wrongful death action are the owner and driver of the other vehicle involved in the collision. The wrongful death action seeks compensatory damages on behalf of the Beneficiaries, comprising lost monetary support, and survival damages on behalf of the Estates, consisting of physical and emotional pain and suffering of the decedents prior to death. The Beneficiaries of both Estates are the same.

3. In answer to the wrongful death complaint, defendants have asserted an affirmative defense of comparative fault that the husband's negligence in operating the vehicle was the sole, or at least a contributing, cause of the accident. Defendants have also asserted a counterclaim solely against the Husband's Estate for indemnification. Neither the affirmative defense nor the counterclaim would reduce the recoveries by the other plaintiffs in the wrongful death action, but a successful affirmative defense could reduce any damages awarded to the Husband's Estate and a successful indemnification claim could result in the Husband's Estate reducing the exposure of defendants to damages awarded plaintiffs. Litigation Counsel represents the Executor of each Estate and the Beneficiaries in opposing the comparative fault affirmative defense. The Wife's Estate and the Beneficiaries have interposed no direct claim against the Husband's Estate.

4. The inquirer is the attorney assigned by the husband's insurance carrier to defend the Husband's Estate against the indemnification counterclaim. The inquirer believes that the insurance coverage may not be adequate to satisfy an award entered on the counterclaim. Although limiting the husband's culpability for the accident is in the interest of all plaintiffs in the wrongful death action, the inquirer believes that tension exists between the interests of the Husband's Estate, on the one hand, and the Wife's Estate and the Beneficiaries, on the other hand, with respect to the wrongful death damages each allegedly sustained. On the inquirer's view, the Executor, acting on behalf of the Husband's Estate in defense of the counterclaim, should seek to minimize the wrongful death damages to reduce the exposure of the Husband's Estate to indemnify defendants, but, acting on behalf of the Wife's Estate and the Beneficiaries, the Executor should seek to maximize the wrongful death damages allegedly due them.

5. The Executor has directed the inquirer to communicate solely with Estate Counsel about the defense of the indemnification counterclaim. The inquirer is concerned, however, that confidential information received by the Estate Counsel from the inquirer will be shared by the Estate Counsel or by the Executor with Litigation Counsel. That confidential information would ordinarily concern, among other things, the inquirer's strategy for addressing the husband's allegedly culpable conduct and the compensatory wrongful death damages sustained by the Wife's Estate and the survival damages sustained by the Beneficiaries. For this reason, the inquirer wishes to circumscribe the communications to the Estate Counsel, because the inquirer believes that unrestricted communications may adversely affect the insurance company's exposure on the indemnification counterclaim.

QUESTION:

6. May an insurer-assigned counsel for an insured limit communications to the counsel's client based on a belief that the client may use the communications to the financial detriment of the insurance company?

OPINION:

7. The answer is no. Our opinions address solely the ethics issues that an inquirer poses about the inquirer's own prospective conduct; we do not opine on the conduct of others. Thus, we offer no opinion here on whether Litigation Counsel has a conflict of interest in representing all plaintiffs in the wrongful death action. Our focus is confined to the inquirer's duties to the inquirer's client, the Executor of the Husband's Estate, under the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"). The Rules make clear that the inquirer's obligations are to serve the interests of the Executor as the Executor defines them.

8. Rule 1.8(f) prohibits a lawyer from accepting compensation for representing a client from one other than the client unless:

> (1) the client gives informed consent;
> (2) there is no interference with the lawyer's independent professional judgment or with the client-lawyer relationship; and
> (3) the client's confidential information is protected as required by Rule 1.6.

9. Rule 1.8(f) makes clear that, no matter the source of the lawyer's compensation for > representing a client, the lawyer's duty is to the client, not to the one paying the lawyer's fees.

10. Comment 11 to Rule 1.8(f) elaborates:

> Lawyers are frequently asked to represent clients under circumstances in which a third person will compensate them, in whole or in part. The third person might be a relative or friend, an indemnitor (such as a liability insurance company). . . . Third-party payers frequently have interests that may differ from those of the client. A lawyer is therefore prohibited from accepting or continuing such a representation unless the lawyer determines that there will be no interference with the lawyer's professional judgment and there is informed consent from the client.

Rule 1.8, Cmt. [11]; see Feliberty v. Damon, 72 N.Y.2d 112, 120 (1988) ("[T]he paramount interest independent counsel represents is that of the insured, not the insurer."); N.Y. State 1102, ¶ 3 (2016) ("When the insurance company designates counsel for the assured, whether the designated counsel is inside or outside counsel, the lawyer's client is the insured and not the insurance company."); N.Y. State 716 (1999) (the lawyer's primary allegiance is to the client, the insured); N.Y. State 73 (1968) (attorney employed by carrier has superior duty to assured, the client).

11. An insurer-compensated lawyer thus owes the same duties to a client as if the client were paying the lawyer's fees. Rule 1.2(a) provides that "a lawyer shall abide by a client's decisions concerning the objectives of representation and, as required by Rule 1.4, shall consult with the client as to the means by which they are to be pursued."

12. Rule 1.4 imposes obligations on attorneys, among other things, promptly to inform the client of material developments in the matter, Rule 1.4(a)(1)(iii); reasonably to consult about the means by which the client's objectives are to be achieved, Rule 1.4(a)(2); to keep the client reasonably informed about the matter, Rule 1.4(a)(3); promptly to comply with the client's reasonable requests for information, Rule 1.4(a)(4); and to explain a matter to the extent reasonably necessary to permit the client to make informed decisions regarding the representation, Rule 1.4(b).

13. It may be that the inquirer's counterclaim defense litigation strategy, if freely reviewed and discussed with the Executor or Estate Counsel in conformance with inquirer's obligations under Rules 1.2(a) and 1.4, and subsequently disclosed to Litigation Counsel, might harm the interests of the insurance carrier, but consideration of the insurer's interests in discharging the lawyer's obligations under Rules 1.2(a) and 1.4 would constitute interference with the inquirer's attorney-client relationship with the client Executor that Rule 1.8(f) forbids. See Feliberty, 72 N.Y.2d at 120 ("[t]he insurer is precluded from interference with counsel's independent professional judgments in the conduct of the litigation on behalf of its client") (citations omitted). Any strategy for opposing and defeating the comparative fault affirmative defense and the indemnification counterclaim is just one element of the larger picture that the Executor must consider, a picture which also presumably takes account of the limited coverage that the insurance carrier provides for the counterclaim. Accordingly, the inquirer's communications with the Executor, or with the Estate Counsel at the direction of the Executor, should be free and unrestricted, guided by the requirements of Rules 1.2(a) and 1.4. The use to which the Executor or Estate Counsel choose to make of those communications, in what they determine to be the overall best interests of the Estates and the Beneficiaries, is for the Executor or Estate Counsel to decide, not the inquirer.

14. The inquirer should take one other consideration into account, an issue we raise owing solely to the inquirer's desire to limit communications to the inquirer's client based on the inquirer's concern about the Husband's Estate's insurer.

15. The inquirer may rely on repeat business from the insurance carrier, whether through a long-standing business relationship between the carrier and the inquirer's law firm, personal relationships with claims agents or other carrier employees, or otherwise. We are mindful, for example, that insurance companies often maintain lists of approved counsel to represent their insureds in particular types of matters. Being so listed is obviously in the financial and business interests of the law firm. We recognize, too, that the interests of the insurer and the insured are not always perfectly aligned. Although each has an interest in minimizing a claimant's recovery, an insured may have other interests in seeking a resolution of a matter that the insurer regards as excessive in light of the insurer's more narrow interests – a situation that this inquiry potentially poses.

16. If a lawyer depends on an insurance carrier for a regular flow of business, and the lawyer believes that the lawyer's insured client is pursuing a course of action that the lawyer considers potentially injurious to the insurance carrier, then the lawyer must determine whether, under Rule 1.7(a), a reasonable lawyer would conclude that a "significant risk" exists "that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf" of the insured client "will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests." If the lawyer determines that such a "significant risk" is present, then, consistent with Rule 1.7(b), the lawyer must assess whether the lawyer nevertheless reasonably believes that the lawyer "will be able to provide competent and diligent representation" to the insured client and obtain the insured client's informed consent, confirmed in writing, to continuing the representation. In that circumstance, the inquirer should disclose the inquirer's relationship with the insurer and, if able to provide the requisite representation, obtain the Executor's consent to continuing the representation.

CONCLUSION:

17. An insurer-assigned lawyer may not limit or restrict communications to the lawyer's client even if the possibility exists that the client may share the communications with others whose interests may be in conflict with those of the insurer.

OPINION 1155 (08/27/2018)

TOPIC: Dual practice as lawyer and financial planner

DIGEST: Whether a lawyer may provide both legal services and nonlegal services to a single client depends on whether the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's financial interest in the nonlegal services. If there is no significant risk that it will, then the lawyer may provide both. Whether the nonlegal services will be subject to the provisions of the Rules depends on whether the nonlegal services are distinct from the legal services, which turns on the nature of the legal and nonlegal services and how integrated they are. But receiving brokerage commissions with respect to nonlegal products would constitute a nonconsentable conflict of interest.

RULES: 1.7(a) & (b), 1.8 (a) & (f), 5.4 (a) & (b), 5.7(a), 5.8, 7.1, 7.4(a) & (c), 8.4(b).

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a family/matrimonial lawyer. In that connection, the inquirer may prepare Statements of Net Worth and value assets for settlement purposes. The inquirer recently received certification from a non-governmental entity as a "Certified Financial Planner," and would like to provide stand-alone financial planning services to new and existing clients. The services would include recommendations for investments and insurance as well as education and retirement planning. The inquirer asks a number of questions about whether the provision of such services is permitted by the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules").

QUESTIONS:

2. A. May a lawyer provide stand-alone financial services under a financial planning agreement to clients of the law firm and also to persons who do not receive legal services from the lawyer?

   B. May the lawyer provide legal and financial services to the same client simultaneously?

   C. May the lawyer include information about financial planning services in the lawyer's newsletter and website, as long as the lawyer makes clear that these are non-legal services and do not create a lawyer-client relationship?

   D. May the lawyer refer financial planning clients to an asset management or insurance firm (an "investment firm") that pays the lawyer a referral fee for products purchased from the company, as long as the referral relationship is non-exclusive and the company or the lawyer discloses to the client that the lawyer will receive a commission? Must the disclosure be in writing?

   E. Is the relationship between the lawyer and the investment firm subject to Rule 5.8?

OPINION:

3. Lawyers have traditionally provided both legal and nonlegal services to their clients. See N.Y. State 206 (1971) (conditions under which dual practice is permissible). Two issues are raised by that practice: (1) the potential conflict of interest under Rule 1.7 if the lawyer's interest in the nonlegal services will have an adverse effect on his or her independent professional legal judgment on behalf of the client, and (2) whether the Rules of Professional Conduct apply to the nonlegal services as well as the legal services.

The Potential Conflict of Interest

4. Before a lawyer may provide both legal and nonlegal services to the same client, the lawyer must determine whether doing so would violate Rule 1.7(a), which prohibits a lawyer from representing a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that a significant risk exists that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial or business interests (unless client consent is possible and the client gives informed consent). See N.Y. State 784 (2005) (if an entertainment management company in which a lawyer has an interest will provide non-legal services to a client of the lawyer's firm, the law firm may continue to represent the client only if a disinterested lawyer would believe that the representation of the client will not be adversely affected thereby and the client consents to the representation after full disclosure of the implications of the lawyer's interest in the management company).

5. In many circumstances, whether there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment will be adversely affected will depend on the size of the lawyer's financial interest in the nonlegal services, and whether the lawyer's actions in the legal matter may affect the lawyer's ability to receive the nonlegal fees. If there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment will be adversely affected by the non-legal financial interests, the lawyer must disclose that possibility to the client and obtain informed consent, confirmed in writing.

6. Some conflicts are deemed to be so serious that client consent is not possible. In a series of opinions, we have found that, in certain cases, the conflict between the legal and nonlegal services is so severe that it cannot be cured by consent. Most of these opinions involve acting as a lawyer and a real estate broker in the same transaction. See N.Y. State 752 (2002) (after adoption of the predecessor to Rule 5.7, the conflict provisions of the Code of Professional Responsibility still prohibited a lawyer from acting as a lawyer and a real estate broker in the same transaction, even with the consent of the client); N.Y. State 208 (1971); N.Y. State 919 ¶ 3 (2012); N.Y. State 933 ¶ 7 (2012); N.Y. State 1013 ¶ 5 (2014); N.Y. State 1015 ¶ 7 (2014). The nonconsentable conflict identified in these opinions is that the broker's personal financial interest in losing the brokerage transaction interferes with the lawyer's ability to render independent advice with respect to the transaction. See also N.Y. State 595 (1988); N.Y. State 621 (1991); N.Y. State 738 (2001) (dual role of lawyer for real estate client and abstract title examiner impermissible because of possible need to negotiate exceptions to title).

7. We have reached similar conclusions with respect to brokers of financial products. In N.Y. State 536 (1981), we were asked whether the members of a law firm could conduct a financial planning business from the same office in which they practiced law, and whether they could provide both legal and financial planning services to the same clients. We concluded that engaging in such dual practice would not be unethical, as long as the financial planning corporation did not offer any products (e.g. securities, real estate or insurance) for which it would receive a commission or other form of compensation or act as legal counsel and broker in the same transaction. We reached a similar conclusion in N.Y. State 619 (1991). There, a lawyer engaged in estate planning wanted to recommend to the lawyer's clients the purchase of life insurance products that were an appropriate means to achieve the client's financial or estate planning goals, but the lawyer had a financial interest in the sale of the products recommended. We concluded that this situation presented a nonconsentable conflict of interest:

> A frequent topic in trust and estate planning is whether and to what extent life insurance products should be used to satisfy some of the client's financial objectives and, is so, which ones. Where a lawyer has a financial interest or affiliation with a particular life insurance agency or company, the lawyer's independent professional judgment would unavoidably be affected in considering the appropriateness of or recommending, life insurance products for a particular client. . . . Given the wide array of life insurance products sold by various companies at differing prices, not to mention the threshold question of whether life insurance products are the most appropriate or economical way to best satisfy the client's needs, however, we do not believe that there could be meaningful consent by the client to the lawyer having a separate business interest of this kind.

8. Consequently, we believe the inquirer could conclude that a lawyer may provide both legal and financial planning advice to clients, but could not also receive brokerage commissions with respect to financial products purchased by clients receiving the lawyer's legal advice.

Application of the Rules of Professional Conduct to Lawyer's Nonlegal Services

9. The remainder of this opinion assumes that the lawyer will not receive commissions for recommending particular financial products to a client who also receives legal services and that a reasonable lawyer would not conclude that there is a significant risk that the inquirer's professional judgment on behalf of a client would be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial or business interests in the financial planning fees. As noted above, lawyers have long provided both legal and nonlegal services to their clients. A lawyer who does so, however, must take care that the clients are not confused about whether the lawyer is acting as a lawyer and must determine whether the provisions of the Rules apply to the nonlegal services as well as to the legal services. The issues are set forth in Comment [1] to Rule 5.7:

> Whenever a lawyer directly provides nonlegal services, the lawyer must avoid confusion on the part of the client as to the nature of the lawyer's role, so that the person for whom the nonlegal services are performed understands that the services may not carry with them the legal and ethical protections that ordinarily accompany a client-lawyer relationship. The recipient of the nonlegal services may expect, for example, that the protection of client confidences and secrets, prohibitions against representation of persons with conflicting interests, and obligations of a lawyer to maintain professional independence apply to the provision of nonlegal services when that may not be the > case. The risk of confusion is especially acute when the lawyer renders both legal and nonlegal services with respect to the same matter.

10. Rule 5.7(a) sets forth the lawyer's responsibilities when the lawyer or her law firm provides nonlegal services to clients or other persons:

> (a) With respect to lawyers or law firms providing nonlegal services to clients or other persons:
> > (1) A lawyer or law firm that provides nonlegal services to a person that are not distinct from legal services being provided to that person by the lawyer or law firm is subject to these Rules with respect to the provision of both legal and nonlegal services.
> > (2) A lawyer or law firm that provides nonlegal services to a person that are distinct from legal services being provided to that person by the lawyer or law firm is subject to these Rules with respect to the nonlegal services if the person receiving the services could reasonably believe that the nonlegal services are the subject of a client-lawyer relationship.
> > (3) A lawyer or law firm that is an owner, controlling party or agent of, or that is otherwise affiliated with, an entity that the lawyer or law firm knows to be providing nonlegal services to a person is subject to these Rules with respect to the nonlegal services if the person receiving the services could reasonably believe that the nonlegal services are the subject of a client-lawyer relationship.
> > (4) For purposes of paragraphs (a)(2) and (a)(3), it will be presumed that the person receiving nonlegal services believes the services to be the subject of a client-lawyer relationship unless the lawyer or law firm has advised the person receiving the services in writing that the services are not legal services and that the protection of a client-lawyer relationship does not exist with respect to the nonlegal services, or if the interest of the lawyer or law firm in the entity providing nonlegal services is de minimis.

11. Paragraph (a)(1) of Rule 5.7 governs nonlegal services that are not distinct from legal services. Those nonlegal services are always subject to the Rules, no matter what disclaimer a lawyer may provide about the nonlegal services. Although the comment quoted above points to the protection of client confidences and secrets, the prohibition against representation of persons with conflicting interests, and the obligations of the lawyer to maintain professional independence, those are not the only Rule provisions that would apply to the provision of nonlegal services that are not distinct. See, e.g., N.Y. State 1135 ¶¶ 8-9 (2017) (CPA services are not distinct from legal services; consequently, under Rule 7.3, the lawyer who provides CPA services may not engage in in-person or telephone solicitation for clients).

12. Rule 5.7(a)(2) governs nonlegal services that are distinct from legal services. Those nonlegal services are still subject to the Rules if the recipient could reasonably believe that they are the subject of a client-lawyer relationship, unless the lawyer has advised the recipient in writing that the protection of the client-lawyer relationship does not apply to the nonlegal services. Paragraph (a)(3) applies where the lawyer is the owner or agent of any entity that provides nonlegal services to a recipient. Those nonlegal services are still subject to the Rules if the recipient could reasonably believe that the nonlegal services are the subject of a client-lawyer relationship, unless the lawyer has advised the recipient that the protection of the client-lawyer relationship does not apply to the nonlegal services.

13. Because a disclaimer by the lawyer that the Rules apply to nonlegal services applies only if the legal and nonlegal services are distinct, it is important to determine whether the services are distinct. The inquirer here is a family and matrimonial lawyer. The proposed nonlegal services are those that might be provided by a financial planner, including recommendations for investments, insurance, and education and retirement planning.

Are the services distinct?

14. In NY State 1135 ¶ 7, noting that the Rules do not define "distinct," we used the dictionary meaning: To be "distinct" is to be "not alike, different, not the same, separate, clearly marked off." Webster's Unabridged Dictionary 534 (2d ed. 1979). Rule 5.7(a) identifies the subjects to compare – the service provider (the lawyer), the substance of the service to be provided (legal or nonlegal), the proposed recipient of the service (the potential client), and the manner or means by which the lawyer offers the services (that is, the degree of integration of the two services). When the lawyer provides both the legal and nonlegal services, the most important factor in determining distinctness is the degree of integration of the services. See N.Y. State 1135 ¶ 8 (state and local tax services involving tax law and accounting, including tax audit defense and certain administrative matters before tax authorities, are integrated "not distinct" services); N.Y. State 1026 ¶ 10 (2014) (services are "not distinct" when a lawyer offered nonlegal mediation services in domestic relations matters in which the retainer agreement offered to "represent the parties in drafting and filing the court papers to obtain a divorce if the mediation results in a settlement; thus the legal and nonlegal services were "intimately bound up with each other"); N.Y. State 1015 ¶ 14 (legal and nonlegal real estate services provided in the very same matter are not distinct).

15. When a patron of the nonlegal services business uses only that service and not legal services, there is no integrated whole and the nonlegal services are by definition distinct. When, however, the patron of nonlegal financial planning services is also using or has received related legal services of the lawyer, whether the legal and nonlegal services are distinct will depend on the nature of the legal and nonlegal services. When the legal services involve estate planning and the financial planning services include planning investments that would affect the size and composition of the estate or the educational or retirement plan, even if the nonlegal services are provided from a separate entity and at times are not overlapping, we believe the services would be nondistinct. Therefore, the provisions of the Rules will apply to the nonlegal services.

Information about Investment Services in the Lawyer's Newsletters and Website

16. In N.Y. State 1135 (2017), we noted that, where the nonlegal services are not distinct from legal services, and thus the Rules would apply to the nonlegal services, the advertising and solicitation rules would apply to the nonlegal services. Thus, the link and the related text here would be

"advertisements" and would have to comply with Rule 7.1 governing advertisements. The same would be true if the information were not in a link but in the lawyer's actual website or newsletter.

17. Under Rule 7.1, a lawyer may use the phrase "Certified Financial Planner" on a website, newsletter, and other advertisements subject to the Rules. In N.Y. State 1100 ¶ 3 (2016), the inquirer wanted to use the designation "Accredited Estate Planner" on a website and on business cards. We opined that such use would be a claim of specialization in violation of Rule 7.4(a), which prohibits a lawyer or law firm from identifying one or more areas of the law in which the lawyer or law firm practices, and from stating that the lawyer is a specialist in a particular field, except as provided in Rule 7.4(c). We noted that the term "certified" implied expertise. By contrast, we do not regard "financial planning" as an area of law practice, even when that service is not distinct from other services provided by the lawyer. Accordingly, we believe that a lawyer could use the designation "certified financial planner" in the firm newsletter and on its website without running afoul of Rule 7.4, as long as the advertising makes clear that financial planning is not a legal service and that the service does not involve an attorney-client relationship.

Referring Financial Planning Clients to a Third-Party Investment Firm

18. The inquirer asks whether a lawyer may refer financial planning clients to an asset management or insurance firm that pays the lawyer a referral fee for products purchased from the company, as long as the referral relationship is non-exclusive and the company or the lawyer discloses to the client that the lawyer will receive a commission. We assume that the investment firm may legally pay the attorney a fee or commission and that such payment is not otherwise illegal, because, if the fee is illegal and reflects adversely on the lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness as a lawyer, receipt of the payment would violate Rule 8.4(b).

19. The answer to this question is controlled by N.Y. State 1086 (2016), discussing whether a lawyer may accept a fee or commission from an investment firm for referring a client to that firm. In N.Y. State 1086, we pointed out that the question of whether a lawyer may accept a referral fee from a third-party service provider generally involves analysis of Rules 1.7(a)(2) and 1.8(f). Id. ¶ 6. As we noted above, Rule 1.7(a)(2) governs conflicts involving a lawyer's personal interest and generally prohibits a representation where a reasonable lawyer would conclude that the representation would involve the lawyer in representing differing interests or that there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests – in either case, unless the conflict can be and is waived under Rule 1.7(b).

20. We noted in N.Y. State 1086 that a number of our prior opinions have permitted a lawyer to accept a referral fee or commission from a third-party service provider in a few restricted instances, but that other prior opinions have prohibited a lawyer from accepting such a referral fee or commission, often because the lawyer's personal conflict of interest is so great that disclosure to and consent from the client will not cure the conflict.

21. Our opinions permit such a payment in very limited circumstances. See, e.g., N.Y. State 981 (2013) (referral fee not prohibited by Rule 1.7 where the service is not related to the lawyer's legal services and the lawyer makes no recommendation to use the service); N.Y. State 667 (1994) (lawyer may accept referral fee from mortgage broker notwithstanding predecessors to Rules 1.7(a) and 1.8(f) as long as client consents and all proceeds are credited to client if client so requests); N.Y. State 626 (1992) (lawyer for lender may retain fees from a title insurance company as long as client consents and amount of the fee is disclosed to the borrower who will pay the cost of the insurance and the total amount of the lawyer's fee is not excessive); N.Y. State 576 (1986) (lawyer may act as agent for title insurance company and also represent the buyer, seller or mortgagee in a real estate transaction consistent with the predecessors to Rules 1.7(a) and 1.8(f) as long as lawyer credits client with amount received from title insurer or the client expressly consents to the lawyer retaining the fee paid by the insurer); N.Y. State 461 (1977) (lawyer may accept part of a fire adjuster's commission consistent with predecessor to Rule 1.7(a) if client consents and all proceeds thereof are credited to client); and N.Y. State 107 (1969) and N.Y. State 107(a) (1970) (both permitting lawyer to accept a referral fee from a financial company where the lawyer invests the client's funds in certificates of deposit, if client consents after disclosure and lawyer remits the fee to client if client so requests).

22. When these narrow circumstances do not exist, we have opined that receipt of a commission creates a nonconsentable conflict. See, e.g., N.Y. State 682 (1996) (lawyer may not accept a fee from an investment adviser for referring a client under predecessor to Rule 1.7 because disclosure and consent would not cure the lawyer's direct and substantial conflict); N.Y. State 671 (1994) (lawyer engaged in estate planning may not accept referral fee from insurance company for referring client under predecessor to Rule 1.7 because disclosure and consent could not cure the direct and substantial conflict between the client's and the lawyer's interests); N.Y. State 619 (1991) (where estate planning lawyer's remuneration from the third party would vary with the quantity of the product or services recommended, receipt of the referral fee was impermissible under predecessors to Rules 1.7 and 1.8(a) [business transaction with client] because the lawyer's substantial financial interest conflict could not be cured by disclosure and consent).

23. In particular, N.Y. State 682 identifies two factors that determine whether the lawyer's financial interest in a referral fee is so great that disclosure and client consent will be ineffective. A client may give informed consent for a referral fee when (1) the transaction at issue involves a product or service that is fairly uniform among providers and is required in an objectively determinable quantity, or (2) when the product or service is fairly uniform among providers and is unconnected to any particular legal services.

24. In this case, we understand that a variety of financial products could meet the financial planning objectives of the clients (i.e. the products are not fairly uniform) and that the products are not required in an objectively determinable quantity. See N.Y. State 1086 ("In N.Y. State 682 (1996) we determined that an attorney may not accept a fee from an investment advisor for referring a client to the advisor, because the services of advisors vary substantially among differing providers and the amount of funds that should ideally be entrusted to any particular adviser is not objectively determinable.") Moreover, where the recipient also is a legal services client, the products are likely connected to the inquirer's legal services. For these reasons, we believe the receipt of referral fees or commissions would be ethically prohibited.

25. Rule 1.8(f) provides that:

> (f) A lawyer shall not accept compensation for representing a client, or anything of value related to the lawyer's representation of the client, from one other than the client unless:
> (1) the client gives informed consent;
> (2) there is no interference with the lawyer's independent professional judgment or with the client-lawyer relationship; and
> (3) the client's confidential information is protected as required by Rule 1.6.

As we explained in N.Y. State 1086 ¶ 16 (2016), when a non-waivable conflict exists under Rule 1.7(b), we need not reach the issue whether the lawyer could meet the requirements of Rule 1.8(f).

Does it Matter that the Referral Relationship Would be Non-Exclusive?

26. The inquirer notes that the referral relationship with financial services providers would be non-exclusive. Non-exclusivity is relevant under Rule 5.8, which prohibits contractual relationships between lawyers and providers of nonlegal services, except in very limited circumstances. Rule 5.8(c) states that the restrictions of Rule 5.8 do not apply to "relationships consisting solely of non-exclusive reciprocal referral agreements or understandings between a lawyer or aw firm and a nonlegal professional or nonlegal professional service firm." The issue here, however, is not whether Rule 5.8 applies, but rather whether the lawyer has a nonconsentable financial interest. Consequently, the fact that the lawyer would have a non-exclusive relationship with the financial products provider that pays the commissions is irrelevant.

Is the Relationship Between the Lawyer and the Investment Firm Subject to Rule 5.8?

27. The inquirer asks whether the relationship between the lawyer and the investment firm would be subject to Rule 5.8, thus requiring her to give the client the "Statement of Client's Rights In Cooperative Business Arrangements" under section 1205.4 of the Joint Appellate Division Rules. Rule 5.8 governs a contractual relationship between a lawyer and certain designated nonlegal professionals "for the purpose of offering to the public, on a systematic and continuing basis, legal services performed by the lawyer or law firm as well as other nonlegal professional services . . . ." The designated nonlegal professionals are set forth on a list jointly established and maintained by the Appellate Division in Section 1205.5 of the Joint Appellate Division Rules. That list currently includes only architecture, certified public accountancy, professional engineering, land surveying and certified social work. It does not include financial planning. A lawyer therefore could not enter into a contractual relationship with an investment firm to provide, on a systematic and continuing basis, financial planning and legal services.

28. By the terms of Rule 5.8(c), Rule 5.8 does not apply to a relationship consisting solely of non-exclusive reciprocal referral agreements or understanding between a lawyer or law firm and a nonlegal professional. Consequently, since the relationship proposed here is only a nonexclusive referral arrangement, Rule 5.8 does not apply.

CONCLUSION:

29. Whether a lawyer may provide both legal services and nonlegal services consisting of financial planning to a single client depends on whether the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's financial interest in the financial planning services. If there is no significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment will be adversely affected, then the lawyer may provide both, but may not also receive brokerage commissions with respect to financial products purchased by clients because that would constitute a nonconsentable conflict of interest. Whether the nonlegal services will be subject to the provisions of the Rules depends on whether the nonlegal services are distinct from the legal services, which depends on the nature of the legal and nonlegal services and how integrated they are. The lawyer may advertise the legal and nonlegal services on the lawyer's website and newsletter as long as the advertising complies with the advertising rules and the advertisements make clear that the nonlegal services are not legal services and are not protected by a client-lawyer relationship. The lawyer may not refer financial planning clients to an asset management firm that pays the lawyer a referral fee for products purchased from the company.

TOPIC: Securing fee obligation with mortgage against divorce client's property

DIGEST: For a lawyer to take a mortgage against a client's property to secure a fee in a divorce matter, the lawyer must comply with all the requirements of Rules 1.5(d)(5) and 1.8(a), including approval by the court.

RULES: 1.0(f) & (g); 1.5(a) & (d)(5), 1.8(a)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer represents a client in a domestic relations matter that resulted in a judgment of divorce. The inquirer's legal services for the client are almost complete, although the representation continues. The client owes the inquirer legal fees for the services provided to date.

2. The client is not readily able to make timely payment of the fees owed to the inquirer. The client is sole owner of a house in New York State which the client intends to sell as soon as possible, a transaction consistent with the client's rights under the divorce judgment. The client has requested that the inquirer defer payment of the outstanding legal fees until the client sells the house, with the fees to be paid from the sale proceeds.

3. Discussions between the client and the inquirer have led to a tentative understanding, which the inquirer would like to incorporate into a written agreement, to be signed by both parties as a revision of the original retainer agreement. The proposed revision would provide: (1) that the inquirer would accept a specified amount – significantly less than the amount currently owed – in full payment of the fee obligation; (2) that the inquirer would take a mortgage against the house in the amount of the reduced fees; and (3), recognizing that the client may not be able to sell the house immediately, the inquirer would charge no interest on the fee balance for approximately seven months, after which interest at a low rate would start to accrue.

QUESTION:

4. In a divorce matter in which there is a judgment, may an attorney and a client, without court approval, amend the retainer agreement to give the attorney a mortgage against property of the client in order to secure the client's obligation to pay accrued legal fees in that matter?

OPINION:

5. Legal fees are always subject to certain general provisions of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"), among them Rule 1.5(a), which prohibits fees that are excessive. The conduct proposed in this inquiry is subject to those general provisions, but also to two more specific ones as discussed below.

Business transactions with clients under Rule 1.8(a)

6. Rule 1.8(a) is triggered when three conditions are met: (i) there is a "business transaction" between lawyer and client; (ii) they have "differing interests therein"; and (iii) the client "expects the lawyer to exercise professional judgment therein for the protection of the client."

7. When those conditions are met, then Rule 1.8(a) requires that the transaction be "fair and reasonable to the client"; that the terms of the transaction be fully disclosed in writing in a manner that can be reasonably understood by the client; that the client be advised in writing of the desirability of seeking, and is given a reasonable opportunity to seek, the advice of independent legal counsel on the transaction; and that the client, in a signed writing, give informed consent to the essential terms of the transaction and the lawyer's role therein, including whether the lawyer is representing the client in the transaction.

8. The facts of the current inquiry meet the three conditions that trigger application of Rule 1.8(a). First, the proposed agreement would constitute a "business transaction." An amendment to a retainer agreement, made during the course of representation, can constitute a business transaction in some circumstances, as we have previously discussed. See N.Y. State 910 ¶¶ 19-26 (2012) (listing factors bearing on whether a retainer amendment constitutes a business transaction).

9. Moreover, "[w]hen a lawyer acquires by contract a security interest in property other than that recovered through the lawyer's efforts in the litigation, such an acquisition is a business or financial transaction with a client and is governed by the requirements of paragraph (a)." Rule 1.8, Cmt. [16]; see Rule 1.8, Cmt. [4C] ("The requirements of the Rule ordinarily must be met . . . when the lawyer accepts an interest in the client's business or other nonmonetary property as payment of all or part of the lawyer's fee"); N.Y. State 1104 ¶ 4 (2016); N.Y. State 910 ¶ 16 (2012); ABA Op. 11-458; ABA Op. 02-427; N.Y. City 1988-7 (interpreting predecessor provisions). Hence, the proposed revision is a business transaction between a lawyer and a client governed by Rule 1.8(a).

10. The second condition of Rule 1.8(a) is met also. In reaching their agreement, the inquirer and the client will have occasion to negotiate terms that may be more favorable to one or the other. For example, the provisions for interest on unpaid balances may be more or less stringent. There could also be terms relating to possible foreclosure on the mortgage. Thus, the parties have "differing interests" in the transaction, as that term is defined in Rule 1.0(f).

11. The final condition is that client expects the lawyer to exercise professional judgment therein for the protection of the client. The client may well be an unsophisticated party not versed in contracts or negotiations over legal fees. Under these circumstances, it is foreseeable that the client will expect the inquirer to act in the client's interest. See N.Y. 1104 ¶ 6 (2016) ("Here, the client may be looking to the lawyer's professional judgment to understand the significance of the proposed mortgage and promissory note to the services for which the lawyer is being engaged."); N.Y. City 1988-7 ([I]t would be unrealistic to conclude that a client would not expect his or her lawyer to exercise professional judgment for the client in drafting the mortgage agreement.").

12. Because the three conditions are met, the inquirer is subject to the requirements of Rule 1.8(a). The first requirement is that the transaction be fair and reasonable to the client. The inquiry does not include the text of the proposed agreement. As summarized to us, the proposed agreement does not sound obviously unfair in any way, but the inquirer would have to consider all the terms – such as the details relating to interest and possible foreclosure – to determine that the transaction is fair and reasonable to the client.

13. Similarly, the inquirer would need to consider the entire text to assess compliance with the requirement that the agreement be written in a manner that can be reasonably understood by the client. As discussed above, it is also necessary that the written agreement include certain specific provisions. It must describe not only the essential terms of the transaction but also the inquirer's role therein, and whether the inquirer is representing the client in the transaction. Finally, the writing must advise the client of the desirability of seeking, and the client must be given a reasonable opportunity to seek, the advice of independent legal counsel on the transaction.

Security interest in a domestic relations matter under Rule 1.5(d)(5)(iii)

14. In a "domestic relations matter," a lawyer may not take any fee if "the written retainer agreement includes a security interest, confession of judgment or other lien without prior notice being provided to the client in a signed retainer agreement and approval from a tribunal after notice to the adversary." Rule 1.5(d)(5)(iii).

15. This rule applies to the current inquiry even though a judgment has already been entered. "Domestic relations matter" means "representation of a client in a claim, action or proceeding, or preliminary to the filing of a claim, action or proceeding, in either Supreme Court or Family Court, or in any court of appellate jurisdiction, for divorce" and certain other subject matters, "or to enforce or modify a judgment or order in connection with any such claim, action or proceeding." Rule 1.0(g). If the representation had terminated, then applicability of the rule could have terminated as well. But if the representation continues past entry of the judgment, then there continues to be a "domestic relations matter" subject to the Rule. Ordinarily, questions about the existence and termination of an attorney-client relationship are questions of law beyond our purview. But here, the inquirer advises us that the inquirer still represents the client in connection with the divorce proceedings.

16. Because the proposed agreement includes a security interest, under this rule there must be notice to the client in a signed retainer agreement, notice to the adversary, and approval by the court. Rule 1.5(d)(5)(iii); see N.Y. State 910 (2012). "The requirements of this rule are similar to those of the applicable court rules." N.Y. State 910 ¶ 15 & n.1 (citing section 202.16 of the Uniform Rules of the Supreme Court and County Court and section 1400.5 of the Joint Rules of the Supreme Court, Appellate Division, 22 NYCRR §1400.5).

17. The proposed agreement would be a signed retainer agreement, satisfying one requirement of Rule 1.5(d)(5)(iii). The remaining requirement is that there must be approval by the court after notice to the adversary – the client's ex-spouse. The need for such notice and approval may be less sharp given the existence of a judgment in the matter; however, as discussed above, the representation continues, and based on the text and policies of the rule, we believe that its requirements continue to apply.

18. We have no occasion to discuss any ethical considerations with respect to possible execution on the mortgage. See N.Y. State 1104 ¶ 8.

CONCLUSION:

19. If a lawyer representing a client in a divorce matter agrees with the client that the lawyer will take a mortgage on the client's house to secure the legal fees, the lawyer may do so only upon compliance with the requirements of Rules 1.5(d)(5)(iii) and 1.8(a), such as fairness, proper advice to the client, a sufficient writing signed by the client, notice to the adversary, and approval by the court.

TOPIC: Legal and Non-legal Services Offered by a Single Entity

DIGEST: A lawyer who is a licensed professional engineer may operate both a law practice and an engineering practice in a single entity from the same office. The name of the law firm may not include reference to the lawyer's engineering degree or practice, but the law firm may otherwise promote the lawyer's engineering degree in listing the lawyer's qualifications, as a branding device, or otherwise consistent with the rule governing lawyer advertising. Engineering is a non-legal service distinct from the rendition of legal services, and, as a result, the lawyer may overcome the presumption that the N.Y. Rules of Professional Conduct apply to the rendition of such services by advising the engineering client in writing that the services are not legal services and that the protections of the attorney-client relationship do not attach.

RULES: 5.7(a), 7.1, 7.5(b).

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a New York attorney and a licensed professional engineer. The inquirer wishes to establish a single-member professional entity – whether as a professional corporation or a professional limited liability company – to offer both legal and engineering services to the public. The inquirer would like to indicate the inquirer's professional status as a licensed professional engineer in the name of this entity, and asserts a current intention to offer only one service (legal or engineering) to each client.

QUESTIONS:

2. The inquiry presents three issues for consideration:

(a) May a lawyer offer legal services and non-legal services through a single professional entity out of the same office?

(b) May a lawyer include reference to the non-legal service in the name of the professional entity?

(c) Does the lawyer owe duties to clients of the lawyer's non-legal services to clarify the lawyer's status as a non-legal service provider?

OPINION:

3. The answer to the first question – whether the lawyer may use a single entity and office to provide both legal and non-legal services – is yes. Rule 5.7 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") expressly contemplates that a law firm may offer both legal and non-legal services "to clients or other persons." "For many years, lawyers have provided non-legal services to their clients. By participating in the delivery of these services, lawyers can serve a broad range of economic and other interests of their clients." Rule 5.7, Cmt. [1]; see N.Y. State 933 ¶ 4 (2012) (lawyer may operate real estate brokerage firm out of law office). Thus, the Rules permit a lawyer to conduct both a law office and an engineering practice in a single entity out of the same office.

4. The answer to the second question – whether the lawyer may refer to the non-legal service in the firm's name – is no. The name of a law firm implicates Rule 7.5(b), which regulates the name(s) a lawyer may use to identify the lawyer's firm. Rule 7.5(b) provides, in pertinent part, that a "lawyer in private practice shall not practice under a trade name, a name that is misleading as to the identity of the lawyer or lawyers practicing under such name, or a firm name containing names other than those of one or more of the lawyers in the firm." "The prohibition against trade names is broad, permitting use of little beyond the names of lawyers presently or previously associated with the firm." N.Y. State 869 (2011) (lawyer may not use practice area in the name of the law firm). In N.Y. State 861 ¶ 4 (2011), we considered the inclusion in a firm name of initials signifying the firm's practice area to constitute an impermissible trade name. See also N.Y. State 1152 ¶ 6 (2018) ("[C]ustomary usage teaches us that the public in general and the legal profession in particular expect that the name of a law firm reflects the surnames of lawyers currently or formerly associated with the law firm.")

5. That a lawyer may not use the lawyer's engineering practice in the name of the professional entity that the lawyer uses to render legal services does not mean that the lawyer may not otherwise refer to the lawyer's engineering qualifications in listings of the lawyer's qualifications and areas of practice, as well as in advertising consistent with the standards on lawyer advertising set out in Rule 7.1. Subject always to those standards, nothing in the Rules prohibits a lawyer from using the lawyer's engineering qualifications as a means of branding or other advertising.

6. The answer to the third question – whether a lawyer is obligated to clarify the lawyer's status when rendering non-legal services – is yes if the recipient of those services could reasonably believe that the non-legal services are subject to an attorney-client relationship. Rule 5.7(a) sets forth the lawyer's responsibilities when the lawyer or her law firm provides non-legal services to law clients or other persons:

> (a) With respect to lawyers or law firms providing nonlegal services to clients or other persons:
> > (1) A lawyer or law firm that provides nonlegal services to a person that are not distinct from legal services being provided to that person by the lawyer or law firm is subject to these Rules with respect to the provision of both legal and nonlegal services.
> > (2) A lawyer or law firm that provides nonlegal services to a person that are distinct from legal services being provided to that person by the lawyer or law firm is subject to these Rules with respect to the nonlegal services if the person receiving the services could reasonably believe that the nonlegal services are the subject of a client-lawyer relationship.
> > (3) A lawyer or law firm that is an owner, controlling party or agent of, or that is otherwise affiliated with, an entity that the lawyer or law firm knows to be providing nonlegal services to a person is subject to these Rules with respect to the non-

> legal services if the person receiving the services could reasonably believe that the nonlegal services are the subject of a client-lawyer relationship.
> (4) For purposes of paragraphs (a)(2) and (a)(3), it will be presumed that the person receiving nonlegal services believes the services to be the subject of a client-lawyer relationship unless the lawyer or law firm has advised the person receiving the services in writing that the services are not legal services and that the protection of a client-lawyer relationship does not exist with respect to the nonlegal services, or if the interest of the lawyer or law firm in the entity providing nonlegal services is de minimis.

7. Thus, under Rule 5.7(a)(1), non-legal services that are not distinct from legal services are always subject to the Rules, no matter what disclaimer or writing a lawyer may provide to clients of the lawyer's non-legal services. Under Rule 5.7(a)(2), however, when the non-legal services are distinct from legal services, then the non-legal services are subject to the Rules if the recipient could reasonably believe that they are the subject of a client-lawyer relationship. This same point is made in Rule 5.7(a)(3), applicable to this inquiry, when the lawyer is an owner, controlling party, or agent of the entity providing the non-legal service. Rule 5.7(a)(4) creates a presumption of reasonable belief in an attorney-client relationship, but permits the lawyer to overcome that presumption by advising the recipient of the non-legal services, in writing, that the protection of the client-lawyer relationship does not apply to the non-legal services. The initial consideration on the inquirer's third question turns, then, on whether legal services are distinct from engineering services.

8. We believe the two services are distinct. In N.Y. State 1135 ¶ 7 (2017), noting that the Rules do not define distinct, we relied on the ordinary and customary meaning of the word – namely, "not alike, different, not the same, separate, clearly marked off." The "most important factor in determining distinctness is the degree of integration of the services." N.Y. State 1155 ¶ 14 (listing other factors as well). In our view, the engineering profession differs from the legal profession in material ways, and involves the deployment of skills that are distinct from the application of legal principles to a set of facts. A clear demarcation exists between the scientific design and construction of tangible things and the use of legal knowledge and experience to advise a client on adherence to lawful behavior. This contrasts sharply with those services that we have deemed not distinct from legal services. See, e.g., N.Y. State 1135 ¶ 8 (2017) (provision of state and local tax services); N.Y. State 1026 ¶ 10 (2014) (mediation in domestic relations matters); N.Y. State 1015 ¶ 14 (2014) (integrated real estate services).

9. Rule 5.7(a)(4) instructs that, when a legal service provider offers distinct non-legal services to clients which the parties do not intend to create an attorney-client relationship, then the lawyer may overcome the presumption for which that Rule provides by advising the recipient of (here) engineering services, in writing, that the services are not legal services and that the protections attending an attorney-client relationship are inapposite. A lawyer who provides both legal and non-legal services "must take care that the clients are not confused about whether the lawyer is acting as a lawyer and must determine whether the provisions of the Rules apply to the non-legal services." N.Y. State 1155 ¶ 9 (2018). "Whenever a lawyer directly provides non-legal services, the lawyer must avoid confusion on the part of the client as to the nature of the lawyer's role," for the recipient of the non-legal services may reasonably expect "that the protections of client confidences and secrets, prohibitions against representation of persons with conflicting interests, and obligations of a lawyer to maintain professional independence apply to the provision of non-legal services when that may not be the case.' Rule 5.7, Cmt. [1]. Thus, while a written disclaimer under Rule 5.7(b)(4) provides something of a safe harbor for a lawyer providing distinct non-legal services such as engineering, any lawyer providing non-legal services, distinct or indistinct, owes a duty to clarify whether an attorney-client relationship exists if a client could reasonably believe in the circumstances that there is such a relationship.

10. We are mindful that the degree of integration of legal and non-legal services may vary with the nature of the legal services; we can envision, for example, that a patent lawyer with an engineering degree may use engineering skills in rendering legal services to a client in a patent matter, and do so in the client's reasonable belief that the protections of the attorney-client privilege apply. In such circumstances, Rule 5.7(a)(1) requires that the full panoply of the Rules apply to the lawyer's conduct. This inquiry does not require us to delve into all the implications of those circumstances. For now, we say only that we regard engineering and legal services as distinct, and that a lawyer offering both services to a client may provide an appropriate written disclaimer to the recipient of distinct non-legal services that the lawyer's rendition of solely engineering services does not give rise to all the attributes that an attorney-client relationship entails.

CONCLUSION:

11. A lawyer may provide both legal and engineering services through a single entity provided that the entity complies with the Rule governing the name of law firms. Engineering services being distinct from legal services, a lawyer offering each service may provide a written notice to the recipient of the engineering services that no attorney-client relationship, with its attendant protections, is thereby established.

Inquiry No. 7-18

TOPIC: Conflicts, lawyer seeking new employment

DIGEST: Subject to provisions regarding protection of confidential information and personal conflicts of interest, and other Rules discussed in this Opinion, a lawyer who has worked on regulatory drafting as in-house counsel for a tax authority may seek new employment in a position seeking to change the current tax code and may work in such a position after leaving the agency.

RULES: 1.1(c)(2), 1.6, 1.7, 1.9(c), 1.11

FACTS:

1. Inquirer is an attorney with the Internal Revenue Service. The lawyer worked on a range of matters over his career at the IRS, including recent work on certain regulatory provisions. Inquirer is seeking other employment, including in positions where the goal is to change the current tax code. As part of these efforts to seek employment, the inquirer would like to seek funding and engage in discussions with academics and practitioners to secure their participation in a project to reform the current tax code.

QUESTION:

2. May inquirer communicate with funders to seek funding, and with academics and practitioners to secure their participation in the project, while still employed at the IRS?

3. May inquirer communicate with funders and others in connection with this project after he leaves the IRS?

OPINION:

4. We address in this opinion only the provisions of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") and assume that the inquirer's proposed activities comply with any other applicable laws and regulations.

Inquirer's Current Job-Seeking Activities

5. There are four provisions of the Rules that may restrict the inquirer's current job-seeking activities, but none is likely to pose a significant limitation.

6. First, the inquirer may not disclose confidential information in violation of Rule 1.6. Confidential information "consists of information gained during or relating to the representation of a client, whatever its source, that is (a) protected by the attorney-client privilege, (b) likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed, or (c) information that the client has requested be kept confidential." Rule 1.6(a). We note, however, that confidential information "does not ordinarily include (i) a lawyer's legal knowledge or legal research or (ii) information that is generally known in the local community or in the trade, field or profession to which the information relates." Id. While the inquirer must be careful not to reveal confidential information of the IRS in conducting a search for employment or funding, lawyers commonly are able to seek new employment, including establishing new businesses or practices, without disclosing confidential information of their current or prior clients.

7. Second, and most pertinent to the inquirer's current activities, Rule 1.11(d)(2) provides that a lawyer currently serving as a public officer or employee shall not "negotiate for private employment with any person who is involved as a party or as lawyer for a party in a matter in which the lawyer is participating personally and substantially." The term "matter" is defined in Rule 1.0(l) as "includ[ing] any litigation, judicial, or administrative proceeding, case, claim, application, request for a ruling or other determination, contract, controversy, investigation, charge, accusation, arrest, negotiation, arbitration, mediation or other representation involving a specific party or parties." Work on generally applicable regulations such as the inquirer describes would not ordinarily "involv[e] a specific party or parties," and in any case Rule 1.11(e) provides that, for purposes of Rule 1.11, "the term 'matter' as defined in Rule 1.0(l) does not include or apply to agency rulemaking functions." Thus, while the inquirer generally must be careful to avoid negotiating for private employment with persons involved in matters in which the inquirer is currently participating personally and substantially that involve specific parties or persons, the inquirer need not avoid such negotiations if the matter was limited to the rulemaking function to which he refers.

8. Third, and more generally, Rule 1.7(a)(2) bars a lawyer from representing a client—in this case, the IRS—if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that "there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests." In this case, if the inquirer's views on the need for reform of the tax code are so strongly felt that a reasonable lawyer would conclude that there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the IRS in implementing tax legislation would be adversely affected, the inquirer would have a conflict under Rule 1.7. In most cases, if the inquirer reasonably believes, notwithstanding such a significant risk, that he is able to provide competent and diligent representation, the conflict would be subject to consent by an authorized representative of the employer. See Rule 1.7(b). The personal-conflict provisions of Rule 1.7 would be applicable to the inquirer even prior to his current search for new employment. Rule 6.4 reinforces the role of Rule 1.7 in connection with law reform activities such as those that the inquirer contemplates. That Rule provides at the outset, "A lawyer may serve as a director, officer or member of an organization involved in the reform of the law or its administration, notwithstanding that the reform may affect the interests of a client of the lawyer." But the Rule notes that "[i]n determining the nature and scope of participation in such activities, a lawyer should be mindful of obligations to clients under other Rules, particularly Rule 1.7."

9. Fourth and finally with respect to the inquirer's current job-seeking activities, Rule 1.1(c)(2) states that "[a] lawyer shall not intentionally . . . prejudice or damage the client during the course of the representation except as permitted or required by these Rules." In a prior opinion also dealing with conflicts of government lawyers, we noted that Rule 1.1(c)(2) applies only in ways related to the representation and does not preclude conduct prejudicial to a client unrelated to legal services being rendered. N.Y. State 968 ¶ 9 (2013). We did not then need to decide whether we agreed with that view and we likewise do not need to decide that question here, because we conclude that merely seeking to form a group to advocate for changes to the tax code is not "intentionally . . . prejudic[ing] or damag[ing]" the IRS. The IRS exists to implement the tax code as passed by Congress. In any case, all that inquirer is seeking to do while still at the IRS is explore putting together a group that would advocate for such changes. We are convinced that such activities in this situation do not rise to the level of "prejudice or damage" within the meaning of Rule 1.1(c)(2).

Inquirer's Potential Future Activities

10. With respect the inquirer's potential future work in advocating for changes to the tax code, Rule 1.11 contains three restrictions relating to former government lawyers.

11. Rule 1.11(a)(1) requires that the inquirer comply with Rule 1.9(c), which in turn bars a lawyer from using confidential information to the disadvantage of a former client or revealing confidential information of the former client, with certain exceptions noted there. Rule 1.9 addresses former-client conflicts generally; Rule 1.11 addresses former-client conflicts of government lawyers. Comment [1] to Rule 1.9 specifies that former government lawyers "must comply with this Rule to the extent required by Rule 1.11." Consistent with our analysis above of Rule 1.6, while the inquirer must be careful to protect the IRS's confidential information in any future activities, we see nothing about advocating for changes in the tax code that necessarily requires use or disclosure of such information.

12. Relatedly, Rule 1.11(c) bars a lawyer from representing a private client adverse to a person about whom the lawyer has information that the lawyer knows is confidential government information. The inquirer does not suggest that adversity exists to any person about whom the inquirer has such information, so we detect no issue here.

13. Finally, Rule 1.11(a)(2) prohibits a former government lawyer, absent consent from the relevant agency, from representing any client in connection with a matter in which the lawyer participated personally and substantially as a public officer or employee; for purposes of this provision, "matter" has the same meaning discussed above, and in particular excludes agency rulemaking functions. Thus, this provision would not be implicated by the lawyer's prior work on regulations, even if that work were related to the revisions to the tax code that the inquirer might seek. It seems unlikely that work seeking changes in the code would be the same matter as any matter that the inquirer worked on as an agency lawyer, but of course that is for the inquirer to determine.

CONCLUSION:

14. Subject to the observations made in this opinion regarding protection of confidential information, potential personal conflicts and other Rules, the inquirer is not restricted by the Rules in seeking to put together a project to advocate for changes in the tax code in which the inquirer would be involved after leaving the IRS, or in participating in such a project after the employment ends.

OPINION 1159 (12/14/2018)

TOPIC: Sharing legal fees with the estate of a deceased lawyer

DIGEST: Following the death of a lawyer who was the sole shareholder of a law firm, and the firm's dissolution, a former associate of the firm may share legal fees with the deceased lawyer's estate only as permitted by Rule 5.4(a) or as required by court order.

RULES: 1.5(g), 1.17, 5.4(a) & (d)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer was an associate in a firm wholly owned by the firm's senior lawyer. The firm represented plaintiffs on a contingent-fee basis in personal injury and other actions. The senior lawyer/sole owner died unexpectedly, having made no succession plan or agreement regarding the disposition of the law firm or regarding the payment of legal fees from ongoing cases upon the senior lawyer's death. The estate held the deceased lawyer's interest for a period of time, during which the inquirer continued to represent the law firm's existing clients and undertook the representation of new clients. Thereafter, rather than selling the law firm, the estate's representative dissolved it. The inquirer established a new law firm, and the new law firm continued to represent former clients of deceased lawyer's now-dissolved firm. The estate of the deceased lawyer now seeks to recover a portion of the fees generated in matters originating with the deceased lawyer's firm.

QUESTION:

2. May a law firm pay a portion of the legal fees earned in actions to the estate of a now deceased lawyer who wholly owned a since-dissolved firm in which the actions originated and, if so, in what amount?

OPINION:

3. Preliminarily, we note that, before the dissolution of the deceased lawyer's law firm, the former associate could continue to work in the law firm for a reasonable period. Ordinarily, under the N.Y. Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"), in particular Rule 5.4(d), a lawyer may not practice with a law firm if "a nonlawyer owns any interest therein." But, as an exception, Rule 5.4(d)(1) permits "a fiduciary representative of the estate of a lawyer [to] hold the stock or interest of the [deceased] lawyer for a reasonable period during administration." During that period, the estate representative may take steps to dissolve the firm or to sell the deceased lawyer's practice to another lawyer or law firm pursuant to Rule 1.17(a), and meanwhile, the inquirer could maintain the firm's practice.

4. We do not address questions concerning the sharing of fees with a deceased lawyer's estate before the firm's dissolution, or concerning the sharing of fees with a lawyer who acquires a deceased lawyer's practice pursuant to Rule 1.17. Cf. N.Y. State 961 (2013) (addressing issues concerning the sale of a law business under Rule 1.17). Here, the question is whether the former associate may share legal fees with the estate after the firm has been dissolved. The question is governed by Rule 5.4(a), which provides, subject to exception, that: "A lawyer or law firm shall not share legal fees with a non-lawyer." Absent an applicable exception, legal fees from pending personal injury (or other) matters may not be shared with the estate of the former law firm's deceased owner because the estate is not a lawyer.

5. One potentially applicable exception is Rule 5.4(a)(1), which provides: "an agreement by a lawyer with the lawyer's firm or another lawyer associated in the firm may provide for the payment of money, over a reasonable period of time after the lawyer's death, to the lawyer's estate or to one or more specified persons." In this case, the exception is inapplicable, because the deceased lawyer/sole owner never entered into an agreement with the inquirer (or anyone else) "for the payment of money . . . to the lawyer's estate" or to specified others.

6. The other potentially applicable exception is Rule 5.4(a)(2), which provides: "a lawyer who undertakes to complete unfinished legal business of a deceased lawyer may pay to the estate of the deceased lawyer that portion of the total compensation that fairly represents the services rendered by the deceased." This exception applies here to a limited extent. If the deceased lawyer/sole owner rendered services in a matter before dying, then the inquirer may pay the estate a portion of legal fees from the matter corresponding to "that portion of the total compensation that fairly represents the services rendered by the deceased." This provision would not allow fees to be shared in matters undertaken after the onetime owner's death. See Phil. Op. 92-1 (1992) (opining, under language identical to Rule 5.4(a), that "[i]t would not be appropriate to pay a referral fee to the [deceased] referring lawyer's estate for services rendered to an executor or trustee when those services had not started during the lifetime of the referring lawyer").

7. In N.Y. State 1128 (2017), we addressed a question similar to this one. There, the inquirer's lawyer friend passed away, leaving (as here) no agreement or understanding concerning the sale or dissolution of the decedent's firm, though before dying the friend told an assistant to refer contingent-fee cases to the inquirer. At the time, the inquirer knew that the decedent had worked on at least one of the matters (labeled "Matter A") but was as yet unaware of the work, if any, done on the others. In that instance, we concluded that, "under Rule 5.4(a)(2), the inquirer could, at the conclusion of Matter A, pay the estate a portion that represents the services rendered by the deceased attorney, or at any time pay an amount representing quantum meruit for those services." We explained that the proportional contribution fairly representing the value of the decedent's services could not be calculated until the matter concluded, but that the quantum meruit amount of fair compensation for those services "could be calculated immediately." Id. ¶ 9. With respect to the other matters, however, we said that, "if the deceased lawyer did not provide any legal 'services' on those matters" before death, "then the inquirer may not ethically pay the estate a portion of the fees," because, among other things, such a payment would be an improper division of fees with a nonlawyer in violation of Rule 5.4. Id. ¶ 10.

8. Other than as permitted by Rule 5.4(a)(2) to compensate for services rendered by the deceased lawyer before death, no rule authorizes fee-sharing with the deceased lawyer's estate. In N.Y. State 1128 ¶ 10, we declined to opine, as we do here, on whether a deceased lawyer's signing or filing of a retainer agreement, and thus perhaps assuming liability for a matter, amounts to a service rendered by the deceased lawyer. This Committee renders opinions interpreting the Rules but not interpreting other law; therefore, we also do not opine on whether the decedent's estate has a contractual claim, or other legal claim, to legal fees from matters that originated in the now-dissolved firm, whether before or after death. We add only that, notwithstanding Rule 5.4(a), it would be ethically permissible for the inquirer to satisfy an adverse judgment issued by a court, in the event that the estate brought a civil claim to recover a portion of legal fees in lawsuits pending while decedent was alive. While a lawyer might raise an objection based on Rule 5.4, insofar as it reasonably appears to be applicable, we see nothing in the Rules that would call on a lawyer to defy a court's judgment in this situation once it is issued. Cf. N.Y. City Op. 2018-5 (2018) at n. 12 (recognizing that, in litigation against lawyers, courts do not invariably enforce Rule 5.4's proscription on fee sharing with a nonlawyer).

CONCLUSION:

9. Following the death of a lawyer who was the sole owner of a law firm, and the firm's dissolution, a former associate of the firm may share legal fees with the deceased lawyer's estate only as permitted by Rule 5.4(a) or as required by court order.

OPINION 1160 (01/02/2019)

TOPIC: Affiliation and fee-sharing with a New York resident attorney not admitted in New York, although admitted out-of-state, and licensed to practice in New York federal courts.

DIGEST: Not proper for a New York attorney to affiliate and share fees with a lawyer who, though resident in New York, is not admitted to practice in New York, if the solicitation of clients, sharing of fees, and any other services performed, would as a matter of law constitute the unauthorized practice of law.

RULES: 1.5(g); 5.5; 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 8.4

FACTS:

1. The inquirer, an attorney recently admitted to practice in New York, is acquainted with another lawyer. The other lawyer, like the inquirer, resides in New York, but the other attorney is admitted only in another state, not New York, though the latter is admitted to practice in federal courts located in New York. According to the inquirer, the other lawyer is capable of generating business, and the inquirer would like to affiliate with this other lawyer, listing the other lawyer as a partner, associate, counsel, or otherwise, on letterhead showing that the other lawyer is admitted solely in the other state and not New York. The inquirer anticipates that the other lawyer would attend initial meetings with the clients being produced by the other lawyer, but then would not deal with any of the legal work being performed.

QUESTION:

2. May a lawyer admitted in New York affiliate and share legal fees with another lawyer, who, while a resident of this State, is not admitted here, with the affiliation intended solely for the purpose of obtaining clients referred by the non-admitted lawyer?

OPINION:

3. "Our prior opinions have recognized that a New York law firm may include lawyers not admitted to practice in New York." N.Y. State 955 ¶ 7 (2013); see, e.g., N.Y. State 704 (1997). Our main concern has been that the New York firm, consistent with the rules governing lawyer advertising set out in Rule 7.1 of the N.Y. Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"), avoid misleading the public by failing to disclose the jurisdictional limitations on practice by out-of-state lawyers. See Rule 7.5(d) (partnership practicing with lawyers licensed in different jurisdictions must "make clear the jurisdictional limitations on" lawyers in the firm not licensed to practice in all jurisdictions); N.Y. State 1042 ¶ 15 (2014) (so concluding); N.Y. State 144 (1970) (same result under the Rules' predecessor the N.Y. Code of Professional Responsibility (the "Code")).

4. Our prior opinions blessing affiliations with such non-lawyers presupposed that an affiliation among lawyers admitted in different jurisdictions were engaged in a common enterprise in which all lawyers in the firm would render legal services to clients of the firm within the confines of their jurisdictional limitations. The sharing of fees among lawyers in the circumstances is a function of the common enterprise in which the lawyers perform legal services for the benefit of the firm's clients within those confines. But we have never sanctioned an arrangement between a New York lawyer and a non-attorney consisting of nothing more than signing up clients and passing them on to lawyers, with a fee skimmed off the top. N.Y. State 705 (1997)(quotations and citations omitted).

5. The Rules "generally do not allow lawyers to pay for referrals of clients." N.Y. State 979 ¶ 4 (2013). Rule 7.2 (a) says that an attorney "shall not compensate or give anything of value to a person or organization to recommend or obtain employment by a client, or as a reward for having made a recommendation resulting in employment by a client," subject to two exceptions. See Rule 7.2, Cmt [1]. One exception appears in Rule 5.8, which authorizes contractual relationships between lawyers and certain non-legal professional services enumerated in Section 1205.3 of the Joint Appellate Division Rules; an out-of-state law firm is not so listed. The other exception, Rule 1.5(g), allows a lawyer to share a fee with an unaffiliated lawyer if, among other things, the client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing, to the division of fees and the division either reflects the proportional contribution of the lawyers to the services performed or, in a writing shared with the client, the referring lawyer assumes joint responsibility for the representation.

6. We examined Rule 1.5(g) in N.Y. State 864 (2011), in which the inquirer wished to accept a referral from an out-of-state lawyer in a personal injury matter. The injury occurred in New York and the referring lawyer proposed that, in the particular matter at issue, the in-state lawyer would "handle" the matter and pay the referring lawyer a portion of any recovery. We endorsed the proposal subject to compliance with Rule 1.5(g). Id. ¶ 16. Although we have declined to delineate the precise contours of "joint responsibility" under this Rule, see N.Y. State 745 (2001); cf. Rule 1.5, Cmt. [7] ("joint responsibility entails financial and ethical responsibility for the representation as if the lawyers were associated in a partnership"), we have made clear that the mere cultivation of client relationships does not qualify as "services performed" by the referring lawyer, N.Y. State 954 ¶ 9 (2013). Thus, the inquirer's contemplated action would violate Rule 7.2(a) unless it could be said that the inquirer is ethically permitted to be affiliated with the out-of-state lawyer in the circumstances presented.

7. Our opinion in N.Y. State 801 (2006), which involved facts closer to the instant situation, is not inconsistent. There, the New York lawyer contemplated forming a professional partnership with an attorney admitted in another state, but not in New York. The out-of-state attorney was nevertheless to be based in the New York office, participate in work of the practice, including "paperwork," meet with clients, and share fees. There, we said that either the out-of-state attorney would be engaging in the unauthorized practice of law here, or acting in a quasi-paralegal capacity, as a non-lawyer. While noting that unauthorized practice is a creature of statute not the Rules, we concluded that, "[i]f the out-of-state lawyer were to limit activities to those permitted a non-lawyer, such as a paralegal, then the lawyer would violate [the Rules] by partnering with the lawyer, as it is impermissible for a New York lawyer to share fees with a non-lawyer," but that "[i]f the out-of-state lawyer is engaged in the unauthorized practice of law, then the New York lawyer would violate [the Rules] by partnering with the lawyer."

8. The principal distinctions between the situation proposed here, and that considered in Opinion 801, would appear to be the facts that (a) the proposed affiliated attorney in the instant inquiry is not to participate in "paperwork," or in client meetings beyond the initial meeting, and (b) the proposed affiliated lawyer in the instant case is licensed to practice in the New York federal courts. What is being proposed here therefore appears to be an arrangement for the solicitation of legal work in New York, for purposes of receiving a share of the fees earned thereby, by an attorney residing in New York but not licensed to practice by the New York courts, using licensure by the federal courts in New York as a predicate. The question then becomes whether an out-of-state lawyer may set up shop in New York for purposes of rainmaking and fee-sharing based solely upon admission to federal courts located here.

9. As we have said, whether something constitutes the unauthorized practice of law is a question of statutory interpretation, which is beyond our purview. Nevertheless, Rule 5.5 says:

> (b) A lawyer shall not aid a nonlawyer in the unauthorized practice of law.

10. In re Peterson, 163 B.R. 665 (Bkptcy. Ct., D. Conn. 1994) addressed a situation similar to the one described by the inquirer. The situation was summarized by the Bankruptcy Court as follows, id. at 667:

> Betsos is not licensed to practice law in Connecticut. He is licensed in New York, and is admitted to practice in the federal district courts for the district of Connecticut and the southern and eastern districts of New York. He has had no office in New York since approximately 1983. Betsos has a law office in Stamford, Connecticut where he has provided legal services by telephone in bankruptcy matters. Moreover, he has prepared pleadings in that office for filing in bankruptcy court. He has not met with clients at his office, but he has met with them at other locations in Connecticut. His stationery lists his Stamford office address and states that he is an attorney-at-law.

11. Determining that Betsos, on those facts, was engaged in the unauthorized practice of law, the Bankruptcy Court held, 163 B.R. at 672-673 (footnotes omitted):

> I find at the outset that Betsos's activities constituted the practice of law. The practice of law is not limited to appearing before state courts; it includes giving legal advice and drafting documents regardless of whether it occurs in a "court of record," and regardless of whether the practice is carried on as a business.
> The flaw in [the attorney's] argument is that it fails to recognize the distinction between the right to practice in a court and the right to practice law generally. The essence of that distinction is that the general practice of law connotes the right to offer legal services to anyone who seeks them, whereas the right to practice in a court is limited to providing legal services that are incidental to a specific case or proceeding pending in that court.

12. Peterson was subsequently followed by, e.g., Servidone Const. Corp. v. St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 911 F. Supp. 560, 572-576 (N.D.N.Y. 1995) (also citing Spanos v. Skouras Theatres Corporation, 364 F.2d 161 (2d Cir.), cert. den'd, 385 U.S. 987 (1966)), and In Re Swendiman, 57 N.E.3d 1155, 1156-1157 (Sup. Ct., Ohio 2016) (noting that Peterson had been distinguished In Re Desilets, 291 F.3d 925 (6th Cir. 2002) (holding that an attorney licensed in Texas and admitted to practice before federal bankruptcy court in Michigan was authorized to practice federal bankruptcy law in Michigan, even though he was not licensed in Michigan, because the bankruptcy courts rules expressly permitted the attorney not only to appear before the bankruptcy court, but also to generally counsel clients).

13. The ultimate question being one of law, we leave to the inquirer to resolve the import of Peterson and like cases on the proposed arrangement, with the caution that, were Peterson to control, then the inquirer would run afoul of Rule 5.5(b). We caution, too, that the proposal may well constitute improper solicitation under Rule 7.3, the provisions of which, in Rule 7.3(i), fully apply to an out-of-state lawyer who solicits retention of clients in New York. See Rule 8.4(a) (a lawyer may not "knowingly assist or induce another" to violate the Rules). Finally, we note that the Court of Appeals has adopted rules governing temporary practice by out-of-state lawyers, which provide, among other things, that "except as authorized by other rules or law," an out-of-state lawyer shall not "establish an office or other systematic and continuous presence in this State for the practice of law." 22 N.Y.C.R.R. Part 523.

CONCLUSION:

14. It would not be proper for the inquiring New York attorney to affiliate with, and share fees with, a solely out-of-state-licensed attorney, resident in New York, for matters to be solicited and originated by the out-of-state-licensed attorney, based upon the New York resident out-of-state-licensed attorney's admission to New York federal courts, if the solicitation of clients, sharing of fees, and any other services performed, would as a matter of law constitute the unauthorized practice of law.

OPINION 1161 (01/04/2019)

TOPIC: Confidential Information: Lawyer's duty to preserve and to make adequate disclosure in seeking client consent to disclosure

DIGEST: When a lawyer rather than a broker prepares a real estate contract, the lawyer may not disclose the contract to the broker without the client's informed consent, which must include disclosure of any personal, financial, or business interest of the lawyer in responding to the broker's request for disclosure of the information.

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a New York real estate transactional lawyer. We are informed that, in contrast to many areas in New York, the custom in the locale where the inquirer principally practices is for the lawyer, rather than (as elsewhere in the State) the broker, to prepare the contract of sale. The inquirer represents a selling client in a pending residential real estate transaction in which the client's broker has now requested a copy of the signed contract between the buyer and the seller. The inquirer expresses concern about complying with this request absent client consent, and also because the inquirer frequently encounters this broker in other real estate matters and does not wish the broker to learn what the inquirer depicts as provisions uniquely of the inquirer's design.

QUESTIONS:

2. The inquiry raises two questions:

(a) When a lawyer rather than a broker prepares the contract of sale in a real estate transaction in which a broker is also involved, may the lawyer disclose the contract to the broker without the client's consent?

(b) When a lawyer has a personal, financial, or business interest in not disclosing a real estate contract to the client's real estate broker, does a conflict of interest arise in the event that the lawyer seeks client consent to disclose the contract?

OPINION:

3. Rule 1.6(a) of the N.Y. Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") says that a lawyer "shall not knowingly reveal confidential information" unless, among other things, the client gives informed consent. The same Rule defines "confidential information" to mean "information gained during or relating to the representation of a client, whatever its source, that is (a) protected by the attorney-client privilege, (b) likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed, or (c) information that the client has requested to be kept confidential." We have characterized this duty of confidentiality as "one of the lawyer's principal obligations" under the Rules. N.Y. State 1125 ¶ 3 (2017.)

4. Two exceptions appear in Rule 1.6(a). One is if disclosure is permitted under circumstances set out in Rule 1.6(b), none of which apply to this inquiry. The other is if the disclosure "is impliedly authorized to advance the best interests of the client and is either reasonable under the circumstances or customary in the professional community." We have no factual basis on which to conclude that these factors apply in the circumstances presented. In the absence of such facts, we assume that the sale contract is confidential information, the sanctity of which the inquirer must preserve absent the client's consent.

5. The inquirer may not bury the broker's request. Rule 1.4(a)(1) says that a lawyer "shall promptly inform the client of," among other things, "any decision or circumstance with respect to which the client's informed consent, as defined in Rule 1.0(j), is required by these Rules." Rule 1.0(j) defines "informed consent" to mean "the agreement by a person to a proposed course of conduct after the lawyer has communicated information adequate for the person to make an informed decision, and after the lawyer has explained to the person the material risks of the proposed course of conduct and reasonably available alternatives." "The extent of the information needed and the risks to be addressed will vary both with the nature of the information being disclosed and the sophistication" of the client. N.Y. State 1059 ¶ 15 (2015); see N.Y. State 1061 ¶ 19 (2015) (facts and circumstances determine the adequacy of disclosure).

6. We decline to speculate here whether a dispute over the broker's fee is latent in the broker's request for the real estate contract, except to observe that this potential may be part of a lawyer's duty to meet the adequacy test of disclosure under Rule 1.0(j). In light of the inquirer's own admitted personal, financial, and business reason for resisting disclosure to the broker, however, we believe that the inquirer's own interests implicate Rule 1.7(a)(2), which arises when a significant risk exists that such interests will "adversely" affect the lawyer's "professional judgment on behalf of a client." That a lawyer may wish for the lawyer's own sake to decline to disclose the real estate contract to the broker, when disclosure may be in the client's interest in the matter in which the lawyer represents the client, is a conflict within the meaning of Rule 1.7(a)(2). This conflict may be subject to informed consent under the standard set out above if, nevertheless, "the lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation" to the client, Rule 1.7(b)(1), but we cannot imagine the lawyer complying with Rule 1.7 without adequate disclosure of the lawyer's own stake in advising the client whether to provide informed consent to disclosure of the contract.

CONCLUSION:

7. When a lawyer rather than a broker prepares a contract of sale in a real estate transaction, a copy of which the broker has requested, the contract is confidential information that the lawyer is obliged to protect absent informed client consent. The adequacy of informed consent depends on the facts and circumstances of each case, but a lawyer's own personal, financial, or business interest in resisting disclosure creates a conflict of interest, subject to waiver, which the lawyer must disclose to the client in seeking consent to disclosure of the confidential information.

TOPIC: Referral Fees

DIGEST: A lawyer who forms a tax credit business may not pay referral fees to other lawyers unless the lawyer or his law firm could pay such referral fees under Rule 1.5(g) or 7.2. A lawyer who is an employee of a tax credit business owned by non-lawyers may receive a referral fee from the business if none of the lawyer's activities as an employee constitute the practice of law. A lawyer who is a non-employee consultant to a tax credit business may receive a referral fee if the lawyer is not involved in the underlying transaction, obtains informed client consent, and satisfies Rule 1.8(f); if the lawyer is involved in the underlying transaction, then the lawyer must advise the client of the referral fee and credit the client with that fee.

RULES: 1.5(g), 1.7(a), 1.7(b), 1.8(f), 5.4(d), 5.7, 5.8, 7.2

FACTS:

1. The inquirer, a patent attorney licensed in New York, seeks to start a business ("RD1") that would advise clients on applying to the Internal Revenue Service for research and development tax credits and prepare the necessary applications to the IRS. The inquirer characterizes these R&D tax credit services as non-legal, because the IRS authorizes certain qualifying non-lawyers who are licensed as Enrolled Agents to engage in this business. We are told that the factors that determine whether something is eligible for a tax credit are the same as those that determine patentability. The inquirer envisions that at least some of the clients of RD1 would also be clients of the inquirer's law firm. The inquirer intends either to obtain an Enrolled Agent license or to hire licensed Enrolled Agents in order to become competent to prepare the necessary IRS filings.

2. Alternatively, the inquirer would work for, or collaborate with, another R&D tax credit business ("RD2") as an Enrolled Agent or a consultant, such as a marketing consultant. As part of that engagement, the inquirer would market the firm's services to select industries.

3. In either case, the inquirer would market the tax credit services to intellectual property attorneys to encourage them to refer their clients to the tax credit business, whether RD1 or RD2. These marketing efforts may include conducting presentations or sharing materials on the relevant subject matter. At the present time, the inquirer tells us, it is usually a company's accountant that refers the company to an R&D tax credit business to see if the company is eligible for the tax credit.

4. The inquirer asks whether RD1 or RD2 could pay referral fees to the lawyers who refer their clients. We answer questions only about a lawyer's own proposed conduct. While that includes questions about a business owned by the lawyer, our jurisdiction does not include questions about the conduct of third parties – in this case, RD2.

QUESTIONS:

5. May RD1 pay referral fees to lawyers who refer clients to RD1?

6. May the inquirer receive referral fees from RD2 if the inquirer (a) is employed by RD2 but does not have an ownership interest in RD2, or (b) has no affiliation RD2 but merely refers clients to it?

OPINION:

Lawyer-Owned Tax Credit Firm

7. Lawyers have traditionally provided both legal and nonlegal services to their clients. See N.Y. State 206 (1971) (conditions under which dual practice is permissible). Since the publication of N.Y. State 206, this committee has issued opinions regarding the implications under the rules of legal ethics of dual practice of legal and nonlegal services. See, e.g., N.Y. State 536 (1981) (financial planning business); N.Y. State 687 (1997) (lawyer-insurance broker); N.Y. State 711 (1998) (same); N.Y. State 784 (2005) (entertainment management).

8. We addressed the issues arising in dual practice most recently in N.Y. State 1155 (2018). As explained in that opinion, two issues raised by multidisciplinary practice are: (a) the potential conflict of interest under Rule 1.7 of the N.Y. Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") if the lawyer's interest in the nonlegal service will have an adverse effect on his or her independent professional judgment on behalf of the client in the legal services, and (b) whether the Rules as a whole (for example, the rules on confidentiality, conflicts, or, as here, payment of referral fees) will apply to the lawyer's provision of the nonlegal services as well as the legal services.

9. Before a lawyer may provide both legal and nonlegal services to the same client, the lawyer must determine whether doing so would violate Rule 1.7(a), which prohibits a lawyer from representing a client (absent the client's informed consent) if a reasonable lawyer would conclude there is significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client would be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business or other personal interests. Whether a significant risk exists that the lawyer's professional judgment will be adversely affected will depend upon the size of the lawyer's financial interest in the nonlegal services, and whether the lawyer's actions in the legal matter may affect the lawyer's ability to receive the nonlegal fees. If there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment will be adversely affected by the non-legal financial interests, the lawyer must disclose that possibility to the client, but may proceed with the representation if the conflict is subject to consent and the lawyer obtains informed consent, confirmed in writing. See Rule 1.7(b)(4); see also Rule 1.7(a), Cmt. [10] (a lawyer may not allow related business interests to affect representation, for example, by referring clients to an enterprise in which the lawyer has an undisclosed financial interest).

10. The other issue in multidisciplinary practice is whether the Rules apply to the conduct of the lawyer's rendition of nonlegal services, in this instance through RD1. We believe that the Rules do apply. In N.Y. State 779 (2004), which involved tax services that could be performed by CPAs and Enrolled Agents, we explained that, even when the services can be performed by both lawyers and non-lawyers (such as preparing tax returns), when the services are performed by a lawyer designated as such, the services constitute the practice of law and the lawyer, in performing them, is governed by the rules of lawyer conduct. Since it seems likely when the inquirer is marketing to intellectual property lawyers that the inquirer will inform the targets that the inquirer is a lawyer, we believe that the services RD1 will provide should be considered legal services and therefore subject to the Rules.

11. Rule 5.7(a) independently supports this conclusion. That Rule says that a lawyer or law firm "that provides service to a person that are not distinct from legal services being provided to that person by the lawyer or law firm is subject to these Rules with respect to the provisions of both legal and nonlegal services." In N.Y. State 1135 ¶¶ 7-8 (2017), we said that, in determining distinctness, one should look to the substance of the service to be provided, the proposed recipient, and the degree of integration of the two services. Here, some of the clients to whom RD1 would provide tax credit services would also be clients in the inquirer's law firm. We are told that the same factors that would render something patentable (the inquirer's legal business) are the very factors that relate to whether a company may receive a tax credit for the same thing. When a lawyer provides both legal services (patent eligibility) and non-legal services (tax credit eligibility) based upon the same operative facts and criteria, the two services are necessarily integrated and are therefore not distinct within the meaning of Rule 5.7(a). See also N.Y. State 1015 ¶ 14 (2014) (legal and nonlegal services provided in the same matter are not distinct). As a result, the provisions of the Rules apply to the nonlegal services.

12. Prominent among these is Rule 7.2, which prohibits a lawyer from compensating a person to recommend or obtain employment of a client, with certain exceptions. Rule 7.2 provides:

> (a) A lawyer shall not compensate or give anything of value to a person or organization to recommend or obtain employment by a client, or as a reward for having made a recommendation resulting in employment by a client, except that:
> > (1) a lawyer or law firm may refer clients to a nonlegal professional or nonlegal professional service firm pursuant to a contractual relationship with such nonlegal professional or nonlegal professional service firm to provide legal and other professional services on a systematic and continuing basis as permitted by Rule 5.8, provided however that such referral shall not otherwise include any monetary or other tangible consideration or reward for such, or the sharing of legal fees; and
> > (2) a lawyer may pay the usual and reasonable fees or dues charged by a qualified legal assistance organization or referral fees to another lawyer as permitted by Rule 1.5(g).

13. Thus, Rule 7.2 prohibits the payment of referral fees for the referral of business to RD1, unless one of two exceptions applies: (a) the existence of a contractual relationship permissible under Rule 5.8, or (b) the referral fees comply with the provisions of Rule 1.5(g). Here, the first exception is inapplicable because Rule 5.8 extends only to nonlegal services provided by professionals listed in Section 1205.3 of the Joint Appellate Division Rules, none of which includes a business like RD1, and, in any event, Rule 5.8(a)(2) bans a lawyer from giving any monetary benefit to the non-legal professional service firm for a referral. The second exception does not apply because Rule 1.5(g) permits a lawyer to divide a fee for legal services with another lawyer not associated the same law firm only when either (a) the division is in proportion to the services performed by each, or (b) by a writing given to the client, each lawyer assumes joint responsibility for the representation – conditions not contemplated in the inquirer's proposal.

14. Accordingly, because Rule 7.2 applies to the lawyer's conduct through RD1, the inquirer may not pay referral fees to lawyers who refer clients to RD1.

Non-Lawyer-Owned Tax Credit Firm

15. Lawyers occasionally refer a client to another service provider. Rule 5.8(c) says that its restrictions on multidisciplinary practice do "not apply to relationships consisting solely of non-exclusive reciprocal referral agreements or understandings between a lawyer or law firm and a nonlegal professional or nonlegal professional service firm." This has differing implications depending on whether the lawyer is an employee or an outside consultant to RD2.

16. Whether or not the inquirer, as an employee of RD2, may accept a referral fee from RD2 for marketing services depends on the precise conduct in which the lawyer would be engaged. If the lawyer is engaged in purely marketing activities (for instance, drafting advertising copy), and not in the practice of law, then the referral fee would be permissible. Whether certain activities comprise the practice of law is a legal question regulated by, among other things, criminal statutes; legal questions are beyond our jurisdiction to resolve. If, however, the lawyer's marketing activities for RD2 would involve the lawyer in applying law to specific facts in order to identify targets for RD2's business, a very significant question could arise whether the conduct constitutes the practice of law when a lawyer is engaged in such conduct. In that event, the lawyer could not be employed by an entity owned by non-lawyers owing to statutes and rules barring the practice of law in or with entities that non-lawyers own. See N.Y. State Business Corporation Law § 1503 (non-lawyer may not own an interest in a professional services corporation authorized to practice law); N.Y. State Judiciary Law § 495 (corporation or voluntary association may not practice law except in certain instances inapplicable here); Rule 5.4(d) (a "lawyer shall not practice with or in the form of an entity authorized to practice law" if "a nonlawyer owns any interest therein").

17. If the lawyer is not an employee of RD2, then the lawyer would be able to receive a referral fee – even if the lawyer is engaged in the practice of law in making the referral – as long as the lawyer is not otherwise involved in or benefitting from the underlying transaction and the client gives informed consent to the lawyer's receipt of the fee under Rule 1.8(f). Rule 1.8(f) says:

> A lawyer shall not accept compensation for representing a client, or anything of value related to the lawyer's representation of the client, from one other than the client unless:
> (a) the client gives informed consent;
> (b) there is no interference with the lawyer's independent professional judgment or with the client-lawyer relationship; and
> (c) the client's confidential information is protected as required by Rule 1.6.

18. We have held that a lawyer may accept a referral fee from a nonlegal service provider provided that the referring attorney is not benefitting financially from the underlying transaction and complies with Rule 1.8(f), or, if the referring attorney is involved in the underlying related transaction, the attorney (a) advises the client of the arrangement and (b) credits the client with the referral fee obtained. See N.Y. State 845 (2010); see also N.Y. State 667 (1994); N.Y. State 626 (1992); N.Y. State 576 (1986); N.Y. State 461 (1977). Recently in N.Y. State 1086 ¶¶ 15-16 (2016) we again visited the question of referral fees from a third-party service provider. In that case, we stated that the attorney may not accept the referral fee from a third-party investment firm as the money to be invested arose from the engagement in which the lawyer represented the client. In contrast, in N.Y. State 981 ¶¶ 4-5 (2013), we said that a referral fee was not prohibited when the service is not related to the lawyer's legal services and the lawyer makes no recommendation to use the service, which is not the case here.

CONCLUSION:

19. A lawyer who forms an R&D tax credit firm may not pay referral fees to other lawyers unless the lawyer or his law firm could pay such referral fees under Rule 1.5(g) or Rule 7.2, which does not appear to be the case here because, among other things, the payment would be a referral and not in proportion to the work done and the referring lawyers would not be assuming joint responsibility for the matter. Assuming that referring business to an R&D tax credit company constitutes the practice of law when conducted by a lawyer, the lawyer may not do so as an employee of a business owned by a non-lawyer. If the lawyer is not employed by the tax credit business, a lawyer who is not involved in the transaction may receive a referral fee from such business if the lawyer obtains informed consent from the client and satisfies the other conditions of Rule 1.8(f). If the lawyer is involved in the underlying transaction, then the lawyer would need to advise the client of the arrangement and credit the client with the referral fee obtained.

TOPIC: Missing client: Lawyer's Duty When Unable To Locate Client

DIGEST: A lawyer represented a defendant who later defaulted in making payments under a settlement agreement, who cannot be now located by the lawyer, and who is facing a motion before a court based on the failure to make such payments, may inform the court that the lawyer no longer represents the defendant if the prior representation ended and the prior action before the court had ended. If the representation of the client had not concluded or the prior matter before the court had not been closed, the lawyer will have to seek permission from the court to withdraw from the representation, after using reasonable efforts to locate the client.

RULES: Rules 1.6, 1.16

FACTS:

1. The inquirer, who now practices primarily in Colorado, previously focused a law practice in New York, where the inquirer remains admitted and still maintains an office. When practicing mainly in New York, the inquirer frequently represented defendants in breach of contract and debt cases. In the event of a settlement of one of those cases, the settlement agreement would often provide for the clients to make payments over time. On occasion, the parties would file a stipulation of discontinuance upon execution of the settlement agreement; on other occasions, the settlement agreement contemplated that a stipulation of discontinuance would be filed upon the final payment by the inquiring lawyer's client. In each event, on execution of the settlement agreement, the inquiring lawyer would provide the client with the payment instructions in writing and inform the client that the representation was concluded.

2. Recently, the inquiring lawyer received an email from plaintiff's counsel in a matter in which the inquirer represented defendant. Plaintiff's lawyer asserts that defendant has defaulted on making payments under the settlement agreement and, consequently, plans to file a motion for summary judgment. Upon hearing from plaintiff's counsel, the inquiring lawyer attempted to contact defendant by email and telephone but has been unable to reach the person. Although the inquiring lawyer believes that the representation of defendant concluded when the matter was settled, the inquirer is concerned that the court may take a different view.

QUESTIONS:

3. The inquirer asks two questions:

   a. May the inquiring lawyer tell plaintiff's counsel that the inquirer no longer represents defendant?

   b. If plaintiff's counsel files a motion in court, does the inquiring lawyer have to respond to the motion, or may the inquirer instead seek to be relieved as attorney for defendant?

OPINION:

4. The answer to the first question is yes: No ethical rule prohibits the inquiring lawyer from informing plaintiff's lawyer that, on the inquirer's view, the inquirer no longer represents defendant. This, however, does not solve the inquirer's difficulty, because either plaintiff's lawyer may find the answer unacceptable or, more problematic, a court may. If plaintiff's lawyer files a summary judgment motion with the court, the inquiring lawyer will still need to decide whether a duty exists to respond to the motion on behalf of defendant.

5. That the inquiring lawyer sent defendant a writing terminating the representation is of some consequence: We have noted that, in some circumstances, a termination letter may be dispositive on the issue whether the attorney-client relationship has ended. N.Y. State 1008 (2014). We cautioned there, however, that whether the attorney-client relationship has ended "depends in part on questions of law beyond our jurisdiction," and so, in that opinion, we did not opine on whether the lawyer's representation of the client had concluded. Id. ¶¶ 9-10; see New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"), Preamble ¶ 9 ("principles of substantive law external to these Rules determine whether a client-lawyer relationship exists").

6. The Rules offer some guidance on how the inquirer ought to proceed, the outcome of which depends on the terms of the settlement agreement and the import of those terms for the status of the matter in court. If both the representation of the client and the matter before the court have concluded, and the plaintiff's lawyer then takes action concerning the unpaid settlement amount against the former client, then the lawyer should inform the court that the lawyer no longer represents the defendant and is not otherwise obligated to respond on behalf of the defendant.

7. If, however, the representation has not concluded, or the matter before the court remains open, the lawyer must comply with Rule 1.16, which governs withdrawal from representation of a client. Rule 1.16(c) outlines when a lawyer may withdraw from a representation, including, in Rule 1.16(c)(7), when "the client fails to cooperate in the representation or otherwise renders the representation unreasonably difficult for the lawyer to carry out employment effectively," or in Rule 1.16(c)(12), when "the lawyer believes in good faith, in a matter pending before a tribunal, that the tribunal will find the existence of good cause for withdrawal." In most representations, "effective representation requires meaningful communication between a lawyer and a client." N.Y. State 1144 ¶ 10 (2018). In our view, "good cause" exists for the lawyer to seek to withdraw from representation if the lawyer cannot locate the client after taking reasonable steps to do so. See, e.g., N.Y. State 787 (2005) (discussing reasonable steps a lawyer should consider when attempting to locate a missing client).

8. Rule 1.16(d) qualifies permissive withdrawal when a matter is pending before a tribunal the rules of which require the tribunal's permission to withdraw. In that circumstance, the lawyer must seek the tribunal's permission and, if the tribunal declines, "a lawyer shall continue representation notwithstanding good cause for terminating the representation."

9. In applying for withdrawal, a lawyer remains bound by Rule 1.6 governing the nondisclosure of a client's confidential information, which includes information learned during the course of the representation that is subject to the attorney-client privilege, is "likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed," or "that the client has requested be kept confidential." Privilege issues are questions of law beyond our purview, but we recognize that a communication is a necessary predicate to its assertion, as is a client's request that information "be kept confidential." There being no communication here, the inquirer must resolve whether disclosure of the client's unavailability is "confidential information" that would likely "be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed." In N.Y. State 1057 (2015), we discussed disclosure in the context of a motion to withdraw as counsel. There, we noted that a lawyer may always advise a court that "professional considerations require termination of the representation." Id. ¶ 12; Rule 1.16, Cmt. [3]. If the court insists on more, then Rule 1.6(b)(6) allows a lawyer to disclose confidential information if ordered to do so by a court.

CONCLUSION:

10. When unable to locate a client once represented in a settled action, a lawyer's duty to respond to a claimed default under the settlement agreement depends on whether the representation and action are concluded or not. If the representation and matter are over, the lawyer may inform the court that the lawyer no longer represents the client. If instead the representation of the client had not concluded or the prior matter before the court had not been closed, then, following reasonable efforts to locate the client, the lawyer may seek permission from the court to withdraw from the representation, sensitive to the lawyer's ongoing duty to maintain a client's confidential information.

TOPIC: Returning client files without keeping a copy; conditions on compliance.

DIGEST: A lawyer has an interest in maintaining a copy of client-owned documents provided to the lawyer during a representation, but in certain instances that interest must yield to a client's legitimate request to destroy those copies. To protect the lawyer's exposure to later suit, the lawyer may condition compliance on the client's request on receipt of certain protections that are reasonable in light of all the facts and circumstances attending the client's request.

RULES: 1.6, 1.15, 1.16

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a New York lawyer who represented a client in an intellectual property matter adverse to the client's former employer. During the course of the representation, the client provided the inquirer with a large amount of data in digital form relating to the dispute between the client and the client's erstwhile employer (though the inquirer does not know the provenance of all the data). In the dispute, the latter alleged that the former had misappropriated proprietary information, some of which is embodied in the data given to the inquirer. Subsequently, the client decided to retain different counsel to handle the dispute, thereby ending the inquirer's attorney-client relationship with the client. The inquirer delivered to successor counsel all the materials comprising the client's file, doing so in the manner that successor counsel requested, but the inquirer retained one or more back-up copies of the data provided by the client during the representation.

2. The inquirer's former client thereafter settled the dispute in a confidential agreement, one provision of which requires the former client to retrieve and destroy all data comprising the subject of the dispute. The inquirer is not a party to the settlement agreement, but the inquirer's former client has requested the inquirer to destroy (and certify to the destruction of) the data in question. The inquirer is concerned that, in complying with this request, the inquirer would be without information that may be needed in the event of a subsequent lawsuit brought either by the former client or by the former client's onetime employer, who claims ownership of the data at issue. To protect against this prospect, the inquirer seeks guidance on the extent to which a lawyer may condition a request to destroy a file on receipt of a release and indemnity – from each party to the settlement agreement – and insistence on maintaining an index of the files destroyed in keeping with the former client's request.

QUESTIONS:

3. The inquirer poses two questions:

> (a) Does an attorney have an obligation to delete backup copies of files or data provided by a client after the client has terminated the legal engagement?
> (b) May the attorney condition compliance with such a request on obtaining a release and indemnification (including advance of attorneys' fees and expenses), as well as creating an inventory of file names, sizes, and dates to prove what files were or were not in the attorney's possession?

OPINION:

4. Rule 1.15(c)(4) of the N.Y. Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") says that a lawyer shall "promptly . . . deliver to the client . . . as requested by the client . . . properties in possession of the lawyer that the client . . . is entitled to receive." Rule 1.16(e) provides that, "upon termination of representation, a lawyer shall take steps, to the extent reasonably practicable, to avoid foreseeable prejudice to the rights of the client," including, among other things, "delivering to the client all papers and property to which the client is entitled." The Rules offer no guidance on which "papers and property" the client "is entitled to receive." Rather, the question of whether documents (including electronic versions) belong to the client is "generally a question of law, not ethics." N.Y. State 766 (1993). Which documents may belong to the client is "not always easy to ascertain" and may entail "a complex issue of both fact and law." N.Y. State 623 (1991). See generally Sage Realty Corp. v. Proskauer Rose Goetz & Mendelsohn, 91 N.Y.2d. 30, 37 (1997). Our Committee does not resolve issues of law, and so for our purposes we assume, without deciding, that the data in question belongs to the client.

5. In N.Y. State 780 (2004), we addressed whether a lawyer may retain a copy of documents belonging to a client despite the client's objection. There we said that "there can be little doubt" that a lawyer "has an interest in the file that would permit the lawyer to retain copies of file documents." Citing opinions from other jurisdictions, we concluded that, as a "general rule," a lawyer may retain "copies of the file at the lawyer's expense," notwithstanding a client's objection. See Rule 1.6(c)(5)(i) (lawyer may reveal or use client confidential information to the extent that the lawyer reasonably believes necessary to defend the lawyer against an accusation of wrongful conduct); Restatement (Third) of the Law Governing Lawyers § 46, Cmt. d (Am. Law Inst. 1998) (a "lawyer may keep copies of documents when furnished to a client.") In recognition of this interest, we said in N.Y. State 780, a lawyer may insist on a release from a client as a condition of forgoing the lawyer's interest in maintaining a copy.

6. This interest is not unqualified. The Restatement notes that "extraordinary circumstances" may exist in which the very nature of the lawyer's assignment overrides the lawyer's interest in maintaining a copy; as an example, the Restatement cites "when a client retained the lawyer to recover and destroy a confidential letter." Restatement § 46, Cmt. d. Our N.Y. State 780 took a somewhat less narrow view of the possible exceptions to the "general rule" that a lawyer may always maintain a copy of a client file; without attempting to anticipate all conceivable circumstances, we said there that exceptions might include "where the client has a legal right to prevent others from copying its documents and wishes for legitimate reasons to ensure that no copies of a particular document be available under any circumstances." These qualifications require a fact-intensive inquiry balancing factors favoring a lawyer's interest in maintaining a copy of a client file and factors favoring a client's interest in destruction of that copy. This balance determines the extent to which the lawyer may condition compliance with a client's demand for destruction of a file on protections for the lawyer's benefit.

7. No exhaustive catalog of these factors is practicable, but certain common considerations are likely to recur, among them the strength of the client's claim to ownership; the sensitivity of the documents; the centrality of their sensitivity to the object of the representation; the legitimacy of the client's request for destruction; the extent to which the documents slated for destruction comprise the client file (i.e., one document versus the entire file); the difficulty associated with destruction of the documents; the degree to which the lawyer is subject to a meaningful risk of later liability; and the availability and feasibility of provisions protective of the lawyer's interests. In balancing these and other factors, the weight to be given each depends on the facts and circumstances, with the overriding concern that a lawyer's demand for protections for the lawyer's benefit must be reasonable in light of those facts and circumstances.

8. Applying these considerations to the current inquiry, we believe that it would be reasonable for the lawyer to request a release and a simple hold-harmless agreement from the lawyer's former client in exchange for the lawyer's agreement to destroy the documents at issue. Because the documents originated with the client (no matter their original provenance), the client's claim to ownership is strong. The nature of the dispute – that the documents embody proprietary information – reflects their sensitivity, which appears to be core to the nature of the lawyer's initial engagement, and the settlement agreement supplies a legitimate basis for the client's request. The documents are in an electronic format, so we detect no undue difficulty in achieving the client's aim. If the lawyer destroys the documents as requested, the risk of later liability is correspondingly diminished. Maintaining an inventory of the documents, with which we see no problem, affords the inquirer an additional layer of protection from a subsequent claim. Merely asking for advance payment of legal fees and expenses in the event of suit, or requesting a release and indemnity from the non-client former employer, may not alone violate the Rules, but we are dubious that the lawyer may insist on these conditions before complying with the former client's request that the documents be destroyed and that the lawyer certify to their destruction.

CONCLUSION:

9. Compliance with the terms of a settlement reached by a former client provides a legitimate reason to comply with that former client's request to destroy client-owned documents in a lawyer's possession. The lawyer may condition deletion of the file on obtaining a release and a simple hold-harmless clause from the former client, and may maintain an inventory of the file names, sizes, and dates for data supplied by the former client to the lawyer during the representation and maintained in the lawyer's files.

OPINION 1165 (05/07/2019)

TOPIC: Unpaid Client Fees

DIGEST: Lawyer may not remove amounts from client's trust account if in dispute. Lawyer may only charge reasonable interest if provided for in the engagement letter.

RULES: 1.15(b)(4)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer, a New York lawyer, was retained nine years ago to represent a client in numerous litigations arising out of an estate matter. The client is executor of the estate and sole beneficiary of various annuity contracts of the decedent that the Surrogate's Court ruled, in response to interpleader litigation, were the client's property and not part of the estate. A sum of money was received into the inquirer's escrow account while the interpleader litigation regarding the annuity contracts was pending. The Surrogate's Court has now authorized the distribution of those funds to inquirer's client.

2. The inquirer had previously sent the client invoices for legal fees and expenses while the litigation was ongoing, but the inquirer agreed at the client's request to defer payment until the end of the litigation. The client raised no objection to the invoices at the time. The principal balance of the bill is now an amount greater than $50,000, which the inquirer observes is the ceiling set forth for mandatory fee arbitration under 22 N.Y.C.R.R. § 137.1. The client refuses to pay the bill, demanding that the inquirer cut the bill by approximately 20%. The inquirer claims that the inquirer has repeatedly and voluntarily reduced the amount of the bill over the years, and has recently evinced a willingness further to negotiate, but now wants the client to pay the outstanding amount. The inquirer asserts that a "written formal fee agreement" exists. The inquirer wants to withhold payment of the escrowed funds in an amount equal to the fees the inquirer says are due and owing, as well interest on those fees and an amount to cover fees and expenses should litigation arise over the amount the inquirer says is due and owing, which the inquirer proposes to seek by litigation after what the inquirer asserts is some statute of limitations.

QUESTIONS:

3. May the inquirer remove from the trust account the sums equal to what the inquirer believes are due and owing, and, if so, may this amount include payment of interest due on the unpaid bill?

4. May the inquirer also withhold from distribution to the client an amount the inquirer depicts as a "cushion" to cover fees and expenses in the event that the fee dispute results in litigation?

OPINION:

5. The answer to each question is no.

6. Rule 1.15(b)(4) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") states that a lawyer may withdraw funds from a trust account "when due, unless the right of the lawyer to receive it is disputed by the client . . . in which event the disputed portion shall not be withdrawn until the dispute is finally resolved." The client's insistence on the discount is a dispute for purposes of the Rule and so the inquirer may retain but must not remove from the trust account those sums that the client questions until the dispute is resolved, whether by settlement or through some dispute resolution process. Insofar as the client concedes that some of the amounts in the account are properly the lawyer's property, the lawyer may distribute the same to the lawyer's account; to the extent the client disputes any portion of those sums, the lawyer must retain them in escrow.

7. Absent a prior written agreement, the lawyer may not unilaterally charge interest on a delinquent client account. "[I]n order to charge interest on delinquent accounts, a lawyer must advise the client prior to performing services of the fact that interest will be so charged, the definition (time period) of delinquency, and must obtain the client's consent thereto." N.Y. State 399 (1975). "A law firm may seek its clients' agreement to modify its retainer agreement with the clients during the pendency of a current matter to secure payment, by confessions of judgment and collateral mortgages, of fully earned but unpaid legal fees and expenses in an amount on which the parties agree, if the law firm complies with the rules governing business transactions with clients and is mindful of ongoing obligations to avoid general conflicts of interest." N.Y. State 1139 ¶ (2017). See N.Y. State 910 (2012) ("A lawyer may request a client to amend a retainer agreement. Whether such an amendment must meet the requirements for fee agreements under Rule 1.5 or for business transactions between the lawyer and client under Rule 1.8(i) depends on the circumstances in which the amendment is requested and the nature of the amendment."); N.Y. State 783 (2005) ("If a client deliberately disregards an agreement to pay legal fees and expenses, and the letter of engagement or retainer agreement is silent as to interest charges on the delinquent accounts, a lawyer may condition continued representation on the client's agreement to prospectively pay interest on any past balance due for services previously rendered or to be rendered in the future"). Accordingly, absent a prior written agreement, the inquirer may not charge interest on the amounts the inquirer believes are due and owing.

8. Nor may the inquirer decide to withhold from the escrowed funds an amount that the inquirer deems apt to indemnify the inquirer for fees and expenses that the inquirer may incur in the event that litigation arises from the dispute with the client over the appropriate amount of fees for services rendered. In our view, the inquirer is ethically obligated to pay to the client those sums that are not part of the fee dispute – that is, the amount the client agrees the lawyer is due, without reference to interest or other holdbacks unless the client explicitly agrees. See Rule 1.15(c)(4) (lawyer must promptly pay to the client as requested by the client funds the client is entitled to receive). Absent some agreement, no authority exists for a lawyer to use disputed funds for self-help in the event that a dispute arises between a lawyer and a client over legal fees.

CONCLUSION:

9. A lawyer may not remove any amounts from the client's trust account if the client disputes the lawyer's entitlement to them. The lawyer may charge only a reasonable rate of interest on any unpaid bills if provided for in the written fee agreement.

OPINION 1166 (05/07/2019)

TOPIC: Non-legal business owned by lawyer in intellectual property: Choice of Law, Fee-Sharing, and Supervisory Duties

DIGEST: A New York lawyer who operates both a law firm and a consulting firm on intellectual property matters in multiple jurisdictions must determine the applicable ethical rules on a matter-by-matter basis, is not engaged in work distinct from the practice of law, may associate and share fees with a non-U.S. lawyer if certain criteria are met, may not share ownership or share fees with a person not thus qualified as a lawyer, and may not delegate the duty to supervise the work of a non-lawyer.

RULES: 5.3(a), 5.3(b), 5.4(a), 5.5, 5.7(a), 8.5(a) & (b).

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a New York attorney who is also admitted in other U.S. jurisdictions and before the U. S. Patent and Trademark Office ("USPTO"). The inquirer is the sole owner of a law firm, through which the inquirer practices intellectual property law, and also the lone shareholder of a corporation that provides business and consulting services on issues relating to intellectual property. The two entities have separate, but linked, websites and the inquirer uses a different email address for each entity. The mailing address for both entities is the inquirer's home in New York, where the majority of the work is performed. The inquirer also provides services to clients elsewhere in the U.S. and in countries around the world.

2. The inquirer provides intellectual property-related services through the entity the inquirer deems appropriate. For services that the inquirer deems to be "clearly not the practice of law (e.g., the brokering of patents)," the inquirer would engage clients through the consulting firm and provides "an appropriate disclaimer that [the] services are NOT the practice of law." For services that the inquirer deems to "clearly [constitute] the practice of law or where there is some potential confusion," the inquirer would engage clients through the law firm and treats the matter as a legal matter. The inquirer notes that one need not be a lawyer to practice before the USPTO.

3. The services the inquirer proposes to render include, among others, assessing the validity and value of intellectual property, whether registered (e.g., patents) or unregistered (e.g., trade secrets); advising on whether property should be registered or otherwise classified; drafting and reviewing business arrangements between the client and third parties; counseling on how best to exploit and protect the intellectual property; outlining best practices for policies governing issues such as human resources, cyber-security, risk management, contracts with manufacturers and suppliers, insurance, and corporate governance; advising on strategies to raise capital for the client's business and to sell or otherwise transfer the intellectual property; and representing the client in pursuing registrations of intellectual property, issuing opinions, negotiating contracts with third parties in jurisdictions around the globe, and managing other counsel in litigation, arbitration or regulatory proceedings on behalf of the client.

4. The inquirer is in the process of engaging four individuals: (a) a U.S. lawyer with a profile similar to the inquirer's; (b) a U.S. patent agent (who is not and need not be a lawyer); (c) a person certified to practice law in Europe but not admitted to practice in any U.S. jurisdiction; and (d) a technologist who is neither a lawyer nor a patent agent. These individuals would like to be partners or shareholders in the entities the inquirer owns, or at least employees who not only receive fixed salaries, but also share in the profits and fees generated by the entities.

QUESTIONS:

5. The inquirer poses several questions, two of which ask whether the non-lawyers the inquirer plans to hire would be engaged in the unauthorized practice of law if they perform any of the above services without the direct supervision of a properly admitted firm lawyer in the relevant jurisdiction. This Committee does not provide opinions on the unauthorized practice of law. As Comment [2] to Rule 5.5 states: "The definition of the 'practice of law' is established by law and varies from one jurisdiction to another." Thus, determining what constitutes the practice of law is a question of law that is outside our jurisdiction. N.Y. State 1093 ¶ 14 (2016); N.Y. State 1082 ¶ 7 (2016). We turn, therefore, to the inquirer's remaining questions, and the issues thereby raised, which are:

(a) Since the inquirer practices in several jurisdictions, which ethical rules will apply?

(b) Do the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") apply to the activities of the consulting firm?

(c) Is the non-U.S. lawyer a non-lawyer for purposes of the application of Rule 5.4 which prohibits sharing legal fees with a non-lawyer?

(d) May the inquirer share fees from the legal services or non-legal services with the non-lawyers the inquirer hires?

(e) If a non-lawyer is involved in any of the activities above that are deemed the practice of law, and is merely an employee of either the law firm or the consulting firm, what degree of lawyer supervision is required? May the lawyer be from a third party law firm or be an in house counsel of the client?

OPINION:

Disciplinary Authority and Choice of Law

6. The inquirer is admitted in New York as well as several other U.S. jurisdictions and before the USPTO. The inquirer provides services to clients across the U.S. and around the world, but most of the work is physically performed in New York. Being admitted in New York, the inquirer "is subject to the disciplinary authority of this state, regardless of where the lawyer's conduct occurs." Rule 8.5(a). Being admitted in other U.S. jurisdictions, the inquirer may also be "subject to the disciplinary authority of both this state and another jurisdiction where the lawyer is admitted for the same conduct." Id.

7. Rule 8.5(a) is jurisdictional; it tells us the forum authorized to exercise authority over the lawyer. That New York may have the power to discipline a lawyer does not mean that the Rules will apply in evaluating the lawyer's compliance with ethical standards. N.Y. State 1058 ¶ 6 (2015). Rather, the rules of conduct that a New York disciplinary authority will apply will depend on the choice of law rules set forth in Rule 8.5(b), which provides:

> In any exercise of the disciplinary authority of this state, the rules of professional conduct to be applied shall be as follows:
> (1) For conduct in connection with a proceeding in a court before which a lawyer has been admitted to practice (either generally or for purposes of that proceeding), the rules to be applied shall be the rules of the jurisdiction in which the court sits, unless the rules of the court provide otherwise; and
> (2) For any other conduct:
> (i) If the lawyer is licensed to practice only in this state, the rules to be applied shall be the rules of this state, and
> (ii) If the lawyer is licensed to practice in this state and another jurisdiction, the rules to be applied shall be the rules of the admitting jurisdiction in which the lawyer principally practices; provided, however, that if particular conduct clearly has its predominant effect in another jurisdiction in which the lawyer is licensed to practice, the rules of that jurisdiction shall be applied to that conduct.

8. In addition, a practitioner, including a lawyer, who handles matters before the USPTO may need to adhere to the Rules of Professional Conduct that the USPTO adopted, effective May 3, 2013, and "that govern a wide range of professional conduct by lawyers and others practicing before the USPTO. See 37 C.F.R. §§ 11.101 et seq." N.Y. State 1027 ¶ 18 n. 5 (2014). The USPTO, like New York, followed the format of the ABA Model Rules of Professional Conduct, but with provisions tailored to the USPTO's jurisdiction; among other things, the USPTO defines "tribunal" to include the Office itself, 37 C.F.R. § 11.101. Whether the USPTO Rules preempt and therefore take precedence over the New York Rules is, however, a question of law beyond our jurisdiction to resolve. N.Y. State 1027 ¶ 18 n. 7.

9. N.Y. State 1027 is also instructive on identifying the place where a lawyer "principally practices" for purposes of Rule 8.5(b)(2)(ii). There we named factors that could bear on that determination, including (a) the number of calendar days the lawyer spends working in each jurisdiction; (b) the number of hours the lawyer bills in each jurisdiction; (c) the location of the clients the lawyer serves; and (d) the activities the lawyer performs in each jurisdiction (e.g., legal work for clients vs. administrative work for the law firm). We added that, in light of "the increase in law practice over the Internet, and the corresponding decrease in the importance of the lawyer's physical location, the jurisdiction in which a lawyer 'principally practices' for purposes of Rule 8.5(b)(2)(ii) is becoming less certain, and we should consider a lawyer's significant contacts with all jurisdictions, not only the jurisdiction in which the lawyer is most often physically present." Id. ¶ 14.

10. No matter where the inquirer "principally practices," if a lawyer's "conduct clearly has its predominant effect in another jurisdiction in which the lawyer is licensed to practice, the rules of that jurisdiction shall be applied to that conduct." Rule 8.5(b)(2)(ii). Determinations under Rule 8.5(b) are necessarily fact specific. Such are the multiplicity of the inquirer's proposed activities, and the locations where the inquirer expects to engage in them, that we are in no position to guide the inquirer beyond saying that the lawyer should assess the potential choices of ethics rules with respect to each discrete activity in which the lawyer is involved. For now, we assume that the applicable Rules are those in New York.

Application of the Rules to the Consulting Firm

11. This Committee has issued a number of opinions on the application of the Rules to non-legal services provided by a lawyer who provides both legal and non-legal services to clients. See, e.g., N.Y. State 1162 (2019) (patent law and consulting on research and development tax credits); N.Y. State 1157 (2018) (legal and engineering services); N.Y. State 1155 (2018) (family law and financial planning services); N.Y. State 1135 (2017) (state and local tax services); N.Y. State 1026 (2014) (mediation in domestic relations matters); N.Y. State 938 (2012) (law firm owns firm that provides services with respect to social security disability insurance claims). One of the major issues discussed in these opinions is whether the Rules apply to non-legal services provided to clients, including the rules on advertising and solicitation and the rules on payment of referral fees and profit-sharing. Rule 5.7 provides:

> > (1) A lawyer or law firm that provides non-legal services to a person that are not distinct from legal services being provided to that person by the lawyer or law firm is subject to these Rules with respect to the provision of both legal and non-legal services.
> > (2) A lawyer or law firm that provides non-legal services to a person that are distinct from legal services being provided to that person by the lawyer or law firm is subject to these Rules with respect to the non-legal services if the person receiving the services could reasonably believe that the non-legal services are the *s*ubject of a client-lawyer relationship.
> > (3) A lawyer or law firm that is an owner, controlling party or agent of, or that is otherwise affiliated with, an entity that the lawyer or law firm knows to be providing non-legal services to a person is subject to these Rules with respect to the non-legal services if the person receiving the services could reasonably believe that the non-legal services are the subject of a client-lawyer relationship.
> > (4) For purposes of paragraphs (a)(2) and (a)(3), it will be presumed that the person receiving non-legal services believes the services to be the subject of a client-lawyer relationship unless the lawyer or law firm has advised the person receiving the services in writing that the services are not legal services and that the protection of a client-lawyer relationship does not exist with respect to the non-legal services, or if the interest of the lawyer or law firm in the entity providing non-legal services is de minimis.

(b) Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph (a), a lawyer or law firm that is an owner, controlling party, agent, or is otherwise affiliated with an entity that the lawyer or law firm knows is providing non-legal services to a person shall not permit any non-lawyer providing such services or affiliated with that entity to direct or regulate the professional judgment of the lawyer or law firm in rendering legal services to any person, or to cause the lawyer or law firm to compromise its duty under Rule 1.6(a) and Rule 1.6(c) with respect to the confidential information of a client receiving legal services.

(c) For purposes of this Rule, "non-legal services" shall mean those services that lawyers may lawfully provide and that are not prohibited as an unauthorized practice of law when provided by a non-lawyer.

12. Under Rule 5.7(a)(1), whether non-legal services provided to a person by a lawyer or law firm are subject to the Rules depends upon whether the non-legal services are distinct from legal services being provided to that person. In N.Y. State 1135 ¶¶ 7-8 (2017), we said that, in determining distinctness, one should look to the substance of the service to be provided, the proposed recipient and the degree of integration of the two services. That the two different entities provide the services is not sufficient; if the services are not distinct, and a single person receives both services, the recipient is presumed to believe that the attorney-client relationship applies to both. Non-legal services that are not distinct from legal services are always subject to the Rules, no matter what disclaimer a lawyer may provide about the non-legal services. N.Y. State 1155 ¶ 13.

13. In our opinion, the services that the inquirer proposes to render through the law firm and the consulting firm are not distinct. The vast majority of the services provided by the inquirer involve the protection of intellectual property, whether intellectual property is subject to registration, and the validity and infringement of registered intellectual property. They involve legal determinations and advice. Users of the services are likely to view the services as part of a continuum of legal services. The fact that the USPTO authorizes certain of the services to be performed by persons who are not lawyers is irrelevant. Consequently, under Rule 5.7(a)(1), the activities of the consulting firm will be subject to the Rules. See N.Y. State 1162 ¶ 14 (Rules apply when lawyer provides both legal patent advice non-legal tax credit services); N.Y. State 1155 ¶ 15 (Rules apply when lawyer provides both legal estate planning and non-legal financial planning affecting estate); N.Y. State 1157 ¶ 11 (Rules inapplicable when lawyer provides engineering services); N.Y. State 938 ¶ 10 (Rules inapplicable to lawyer-owned business processing disability claims when business employed no lawyers, operated from separate facility, and disclaimed legal services).

Sharing Legal Fees with a Non-U.S. Lawyer Not Admitted to Practice in a U.S. Jurisdiction

14. The inquirer next asks whether the inquirer may share legal fees with a person who is certified to practice law in a civil law country in Europe, but does not have a license to practice law in any of the United States. We are mindful that it is not uncommon for law firms today to operate around the world using various juridical entities and, in some instances, sharing legal fees with persons qualified to practice law in an extraterritorial jurisdiction but not in any of the United States. In the past, we have endorsed this practice – see, e.g., N.Y. State 1072 (2015) (Japanese benrishi); N.Y. State 806 (2007) (Italian law firm); N.Y. State 658 (1993) (Swedish law firm); N.Y. State 646 (1993) (Japanese bengoshi); N.Y. State 542 (1982) (U.K. solicitors) – with two caveats. First, the arrangement must comply with the substantive law of New York and with the ethical and legal codes of the non-U.S. jurisdiction. Second, the New York lawyer must make an independent evaluation that the educational requirements for the non-U.S. lawyer are equivalent to those for a New York lawyer, and that nothing in the arrangement would compromise the New York lawyer's ability to uphold the ethical requirements of this State, including those requiring the exercise of independent professional judgment and protecting the confidentiality of attorney-client communications. If the inquirer is satisfied that the non-U.S. lawyer here would meet these requirements, then the inquirer may share legal fees with that person.

Sharing Ownership of and Fees Generated by a Non-Distinct Services Firm

15. The same is not true of a person who fails to qualify as a lawyer under the foregoing criteria, including in particular the inquirer's proposed retention of a non-lawyer patent agent and a technologist. Having concluded that the services the inquirer proposes to render in the consulting firm are not distinct from those to be rendered through the law firm, the full panoply of the Rules applies. Thus we believe that Rule 5.4(b) prohibits a lawyer from forming a partnership with a non-lawyer if any of the activities of the partnership consist of the practice of law. Although the inquirer maintains that the consulting firm will not engage in the practice of law, we have often remarked that there are some activities that would not constitute the unauthorized practice of law when engaged in by a non-lawyer that would still constitute the practice of law when engaged in by a lawyer. See, e.g., N.Y. State 779 (2004) (even though tax services can be performed by both lawyers and non-lawyers, when the services are performed by a lawyer designated as such they constitute the practice of law and the lawyer, in performing them, is governed by the rules of lawyer conduct); N.Y. State 662 (1994) (if activity is the practice of law when performed by lawyer, lawyer does not escape ethical requirements by "announcing he is to be regarded as a layman" for that particular purpose).

16. Rule 5.4(a) prohibits a lawyer or law firm from sharing legal fees with a non-lawyer, with limited exceptions. A lawyer is prohibited from sharing legal fees from either the law firm or the consulting firm with the non-lawyer employees unless an exception to Rule 5.4(a) applies. A significant exception is that Rule 5.4(a)(3) permits a lawyer to "compensate a non-lawyer employee . . . based in whole or in part on a profit sharing plan." Comment [1B] explains:

> Paragraph (a)(3) permits limited fee sharing with a non-lawyer employee, where the employee's compensation or retirement plan is based in whole or in part on a profit-sharing arrangement. Such sharing of profits with a non-lawyer employee must be based on the total profitability of the law firm or a department within a law firm and may not be based on the fee resulting from a single case.

17. For example, in N.Y. State 887 (2011), we said that a lawyer or law firm may have a profit-sharing plan that pays bonus compensation to a non-lawyer marketer based on the overall profits of the firm or on a percentage of the employee's base salary, but that the bonus compensation could not be based on referrals of particular matters or based on the profitability of the firm or the department for which the employee markets if such profits are substantially related to the employee's marketing efforts, or on the fees paid by clients that resulted from such marketing. The same is true here.

Supervision of Non-Lawyers at Inquirer's Firms

18. The inquirer's final question entails the degree to which lawyer supervision is required over the non-lawyer employees. The Rules recognize that lawyers will frequently require the assistance of non-lawyers to provide legal advice in a competent fashion. See Rule 5.5, Cmt. [1] (noting that the Unauthorized Practice of Law Rule "does not prohibit a lawyer from employing the services of paraprofessionals and delegating functions to them, so long as the lawyer supervises the delegated work and retains responsibility for their work."). Rule 5.3 provides in its opening subparagraph that "[a] law firm shall ensure that the work of non-lawyers who work for the firm is adequately supervised, as appropriate." See N.Y. State 774 (2004) (addressing supervisory duties of firm hiring paralegal or other non-lawyer). Rule 5.3 dictates that "[a] lawyer with direct supervisory authority over a non-lawyer shall adequately supervise the work of the non-lawyer, as appropriate." The Rules thereby impose upon both law firms and individual lawyers a duty of direct supervisory authority over a non-lawyer. This is a rule of reason: Rule 5.3(a) provides that the degree of supervision required is that which is reasonable under the circumstances, taking into account factors such as the experience of the person whose work is being supervised, the amount of work involved in a particular matter and the likelihood that ethical problems might arise in the course of working on the matter.

19. The rule requiring a law firm and a lawyer with direct supervisory authority over a non-lawyer to adequately supervise the work of a non-lawyer serves an important goal. It provides "reasonable assurance that the conduct of all non-lawyers employed by or retained by or associated with the law firm, including non-lawyers outside the firm working on firm matters, is compatible with the professional obligations of the lawyers and firm." Rule 5.3(a), Cmt. [2]; see Matter of Galasso, 19 N.Y.3d 688, 695 (2012) (observing that attorneys are not prohibited from delegating tasks to firm employees, but also stressing that any delegation must be accompanied by an appropriate degree of oversight by a lawyer). The duty of supervision is supplemented by Rule 5.3(b), which imposes responsibility on a lawyer for the conduct of a non-lawyer in certain circumstances. Accordingly, the inquirer must assure that the work of the non-lawyers is adequately supervised, as appropriate, in accordance with the standards outlined above.

20. The inquirer asks whether the necessary degree of supervision must be achieved by a supervising lawyer from within the law firm or, alternatively, may be satisfied by a lawyer from a third party law firm or by an in house counsel of the law firm's client. We have opined that certain fundamental obligations imposed by the Rules upon law firms and lawyers cannot be delegated to another. See N.Y. State 693 (1997) ("Attorneys must be aware that responsibility for client funds may not be delegated"). A law firm's responsibility for developing and implementing systems to ensure professional and ethical practice, which would include adequate supervision of non-lawyers, may be delegated to a management committee or similar group within the firm. See N.Y. State 762 (2003); Rule 5.1, Cmt. [3]. Given that the duty of supervision over non-lawyers housed in Rule 5.3 is fundamental to the ethical practice of law, we conclude that it may not be delegated to a lawyer not associated with the inquirer's firm. See N.Y. State 807, ¶¶ 2-3 (discussing factors to consider in determining if a lawyer is "associated" with law firm). Therefore, the inquirer cannot rely on a third-party law firm or an in house counsel of a client to comply with Rule 5.3's duty of supervision of non-lawyers who work for his law firm.

CONCLUSION:

21. A lawyer admitted in New York State and other jurisdictions is subject to the disciplinary authority of New York State regardless of where the lawyer's conduct occurs, and may be subject to the disciplinary authority of another jurisdiction. The rules of conduct that a New York disciplinary authority will apply will depend on the choice of law rules set forth in Rule 8.5(b). Whether a lawyer's non-legal consulting firm is subject to the Rules depends on whether the services it provides are distinct from legal services. If the non-legal services are not distinct, as in the inquiry presented, then a disclaimer that they are legal services is not effective. Whether a non-U.S. lawyer is a "lawyer" for purposes of the Rules depends on whether the admitting jurisdiction's educational requirements are equivalent to those for a New York lawyer and whether New York's ethical requirements will be upheld. A New York lawyer may not share fees with a non-lawyer employee except under a profit-sharing plan permitted by Rule 5.4. Reliance on a third-party law firm or in-house counsel of a client to supervise the lawyer's employees does not relieve the lawyer of supervisory responsibility under Rule 5.3.

OPINION 1167 (05/09/2019)

TOPIC: Law Firm Name: Use of Multiple Surnames

DIGEST: A lawyer who practices under the lawyer's full surname name may use a law firm name that omits a first name and includes only the lawyer's middle name and last name.

RULES: Rule 7.5(b)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer, a New York sole practitioner whose full legal name we will call "Charlotte Moretti Jones," is forming a new law firm and wants to know whether the firm may be called "Moretti Jones, PC." The inquirer recently changed the inquirer's surname to include the name of a spouse. Nevertheless, the inquirer's concern is that, because the inquirer's middle name sounds like a surname, the public may mistakenly conclude that Moretti and Jones are two different lawyers.

QUESTION:

2. May a lawyer practice under a law firm name that includes only the lawyer's surname includes a name that is a common last name?

OPINION:

3. Rule 7.5(b) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") provides, with certain narrow exceptions, that a "lawyer in private practice shall not practice under a trade name, a name that is misleading as to the identity of the lawyer or lawyers practicing under such name, or a firm name containing names other than those of one or more of the lawyers in the firm. "Awe have often remarked, the purpose of this rule is to protect the public from being deceived about the identity or status of those who use the firm name. See, e.g., N.Y. State 1003 (2014).

4. In N.Y. State 740 (2001), the Committee opined that "[u]sing a name that is not the legal name of one or more partners or former partners in the law firm constitutes [the] use of a trade name" within the meaning of Rule 7.5(b). Applying this interpretation of the rule to the inquiry at issue, the Committee concluded that a lawyer could not insert the letter A before the firm name to insure favorable placement in the Yellow Pages.

5. The Committee has, however, determined that not all minor name variations violate Rule 7.5(b). Thus, in N.Y. State 1003 (2014), the Committee opined that the inquirer could use a firm name that omitted the lawyer's first name but contained the inquirer's full surname and the initials of two middle names without running afoul of Rule 7.5(b). The Committee concluded that such minimal variation is acceptable as long as the proposed firm name is not misleading about the identity of the lawyer practicing under such name.

6. Applying these principles to the current inquiry, we conclude that the inquirer's proposed firm name does not violate Rule 7.5(b). For purposes of the Rule, no material difference exists between using a firm name that is comprised of a middle name and a last name and using a firm name that is comprised of middle initials and a last name. The inquirer's concern that the public might conclude that the firm's name is the last name of an additional partner because it is happens to be a name that is commonly a last name is a concern too amorphous to affect our application of Rule 7.5(b). We live in a country (unlike some other countries) that does not impose blanket limitations on given names, and it is not uncommon for names that are more traditionally last names to be used as given names. In light of this facts, the public cannot reasonably assume that a particular name is a given name or a last name. Accordingly, we do not view the inquirer's proposed use of the firm name "Moretti Jones, PC" as "misleading" about the identity of the lawyer within the meaning of Rule 7.5(b).

7. We note the difference between this inquiry and the one we resolved in N.Y. State 1152 (2018). There, we concluded that the use of only a lawyer's first name as the name of the firm – as opposed to its use in advertising or branding – was impermissible. We reasoned that Rule 7.5(b) "embeds an understanding that a law firm's name consists of the surnames of lawyers who either practice there or once did." Id. ¶ 6. Here, by contrast, the inquirer's proposed firm name is the inquirer's actual surname, whether as a spousal name or a middle one coupled with an actual one.

CONCLUSION:

8. A lawyer who practices under the lawyer's full surname may use a law firm name that includes only the lawyer's middle name and last name, without including the lawyer's first name.

OPINION 1168 (05/13/2019)

TOPIC: Sale of Law Practice; Use of Firm Name after Sale

DIGEST: A lawyer affiliated with firm wholly owned by another lawyer may purchase the firm consistent with Rule 1.17 and may use the name of the seller's firm provided that doing so is not misleading. The meaning of "retired" for purpose of such a sale is as set out in Rule 1.17.

RULES: 1.5(h), 1.17(a), 7.5(b), 7.5(c), 8.4(c)

Overrules N.Y. State 148 (1970) and modifies N.Y. State 850 (2011)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a New York lawyer affiliated with a firm wholly owned by another New York lawyer (here, "Owner"), which currently operates under the name of the [Owner] Group, P.L.L.C. The firm has offices located in New York City metropolitan area. The Owner has decided to leave the firm, to cease practicing law there, and to move to a location in New York State distant from the metropolitan area, where the Owner intends to start a new practice. The inquirer wishes to purchase the Owner's law practice in the metropolitan area, and to continue to use the Owner's name in conducting the practice as [Owner] Group, P.L.L.C.

QUESTIONS:

2. May a lawyer purchase another lawyer's wholly owned law practice, notwithstanding the seller's continuing in law practice?

3. May the buying lawyer continue to use the name of the selling lawyer's practice?

OPINION:

4. Standards governing the sale of law practices are of comparatively recent origin. Before the 1996 adoption of DR 2-111 of the N.Y. Code of Professional Responsibility (the "Code") – the predecessor to Rule 1.17(a) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") – a lawyer in New York could not sell a law practice. See EC 4-6 (as in effect prior to 1996); N.Y. State 707 (1998). The theory, still reflected in Comment [1] to Rule 1.17, was that "[c]lients are not commodities that can be purchased and sold at will."

5. According to the Report and Recommendations approved by the New York State Bar Association's House of Delegates on January 26, 1996, the provision that became Rule 1.17(a) was designed to "address the disparate treatment of sole practitioners and members of law firms with respect to the 'good will' of their respective practices". See also EC 2-34 of the Code. That is, before the adoption of this rule, a member of a law firm could retire from the practice of law and receive payments from the firm under a separation or retirement agreement under what became Rule 1.5(h). But a solo practitioner could not sell a law practice or divide fees from legal business except in very restricted circumstances. DR 2-111 and its successor Rule 1.17(a) were intended to address this disparity.

6. Rule 1.17 now provides in pertinent part:

> A lawyer retiring from a private practice of law . . . may sell a law practice, including good will, to one or more lawyers or law firms, who may purchase the practice. . . . Retirement shall include the cessation of the private practice of law in the geographic area, that is, the county and city and any county or city contiguous thereto, in which the practice to be sold has been conducted.

7. Here, the Owner is "retiring" within the meaning of Rule 1.17 because the Owner will cease practicing law in geographic areas where the Owner once practiced. The owner intends to practice, if at all, in counties not contiguous to but distant from the New York City metropolitan area where the Owner's offices once were. Consequently, as long as the purchase complies with the other requirements of Rule 1.17, the inquirer may purchase the Owner's law practice.

8. The use of the Owner's name in the purchased entity presents a closer question owing to a tension between Rule 1.17 and Rule 7.5(b).

9. This Committee has long recognized, as the Rules do and their predecessors did, that a law firm may continue to use the names of partners who once practiced there in the names of their law firms. For instance, in N.Y. State 622 (1991), we recognized the practice of continuing to use the names of retired or deceased partners in firm names:

> Many firms, large and small alike, continue to practice under firm names – essentially trade names – that include the names of their founders or other former partners, often long after those lawyers have passed away. They do so to perpetuate the good will associated with their institutional names, as well as to honor lawyers whose efforts and skills laid the foundation for their practice. . . . The justification for sanctioning this practice, in the absence of danger of deception, is that all of the partners contribute to the good will attached to a firm name, and that surviving partners should not be deprived of their right to a benefit to which they contributed their time, skill and labor. N.Y. State 279 (1973).

10. Yet nothing in Rule 1.17 restricts prospective purchasers to persons having a prior affiliation with the purchased firm; "one or more lawyers or law firms may purchase the practice," and the Rule authorizes the sale not only of the practice, but also its "good will." Good will "is an intangible asset of an enterprise that arises from the reputation of a business and its relationship with its customers." N.Y. State 961 ¶ 2 (2013). We have long recognized that the name of a law firm is central to its good will. N.Y. State 45 (1967). Branding and reputation are precious commodities in any profession, including the legal profession. We cannot ignore that, in today's rapidly changing legal market, the constant merger or acquisition of law firms has engendered combinations in which the nexus between or among the combined firms and their predecessors is at times attenuated or opaque. To say that today's legal profession does not trade in the goodwill of storied names would require blinders on reality. Rule 1.17 is alone no obstacle to this commerce.

11. Thus, Rule 1.17 suggests that any lawyer, whether or not previously affiliated with the acquired firm, is free to adopt some or all of the acquired firm's name as its own. Therein lies the rub with Rule 7.5(b), which says:

> A lawyer in private practice shall not practice under a trade name, a name that is misleading as to the identity of the lawyer or lawyers practicing under such name, or a firm name containing names other than those of one or more of the lawyers in the firm, except that . . . a firm may use as, or continue to include in its name the name or names of one or more deceased or retired members of the firm or of a predecessor firm in a continuing line of succession.

12. "The prohibition against trade names is broad, permitting use of little beyond the names of lawyers presently or previously associated with the firm." N.Y. State 869 (2011). See N.Y. State 1152 (2018) (lawyer's first name alone); N.Y. State 1138 (2017) (English translation of lawyer's name); N.Y. State 948 (2012) (the phrase "The Business Dispute Clinic"); N.Y. State 869 (2011) (an area of law in which the lawyer practices); N.Y. State 740 (2001) (using a name that is not the legal name of one or more partners or former partners in the law firm). This broad interpretation is consistent with the purpose of Rule 7.5(b). It serves to protect the public from being deceived about the identity, responsibility, or status of those who use the firm name. See N.Y. State 920 (2012) (citing N.Y. State 732 (2000)). See also Rule 8.4(c) (a lawyer shall not engage in conduct involving misrepresentation).

13. We think it is important to address a potential tension between Rules 1.17 and 7.5(b), because we can envision circumstances in which, without full disclosure, the entry of a stranger to a firm, operating under the firm's name, could generate the public confusion that Rule 7.5(b) (as well as Rules 7.1 and 8.4(c), among others) is intended to prevent. Rule 7.5(b) is explicitly addressed to firm names, whereas Rule 1.17 is intended to facilitate the sale of a law business. "As a general rule of statutory construction, the specific governs over the general." N.Y. State 669 (1994). Whether here the drafters of the Rules intended the inclusion of "good will" in Rule 1.17 to temper Rule 7.5(b) is an issue we need not resolve in this inquiry because of the pre-existing, and we presume bona fide, relationship between the Owner and the inquirer in the conduct of the Owner's New York City metropolitan area practice. We believe that a lawyer with a pre-existing and bona fide affiliation with a law firm – reflective of a continuation of the practice – may acquire that law firm and use its name provided that all the other requirements of Rule 1.17, including notice to clients and maintenance of client confidences, are respected. Our sole caveat is that the use of the word "Group" in the name of the firm implies that the inquirer is not the only lawyer in the firm; assuming that other lawyers are engaged in the practice, then we see no ethical obstacle to the inquirer's continued use of the firm name.

14. Our conclusion here requires us to revisit two prior opinions of this Committee which we now modify or overrule.

15. First, in N.Y. State 148 (1970), this Committee concluded that a former associate may not continue the use of a firm name containing the name of a deceased partner because to do so implies that the surviving associate was a partner. We no longer hold this view, especially in light of the changing nomenclature common in the legal profession today. In 1970, non-equity legal personnel were never called partners; today, it is commonplace. Moreover, in N.Y. City 725 (1948), the City Bar Ethics Committee took a broader view of when a firm is a bona fide successor to another firm, looking to substantial continuity of partners or other lawyers from the predecessor firm, as well as continuity of clientele and professional practice. Even without the change in labels, we now consider the City Bar's view more persuasive.

16. Second, in N.Y. State 850 (2011), we were asked whether a law firm could use the name of a former partner in its firm name if the former partner continued to practice law as general counsel to a corporation. Citing N.Y. State 266 (1972), an opinion decided under the Code, we said the former partner "is still engaged in the practice of law as the general counsel to a corporation." Partly depending on EC 2-11, N.Y. State 266 did not require the "retired" partner to stop practicing completely, as long as the lawyer did not practice law except with the former firm. When we issued our opinion in N.Y. State 850, the Rules had eliminated the Ethical Considerations, including EC 2-11. But the Committee still believed that "retired" for purposes of Rule 7.5(b) should mean "not practicing law," despite the fact that Rule 1.17 contained a less restrictive definition. In support of this broader definition, we cited the definition of "retired" in the court rules governing registration of lawyers. See 22 NYCRR § 118.1(g) (providing, then as now, that an "attorney is 'retired' from the practice of law when, other than the performance of legal services without compensation, he or she does not practice law in any respect and does not intend ever to engage in acts that constitute the practice of law"). Upon reconsideration, we believe that Rule 1.17 should recognize that a partner may retire from a law firm without entirely retiring from the practice of law. N.Y. State 622 (to the same effect). The Court Rule on the registration of lawyers has a different purpose from Rules 7.5(b) and 1.17. The Court Rule determines when a lawyer is required to pay registration fees to the Office of Court Administration and when a lawyer must comply with the rules on continuing legal education – not when a law firm name should be considered misleading or a trade name. For these reasons, we believe that N.Y. State 850 is distinguishable and to the extent inconsistent with this opinion is modified.

CONCLUSION:

17. A lawyer affiliated with firm wholly owned by another lawyer may purchase the firm consistent with Rule 1.17 and may use the name of the seller's firm provided that doing so is not misleading. The meaning of "retired" for purpose of such a sale is as set out in Rule 1.17.

OPINION 1169 (07/08/2019)

TOPIC: Town Supervisor; Law Practice; Conflict of Interest

DIGEST: Subject to any law or regulation governing the office, a public official may engage in the private practice of law, provided that the public official does not represent any private client in a matter involving the official's jurisdiction, does not participate in any matter in which the lawyer participated personally and substantially while in private practice; does not negotiate for private representation on matters with the jurisdiction in which the official would have a role; avoids the use of public office to obtain special treatment for a private client, to influence a tribunal in favor of a client, or to receive consideration from anyone in the guise of legal fees in order to influence official conduct; and does not represent a private client with interests adverse to a person about whom the official acquired confidential government information in a matter in which the information could be used to that person's material disadvantage.

RULES: 1.11(c), (d) and (f)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is an attorney in private practice in a Town, a municipal corporation, where the inquirer regularly represents business clients located within the boundaries of the municipality. The inquirer wishes to seek public office as Town Supervisor, the powers of which could potentially affect some private clients.

QUESTIONS:

2. May a lawyer continue to represent private clients located within a Town while serving as Town Supervisor?

3. May a lawyer represent private clients before the Town Board, Planning Board, Zoning Board of Appeals, Town Court, or any town departments while serving as Town Supervisor?

4. Are there any other ethical restrictions on a lawyer's private practice of law as a result of serving as Town Supervisor?

OPINION:

5. Rule 1.11(d) of the N.Y. Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") says:

> Except as law may otherwise expressly provide, a lawyer currently serving as a public officer or employee shall not:
> > (1) participate in a matter in which the lawyer participated personally and substantially while in private practice or nongovernmental employment, unless under applicable law no one is, or by lawful delegation may be, authorized to act in the lawyer's stead in the matter; or

> (2) negotiate for private employment with any person who is involved as a party or as lawyer for a party in a matter in which the lawyer is participating personally and substantially.

6. As Rule 1.11(d) makes clear, any law or regulation governing the conduct of a current governmental official has priority over the Rules. "[E]ven if conduct is not prohibited by Rule 1.11(d), it may still be prohibited or regulated by statutes or ethics codes. Consequently, before a lawyer in public service analyzes Rule 1.11(d), the lawyer should research statutes, ethics codes, and other authorities that apply to government lawyers, since those authorities will trump Rule 1.11." R. Simon & N. Hyland, Simon's New York Rules of Professional Conduct Annotated 793 (2017 ed.)

7. For example, the General Municipal Law authorizes municipal corporations to regulate the conduct of officials – for instance, in a Code of Ethics – that would override any inconsistent provisions of the Rules. Provisions regulating the extent of outside employment by a town official may also appear in the Public Officers Law, the Municipal Home Rule Law, and the Town Law. This list is not intended to be exhaustive of potentially applicable rules, as other rules may bear on the Town Supervisor's ability to engage in a private law practice. This Committee's jurisdiction is limited to interpreting the Rules, and thus we do not address here the applicability of other laws that the lawyer must consult by the terms of Rule 1.11(d).

8. Rule 1.11(d) has two prongs. First, it generally prohibits a government officer or employee from participating in a matter in which the lawyer participated personally and substantially while in private practice. This prohibition is subject to the "rule of necessity," which permits the official or employee to participate in a matter of public service even if he or she participated personally and substantially in the matter outside of government service if the official or employee in question is the only one who can possibly be authorized to act on a particular matter. See N.Y. State 968 ¶ 29 (2013). Thus, a lawyer serving as Town Supervisor must recuse himself or herself from any participation in, or discussion of, matters in which he was involved as a private attorney, even where, as here, the lawyer is playing a non-legal role in government, unless the elements of necessity apply.

9. The second prong of Rule 1.11(d) prohibits a government officer or employee from negotiating for private employment with any person who is involved as a party or as a lawyer for a party in a matter in which the lawyer is participating personally and substantially. This Rule limits a lawyer serving as Town Supervisor from taking on the representation of private clients with regular business with the Township, as the lawyer serving as Town Supervisor would be prohibited from negotiating a retention with any party involved in matters in which the Town Supervisor would have a role.

10. Rule 1.11(f) also governs the conduct of lawyers in public office. The Rule states that a lawyer who holds public office shall not:

> (1) use the public position to obtain, or attempt to obtain, a special advantage in legislative matters for the lawyer or for a client under circumstances where the lawyer knows or it is obvious that such action is not in the public interest;
> (2) use the public position to influence, or attempt to influence, a tribunal to act in favor of the lawyer or of a client; or

> (3) accept anything of value from any person when the lawyer knows or it is obvious that the offer is for the purpose of influencing the lawyer's action as a public official.

11. N.Y. State 1056 (2015) discussed the circumstances under which a County Clerk may engage in the private practice of law. There, we commented that, as a public official seeking to engage in private practice, the County Clerk's conduct was governed by Rules 1.11(d) and (f). We noted:

> Subject to any overriding law or regulation governing the office, a county clerk may engage in the private practice of law provided the clerk does not participate in any way in any matter before the clerk's office in which the clerk is personally and substantially involved in private practice, and avoids use of the public office to obtain special treatment for a private client, to influence a tribunal in favor of a client, or to receive consideration from anyone in the guise of legal fees to influence official conduct.

12. In N.Y. State 510 (1979), we considered whether a deputy Town Supervisor could represent private clients in tax certiorari or other proceedings involving the Town. We concluded that, because the deputy Town Supervisor would assume the duties of the Town Supervisor in the Town Supervisor's absence or inability to act, he could not participate in any litigation involving the Town on behalf of a private client. We commented:

> As an official charged with preserving the funds of the town, the representation of a private client whose interest is to reduce his taxes, or to obtain a judgment against the town, or to prevent a judgment by the town against him, would place the deputy in a position where his duty to his client conflicts with his duty toward the town. Such a conflict should be avoided . . . Even if the conflict were less direct, the deputy should avoid the appearance of impropriety which would inevitably arise from his representation of a party who might receive some benefit to the disadvantage of the town.

13. This analysis applies with greater force to the Town Supervisor, who is primarily charged with preserving the funds of the Town. In such a position, the Town Supervisor cannot represent any private client whose interests may be adverse to those of the Town.

14. We further commented, quoting N.Y. State 431 (1976):

> Rules disqualifying lawyers who are part-time officials from accepting private clients in certain situations are designed to serve two basic purposes. Primarily the disqualification rules serve to prevent private clients from retaining a part-time public official in the hope of gaining some improper advantage by reason of his lawyer's public office. In addition the rules are designed to prevent public suspicion that the client may be gaining some improper advantage by retaining the public official.

15. The prohibitions of Rules 1.11(f)(1) and (3) are clear. They prohibit a lawyer from using his or her position as Town Supervisor to obtain special treatment for a private client, unless the official could make a good faith judgment that the client's interests accord with the public interest. Likewise, the Town Supervisor's use of a private law practice as a vehicle to receive anything of value to influence an official judgment would run afoul of the Rules.

16. Rule 1.11(c) places further restrictions on the conduct of lawyers who are public officers or employees. It provides, in relevant part:

> Except as law may otherwise expressly provide, a lawyer having information that the lawyer knows is confidential government information about a person, acquired when the lawyer was a public officer or employee, may not represent a private client whose interests are adverse to that person in a matter in which the information could be used to the material disadvantage of that person. As used in this Rule, the term 'confidential government information' means information that has been obtained under governmental authority and that, at the time this Rule is applied, the government is prohibited by law from disclosing to the public or has a legal privilege not to disclose, and that is not otherwise available to the public.

17. Thus, to the extent that a lawyer serving as Town Supervisor has access to confidential government information about any person as a result of the lawyer's status as a public officer or employee, the lawyer may be disqualified from representing private clients with interests adverse to that person in any matter in which the information could be used to that person's material disadvantage. This provision applies even if the lawyer did no work on a matter and came across the confidential government information by happenstance. This Rule applies only when the lawyer has confidential government information, and does not operate with respect to information that merely could be imputed to the lawyer.

CONCLUSION:

18. In sum, while Rule 1.11 does not prohibit the inquirer from representing private clients located within the Township while he is serving as Town Supervisor, subject to any further restrictions under applicable law, the inquirer cannot represent any private client in a matter involving the Town and should not participate, in his role as a public official, in any matter in which he participated personally and substantially while in private practice. Additionally, the inquirer may not negotiate for private employment with any party involved in matters with the Township in which he would have a role. The inquirer should also avoid the use of his public office to obtain special treatment for a private client, to influence a tribunal in favor of a client, or to receive consideration from anyone in the guise of legal fees in order to influence official conduct. Finally, if the inquirer acquires confidential government information about any person, the inquirer may not represent a private client with interests adverse to that person in a matter in which the information could be used to that person's material disadvantage.

TOPIC: Conflict of Interest; village attorney

DIGEST: A Village Attorney who does not represent the Village in court or in criminal matters, may represent private clients in defense of traffic violations, criminal proceedings, or Town Ordinance violation cases brought in the same Town Court that adjudicates such matters arising from summonses issued and arrests that occurred within the Village boundaries, provided that the lawyer adheres to rules governing conflicts and current government employees.

RULES: 1.7(a)(1), 1.7(a)(2), 1.11(c), 1.11(d) and 1.11(f)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is the Village Attorney, appointed annually, for an incorporated Village that has no Village Justice Court or separate Village Police Department. The inquirer attends bi-monthly meetings of the Village Board, advising on a variety of legal matters, but maintains a separate private legal practice. The inquirer does not represent the Village in Town Justice Court, where Village Ordinance violation cases are adjudicated. The Town Justice Court also adjudicates Vehicle and Traffic Law ("VTL") and criminal cases where summonses were issued or arrests were made by a police department that patrols the entire Town, including the geographic area of the Village located wholly within Town boundaries. VTL violation and other criminal cases are prosecuted by the District Attorney for the county.

2. The Town Justice Court is located in a building owned by the Town. The expenses of operating and maintaining the Town Justice Court, including the salary of the two elected Town Justices, are paid exclusively by the Town. The Village receives some revenue as a result of the disposition of certain criminal charges in which the Town and Village share monetary fines, as well as fines generated by the disposition of Village Ordinance violations that are adjudicated in the Town Justice Court. There is a formula that governs the allocation, between the Town and the Village, of the fines collected in the Town Justice Court arising from violations in the Village. With respect to any given offense, that formula may be fixed by statute, or it may be the product of an agreement between the Town and Village. The percentages allocated in the formula may also differ depending on the particular offense, or category of offense. In addition, the total amount of the fines that are annually distributed to the Village may be substantial or nominal in relation to the overall Village budget.

3. The vast majority of cases pending on the VTL and criminal dockets are resolved by plea negotiation. Not only the amount of the fines, but the particular government entities that receive a portion of the fines, will depend on the particular statutes or ordinances to which the defendant has pled guilty.

4. In private practice, the inquirer appears in Town Justice Court defending only clients who are facing charges that do not involve the Village.

QUESTION:

5. May the inquirer continue to represent persons charged with crimes, VTL violations or other offenses prosecuted by the District Attorney or Town Attorney in the Town Justice Court?

OPINION:

6. The question posed implicates Rules 1.7 and 1.11 of the N.Y. Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules").

Rule 1.7

7. Rule 1.7(a)(1) prohibits simultaneous representation of two clients where a reasonable attorney would conclude that "the representation will involve the lawyer in representing differing interests." "Differing interests" are defined by Rule 1.0(f) to include "every interest that will adversely affect either the judgment or the loyalty of a lawyer to a client, whether it be conflicting, inconsistent, diverse or other interest." Rule 1.7(a)(2) prohibits a lawyer from representing a client if "there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests."

8. Here, we are told that, in matters in which the offense occurred in the Village, a formula exists to allot any fine between the Village and the Town, and that most dispositions are products of plea bargaining. We assume for our purposes that the Village Attorney is familiar with the formula.

9. In representing clients in the Town Justice Court, a Village Attorney in private practice may have the opportunity to guide and cause a client to reach a negotiated disposition that is less favorable to the private client but more favorable to the Village, even though the Village is not a party to the matter, because that disposition will produce a greater dollar return for the Village when the fine is paid and apportioned. Conversely, the lawyer may have an opportunity to negotiate a disposition that is less favorable to the Village in order to enhance a relationship with a private client. This engages the lawyer in representing "differing interests" and could create a risk that the Village Attorney's own financial or business interests could adversely influence the lawyer's concurrent representations of the private client and the Village.

10. If a reasonable attorney would conclude, based on the factors discussed, that there is a "significant risk" that the professional judgment of the Village Attorney when acting on behalf of private clients might be adversely affected by a desire to advance one or the other of the competing interests of the private client or Village, then the representation of the private client in Town Justice Court would be permissible only if the conditions of Rule 1.7(b) are met. Three are relevant here: first, that the Village Attorney reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to both the Village and the private client; second, that the representation is not prohibited by law; and third, that each affected client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing. We note that a number of state and local laws, regulations, codes, and ordinances govern the conduct of municipal officials, any one which, if proscribing the proposed conduct, would override the Rules. Our jurisdiction does not extend to interpreting these legal issues, so we assume for our purposes that no law prohibits the Village Attorney from representing private clients in the Town Court. On that assumption, we see no reason why, if the lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer may competently and diligently represent the interests of the lawyer's concurrent clients, the lawyer may not seek informed consent from each client, confirmed in writing, to represent private clients in the Town Court.

11. Rule 1.11 sets forth restrictions on a lawyer currently serving as a public officer or employee. Rule 1.11(c) prohibits a lawyer from using confidential information about a person, acquired in the course of government employment, from representing a person in a matter in which the information could be used to the material disadvantage of that person. Rule 1.11(d) forbids a lawyer, subject to contrary law, from participating in a matter in which the lawyer participated personally and substantially while in private or nongovernmental practice, or from negotiating for private employment with any person involved as a party or a lawyer for a party in a matter in which the government lawyer is participating personally and substantially. Rule 1.11(f) says that a lawyer shall not: use a public position to obtain, or attempt to obtain, a special advantage in legislative matters for the lawyer or a client if the lawyer knows or it is obvious that the legislative proposal is not in the public interest; use a public position to influence, or attempt to influence, a tribunal to act in favor of the lawyer or a client; or accept anything of value for the purpose of influencing the lawyer's action as a public official.

12. To anticipate every possible circumstances in which one or more of these proscriptions may come into play is not possible. The Village Law gives the mayor and its governing body powers over a variety of matters, on which presumably the Village Attorney may be called upon to advise. Village Law §§ 101 et seq. These powers may include adoption of budgets; setting of taxes and fees; zoning and building permits; village road maintenance, speed limits, and repair; local improvements; managing village properties; and the like. Id. It is our understanding that the overwhelming number of villages in New York are located within the boundaries of a single town, and that arrangements between these towns and villages vary widely. For example, some villages have their own police or village justices; the inquirer's village, it seems, does not. Apart from the facts set forth in the inquiry, we are not informed of the range of powers the village has reserved for itself.

13. Mindful of this limitation on our ability to set hard rules, we think a few obvious illustrations may be useful. For instance, a lawyer who acquires confidential information about a building zone matter involving a village resident may not use that information to the detriment of that resident owing to the interests of the lawyer's private client. A Village Attorney may not advise the Village on a matter involving property improvements in which the lawyer personally and substantially represented a private client on that same property, nor may the lawyer seek private employment from a client arising out of, say, a local ordinance in which the Village Attorney counseled the Village. A Village Attorney must forebear from advising a private client about a prospective local law of special interest to that client, nor seek to use the lawyer's influence as Village Attorney to affect an outcome in the Town Court or any other tribunal (including a zoning board) on behalf of a private client. It goes without saying that the Village Attorney may not accept anything of value to influence the lawyer's exercise of that role.

CONCLUSION:

14. A Village Attorney who does not represent the Village in court or in criminal matters is not ethically prohibited from representing private clients in defense of Vehicle and Traffic Law violations, criminal proceedings, or Town Ordinance violation cases brought in the Town Justice Court, funded exclusively by the Town, that adjudicates Village Ordinance violations, provided that no unconsented financial or business conflicts of interest exist under Rule 1.7(a)(2), and provided that the provisions on current government employees in Rule 1.11 are respected.

OPINION 1171 (08/26/2019)

TOPIC: Deceptive Conduct – Assisting foreign clients to make investments that are subject to foreign currency controls

DIGEST: A lawyer may not engage in deceptive conduct to help clients in foreign countries circumvent currency controls of that country.

RULES: 1.2(d), 8.4(b), 8.4(c)

FACTS:

1. The inquiring lawyer is admitted in New York and in no other extraterritorial or U.S. jurisdiction. The inquirer represents four companies in a multi-step transaction to invest funds now located in China to acquire an interest in an enterprise for a project in the U.S. We are informed that the amount of the funds at issue exceeds the strict limits imposed by China's currency control laws for transfer out of China, would not be permissible under the law of China, and could potentially subject the transferor to criminal liability in China.

2. There are four companies involved in the proposed transaction. Two of them – we will call them Company A and Company B – are each a U.S. corporation commonly owned or controlled by U.S. citizens or holders of Lawful Permanent Resident Cards, popularly known as green cards; Company B is located (or is doing business) in China. The other two companies – for convenience, Company C and Company D – are each a Chinese corporation commonly owned or controlled by citizens of China; Company D is located (or is doing business) in the U.S.

3. The proposed transaction would involve three steps. First, the U.S.-owned and U.S.–based Company A would transfer U.S. dollars to the inquirer's escrow account. Second, after giving notice of the receipt of those U.S. dollars, the inquirer would instruct the Chinese-owned and Chinese–based Company C to wire Chinese funds (renminbi or "RMB"), in an amount equivalent to U.S. dollars in the inquirer's escrow account into a Chinese bank account of the U.S.-owned but China-based Company B. Third, following that wire transfer, the U.S. dollars in the inquirer's escrow account would be released to the U.S. bank account of the Chinese-owned but U.S.-based Company D. The inquirer represents to us that Company C has a bona fide investment motive for providing funds to Company D. The inquirer denies knowledge, however, on whether Company A has a bona fide investment motive for providing funds to Company B. This much is clear: By this arrangement, the U.S.-owned and U.S.–based Company A would be financing the Chinese-owned and Chinese–based Company C's investment in the Chinese-owned but U.S.-based Company D.

4. The inquirer proposes to charge a fee such as 1% or 2% of the amount held in escrow.

QUESTIONS:

5. May a lawyer help a client in a foreign country invest in a United States company, despite currency controls imposed by the foreign country, using the lawyer's escrow account in a way that avoids direct payment from the investing client to the United States company?

6. If so, may the lawyer charge a fee calculated as a percentage of the amount in escrow?

OPINION:

7. Rule 8.4(c) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") provides: "A lawyer or law firm shall not . . . engage in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation . . . ."

8. The terms "dishonesty," "deceit," and "misrepresentation" are not defined in the Rules, but in Rule 1.0(i) there is a definition of "fraud":

> "Fraud" or "fraudulent" denotes conduct that is fraudulent under the substantive or procedural law of the applicable jurisdiction or has a purpose to deceive, provided that it does not include conduct that, although characterized as fraudulent by statute or administrative rule, lacks an element of scienter, deceit, intent to mislead, or knowing failure to correct misrepresentations that can be reasonably expected to induce detrimental reliance by another.

Application of Rule 8.4(c)

9. We begin by reviewing some facts relevant to whether the proposed conduct would involve dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation.

10. The proposed money transfers, taken together, would have a net effect equivalent to (a) a transfer of dollars from Company A to Company B, and (b) a transfer of dollars from Company C to Company D, even though such a transfer, if made directly, would be prohibited by the Chinese laws in question. There are connections among the parties: Companies A and B are commonly owned, as are Companies C and D, and all four are represented by the same attorney. Company C, located in China and subject to Chinese currency controls, has a genuine motive to invest in the United States project of Company D. Such an investment, even though prohibited in direct form by those controls, would in effect be achieved indirectly through the proposed combination of transfers. In addition to the economic analysis that supports that characterization, the inquiry clearly acknowledges that the proposed transfers are motivated by the desire of Company C to invest in Company D's project in the United States. Although there would also effectively be a corresponding transfer from Company A to Company B, nothing in the facts as presented suggests any genuine motive for investment between those two companies. Notably, the amount of the proposed "investment" by Company A in Company B would be exactly equal to the investment by Company C, and therefore not dictated by any investment considerations of Company A.

11. These facts lead to the conclusion that the proposed conduct would have the purpose and effect of allowing Companies A and B, and their purported investments, to be used to circumvent applicable currency controls. The inquirer's proposed use of an attorney escrow account would be an important part of this scheme. The goal of this scheme would be to disguise the true nature of the money transfers and deceive government authorities and counter-parties In our view, the inquiry proposes sham conduct that would involve dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation.

Possible application of other Rules

12. Because we conclude that Rule 8.4(c) answers the primary question, we need not resolve whether two other Rules that have to do with "illegal" conduct also apply. One of those Rules provides:

> A lawyer shall not counsel a client to engage, or assist a client, in conduct that the lawyer knows is illegal or fraudulent, except that the lawyer may discuss the legal consequences of any proposed course of conduct with a client.

Rule 1.2(d); see Rule 1.0(i) (definition of "fraudulent").

13. The other is Rule 8.4(b), which provides: "A lawyer or law firm shall not . . . engage in illegal conduct that adversely reflects on the lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness as a lawyer."

14. These Rules are ambiguous in failing to explain whether the Rules apply only to conduct that is illegal under the laws of the United States or its political subdivisions, or extend their reach to conduct illegal under the law of a foreign country. The Rules do not explicitly distinguish between domestic and foreign law, nor do the relevant Comments. Arguments may be made in favor of either outcome. Nevertheless, we have been unable to locate a single ethics authority – case law, treatises, ethics opinions, and the like – in which a suggestion arises in which a lawyer may be held accountable for conduct in violation of the law solely of a foreign country without any attendant violation of the laws of the United States and its states and territories. A commentator who discusses the point argues that the Model Rules should be changed to clarify the point. Mike Donaldson, "Lawyers and the Panama Papers: How Ethical Rules Contribute to the Problem and Might Provide a Solution," 22 Law & Bus. Rev. of the Americas 363, 372 (2016); id. at 372 n.49 (citing letter from John Leubsdorf and William Simon to Global Witness, "Professional Responsibility Assessment of Lawyer Interview Transcripts" (2015)). Because the current inquiry does not require an answer to this question, we leave its consideration to a future day.

15. Having concluded that the proposed conduct is impermissible, we have no occasion to consider the secondary question: whether ethics provisions including Rule 1.5(a) would permit a fee for those services to be calculated as a percentage of the amount in escrow.

CONCLUSION:

A lawyer may not engage in deceptive conduct to assist a client in a foreign country to carry out a scheme to circumvent currency controls of that country by making sham investments.

OPINION 1172 (10/03/2019)

TOPIC: Referral fees; retired lawyer

DIGEST: A retiring lawyer may ask for a referral fee, from the attorney who agrees to safe keep wills drafted by the lawyer, with respect to new representations of the testators or estates, if the retiring lawyer will assume joint responsibility for the subsequent representations, which may only occur if the lawyer maintains his registration as a lawyer.

RULES: 1.5(g), 1.17, 5.1, 5.4(a), 8.4(a).

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a practicing attorney who is about to retire. The inquirer has turned over to another attorney (the custodial attorney) several original wills the inquirer had prepared for clients. The inquirer's firm had been holding them for safekeeping, but the firm no longer handles wills and estate matters. The custodial attorney previously practiced with the inquirer's firm, but had moved to another firm by the time of the transfer.

QUESTION:

2. If the wills the inquirer turned over to the custodial attorney evolve into estate work for the custodial attorney, may the custodial attorney pay the inquirer a referral fee, in the amount of a percentage of the fee that the custodial attorney receives?

OPINION:

3. This Committee does not answer questions about the conduct of a lawyer other than the inquirer, and, technically, this inquiry concerns the conduct of the custodial lawyer, not the inquirer. Accordingly, we will consider the question to be whether the inquirer may ask for or accept such a referral fee. See Rule 1.5(g) (rule on sharing fees applies to both the payor and the recipient); Rule 8.4(a) (a lawyer shall not induce another to violate the Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules")).

4. This opinion assumes that the clients whose wills were turned over to the custodial attorney consented to that action, or that the custodial attorney will read the wills only to the extent necessary to notify the testators and ask for further instructions. See N.Y. State 1035 ¶¶ 11-13 (2014) (obligations of a lawyer who received wills when purchasing a law practice); N.Y. State 1002 ¶ 5 (2014) (obligations of lawyer who is executor of estate of deceased lawyer with respect to wills possessed by deceased lawyer).

Referral Fees

5. We have long held that the mere forwarding of a client to another lawyer is not a proper basis for fee splitting. See, e.g., N.Y. State 414 (1975). Referral fees are explicitly restricted under the Rules. Rule 1.5(g) prohibits a lawyer from dividing a fee for legal services with another lawyer who is not associated in the same law firm unless the following conditions are met:

(1) the division is in proportion to the services performed by each lawyer, or, by a writing given to the client, each lawyer assumes joint responsibility for the representation;

(2) the client agrees to employment of the other lawyer after a fully disclosure that a division of fees will be made, including the share each lawyer will receive, and the client's agreement is confirmed in writing; and

(3) the total fee is not excessive.

6. Here, the inquirer has already drafted the wills and has been paid for those legal services. If the testators or their heirs ask the custodial attorney to provide additional legal services – for example, amending a will or providing services in connection with the administration of the estate – the inquirer, who will be retired, presumably will not be providing any services and therefore would not be entitled to a division of fees in proportion to the services performed for the new representation.

7. We therefore address whether the inquirer could become entitled to share in the legal fees for the new representation by assuming joint responsibility for the representation. Comment [7] to Rule 1.5 provides: "Joint responsibility for the representation entails financial and ethical responsibility for the representation as if the lawyers were associated in a partnership."

8. Whether the inquirer could assume joint responsibility under the facts here would depend on whether the inquirer is not only retiring from his law firm but also giving up the ability to practice law for compensation. There are three ways that an attorney who ceases the active practice of law may structure a relationship with the Office of Court Administration. The first (continued registration) is to continue his or her biennial attorney registration, filing the required form, paying the required fee, and completing the mandatory continuing legal education requirement. This allows the attorney to continue to undertake representations. The second method is by changing his or her registration status to "retired" under Section 118.1(g) of the Rules of the Chief Administrative Judge, 22 NYCRR §118.1(g). Such lawyers are exempt from payment of the biennial registration fee and from compliance with the mandatory CLE requirement, but they may render legal services only without compensation. The third method (voluntary resignation) involves filing an amendment to the attorney's registration form withdrawing his or her registration. Such a filer is no longer considered an attorney. See, e.g., www.nycourts.gov/courts/ad2/attorneymatters_VoluntaryResignation.shtml.

9. We believe the inquirer could assume joint responsibility for a representation only if the lawyer opts for continued registration. Rule 5.4(a) generally prohibits a lawyer from sharing legal fees with a non-lawyer. Moreover, we have held that, in order to agree to joint responsibility for a representation, a lawyer must be able to provide legal services to the client. For example, a lawyer may not agree to joint responsibility with another lawyer if the other lawyer has a non-consentable conflict of interest (N.Y. State 745 (2001)), the other lawyer has been suspended (N.Y. State 334 (1974)), or the other lawyer has been disbarred (N.Y. State 609 (1990)). Similarly, neither "retired" status nor voluntary resignation would enable the inquirer to provide legal services to a client. See N.Y. State 1160 ¶¶ 3-4 (2019) (not proper for a New York attorney to share fees with a lawyer who, though resident in New York, is not admitted to practice in New York, if the sharing of fees as a matter of law would constitute the unauthorized practice of law.)

10. Assuming that the inquirer's status is "continued registration" at the time the custodial attorney provides services to the client, we believe the inquirer could meet the requirements of the second clause of Rule 1.5(g)(1).

Sale of a Law Practice

11. Rule 1.17 authorizes a lawyer who retires from the private practice of law to sell his or her law practice, including goodwill, to one or more lawyers or law firms, as long as the lawyer complies with the conditions set forth in that rule. In N.Y. State 961 ¶¶ 3-5 (2013) we said that a retiring lawyer may sell his or her law practice contingent upon receiving a percentage of legal fees collected by the purchaser if the payment either (1) is in proportion to the services performed by the selling lawyer prior to the sale, or (2) fairly represents the value of the "goodwill" of the retiring lawyer. In particular, the payment for "goodwill" that is permitted by Rule 1.17 permits a payment that is made in the future after the fees that reflect "goodwill" are earned. Rule 1.17 does not apply here because the inquirer is not selling all or part of his law practice. The inquirer has already transferred the will files, in return for the custodial attorney's agreement to maintain the files.

CONCLUSION:

12. A lawyer who drafted wills for clients and who, upon retirement, transferred the original wills to another lawyer outside the retiring lawyer's firm for custody, may request and accept a referral fee from the second lawyer if holding the wills results in a new representation for the second lawyer, but only if the retiring lawyer will assume joint responsibility for the subsequent representations within the meaning of Rule 1.5(g), which may only occur if the inquirer maintains his registration as a lawyer.

TOPIC: Advertising and Letterhead: Listing of N.Y. admission on out-of-state letterhead

DIGEST: A New York lawyer admitted in one or more other jurisdictions may properly list the lawyer's admission to the New York bar on professional or law firm letterhead, even though the lawyer does not maintain a law office in New York, provided the lawyer makes clear to prospective and existing clients the limits on the lawyer's ability to practice within this State.

RULES: 7.1(a)(1); 7.1(b)(1); 7.5(a)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a lawyer admitted to practice in New York and in an adjacent jurisdiction. The inquirer is affiliated solely with a law firm with offices only in that adjacent state, and none in New York.

QUESTION:

2. May a lawyer admitted to practice in two or more jurisdictions (including New York) permissibly list the lawyer's admission in New York, even though the lawyer does not have a law office in New York?

OPINION:

3. Our answer is yes, with a caveat. Lawyers and law firms are permitted to advertise their services provided that their advertisements do not contain statements or claims that are "false, deceptive or misleading." RPC 7.1(a)(1). Rule 7.1(b)(1) of the N.Y. Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") says that a lawyer may properly include in an advertisement information concerning a lawyer's bar admissions. In N.Y. State 637 (1992), which was decided under the predecessor of the Rules, the Code of Professional Responsibility (the "Code"), we said that "a lawyer who is admitted to practice law in another state may indicate this fact on a letterhead or card. DR 2-101(C)(1) [the forerunner of Rule 7.1 (b)(1)] permits the inclusion of 'dates of admission to any bar' in lawyer publicity. Even without this provision, there is nothing inherently false or misleading in truthfully identifying the jurisdictions in which a lawyer is licensed to practice law." No difference exists between the Rules and the Code on this point.

4. Rule 7.5(a) provides that lawyers and law firms may use websites, business cards, professional announcements and office signs, as well as letterhead and similar professional notices, provided that they "do not violate any statute or court rule and are in accordance with Rule 7.1." Rule 7.5(a) is substantially similar to DR 2-102(a) of the Code. The fundamental principle for all forms of attorney advertising and other communications with the public is that they may not be "false, deceptive or misleading." In our view, a letterhead accurately stating that a lawyer is a "Member of the Bars of [X State] and New York is not engaged in false, deceptive or misleading conduct.

5. Our sole caveat is that a lawyer listing admission in New York but lacking an office located in New York must explain to prospective and existing clients the limits that the absence of a New York office imposes on the lawyer to engage in practice in New York. For example, Judiciary Law § 470 requires that a lawyer practicing in New York must have a physical office located here – that is, a brick-and-mortar workplace – and, in Schoenefeld v. Schneiderman, 821 F.3d 273 (2nd Cir. 2016), the Court of Appeals held that this requirement does not violate the U.S. Constitution. Hence, while a lawyer may list a New York admission on an out-of-state firm's letterhead (and other advertising), the lawyer who wishes to practice within our borders must fully comply with all legal and regulatory provisions governing practice within this State.

6. Nothing in this opinion is intended to address the ethics of the inquirer's proposed conduct under the rules governing lawyers in the other jurisdiction where the lawyer is admitted.

CONCLUSION:

7. A New York lawyer admitted in one or more other jurisdictions may properly list the lawyer's admission to the New York Bar on professional or law firm letterhead, even though the lawyer does not maintain a law office in New York, provided that the lawyer discloses to prospective and existing clients the limits placed on the lawyer's ability to practice in New York without an office here.

OPINION 1174 (10/15/2019)

TOPIC: Conflicts of interest; lawyer advocating as amicus for one side of litigation while other lawyers in same firm advocate as amicus for other side.

DIGEST: Attorneys at a law firm are not permitted to submit amicus briefs for both sides of a litigation when representing a client as amicus for one or the other side, but, in the absence of a represented client may do solely on a pro se basis.

RULES: 1.2(a); 1.7; 1.8; 1.9; 1.10(a); 1.7(b)(3); 1.7(a)(2),

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is an attorney at a law firm. The law firm circulated a proposal for attorneys to volunteer pro bono legal services supporting a particular position, and preparing an amicus brief advocating that position, for submission to the Supreme Court of the United States.

2. The response of the attorneys at the firm was mixed. Some associates favored one side of the issue before the Court, while others wished to take the opposing view. The law firm proposed creating two mutually exclusive teams to work on their respective positions, with each group submitting its own amicus brief.

QUESTION:

3. May attorneys from a single law firm submit amicus briefs on opposing sides of the same issue before the same court?

OPINION:

4. Even with amicus briefs, an attorney is generally not submitting them on his or her own behalf, but, either individually or as a firm, is doing legal work for a client, be it for compensation or pro bono.

5. Once an attorney enters into an attorney-client relationship, then all the elements of the N.Y. Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") applicable to such representations apply. These include Rule 1.2(a), which says that, subject to certain exceptions not apposite here, "a lawyer shall abide by a client's decisions concerning the objectives of representation." See Rule 1.2(a), Cmt. [1] ("[p]aragraph (a) confers upon the client the ultimate authority to determine the purposes to be served by legal representation"). If, for instance, a client wants attorneys at the law firm to advocate a particular position as an amicus, in support of either an appellant or an appellee, debate within the firm may be had about how most effectively to do so. By way of example, the division into two mutually exclusive teams to work on opposing sides may be a useful tool to hone a brief, test the strongest arguments for each position, and assess the weaknesses of relying on certain precedents or claims.

6. Equally applicable once a law firm establishes an attorney-client relationship are the Rules governing conflicts set out in Rules 1.7, 1.8, and 1.9, each of which is imputed to all lawyers in the firm under the standards set forth in Rule 1.10(a). N.Y. State 968 ¶ 18 (2013). Opinion 968 addressed a situation in which government attorneys inquired regarding their ability to defend their agency in proceedings challenging agency actions to which they themselves were subject, including challenges brought by their own fellow government attorneys. There, we concluded that the attorneys were permitted to do so, if consent were obtained, and if certain qualifications were met, including the defending attorneys not themselves being involved in challenging the agency actions.

7. The Opinion then continued: "There is one form of nonconsentable conflict that presents a different problem, and that is the situation presented by Rule 1.7(b)(3), which bars a lawyer from representing clients on both sides of the same litigation or other proceeding before a tribunal. Lawyer A cannot appear on both sides of a litigation, but can Lawyer A appear adverse to Lawyer B from the same law firm in that litigation? We think that such a situation would be governed by different considerations because litigation involves the interests not just of the affected client or clients but also of the public and the judiciary. For example, where a matter is in litigation, the appearance of lawyers from the same firm may deprive the judiciary and the public of the confidence that the adversary system, on which the development of the law depends, will function as it should." Id. ¶ 28. In Opinion 968, we did not address "that question with finality here, as the issue is not presented." Id. We explained in a footnote: "Rule 1.7(b)(3) by its terms only applies when lawyers are representing clients on both sides of the case. Here, the [opposing] lawyer . . . would be proceeding pro se, and would not be representing a client (other than him- or herself)." Id. fn. 11 (emphasis in original).

8. Here, we believe it necessary to resolve the issue left open in Opinion 968. Two scenarios occur to us as possibilities confronting the inquirer. One is that the inquirer's firm has one or more clients asking the firm to submit amicus briefs on opposing sides of the issue before the Court. We believe that the firm may not do so, for such a circumstance falls within the prohibition of Rule 1.7(b)(3). This is so whether the clients are outside clients or lawyers within the firm. A law firm may form an attorney-client relationship with one or more of its own lawyers. New York State 789 (2005). If the law firm forms such a relationship with one of its own attorneys for purposes of submitting an amicus brief, the same prohibition applies as if the client were an "outside" client.

9. The second scenario is the one to which the footnote in Opinion 968 referred, namely, that lawyers in a firm propose to appear pro se. "[L]awyers are as free as anyone else to pursue legal remedies . . . and they are not obligated . . . to retain other counsel in such pursuits. [Each] lawyer clearly may serve as [the lawyer's] own client." New York State 527 (1980). It is not for us to assess whether the firm's governing documents allow for such freelancing, but we see no ethical reason why attorneys may not appear in their own name (rather than in the name of the firm) as pro se amici on opposing sides of a question before the Court.

10. We suggest that the law firm consider whether the Supreme Court would expect attorneys appearing pro se on opposite sides of an issue to disclose that they are affiliated with the same firm, or at least disclose their law firm affiliation, for the affiliation could affect the Court's evaluation of the competing briefs.

CONCLUSION:

11. Attorneys at the law firm representing clients may not submit amicus briefs on opposing sides of an issue before the Supreme Court of the United States, but attorneys at the firm may in their individual capacities submit amicus briefs for opposite sides of an issue pro se.

OPINION 1175 (10/29/2019)

TOPIC: Withdrawal of guilty plea; allocation of authority between lawyer and client.

DIGEST: Once a lawyer has explained the material risks and chances of success of the withdrawal of a previously entered guilty plea to a criminal defendant, the lawyer must follow the decision of the client to withdraw the plea.

RULES: 1.2(a), 1.4, 3.1

FACTS:

1. The inquiring lawyer has been assigned as counsel to a criminal defendant who, while represented by previous counsel, had entered a guilty plea to a criminal charge with an understanding of the sentence to be imposed. On the date set for that sentencing, defendant did not appear and later was re-arrested on two misdemeanor charges. The sentencing was adjourned.

2. On the new date set for sentencing, the defendant discharged his prior attorney and advised the court that he wished to withdraw his prior guilty plea. On that same date, the inquirer was appointed by the court and the case adjourned to allow the inquirer to bring a motion to withdraw defendant's prior guilty plea.

3. The inquirer has obtained a transcript of the plea proceedings and interviewed prior counsel and finds nothing which would support the contention that the plea was not knowingly and voluntarily made. The inquirer is likewise convinced that the evidence would result in a guilty verdict if the matter were taken to trial and that if he withdraws his prior guilty plea he will not be afforded a drug treatment program that was in the previous plea agreement.

QUESTION:

4. Is a lawyer required to follow the client's decision to withdraw a guilty plea when the consequences of such withdrawal will result in a more severe sentencing of the defendant and the motion has little chance of success?

DISCUSSION:

5. Our jurisdiction is limited to interpreting the N.Y. Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"). It is our understanding that New York's Criminal Procedure Law section 220.60 (c) permits the withdrawal of a guilty plea at any time before sentencing upon the discretion of the court. Nothing in this opinion addresses the legal sufficiency of any argument under this section nor of the probability of success of a motion addressed to the court's discretion. Nor do we opine on constitutional issues that may arise under the Sixth Amendment concerning a client's rights in entering pleas. See, e.g., Missouri v. Frye, 566 U.S. 139 (2012); Lafler v. Cooper, 566 U.S. 156 (2012).

6. Rule 1.2(a) addresses the allocation of responsibility between a lawyer and client regarding pleas in criminal matters and states: "Subject to the provisions herein, a lawyer shall abide by a client's decisions concerning the objectives and as required by Rule 1.4, shall consult with the client as to the means by which they are to be pursued." Comment [1] to Rule 1.2 reinforces the point: "Paragraph (a) confers upon the client the ultimate authority to determine the purpose to be served by legal representation, within the limits imposed by law and the lawyer's professional obligations."

7. Rule 1.2(a) makes clear that, "in a criminal case, the lawyer shall abide by the client's decision, after consultation with the lawyer, as to," among other things, "the plea to be entered." The lawyer's ethical obligation is to consult with the client on the means of achieving the client's objectives and "to explain a matter to the extent reasonably necessary to permit the client to make informed decisions regarding the representation." Rule 1.4(b). Here, this includes the lawyer's assessment of the probability of success on any motion as well as any adverse consequences flowing from its denial. Having explained to the client the advantages and disadvantages of a particular objective the client desires, the lawyer has satisfied the lawyer's obligations under Rules 1.2 and 1.4. We detect no difference in Rule 1.2(a) between a decision to enter a particular plea and a decision later to seek to withdraw it. See generally Criminal Procedure Law §§ 220 et seq.

8. This Committee has extended the application of Rule 1.2(a) to a client's decision to enter a drug treatment program as part of the resolution of a criminal proceeding. In N.Y. State 1106 ¶ 20 (2016), we said: "Once the client makes his or her choice, whether it be to attend a treatment program or to go through the traditional criminal justice system, the lawyer must abide by that decision."

9. We note that a lawyer is always bound by Rule 3.1(a), which says that a "lawyer shall not bring or defend a proceeding, or assert or controvert an issue therein, unless there is a basis in law and fact for doing so that is not frivolous." The Rule continues: "A lawyer for a defendant in a criminal proceeding or for a respondent in a proceeding that could result in incarceration may nevertheless so defend the proceeding as to require that every element of the case be established."

CONCLUSION:

10. Once a lawyer has explained the material risks and chances of success of the withdrawal of a previously entered guilty plea to a criminal defendant, the lawyer must follow the decision of the client to withdraw the plea.

OPINION 1176 (10/29/2019)

TOPIC: Escrow Account

DIGEST: A lawyer may make nominal deposits of the lawyer's own funds into a trust or escrow account to avoid the account being closed for inactivity or failure to maintain minimum balance.

RULES: 1.15(a), (b)(1), (b)(3)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer's trust or escrow account has had a zero balance of funds for a period of time. The inquirer apprehends that the bank may close the account for inactivity or failure to maintain the requisite minimum balance. The inquirer is concerned that, if the inquirer deposits lawyer funds into the account to avoid bank sanction and thereafter receives client funds for deposit into the trust or escrow account, the inquirer could be impermissibly commingling funds.

QUESTION:

2. May a lawyer make a nominal deposit of the lawyer's own funds to avoid having the lawyer's trust or escrow account closed for inactivity or failure to maintain a minimum balance?

OPINION:

3. The N.Y. Rules of Professional Responsibility (the "Rules") regulate lawyer trust or escrow accounts in Rule 1.15. For current purposes, three provisions of Rule 1.15 govern the conclusion of the inquiry. First, a lawyer who is in possession of funds belonging to another person incident to the lawyer's practice of law shall maintain such funds in a banking institution . . . in accordance with the provisions of 22 N.Y.C.R.R. Part 1300. . . . Such funds shall be maintained, . . . in a special account or accounts, separate from any business or personal accounts of the lawyer . . ." Rule 1.15(b)(1). Second, "A lawyer in possession of any funds or other property belonging to another person, where such possession is incident to his or her practice of law . . . must not . . . commingle such funds or property with his or her own." Rule 1.15(a). See N.Y. State 1127 ¶ 3 (2017); N.Y. City 2014-3 (2014). As Comment [1] to Rule 1.15 provides, "All property that is the property of clients or third persons . . . must be kept separate from the lawyer's business and personal property . . ."

4. Third, and most pertinent to this inquiry, is Rule 1.15(b)(3), which says that funds "reasonably sufficient to maintain the account or to pay account charges may be deposited therein." This is simple common sense – that a lawyer may provide a cushion from the lawyer's own funds to maintain the account and cover account charges. This is no license to pad the account with the lawyer's money: the words "reasonably sufficient" mean than that a lawyer may pay into the account such amounts as may be reasonably adequate to meet whatever bank requirements exist to sustain the account, pay the bank's charges, and meet the minimal thresholds that the bank imposes for the account to endure. Amounts beyond those "reasonably sufficient" to maintain the account may cross the line of commingling. In light of the variety of possible banking requirements to maintain an account, no bright lines of dollars may be set to establish the amount constituting the scope of the what constitutes "reasonably sufficient," but we are confident that a lawyer who uses the lawyer's own funds to sustain the account within the bank's guidelines faces no fear of crossing the line into commingling.

CONCLUSION:

5. A lawyer may make nominal deposits in the lawyer's trust or escrow account to maintain the account or to pay account charges.

(26-19)

OPINION 1177 (11/08/2019)

TOPIC: Counseling clients in illegal conduct; medical marijuana law.

DIGEST: The Committee reaffirms its conclusion in N.Y. State 1024 (2014) that a lawyer may ethically assist a client in conduct designed to comply with New York's medical marijuana law.

RULES: 1.2(d).

FACTS:

1. In July 2014, New York, following the lead of 22 other states, adopted the Compassionate Care Act ("CCA"), a law permitting and regulating the cultivation, distribution, prescription, and use of marijuana for medical purposes. The CCA enables specially approved organizations such as hospitals and community health centers to dispense medical marijuana to patients who have been certified by a health care provider and who have registered with the state Department of Health, and provides further for the regulation and registration of organizations to manufacture and deliver marijuana for authorized medical uses.

2. Although federal criminal law forbids the possession, distribution, sale, or use of marijuana, the United States Department of Justice ("DOJ") does not enforce the law against individuals and entities engaged in the cultivation, transportation, delivery, prescription, or use of medical marijuana in accordance with state regulatory law. In 2013, the DOJ issued a memorandum (the "Cole Memo") restricting federal enforcement of the federal marijuana prohibition when individuals and entities act in accordance with state regulation of medical marijuana.

3. On September 29, 2014, this Committee issued Opinion 1024, which concluded that, "in light of current federal enforcement policy, the N.Y. Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") permit a lawyer to assist a client in conduct designed to comply with state medical marijuana law, notwithstanding that federal narcotics law prohibits the delivery, sale, possession and use of marijuana and makes no exception for medical marijuana." Id. ¶ 26. Opinion 1024 said, too, that "[i]f federal enforcement were to change materially, this Opinion might need to be reconsidered." Id. ¶ 25.

4. In December 2014, as part of a spending measure subject to periodic review, Congress enacted the Rohrabacher-Farr amendment (now known as the Rohrabacher-Blumenauer amendment, hereafter the "Rohrabacher Amendment"), which prohibits the DOJ from using any of the funds appropriated by Congress to prevent states with medical marijuana laws "from implementing their own State laws that authorize, the use, distribution, possession, or cultivation of medical marijuana." https://www.congress.gov/amendment/113th-congress/house-amendment/748/text. The Rohrabacher Amendment was the basis of the decision in United States v. McIntosh, 833 F.3d 1163 (9th Cir 2016), which prohibited the Department of Justice from prosecuting defendants who complied with their respective states' medical marijuana laws. Since 2014, Congress has continuously renewed the Rohrabacher Amendment (by healthy bipartisan majorities) in subsequent spending measures. Although the Cole Memo was rescinded by former Attorney General Jeff Sessions on January 4, 2018, General Sessions' successor, William Barr, said during his confirmation hearing that he would not target state legal marijuana businesses, and would leave it to Congress to act.

QUESTION:

5. Does the Committee adhere to its conclusion in Opinion 1024 that lawyers may assist clients in complying with New York's medical marijuana law?

OPINION:

6. The Committee concludes that, notwithstanding the Attorney General's rescission of the Cole Memo, the guidance provided in Opinion 1024 remains sound because, in light of the Rohrabacher Amendment, federal law and enforcement practice continue to permit New York to implement its medical marijuana law.

7. After providing extensive factual and legal background, which we need not repeat here, Opinion 1024 focused on the application of Rule 1.2(d), which provides: "A lawyer shall not counsel a client to engage, or assist a client, in conduct that the lawyer knows is illegal or fraudulent, except that the lawyer may discuss the legal consequences of any proposed course of conduct with a client." We observed that, as a general matter, "although a lawyer may not encourage a client to violate the law or assist a client in doing so, a lawyer may advise a client about the reach of the law," and that therefore "a lawyer may give advice about whether undertaking to manufacture, transport, sell, prescribe or use marijuana in accordance with the CCA's regulatory scheme would violate federal narcotics law." N.Y. State 1024 ¶ 21. We observed also that "Rule 1.2(d) forbids a lawyer from assisting a client in conduct only if the lawyer knows the conduct is illegal or fraudulent. If the lawyer believes that conduct is unlawful but there is some support for an argument that the conduct is legal, the lawyer may provide legal assistance under the Rules (but is not obligated to do so)." Id. ¶ 22 (emphasis in original). We then turned to "[t]he difficult question [that] arises if the lawyer knows that the client's proposed conduct, although consistent with state law, would violate valid and enforceable federal law." Id. ¶ 23 (emphasis in original).

8. On that question, we said that "[o]rdinarily, . . . while the lawyer could advise the client about the reach of the federal law and how to conform to the federal law, the lawyer could not properly encourage or assist the client in conduct that violates the federal law. That would ordinarily be true even if the federal law, although applicable to the client's proposed conduct, was not rigorously enforced and the lawyer anticipated that the law would not be enforced in the client's situation." Id. We reasoned, however, that "the situation is different where the state executive branch determines to implement the state legislation by authorizing and regulating medical marijuana, consistent with current, published federal executive-branch enforcement policy, and the federal government does not take effective measures to prevent the implementation of the state law. In that event, the question under Rule 1.2(d) is whether a lawyer may assist in conduct under the state medical marijuana law that the lawyer knows would violate federal narcotics law that is on the books but deliberately unenforced as a matter of federal executive discretion." Id.

9. In concluding that lawyers may assist clients in complying with New York's medical marijuana laws, we explained in part (id. ¶ 24):

> We do not believe that by adopting Rule 1.2(d), our state judiciary meant to declare a position on this debate or meant to preclude lawyers from counseling or assisting conduct that is legal under state law. Rule 1.2(d) was based on an ABA model and there is > no indication that anyone – not the ABA, not the state bar, and not the state court itself – specifically considered whether lawyers may serve in their traditional role in this unusual legal situation. We assume for purposes of this Opinion that state courts will themselves serve in their traditional role: As issues of interpretation arise in litigation under the CCA, state courts will be available to issue interpretive rulings and take other judicial action that has the practical effect of assisting in the implementation of the CCA. Serving this role will not undermine state judicial integrity. Similarly, we do not believe that it derogates from public respect for the law and lawyers, or otherwise undermines the objectives of the professional conduct rules, for lawyers as "officers of the court" to serve in their traditional role as well, if they so choose. Obviously, lawyers may decline to give legal assistance regarding the CCA.

10. The DOJ's rescission of the Cole Memo does not meaningfully change federal law enforcement policy. If anything, the adoption, continued approval, and implementation of the Rohrabacher Amendment reinforces our earlier conclusion. Not only does the DOJ continue to permit states to implement their medical marijuana laws, but federal legislation now prohibits the DOJ from preventing states from doing so.

11. Accordingly, we reaffirm our earlier conclusion that the Rules permit lawyers to give legal assistance regarding the CCA that goes beyond a mere discussion of the legality of the client's proposed conduct. "Implicitly, the state law authorizes lawyers to provide traditional legal services to clients seeking to act in accordance with the state law. . . . Nothing in the history and tradition of the profession, in court opinions, or elsewhere, suggests that Rule 1.2(d) was intended to prevent lawyers in a situation like this from providing assistance that is necessary to implement state law and to effectuate current federal policy." Id. ¶ 25

CONCLUSION:

12. In light of current federal policy, the Rules permit a lawyer to assist a client in conduct designed to comply with state medical marijuana law.

OPINION 1178 (12/13/2019)

Modifies NY State 678 (1996)

TOPIC: Lawyer as third-party neutral

DIGEST: A lawyer-mediator engaged in providing third-party neutral services is subject to Rule 2.4 but not the Rules that govern the representation of clients. As such, the lawyer-mediator is generally free to conduct the mediation in the way the lawyer thinks best, and to charge whatever fee may be appropriate, provided always that the lawyer fully discloses to the parties that the lawyer is acting as a disinterested mediator and not as counsel to any party, including the consequences of that difference. In the event of an agreement, the lawyer-mediator may memorialize the parties' understanding in a document and may appear as counsel for one party (but not both) in filing a divorce action if the other party gives informed consent confirmed in writing.

RULES: 1.5, 1.6, 1.7, 1.12, 2.4, 5.7

FACTS:

1. The inquiring lawyer intends to become a mediator and plans to focus on mediating cases involving parties who would otherwise seek a contested divorce. The lawyer-mediator anticipates that the parties may find that meeting individually to discuss the issues that need to be resolved in order to submit their agreement to the court would be beneficial given the antagonistic position between them.

2. The lawyer-mediator intends to charge an upfront, flat rate for the mediation services. The goal of those services is for the parties to resolve all of the issues necessary for the parties to be in a position to submit an uncontested divorce package. In the event that the parties discontinue using the lawyer as a mediator before all of the issues are resolved, the contract will provide that the parties will pay the lawyer-mediator an hourly rate for the services performed, charged against the upfront payment with any unused amount returned to the parties.

QUESTIONS:

3. In connection with setting up a mediation practice, the inquiring lawyer poses several questions:

> (a) May the lawyer-mediator meet with the parties individually to inform them of the various issues that need to be resolved in order to have a divorce granted in New York?
> (b) May the lawyer-mediator enter into a contract with the parties to provide mediation services? If so, may the contract provide for the payment of a flat rate by the parties in the event resolution is reached that results in an uncontested divorce packet but otherwise provides for the payment by the parties on an hourly basis if the parties discontinue the lawyer-mediator's services before all issues can be resolved?
> (c) What disclosures does the lawyer-mediator have to provide to parties to the mediation concerning her role as mediator?

(d) May the lawyer-mediator prepare documents, including a divorce action representing the parties, if the parties reach agreement?

OPINION:

4. Generally, lawyer-mediators are not engaged in the representation of a client and are not providing legal services to the parties to the mediation. See N.Y. State 999 ¶ 2 (2014); N.Y. State 1026 ¶ 6 (2014). Thus, the N.Y. Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") that apply when a lawyer represents a client do not necessarily apply in the context of a lawyer providing mediation services, including Rule 1.5 concerning fees, Rule 1.6 concerning confidentiality, and Rule 1.7 concerning conflicts, although lawyer-mediators should be aware that certain rules will continue to apply even in the absence of an attorney-client relationship. See Rule 5.7, Cmt. [4].

5. Instead, Rule 2.4 is directed to lawyers acting as third-party neutrals and provides:

> (a) A lawyer serves as a "third-party neutral" when the lawyer assists two or more persons who are not clients of the lawyer to reach a resolution of a dispute or other matter that has arisen between them. Service as a third-party neutral may include service as an arbitrator, a mediator or in such other capacity as will enable the lawyer to assist the parties to resolve the matter.
> (b) A lawyer serving as a third-party neutral shall inform unrepresented parties that the lawyer is not representing them. When the lawyer knows or reasonably should know that a party does not understand the lawyer's role in the matter, the lawyer shall explain the difference between the lawyer's role as a third party neutral and a lawyer's role as one who represents a client.

6. In terms of the required disclosure under Rule 2.4(b) stated above, we have noted that "[t]he precise content of the required conversation, and the exact information the lawyer-mediator will have to disclose to a party about the lawyer's role, may vary from one mediation to another." See N.Y. State 878 (2011). Comment [3] to Rule 2.4 provides some guidance:

> Unlike nonlawyers who serve as third-party neutrals, lawyers serving in this role may experience unique problems as a result of differences between the role of a third-party neutral and a lawyer's service as a client representative. The potential for confusion is significant when the parties are unrepresented in the process. Thus, paragraph (b) requires a lawyer-neutral to inform the unrepresented parties that the lawyer is not representing them. For some parties, particularly parties who frequently use dispute-resolution processes, this information will be sufficient. For others, particularly those who are using the process for the first time, more information will be required. Where appropriate, the lawyer should inform unrepresented parties of the important differences between the lawyer's role as a third-party neutral and as a client representative, including the inapplicability of the attorney-client evidentiary privilege. The extent of the disclosure required under this paragraph will depend on the particular parties involved and the subject matter of the proceeding, as well as the particular features of the dispute resolution process selected.

7. "Thus, unless all mediating parties are represented by counsel in the mediated matter, a lawyer-mediator must explain whatever needs to be explained to assure there is no confusion about the lawyer-mediator's role and the difference between a lawyer's role on behalf of a client and a mediator's role as a neutral." See N.Y. State 878 (2011).

8. There may also be times when it is not possible for the lawyer-mediator to provide an effective explanation regarding the difference between the role as a lawyer-mediator compared to a lawyer's role when representing a client. As we noted in N.Y. State 736 (2001), matrimonial mediation may be undertaken in many circumstances, but sometimes "the complex and conflicting interests involved in a particular matrimonial dispute, the difficult legal issues involved, the subtle legal ramifications of particular resolutions, and the inequality in bargaining power resulting from differences in personalities or sophistication of the parties make it virtually impossible to achieve a result free from later recriminations or bias or malpractice, unless both parties are represented by separate counsel. In the latter circumstances, informing the parties that the lawyer 'represents' neither and obtaining their consent, even after a full explanation of the risks, may not be meaningful; the distinction between representing both parties and not representing either, in such circumstances, may be illusory."

9. In addition, even though the confidentiality provisions of Rule 1.6 would not apply, a lawyer-mediator may be governed by other confidentiality obligations found in substantive laws (such as statutes or court rules) or private sources (such as ethics codes promulgated by mediation groups). See Rule 2.4, Cmt. [2] ("the lawyer may be subject to court rules or other law that applies either to third-party neutrals generally or to lawyers serving as third-party neutrals. Lawyer-neutrals may also be subject to various codes of ethics"); Rule 1.12, Cmt. [3] (lawyers who serve as third-party neutrals "typically owe the parties an obligation of confidentiality under law or codes of ethics governing third-party neutrals"); N.Y. State 1026 ¶ 7 (2014).

10. Accordingly, as long as the lawyer-mediator follows Rule 2.4 (and any other applicable rules or laws), the lawyer-mediator would be free to conduct the mediation in the way the lawyer-mediator thinks best, including meeting with the parties separately, and contracting for and structuring her fee however the lawyer-mediator would like.

11. We also note that the lawyer-mediator may assist the parties with memorializing in writing the terms to which they agree during the mediation. Such an aide memoire or Memorandum of Understanding is a common product of the mediation process.

12. Beyond this, however, that lawyer-mediator may not cross the line between acting as a neutral arbiter and acting as counsel to the parties. N.Y. State 1026 ¶ 10 (the lawyer performs legal services when the lawyer drafts and files divorce papers in court on behalf of the parties). In that event, all of the mediation services would then be covered by the Rules as the non-legal mediation services would not be distinct from the legal services. See Rule 5.7. Nevertheless, Rule 1.12(b) expressly permits the lawyer-mediator, at the conclusion of the mediation, in the event of an agreement between the parties, to represent one of the parties in filing a divorce action in court, provided the other party gives informed consent, confirmed in writing. At that point, the erstwhile mediator owes all the duties accompanying the attorney-client relationship under the Rules to the represented party. Rule 1.7(b)(3) forbids a lawyer from representing adverse parties in a proceeding, even with informed consent, and so the lawyer-mediator may not represent both parties in the filing of a divorce action.

13. In so concluding, we expressly supersede N.Y. State 678 (1996) insofar as that opinion says that the provision of mediation services by lawyers constitutes the practice of law. That opinion was issued before adoption of Rule 2.4, which specifically governs a lawyer's provision of neutral services and which had no equivalent in the predecessor N.Y. Code of Professional Responsibility. We have earlier so hinted: Following adoption of the Rules, we noted the possibility that our conclusion under the Rules might change on this issue. In N.Y. State 979 (2013), we said that there were conflicting opinions concerning whether the provision of mediation services was the practice of law and that "[t]he case that such services are not the practice of law was arguably bolstered by New York's adoption of the Rule specifically governing a lawyer's service as a mediator." We now make explicit that Rule 2.4 ousts our conclusion in N.Y. State 678 that the provision of mediation services invariably constitutes the practice of law. Only when a lawyer-mediator engages in services beyond providing neutral services, such as filing papers in court, does the lawyer-mediator cross the line into providing legal services.

CONCLUSION:

14. A lawyer-mediator engaged in providing third-party neutral services is subject to Rule 2.4 but not the Rules that govern the representation of clients. As such, the lawyer-mediator is generally free to conduct the mediation in the way the lawyer-mediator thinks best and to charge whatever fee the lawyer-mediator thinks appropriate and must provide disclosure to the parties concerning the lawyer-mediator's role as a mediator compared to that of a lawyer representing a client. If, however, the lawyer-mediator engages in an activity that constitutes a legal service, that legal service would not be distinct from the non-legal mediation services and the Rules would then apply to both the legal and non-legal services provided by the lawyer-mediator. At the conclusion of the mediation, the lawyer may represent one (but not both) of the parties in filing a divorce action, provided the other party gives informed consent, confirmed in writing.

OPINION 1179 (01/17/2020)

TOPIC: Conducting law practice under a trade name

DIGEST: A New York attorney may not practice in New York under a trade name in New York, even when the attorney's office is a branch of an out-of-state law firm that is permitted to practice under the trade name in its home state.

RULES: Rule 7.5(b)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is admitted to practice in New York and wishes to open a New York office for a law firm the main office of which is in California. In California, the firm practices under a trade name, as permitted by the ethics rules in California, which, according to the inquirer, has allowed such trade names since 1979. The inquirer acknowledges that the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") make no such allowance, but asserts that applying the Rules to prevent use of the California trade name in New York deprives the inquirer's firm of the good will embedded in the California trade name – a well-established name, we are told – and thereby frustrates the inquirer's ability to exploit the benefits associated with the name in connection with the New York office.

QUESTIONS:

2. May an out-of-state law firm that is permitted to practice law using a trade name in its home state practice law in New York using its trade name?

3. If the inquirer may not practice in New York under the California trade name, may the California firm establish a New York presence with lawyers who are not admitted in New York?

OPINION:

4. This inquiry asks whether New York's prohibition on lawyers engaged in the private practice of law using trade names remains in effect, even though the ethical rules of other states permit trade names and the cross-jurisdictional practice of law is becoming more common. The answer is yes. Rule 7.5(b) states in part:

> A lawyer in private practice shall not practice under a trade name, a name that is misleading as to the identity of the lawyer or lawyers practicing under such name, or a firm name containing names other than those of one or more of the lawyers in the firm, except that. . . a firm may use as, or continue to include in its name the name or names of one or more of the lawyers in the firm . . .

5. No ambiguity clouds this Rule. "'The prohibition against trade names is broad, permitting little beyond the names of lawyers presently or previously associated with a law firm.'" N.Y. State 1168 ¶ 12 (2019) (quoting N.Y. State 869 (2011)). "[U]sing a name that is not the legal name of one or more partners or former partners in the law firm constitutes use of a trade name." N.Y. State 740 (2001). Thus, we have previously concluded that a lawyer may not use only the lawyer's first name as a firm name, N.Y. State 1152 (2018), or the phrase, "The Business Dispute Clinic," N.Y. State 869 (2011), or the area of law in which the lawyer practices, N.Y. State 740 (2001).

6. As explained in N.Y. State 861 (2011), the New York office of a law firm "cannot operate under a name that does not include the name of a current or deceased partner." In N.Y. State 1023 (2014) the committee said that an attorney licensed only in New York could not be of counsel to an out-of-state firm practicing under a trade name in a state that permits the use of trade names. The opinion notes that a lawyer admitted only in New York could also not become an associate or partner of an out-of-state law firm that practices under a trade name. Thus, we have repeatedly, and we believe correctly, concluded that no circumstances exist in which a New York lawyer may ethically practice under a trade name in New York, even though the use of a trade name is permitted in another state in which the firm has offices.

7. This does not mean that the inquirer may not use the California law firm's names in other ways, that is, other than as the name of the law firm in New York. Thus, nothing in the Rules prevents the inquirer from saying, for example, that the inquirer's firm practices in California under firm name XYZ or otherwise truthfully stating in advertising and other branding activities the inquirer's New York firm is elsewhere known as XYZ. Hence the prohibition on trade names in New York does not entirely deprive the inquirer of the benefits of whatever good will may reside in the name of the California firm.

8. The inquirer's second question – whether the California firm populated solely by lawyers not admitted in New York may establish a New York presence– is beyond our jurisdiction to answer. This question raises issues of unlawful practice under New York State's Judiciary Law § 478, about which the committee does not opine, for they present pure questions of law, not ethics.

CONCLUSION:

9. A New York lawyer may not practice law under a trade name in New York, even though the use of a trade name is permitted in another state in which the firm has offices.

OPINION 1180 (01/17/2020)

TOPIC: Professional letterheads and emails

DIGEST: An attorney may communicate with third parties on a client's behalf using a client's email address with a signature line that includes the client's logo and a title indicating that the inquirer is "Corporate Counsel and Chief Compliance Officer" for the client, provided that the client devotes a substantial amount of professional time to the client's representation and provided that such position and title representations are truthful.

RULES: 7.1(a); 7.5(a)(4)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer, a solo practitioner, serves as outside counsel to a client company. The inquirer devotes a substantial amount of professional time to the client's affairs. The client has requested, when communicating on the client's behalf to third parties, that the inquirer use a client email address with a signature line that includes the client's logo and a title indicating that the inquirer is "Corporate Counsel and Chief Compliance Officer" for the client, a statement that, we are told, is factually correct.

QUESTION:

2. May an attorney communicate with third parties on a client's behalf using a client's email address with the client's logo including a signature line indicating the attorney's title and position with the client?

OPINION:

3. Rule 7.5(a) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct ("Rules") authorizes attorneys to use "the internet, web sites, professional announcement cards, office signs, letterhead or similar professional devices" provided two conditions are satisfied:

> a. Rule 7.5(a) requires that such communications not violate any statute or court rule and must be in accordance with Rule 7.1, which prohibits the use of statements that are false, deceptive or misleading (¶ (a)(1)) or which violate a Rule (¶ (a)(2)); and
> b. Such communications must conform to certain specific restrictions that circumscribe the information that may be provided in professional cards (¶ 7.5(a)(1), notices (¶7.5 (a)(2), signs (¶ 7.5(a)(3) and letterhead (¶ 7.5(a)(4).

4. Rule 7.5 (a)(4) also imposes an additional condition with respect to the use of "General Counsel" or "similar professional reference" on client stationery:

> A lawyer or law firm may be designated as "General Counsel" or by similar professional reference on stationery of a client if the lawyer or the firm devotes a substantial amount of professional time in the representation of the client.

5. Here, it is ethically permissible for the inquirer, when communicating on behalf of the client, to use the client email's address, as proposed, because the attorney does in fact devote a substantial amount of professional time in the representation of the client, and does in fact serve the client in the signified positions.

6. Our analysis warrants two additional comments. First, we see no functional difference between the application of the safe harbor of Rule 7.5(a)(4) on an attorney's use of client letterhead to an attorney's use of a company email address and template that includes the company logo. Second, although we recognize the possibility that an attorney's communication on such a template with a signature block indicating that the attorney is the client's "Corporate Counsel and Chief Compliance Officer" might lead a third-party recipient to assume that the attorney is a payroll employee of the client, and not outside counsel, that does not, in our opinion, raise any concerns regarding false, deceptive or misleading statements under Rule 7.1. Whether an attorney serves as in-house counsel or outside counsel, the fiduciary obligation of the lawyer to the client and the Rules of Professional Conduct that govern that relationship are the same. Therefore, any misimpression formed would be irrelevant, having no more significance than if a third party, for example, mistook a lawyer's gender based on unfamiliarity with a foreign name.

CONCLUSION:

7. An attorney may communicate with third parties on a client's behalf using a client's email address with a signature line that includes the client's logo and a title indicating that the attorney is "Corporate Counsel and Chief Compliance Officer" for the client, provided that the client devotes a substantial amount of professional time to the client's representation and provided that such position and title representations are truthful.

OPINION 1181 (01/17/2020)

TOPIC: Charging interest on expenses

DIGEST: A New York contingency-fee attorney may impose an interest charge on unpaid disbursements if a written agreement signed by the client fully discloses the terms on which interest may be charged and the terms are reasonable.

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a New York lawyer whose practice includes matters done on a contingency fee basis. We are told that recent changes in the law concerning contingency fee cases have sowed some confusion about our prior opinions on a lawyer's ability to charge interest on disbursements. This confusion, we are told, stems from the laws allowing a lawyer to fund disbursements rather than seeking immediate reimbursement from the client.

QUESTIONS:

2. The inquirer asks the following:

(a) May a lawyer impose a flat interest charge on lawyer-funded disbursements?

(b) Must the lawyer advise the client of each individual expense and be offered the chance to pay the expense as incurred?

(c) May the lawyer use the statutory interest rate of 9% set forth in CPLR § 5004 as guidance for a reasonable interest rate or may the lawyer charge a higher rate based either on the lawyer's cost of money from the lawyer's bank or other factors?

OPINION:

3. Assorted laws and court rules govern a lawyer's obligations in contingency fee cases. We address questions arising solely under the N.Y. Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"), so nothing in this opinion should be construed as overriding or interpreting the laws and regulations that govern the practices of contingency fees as set forth by the legislature and the courts, including those statutes and rules that mandate the disclosures a lawyer must provide a client. See, e.g., 22 NYCRR 806.27(c)(2) (3d Dept.) (in certain actions, "[I]n the event that the attorney agrees to pay costs and expenses of the action pursuant to Judiciary Law section 488(2)(d), on the gross sum recovered before deducting expenses and disbursements, [then] [t]he retainer agreement or letter of engagement shall describe these alternative methods, explain the financial consequences of each, and clearly indicate the client's selection"); see also 22 NYCRR 603.25 (e)(3)(ii) [Schedule B] [1st Dept.]; 691.20 (e)(3)(ii) [Schedule B] [2d Dept.]) Here, our focus is only on the lawyer's ethical responsibilities.

4. Whether a lawyer may charge interest on disbursements in a contingency fee case is not a new issue for us. In N. Y. State 729 (2000), which was issued under a substantially identical rule in the prior Code of Professional Responsibility (the "Code"), we said that a lawyer may do so provided certain conditions are met. These conditions were: (a) that the client is clearly advised in writing that disbursements not paid within an expressly stated time period would be subject to an interest charge; (b) that the client is billed for the disbursement promptly after the disbursement is incurred so that the client may pay the disbursement, if the client so chooses, before the client incurs an interest charge; (c) that the period of time between the bill and the imposition of the interest charge is reasonable; (d) that the disbursement is itself appropriate (see, e.g., ABA 93-379 (1993) (citing appropriate disbursements); (e) that the interest rate is reasonable; and (f) that the client gives informed consent in writing to the arrangement before the arrangement goes into effect. We believe that the conditions set forth in Opinion 729 are equally applicable under the Rules, and we thus continue to endorse them as appropriate conditions when a lawyer seeks to charge interest on disbursements in a contingency fee case, whether the interest rate is flat or fluctuating.

5. Our adherence to Opinion 729 answers the inquirer's first two questions, namely, that a lawyer may charge interest on disbursements but must offer the client a reasonable chance to pay the expense before the interest charge is incurred. This leaves only the inquirer's question about whether the statutory provision for 9% interest on pre- and post-judgments may (or must) serve as a yardstick for the amount of interest a lawyer may charge for unpaid disbursements.

6. In Opinion 729, we declined to opine on the amount of interest a lawyer may charge other than to conclude that the amount must be reasonable. We adhere to that view. Nothing in the Rules dictates a particular amount as reasonable, and this Committee interprets the Rules, it does not make them. That said, we see no obvious relationship between, on the one hand, a legislative policy on the interest that must be paid on judgments (that is, 9%) and, on the other, the ethical reasonableness of an interest charge on unpaid disbursements in a contingency case. It is possible that one may bear on the other, but the connection is not ineluctable. We believe, instead, that the reasonableness of an interest rate varies with the facts and circumstances of a particular lawyer-client relationship. It follows that, in our view, a lawyer is not required to use the statutory interest rate as an interest charge, and that whether a lawyer may do so depends on the facts and circumstances.

7. For example, we have previously opined that a lawyer may pass on to a client the interest rate (but no more) that the lawyer actually incurs if the lawyer borrows from a bank to fund the disbursements. N.Y. State 754 (2002); see N.Y.C. 1997-1 (1997). In our Opinions 729 and 754, we said, too, that whether the lawyer uses the lawyer's own funds to finance the disbursements rather than borrowing those funds should not matter; in each instance, there is an economic cost to the lawyer which the lawyer may ethically pass on to the client provided the conditions set forth above are satisfied. The factors comprising the lawyer's cost of money in the absence of bank financing are impossible to identify to any useful effect, except to note that laws exist (such as usury laws) that regulate these matters and hence apply.

CONCLUSION:

8. A New York contingency fee attorney may impose an interest charge on unpaid disbursements as long as (a) the agreement describes the alternative methods of payment of such disbursements, explains the financial consequences of each, and clearly indicates the client's selection, (b) the client is clearly advised, indicating that an interest charge will be imposed on disbursements that are not paid within a stated period of time, and the client consents to that arrangement before it goes into effect, (c) the client is billed for the disbursements promptly after they have been incurred so the client may decide whether to pay the disbursements or incur the interest charge, (d) the period of time between the bill and the imposition of the interest charge is reasonable, (e) the disbursement itself is appropriate, and (f) the interest rate is reasonable. The reasonableness of the interest rate depends on the facts and circumstances of the case.

TOPIC: Disposition of Wills

DIGEST: A lawyer may not dispose of wills even when the testators' locations and/or circumstances are unknown. A lawyer must safeguard the wills indefinitely unless the law provides an alternative.

RULES: 1.15(c)

FACTS:

1. The inquiring lawyer is in possession of over five hundred wills where the testators' whereabouts are unknown to the inquirer and/or cannot be discovered with due diligence. The inquirer (or the inquirer's firm) prepared some of these wills, but most came to be in the inquirer's possession by reason of the inquirer's succession to the practices of other lawyers (in some instances, lawyers who had themselves acquired practices and, with them, wills). Among these wills are some prepared more than seventy years ago.

2. The inquirer has conducted a due diligence search of office records, the internet, and the Surrogate's Court in the county where the inquirer's office is located in an attempt to find information about the testators, executors, or beneficiaries. To date, these efforts have been to no avail and we accept the inquirer's assertion that the prospect of discovering the information is unpromising. The inquirer would like to dispose of the wills for which identifying information is lacking and unlikely to emerge.

QUESTION:

3. May an attorney dispose of Wills, when after due diligence and significant passage of time the attorney is unable to learn the whereabouts or other circumstances of the testators?

OPINION:

4. Rule 1.15(c)(1) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") provides that a lawyer shall "promptly notify a client or third person of the receipt of funds, securities, or other properties in which the client or third person has an interest." Rule 1.15(c)(2) - (4) requires the lawyer to preserve such property, keep complete records and render appropriate accounts, and to promptly pay or deliver the property as requested by the client or third person. A will is a piece of property.

5. In N.Y. State 341 (1974), the Committee concluded that a lawyer who receives wills from an attorney who retires from the practice of law "holds them only as a custodian and that the firm was required to notify the lawyer's clients of his retirement." We have indicated that a lawyer who comes into possession of a will by acquiring the practice of a retiring lawyer is required to take reasonable steps to locate and notify third persons, such as the testator, with an interest in the will. N.Y. State 1035 (2014); see N.Y. State 1133 ¶ 9 (2017) (a lawyer "must maintain the files unless and until a client retrieves them or gives notice to the affected clients of some other disposition").

6. We have not previously resolved the question presented here – that is, to outline a lawyer's duties in the event that the lawyer is unable to locate the testator or another person with an interest in the will despite a lawyer's reasonable efforts to do so. The Rules do not explicitly answer that question.

7. In 1999, the New York City Bar Association's Ethics Committee did address the issue under the N.Y. Code of Professional Responsibility (the "Code"), and in particular the Code's DR 9-102(c), the language of which was identical to Rule 1.15. In its Opinion 1999-05, the City Bar said that "as to those clients who cannot be located, the lawyer's obligation to retain the Wills in safekeeping continues indefinitely or in accordance with law." In so concluding, the City Bar relied on Massachusetts Bar Association Opinion 76-7, which concluded that "if the lawyer, cannot find the testator and does not wish to deposit the will with the appropriate court, [the lawyer] remains obligated to use reasonable care to keep it secure."

8. We agree with these opinions. When, as here, an attorney is the custodian of wills – whether by reason of the attorney's own practice or by succession to the practice of other lawyers through acquisition or otherwise – and cannot after due diligence locate a testator, the attorney must maintain the wills indefinitely or act as the law may allow. Our jurisdiction stops at the corners of the Rules, so we have no charter to give legal advice, but we have opined that "[i]n general, when a lawyer is uncertain about what to do with property that he or she holds for safekeeping, the lawyer may seek judicial guidance" N.Y. State 775 (2004). Otherwise put, a lawyer may always seek court permission to dispose of property in accordance with law.

9. We note that Section 2507 of the Surrogate's Court Procedure Act provides that the court "of any county upon being paid the fees allowed therefor by law shall receive and deposit in the court any will of a domiciliary of the county which any person shall deliver to it for that purpose and shall give a written receipt therefor to the person depositing it." The Law Practice Management Committee of this Association, in the second edition of its Planning Ahead Guide, explains (at App. 2C ¶ 12) that "[o]riginal wills and other original documents must be returned to clients and may not be destroyed or otherwise disposed of. In the case of original wills, if you are unable to locate the clients after a diligent search, you may file such wills with the Surrogate's Court (be aware of filing fees) or deposit them with an appropriate depository (e.g., the appropriate county bar association) and notify the clients in writing, addressed to their last known address"); see also id. App. 17 ("If a lawyer or law firm has retained original wills, they must be preserved or returned to the testators for safekeeping. Lawyers who retain original wills should make arrangements for someone else to safeguard them after they retire or cease practicing . . . Consider filing the wills in the local Surrogate's court . . . Some County Bar associations offer will registries which may be useful. Another law office may be willing to retain the wills of a deceased or retired attorney").

CONCLUSION:

10. A lawyer may not dispose of Wills, whose testators' locations and/or circumstances are unknown. The Wills constitute property, and the lawyer must safeguard the Wills indefinitely unless the law affords the lawyer an avenue to file or otherwise dispose of the wills.

TOPIC: Designated counsel in financing transactions; payment of fees by a third party; exercise of independent judgment; conflicts of interest

DIGEST: A lawyer may accept appointments as designated counsel for underwriters, lenders or other funding sources involved in private equity or corporate financing transactions on the recommendation of the counter-party to the transaction, with the lawyer being paid out of the proceeds of the transaction, provided that no interference occurs with the lawyer's exercise of independent professional judgment on the clients' behalf, the lawyer preserves the confidentiality of client confidential information, and the lawyer obtains the clients' informed consent, confirmed in writing.

RULES: 1.0(j), 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 1.4, 1.6, 1.7(a) & (b), 1.8(f), 4.2, 5.4(c)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a New York lawyer who represents underwriters, lenders and other financial institutions that participate in large private equity offerings and other corporate financing transactions. The fees for the lawyer and the lawyer's clients are paid out of the proceeds of the transactions. At risk of oversimplification, but for ease of reference, we refer to the lawyer's clients as the "funders" and the counterparties as the "recipients."

2. We are told that, in a growing number of these financing transactions, it is not uncommon for the recipients (or their counsel) to maintain lists of designated counsel to act on behalf of the funders, the use of which counsel is a condition precedent to the recipients' willingness to transact business with the funders. As we understand the circumstances, the recipients' designation of the funders' counsel is made independent of the selection of the funders and is made by the law firm representing the recipients. No provision is made for the funders' consent to counsel other than that implicit in the funders' agreement to participate in the transaction.

3. These financing transactions are not part of a series of offerings, but have different parties for each transaction. The inquirer has been offered the opportunity to have the inquirer's firm included on the list of designated counsel, which the inquirer acknowledges could result in fees comprising a material portion of the income of the firm's financial transactions practice.

4. Recently the inquirer has learned that the recipients have sent a so-called "terms list" to the funder clients with instructions to agree with the proposed terms, or propose counter terms, but to do so without consultation with the funders' designated counsel. According to the inquirer, no opportunity exists for the funders to use their designated counsel to negotiate the term sheet with the recipients. The role of the funders' designated counsel is thus to prepare the financing documents based on the terms negotiated by the funders (without benefit of counsel) and the recipients (with counsel).

5. We are asked to assume that, if the designated counsel fails to abide by the recipients' directives, then the prospect of future designations will disappear, with the attendant loss of income to the lawyer's firm.

QUESTION:

6. May a lawyer accept a designation of counsel to represent a client in a transaction when the counterparty in the transaction makes the designation, places restrictions on the lawyer's ability to exercise independent professional judgment on behalf of the lawyer's client, and the designated counsel is paid out of the proceeds of the transaction?

DISCUSSION:

7. The inquiry implicates several provisions of the N.Y. Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"). These Rules regulate the lawyer's responsibilities in an attorney-client relationship when factors extraneous to that relationship may imperil the lawyer's fiduciary obligations to a client and the duties of loyalty and care that accompany those obligations. Broadly stated, the Rules forbid a lawyer to allow a stranger to the attorney-client relationship to inhibit the lawyer's faithful discharge of those obligations to a client, at least absent circumstances in which the client is able freely to provide informed consent to the intrusion without impairing the lawyer's ability to fulfill the lawyer's duties to the client.

8. One such provision is Rule 5.4(c), contained in the provision "Professional Independence of a Lawyer," which says that, unless the law otherwise provides, "a lawyer shall not permit a person who recommends, employs or pays the lawyer to render legal service for another to direct or regulate the lawyer's professional judgment in rendering such legal services or to cause the lawyer to compromise the lawyer's duty to maintain the confidential information of the client" that Rule 1.6 safeguards. Comment [2] associated with this Rule explains that the Rule "expresses traditional limitations on permitting a third party to direct or regulate the lawyer's professional judgment in rendering legal services to another." See generally N.Y. State 1081 ¶ 16 (2016); N.Y. State 957 ¶¶ 11-12 (2013).

9. This same Comment [2] directs attention to Rule 1.8(f), of special pertinence here, which says that a "lawyer shall not accept compensation for representing a client from one other than the client unless (1) the client gives informed consent; (2) there is no interference with the lawyer's independent professional judgment and (3) information relating to the representation of the client is protected as required by Rule 1.6." "Simply put, Rule 1.8(f) means that a lawyer owes a client the same duties owed to a client without regard to the source of the fees the lawyer is paid, with the added proviso that a client must give 'informed consent' to the arrangement." N.Y. State 1000 ¶ 5 (2014) (allowing a lawyer to be paid by an adverse party subject to Rule 1.8(f)). As Comment [11] to this Rule explains, and as our Opinion 1000 attests, "[t]hird-party payors frequently have interests that may differ from those of the client." But this fact does not unburden the lawyer of the duty to comply with obligations to a client, including, among others, the duties of competence set out in Rule 1.1, of diligence set out in Rule 1.3, of communication set out in Rule 1.4, of confidentiality set out in Rule 1.6, and of attention to conflicts of interest set out in Rule 1.7.

10. N.Y. State 818 (2007) is instructive in applying these principles to this inquiry. That opinion was issued under the N.Y. Code of Professional Responsibility (the "Code"), the precursor of the Rules, but the relevant provisions of the Code and the Rules are interchangeable for our purposes. There, the inquirer was designated counsel for an underwriter of a series of municipal security offerings by the same issuer. The lawyer was "selected for this work by the issuer," which paid the designated counsel's fees. In Opinion 818, we recognized that "there may be competing interests when negotiating the underwriting agreement" and that disagreements could arise about what is 'material' for the purposes of disclosure in offering documents." Id. ¶ 5. We continued: "The Code explicitly requires that a lawyer whose fees will be paid by a third party obtain the consent of the client, after full disclosure of all relevant facts and circumstances, before accepting such compensation." Id. ¶ 8. Included in the disclosures are "any material facts or circumstances – beyond the selection of Designated Underwriters' Counsel by the issuer and what that normally entails – that might bear on the lawyer's ability to exercise independent professional judgment on behalf of the client (the underwriter) or otherwise interfere with the lawyer's ability to adequately represent the client." Id.

11. Although some facts in Opinion 818 vary from those here – for instance, here each transaction is unique and involves different financial instruments and participants – these variances do not affect the controlling principles. Among other things, the competing interests and the potential for disagreement over disclosure and material terms persist, and thereby engender the same concerns animating Opinion 818. There, as here, these concerns included that the designating counterparty might impose conditions on the lawyer's exercise of independent professional judgment and also that the prospect of future designations comprising a significant source of income to the lawyer could affect lawyer's exercise of that judgment. Id. Accordingly, there, we concluded: "A law firm selected to serve as Designated Underwriters' Counsel by a company must carefully consider its relationship with the company selecting it, and assess whether a disinterested lawyer would conclude that the law firm can competently represent the interests of the underwriters in light of its relationship with the company, and if so, ensure that the underwriters appropriately consent to its representation of them." Id. ¶ 14.

12. Apparent from Opinion 818 is that a conflicts analysis under Rule 1.7 may be an integral part of appraising the ethical limitations of accepting the role of counsel designated by an adverse party and paid by other than the counsel's own client. The Comments associated with each Rule refer to the other. Thus, Comment [12] under Rule 1.8(f) says that a conflict under Rule 1.7(a) may exist if "there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own interest in the fee arrangement or by the lawyer's responsibilities to the third party payer." Likewise, Comment [13] under Rule 1.7(a) says that a lawyer "may be paid from a source other than the client, including a co-client, if the client is informed of that fact and consents and the arrangement does not compromise the lawyer's duty of loyalty or independent judgment to the client. See Rule 1.8(f). If acceptance of the payment from any other source presents a significant risk that the lawyer's exercise of professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own interest in accommodating the person paying the lawyer's fee . . . then the lawyer must comply with the requirements of [Rule 1.7] (b) before accepting the representation, including determining whether the conflict is consentable and, if so, that the client has adequate information about the material risks of the representation." Our prior opinions frequently refer to each Rule in describing a lawyer's duties when the source of the lawyer's fee is other than the client. See, e.g., N.Y. State 1162 (2019); N.Y. State 1155 (2018); N.Y. State 1086 (2016); N.Y. State 1063 (2015).

13. The lessons for this inquiry from these Rules and the opinions construing them are readily apparent. A lawyer may not ethically accept a representation of a client if the lawyer accepts compensation or "anything of value" (including inclusion of an approved list of designated counsel), nor a recommendation to serve as counsel, if the lawyer thereby allows a stranger to the attorney-client relationship to interfere with, among other things, the lawyer's exercise of independent professional judgment on behalf of the client. To us, this means that a lawyer may not allow counsel for an adverse party to dictate the limits the lawyer's role in service of a client's interests absent a client's informed consent confirmed in writing.

14. Other Rules compel this conclusion. Rule 1.2(a) provides that a "lawyer shall abide by a client's decisions concerning the objectives of representation," and by necessary implication not abide by the dictates of others. Rule 1.3 says that a lawyer "shall act with reasonable diligence and promptness in representing a client." Rule 1.4 imposes obligations on a lawyer promptly to inform the client of material developments in the matter and, among other things, reasonably to consult with the client about the means by which the client's objectives are to be achieved and to explain a matter to the extent reasonably necessary to permit the client to make informed decisions regarding the representation. To fulfill these responsibilities requires the unfettered ability to exercise independent professional judgment on the client's behalf unless the client otherwise agrees.

15. In addition, in these circumstances, if a "significant risk" exists that a disinterested lawyer would conclude that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's "own financial, business, property or other personal interests," then a conflict of interest is present. In light of the inquirer's acknowledgment that a failure to abide by the third party's directives could endanger a material portion of the lawyer's business and property interests, it is likely that a disinterested lawyer would find such a significant risk. Fortifying this conclusion is that Rule 1.8(f), which addresses specific conflicts that Rule 1.7 addresses more generally, identifies situations involving third-party payors as ones in which conflicts are inherently present. So, too, does Rule 5.4(c).

16. This leaves the question – applicable under Rule 1.7(a) and Rule 1.8(f) – whether the conflict is subject to informed consent. We think the answer is yes. Rule 1.0(j) defines "informed consent" as "the agreement by a person to a proposed course of conduct after the lawyer has communicated information adequate for the person to make an informed decision, and after the lawyer has adequately explained to the person the material risks of the proposed course of conduct and reasonably available alternatives." The expectation of informed consent to the representation is found within Rule 1.8(f) and, save for the requirement of a writing, is no different from that required under Rule 1.7(a)(2). On our view, "informed consent" cannot be adequate without disclosing to the client the lawyer's business and personal interest in carrying out the representation.

17. This is nothing new. We have followed these principles in other areas, most notably in insurance defense when the existence of third party payment of fees did not alter the primary obligations owed to the client. See N.Y State 721 (1999). For instance, in N.Y. State 1154 (2018), we said that, if the "lawyer depends on an insurance carrier for a regular flow of business," then the inquirer needed to resolve whether this relationship created a conflict of interest. If the inquirer concluded that it did, then the inquirer had to determine whether the inquirer reasonably believed that the inquirer could nevertheless provide "competent and diligent" representation to the affected client. If yes, then the inquirer needed to obtain the client's informed consent confirmed in writing, including by disclosing "the inquirer's relationship with the insurer." Id. ¶ 16. Applying that statement to the present inquiry would suggest that the inquiring counsel disclose to the funder clients the nature of the inquirer's relationship with recipients and their counsel.

18. Similarly, in N.Y. State 942 (2012), another inquiry involving a third-party payor, the client would not be told material facts concerning the fee arrangement. There, we said: "Informed consent can occur only after the lawyer has adequately explained the risks and provided enough information for the client to make an informed decision." We concluded, "That standard may not be satisfied here, given the apparent limits to the planned disclosure to the client." So, too, here. The analysis of adequate consent is heavily fact-dependent, including clarification that the duty runs solely to the client, the sophistication of the client, the risks flowing from the representation, and the ability to exercise independent judgment on the client's behalf. Nevertheless, we are confident that the funder's willingness to participate in the transaction does not alone constitute "informed consent" within the meaning of the Rules.

19. Nothing in this opinion is intended to criticize or discourage use of designated counsel, a common practice that often provides efficiencies of great benefit to the clients and other parties. Nor is there anything wrong with principals negotiating the material terms of a transaction without benefit of counsel on each side and then enlisting lawyers to prepare the needed documents, subject to the requirements of Rule 4.2 regulating a lawyer's right to communicate with a person known to be represented by counsel. And a client is free to give informed consent, as defined above, to limit the scope of a representation if the limitation is reasonable in the circumstances. Rule 1.2(c) & Rule 1.2, Cmt. [6A]. But a lawyer is not free to undertake a representation of a client when a counter-party dictates the terms of the lawyer's exercise of independent professional judgment.

CONCLUSION:

20. A lawyer may accept appointments as designated counsel for underwriters, lenders or other funding sources involved in a private equity or corporate financing transaction on the recommendation of and paid for by the issuer, borrower or other lead entity from the transaction proceeds if the lawyer concludes the third party will not interfere with the lawyer's independent professional judgment and the lawyer obtains the informed consent confirmed in writing to the representation from the lawyer's client.

TOPIC: Freelance or per diem attorney; trade names; maintenance of bank accounts and records conflicts

DIGEST: A New York attorney seeking to market services as a "freelance attorney" to provide contract or per diem services to other attorneys or law firms may use the name and domain name Surname Esquire. Depending on the nature of services provided, the lawyer need not comply with the strict rules on maintaining separate bank accounts but may need to comply with certain recordkeeping requirements. The lawyer is otherwise subject to the ethical rules, including the obligation to check for and avoid conflicts of interest.

RULES: 1.0(a), 1.1, 1.4(a)(3), 1.6, 1.7, 1.8, 1.9, 1.10(e), 1.15(d), 3.3(f)(1), 4.1, 4.2, 7.1, 7.4, 7.5

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a New York attorney who seeks to perform work on a freelance or per diem basis for other attorneys and/or law firms without forming a law firm. The inquirer proposes to market services on a website with the domain name "[Surname] Esquire.com" directly solely to other lawyers. The proposed website would contain the inquirer's biographical information and would state that the inquirer is available for retention by other attorneys or law firms on a contract basis. The inquirer proposes also to say on a LinkedIn profile that the inquirer works as a "Freelance Attorney" at [Surname] Esquire. For our purposes, a "freelance" attorney is the same as a per diem or contract lawyer.

2. The inquirer asks whether such conduct is permissible under the N.Y. Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"), whether the inquirer is required to maintain a separate bank account for the legal practice, and whether any other ethical restrictions or requirements exist on this type of freelance or per diem legal practice.

QUESTIONS:

3. May the inquirer market legal services to other lawyers or law firms using the name and website of "[Surname] Esquire" and describing the inquirer as a "Freelance Attorney"?

4. Is the inquirer required to maintain a separate bank account(s) for the proposed legal practice?

5. Are there any other ethical restrictions on the inquirer's proposed practice?

OPINION:

Firm Name & Advertising

6. Although the inquirer disclaims an intention to form a "law firm," Rule 1.0(h) defines a "law firm" to include a sole proprietorship. Thus, under the Rules, the proposed [Surname] Esquire is a law firm governed by the same ethical provisions as any other law firm.

7. Rule 7.5(b) provides, in relevant part, that "A lawyer in private practice shall not practice under a trade name, a name that is misleading as to the identity of the lawyer or lawyers practicing under such name, or a firm name containing names other than those of one or more of the lawyers in the firm." We have previously opined that, while the prohibition against using trade names is broad, the use of an attorney's surname in a firm name is permissible, and in fact customary. In N.Y. State 1152 ¶ 6 (2018), we noted:

> In our view, Rule 7.5(b) embeds an understanding that a law firm's name consists of the surnames of lawyers who either practice there or once did. We are unaware of any authority or precedent that breaks from this pattern, and it cannot be denied that, at the time the Rules and their predecessors were adopted, the universal practice in this state was to confine the names of law firms to the surnames of its current or former lawyers.

See also N.Y. State 1167 ¶ 6 (2019) (lawyer who practices under a full surname may use a law firm name that includes only the lawyer's middle name and last name, without including the lawyer's first name); N.Y. State 1003 ¶ 9 (2014) (sole practitioner may use initials with full surname as law firm name); N.Y. State 869 ¶ 11 (2011) (a sole practitioner may practice under the name "The [Surname] Law Firm"). These precedents make clear that the inquirer may practice in a law firm using solely the inquirer's surname as the name of a law firm and as a domain name.

8. Likewise, the use of the term "Esquire" or "Esq." by an attorney admitted to practice in New York does not constitute an improper trade name or a name that is misleading about the identity of the lawyer. In N.Y. State 1147 (2018) and N.Y. State 1089 (2016), we considered the use of the term "Esq." or "Esquire" by lawyers not admitted in New York and by retired lawyers, respectively. We cited with approval N.Y. City 1994-5, which states:

> The title "esquire" does not legally designate an individual as a lawyer because it is not conferred in this country as an academic degree or license. It has, however, been adopted by lawyers by convention as a form of designation. Thus, one using the title in the United States is identifying himself or herself as a lawyer.

9. Accordingly, we concluded that a lawyer not admitted in New York or a retired lawyer could use the title "Esq.," so long as he or she took care to avoid the risk of confusion by indicating the limitations on his or her right to practice. The obvious implication of these opinions is that an attorney licensed and actually practicing in New York may use the term "Esquire" or "Esq." to indicate that he or she is a lawyer. There is, therefore, no ethical bar to the inquirer using the name and website "[Surname] Esquire" to market per diem, freelance, or other legal services.

10. The inquirer indicates an intention to market services only to other attorneys, rather than to the public. We assume for our purposes that this is possible to do on a website or LinkedIn profile, though it may be that, to the extent that these media are available to the general public, a disclaimer may be needed to clarify the inquirer's intention. To the extent that the marketing is aimed solely at other lawyers, then the content of the marketing does not fall under the rubric of attorney advertising and thus is not subject to the provisions of Rule 7.1 that govern the content of attorney advertisements. Rule 1.0(a) (providing that the definition of an "advertisement" specifically "does not include communications to . . . other lawyers"); see Rule 7.1, Cmt. [7] ("communications to other lawyers . . . are excluded from the special rules governing lawyer advertising even if their purpose is the retention of the lawyer or law firm").

11. Nevertheless, as Comment [6] to Rule 7.1 says:

> All communications by lawyers, whether subject to the special rules governing lawyer advertising or not, are governed by the general rule that lawyers may not engage in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation, or knowingly make a material false statement of fact or law." See also 8.4(c).

12. The inquirer's designation of a practice as "freelance attorney" does not violate the rules prohibiting attorney fraud, dishonesty, misrepresentation or deceit if it accurately describes the inquirer's practice. The same is true of any biographical information accompanying the designation.

13. Rule 7.4 regarding "Identification of Practice and Specialty" applies to a lawyer or law firm's public identification even when the advertising rules do not apply. This rule permits a lawyer or law firm to "publicly identify" areas of law in which he or she practices and permits a lawyer to state that "the practice of the lawyer or law firm is limited to one or more areas of law." Thus, insofar as the inquirer intends to identify the areas of law in which a lawyer's practice is limited – for example, appeals, depositions, wills – the inquirer should, as we understand the inquirer intends, identify the limited nature of the inquirer's practice, that is, as a freelance or contract attorney.

Bank Accounts

14. Whether the inquirer must maintain a separate bank account for the law firm depends on the financial arrangements the inquirer makes with a contracting lawyer or firm and the nature of the work the inquirer would be doing.

15. Rule 1.15(a) says that a lawyer "in possession of funds or other property belonging to another person, where such possession is incident to his or her practice of law, is a fiduciary, and must not misappropriate such funds or property or commingle such funds or property with his or her own." Rule 1.15(b) and Rule 1.15(c) contain specific requirements on the handling of funds or other property belonging to a person other than the lawyer. In the event that, by reason of the contractual nature of the services being provided, the inquirer comes into possession of funds or property in which others have an interest, then all these provisions apply, including specifically the maintenance of a separate bank account within New York State.

16. In our experience, however, contract and per diem lawyers typically work on an hourly or flat fee basis and are paid directly by the hiring lawyer or law firm for services rendered. To us, such payments are the functional equivalent of a distribution made to a partner or a salary paid to an associate, in-house counsel, government lawyer, and the like – that is, the money belongs solely to the lawyer, who presumably deposits the funds into a personal bank account in the lawyer's own name without need to worry about the regulations in Rule 1.15(a), (b), or (c).

17. Yet the Rules seem to say otherwise. Specifically, Rule 1.15(d) provides, in relevant part, that: "(1) A lawyer shall maintain for seven years after the events that they record: (i) the records of all deposits in and withdrawals from the accounts specified in Rule 1.15(b) and of any other bank account that concerns or affects the lawyer's practice of law; these records shall specifically identify the date, source and description of each item deposited, as well as the date, payee and purpose of each withdrawal or disbursement." Rule 1.15(d)((2) expressly requires a lawyer to make "accurate entries" of all financial transactions "in any other books of account kept by them in the regular course of their practice, which entries shall be made at or near the time of the act, condition or event recorded." The financial records required by this Rule shall be maintained at the principal New York office of the lawyer and a failure to do so will be "deemed a violation of those rules" and subject the lawyer to discipline. Rule 1.15(i) and (j). Nothing in the Rule prohibits the inquirer from, for example, depositing payments for services rendered directly into a personal account. But nothing excuses the inquirer from the recordkeeping requirement.

18. Although skeptical that the framers of the Rule intended this result, we have no choice in light of its language but to conclude that, if Rule 1.15 applies to the inquirer's practice, then the inquirer must comply with the recordkeeping requirements of Rule 1.15(d).

Other Ethical Considerations

19. Finally, the inquirer seeks guidance regarding any other ethics issues that the inquire may encounter in operating a freelance or per diem legal practice. As we noted in N.Y. State 1113 (2017):

> We will not attempt to catalog all of the ethical duties of per diem lawyers, but we will suggest several. Under Rule 1.1, they should be competent, and thus should obtain whatever knowledge is necessary to handle an appearance. Under Rule 1.3(a), they must be diligent, and must be on time for the matters they have been retained to handle. Under Rule 1.4(a)(3), they must keep the client (through the client's agent, the hiring lawyer) reasonably informed about the status of the matter. Under Rule 1.6, they must preserve the confidentiality of any client confidential information to which they are privy . . . [U]nder Rule 1.10(e) they must check for conflicts and, if consentable, obtain consent or decline the proffered representation . . .
> Per diem lawyers also owe duties to adversaries. For example, under Rule 4.1, they must not make a false statement of fact or law to an adversary or other third person. Under Rule 4.2, they must not communicate on the subject of the representation with a party they know to be represented by counsel unless they have that counsel's prior consent.
> In addition, per diem lawyers owe duties to courts. Rule 3.3(f)(1) provides that, in appearing before a tribunal, a lawyer shall not fail to comply with local customs of practice of a particular tribunal, so per diem lawyers must comply with the relevant court rules for the courts and parts in which they appear . . . [C]ourt rules may impose additional obligations, but interpreting those rules is beyond our jurisdiction.

20. The obligations of a contract or per diem attorney to avoid conflicts of interest pursuant to Rules 1.7, 1.8, and 1.9 and to engage in conflicts checking pursuant to Rule 1.10(e) has been addressed previously by this Committee and has been the subject of numerous bar association ethics committee opinions. See N.Y. State 1113 (2017); N.Y. State 715 (1999); N.Y. City 1996-8 (1996); N.Y. City. 1989-2 (1989); N.Y. City 1988-3 and 3-A (1988); ABA 88-356 (1988).

21. In N.Y. State 1113 this Committee noted that a per diem lawyer who handled a specific appearance, or argued a specific motion, could not later appear on behalf of the other side in that case or substantially related case. Critically, under 1.10(e), both the hiring law firm and the per diem lawyer must maintain a written record of engagements and a system by which proposed engagements are checked against current or previous engagements. The per diem lawyer has the same obligation as the hiring lawyer to check for and identify conflicts. See N.Y. State 1113.

CONCLUSION:

22. A lawyer may market services as a "freelance," contract, or per diem attorney to other attorneys using the name and website with the lawyer's surname and the word Esquire. If such services are being marketed solely to other attorneys, the freelance attorney is not required to comply with restrictions on attorney advertising. A freelance attorney who does not hold funds for other people is not required to maintain a separate trust or escrow account, but must comply with the record keeping requirements of Rule 1.15(d) regarding any other bank account that concerns or affects the lawyer's practice of law. Finally, a freelance attorney must comply with all other ethical obligations.

OPINION 1185 (04/22/2020)

TOPIC: Conflicts of interest in defending multiple clients in prosecutions

DIGEST: It is likely an unwaivable conflict of interest exists for a lawyer or law firm concurrently to represent two individuals in separate criminal prosecutions that arise out of the same common nucleus of circumstances in which each client is a witness in each matter.

RULES: 1.7, 1.10

FACTS:

1. The inquirer concurrently represents two individuals – for our purposes Client One and Client Two – in two separate but related criminal matters.

2. Client One has been charged with a crime in which Client Two is the alleged victim. Client One and Client Two are in a relationship; Client Two denies Client One committed any wrongdoing, opposed Client One's arrest, and wishes to testify in favor of Client One. According to each Client, Client Two was intoxicated during the events at issue, and, following Client One's arrest, Client Two was arrested for driving while intoxicated (DWI).

3. The inquirer's firm proposes to represent each Client in the proceedings resisting the charges. The prosecution objects to the firm's representing Client Two (its alleged victim in the charge against Client One), suggesting that the firm has co-opted the prosecution's main witness against Client One. The inquirer asserts that no conflict exists because the prosecutions are separate, and that Client Two may testify in defense of Client One while invoking the Fifth Amendment on any questions probing intoxication.

QUESTION:

4. Is the inquirer's representation of the two clients in separate but related matters a conflict of interest and, if so, it the conflict subject to waiver?

OPINION:

5. We reject the arguments of each side as described to us. In our view, no party has a possessory interest in a witness, so we consider the prosecutor's position as inconsistent with the N.Y. Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"). We also consider the fact of separate prosecutions as unpersuasive, because the two charges, though to be individually prosecuted, arise out of the same common nucleus of circumstances. Clients One and Two may be facing separate charges, but it is impossible to divorce the allegations of one from the allegations of the other.

6. Whether a conflict exists depends on Rule 1.7(a). Rule 1.7(a) says, in summary, that a conflict of interest exists for a lawyer concurrently to represent two clients if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that it will involve the lawyer in representing differing interests, or that a "significant risk" exists that the lawyer's professional judgment will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests. Rule 1.0(f) defines "differing interests" to "include every interest that will adversely affect either the judgment or the loyalty of a lawyer to a client, whether it be a conflicting, inconsistent, diverse, or other interest."

7. We believe that Client One's interests differ from those of Client Two, just as Client Two's interests differ from Client One's. For instance, a reasonable lawyer for Client One would have every incentive to establish that Client Two was indeed intoxicated based on eyewitnesses, the later arrest, behavior before the Client' One's arrest, and other evidence – all of which would be detrimental to Client Two in the DWI case. Similarly, a reasonable lawyer for Client Two might well advise Client Two not to testify in Client One's defense, not just for the aforementioned damage to Client Two's own legal status but also the risk of waiving Fifth Amendment rights. Likewise, a reasonable lawyer for Client One would have every incentive to advise Client One to testify against Client Two in the DWI case to justify the actions giving rise to Client One's arrest. This is not intended as an exhaustive list of the ways the interests of the two clients diverge, but simply as common sense examples of the way they do.

8. Accordingly, in our judgment, advancing the legal interests of Client One would adversely affect the legal interests of Client Two, and vice-versa. "In order to be 'differing,' the interests need not arise in the same matter, and they need not arise in litigation." N.Y. State 990 (2013). "For example, the professional judgment of a lawyer asked to represent several individuals operating a joint venture is likely to be adversely affected to the extent that the lawyer is unable to recommend or advocate all possible positions that each client might take because of the lawyer's duty of loyalty to the others. The conflict in effect forecloses alternatives that would otherwise be available to the client. The mere possibility of subsequent harm does not itself require disclosure and consent. The critical questions are the likelihood that a difference in interests will eventuate and, if it does, whether it will adversely affect the lawyer's professional judgment in considering alternatives or foreclose courses of action that reasonably should be pursued on behalf of the client." N.Y. State 867 (2011). We believe, too, that a significant risk exists that the firm's fiduciary duty to one client would be compromised by its concurrent fiduciary duty to the other.

9. Even if separate lawyers in the inquirer's firm would represent Client One and Client Two in their matters, Rule 1.10(a) imputes such lawyers' representations, and thus the conflict, to the entire firm.

10. We are left, then, with the issue whether the conflict of interests may be waived for the law firm (one lawyer or different lawyers in that firm) to continue to represent both clients in their matters. Rule 1.7(a) is subject to Rule 1.7(b), which permits a conflict to be waived if the lawyer "reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client" and if each client gives "informed consent confirmed in writing." Rule 1.0(j) defines "informed consent" to mean "the agreement by a person to a proposed course of action after the lawyer has communicated information adequate for the person to make an informed decision, and after the lawyer has adequately explained to the person the material risks of the proposed course of conduct and reasonably available alternatives."

11. Whether a conflict of interest is subject to waiver is very fact-intensive and depends on a variety of factors of which we have limited knowledge here. Among these factors are the relationship between Clients One and Two, the timing of their respective hearings, the sophistication of the clients, their respective familiarity with the judicial processes they confront, and other matters. These considerations render us reluctant to conclude that a conflict may never be waived on the facts as presented. Nevertheless, we are very skeptical that informed consent is possible here, among other reasons because (1) Client Two's state of intoxication could be raised in both proceedings; (2) the possibility that inquirer's firm might cross-examine Client Two in Client One's proceeding (and vice versa); (3) the possibility that Client Two might have a change of mind about the content of testimony; (4) the judgment involved for both clients on questions such as which proceeding to push forward first, and whether to negotiate a plea; (5) the risk that the inquirer's firm might be tempted to withhold complete explanations of the considerations and risks to either client out of concern for harming the other's proceeding; (6) the ever-present possibility of negotiable plea options, which could adversely affect the legal interests of one client or the other; and (7) the inadvisability of Client One's counsel advising Client Two of Fifth Amendment issues.

12. We stress, finally, that our opinion is confined to an interpretation of the Rules and does not address issues under the Sixth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution on effective assistance of counsel. See United States v. Schwarz, 283 F.3d 76 (2nd Cir. 2002) (reversing conviction despite common defendants' informed consent to representation by one lawyer).

CONCLUSION:

13. It would be a conflict of interest for the inquirer's law firm concurrently to represent two clients in separate but related criminal matters in which each client would be a witness. Whether the two clients may provide informed consent to the concurrent representation is highly fact intensive subject to the considerations set forth in this opinion.

OPINION 1186 (04/22/2020)

TOPIC: Legal Aid Society; conflicts of interest; screening; definition of law firm

DIGEST: Screening cannot prevent imputation of a conflict under Rule 1.10(a). Certain elements of screening may be used to demonstrate that divisions or projects of a legal services organization constitute different law firms for purposes of the conflict's rules. But the bar is high to show that the firms are separate and not merely branches of a single entity.

RULES: Rule 1.0(h), 1.0(t), 1.7(a), 1.7(b), 1.10(a)

FACTS:

1. A Legal Aid Society (the "Society") in New York has two divisions. One is a civil division that has programs in the areas of family law, housing and consumer law, immigration law and education law, and the second division represents children in the Family Court of the county where the Society is located. The Society has found over the past several years that it has had an increasing number of conflicts arising between its two divisions, and within the programs in each division. For example, the Society has found that many of its clients who are children, and are represented by an attorney for the child, might also have their own housing or family law issue.

2. The Society would like to minimize conflicts through a firewall that would screen each program and division from the others. The Society believes that it has the ability to screen the programs from each other through its case management system. In addition, we are told that the housing program is on a different floor from the other programs.

QUESTION:

3. May a Legal Aid Society avoid conflict imputation between its two divisions and between programs in each division by screening them, or otherwise characterize each division or program as a separate law firm for the purposes of avoiding conflicts and conflict imputation?

OPINION:

Conflicts of Interest

4. We assume, for purposes of this opinion, that the Society is correct in its conclusion that certain representations in which it is asked to engage would involve a conflict of interest under the N.Y. Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules").

5. Rule 1.7(a) prohibits a lawyer from representing a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that either the representation will involve the lawyer in representing differing interests or there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected, among other things, by the lawyer's own business or personal interests. When lawyers are associated in a firm, Rule 1.10 attributes a conflict under Rule 1.7, 1.8 or 1.9 of one lawyer to all lawyers in the firm. See Rule 1.10(a) ("[w]hile lawyers are associated in a firm, none of them shall knowingly represent a client when any one of them practicing alone would be prohibited from doing so by Rule 1.7.").

6. A number of our prior opinions discuss conflicts in legal services offices. See, e.g., N.Y. State 975 (2013) (when Public Defender's office has three part-time criminal PDs and two part-time Family Court PDs, all of whom maintain their own private offices and who do not share files with each other, their conflicts are imputed to each other even though they work on a part-time basis and work in different divisions of the office); N.Y. State 973 (2013) (imputation of conflicts within a legal aid organization and waiver of imputed conflicts); N.Y. State 862 (2011) (imputing conflict from a public defender office to a part-time assistant public defender in private practice, and discussing waiver of the conflict).

Screening as a Cure for Conflicts

7. Although the inquiry asks about "firewalls," the term used in certain conflicts provisions of the Rules is "screening." See definition 1.0(t) ("Screened" or "screening" denotes the isolation of a lawyer from any participation in a matter through the timely imposition of procedures within a firm that are reasonably adequate under the circumstances to protect information that the isolated lawyer or the firm is obligated to protect under these Rules or other law.")

8. Comment [8] to Rule 1.0 makes clear that screening generally applies only when the screening of a personally disqualified lawyer is permitted to remove imputation of a conflict of interest under Rule 1.11 (former and current government officers and employees), Rule 1.12 (former judges, arbitrators, mediators or other third-party neutrals), or Rule 1.18 (lawyers who meet with prospective clients who do not become actual clients). Implicit in Comment [8] is that the Rules do not approve screening when a current conflict exists between clients under Rule 1.7(a), at least absent informed client consent confirmed in writing under Rule 1.7(b).

9. Our opinions support the conclusion that, with the exceptions noted above, a screen may not be used to eliminate conflicts under the conflict's rules. For example, in N.Y. State 876 (2011), which involved two separate firms that were unconnected to each other, but each of which had lawyers who were associated with a third firm, the inquirer asked whether the firms could avoid the imputation of conflicts by creating a screen (that is, the third firm would maintain its files electronically and make them available only to the attorneys of the third firm, and the third firm's files would be maintained physically at the two other firms in locked cabinets separated from the general files of the two firms, with locks preventing access to anyone other than attorneys of the third firm) and limiting the practice of the third law firm. The Committee responded:

> When two law firms are both associated with lawyers at a third firm, the conflicts of each firm are imputed to the lawyers in all three firms as if they were a single law firm. Screening, no matter how elaborate, cannot avoid that imputation. Therefore, the three law firms must conduct interrelated conflict checks as if they were one firm. The screening measures proposed here would prevent two of the law firms from checking for conflicts and would likewise deprive those two firms of the information necessary to obtain informed consent from clients to waive the imputation of any conflicts that might exist. Limiting the practice of the firm that will be screened does not change the analysis.

May the Society Structure itself into Different Law Firms?

10. Under Rule 1.0(h), a "firm" or "law firm" includes a qualified legal assistance organization under Rule 7.2(b)(1) – (4), including a legal aid office or public defender office operated by a bona fide non-profit community organization or by a governmental agency. But Comment [4] to the definition section makes clear that, in certain circumstances, a legal services organization may be considered to be more than one firm: "Depending upon the structure of the organization, the entire organization or components of it may constitute a firm or firms for purposes of these Rules." This proviso is limited to not-for-profit legal services organizations and has no impact on other legal services entities that fall within the definition of "firm" under the Rules.

11. Our opinions note that the determination of whether one or more entities constitute a firm is a fact-intensive one. See N.Y. State 1105 (2016) (where one firm lawyer, A, also received case assignments from local daytime courts when the county public defender's office had a conflict of interest, and another firm lawyer, B, accepted a part time position with the county public defender's office to represent clients in evening appearances, whether conflicts of the public defender office would be imputed to Lawyer A depended on whether the public defender's office constituted a single "law firm," which was a question of fact and depended on whether the public defender's office was organized so that matters heard in daytime and evening sessions were handled by different "firms.")

12. We have issued several opinions that discuss the structure that may be indicative of a separate law firm. These opinions focus, among other things, on the physical space where the divisions or projects (sometimes referred to as units) are located, the arrangement for maintaining separate files, including a case management system, the interaction between the units, and the management system for the separate units. See also N.Y. City 2009-3 (2009) (factors considered by courts in determining whether a law firm has effectively screened a conflicted lawyer include the timeliness of implementation, the size of the law firm, the size of the office space, the accessibility of files and the relative informality of office interaction, including the extent to which the disqualified lawyer has contact with lawyers working on the other matter). The operating mechanisms designed to create separate units should ensure that (1) the confidential information of clients of each "firm" is not shared with the other firm or firms, (2) the professional judgment of the lawyers in each firm is not affected by close association with the other firm, and (3) public confidence that the Rules are complied with is maintained.

Office Space and Files

13. Several of our opinions have focused on physical space and access to files. N.Y. State 794 (2006) involved a law school legal clinic which had different projects, such as civil rights and domestic violence, and wanted to start a legal clinic involving consumer protection. The law school planned to hire an outside lawyer as the part-time director of the clinic and wanted to avoid the imputation of conflicts to and from the outside lawyer's law firm. The clinic proposed various measures to segregate the projects, including that (1) the offices of the supervising lawyers would not be part of the clinic's common space, although students assigned to the consumer project would continue to work side-by-side with students assigned to other projects; and (2) the consumer project and the other projects would each have exclusive access to a separate client information database for storing documents electronically, although client files would be physically located in the common clinic space. In that opinion, decided under the equivalent provisions of the former Code of Professional Responsibility, we said:

> The sharing of merely the same leasehold, a library, an electronic research account, restrooms, a central phone system with individual lines, or a common receptionist is not sufficient, alone or in combination, to merge lawyers in separate practices into one. Acceptance of these organizations presupposes, however, that the confidences and secrets of the clients of each separate practice will not be shared or appear to be subject to sharing with lawyers working on a conflicting matter.

14. Nevertheless, this Committee objected to the proposed layout of the proposed clinic space, because students involved in the consumer project would be working side-by-side in the same space with students working on the clinic's other matters, and because, even though an electronic barrier would be erected to prevent access to client documents on the electronic database, no physical barrier would separate consumer project students from access to the physical files of other clinic matters, or vice versa. We therefore opined that the legal clinic should be treated as a single law firm:

> Two or more lawyers carrying out conflicting assignments in close proximity in the same space with common tables, facilities, and files engender subtle influences that could affect the exercise of independent professional judgment. EC 5-21, EC 5-23. These "numerous influences might weigh against the unswerving fidelity to the client's interest that professional duty compels." ABA Inf. 1474 (1982) (quoting ABA Inf. 1235 (1972)). In addition, there is a "real danger that a client's confidences and secrets will be divulged" through the use of "shared clerical staff, common files, or otherwise." ABA Inf. 1474 (1972)). "If the physical organization of the office suite places client confidences at risk, it is appropriate to treat the association as a firm or to determine that adverse interests may not be represented." Commonwealth v. Alison, 434 Mass. 670, 691, 751 N.E.2d 868, 890 (2001).

See also N.Y. State 1085 (2016) ¶ 6 (quoting N.Y. State 794 as opining that "[s]o long as the clinic's students work in a common space and have shared access to physical files, the entire legal clinic, including the project in question, is a law firm").

15. These opinions contrast sharply with the facts in N.Y. State 1141 (2017), in which a law school's clinical education program proposed to have students collaborate as co-counsel with a New York not-for-profit legal services organization. The clinic and the legal services organization were financially separate, operated out of different offices, maintained their own files, did not share any overlapping personnel, and represented numerous clients other than those in which they would serve as co-counsel. There, we said that the two entities would not be considered "associated" for purposes of imputing all conflicts of each firm to the other.

16. In determining the risk that client confidences may be shared, it is important to consider the size of the physical space and the interaction between the lawyers. New York courts, when determining if a moving lawyer should be able to rebut the presumption that he or she acquired confidences of a former client before moving to a new firm, have adopted special rules that apply where the former firm was small. See Cardinale v. Golinello, 43 N.Y.2d 288, 372 N.E.2d 26 (1977). Cardinale and its progeny suggest that, when the original firm is small, and characterized by informality, "constant cross pollination" and a "cross current of discussion and ideas" among the firm's attorneys, and when all firm files are open and available to all lawyers in the firm, then the presumption that the moving lawyer gained confidential information at the first firm is not subject to rebuttal. Similar considerations may apply to the creation of separate firms when a legal services organization is small and characterized by a cross current of discussion and ideas. Even in a legal services organization in a large city, if the lawyers in different units share common eating spaces and discuss cases over lunch or at coffee breaks, it may be problematic to characterize them as separate firms.

17. The Rules governing confidentiality also require special precautions where the different units use a single email system. For example, in N.Y. State 1102 (2016), we discussed the design of the office space of the in-house legal department of an insurance company that represented the company's insureds. After discussing the physical separation of space and files, we turned to whether the use of the insurance company's computer system would adequately safeguard client confidential information. Citing N.Y. State 939 (2012), we analogized, to lawyers who shared office space as well as a single computer, when each lawyer had a separate administrative password to the computer that was not known to the others. In addition, we noted another potential obstacle to confidentiality:

> Here, if the insurance company's technical administrators have access to the Department's client files and are not prohibited from sharing them with persons outside the Department, the lawyers in the Department will be violating their duty to preserve the confidentiality of client information.

18. Moreover, if a single office-wide email system were used to communicate with lawyers in different units, the units might seem more like branches of a single entity than like separate "firms" and might undermine the management considerations discussed below.

Law Firm Management

19. Another consideration in determining whether different units of a legal services firm should be considered separate firms is the manner in which the units are managed, which is indicative of the independence of the units. For example, in N.Y. 914 (2012) we considered whether a "conflict panel" of lawyers established to provide legal assistance to clients who could not be served by the local Legal Aid office because of a conflict of interest should be considered part of the same firm as the Legal Aid office. We concluded that, because neither the Legal Aid office nor its lawyers would exercise any supervision or control over the legal services provided by the conflict panel, they were not part of the same firm.

20. In contrast, N.Y. State 975 (2013) involved a small upstate county whose Public Defender's office had three part-time criminal PDs and two part-time Family Court PDs, all of whom maintained their own private offices and who did not share files with each other. Despite these facts, we concluded that the Public Defender was still a single law firm:

> While it is relevant that in actual practice the Assistants work independently, that factor is outweighed by others. The structure of the office and the central role of the Public Defender are prescribed by statutory provisions [citing County Law § 716]. There is a single attorney who is the Public Defender and who is publicly listed with that title. The other attorneys in the office serve as Assistant Public Defenders and are publicly identified as such. The Public Defender appoints those assistants, and fixes their compensation, subject to authorization by the board of supervisors. It is the Public Defender who is statutorily charged with representing the clients of the office. See County Law § 701(2). . . . We accept the inquirer's representation that the defenders typically do not share assignments or files, but they could, consistent with the underlying statutory provisions, sometimes work together collaboratively.

21. N.Y. State 1036 (2014) involved a national legal services project focusing on immigration matters. The project had a national board, which also employed several lawyers at the national level, as well as a number of separately incorporated local sections. The local sections received both national and local financing. They also shared the same logo, and a case management system that enabled each attorney to have access to the information of all of the project's clients in all sections, and did not have a reliable means for confining confidential information to any one office. In addition, the national board designated several lawyers as "Regional Attorneys" to supervise the attorneys in multiple state offices. We concluded that the regional offices and the national office constituted a single law firm. The project's use of a single case management system with shared access to client files was dispositive. Similarly, the fact that regional supervisors oversaw local lawyers indicated that the local lawyers were not acting independently.

22. Some central management activities would certainly not run afoul of this common management prohibition. For example, we believe that central fundraising and HR activities would be permitted. At the other end of the spectrum, supervision of legal matters in all entities clearly would be prohibited. Between those extremes – for example, in the setting of budgets – there are many activities that are fact specific and inappropriate for general advice. In all cases, the access to confidential information of persons with central management authority should be restricted.

Public Appearance

23. Finally, it is important to note that Comment [2] to Rule 1.0 (on the definition of "Firm") says, with respect to lawyers who share offices, "if they present themselves to the public in a way that suggests that they are a firm . . . they should be regarded as a firm for purposes of these Rules." This may present problems where the units "holistically" represent a single client, e.g., if the housing unit commonly refers its clients to another unit for help with other legal problems without emphasizing that the two units are separate firms and do not share information without the client's consent. Similarly, where the units share a single office building, it would be important for the Society to expressly communicate that its units are separate firms so that the public is not confused.

24. In summary, to qualify as a separate "firm" under the Rules, a unit of a legal services organization must ensure the confidentiality of client confidences. Separate physical space helps to achieve that goal. Our opinions have objected where divisional or project lawyers have too much interaction with those in another unit. See N.Y. State 794 (2006) (students from different projects would work side-by-side). Confidentiality also requires that client files of each unit not be accessible to lawyers in the other firm or firms. But separate space and files alone are not enough when the programs are managed by a common manager. See N.Y. State 975 (2013) (separate space and files are not sufficient if management of the programs is done centrally); N.Y. State 1036 (single case management system and supervision across different local offices made the offices more like branch offices of a single firm than like separate firms).

25. The Society here has one division occupying a separate floor. Whether that will be enough to support designation as a separate firm will depend on the degree of interaction between lawyers in that division and those in other divisions or projects, how client files are maintained, how the various projects are supervised and managed and how the various projects present themselves to the public. As for the projects that share space, it will be more difficult to establish the necessary separateness for purposes of the definition of "firm" or in the minds of clients or the public. In order to demonstrate that different units are separate firms, the Society must also demonstrate that each firm is managed and operated independently. While having certain shared services, such as a library, an HR department, and a telephone system, are not inconsistent with having separate firms, central management of legal matters and legal policy for all divisions and projects would be problematical.

CONCLUSION:

26. Firewalls and screens cannot prevent imputation of a conflict under Rule 1.10(a). In the context of not-for-profit legal aid organizations, certain elements of screening may be used to demonstrate that divisions or projects of a legal services organization constitute different law firms for purposed of the conflict's rules. But the bar is high to show that the "firms" are separate and not merely branches of a single entity.

OPINION 1187 (05/06/2020)

TOPIC: Police officer representing traffic court defendants

DIGEST: A lawyer who is a Village police officer may not represent defendants in traffic court in the county where the Village police department is located. Whether the officer may do so in other counties depends on the facts and circumstances, and is subject to compliance with both the rules governing conflicts of interest for lawyers in private practice and the rules governing lawyers serving as public officers or employees.

RULES: 1.7(a), 1.7(b), 1.11(c), 1.11(d), and 1.11(f)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a police officer with a Village Police Department in New York and is admitted to practice law in New York. The inquirer wants to represent defendants in traffic court, both in the county where the inquirer serves as a police officer and in other counties. According to the inquirer, traffic infractions are ordinarily classified as "violations," not as misdemeanors or felonies, and thus are not "crimes" in New York as the inquirer understands that term. In our understanding, some traffic infractions may be deemed crimes (driving while intoxicated, for example), but accept for our purposes that others may not be.

QUESTION:

2. May a lawyer who is a Village police officer represent defendants in a county traffic court, either in the county where the Village police department is located or in other counties?

OPINION:

3. The N.Y. Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") impose certain duties on a lawyer currently serving as a public officer such as a police officer. In N.Y. State 615 (1991), we considered whether a police officer could represent a criminal defendant consistent with DR 9-101(B) of the Code of Professional Responsibility (the "Code'), the predecessor of the Rules. DR 9-101(B) said that a lawyer "shall not represent a private client in connection with a matter in which the lawyer participated personally and substantially as a public officer or employee." In Opinion 615, we concluded that "a former police officer could not as lawyer represent a criminal defendant in any matter in which the lawyer had personally participated as a police officer." It went without saying that, if a former lawyer/police officer was barred from representing a criminal defendant in a matter in which the officer had participated personally and substantially, then a current police officer would be barred from such conduct as well.

4. Rule 1.11(d), which is the successor to DR 9-101(B), says:

> (d) Except as law may otherwise expressly provide, a lawyer currently serving as a public officer or employee shall not:

> (1) participate in a matter in which the lawyer participated personally and substantially while in private practice or nongovernmental employment, unless under applicable law no one is, or by lawful delegation may be, authorized to act in the lawyer's stead in the matter; or
> (2) negotiate for private employment with any person who is involved as a party or as lawyer for a party in a matter in which the lawyer is participating personally and substantially.

5. Our jurisdiction is limited to questions arising under the Rules and does not extend to questions of law. Thus, we express no view on whether "law may otherwise expressly provide" contrary to the language of Rule 1.11.

6. Under Rule 1.11(d)(1), if the inquirer has represented defendants of any kind in the past or begins representing traffic court defendants going forward, the inquirer would be prohibited from working as a "public officer or employee" – including as a police officer – on any matter in which the inquirer "participated personally and substantially" while in nongovernmental employment.

7. Under Rule 1.11(d)(2), the inquirer may not negotiate to represent (or agree to represent) any traffic court defendant as a private client if that defendant "is involved as a party or as lawyer for a party in a matter in which the lawyer is participating personally and substantially." For example, if the inquirer is participating personally and substantially in investigating X with respect to drug dealing, then Rule 1.11(d)(2) would prohibit the inquirer from representing X in traffic court. This would be so even if the traffic court matter is wholly unrelated to the drug investigation. A public officer or employee who is a lawyer may not serve as a private lawyer for any person "involved" in a government matter in which the lawyer is participating personally and substantially, whether the person is involved as a witness, a suspect, an independent contractor, a government supervisor, or otherwise.

8. When acting as a private defense lawyer, the inquirer must also comply with Rule 1.11(c), which provides:

> Except as law may otherwise expressly provide, a lawyer having information that the lawyer knows is confidential government information about a person, acquired when the lawyer was a public officer or employee, may not represent a private client whose interests are adverse to that person in a matter in which the information could be used to the material disadvantage of that person. . . .

Rule 1.11(c) defines the term "confidential government information" to mean "information that has been obtained under governmental authority and that, at the time this Rule is applied, the government is prohibited by law from disclosing to the public or has a legal privilege not to disclose, and that is not otherwise available to the public." For example, if the inquirer knows of unfavorable employment reviews or non-public job discipline imposed on a police officer who is a witness in a traffic court matter, and if that information "could be used to the material disadvantage" of that person in plea negotiations or impeachment, then the inquirer may not represent a traffic court defendant in that matter.

9. The inquirer must also abide by Rule 1.11(f), which says (in pertinent part) that a lawyer shall not "use the public position to influence, or attempt to influence, a tribunal to act in favor of the lawyer or of a client; or accept anything of value from any person when the lawyer knows or it is obvious that the offer is for the purpose of influencing the lawyer's action as a public official." By way of easy illustration, the inquirer may not suggest to a traffic court judge that the inquirer could use a public position as a police officer to give special treatment to the traffic court judge if the judge is caught speeding. Likewise, the inquirer may not accept an outsize fee or expensive gift from a traffic court client if it is obvious that the fee or gift is for the purpose of influencing the inquirer's actions as a police officer.

10. We recently applied Rules 1.7 and 1.11 in N.Y. State 1170 (2019), in which a Village attorney asked about the ethical implications of appearing in Town Justice Court defending clients who were facing charges that did not involve the Village. There, we said:

> A Village Attorney who does not represent the Village in court or in criminal matters is not ethically prohibited from representing private clients in defense of Vehicle and Traffic Law violations, criminal proceedings, or Town Ordinance violation cases brought in the Town Justice Court, funded exclusively by the Town, that adjudicates Village Ordinance violations, provided that no unconsented financial or business conflicts of interest exist under Rule 1.7(a)(2), and provided that the provisions on current government employees in Rule 1.11 are respected.

11. We reach an analogous conclusion here. On our view, whether a police officer may represent clients in traffic violation matters depends on the facts and circumstances of the representation, with two caveats. First, a police officer engaged in private legal practice may not represent traffic court defendants in the same county where the police officer works, because such conflicts arising under Rule 1.7(a)(2) would on our view not be subject to consent under Rule 1.7(b)(1). Second, whatever confidential information the inquirer learns in private practice with respect to a traffic court client or prospective client, the inquirer must not use or reveal that information to advance his work as a Village police officer except as permitted by Rules 1.6, 1.9(c), and 1.18(b).

12. In N.Y. State 615, we considered whether conflicts of interest would arise if a lawyer who was a police officer represented criminal defendants in private practice. We concluded that conflicts would arise. We said that "it is impermissible for the firm to practice criminal law in the town and village courts because it would be inappropriate for the police officer personally to represent criminal defendants." We explained our reasoning as follows:

> . . . [A] criminal defendant is entitled to a defense and representation of undivided loyalty within the limits of the law.
> No matter how earnest and complete a defense the lawyer provides, there is an obvious danger that a convicted defendant will believe that his defense was inadequate because of the lawyer's bias as a police officer. Conversely, the public might lose faith in the criminal justice system if it believes that the lawyer was employed in the hope that the lawyer's position as a police officer might enable the lawyer to obtain more lenient treatment for the defendant. A police officer is widely viewed as a representative of the people. We believe that the representation of a criminal defendant by a police officer could lessen public confidence in the integrity of the criminal justice system. Furthermore, the dual roles of police officer and defense attorney could find the lawyer chal> lenging in the latter capacity the very laws the police officer is sworn to enforce in the former capacity.

> Thus we find that DR 5-101(A) renders impermissible the lawyer's representation of criminal defendants. . . .

13. That the inquirer here may be defending infractions rather than crimes does not alter our conclusion. In N.Y. State 615, we relied on DR 5-101(A). The successor to DR 5-101(A) in our current Rules is Rule 1.7(a)(2), which provides, in pertinent part, as follows:

> (a) Except as provided in paragraph (b), a lawyer shall not represent a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that . . .
> > (2) there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests.
> > (b) Notwithstanding the existence of a concurrent conflict of interest under paragraph (a), a lawyer may represent a client if:
> > > (1) the lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client;
> > > (2) the representation is not prohibited by law; . . . and
> > > (4) each affected client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing.

14. Applying Rule 1.7(a)(2) to the facts before us, we believe that a reasonable lawyer would perceive a "significant risk" that, in some cases, the inquirer's professional judgment on behalf of a traffic court client will be adversely affected by the inquirer's financial and personal interests. The inquirer's financial and personal interests include staying in the good graces of his superiors on the police force and in Village government, as well as not incurring the wrath of peers in police departments in the Village and in other towns and villages. For example, when representing a traffic court defendant, the inquirer might be inhibited from arguing that a given police technique is defective, or might be inhibited from arguing that a police officer witness is lying, or might be inhibited from arguing that a defendant was ticketed solely so that an officer could make a quota. In any situation presenting such conflicts of interest, the inquirer may not take on the representation of a traffic court defendant unless the conflict is subject to consent and the inquirer obtains the client's informed consent pursuant to Rule 1.7(b).

15. Applying Rule 1.7(b)(1), our analysis of consent depends on whether the traffic court matter is in the same county where the inquirer serves as a police officer or instead in some other county. When a traffic court defendant will appear in a traffic court in the same county where the inquirer serves as a police officer, we believe the conflict is not subject to consent. But in other counties, the outcome will turn on whether the inquirer reasonably believes the inquirer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to the traffic court defendant as required by subparagraph (b)(1). This is a case-by-case determination, depending on all of the facts and circumstances.

16. For example, one relevant circumstance will be the relationship between the nature of the traffic violation and the inquirer's work as a police officer. By way of modest example, if the inquirer as a police officer is currently a witness against a driver who made an improper left turn at a busy intersection, then the inquirer as a private lawyer may be unable to provide competent and diligent representation to a defendant charged with making an improper left turn at a busy intersection. Each representation of a traffic court defendant will require a separate analysis taking into account all of the facts and circumstances of both the particular representation and the inquirer's responsibilities and experience as a police officer. In the event that the inquirer concludes that a conflict may exist but is subject to consent, then under Rule 1.7(b)(4) the consent must be "informed consent, confirmed in writing."

CONCLUSION:

17. A lawyer who is a Village police officer may not represent defendants in traffic court in the county where the Village police department is located. Whether a police officer may represent traffic court defendants in private practice in other counties depends on the facts and circumstances of the representation, and is subject to compliance with both the rules governing lawyers serving as public officers or employees and the rules governing conflicts of interest for lawyers in private practice.

OPINION 1188 (05/06/2020)

TOPIC: Attorney Trust Accounts; Deposit of Estate Funds in Attorney Trust Accounts

DIGEST: A lawyer who receives estate funds solely as co-executor of an estate may not use an attorney trust account to hold or disburse such funds

RULE: 1.15(b)(1)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a New York attorney who, together with a family relative, was designated in a will as a co-executor of an estate. The two co-executors were issued Letters Testamentary, and had been co-signers on an estate bank account. The inquirer uncovered unauthorized transactions in the estate account, and upon queries to the bank the account was frozen. The inquirer is not counsel to the estate, but acting through such counsel the inquirer has applied in the Surrogate's Court for removal of the co-executor, an application that remains pending. In the interim, the estate faces assorted time-sensitive expenses to preserve estate assets, but the co-executor has refused to open a new estate bank account that would require both to co-sign on all withdrawals. As an alternative, the inquirer proposes to use an attorney trust account through a separate sub-account for the estate to deposit funds payable to the estate and to pay emergency expenses on behalf of the estate; the co-executor has consented to this arrangement. The inquirer is concerned whether doing so comports with the N.Y. Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules").

QUESTION:

2. May a lawyer use an attorney trust account to receive and disburse funds on behalf of an estate of which the inquirer is the co-executor when such funds come into the inquirer's possession solely as an executor of the estate and not as a lawyer for the estate?

3. Rule 1.15(b)(1) provides, in relevant part, that a "lawyer who is in possession of funds belonging to another person incident to the lawyer's practice of law shall maintain such funds in a banking institution within New York State. . . . Such funds shall be maintained in the lawyer's own name, or in the name of a firm of lawyers of which the lawyer is a member, or in the name of the lawyer or firm of lawyers by whom the lawyer is employed, in a special account or accounts separate from any business or personal accounts of the lawyer or lawyer's firm, and separate from any accounts that the lawyer may maintain as executor, guardian, trustee or receiver, or in any other fiduciary capacity."

4. Rule 1.15(b)(1) identifies two species of accounts that a lawyer may maintain when the lawyer holds funds belonging to another. One is an account "incident to the practice of law" and the other is an account the lawyer holds in other fiduciary capacities, among them as an executor.

5. An attorney trust account is solely for funds received "incident to the lawyer's practice of law" and therefore should not be used to hold funds that an attorney receives in any other capacity. Yet we acknowledge that lawyers often do receive funds that are not incident to the lawyer's legal practice, and so the Rules recognize this fact. For instance, Comment [1] to Rule 1.15 says that "[s]eparate trust accounts may be warranted or required when administering estate monies or acting in similar fiduciary capacities."

6. On our view, the inquirer's receipt of estate funds would not be considered incident to the practice of law. The estate has its own lawyer. It appears that the inquirer was designated as co-executor for reasons unrelated to any status as a lawyer, perhaps a familial one.

7. We have previously dealt with relationships that fall within the ambit of "incident to the practice of law." For instance, in N.Y. State 1143 (2018), we concluded that an attorney serving as a court-appointed referee to conduct foreclosure sales could ethically deposit sale proceeds into the firm's IOLA account because the referee's tasks – executing a referee's deed, obtaining the purchase deposit, executing the memorandum of sale and the report of sale, calculating the final amount due, and distributing the funds in accordance with the judgment – constituted activity "incident to the practice of law" even though non-lawyers are legally eligible to serve as foreclosure referees. Similarly, in N.Y. State 907 (2012), we said that an attorney could use an attorney trust account to make an anonymous charitable donation on behalf of a client based on our view that the attorney was doing so incident to a legal practice, though we cautioned that, if the facts were otherwise, "it may be necessary for the attorney" to set up a separate account.

8. Finally, while questions of law are beyond the purview of this Committee, we note that controlling statutes may dictate the permissibility of the conduct in question without regard to the Rules. See e.g., EPTL § 11-1.6(a) and SCPA § 719(7). As Comment [5] to Rule 1.15 notes, "The obligations of a lawyer under this Rule are independent of those arising from activity other than rendering legal services."

CONCLUSION:

9. A lawyer who receives funds belonging to another may not use an attorney trust account to manage the funds if the funds were not received incident to the practice of law but instead solely in another fiduciary capacity as an executor of an estate.

OPINION 1189 (05/22/2020)

TOPIC: Obtaining and using alternate client contact information

DIGEST: A lawyer may ask a client to designate an alternate contact person, and as needed may contact that person so as to reach the client

RULES: 1.4, 1.6

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is concerned about situations in which it becomes hard to reach clients. As an example, the inquirer notes having been "in regular contact with [a client] for a litigation and related settlement negotiations. But since the ongoing COVID 19 pandemic, [the inquirer has] been unable to reach him by email or phone despite multiple attempts."

2. The inquiry notes that if the inquirer had "emergency contact information" for the client, then the inquirer could call a designated emergency contact person and "introduce myself as the client's lawyer and inquire whether everything is okay with the client" or "whether something (e.g., a medical issue, death) is impacting my client's ability to communicate."

3. Such an inquiry could result in useful information, possibly by revealing that the client had passed away or was hospitalized, or even in the absence of medical developments, by revealing an alternate means for getting in touch with a hard-to-reach client.

QUESTIONS:

4. Is it permissible to ask a client to designate a third person contact in case, due to an emergency or for other reasons, the lawyer cannot reach the client directly?

5. If so, when is it permissible to contact the designated person, and in doing so, what may be disclosed?

OPINION:

6. The inquirer's goal of maintaining the ability to reach clients is plainly salutary. The New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"), including especially Rule 1.4, make clear that adequate communication with clients is essential to proper representation.

7. For there to be adequate communication, the attorney and client need effective means of reaching each other. Thus at the formation of an attorney-client relationship, it is a good idea for the lawyer to request, and for the client to provide, sufficient contact information for the lawyer to reach the client as needed.

8. The contact information for reaching the client may of course include basic items such as telephone numbers and mail and email addresses for the lawyer to use in the first instance. But no ethical rule prevents the sharing of additional "emergency" or alternate methods such as the names and contact information of one or more persons likely to know the status and whereabouts of the client if and when it becomes hard to reach the client directly. In some situations, such as when the lawyer knows family members or business colleagues of the client, there may be little reason to ask for such information. In other situations there may be more reason for the lawyer to make such a request, and it is for the client to determine what information to provide.

9. Unless the lawyer and client have agreed to restrict the lawyer's resort to the alternate channel of communication, no specific triggering event is required before the lawyer may use that channel. In particular, if a time comes when the lawyer's usual means for reaching the client are unavailing, then the lawyer may try to reach the client by communicating with the designated alternate contact person.

10. The inquiry reflects a concern about the possible disclosure of confidential information to the designated alternate contact person. There is little basis for that concern.

11. If a lawyer has occasion to reach out to a client's alternate contact person, the lawyer would not need to disclose much information if any. Perhaps the lawyer might need to explain that the lawyer has reason to communicate with, but has had trouble reaching, the client. That minimal information should usually suffice, because presumably the person designated by the client would be sympathetic to the lawyer's need to communicate. Indeed, it would be a good practice for the client to have discussed these matters with that person at the time of the designation.

12. Typically, that minimal information would not be confidential, because it is not privileged; it is unlikely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed; and the client, far from having requested that the information be kept confidential, accepted that the lawyer may have reason to disclose it to the alternate contact person designated by the client. See Rule 1.6(a) (definition of "confidential information").

13. Admittedly it is possible to imagine scenarios that could implicate confidentiality issues. For example, the designated contact person, as a condition for the requested help, could demand to be told what information the lawyer needs to discuss with the client. Perhaps a more common scenario would be one in which embarrassment or detriment could result from the mere fact that the client was represented by a particular lawyer, such as one with a specialization in criminal law or divorce.

14. In those kinds of cases, the lawyer would have to consider whether the information to be disclosed with the designated contact is confidential under Rule 1.6(a); whether under Rule 1.6(a)(1) the client expressly consented to disclosure as part of the designation; whether there is implied authorization to disclose under Rule 1.6(a)(2); and whether there are any other applicable exceptions under Rule 1.6(b). But apart from such scenarios, which seem unlikely to occur very frequently, the lawyer will not need to engage in this analysis.

15. Our conclusion that a lawyer may communicate with a designated alternate contact person should not be taken to imply that a lawyer is stymied when the client has not made such a designation. We have addressed the inquirer's question, which is specifically about a designation by the client. But even in the absence of such a designation, a lawyer may have reason to try to reach a client who does not answer to the usual methods. If the lawyer knows or can learn of third persons who might have information about the client's status or whereabouts, the lawyer could contact such third persons and, as discussed above, could inquire about the client without disclosing confidential information.

16. The permissibility of contacting third parties in the absence of a designation does not undercut the possible value of discussing the matter and making a designation when the lawyer is retained. As a matter of best practices rather than ethical obligation, and depending on the circumstances, there could be value for the lawyer and client to agree on communication procedures in a variety of situations, including emergency contacts and the circumstances that would lead the lawyer to use them, and to update such procedures as appropriate, including revocation of the designation if at any time the client should so desire. Such consultation may be especially valuable when the client would be reluctant for others to know about the very fact of the representation.

CONCLUSION:

17. A lawyer, so as to protect the ability to reach and communicate with a client, may ask the client to designate a person for the lawyer to contact in the event the lawyer is unable otherwise to reach the client.

18. In the event the lawyer is unable to reach the client using ordinary means, the lawyer may, in most circumstances, contact the person designated by the client and may disclose that the lawyer has reason to reach the client but has been unable to do so.

OPINION 1190 (05/22/2020)

TOPIC: Professional limited liability company to provide legal services with non-lawyer members

DIGEST: A professional limited liability company with nonlawyer members may not provide legal services.

RULES: Rule 5.4 (d)(3)

FACTS:

1. The committee has received an inquiry from a lawyer admitted to practice in the state of New York who is a sole practitioner doing business though a Professional Limited Liability Company (PLLC) of which the lawyer is the sole member. The PLLC has no employees. The inquirer proposes to add family members who are not lawyers as minority members of the PLLC so that they can receive retirement and health insurance benefits through the PLLC.

QUESTION:

2. Is it ethically permissible for non-attorneys to be members of a PLLC providing legal services?

OPINION:

3. New York Rule of Professional Conduct 5.4, entitled, "Professional Independence of a Lawyer," contains various provisions to ensure that a lawyer's representation of clients is not tainted by the influence of persons not bound to the tenets underlying the profession. A principle of great importance is that stated in the title of this rule, that a lawyer must maintain professional independence. Thus, a lawyer may not share fees with a non-lawyer (5.4(a)), a lawyer may not form a partnership with a nonlawyer if any of the activities of the partnership consist of the practice of law (5.4(b)), A lawyer may not permit someone who recommends, employs or pays the lawyer to control the lawyer's professional judgment or to interfere with the lawyer's duty of confidentiality (5.4 (c)), and, relevant to this inquiry, a lawyer must not practice with or in the form of a for-profit entity wherein a nonlawyer owns any interest, or a nonlawyer holds a position as a member, director or officer, or occupies a position of similar responsibility in a non-corporate association (5.4(d)).

4. Applying Rule 5.4, this committee has opined that: 1) A patent attorney cannot offer non-distinct (mixed legal and non-legal) services in, among other situations, a business where the lawyer owns the business with a nonlawyer, N. Y. State 1166. 2) A New York lawyer may not partner with a D. C. lawyer who has nonlawyer partners in the lawyer's D. C. practice, N.Y. State 1038. 3) A lawyer may not partner with or be employed by a nonlawyer to offer legal services as part of a "disability office," N.Y. State 992. 4) A lawyer who works for a debt-management company owned by a nonlawyer may not offer legal services to the company's clients, N.Y. State 1081. 5) A lawyer cannot practice principally in New York if working for a United Kingdom firm with nonlawyer owners, N.Y. State 911.

5. The Inquirer notes this Rule, but still asks if the exception stated in Rule 5.4 (a)(3) to permit law firms to include nonlawyer employees in a retirement plan based on a profit-sharing arrangement would include the minority members of a PLLC who are not employees, and if the Committee could include other employee benefits in this exception. The committee has no authority to expand Rules beyond their clear meaning. A "member" of a PLLC is defined in the New York State Limited Liability Law as a person with a "membership interest." A membership interest includes all the indicia of ownership: a right to share in profits and losses, a right to dividends, and a right to vote and participate in management. N.Y. Limited Liability Law § 102 (q, r). The meaning of "Employee" in the Rule at issue is as the term is commonly understood, and the Inquirer has stated that the family members he wishes to include are not employees.

6. Finally, while this Committee does not decide questions of law, it is worth noting that the New York Limited Liability Company Law does not permit PLLCs that practice law to have nonlawyer members. §1203. This provision is in accord with the N. Y. Business Corporation Law (BCL) dealing with Professional Corporations (Article 15), and, of course with N.Y. Judiciary Law §495. In N.Y. State 934, a lawyer who had withdrawn as a partner in a firm but remained "of counsel" to the firm wanted his compensation from the firm to be paid into a subchapter S corporation in which his spouse was a shareholder. The opinion found that the payment for the practice of law could not be made to the S corporation, because the BCL did not permit nonlawyers to own any interest in a Professional Corporation formed to practice law. (N.Y. BCL §1503.)

CONCLUSION:

Therefore, because the contemplated conduct is specifically proscribed by Rule 5.4(d), the Inquirer may not practice law in a PLLC that has nonlawyers as members.

OPINION 1191 (05/26/2020)

TOPIC: Duty to Municipal Organization; Conflicts of Interest

DIGEST: Counsel for a municipal corporation owes a duty solely to the municipal corporation. Upon learning information of serious allegations by municipal employees injurious to the municipality, corporation counsel should report the information to higher authorities within the municipal unit, including, if need be, to the highest authority. A prior or current representation of the employees in their official capacities does not relieve the corporate counsel of this duty.

RULES: 1.6, 1.7, 1.9, and 1.13

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a New York attorney who is chief counsel to a New York municipal corporation. The corporation counsel's office is responsible for representing the municipality and its employees when sued in an official capacity. If a conflict exists between the municipal corporation and one or more employees, the counsel's office retains outside counsel.

2. The corporation counsel's office is responsible as well for reviewing and investigating allegations of wrongdoing by municipal employees. Recently, the corporation counsel has learned of serious and credible allegations against certain employees, including supervisory employees, who may have engaged in the misappropriation of municipal funds of substantial injury to the municipality. The allegations concern the misuse of funds for work that the employees did not discharge.

3. As corporation counsel, the inquirer has represented some of the alleged wrongdoers in their official capacity, either currently or in the past.

QUESTIONS:

4. The inquirer's questions are best reduced to two:

> (a) What are the obligations of a municipal counsel when faced with serious and credible allegations of wrongdoing by municipal employees adversely affecting the municipal corporation?
> (b) What are the municipal counsel's duties when the counsel's office has previously represented, or continues to represent, the alleged wrongdoers, in their official capacities?

OPINION:

5. Rule 1.13 of the N.Y. Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") governs this inquiry. "The duties defined in this Rule apply to government organizations." Rule 1.13, Cmt. [9]. Under that Rule, the inquirer's client is the municipal corporation and not any of its constituents. Rule 1.13(a) says:

> When a lawyer employed or retained by an organization is dealing with the organization's directors, officers, employees, members, shareholders or other constituent, and it > appears that the organization's interests may differ from those with whom the lawyer is dealing, the lawyer shall explain that the lawyer is the lawyer for the organization and not for any of its constituents.

Rule 1.13 (b) continues:

> If a lawyer for the organization knows that an officer, employee or other person associated with the organization is engaged in action or intends to act or refuses to act in a matter related to the representation that (i) is a violation of a legal obligation to the organization or a violation of law that reasonably might be imputed to the organization, and (ii) is likely to result in substantial injury to the organization, then the lawyer shall proceed as is reasonably necessary in the best interest of the organization.

6. The legal rights and duties of a municipal corporate counsel may vary by municipality, so we are in no position to establish a general standard of conduct in all circumstances. If, however, the municipal corporate counsel reaches the conclusions set out in Rule 1.13(b), and lacks authority to act on the his or her own power without violating Rule 1.6 on the protection of confidential information owned by the municipal corporation (such as a reference to a county District Attorney), then Rule 1.13(b)(3) permits the lawyer to refer the matter "to higher authority in the organization, including, if warranted by the seriousness of the matter, referral to the highest authority that can act in behalf of the organization as determined by applicable law." The "applicable law" is beyond our jurisdiction to decide, but for purpose of this inquiry we assume that the highest authority in a municipality is its chief executive (a mayor or town executive) or its governing body (a town committee, a village board, etc.).

7. Accordingly, if the inquire concludes, as the facts suggest, that municipal employees are engaged in conduct that violates the employees' duties to the municipal corporation, may result in liability to that municipal corporation, and may result in substantial injury to the municipal corporation, then Rule 1.13 obligates the corporate counsel to report the conduct to a higher authority such as the municipality's chief executive or governing body. Whether the corporate counsel may disclose the information if the municipal officials do not act on the disclosure depends on whether disclosure is permitted under Rule 1.6(b), including whether disclosure is "required" by law. Not able to opine on legal questions owing to limits on our jurisdiction, we offer no view on whether the corporate counsel may disclose the municipality's confidential information to third persons, with some confidence that disclosure to the higher authorities may excite some action.

8. That the corporation counsel may have previously represented one or more of the affected employees in their official capacity but in unrelated matters does not affect this duty. Rule 1.9 prohibits a lawyer from representing another person in "the same or substantially related matter in which that person's interests are materially adverse to the interests of the former client unless the former client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing." Nothing in the inquiry suggests that any prior representation of the affected employees was in any way related to the allegations of wrongdoing that corporate counsel currently confronts. Absent circumstances in which the corporate counsel acquired personal (as opposed to municipal) confidential information from the employees – and no such indication exists here – then Rule 1.9 poses no barrier to revealing wrongdoing by a person previously represented in an official capacity.

9. If the corporate counsel's office currently represents an individual employee in an official capacity in a pending matter, and that employee is among those who are alleged to have engaged in wrongdoing, then, again assuming that the corporate counsel has not acquired personal (as opposed to municipal) confidential information from the employee, the corporate counsel should withdraw from the representation consistent with the dictates of Rule 1.16, including, if need be, permission of the tribunal before which the office appears on behalf of the individual. Such is the requirement of Rule 1.7, governing current conflicts of interest, which prohibits a lawyer from a representation that "will involve the lawyer in representing differing interests." On the facts here, the interests of the municipality and the official plainly diverge, and hence a conflict exists.

10. Our parentheticals concerning the acquisition of personal confidential information as opposed to confidential information owned by the municipality are intended as an alert of the perils inhering in any corporate representation – that a lawyer for an organization, including a municipal corporation, must be careful to be clear that the lawyer is counsel for the corporation and not for any of its constituents, including employees.

CONCLUSION:

11. Counsel for a municipal corporation who learns of information that municipal employees have breached a legal duty to the municipality that may be imputed to the municipality or otherwise is likely to result in substantial injury to the municipality should report the information to the municipal authorities and may disclose the information outside the municipality if required by law. A prior representation of the affected employees is no obstacle to this disclosure if unrelated to the alleged wrongdoing, and a lawyer may withdraw from a current representation of an affected employee consistent with the rules of the tribunal.

TOPIC: Retention and disposition of lawyer's closed files

DIGEST: With certain important exceptions, a lawyer has no ethical duty to retain closed client files (or other documents held by the lawyer owned by third parties) for an indefinite period when neither the client nor the third party requests their return. The exceptions are original documents of intrinsic value such as wills, deeds, or negotiable instruments, as well as documents that the lawyer knows or should know that the client or third party may need in the future. Apart from these documents, a lawyer has an ethical duty to retain for seven years certain books and records concerning an attorney-client relationship, and any documents otherwise required by law to maintain.

RULES: 1.9, 1.10, 1.15

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a New York attorney who acquired a partnership interest in a law firm some years ago. Upon the inquirer's arrival, the firm was, we are told, in a state of disarray in both its financial and administrative affairs. The prospect of the firm's insolvency looms. Of particular concern to the inquirer in the context of a possible dissolution are the files of thousands of clients and former clients of the firm. The inquirer says that most of these files are stale and without connection to any ongoing client of the firm. The costs of disposal of the files, by whatever means, would be substantial.

QUESTION:

2. What are a lawyer's obligations in dealing with closed client files?

OPINION:

General Principles

3. In 1977, we wrote: "The ethics of our profession do not cast upon lawyers the unreasonable burden of maintaining all files and records relating to their clients. Indeed, the Code of Professional Responsibility is remarkably silent on this subject. What is required of lawyers must for the most part be determined in the light of common sense and certain general principles of considerably broader application." N.Y. State 460 (1977).

4. We think that Opinion 460 is still applicable. Although decided under the Code of Professional Responsibility (the "Code"), the Code's successor, the Rules of Professional Responsibility (the "Rules"), effects no change in its reasoning. With the important exceptions noted below, nothing in the Rules requires lawyers to maintain all files and records concerning an attorney-client relationship for any predetermined period of time. Subject to the following caveats, therefore, a lawyer is free to discard such files and records consistent with common sense and the prudential exercise of professional judgment.

5. Sage Realty v. Proskauer Rose, 91 N.Y.2d 30 (1997), teaches that what are generally, if too-broadly-named, as "client files" is a matter of property law. Issues of property law are outside our jurisdiction; we opine only on the Rules. Rule 1.15(a) says, among other things, that a lawyer in possession of "property belonging to another person, where such possession is his or her incident to practice of law, is a fiduciary." Rule 1.15(c)(4) requires a lawyer to "deliver to the client or third person as requested" any "properties in the possession of the lawyer that the client or third person is entitled to receive." For our purposes, we assume that no client or third person has requested the inquirer to return any property, for otherwise the lawyer's duty is plain: the lawyer must deliver to the requesting party whatever the client or third party is entitled to receive. Absent such a request, however, the issues for the fiduciary are a determination of ownership, and whether the lawyer may dispose of the contents of a client file based on that determination.

6. That the lawyer has succeeded to this duty through acquisition of or new membership in a firm is of no consequence. In our Opinion 623 (1991), decided under the Code but equally applicable today, we said:

> The professional obligation to maintain closed files or to arrange for their disposition is not limited to those members of the firm who worked on the file when it was active. In N.Y. State 398 (1975), we held that, absent a special agreement to the contrary, the clients of a law partnership employ the firm as an entity and not a particular member of the firm. Consistent with that holding, the ethics committee of the Nassau County Bar Association determined that both partners of a two-member firm in dissolution were fully responsible to every client of the firm, and the lawyers' separate agreement to the contrary could not diminish each lawyer's responsibility to the clients of the firm. Nassau County 40–88 (1988). The recently amended provisions of DR 9–102(G) are also consistent with this principle of joint and several responsibility in requiring that "the former partners or members [of the firm in dissolution] shall make appropriate arrangements" for the maintenance of the records which the firm was required by law to maintain.
> When a law firm dissolves or a lawyer retires from practice, additional questions arise concerning the disposition of closed files. Dissolution or retirement from practice clearly does not relieve the lawyer of a professional obligation to maintain closed files. See e.g., N.Y. State 460, supra; see also, EC 4–4, EC 4–6.

7. Three possible ownership claims exist when reference is made to client files: a current or former client, a third person, or the law firm itself. However cumbersome the exercise – and we do not underestimate the burden, especially on the facts presented – the Rules require the lawyer as fiduciary to undertake the task. It is ethically immaterial that the economic burden of disposing of closed files may be far in excess of any practical benefit to the parties involved. In its Opinion 43–89 (1989), cited with approval in N.Y. State 623, the Nassau County Bar Association, deciding under the Code and referring to a custodial attorney's release of files to the client of a deceased attorney, aptly said:

> It is no answer to the discharge of custodial counsels' obligations under the Code of Professional Responsibility to complain that the benefits of their passive custody of the documents are not commensurate with the present burdens. Such burdens do not follow solely from the attorney-client relationship, and are not dependent on the payment of fees; rather, the burdens of custody as prescribed by the Code are inherent in > the lawyer's enjoyment of his professional status, and his concomitant obligations to the public generally. Once the burden is assumed, by actively (or passively) taking custody of funds or property belonging to any "client," those burdens must be fully discharged even if the benefits of the custody are minimal or non-existent.

See also N.Y. State 398 (1975); N.Y. State 341 (1974); N.Y. City 87–74 (1988).

8. Other authorities generally agree. For instance, In its Opinion 725 (1998), the New York County Lawyers' Association Committee on Professional Ethics said:

> Although Inquirer no longer represents private clients, he still is subject to ethical restraints on the length of time he should keep former clients' documents and on the manner of their disposal. Restatement (Third) The Law Governing Lawyers, § 58, cmt. b (Proposed Draft, May 1996). These restrictions are not rigid. They vary case-by-case in light of the concerns of lawyers, clients and the justice system. On the one hand, lawyers wish to avoid unreasonable burdens and expenses from storing closed files. On the other hand, clients and the justice system have an interest in preserving important documents in the event they are needed after a client's file has been closed. See N.Y. State 460 (1977). How these interests are balanced in a particular case usually depends on the type of documents in question.

9. We agree as well. Although of little practical use to the inquirer's circumstances, we note that prudence and good practice counsel in favor of lawyers anticipating the issue of document disposal in engagement letters at the start of a representation, which may outline the law firm's intentions concerning the disposition of files at the close of an engagement and thereby eliminate the problems so many firms face when confronted with stale files and rising storage costs. Today's technology may save some warehouse space but scanning thousands of documents does not necessarily relieve the expense. Foreseeing the issue in engagement letters may thus spare resources better devoted elsewhere.

Files Belonging to Clients and Others

10. In its Opinion 2010-1, the New York City Bar Association Committee on Professional and Judicial Ethics addressed the issue of old files, and sought to classify the contents of a client file into categories. The Committee recognized, as we do, that "upon termination of the attorney-client relationship . . . if the client does not seek access or makes no provision for delivery, [the] attorney may have an obligation to retain certain documents, although the lawyer need not permanently retain all files after an engagement is concluded."

11. One category the Committee recognized were "documents with intrinsic value or those that directly affect property rights such as wills, deeds, or negotiable instruments," which the Committee concluded the lawyer was obligated to retain for an indefinite period. This conclusion is consistent with our recent opinion, NY State 1182 (2020), in which the inquirer was in possession of over five hundred wills, the testators being unknown and, after due diligence, undiscoverable. We concluded there (at ¶ 10):

> A lawyer may not dispose of Wills, whose testators' locations and/or circumstances are unknown. The Wills constitute property, and the lawyer must safeguard the Wills indefinitely unless the law affords the lawyer an avenue to file or otherwise dispose of the wills.

12. Another category the City Bar Ethics Committee classified as subject to indeterminate retention consists of documents "that a lawyer knows or should know may still be necessary or useful to the client, perhaps in the assertion of a defense in a matter for which the applicable limitations period has not expired." Its opinion cites our N.Y. State 460, and accords with our reasoning there that common sense and the prudent exercise of professional judgment is required before a lawyer disposes of files. Within this grouping we would include documents that may be property of a third party – for example, materials gathered in discovery or due diligence – which a lawyer should retain unless judicial or client contractual obligations otherwise dictate. We agree that this duty is not invariably open-ended, and that some lapse following the relevant limitations period may provide closure.

13. Apart from the foregoing, neither the Rules nor our precedents require maintenance of client files belonging to current or prior clients or other persons for any specific period unless the law, whether by statute, regulations, or rules or orders of court, say the contrary. The City Bar's Opinion 2010-1 said that some jurisdictions require retention periods of five or six years. One commentator observed that Illinois Bar Association Committee on Professional Ethics Opinion 17-02, having reviewed resources from various states, and the retention periods dictated by them (some of which were as long as 10 years), arrived at the conclusion that a general default retention period of seven years for ordinary closed file materials is reasonable. J. Rogers, Usually Okay to Destroy Client Files After Seven Years, 33 Law. Man. Prof. Conduct 170 (2017), This may be so, but unless some law, regulation, rule, or order says as much, our view is that the Rules alone impose no such obligation, and that therefore a lawyer, in the absence of a legal duty or an owner's instructions, may dispose of files belonging to current or prior clients or other persons at any time except for those in the categories mentioned above.

Files Belonging to the Law Firm

14. It is not uncommon for files called "client files" to contain materials that belong to the custodial law firm. Whether certain materials in the file – purely internal memoranda written to assist the firm in providing advice, a lawyer's handwritten notes of a meeting – belong to the client or the lawyer is an often litigated issue pivoting on, among other things, legal doctrines such as the work product privilege. We avoid entering into this fray except to say that a law firm may have a possessory interest in some of these kinds of documents and, if the law firm does so, then the lawyer may dispose of them as the lawyer sees fit unless a legal duty (compulsory process being an instance) exists to require their preservation.

15. But other duties remain. Rule 1.15(d) imposes on a lawyer or law firm the duty to maintain certain specific records for a period of seven years, a duty that, like its parallel in the Code, Rule 1.15(h) extends to former partners or a successor firm in the event of dissolution, merger, or sale. In brief summary, these duties of retention are to keep for seven years: (1) complete records of all banking transactions affecting the lawyer's practice; (2) complete records of all special accounts; (3) copies of all retainer and compensation agreements with clients; (4) copies of all statements to clients or others of disbursements of funds on behalf of clients or the others; (5) copies of all client bills; (6) copies of all payments to lawyers, investigators or other persons, not in the lawyer's employ, for services rendered; (7) copies of all retainer and closing statements filed with the Office of Court Administration; and (8) all checkbooks, bank statements and related documents. Some lawyers keep some of these documents only in the client file associated with the services rendered on the client's behalf, and Rule 1.15(d) means that a law firm must segregate these documents for saving if the client file is otherwise discarded.

16. The foregoing is not meant as an exhaustive list of the records a law firm should keep for itself. For example, while imposing no time limit on its retention other than to the extent of overlap with Rule 1.15(d), Rule 1.10(e) says that, in most circumstances, a law firm "shall make a written record of its engagements, at or near the time of each engagement, and shall implement and maintain a system by which proposed engagements are checked against current and previous engagements." This Rule is intended to facilitate compliance with the conflicts rules, including Rule 1.9, which governs conflicts with former clients. Inhering in the Rule is that a firm must be mindful of avoiding conflicts prohibited by Rule 1.9, that is, that the law firm must keep a record for some undetermined period of the scope of an earlier but now-closed representations. Rule 1.10(f) warns that a "[s]ubstantial failure to keep" records of these "previous" engagements "shall be a violation" of the Rule no matter whether the failure results in another violation of the Rules.

CONCLUSION:

17. In general, an attorney's duty to maintain a client's closed file is a duty that every law firm partner owes to every past firm client, no matter when the individual partner joined the firm, and a duty that continues during and after the firm's dissolution. Nevertheless, except for original documents of intrinsic value or those a lawyer knows or should know the client or a third party may need in the future, nothing in the Rules obligates a lawyer to maintain storage of closed and unsought client files, with the important caveats that a lawyer has certain bookkeeping duties about current and prior representations and that the lawyer must abide by whatever law may apply to the preservation of certain records.

TOPIC: Law firm name

DIGEST: Lawyers admitted solely in New York may not practice under a law firm with a trade name, even if a trade name is permitted under the governing rules where the firm is principally organized. An out-of-state law firm that conducts business in New York under a name compliant with the New York ethical rules may truthfully advertise its affiliation with an out-of-state firm that uses a trade name permitted in the other jurisdiction.

RULES: 5.4, 7.5, 8.5

FACTS:

1. The inquiring lawyer is admitted to practice only in New York, and is a partner in a firm organized under the rules governing the District of Columbia. In addition to the inquirer, one other partner in the firm who practices principally in New York is admitted both in this State and D.C. Other of the firm's partners principally practice elsewhere, including in D.C.

2. The firm currently practices under a name comprised of the surnames of partners admitted and located in D.C. The inquirer tells us that the firm is considering changing its name to "ABC Law PLLC," with "ABC" lacking the surnames of any current or former partner in the firm. The firm wishes to continue to maintain its New York office using its new name.

QUESTIONS:

3. May a New York lawyer practice in New York in a D.C.-based firm bearing a name lacking the surnames of any past or current partner in the firm, even if the lawyer becomes a member of the D.C. bar?

4. After the law firm changes its name to ABC Law PLLC, may the New York office of the firm continue to practice in New York with a firm name comprised of the surnames of current or past partners in the firm, including those who are not admitted in New York?

OPINION:

5. Rule 7.5(b) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") addresses law firm names:

> A lawyer in private practice shall not practice under a trade name, or a name that is misleading as to the identity of the lawyer or lawyers practicing under such name, or a firm name containing names other than those of one or more of the lawyers in the firm, except that the name of a professional corporation shall contain "PC" or such symbols permitted by law, the name of a limited liability company or partnership shall contain "LLC," or "LLP" or such symbols permitted by law and, if otherwise lawful, a firm may use as, or continue to include in its name the name or names of one or more deceased or retired members of the firm or of a predecessor firm in a continuing line of succession.

6. Consistent with this Rule, our prior opinions resolve this inquiry. A firm name that is not made up of the legal surnames of one or more former or current partners of the firm constitutes a trade name under the Rules. "We have repeatedly, and we believe correctly, concluded that no circumstances exist in which a New York lawyer may ethically practice under a trade name in New York, even though the use of a trade name is permitted in another state in which the firm has offices." N.Y. State 1179 ¶ 6 (2020). See N.Y. State 861 ¶ 4 (2011); N.Y. State 740 (2001). Here, we conclude that the proposed name change is a prohibited trade name in New York.

7. An out-of-state law firm may be an owner of a New York law firm provided that the out-of-state law firm is owned entirely by attorneys and all legal fees are distributed only to attorneys, so as to ensure there is no ownership interest by or fee sharing with non-attorneys in violation of Rule 5.4. N.Y. State 1038 ¶¶ 12-13 (2014) (a New York lawyer "may not join a D.C. firm that includes a non-lawyer partner" or practice in a firm that is a "wholly-owned subsidiary" of a D.C. firm having non-lawyer partners). See N.Y. State 911 ¶ 2 (2012).

8. A lawyer admitted in New York and another jurisdiction may be affiliated with a firm with a trade name if the lawyer principally practices in, and the other jurisdiction ethically permits, the use of trade names. This is because the conduct – practicing under a trade name – principally occurs in the other jurisdiction; accordingly, under the choice-of-law provisions of Rule 8.5(b)(2), the ethical rules that apply would be that of the other jurisdiction. Thus, "a lawyer who is admitted in New York and another jurisdiction that permits a law firm to practice under a trade name, and who principally practices in the other jurisdiction, may be of counsel to a firm with a trade name, even though the lawyer could not do so in New York" N.Y. State 1023 ¶ 8 (2014).

9. Finally, in response to the second question, the inquirer may practice in New York using a firm name comprised of the surnames of current or past partners in the firm, including partners who are (or were) admitted only in D.C. In addition, nothing in the Rules prevents the inquirer from truthfully saying in advertising or other branding that the inquirer's firm practices in D.C. or elsewhere outside New York under a trade name permitted in those jurisdictions. N.Y. State 1179 ¶ 7. Hence, the prohibition on trade names in New York does not entirely deprive the inquirer of the benefits of whatever goodwill may reside in the new name of the D.C.-based firm.

CONCLUSION:

10. Lawyers admitted and practicing solely in New York may not practice under a law firm with a trade name, even if a trade name is permitted under the governing rules where the firm is based. An out-of-state law firm may conduct business in New York under a name that complies with the New York ethical rules, including truthful advertising that the New York firm practices elsewhere under a permitted trade name.

OPINION 1194 (06/11/2020)

TOPIC: Confidentiality of Information; Conduct before a Tribunal; Withdrawal

DIGEST: A lawyer who represents an executor has no ethical duty to the estate's beneficiaries. A lawyer may withdraw, or seek permission to withdraw from a tribunal that requires such permission, when the client ignores the lawyer's request to provide the lawyer with documents pertinent to the representation or if the lawyer has a reasonable belief that the client is engaging or has engaged in criminal conduct. A lawyer who knows that a client intends to engage in criminal or fraudulent conduct related to the proceeding "shall take reasonable remedial measures, including, if necessary, disclosure to the tribunal." Even if such disclosure is not required, a lawyer may reveal confidential information to the extent reasonably believed to be necessary to prevent the client from committing a crime or to comply with law. A lawyer representing an executor may donate a retainer fee to the beneficiaries of the estate.

RULES: Rules 1.0(i), 1.6, 1.16, 3.3(b)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a New York attorney who represents an executor in the probate of an estate. The executor had managed the decedent's financial affairs and acted as the decedent's health care proxy during the decedent's later years. The decedent had no known living relatives. The decedent's estate, not insubstantial, was bequeathed mostly to charities, but the will made a modest gift to the executor.

2. Months after a probate petition was filed, the inquirer learned that the executor was the beneficiary of a transfer-on-death designation – known to practitioners in the field as a "TOD designation" – of a significant sum. Before the inquirer learned of this fact, the executor had presented the decedent's death certificate to the institution handling the decedent's account and arranged the transfer of the TOD designation sums to the executor's account. The TOD designation was created after the will's execution, and so, but for the superseding TOD designation, the inquirer believes that the assets would likely have been distributed to the decedent's charitable beneficiaries. Thus, we are told, the size of the beneficiaries' inheritance likely depends on the legitimacy of the TOD designation.

3. According to the inquirer, the executor gave the inquirer varying, conflicting explanations about the reason for, and circumstances of, the TOD designation. The inquirer says that the TOD designation could have been accomplished without the involvement of an attorney or any witnesses, thus insulating the transaction from any meaningful scrutiny. The inquirer says that the executor has repeatedly refused the inquirer's requests to provide copies of the TOD designation, and continues to do so, which heightens the inquirer's concern about its legitimacy.

4. The Surrogate's Court has granted letters of appointment to the executor. The Surrogate's Court inventory form does not itemize the TOD securities accounts. The inquirer believes that the executor will "likely" not disclose the TOD distribution to the Surrogate's Court. The inquirer believes the Surrogate's Court and the N.Y. Attorney General's Charities Bureau would find this omission to be misleading and fraudulent conduct by the executor.

5. The inquirer sent a letter to the executor expressing the inquirer's intention to withdraw from the representation and sending a check (from an IOLA account) in the amount of the original retainer fee for deposit in the decedent's estate. The executor has now retained an attorney who will continue the administration of the estate. After the executor received the intent-to-withdraw letter, the executor declined to cash the IOLA check made out to the decedent's estate, stating that the inquirer did the work and should be compensated. The inquirer does not want to be compensated in any fashion and prefers the money go to the decedent's charitable beneficiaries.

QUESTIONS:

6. The inquirer raises several issues:

(a) Is a lawyer retained to represent an executor obligated to protect the interests of an estate's beneficiaries?

(b) May a lawyer withdraw from this representation when a client is not cooperating with the lawyer and the lawyer suspects wrongdoing on the part of the executor?

(c) What disclosures about the suspected wrongdoing may or must the lawyer make?

(d) What can a lawyer do with a retainer fee that the lawyer does not want to keep?

OPINION:

An Estate Lawyer's Duties to Beneficiaries

7. We addressed an estate lawyer's duties to beneficiaries in our Opinion 1034 (2014). There, we said (at ¶ 6) that the "question of who is the client is largely a matter of law," a principle consistent with paragraph 9 of the Preamble to the N.Y. Rules of Professional Conduct ("Rules"), which teaches that "substantive law external to these Rules determine whether a client-lawyer relationship exists." Issues of law are beyond our jurisdiction. Nevertheless, in Opinion 1034, we noted that § 4503(a)(2) of the Civil Practice Law and Rules ("CPLR") provides that, "for purposes of the attorney-client privilege, absent an agreement to the contrary between the attorney and the personal representative, no beneficiary of an estate may be treated as the client, and the existence of the fiduciary relationship does not by itself constitute a waiver of the privilege." We then concluded that, absent other law or agreements to the contrary, "the Rules and the CPLR require that the lawyer consider the executor as the only client." Id. ¶ 8.

8. Accordingly, with the same caveat contained in N.Y. State 1034, we do not believe that the inquirer has any ethical duty running directly to the beneficiaries of the estate. We do not opine on the much-litigated issue whether privity between an estate lawyer and an heir is a requisite to standing in a legal malpractice action against the estate lawyer.

An Estate Lawyer's Right To Withdraw from a Representation

9. Rule 1.16 governs whether a lawyer must or may withdraw from the representation of a client. Rule 1.16 provides, in relevant part, that withdrawal is appropriate when "the client insists upon taking action with which the lawyer has a fundamental disagreement"; or when "the client fails to cooperate in the representation or otherwise renders the representation unreasonably difficult for the lawyer to carry out employment effectively." Rule 1.16(c)(4) & (7). On our view, either of these Rules entitle the inquirer to withdraw from representing the estate on the facts presented. See N.Y. State 1034 ¶ 16. In addition, Rule 1.16(c)(2) permits a lawyer to withdraw from a representation when "the client persists in a course of action involving the lawyer's services that the lawyer reasonably believes is criminal or fraudulent." Should the inquirer come to the reasonable belief that the client has implicated the lawyer's services in criminal or fraudulent conduct, 1.16(c)(2) would provide an additional ground for withdrawal. Rule 1.16(b)1) makes this permissive withdrawal mandatory if the lawyer concludes that the representation "will result in a violation of these Rules or of law."

10. The above grounds for withdrawal are subject to the caveat, contained in Rule 1.16(d), which governs matters before a tribunal. Rule 1.16(d) states that, if the tribunal's own rules require permission before withdrawal, permission must be obtained notwithstanding good cause for terminating the representation. It is for the inquirer to determine whether the rules of the Surrogate Court require that court's permission for withdrawal.

An Estate Lawyer's Duty To Make Disclosures to a Tribunal

11. The inquirer owes a duty of confidentiality to the client under Rule 1.6(a). Limits exist on this duty, however, two of which are of special import here. Rule 1.6(b)(6) permits a lawyer to disclose client confidential information "when permitted or required under these Rules or to comply with other law or court order." While this committee cannot answer the question of whether "other law" compels disclosure, it can opine on the effect of Rule 3.3, which mandates disclosure of confidential information in certain situations. Specifically, "a lawyer who represents a client before a tribunal and who knows that a person intends to engage, is engaging or has engaged in criminal fraudulent conduct related to the proceeding shall take reasonable remedial measures, including, if necessary, disclosure to the tribunal." Rule 3.3(b). Rule 1.0(i), in turn, defines "fraud" as denoting conduct that is "fraudulent under the substantive or procedural law of the applicable jurisdiction or has a purpose to deceive," unless it lacks an element of scienter or a knowing failure to correct misrepresentations that can be reasonably expected to induce detrimental reliance by another."

12. While the inquirer in this case "suspects" that the executor intends to engage in conduct that the inquirer believes is fraudulent in relation to the proceeding (i.e., by failing to disclose information pertaining to the TOD account to the Surrogate Court), this suspicion must rise to the level of "knowledge" to trigger remedial measures and, if necessary, disclosure. If the inquirer knows that the executor intends to commit fraud related to the proceedings, then Rule 3.3(b) requires the inquirer, after a final effort to persuade the executor to disclose the TOD account, to report the information concerning the TOD designation to the tribunal, a duty that continues despite the lawyer's withdrawal from the representation. See N.Y. State 1123 ¶ 4 (2017).

13. The question whether the inquirer knows of the executor's intent to commit fraud appears to turn on two factors: (a) whether the executor will, in fact, omit the TOD account from the Surrogate Court's inquiry; and (b) whether the inclusion of the TOD account on the inventory is legally required (s*ee* § 207.20 of the Uniform Rules for the Surrogate's Court (requiring disclosure to the Court of any asset "owned by the decedent individually")). The first factor depends on the degree of the inquirer's knowledge of the executor's intent; the second is a legal issue beyond the purview of this Committee.

14. At risk of repetition but for the sake of clarity: Even if Rule 3.3(b) does not mandate disclosure after a failed effort to persuade the executor to do so, the inquirer must still consider Rules 1.6(a)(3) and 1.6(b)(2) & (6). See N.Y. State 1034. Under those Rules, disclosure would be permitted if the lawyer "reasonably believes" that disclosing the information is "necessary" to "prevent the client from committing a crime" or is required by "law or court order." This disclosure would be permissible only if the failure to disclose the TOD account to the Surrogate's Court would constitute a criminal fraud or other violation of law. As this too turns on a legal determination beyond the purview of this committee, we cannot answer it. As with Rule 3.3(b), if the inquirer decides to make a permissive disclosure under Rule 1.6(b), the inquirer should first "remonstrate with the client about the desirability" of disclosing the TOD account to the Surrogate's Court.

The Estate Lawyer's Retention of the Fee

15. Finally, with respect to the inquirer's unsuccessful attempt to return the retainer fee to the executor, the inquirer is free to keep the fee or, if the inquirer wishes, to donate the fee to one of the estate's beneficiaries or another charity of the inquirer's choosing. Nothing in the Rules prohibits such a gift. We caution only that, subject to the foregoing, the inquirer in making any gift must be mindful of whatever ongoing duties of confidentiality that the inquirer owes the executor.

CONCLUSION:

16. A lawyer representing an executor of an estate is not ethically obligated to protect the interests of the estate's beneficiaries. A lawyer may withdraw, or seek permission to withdraw from a tribunal that requires such permission, when the client ignores the lawyer's request to provide the lawyer with documents pertinent to the representation or when the lawyer reasonably believes that the client has involved the lawyer's services in criminal or fraudulent conduct. A lawyer must disclose the client's fraudulent conduct with regard to the represented matter if he knows that the conduct involves fraud and if other remedial measures have failed. The same disclosure is permitted when the lawyer "reasonably believes" that disclosing the information is "necessary" to "prevent the client from committing a crime." A lawyer representing an executor may donate a retainer fee to the beneficiaries of the estate.

OPINION 1195 (06/11/2020)

TOPIC: Attorney's obligation to accept client files from prior law firm.

DIGEST: A lawyer has no duty to represent clients who were clients of a former law firm and have not engaged the lawyer to represent them at a new firm, no matter whether the lawyer did work on behalf of those clients at the former firm.

RULES: 1.6, 1.9, 1.16

FACTS:

1. The inquirer recently left employment with a law firm in which the inquirer had practiced for some years. Several partners left the firm during the inquirer's last two years at the firm. The inquirer took on a number of matters these lawyers had handled, and settled several of them. In one matter, the inquirer reached a compromise of a lien but then later discovered that another lien existed, at which point the inquirer wrote the client to advise of the outstanding lien and the client's responsibility to pay the lien or negotiate a reduction. The inquirer left the law firm shortly thereafter and started a new firm. Several of the clients from the old firm retained this new firm.

2. Following the inquirer's departure, the former firm began sending files for matters that the inquirer had handled before departure. The inquirer returned the files to the old firm with notice that the inquirer did not represent the affected clients. Nevertheless, the old firm re-sent the files to the inquirer and, we are told, advised those clients in writing that the inquirer was now handling their matters.

QUESTIONS:

3. The inquirer asks:

> (a) Is a lawyer who leaves a law firm responsible for representing clients represented by the inquirer at the prior firm but who have not retained the lawyer's new firm?
> (b) Is a lawyer who advised a client about lien prior to departure from a prior firm still responsible for advising the onetime client about the lien?
> (c) Is it ethical for a law firm an employee of which has left the firm to advise firm clients that the former employee remains responsible for certain matters the departing lawyer had previously handled?

4. Our charter restricts us to responding to inquiries about a lawyer's own prospective conduct, not about the conduct of other lawyers. Consequently, we offer no opinion in reply to the inquirer's third question.

OPINION:

5. On the facts presented, we consider clients of the inquirer's former firm who have not retained the inquirer's new firm to be former clients of the inquirer. A lawyer owes only certain discrete obligations to former clients. The most prominent of these are set out in Rule 1.9 of the N.Y. Rules of Professional Conduct ("Rules"), which, among other things, requires a lawyer not to reveal the confidential information of former clients protected by Rule 1.6, and not to represent a client adverse to the former client in a matter that is 'the same or a substantially related matter" to one in which the lawyer previously represented the former client. Rule 1.16(e) also makes provisions for avoiding prejudice to a client upon termination of the attorney-client relationship. For the most part, however, a lawyer's duty of care to clients dies with the end of the attorney-client relationship.

6. On our view, this means that the inquirer no longer owes clients of the former firm the range of duties attending an ongoing attorney-client relationship under the Rules. This extends to the client of the former firm whom the inquirer advised about liens. It appears that the inquirer counseled the client to deal with the liens. Unless the client has retained the inquirer's new firm, we see nothing in the Rules to obligate the client further to serve the client, except for making available documents or other information in the inquirer's possession that may avoid prejudicing the erstwhile client's ability to act as instructed.

7. The Rules explicitly state that the existence of an attorney-client relationship is a question of law, not ethics. Rules, Preamble ¶ 9. We do not issue opinions on legal questions, but we do not stray far from our charter in saying that an unaffiliated third party may not unilaterally impose such a relationship without the agreement of the lawyer and the client. Thus, unless clients of the former firm have agreed to retain the inquirer's new firm, the inquirer's duties to those onetime clients are limited to those any lawyer owes a former client. See ALI, Restatement of Law Governing Lawyers (Third) § 14(1) (Formation of a Client-Lawyer Relationship) (a lawyer-client relationship arises when "a person manifests to a lawyer the person's intent that the lawyer provide legal services for the person; and either (a) the lawyer manifests to the person consent to do so; or (b) the lawyer fails to manifest lack of consent to do so, and the lawyer knows or reasonably should know that the person reasonably relies on the lawyer to provide the services).

CONCLUSION:

8. A lawyer owes no duty to represent clients of a former firm absent a client's agreement and instead owes such persons only the duties all lawyers owe to former clients.

OPINION 1196 (06/12/2020)

TOPIC: Litigation Financing, Conflicts of Interest.

DIGEST: In a medical malpractice action commenced on behalf of an infant, a lawyer may refer the parent or legal guardian in whose name the action is brought to a litigation funding company owned by the lawyer's sibling for a non-recourse loan to finance litigation expenses only if the parent or legal guardian gives informed consent, confirmed in writing, to waive personal-interest conflicts in compliance with Rule 1.7(b) and satisfies the conditions of Rule 1.8(f) for accepting a thing of value from a non-client related to the client's representation.

RULES: 1.0(j), 1.6(a), 1.7(a)(2); 1.7(b); 1.8(e); 1.8(f); 1.8(i)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a personal injury attorney whose primary focus is pursuing medical malpractice actions that are brought on behalf of infants by a legal guardian, almost always a parent. Upon conclusion of such actions, whether by way of settlement or judgment, the inquirer's contingent fee is subject to court approval, on notice to the guardian, pursuant to Judiciary Law § 474.

2. According to the inquirer, so-called alternative litigation funding – known as "ALF" and referring to litigation financing provided by entities other than the parties, their lawyers, or insurers – is widely available to finance some medical malpractice actions but not the type of actions in which the inquirer concentrates. We are told that this circumstance results from the reluctance of some courts, exercising their authority under Judiciary Law § 474, to approve disbursement of settlement or judgment proceeds to the ALF funder in accordance with the terms of the ALF agreement.

3. The inquirer has found one ALF company willing to finance the actions brought by inquirer's firm, a company that is owned by the inquirer's sibling. The inquirer has no financial interest in the sibling's company, and the sibling has no financial interest in inquirer's law firm. Their family financial interests intersect only with respect to their separate minority interests in a family-owned property in which neither has any management role.

4. ALF may be used to pay litigation expenses, the legal fees of the attorneys who are prosecuting the action, the living expenses of the client, or any combination of these costs. The funding may take the form of a recourse or non-recourse loan, or the purchase of an interest in the litigation. If a loan, the borrower may be the attorneys or the client. Here, the inquirer proposes to refer clients to the sibling's ALF company to secure non-recourse loans to finance only litigation expenses, not the payment of the firm's attorneys' fees, nor the clients' living expenses.

QUESTION:

5. In a medical malpractice action commenced on behalf of an infant, may a lawyer refer the legal guardian, in whose name the action is brought, to a litigation funding company owned by the lawyer's sibling, for a non-recourse loan to finance litigation expenses?

OPINION:

Rules 1.8(e) and 1.8(i)

6. Rule 1.8(e) of the New York Rules of Professional Responsibility ("Rules") prohibits an attorney from providing financial assistance to a client; Rule 1.8(i) prohibits an attorney from acquiring a proprietary interest in a litigation the lawyer is conducting for a client. Rules 1.8(e) and 1.8(i) have exceptions that allow an attorney representing a client on a contingent fee basis to advance on behalf of the client, or to pay on the lawyer's account, only litigation expenses, which are to be recovered only out of the proceeds of the action. See Rules 1.8(e)(1) and (3), and 1.8(i)(2).

7. In N.Y. State 855 (2011), we concluded that a lawyer may not permissibly refer a client to a company owned by the lawyer's spouse to secure ALF for client living expenses. We noted our prior opinions that had "frequently concluded that various rules relating to conflicts involving financial interests apply both to the lawyer and to the lawyer's business relationships with the lawyer's spouse"; we said that, because the referring lawyer could not ethically provide the financial assistance under Rules 1.8(e) or 1.8(i), the lawyer could not cause a spouse to provide that same assistance, "essentially using the spouse as a front for advancing improper financial assistance to a client for whom the lawyer is conducting litigation." Id. ¶¶ 11, 13.

8. Again relying on Rules 8.1(e) and 8.1(i), we concluded in N.Y. State 1145 (2018) that neither the inquiring lawyer nor the lawyer's law firm could represent a client in a commercial litigation funded by an ALF company in exchange for a percentage of the prospective recovery in which one of the firm's lawyers was an investor. We noted that the exceptions that allow an attorney to advance or pay litigation expenses in contingency cases were inapplicable on the facts presented and stated: "Lawyers are never permitted to give litigation clients the more sweeping kinds of assistance – such as lawyer's fees billed on a non-contingency basis – that, under the inquiry, would apparently be provided by the Company." Id. ¶ 16.

9. In contrast to N.Y. State 855 and 1145, the ALF funding proposed here – solely to pay litigation expenses – would constitute permitted financial assistance for the inquiring lawyer to offer under the litigation expense/contingency fee exceptions of Rule 1.8(e), and would not constitute the prohibited acquisition of interest in litigation under Rule 1.8(i). In any event, because the inquirer has represented that the inquirer has no financial interest in the ALF company owned by the inquirer's sibling, even if the financial assistance to be provided exceeded the safe harbors of Rule 1.8(e) and Rule 1.8(i), no issue would arise on whether ALF funding from the sibling's ALF company was a prohibited subterfuge for avoiding the application of these rules. This is because we have never imputed, between siblings, the same "unified financial interest" of spouses. See N.Y. State 855, ¶ 11.

10. Otherwise put, when, as here, a lawyer has no financial interest in the ALF company, a referral to an ALF company to secure financing, even for living expenses that would constitute prohibited financial assistance if made by a lawyer, is not unethical, provided that no referral fee is paid and client confidentiality is suitably protected. N.Y. State 666 (1994); see also N.Y. State 855, ¶ 8 ("there is at least one legitimate route to avoiding restrictions imposed by Rule 1.8(e) and (i): a lawyer may refer a client to a financial institution in which the lawyer has no interest").

11. Accordingly, we conclude that neither Rule 1.8(e) nor Rule 1.8(i) presents an ethical bar to the inquirer's contemplated conduct. Nevertheless, though Rules 1.8(e) and 1.8(i) present no bar to the proposed referral of clients to an ALF company owned by lawyer's sibling, substantial questions remain about whether such a referral runs afoul of Rule 1.7(a)(2), which prohibits representations when a reasonable lawyer would conclude "there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests," or Rule 1.8(f), which imposes conditions upon a lawyer accepting compensation "or anything of value" related to the lawyer's representation of the client. We deem the sibling's willingness to provide a loan to the client to finance litigation expenses to be a "thing of value" indirectly provided to the inquirer because the inquirer's firm would otherwise need to secure financing of its own or forgo the opportunity to represent the client in the matter.

Rule 1.7(a)(2)

12. Under Rule 1.7(a)(2), strong filial bonds may cause the inquirer to favor a sibling's financial interests, consciously or not, over the client's interests with regard to advising the client (or, here, the guardian) on a number of issues that may arise in the course of the representation.

13. For example, although the inquirer is not necessarily a party to the negotiations between clients and the sibling-owned ALF on the specific terms and conditions of the ALF loan, it is unrealistic to assume that the inquirer's clients would not turn to the inquirer for advice about how the loan would likely affect the net recovery, how the loan compares to terms and conditions of litigation expense funding typically offered by other ALF funding sources, and what alternatives exist, if any, to fund litigation expense other than a loan from a company owned by the inquirer's sibling. The clients would reasonably assume that inquirer would exercise independent professional judgment in addressing these issues when, in fact, the inquirer might encourage clients to enter into ALF funding agreements with a sibling's company, and not with an unrelated third-party ALF funder on similar or even more favorable terms, simply to benefit the financial interests of the sibling.

14. Similarly, although the interests of the inquirer's law firm and the sibling's ALF company are logically aligned with regard to the risks of trial and the benefits of a compromise settlement – because the inquirer earns a contingent fee and the loan by the sibling's company gets repaid only if there is a successful outcome – it is quite plausible that inquirer and the sibling are in dissimilar economic circumstances. One of them is, or could in the future be, in greater need of cash and more willing to press the client to accept an early settlement that does not reflect the fair value of the case obtainable at a later stage of the litigation.

15. Finally, as the inquirer notes, the kind of actions at issue here often require the expenditure of large sums to acquire thousands of pages of medical records; the retention of more than one medical expert who are each compensated at substantial hourly rates for their time consulting, preparing expert reports and being deposed; stenographers who charge a premium for medical malpractice depositions; and the per diem fees of the medical experts who ultimately testify at trial. It is not hard to imagine a situation in which developments in a case indicate that the prospect of success at trial is less than assured, and the sibling–owned ALF company perceives its investment in jeopardy. At the same time, the best chance for a successful outcome might be the retention of additional experts requiring substantial additional expense. The issue – inherent in any ALF financing – is whether these considerations would unduly influence the lawyer's management of the case. The prospect of outsized influence is heightened here by the family relationship between the client's counsel and lender – a potential tension exists between the lawyer's duty zealously to pursue a client's interests that may require the expenditure of substantial additional funds for litigation expenses and the sibling's resistance to advancing more funds owing to a diminishing likelihood of securing a recovery.

16. Based on these considerations alone, we believe that a reasonable lawyer would conclude that the inquirer's personal and financial interests pose a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client may be adversely affected by the ALF funding proposed to be provided by a sibling's ALF company, and that a Rule 1.7(a)(2) conflict of interest therefore exists. We believe, however, that this conflict is subject to waiver under Rule 1.7(b) provided the inquirer satisfies the conditions that Rule imposes. Two of those conditions are relevant here – first, that the inquirer "reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation" to the client; and second, that the client "gives informed consent, confirmed in writing."

17. In these circumstances, the inquirer alone is in a position to assess whether the lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer is able to provide the requisite and diligent representation to the client despite the conflict of interest. The standard of reasonable belief in Rule 1.7(b) embeds both subjective and objective elements, meaning that the inquirer must make not only a personal judgment about the inquirer's capacity to satisfy the requirement but also an appraisal of how a disinterested lawyer would regard the situation. N.Y. State 1048 ¶ 20 (2015). On the circumstances presented, we see no objective consideration that would disable the lawyer from proceeding, but only the lawyer may make this decision based on all the facts known to the inquirer.

18. The second condition requires informed consent. Rule 1.0(j) defines "informed consent" to mean "information adequate for the person to make an informed decision, and after the lawyer has adequately explained to the person the material risks of the proposed course of conduct and reasonably available alternatives." This means, at a minimum, disclosure of the above considerations that led us to conclude that a Rule 1.7(a)(2) conflict of interest exists. The client should certainly be made aware of the family relationship between the inquirer and the inquirer's sibling, that ALF funding has an enormous profit potential, and that the inquirer and the ALF company may differ substantially on the level of risk that each is willing to tolerate. In addition, to assure that the consent is fully informed, the inquirer should discuss with the client the desirability of retaining independent counsel to provide disinterested advice regarding the client's best interest. As the New York City Bar Association Committee on Professional Ethics said in its Opinion 2011-2:

In providing candid advice, a lawyer should advise the client to consider the costs and benefits of non-recourse financings, as well as possible alternatives. With respect to costs, a common criticism of non-recourse financing is that the fees charged to clients may be excessive relative to other financing options, such as bank loans, thereby significantly reducing the client's recovery. A lawyer thus should bear in mind the extent to which non-recourse financing will limit a client's recovery. And before recommending financing companies, a lawyer should conduct a reasonable investigation to determine whether particular providers are able and willing to offer financing on reasonable terms.

19. In the context of the current inquiry, an independent counsel, if any, might wish to discuss with the client (a) why the inquirer has elected not to secure the ALF funding by the inquirer's firm itself rather than have the client be the borrower, and (b) whether there are other competent lawyers or law firms who would be willing to represent the client and incur litigation expenses without the need for ALF funding to be secured by the client's recovery.

Rule 1.8(f)

20. Rule 1.8(f) allows a lawyer to accept "a "thing of value" from a non-party where three conditions are met: "(1) the client gives informed consent; (2) there is no interference with the lawyer's independent and professional judgment or with the client-lawyer relationship; and (3) the client's confidential information is protected as required by Rule 1.6."

21. The first and second conditions of Rule 1.8(f) for the inquirer's indirect acceptance of litigation financing from a sibling-owned company will be satisfied if the standard for waiving a personal conflict interest under Rule 1.7(a)(2) has been met. To comply with the third condition, however, that is, the protection of client confidentiality, the inquirer may disclose to the ALF funder for underwriting purposes only such information that is "confidential information" under Rule 1.6(a)(1) to the extent that the client has consented to the disclosure after receiving from the inquirer, as Rule 1.0(j) requires, "information adequate . . . to make an informed decision, and after adequately explain[ing]" to the client "the material risks" of disclosure and the "reasonably available alternatives."

CONCLUSION:

22. In a medical malpractice action commenced on behalf of an infant, a lawyer may refer the parent or legal guardian in whose name the action is brought to a litigation funding company owned by the lawyer's sibling for a non-recourse loan to finance litigation expenses only if the parent or legal guardian gives informed consent, confirmed in writing, to waive personal-interest conflicts in compliance with Rule 1.7(b) and satisfies the conditions of Rule 1.8(f) for accepting a thing of value from a non-client related to the client's representation.

TOPIC: Pro bono, conflicts; fees paid by third-party payors

DIGEST: A lawyer who provides free, limited scope legal services to a client through a not-for-profit legal services program need not comply with the general rules governing conflicts of interest absent actual knowledge that a conflict exists, whether directly or by imputation. This is true even if the program pays participating attorneys nominal or below-market fees to render the services, though receipt of such a payment means that the lawyer must obtain the client's informed consent, preserve the client's confidential information, and avoid outside interference in even the limited scope representation.

RULES: 1.6, 1.7, 1.8, 1.9, 6.1, 6.5.

FACTS:

1. The inquirer, a New York lawyer affiliated with a law school in New York, administers a program to support and encourage the public interest practices of the law school's alumni. One specific program is conducted under a non-profit entity within the law school and allows the school to hire experienced alumni attorneys at nominal fees to deliver legal counseling and referral services, and occasional limited legal assistance to qualifying New Yorkers. The program is funded by government bodies comprised of elected officials and enables the law school to provide the legal services to constituents of these officials in need of legal help without charge.

2. The elected officials or their staff arrange for constituents to come to the officials' district offices, or other community-based organizations, where the constituents can meet with one of the program attorneys free of charge. These meetings are limited to brief one-on-one counseling sessions with an attorney and are not allowed to evolve into a full representation. The law school's non-profit entity pays the program attorneys a nominal or so-called "low bono" hourly rate to render this assistance.

3. The program administrator seeks to ensure that the payment of nominal fees to the participating attorneys does not subject them to the general conflict-of-interest provisions of the N.Y. Rules of Professional Conduct ("Rules").

QUESTION:

4. Is a lawyer participating in a free legal services program and receiving a nominal fee from the program administrator subject to the full panoply of provisions governing conflicts of interests set out in the Rules?

OPINION:

5. The answer is no. The operative provision is Rule 6.5, which we believe applies to the program as described and relieves attorneys who participate in limited pro bono legal services programs from the customary conflict rules when providing short-term limited legal services under the auspices of a program sponsored by certain kinds of entities: a court, government agency, bar association or not-for-profit legal services organization. See Rule 6.5(a). These legal services are short-term, limited in scope, and free of charge, "with no expectations that the assistance will continue beyond what is necessary to complete an initial consultation, representation or court appearance." Rule 6.5(c).

6. Rule 6.5(a)(1) provides, in part, that a participating lawyer is required to comply with the conflict provisions of Rules 1.7, 1.8, and 1.9 "only if the lawyer has actual knowledge at the time of commencement of representation that the representation of the client involves a conflict of interest." Rule 6.5(a)(2) says that the lawyer is required to comply with the imputation provisions in Rule 1.10 "only if the lawyer has actual knowledge at the time of commencement of representation that another lawyer associated with the lawyer in a law firm is affected by Rules 1.7, 1.8 and 1.0." See N.Y. State 1012 ¶¶ 7-9 (2014) (discussing the Rule). A lawyer's actual knowledge of a conflict under the more generally applicable conflict rules is not required to trigger their application. Thus, Rule 6.5(a) imposes a less stringent standard on conflicts in the context of limited pro bono legal services. Nothing in the Rule dislodges this lessened "actual knowledge" standard for conflicts based on the lawyer's receipt of a nominal fee for participating in the program.

7. Rule 6.5 is in harmony with Rule 6.1, which concerns the profession's provision of voluntary pro bono legal services. Rule 6.1(b) defines such services, which fall squarely within the objects of the inquirer's program:

> (1) professional services rendered in civil matters, and in those criminal matters for which the government is not obliged to provide funds for legal representation, to persons who are financially unable to compensate counsel; (2) activities related to improving the administration of justice by simplifying the legal process for, or increasing the availability and quality of legal services to, poor persons; and (3) professional services to charitable, religious, civic and educational organizations in matters designed predominantly to address the needs of poor persons.

8. The Rules encourage every lawyer to provide at least fifty hours of pro bono legal services each year to poor persons, and view these legal services through the intent of the lawyer. See Rule 6.1(a)(1). The attorney's intent must be to render free legal services. Rule 6.1, Cmt. [4]. For example, if a fee is anticipated but uncollected, the services rendered cannot be considered pro bono. Id. If, however, an attorney receives statutory attorneys' fees in a case originally accepted as pro bono, the services continue to qualify as pro bono and the attorney is "encouraged to contribute an appropriate portion of such fees to organizations or projects that benefit persons of limited means." Id.

9. Here, the clients – constituents invited to participate in this program – receive legal services free of charge. The attorneys meet these clients for one session in a government official's district office or other community-based location. The program is paid by the offices of city and state officials and administered by the non-profit arm of a New York law school, and appears to provide broad legal services to increase the availability and quality of legal services to poor persons. The program administrator is, of course, in the best position to determine whether these services qualify as a pro bono program. Nevertheless, assuming that the program does address the legal needs of the poor, because the program participants receive free limited scope legal representation, no basis exists to treat this program any differently from any other pro bono, limited scope legal services program, despite the payment of a nominal fee to participating attorneys.

10. The reason for relaxing the conflicts rules for lawyers representing clients in pro bono, limited scope representation is one of practicality because participating attorneys will likely not be able to check systematically for conflicts of interests." Rule 6.5, Cmt. [3]; see Rule 6.5 Cmt. [1]; N.Y. State 1012. This rationale applies here given that the attorneys in this program have their only contact with their respective clients at the time of services for a brief counseling session, which is not permitted to evolve into a full representation. The actual knowledge standard for the conflict, therefore, is the most practical and effective way to facilitate pro bono programs and their attorney participants, as is the case here, in serving communities in need of free legal services. The lawyer's receipt of a small fee for providing free legal services to the poor is not inconsistent with this rationale.

11. Additionally, when a lawyer accepts a fee from a third party to represent someone else, the lawyer must comply with Rule 1.8(f). Rule 1.8(f) prohibits a lawyer from accepting compensation from a third party on a client's behalf unless:

> (a) the client gives informed consent;
> (b) there is no interference with the lawyer's independent professional judgment or with the client-lawyer relationship; and
> (c) the client's confidential information is protected as required by Rule 1.6.

12. These conditions are consistent with the language of Rule 6.5(d), which says that the lawyer in a program such as this "must secure the client's consent to the limited scope of the representation, and such representation shall be subject to the provisions of Rule 1.6." If these three conditions are fulfilled, the Rules permit a third party to pay a lawyer to represent a client. See N.Y. State 1063 ¶¶ 8-9 (2-15); N.Y. State 1000 ¶ 5 (2014).

CONCLUSION:

13. General conflicts rules do not apply to lawyers providing free, limited scope legal services to qualifying clients even if the lawyers are paid minimal amounts to participate in the program, though receipt of such payments requires the client's informed consent, preservation of client confidences, and avoidance of interference with the lawyer's independent professional judgment.

OPINION 1198 (06/22/2020)

TOPIC: Former government lawyer disclosure of confidential government information

DIGEST: A former government lawyer is permitted to disclose confidential information of a former client if the lawyer reasonably believes it is necessary to comply with a court order. Upon receiving the subpoena or court order, the lawyer must first consult with the former client and, until otherwise instructed by former client, the lawyer should seek to limit the demand or disclosure prior to disclosing any confidential information. If the lawyer discloses the client's confidential information, the lawyer should seek to minimize the disclosure of confidential information consistent with law.

RULES: 1.4, 1.6, 1.9, 1.11, 8.5

FACTS:

1. The inquirer, an attorney licensed in New York, previously served as a government prosecutor. While a prosecutor, the inquirer served as an onsite legal advisor to the team conducting a certain criminal investigation. The investigation included search warrants and the inquirer was present at the crime scene for evidence gathering.

2. The inquirer has reason to believe that the victim and the victim's family will commence a civil lawsuit and name the inquirer's former government client as a defendant. The inquirer anticipates being called as a witness in connection with the civil case arising from the investigation. The inquirer seeks guidance on how to respond if served with a subpoena in the civil case.

QUESTION:

3. What are a former government attorney's obligations regarding compliance with a subpoena that seeks information or testimony from the attorney about a matter in which the attorney was involved while a government prosecutor?

OPINION:

4. As a preliminary matter, we note that the inquirer's former government employer may have its own rules and regulations pertaining to its current or former government employees that may impose obligations on the inquirer apart from and may be superior to those in the N.Y. Rules of Professional Conduct ("Rules"). Our jurisdiction is limited to questions of ethics under the Rules, so nothing in this opinion is intended to express a view on whether other law may require the inquirer to abide by laws specific to the government agency that employed the inquirer notwithstanding anything in the Rules.

5. Rule 1.6 provides that a lawyer shall "not knowingly reveal confidential information . . . or use such information to the disadvantage of a client or for the advantage of the lawyer or a third person, unless (a) the client gives informed consent, as defined in Rule 1.0(j); (b) the disclosure is impliedly authorized to advance the best interests of the client and is either reasonable under the circumstances or customary in the professional community; or (c) the disclosure is permitted by paragraph (b)" of Rule 1.6.

6. Although the inquirer is no longer employed as a prosecutor, the duty of confidentiality continues after the representation of the client has ended. Under Rule 1.9(c), a lawyer who has previously represented a client in a matter shall not thereafter: (i) use confidential information of the former client protected by Rule 1.6 to the disadvantage of the former client, except as the Rules would permit or require with respect to a current client or when the information has become generally known; or (ii) reveal confidential information of the former client protected by Rule 1.6 except as the Rules would permit or require with respect to a current client. Thus, Rule 1.6's duty of confidentiality endures following the termination of the attorney-client relationship.

7. Rule 1.6(a) defines "confidential information" as "information gained during or relating to the representation of a client, whatever its source, that is (a) protected by the attorney-client privilege, (b) likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed, or (c) information that the client has requested be kept confidential." Under the definition, "confidential information" does not include "a lawyer's legal knowledge or legal research" or information that is "generally known in the local community or in the trade, field or profession to which the information relates." Id. We note, as well, that not all information falling within the definition of "confidential information" under the Rules may be subject to evidentiary privileges, though a lawyer's ethical obligation of confidentiality is not limited to privileged information.

8. In parallel to Rule 1.6, Rule 1.11, entitled "Special Conflicts of Interest for Former and Current Government Officers and Employees," defines "confidential government information" to mean "information that has been obtained under governmental authority and that, at the time this Rule is applied, the government is prohibited by law from disclosing to the public or has a legal privilege not to disclose, and that is not otherwise available to the public." Although this definition is narrower than that of "confidential information" in Rule 1.6, we consider Rule 1.6 as a touchstone for analysis.

9. Rule 1.6(b) sets forth six permissive exceptions under which a lawyer may reveal confidential information related to a client's representation. The exception of most apparent relevance here is found in Rule 1.6(b)(6), which says that a lawyer "may reveal confidential information to the extent that the lawyer reasonably believes necessary" when the lawyer is "permitted or required under these Rules or to comply with other law or court order." Comment [15] to Rule 1.6 explains that "[p]aragraph (b) permits but does not require the disclosure of information relating to a client's representation to accomplish the purposes specified in paragraphs (b)(1) through (b)(6). A lawyer's decision not to disclose as permitted by paragraph (b) does not violate this Rule. Disclosure may, however, be required by other Rules or by other law." Rule 1.6, Cmt [15].

10. Comment [12] to Rule 1.6 observes that "[p]aragraph (b) does not mandate any disclosures. However, other law may require that a lawyer disclose confidential information. Whether such a law supersedes Rule 1.6 is a question of law beyond the scope of these Rules." Rule 1.6, Cmt [12]. Comment [12] instructs further that, when disclosure of confidential information appears to be required by other law, the lawyer must consult with the client to the extent required by Rule 1.4 – the Rule requiring communications with a client – before making the disclosure, unless such consultation would be prohibited by other law. If the lawyer concludes that other law supersedes this Rule and requires disclosure, paragraph (b)(6) permits the lawyer to make such disclosures "as are necessary to comply with the law." Rule 1.6, Cmt [12]. See N.Y. State 998 ¶ 12 (2014) (Rule 1.6(b)(6) permits disclosure to the extent reasonably believed necessary "when permitted or required under these Rules or to comply with other law or court order").

11. Comment [13] to Rule 1.6 provides additional guidance. The inquirer is to consult with the client and seek informed consent. The inquirer should seek to prevent disclosure by raising arguments to challenge the order. Comment [13] elaborates: "Absent informed consent of the client to comply with the order, the lawyer should assert on behalf of the client nonfrivolous arguments that the order is not authorized by law, the information sought is protected against disclosure by an applicable privilege or other laws, or the order is invalid or defective for some other reason. In the event of an adverse ruling, the lawyer must consult with the client to the extent required by Rule 1.4 about the possibility of an appeal or further challenge, unless such consultation would be prohibited by other law."

12. In 2016, the American Bar Association Standing Committee on Ethics and Professional Responsibility issued Formal Opinion 473, which detailed a lawyer's obligation upon receiving a subpoena relating to the lawyer's representation of a client. The ABA Committee opined that "a lawyer must obey a court order, subject to any right to move the court to withdraw or modify the order or to appeal the order. But a lawyer facing a court order requiring the disclosure of client confidential information still is faced with complex, critical and fact-intensive questions on how to respond — e.g., what challenges should be considered, what specific information should be disclosed, and what protective measures should be sought. In making these judgments the lawyer must balance obligations inherent in the lawyer's dual role as an advocate for the client and an officer of the court." Initially, if the client is available, the lawyer must consult the client. If instructed by the client or if the client is unavailable, the lawyer must assert all reasonable claims against disclosure and seek to limit the subpoena or other demand on any reasonable ground. ABA Formal Opinion 473 (2016). We agree.

13. Hence, the inquirer must initially consult the former client. If the inquirer determines that he or she is required to disclose the client's confidential information to comply with a court order or subpoena, any adverse disclosure should be no greater than the lawyer reasonably believes necessary to accomplish the purpose. Rule 1.6, Cmt [14].

14. In N.Y, State 1057 (2015), this Committee held that: "[w]here a court orders that confidential information be disclosed, the lawyer should seek to protect the information by asking for an in camera examination by the court. In many cases, this will limit the adverse effects of disclosure on the client." Id. ¶ 18. The Committee in its opinion continued that in the alternative, "the lawyer may ethically decide not to comply immediately with the court's order. Instead, the lawyer may test the validity of the order by appealing. An appeal is not mandatory, but if the lawyer believes the information to be disclosed is protected by the attorney-client privilege, the lawyer should appeal the court order." Id. ¶ 19; see N.Y. State 681 (1996) (lawyer may disclose "secrets" [such as information embarrassing or detrimental to the client] if ordered by a court to do so, but if information is protected by the privilege, lawyer may have an ethical obligation to appeal court's ruling); N.Y. State 528 (1981) (when lawyer's claim of privilege is rejected by a court ruling or order, lawyer may postpone disclosure until validity of adverse ruling is determined on appeal).

15. We also note that if the inquirer is licensed to practice in New York and another jurisdiction Rule 8.5, governing choice of law, would determine which jurisdiction's rules should be applied to the lawyer's conduct. The laws of the disciplinary jurisdiction to apply would be the jurisdiction where the lawyer principally practices. "If the lawyer is licensed to practice in this state and another jurisdiction, the rules to be applied shall be the rules of the admitting jurisdiction in which the lawyer principally practices; provided, however, that if particular conduct clearly has its predominant effect in another jurisdiction in which the lawyer is licensed to practice, the rules of that jurisdiction shall be applied to that conduct." Rule 8.5(b)(2)(ii). Accordingly, it is possible that another jurisdiction's rules may apply to the lawyer's conduct as dictated by Rule 8.5.

CONCLUSION:

16. A former government lawyer is permitted to disclose confidential information of a former client if the lawyer reasonably believes it is necessary to comply with a court order. Upon receiving the subpoena or court order, the lawyer must first consult with the former client and until otherwise instructed by client, the lawyer should seek to limit the demand or disclosure prior to disclosing any confidential information. If the lawyer discloses the client's confidential information, the lawyer should seek to minimize the disclosure of confidential information to the necessary, consistent with law.

OPINION 1199 (07/15/2020)

TOPIC: Attorney website to assist pro se litigants; marketing of legal services

DIGEST: An attorney may, under certain conditions, establish a separate business through a website to assist pro se litigants with filings through an automated system where the business will not be providing individualized legal advice or advertising a law firm's legal services. If an attorney reviews the filings generated by the automated system, or provides general representation on the legal matter, the entirety of the services are subject to all ethical rules governing lawyers.

RULES: 5.7, 7.1, 7.2, 7.3.

FACTS:

1. The inquirer, an attorney admitted in New York, plans to create, with a former law firm colleague, an incorporated business to market the services of the former colleague's firm on a website. The inquirer envisions the website offering three different services.

2. The first service – we will call it Tier I – would be a "guided do-it-yourself" in which the website would provide users with generic templates and general legal guidance to assist them in making pro se filings in New York. This automated service, for which the user would pay, would entail no interaction between the user and a lawyer specific to the user's needs; the user would select from a preprogrammed menu of options. In the second service – Tier II – users would still be initially guided through the completion and assembly of their pro se filings by the automated system, but the final product would be reviewed by an attorney to check for compliance, completeness, and the potential efficacy of the submission, after which the service and filing of the papers would rest with the pro se litigant purchasing the service. A third service, Tier III, would provide the users with full representation by the law firm, in consideration of a legal fee to be paid by the user.

3. The inquirer wishes to avoid forming an attorney-client relationship with visitors to the website who pay for the services offered by Tiers I and II, and to form such a relationship only with those who avail themselves of Tier III by retaining the law firm to represent them. In the inquirer's words, the purpose of Tiers I and II is to provide affordable and accessible guidance to pro se litigants who would otherwise be left "completely to their own devices."

4. The website would feature the name of the newly-established corporation wholly owned by the inquirer and the erstwhile colleague, as well as the name of the latter's law firm.

QUESTION:

5. The inquirer asks whether a corporation may offer the services proposed for Tiers I and II. We see other issues as well.

OPINION:

General Principles

6. In N.Y. State 636 (1992), we wrote:

> There is . . . no ethical proscription against a lawyer engaging in a separate business not constituting the practice of law, N.Y. State 557 (1984), provided that the lawyer does not use the separate business as a means of soliciting legal practice in violation of any statute or court rule and the lawyer does not recommend to his or her clients the purchase of a product from the separate business, N.Y. State 536 (1981), and provided further that the lawyer does not violate any ethical or legal rules. N.Y. State 584 (1987); N.Y. State 307 (1973).

7. Consequently, we concluded that "a lawyer or law firm could establish a separate entity to prepare and engage in the general publication of standard form wills." Id. We opined that there is no per se ethical proscription against a law firm establishing a wholly separate business selling will forms operating under the trade name "The Will Store," provided that the phrase was not used in conjunction with the names of the attorney principals, the business did not constitute the practice of law, and the separate business is not used to solicit legal practice. Id.

8. Several years after we issued N.Y. State 636, the courts codified its conclusion, with conditions, by adopting the substantial equivalent of what is now Rule 5.7 of the N.Y. Rules of Professional Conduct ("Rules"), which contains requirements for lawyers and law firms providing non-legal services. Rule 5.7(c) defines non-legal services to "mean those services that lawyers may lawfully provide and that are not prohibited as an unauthorized practice of law when provided by" a non-lawyer. Rule 5.7(a) varies the requirements applicable to these non-legal services depending on whether the services are "distinct" or "not distinct" from the legal services the lawyer or law firm provides to the affected persons.

9. The Rules do not define the word "distinct." Our opinions have interpreted the word consistent with its customary usage to mean "not alike, different, not the same, separate, clearly marked off." N.Y. State 1135 ¶ 7 (2017) (citing Webster's Unabridged Dictionary 534 (2d ed. 1979)). The "most important factor in determining distinctness is the degree of integration of the services." N.Y. State 1155 ¶ 14 (2018). Applying this and other factors, we have concluded that some non-legal services are not distinct from legal services, e.g., N.Y. State 1026 ¶ 10 (2014) (lawyer/mediator preparing settlement documents in domestic relations matters), while others are distinct, e.g., N.Y. State 1157 ¶ 8 (2018) (lawyer offering engineering services unrelated to law practice).

10. This matters. Rule 5.7(a)(1) says that a lawyer or law firm providing non-legal services to clients or other persons is subject to the entirety of the Rules when the non-legal services are not distinct from legal services. When the services are distinct, the Rules nevertheless caution that a consumer's reasonable belief controls. By reason of Rule 5.7(a)(2) & (3), "if the person receiving the legal services could reasonably believe that" the non-legal services "are the subject of a client-lawyer relationship," then the lawyer owes a duty to clarify by rebutting the presumption that the Rules create. Rule 5.7(a)(4) presumes that the recipient of the non-legal services will believe that the services are subject to a lawyer-client relationship unless the lawyer or law firm has advised that person in writing "that the services are not legal services and that the protection of a lawyer-client relationship does not exist with respect to" the non-legal services, or if the interest of the lawyer or law firm in the entity providing the non-legal services is de minimis. This written notice or disclaimer removes the rendition of non-legal services from the application of the Rules to those distinct non-legal services, provided that those non-legal services do not constitute the unauthorized practice of law and that the lawyer or law firm in fact supplies no legal services. When, as here, the lawyer and onetime colleague wholly own the entity, the issue of de minimis involvement is not implicated.

11. The inquirer acknowledges that the Tier III services – the establishment of a full representation on the matter – creates a lawyer-client relationship to which all the Rules apply. We focus, then, on the website's offering of Tier II and Tier I services. On our view, the inquirer must first determine whether the Tier I and Tier II services constitute the practice of law. This will depend in large part on whether the services provide generic forms or whether they purport to be giving individualized recommendations based on facts the user provides. This is a fact-based determination on which we do not opine: "Questions about services comprising the unauthorized practice of law are outside the orbit of this Committee's reach, and so we offer no opinion on that subject." N.Y. State 1135 ¶ 5; see Rule 5.7(c) (non-legal services permitted under Rule 5.7 "mean those services that . . . are not prohibited as an unauthorized practice of law"). For our purposes here, we assume without deciding that the provision of generic legal forms does not constitute the unauthorized practice of law.

An Interactive Internet Relationship between Lawyer and Client on a Specific Legal Matter

12. N.Y. State 832 (2009) is enlightening on the proposed Tier II service, in which visitors to the proposed website would be guided by the automated system to complete generic forms for pro se filings but then be advised by a lawyer about features of the forms. In N.Y. State 832, we addressed a sole practitioner's inquiry involving the sale of shelf corporations, which we noted was a non-legal service. We explored the scenario in which the lawyer would provide no legal advice to the purchasers of the shelf corporations as follows (at ¶ 5):

> For the assumption that the lawyer provides no legal advice to remain true, the lawyer could not answer the kinds of questions a prospective customer might ask that are likely to call for legal advice (e.g., What are the tax consequences? How long may I leave the corporation on the shelf? Do I have to notify the state if I buy a shelf corporation? Is the corporation validly formed?). For example, if the shelf corporations were sold over the Internet, and the attorney was not identified anywhere on the web site as a lawyer, and any information about the corporations was provided only in writing (e.g., via FAQs or links to articles), and purchasers never communicated with the lawyer directly and had no opportunity to ask for advice, then the lawyer would not be giving legal advice to purchasers. In that case the Rules would not generally apply to those sales.

13. On our view, the proposed Tier II services in which the final papers generated through the Tier I service would then be reviewed and critiqued by an attorney to check for compliance, completeness, and potential efficacy of the submission, crosses the line we drew in N.Y. State 832. Although the existence of a lawyer-client relationship is ultimately a legal - not an ethics question - Rules, Preamble ¶ 9, the rendition of legal advice on a specific matter seems to us to embrace the very essence of a lawyer-client relationship. Subject to the Rules, including Rules 7.1, 7.2, and 7.3, a lawyer may offer such services to the public on the Internet. But in our judgment, the lawyer, a law firm, or a lawyer-owned purportedly non-legal services entity may not escape the Rules in engaging in these activities, and no disclaimer or other notice may rescue them from this consequence.

14. Otherwise put, we do not consider the contemplated Tier II service to be a non-legal service but the rendition of legal services to specific persons on specific matters. The services are not distinct from legal services; they are legal services. The Rules fully apply.

A Lawyer's Offering of Forms on the Internet

15. The Rules do not necessarily fully apply to a do-it-yourself site contemplated by the inquirer's Tier I service, not an automated service. Nothing in the Rules prevents a lawyer from starting a separate business to operate a website (or engaging in other activities) that provides generic advice on legal issues to the public – that is, advice not tailored to facts and law unique to a specific identifiable consumer. Assuming, again, that no unauthorized practice of law occurs, we think a lawyer or a non-lawyer may create a website or other platform to offer the public such generic forms of basic documents as wills, trusts, template lawsuits, and the like. To that extent, we consider the practice akin to that blessed in N.Y. State 636's acceptance of The Will Store. But that blessing came with a condition that, if the operator is a member of the bar, then the lawyer may "not use the separate business as a means of soliciting legal practice in violation of any statute or court rule and the lawyer does not recommend to his or her clients the purchase of a product from the separate business." As presented to us, the inquirer's proposal does not comply with this condition. Cf. N.Y. State 951 ¶¶ 10-12 (2012) (lawyer may establish a web-based letter-writing service if, among other things, no legal services are rendered and the site prominently disclaims the existence of a lawyer-client relationship).

16. As we said in N.Y. State 832, when the attorney's status as a lawyer is visible to the public (e.g., the attorney uses a law office name or letterhead, or advertises the sales on the lawyer's web site, or puts "Esq." or "J.D." after the lawyer's name), a substantial risk is present that the purchaser of the non-legal service "will be misled as to whether an attorney-client relationship exists." Id. ¶ 8. In this scenario, when an attorney or law firm's status is disclosed to a purchaser of the non-legal service, we concluded that "[t]he risk is great because the client may be confused about the nature of the attorney's role." Id. ¶ 10; see Rule 5.7, Cmt. 1 ("The recipient of the non-legal services may expect, for example, that the protection of client confidences and secrets, prohibitions against representation of persons with conflicting interests, and obligations of a lawyer to maintain professional independence apply to the provision of non-legal services when that may not be the case. The risk of confusion is especially acute when the lawyer renders both legal and non-legal services with respect to the same matter."); N.Y. State 951 ¶ 6 ("It is likely that a client of the letter writing service, knowing that the writer is a lawyer, may expect legal advice.").

17. The concerns expressed in N.Y. State 832 and Comment [1] to Rule 5.7 are particularly heightened here, when the business is being formed to market a law firm's services and purchasers for Tier II and Tier III legal services on the very product sold as Tier I service. As a result, if the attorney's status as a lawyer is visible to the public on the website offering the Tier I services, as the inquirer anticipates, "then absent a disclaimer or other steps, the recipients of the non-legal services could reasonably believe there is an attorney-client relationship, and thus the Rules would apply." N.Y. State 832 ¶ 11.

18. If the attorney's status as a lawyer is visible, such as on the business's website or on a lawyer's website marketing the business, one way for a lawyer to avoid wholesale application of the Rules to the sale of non-legal services would be to give the purchaser in writing the Rule 5.7(a)(4) disclaimer stating that no legal services are being rendered and that the protection of an attorney-client relationship does not exist. Even if the lawyer provides the disclaimer specified in Rule 5.7(a)(4), it would not be effective if the lawyer is engaged in activities that constitute the unauthorized practice of law or the lawyer or law firm actually provided legal advice or other legal services to the consumer of the non-legal service. N.Y. State 832 ¶ 11.

19. In short, a lawyer or law firm may operate a separate business that offers a user generic templates to the public, but may not do so as part of, or in connection with, the lawyer's or law firm's offering of legal services. Assuming, again, that such an offering does not amount to the unauthorized practice of law – that is, that a non-lawyer may engage in such activity without running afoul of the law against unauthorized practice – we think a lawyer or law firm may do the same if, but only if, the lawyer or law firm's status as such is not visible to the public, or if, visible, the lawyer or law firm makes the written disclaimer for which Rule 5.7(a)(4) provides to rebut the presumption that a lawyer-client relationship exists.

CONCLUSION:

20. An attorney may, under certain conditions, establish a separate business through a website to assist pro se litigants with filings through an automated system where the business will not be providing individualized legal advice or advertising a law firm's legal services. If an attorney reviews the filings generated by the automated system, or provides general representation on the legal matter, the entirety of the services are subject to the ethical rules governing lawyers.

OPINION 1200 (07/21/2020)

TOPIC: Dual practice as a lawyer and wealth management provider; conflicts of interest

DIGEST: A lawyer may not simultaneously provide legal services and wealth management services to a client for separate fees. A lawyer may provide wealth management services to non-law clients, subject to Rule 5.7. A lawyer may not refer a law client to a financial planner for a fee, even if the services are unrelated, as the referral fee may compromise the loyalty and independent judgment owed to the client.

RULES: 1.7(a) & (b); 1.8(f); 5.7

FACTS:

1. The inquirer, a non-practicing attorney admitted in New York, has maintained a twenty-year career as a wealth manager, providing fee-based planning, life insurance sales, and asset management. The inquirer would like to resume practicing law in a firm or solo practice and also to continue to provide investment advisory services and/or design and broker financial products for a commission. The wealth management services would be provided through an entirely separate entity from the legal services entity. The inquirer asks several questions about the permissibility of providing these services to legal and non-legal clients, including, for example, charging separate fees for creating a life insurance trust for a law client and selling the client a new life insurance policy.

QUESTIONS:

2. The inquirer asks three questions:

(a) May a lawyer simultaneously provide wealth management services to law clients for separate fees?

(b) May a lawyer provide wealth management services to non-law clients?

(c) May a lawyer, during a representation, refer a law client to a third-party financial planner and receive a referral fee?

OPINIONS:

Simultaneous Provision of Legal and Non-Legal Services to the Same Client for Separate Fees

3. In the circumstances at issue, the answer to the first question – the rendition of dual services to the same client for separate fees – is no. Traditionally, lawyers have provided both legal and non-legal services to the same client. See N.Y. State 206 (1971) (lawyer-accountant services). The N.Y. Rules of Professional Conduct ("Rules") expressly allow a lawyer to do so. See Rule 5.7.

4. This does not end the inquiry. Rule 1.7(a) prohibits a lawyer from representing a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that a significant risk exists that the lawyer's professional judgment on the client's behalf will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial or business interests. Providing legal and non-legal services to a client for separate fees presents a conflict of interest. This conflict of interest may be cured only if client consent is permissible under Rule 1.7(b), after full disclosure, confirmed in writing. In some circumstances, such consent may be sufficient to remedy the conflict. See N.Y. State 1155 ¶ 5 (2018) (informed consent permissible in some cases); e.g., N.Y. State 784 (2005) (if an entertainment management company in which a lawyer has an interest that provides non-legal services to a client of the lawyer's firm, the law firm may continue to represent the client only if a disinterested lawyer would believe that the representation of the client will not be thereby adversely affected and the client consents to the representation after full disclosure of the implications of the lawyer's interest in the management company).

5. This Committee has previously opined, however, that some dual practice conflicts are so serious as to preclude the possibility of informed consent. In a series of opinions, we have found that, in certain cases, the conflict between the legal and non-legal services is so severe that informed consent cannot cure it. Most of these opinions involve acting as a lawyer and a real estate broker in the same transaction. See N.Y. State 1015 ¶ 7 (2014); N.Y. State 1013 ¶ 5 (2014); N.Y. State 933 ¶ 7 (2012); N.Y. State 919 ¶ 3 (2012); N.Y. State 752 (2002) (after adoption of the predecessor to Rule 5.7, the conflict provisions of the Code of Professional Responsibility still prohibited a lawyer from acting as a lawyer and a real estate broker in the same transaction, even with the consent of the client); N.Y. State 208 (1971).

6. The problem with consent identified in these opinions is that the broker's personal financial interest in losing the brokerage transaction interferes with the lawyer's ability to render independent advice with respect to the transaction. See also N.Y. State 738 (2001) (dual role of lawyer for real estate client and abstract title examiner impermissible because of possible need to negotiate exceptions to title); N.Y. State 621 (1991); N.Y. State 595 (1988). For instance, a lawyer may not provide both legal and financial planning advice to clients and receive brokerage commissions with respect to financial products purchased by clients receiving the lawyer's legal advice. See N.Y. State 1155 ¶ 6 (2018). By contrast, we concluded that, as long as the financial planning corporation did not offer any products (e.g. securities, real estate or insurance) for which it would receive a commission or other form of compensation or act as legal counsel and broker in the same transaction, then the Rules would permit the conduct. See id.; see also N.Y. State 619 (1991); N.Y. State 536 (1981).

7. Here, the inquirer seeks to offer legal services for a fee and wealth management services to the same clients from a separate entity for a separate fee – the creation of the life insurance trust coupled with the sale of an insurance policy being only an illustration. This dual practice creates a conflict that, in our opinion, is not amenable to consent for the same reasons set forth in the foregoing opinions, namely, that the legal fees for creating a life insurance trust are likely modest to the commissions for selling a life insurance policy. As a result, based on our prior opinions, we believe the dual practice is not subject to informed consent and hence impermissible.

Provision of Non-Legal Services to Non-Clients

8. The answer to the second question is yes – a lawyer may provide non-legal wealth management services to non-law clients if the lawyer complies with Rule 5.7. Rule 5.7(c) defines a non-legal service to mean "services that lawyers may lawfully provide and that are not prohibited as an unauthorized practice of law" when provided by a non-lawyer. Although legal issues are beyond our jurisdictional reach, we assume without deciding that a lawyer may legally engage in wealth management services and that such services do not constitute the unauthorized practice of law. Rules 5.7(a)(1) & (2) concern situations in which the lawyer intends to offer such non-legal services to law clients – persons to whom the lawyer is providing legal services. Here, however, the inquirer is interested in providing the non-legal wealth management services to persons who are not law clients and to do so through an entity separate from the inquirer's law practice. In these circumstances, the applicable standard is found in Rule 5.7(a)(3).

9. Rule 5.7(a)(3) says that when, as here, a lawyer or law firm "is an owner, controlling party or agent of, or is otherwise affiliated with, an entity that the lawyer or law firm knows to be providing" non-legal services to someone, then the lawyer or law firm "is subject to these Rules with respect" to the non-legal services "if the person receiving the services could reasonably believe" that the non-legal services are the subject of a client-lawyer relationship. Rule 5.7(a)(4) creates a presumption that the person receiving the non-legal services will believe the non-legal services "to be subject to a client-lawyer relationship unless the lawyer or law firm has advised the person receiving the services in writing that the services are not legal services and that the protection of a client-lawyer relationship does not exist" with respect to the non-legal services.

10. Thus, a lawyer may provide non-legal wealth management services to non-law clients if the lawyer or law firm rebuts the presumption that Rule 5.7(a)(4) creates if, in offering the non-legal services, the lawyer disclaims the existence of a lawyer-client relationship. This disclaimer tells the consumer that such accessories to a lawyer-client relationship as the protection of client confidential information, prohibitions against representation of persons with conflicting interests, and obligations of a lawyer to maintain professional independence do not apply to the provision of non-legal services.

Receipt of Referral Fees from Third Parties

11. The answer to the inquirer's third question – receipt of a referral fee from a wealth management firm unconnected to the inquirer – was addressed in N.Y. State 1086 (2016). There, we said that the question whether a lawyer may accept a referral fee from a third-party service provider implicates Rules 1.7(a)(2) and 1.8(f). Id. ¶ 6. Rule 1.7(a)(2), as we note above, prohibits a representation when a reasonable lawyer would conclude that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests unless the conflict can be and is waived under Rule 1.7(b).

12. We noted in N.Y. State 1086 that a number of our prior opinions have permitted a lawyer to accept a referral fee or commission from a third-party service provider in a few restricted instances, but that other prior opinions have prohibited a lawyer from accepting such a referral fee or commission, often because the lawyer's personal conflict of interest is so great that disclosure to and consent from the client will not cure the conflict.

13. Our opinions permit such a payment in very limited circumstances. See, e.g., N.Y. State 981 (2013) (referral fee not prohibited by Rule 1.7 when the service is not related to the lawyer's legal services and the lawyer makes no recommendation to use the service); N.Y. State 667 (1994) (lawyer may accept referral fee from mortgage broker notwithstanding predecessors to Rules 1.7(a) and 1.8(f) as long as client consents and all proceeds are credited to client if client so requests); N.Y. State 626

(1992) (lawyer for lender may retain fees from a title insurance company as long as client consents and amount of the fee is disclosed to the borrower who will pay the cost of the insurance and the total amount of the lawyer's fee is not excessive); N.Y. State 576 (1986) (lawyer may act as agent for title insurance company and also represent the buyer, seller or mortgagee in a real estate transaction consistent with the predecessors to Rules 1.7(a) and 1.8(f) as long as lawyer credits client with amount received from title insurer or the client expressly consents to the lawyer retaining the fee paid by the insurer); N.Y. State 461 (1977) (lawyer may accept part of a fire adjuster's commission consistent with predecessor to Rule 1.7(a) if the client consents and all proceeds are credited to client); and N.Y. State 107 (1969) and N.Y. State 107(a) (1970) (both permitting lawyer to accept a referral fee from a financial company when the lawyer invests the client's funds in certificates of deposit, if client consents after disclosure and lawyer remits the fee to client if client so requests).

14. When these narrow circumstances do not exist, we have opined that receipt of a commission creates a conflict that informed consent cannot cure. See, e.g., N.Y. State 682 (1996) (lawyer may not accept a fee from an investment adviser for referring a client under predecessor to Rule 1.7 because disclosure and consent would not cure the lawyer's direct and substantial conflict); N.Y. State 671 (1994) (lawyer engaged in estate planning may not accept referral fee from insurance company for referring client under predecessor to Rule 1.7 because disclosure and consent could not cure the direct and substantial conflict between the client's and the lawyer's interests); N.Y. State 619 (1991) (when estate planning lawyer's remuneration from the third party would vary with the quantity of the product or services recommended, receipt of the referral fee was impermissible under predecessors to Rules 1.7 and 1.8(a) [business transaction with client] because the lawyer's substantial financial interest conflict could not be cured by disclosure and consent).

15. N.Y. State 682 identifies two factors that determine whether the lawyer's financial interest in a referral fee is so great that disclosure and client consent will be ineffective. A client may give informed consent for a referral fee when (a) the transaction at issue involves a product or service that is fairly uniform among providers and is required in an objectively determinable amount, or (b) when the product or service is fairly uniform among providers and is unconnected to any particular legal services.

16. In this case, we understand that a variety of financial products could meet the financial planning objectives of the clients (i.e. the products are not fairly uniform) and that the products are not required in an objectively determinable monetary figure. See N.Y. State 1086 ("an attorney may not accept a fee from an investment advisor for referring a client to the advisor, because the services of advisors vary substantially among differing providers and the amount of funds that should ideally be entrusted to any particular adviser is not objectively determinable.") Moreover, when the recipient also is a legal services client, the products are likely connected to the inquirer's legal services. For these reasons, we believe the receipt of referral fees or commissions would be ethically prohibited.

17. Comment [1] of Rule 1.7 highlights the essential aspects of a lawyer's relationship with a client: loyalty and independent judgment. "The professional judgment of a lawyer should be exercised, within the bounds of the law, solely for the benefit of the client and free of compromising influences and loyalties. Concurrent conflicts of interest, which can impair a lawyer's professional judgment, can arise from the lawyer's responsibilities to another client, a former client or a third person, or from the lawyer's own interests. A lawyer should not permit these competing responsibilities or interests to impair the lawyer's ability to exercise professional judgment on behalf of each client."

18. Here, there is a possibility that recommending a third-party non-legal services provider for a fee may indeed compromise the attorney's loyalty and independent judgment owed to one's client. Therefore, an attorney may not accept a referral fee from a third-party non-legal services provider from law clients who were referred to and received services from a third-party financial planner.

CONCLUSION:

19. A lawyer may not simultaneously provide legal services and wealth management services to a client for separate fees because it is a conflict of interest that consent may not remedy. A lawyer may provide wealth management services to non-law clients subject to Rule 5.7. A lawyer may not refer a law client, even if the services are unrelated, to a financial planner for a referral fee.

OPINION 1201 (08/31/2020)

TOPIC: Retired lawyers; referral fees

DIGEST: A lawyer who received a referral of a contingency-fee wrongful death matter from a lawyer who later retired under the rules of the Office of Court Administration before the conclusion of the case may share the legal fee with the retired lawyer if the latter assumed joint responsibility for the matter.

RULES: 1.5, 1.17(a), 5.4

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a New York lawyer who represents plaintiffs in personal injury actions on a contingency-fee basis. The inquirer recently settled a prolonged wrongful death action, and, conforming to State law, sought and obtained court approval of the settlement, including the amount of attorneys' fees. We understand that, in keeping with this court approval, the client has been paid the full amount of the settlement proceeds to which the client is entitled.

2. The inquirer came to the representation of the client as a result of a referral from another New York lawyer unaffiliated with the inquirer. According to the inquirer, an unwritten agreement between the two lawyers provided that the referral fee would be a fixed formula splitting any legal fee based on a statutory schedule established for the type of case at issue; the division was to be made without regard to the legal services that each lawyer actually performed. The client, it is said, knew of this oral agreement but not the specifics of the fee division. We are told that the agreement between the lawyers has no effect on the amount of the client's recovery in the wrongful death settlement, because only the gross amount of the approved legal fees would be subject to any division between the two lawyers.

3. The inquirer tells us that the referring lawyer did some work in the early stages of the matter and agreed at the outset to assume joint responsibility for the matter. Nothing in the inquiry suggests that the referring lawyer later disclaimed this joint responsibility. The referring lawyer now seeks payment consistent with the fixed formula in the oral agreement.

4. During the pendency of the wrongful death action, the referring lawyer retired from the practice of law. In doing so, the referring lawyer changed his/her registration status with the Office of Court Administration to "retired," and ceased paying the bi-annual attorney registration fees that the OCA collects. This change of status occurred five years before the settlement of the long-running matter.

5. One of the requirements of "retirement" status for attorney registration is that the "retired" lawyer may not receive compensation for legal services rendered while retired. 22 N.Y.C.R.R. § 118.1(g). An OCA-retired lawyer, however, may render legal services for no compensation, and the retired lawyer remains a member of the bar. The change in registration does not strip the lawyer of a license to practice law but instead places parameters on the lawyer's practice.

QUESTION PRESENTED:

6. May a lawyer pay a referral fee to a lawyer retired under the rules of the Office of Court Administration despite the provision in those OCA rules that a retired lawyer may not receive compensation for services rendered during retirement?

OPINION:

7. The question before us is narrow. Our role is to interpret the N.Y. Rules of Professional Conduct ("Rules"). The enforceability of the unwritten agreement between the inquirer and the referring lawyer is ultimately a question of law, a question outside the ambit of our charter. A body of case law exists on the issue. See, e.g., Benjamin v. Koeppel, 85 N.Y.2d 549 (1995) (holding that the referring lawyer's registration status does not affect the enforceability of an otherwise valid fee-sharing agreement). The inquirer was free to present the matter of the fee division to the court that reviewed and approved the settlement, including the gross attorneys' fees, but the inquirer did not do so. This leaves a lingering ethical issue, and so, to address the issue, we assume without deciding that a valid and enforceable fee-sharing agreement exists between the inquirer and the referring, now-retired lawyer.

8. The ethical issue is whether the payment of the referral fee is an impermissible fee-sharing arrangement under Rules 1.5(g) and 5.4(a). Rule 1.5(g) addresses referral fees from lawyers not affiliated with the referring lawyer's firm. With exceptions not applicable here, Rule 5.4(a) prohibits sharing a fee with a non-lawyer. The question for us is whether sharing a legal fee with a lawyer holding "retired" status under the OCA rules is a disallowed fee-sharing arrangement under these Rules. We believe that it is not.

9. We have long said that the mere forwarding of a client to another lawyer is not a permissible basis for sharing in the legal fee thereby generated. N.Y. State 954 ¶ 9 (2013); N.Y. State 414 (1975). Rule 1.5(g) prohibits a lawyer from dividing a fee for legal services with another lawyer not associated in the same firm unless, among other things, "the division is in proportion to the services performed by each lawyer or, by a writing given to the client, each lawyer assumes joint responsibility for the representation." The Rule is disjunctive. Here, the proposed fee division is based not on a proportional share of the legal fee attributable to whatever preliminary work the referring lawyer performed, but rather on a set formula based on the latter's assumption of joint responsibility. The outcome of the ethical issue under Rule 1.5(g) thus turns on the meaning of "joint responsibility," at least in the context of an OCA-retired lawyer.

10. The Rules do not define "joint responsibility." The Comments accompanying the Rule say that "[j]oint responsibility for the representation entails financial and ethical responsibility as if the lawyers were associated in a partnership." Rule 1.5, Cmt. [7]. We have never delineated the precise contours of this "joint responsibility," save that "joint responsibility" involves "more than financial accountability and malpractice liability." N.Y. State 1128 ¶ 12 (2017); N.Y. State 745 (2001). Although others disagree, s*ee, e.g.*, Aiello v. Adar, 750 N.Y.S.2d 457 (Sup. Ct. Bronx Cty. 2002) (only financial accountability required); N.Y. County 715 (1996) (to the same effect), we abide by our prior opinions.

11. The text of Rule 1.5(g) offers some direction on the content of "joint responsibility." The Rule distinguishes between, on the one hand, legal services performed by the referring lawyer directly on the client's matter, for which the Rule provides for compensation on a proportional basis, and, on the other, the assumption of "joint responsibility" to the client for the rendition of legal services by the lawyer(s) handling the matter, for which the Rule dictates no compensation formula. See ABA 474 (2016) (interpreting parallel provision in the ABA Model Rules of Professional Conduct). This distinction means that "joint responsibility" entails something other than some active engagement in the day-to-day handling of the matter; it means, instead, as Comment [7] says, having "financial and ethical responsibility for the matter" in the way partners in a firm do. See ABA 487 (2019) (ditto). Rule 5.1(a) requires a law firm to "make reasonable efforts to ensure that all lawyers in the firm conform to" the Rules. At a minimum, therefore, we think "joint responsibility" under Rule 1.5(g) coincides with this Rule 5.1(a) duty.

12. This conclusion is in harmony with our discussion of "joint responsibility" in N.Y. State 961 (2013). There, the question was whether a retired lawyer could receive a fee for referring new matters to a lawyer buying the retired lawyer's practice. The Opinion equated "retirement" under Rule 1.17 with "retirement" under the OCA rules. Id. ¶ 13 & fn. 9. We corrected this position in N.Y. State 1168 ¶ 7 (2019), in which we explained that, in contrast to the statewide application of the OCA rules, "retirement" under Rule 1.17 was explicitly a geographic matter, that is, that a lawyer selling a law practice could be "retired" under Rule 1.17 if the selling lawyer ceased practicing within the county or adjacent counties where the selling lawyer had previously offered legal services. Thus, a lawyer who sold a Bronx-based law practice could be "retired" under Rule 1.17 even if the selling lawyer opened a new law office in, say, Columbia or Tompkins County, where a registered lawyer continued to practice law for compensation, and could assume joint responsibility for a matter; in that circumstance, the OCA rules are irrelevant. In any event, in Opinion 961, the selling lawyer did not intend to assume "joint responsibility" for any matters, so we did not resolve the issue of what constitutes "joint responsibility" under Rule 1.5(g). N.Y. State 961 ¶ 13.

13. Nevertheless, we think Opinion 961 offers some insight into the meaning of "joint responsibility" under Rule 1.5(g). There, we said that "the selling lawyer would need to supervise, at least to some extent, the work of the buying lawyer." Id. ¶ 13. On the (mistaken) premise that the OCA rules applied, we did not "foreclose the possibility that, under some factual circumstances, a retiring lawyer [under OCA rules] could meet" the requirements of Rule 1.5(g) by assuming a supervisory role consistent with Rule 5.1(a). Id. The "degree of supervision required is that which is reasonable under the circumstances." Rule 5.1(c).

14. We think this analysis was correct. Every day, law firm partners commonly meet this Rule 5.1(a) standard by vesting responsibility over matters to other lawyers in the firm whom, through experience, they have come to trust as meeting the standard of competence. See Rule 1.1. The partners remain responsible for each such matter – they retain "financial and ethical responsibility" for it – including, to the reasonable degree Rule 5.1(c) requires, for compliance with Rule 5.1(a)'s supervisory duties. Among other things, a lawyer who remains available for consultation on the matter, or who keeps generally abreast of developments on the matter to assure adherence to the Rules, may well fulfill the duties of a supervisory counsel. See generally N.Y. State 864 ¶¶ 8, 12 (2011). In assuming "joint responsibility" under Rule 1.5(g), a referring lawyer is in the same position as these partners.

15. In the absence of a full understanding of the referring lawyer's role in the matter at issue over time, we decline to opine on whether that role meets the standard of "joint responsibility" in this specific inquiry. For now, we say only that a lawyer "retired" with the OCA, in some circumstances, may bear the "joint responsibility" that Rule 1.5(g) contemplates, notwithstanding the lawyer's change of registration status to "retirement," and may do so by fulfilling the role akin to a supervisory lawyer in a law firm as outlined in Rule 5.1(a), Rule 5.1(c), and Comment [7] to Rule 1.5.

16. This conclusion requires us to revisit language in our Opinion 1172 (2019). There, the inquirer, anticipating retirement, transferred wills to a former law partner. The question was whether the custodial lawyer could pay fees to the now-retired inquirer in the event that any of the wills matured into fee-generating estate matters. Id. ¶ 2. We answered the question in the negative, based in part on the view that "the inquirer could assume joint responsibility for a representation only if the lawyer opts for continued registration" with the OCA. Id. ¶ 9. Coloring that view were concerns that the fee division might run afoul of Rule 5.4(a)'s prohibition on dividing fees with non-lawyers, and that a retired lawyer could not perform the services that comprise the requisite joint responsibility. Id. On further reflection, we think this answer was overbroad, and so modify the Opinion accordingly.

17. Our concern in Opinion 1172 with Rule 5.4(a) on dividing fees with non-lawyers was misplaced. A lawyer who elects to retire under the OCA rules is still a member of the bar, see Judiciary Law § 90 (the Appellate Divisions, not the OCA, are responsible for lawyer admission), and indeed the retired lawyer may continue to render legal services for no compensation without fear of engaging in the unauthorized practice of law, s*ee Benjamin*, 85 N.Y.2d at 554 ("a person is authorized to practice law if that person has been admitted to practice and has taken the requisite oath"). Thus, Rule 5.4(a), which is pertinent only to sharing fees with non-lawyers, is inapposite, because an OCA-retired lawyer is still a fully-licensed lawyer.

18. Our other concern in Opinion 1172 – that an OCA-retired lawyer could not perform the requisite legal services of "joint responsibility" – was too sweeping. We are unwilling to say that the supervisory role that Opinion 961 envisioned is beyond the capacity of an OCA-retired lawyer to satisfy, especially when the lawyer, as here, has done nothing to disclaim the lawyer's initial assumption of "joint responsibility." As a member of the bar, for example, such a lawyer could remain available for consultation, could oversee case developments to assure compliance with the Rules, and would remain jointly responsible to the client for the handling of the matter, with continued exposure to any financial and ethical repercussions. We do not mean to exhaust the ways in which an OCA-retired lawyer may bear "joint responsibility," for the duties of a supervisory lawyer under Rule 5.1(a) may vary with the facts. We say only that, on our view, an OCA-retired lawyer may in some circumstances meet the requirements of "joint responsibility" of Rule 1.5(g).

CONCLUSION:

19. A lawyer may pay a referral fee to a lawyer who is retired within the meaning of the rules of the Office of Court Administration if the referring lawyer assumed joint responsibility for the referred matter.

OPINION 1202 (10/01/2020)

TOPIC: Legal fees

DIGEST: A lawyer may charge a fixed fee for a matter as long as it is not excessive, and the lawyer specifies the services that are included in the engagement. The client must remain liable for costs, other than as permitted by Rule 1.8(e). The lawyer may require advance payment of fees, which is not to be considered a minimum fee unless specified in the retainer agreement. Although a lawyer may charge a non-excessive minimum fee, the lawyer may not charge a non-refundable fee. If the lawyer is discharged, the lawyer must return any unearned fees. The lawyer may agree with the client that the client need not pay a portion of the legal fee if the client believes the lawyer's services do not merit the additional amount.

RULES: 1.5(a), 1.5(b), 1.5(d)(4), 1.8(e), 1.16(e)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is starting an immigration law practice and is considering how to structure client payment obligations based upon a flat fee. Two possible arrangements are proposed. In the first proposal, 50% of the fee would be payable up front, when the client signs the retainer agreement. The remaining 50% would be payable in two equal payments – one to be billed halfway into the engagement, and the final payment to be billed upon completion of the engagement. In the second proposal, after payment of an initial retainer, the balance would be paid in monthly installments, with final payment payable upon completion of the engagement. In both arrangements, the client would remain responsible for filing fees and other costs, and in both arrangements the retainer agreement would provide that, in full satisfaction of the client's fee obligation, the inquirer would accept payment for some designated portion of the final balance in an amount that the client unilaterally determined that the legal services had been worth.

QUESTION:

2. What ethical considerations apply to inquirer's proposed fee agreements?

OPINION:

3. Rule 1.5 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") – the fee rule – prohibits a lawyer from charging a fee that is illegal or excessive, and it explicitly recognizes fixed fees in its listing of the considerations that determine whether a fee is excessive. See Rule 1.5(a)(8) ("whether the fee is fixed"). See also N.Y. State 942 ¶ 11 (2012) (whether a flat fee is excessive depends on the facts; a flat fee is not necessarily excessive but neither is it necessarily reasonable); N.Y. City 2015-2 (a flat fee is ethically permissible if it satisfies the other requirements of Rule 1.5). A fixed fee is often appropriate in matters frequently performed by the lawyer, where it is possible for the lawyer to accurately estimate the cost of performing the services. It is beneficial to the client since the client knows in advance the cost of the services and is not subject to inefficiencies that may increase the fee in the case of hourly billing. As in all representations, the lawyer should communicate to the client the services the lawyer will perform for the fixed fee. See Rule 1.5(b) (the lawyer shall communicate the scope of the representation).

4. Except as permitted by Rule 1.8(e), the client must remain liable for court costs and the expenses of litigation. The inquirer's engagement letter under either proposed arrangement here complies with that requirement by specifying that filing fees are not included in the fixed legal fee.

5. The Rules permit advance payment of fees. See Rule 1.5, Cmt. [4] (a lawyer may require advance payment of a fee). See also N.Y. State 816 (2007) (discussing, under the Code of Professional Responsibility (the "Code"), whether such payments constitute funds of the lawyer or client); N.Y. State 983 (2013) at note 1 (concluding there is no reason that the Rules would lead to a different result).

6. Rule 1.5(d)(4) prohibits a non-refundable retainer fee. See also Rule 1.5, Cmt. [4] (a lawyer may require advance payment of a fee, but is obliged to return any unearned portion). See Matter of Cooperman, 83 N.Y.2d 465 (1994). See generally N.Y. State 599 (1989) (discussing the prohibition against non-refundable fees under the Code and distinguishing between non-excessive minimum fees and non-refundable retainers). N.Y. City 2015-2 (fees paid to a lawyer in advance are nonrefundable only to the extent they have been earned by the lawyer).

7. Nevertheless, Rule 1.5(d)(4) also permits a lawyer to enter into a retainer agreement containing "a reasonable minimum fee clause if it defines in plain language and sets forth the circumstances under which such a fee may be incurred and how it will be calculated." Comment [4] to Rule 1.5 explains: "A lawyer may charge a minimum fee, if that fee is not excessive, and if the wording of the minimum fee clause of the retainer agreement meets the requirements of paragraph (d)(4)." A minimum fee could also be justified by a description of services to be performed at the outset of the representation, for which the lawyer claims immediate entitlement to payment, even before the work is commenced or completed, subject to the lawyer's obligation to refund any portion the lawyer does not ultimately earn. See Rule 1.16(e).

8. Rule 1.5(a) identifies the factors relevant for determining if a fee is excessive. These factors apply to a minimum fee. See N.Y. State 599 (1989) (listing factors in the former New York Lawyer's Code of Professional Responsibility, which are nearly identical factors to the factors in Rule 1.5). The factors in Rule 1.5(a), which are not intended to be exclusive, include:

> (1) the time and labor required, the novelty and difficulty of the questions involved, and the skill requisite to perform the legal service properly;
> (2) the likelihood, if apparent or made known to the client, that the acceptance of the particular employment will preclude other employment by the lawyer;
> (3) the fee customarily charged in the locality for similar legal services;
> (4) the amount involved and the results obtained;
> (5) the time limitations imposed by the client or the circumstances;
> (6) the nature and length of the professional relationship with the client;

(7) the experience, reputation and ability of the lawyer or lawyers performing the services; and

(8) whether the fee is fixed or contingent.

9. Nothing in the these factors, or in any other Rule, precludes client satisfaction as an element in determining whether a fee is excessive, and client satisfaction is consistent with and often related to "the results obtained," which is listed in Rule 1.5(a)(4) as a relevant factor. Generally, a client who gets good results is a satisfied client, and may be willing to express that satisfaction by paying a higher fee.

10. The inquiry does not state whether the initial payment is a minimum fee or a payment on account, but we believe that a fee paid before legal services are rendered is a payment on account unless expressly identified in the retainer agreement as a minimum fee. See Restatement (Third) of the Law Governing Lawyers § 38, Com. g (ALI 1998) (an advance fee payment that is not otherwise identified is presumed to be a deposit against future services). If a minimum fee, the lawyer would have to specify the services covered and the circumstances in which it would be earned. See N.Y. City 2015-2 (a fee paid in advance for services to be performed on a specific matter — sometimes called a special retainer — is not earned unless the services are performed). And if the initial payment is not a minimum fee and the inquirer withdraws from the representation or is discharged by the client before the services are completed, then the lawyer must return any unearned fees. See Rule 1.16(e) (even when withdrawal is permitted or required, a lawyer shall take steps to avoid foreseeable prejudice to the rights of the client, including promptly refunding any part of a fee paid in advance that has not been earned).

11. As a final matter, the fact that the inquirer has effectively incorporated a discount based on client satisfaction into the retainer agreement does not transform the fee arrangement into a contingent fee within the meaning of Rule 1.5(c), because the fee is not contingent on the "outcome" of the matter, and the amount of the final payment is in the sole discretion of the client. It is not unusual for a lawyer to agree to discount legal fees to resolve a client complaint or to retain client good will, and the provision giving the client discretion to pay some, all, or none of the final payment has that effect.

CONCLUSION:

12. A lawyer may charge a fixed fee for a matter as long as it is not excessive, and the lawyer specifies the services that are included in the engagement. The client must remain liable for costs, other than as permitted by Rule 1.8(e). The lawyer may require advance payment of fees, which is not to be considered a minimum fee unless specified in the retainer agreement. Although a lawyer may charge a non-excessive minimum fee, the lawyer may not charge a non-refundable fee. If the lawyer is discharged, the lawyer must return any unearned fees. The lawyer may agree with the client that the client need not pay a portion of the legal fee if the client believes the lawyer's services do not merit the additional amount. Such an agreement does not transform the fee into a contingent fee.

OPINION 1203 (10/08/2020)

TOPIC: Withdrawal from representation based on attorney health concerns

DIGEST: An attorney may withdraw from representation, with the permission of the Immigration Court, based on fear of contracting COVID-19 as a result of in-person appearances in the proceeding, where such fear renders it difficult for the attorney to carry out the representation effectively.

RULES: 1.0(w), 1.16(c), (d) & (e)

FACTS:

1. The committee has received an inquiry from a lawyer admitted to practice in the State of New York who is presently representing a client in Immigration Court proceedings. Despite the current pandemic, the matter has been scheduled for an in-person appearance. Noting that no COVID-19 safety protocols or procedures to mitigate the spread of the coronavirus have yet been established for such in-person appearances, inquirer is concerned that appearing in-person presents a substantial health risk for the inquirer and, by extension, the inquirer's family.

QUESTION:

2. May an attorney who believes that continued representation of a client before a tribunal endangers the attorney's health withdraw from that representation?

OPINION:

3. New York Rule of Professional Conduct 1.16 governs the ethical obligations of a lawyer with regard to the withdrawal from representation of a client. Rule 1.16(b) permits withdrawal when "the lawyer's mental or physical condition renders it difficult for the lawyer to carry out the representation effectively." The standard is that effective representation becomes "difficult," not impossible, a flexible standard that requires us to consider the ways in which the inquirer's fear of contracting COVID-19 could impede effective representation.

4. The inquirer's fear of contracting COVID-19 could render it difficult to carry out the representation effectively because the inquirer's fear might subtly but powerfully undermine the effectiveness of the Immigration Court representation in a number of ways. For example, the inquirer might be reluctant to spend time with the client in-person to understand the case and communicate the client's options. The inquirer might also consent prematurely to a disposition that ends the proceeding, even though it is likely that a more favorable disposition could be obtained later, following additional appearances, motions, or conferences. In order to limit exposure to the disease, the inquirer might even hasten to complete a hearing without calling witnesses to testify on behalf of the client or by waiving cross-examination of government witnesses. The standard required for Rule 1.16(d) permissive withdrawal would be met by any of these influences, or like influences, to which the inquirer would be susceptible.

5. Independent of the inquirer's fear of contracting COVID-19, withdrawal would also be permitted pursuant to Rule 1.16(c)(1) if the "withdrawal can be accomplished without material adverse effect on the interests of the client," or pursuant to Rule 1.16(c)(10) if the client "knowingly and freely assents to termination of the employment."

6. However, where, as here, a client is being represented before a "tribunal," permission of that tribunal may be required for the withdrawal regardless of the ground for withdrawal. The first sentence of Rule 1.16 (d) provides:

> If permission for withdrawal from employment is required by the rules of a tribunal a lawyer shall not withdraw from employment in a matter before that tribunal without its permission.

7. The Immigration Court is a "tribunal" – see Rule 1.0(w) (defining "tribunal," in pertinent part, as "a court, an arbitrator in an arbitration proceeding or a legislative body, administrative agency or other body acting in an adjudicative capacity") and the Immigration Court Practice Manual, version 7/2/2020, Section 2.3(i) ("Change in Representation") requires that when an attorney wishes to withdraw from representation of an individual under the jurisdiction of the Immigration Court, and that individual has not obtained successor counsel, the attorney seeking to withdraw can only do so by motion with consent of the court. Thus, Rule 1.16(d) will require the inquirer to obtain the Immigration Court's permission to withdraw unless the client has already obtained a new attorney.

8. If the Immigration Court grant*s* the inquirer's motion to withdraw, then Rule 1.16(e) will require the inquirer to "take steps, to the extent reasonably practicable, to avoid foreseeable prejudice to the rights of the client, including by giving reasonable notice to the client, allowing time for employment of other counsel, delivering to the client all papers and property to which the client is entitled, promptly repaying any part of a fee paid in advance that has not been earned and complying with applicable laws and rules."

CONCLUSION:

10. An attorney may withdraw from representation, with the permission of the Immigration Court, based on fear of contracting COVID-19 as a result of in-person appearances in the proceeding, where such fear renders it difficult for the attorney to carry out the representation effectively.

OPINION 1204 (10/14/2020)

TOPIC: Law Firm Letterhead

DIGEST: A law firm that has purchased a retired (and now deceased) lawyer's practice may list on the purchasing law firm's letterhead the name and dates of operation of the former law firm.

RULES: 7.1(a), 7.5(a)

FACTS:

1. The inquiring lawyer is a member of a law firm with two offices. The law firm purchased a law practice from another lawyer who retired, and then shortly thereafter passed away. The law firm intends to keep open the practice it purchased as its third office.

QUESTION:

2. May the law firm state "former office of [retired lawyer]" or list "[retired lawyer with dates of practice]" on the letterhead of the third office it purchased?

OPINION

3. On June 24, 2020, and effective on that date, the Appellate Divisions amended Rule 7.5 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"). Rule 7.5(a) governs the use of firm letterhead. Rule 7.5(a), which was shortened to a single sentence by the June 2020 amendments, now provides as follows:

> (a) A lawyer or law firm may use internet web sites, professional cards, professional announcement cards, office signs, letterheads or similar professional notices or devices, provided the same do not violate these Rules or any statute or court rule.

4. The New York State Bar Association amended the Comments to Rule 7.5 at the same time that the Appellate Divisions amended the black letter text of Rule 7.5. Amended Comment [1] to Rule 7.5 explains, "A lawyer's or law firm's name, trade name, domain name, web site, social media pages, office sign, business cards, letterhead, and professional designations are communications concerning a lawyer's services and must not be false, deceptive, or misleading. They must comply with this Rule and Rule 7.1."

5. Rule 7.1(a) provides:

> A lawyer or law firm shall not use or disseminate or participate in the use or dissemination of any advertisement that:
> (1) contains statements or claims that are false, deceptive or misleading; or
> (2) violates a Rule.

6. We do not believe it would be false, deceptive or misleading to state "Former Office of [Retired Lawyer]" or to list the dates of practice of the retired lawyer (now deceased) on the letterhead of the firm's third office, which is the office that housed the practice purchased by the firm. Accordingly, listing such information on the letterhead of the third office would not violate the prohibition of Rules 7.1(a) and 7.5(a) against the use, dissemination or communication of false, deceptive or misleading statements.

7. This Committee has previously recognized that the purchase of a law firm from a retiring lawyer includes the purchase of the retiring lawyer's good will. In N.Y. State 1168 (2019), we said:

> We have long recognized that the name of a law firm is central to its good will. Branding and reputation are precious commodities in any profession. We cannot ignore that, in today's rapidly changing legal market, the constant merger or acquisition of law firms has engendered combinations in which the nexus between or among the combined firms and their predecessors is at times attenuated or opaque. To say that today's legal profession does not trade in goodwill of storied names would require blinders on reality. [Citation omitted.]

8. See also N.Y. State 45 (1967) ("all of the partners have by their joint and several efforts over a period of years contributed to the good will attached to the firm name"). Thus, the law firm's calling attention on its letterhead to the fact that it has acquired the former law office of the retired (and now deceased) lawyer who sold his practice properly allows the firm to benefit from the good will it purchased. This is fully in keeping with the letter and spirit of Rule 7.5(a).

CONCLUSION:

9. Because listing the former law office purchased by the firm on the firm's letterhead, or the dates of practice of the retired lawyer (now deceased), is not false, deceptive or misleading, it complies with Rule 7.1(a) and therefore is allowed under Rule 7.5(a).

OPINION 1205 (10/26/2020)

TOPIC: Government Employee Negotiating for Private Employment

DIGEST: A lawyer serving as in-house counsel for a federal agency may not negotiate for private employment with an organization that is an adverse party in litigation before the agency where the lawyer is participating personally and substantially in the litigation.

RULES: 1.0(l) & (n), 1.11

FACTS:

1. The inquirer serves as in-house counsel for a federal agency. The inquirer would like to apply for a position with a private employer that is an adverse party in litigation before the agency.

2. The inquirer is "personally and substantially" involved in the litigation in which the private employer is an adverse party. The inquirer states, however, that the confidential information he obtained while representing the agency on the matter did not precipitate his interest in the private practice position. Moreover, if the inquirer were offered and accepted a position with the private employer, the inquirer would not participate in the matter.

QUESTION:

3. Do the New York Rules of Professional Conduct bar a lawyer in public service from applying for a job with the private employer who is an adverse party in litigation before the agency?

OPINION:

4. Our jurisdiction is limited to addressing provisions of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"). We assume for purposes of this opinion that the inquirer's proposed activities comply with any other applicable laws and regulations, but we do not analyze them. See N.Y. State 1148 ¶ 4 (2018).

5. Rule 1.11(d)(2) states that "[e]xcept as law may otherwise expressly provide, a lawyer currently serving as a public officer or employee shall not . . . negotiate for private employment with any person who is involved as a party or as lawyer for a party in a matter in which the lawyer is participating personally and substantially." (Emphasis added.) The Terminology section of the Rules provides: "Person includes an individual, a corporation, an association, a trust, a partnership, and any other organization or entity." Rule 1.0(n). The term "matter," which is broadly defined in Rule 1.0(l), "includes any litigation, judicial or administrative proceeding, case, claim, application, request for a ruling or other determination, contract, controversy, investigation, charge, accusation, arrest, negotiation, arbitration, mediation or any other representation involving a specific party or parties."

6. As Comment [4] to Rule 1.11 recognizes, Rule 1.11 "represents a balancing of interests," and notes that a "lawyer should not be in a position where benefit to [a private] client might affect performance of the lawyer's professional functions on behalf of the government."

7. The inquirer's proposed conduct is prohibited by Rule 1.11(d)(2). Under the language in Rule 1.11(d), the inquirer is "currently serving as a public officer or employee." He seeks to "negotiate for private employment with a[] person" (the private employer) "who is involved as a party . . . in a matter in which the lawyer is participating personally and substantially."

8. The fact that the inquirer's desire to join the private employer is not connected to any confidential information obtained while working with the federal agency, and the fact that he would recuse himself from participating in the litigation if hired by the private employer, do not avoid the prohibition in Rule 1.11(d)(2). Furthermore, the restrictions in Rule 1.11(d)(2) cannot be waived by the government or the private employer. Compare Rule 1.11(a)(2) (expressly permitting appropriate government agency to give informed consent to former governmental lawyer's conflict) with Rule 1.11(d)(2) (not mentioning consent). See also ABA 96-400, n. 6 ("[ABA Model] Rules 1.11 and 1.12 are actually more rigorous than 1.7(b), in that they define circumstances in which negotiations for new employment cannot be pursued at all") (emphasis added).

9. Although the inquirer's proposed conduct is prohibited by Rule 1.11(d)(2), that does not mean that he is perpetually forbidden from negotiating for employment with the private employer. Once the matter in which he is currently participating personally and substantially concludes, the inquirer will no longer be barred from negotiating for a position with the private employer. Furthermore, if the inquirer leaves the federal agency and is no longer a government officer or employee, he may ethically negotiate for a position with the private employer.

10. If the inquirer is ultimately hired by the private employer, he will need to comport with the requirements in Rule 1.11(a) through (c). See, e.g., N.Y. State 1148 ¶ 11 ("a onetime government lawyer may represent clients adverse to the lawyer's former government employer unless that lawyer had a personal and substantial involvement in the same specific matter in which the lawyer now proposes to challenge the government's position").

CONCLUSION:

11. A lawyer serving as in-house counsel for a federal agency may not negotiate for private employment with an organization that is an adverse party in litigation before the agency where the lawyer is participating personally and substantially in the litigation.

OPINION 1206 (11/02/2020)

TOPIC: Litigation Financing

DIGEST: A law firm may not refer its clients to a company providing litigation financing where the sole owner of the company is married to a lawyer who is "of counsel" to the law firm.

RULES: 1.8(e); 1.8(i); 1.10 (a); 7.5(a).

FACTS:

1. The Committee has received an inquiry from a lawyer at a firm with two partners and a former partner with no equity interest in the firm who is listed as both "retired" and "of counsel" on the firm's materials. The law firm's website includes a profile of the former partner under the heading "Our Attorneys," and details the former partner's current legal practice, including the statement that he "maintains a role with the firm in an 'of counsel' capacity." The firm would like to refer clients who need financial assistance to the former partner's wife, who is the sole owner of a company providing litigation financing. The former partner will not be involved in providing the financing and will not have any ownership in the company. The law firm will not participate in financing the litigation or have any ownership in the litigation financing company.

QUESTION:

2. May a law firm may refer its clients to a company providing litigation financing when the sole owner of the company is married to a lawyer who is listed as "retired" and "of counsel" on the law firm's materials and who is represented on the law firm's website as maintaining a role with the firm in an "of counsel" capacity?

OPINION:

3. As we concluded in N.Y. State 855 (2011):

> A lawyer may not refer a client for whom the lawyer is conducting litigation to a litigation financing company owned by the lawyer's spouse in order to advance financial assistance to the client based on the prospective recovery in that litigation if the lawyer personally would be barred from providing that financial assistance.

4. As we further noted in N.Y State 855: "If the inquiring attorney had asked this Committee whether a lawyer could personally form a litigation financing company to advance funds to clients, the Committee would have concluded that such an act violates Rule 1.8(e). Under Rule 1.8(e), the inquirer personally could not advance funds to clients in the form of loans." See also N.Y. State 1196 (2020); N.Y. State 1145 (2018).

5. Here, because the former partner and current of counsel lawyer would be personally barred from providing litigation financing to his clients, he may not refer his clients to a litigation financing company owned by his wife. Under Rule 1.10(a), a lawyer's conflicts arising under Rule 1.8 are imputed to all other lawyers "associated in" the firm. Because the former partner maintains an ongoing relationship with the law firm (i.e., he remains "associated" with it), Rule 1.10(a) imputes his conflict of interest arising from referring clients to his wife to the other lawyers in the firm. Thus, the law firm may not refer its clients to the litigation loan company.

6. Arguably, the question posed here raises a slightly different issue from the issues posed in N.Y. State 855, because there the inquiring lawyer was an active lawyer in the firm whereas here the inquiring lawyer is a former partner who is listed as "retired" and "of counsel" on the firm's materials, and has no equity interest in the firm. This factual distinction, however, does not result in a different result. Under Rule 7.5(a)(4), "[a] lawyer or law firm may be designated 'Of Counsel' on a letterhead if there is a continuing relationship with a lawyer or law firm, other than as a partner or associate." (Emphasis added.) Indeed, as we noted in N.Y. State 793 (2006): "We have interpreted an of counsel relationship to mean that the of counsel lawyer is 'available to the firm for consultation and advice on a regular and continuing basis.'" Moreover, the law firm's website lists a profile of the former partner under the heading "Our Attorneys" and says that he "maintains a role with the firm in an 'of counsel' capacity." (Emphasis added).

7. Therefore, we conclude that the former partner who is listed "of counsel" on the law firm's materials maintains an ongoing relationship with the firm that imputes his Rule 1.8 conflicts to the other lawyers in the firm and precludes the firm from referring its clients to a company providing litigation financing where the sole owner of that company is the former partner's spouse.

CONCLUSION:

8. A law firm may not refer its clients to a company providing litigation financing where the sole owner of the company is married to a lawyer who is "of counsel" to the law firm.

OPINION 1207 (11/09/2020)

TOPIC: Firm names; trade names

DIGEST: A law firm may practice in New York using a name that does not include the name of any lawyer currently or formerly practicing in the firm (i.e., under a "trade name") as long as the name under which the firm practices is not false, deceptive or misleading. A law firm may continue to practice under the same name after a name partner retires from the practice of law.

RULES: 7.5(b); 8.4(c).

FACTS:

1. In the wake of the recent amendment to Rule 7.5(b) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct, three inquiries have come to the Committee asking closely aligned questions.

2. The first inquiry comes from a national law firm that maintains offices in several states where trade names are permitted and currently practices in those states under a trade name we will call "LONG Legal Group." LONG is an acronym for "Law Office of Norman Grant" (also fictional) who is the sole owner of the firm. In New York, Grant and two New York admitted attorneys, who we will call Hudson and India, practice in a law firm we will call "Grant, Hudson & India, P.C."

3. The second inquiry comes from a firm located in New York that maintains a physical location on a street we will call "Maple Street," and wishes to practice under the trade name "Maple Street Law Group."

4. The third inquiry comes from a lawyer named Jones who informs us that Smith, one of the name partners in a law firm we will call "Smith & Jones, LLP," will soon be retiring. The remaining name partner, Jones, wants to continue practicing under the same name.

QUESTIONS:

5. May a law firm practice under a name that does not contain the name of any lawyers (in other words, under a trade name)?

6. May a law firm practice under a trade name based on its street address?

7. May a law firm continue to practice under a firm name that includes the name of a retired name partner?

DISCUSSION:

8. For decades, lawyers have been required to practice under a firm name that contains the name of one or more of the lawyers in the firm or the name or names of one or more deceased or retired members of the firm (or of a predecessor firm) in a continuing line of succession. Prior opinions issued by this Committee under this Rule have stressed the purpose of the requirement is to protect the public from being deceived or misled as to the identity of lawyers using or practicing under the firm name.

9. On June 24, 2020, however, the Appellate Divisions issued a Joint Order amending Rule 7.5(b) so that it now reads, in pertinent part:

> (a) A lawyer or law firm may use internet web sites, professional cards, professional announcement cards, office signs, letterheads, or similar professional notices or devices, provided the same do not violate these Rules or any statute or court rule.
> (b) (1) A lawyer or law firm in private practice shall not practice under:
> (i) a false, deceptive, or misleading trade name;
> (ii) a false, deceptive, or misleading domain name; or
> (iii) a name that is misleading as to the identity of the lawyer or lawyers practicing under such name.
> (2) Specific Guidance Regarding Law Firm Names
> (i) Such terms as "legal aid," "legal service office," "legal assistance office," "defender office," and the like may be used only by bona fide legal assistance organizations.
> (ii) A law firm name, trade name, or domain name may not include the terms "non-profit" or "not-for-profit" unless the law firm qualifies for those designations under applicable law.
> (iii) A lawyer or law firm in private practice may not include the name of a nonlawyer in its firm name.
> (iv) The name of a professional corporation shall contain "PC" or such symbols permitted by law.
>
> (v) The name of a limited liability company or limited liability partnership shall contain "LLC," "LLP" or such symbols permitted by law.
> (vi) A lawyer or law firm may utilize a telephone number that contains a trade name, domain name, nickname, moniker, or motto that does not otherwise violate these Rules.-

10. The June 24, 2020 amendment deleted language in former Rule 7.5(b) that prohibited a "firm name containing the names other than those of one or more of the lawyers in the firm" except "the name or names of one or more deceased or retired members of the firm or of a predecessor firm in a continuing line of succession." Thus, had the Rule remained unchanged, the Committee would have concluded that practicing under a trade name, whether an acronym or a street name, was prohibited.

11. The clear implication of the additions to and deletions from Rule 7.5(b) is that law firm names no longer need to contain the names of lawyers practicing in the firm. However, the Rule as amended reaffirms and makes explicit the longstanding principle that law firm names must not be false, misleading, or deceptive.

12. This principle is reflected in Comment [2] to the Rule 7.5 as amended, which states,

> [2] A lawyer or law firm may not use any name that is false, deceptive, or misleading. It is not false, deceptive, or misleading for a firm to be designated by the names of all or some of its current members or by the names of retired or deceased members where there has been a continuing line of succession in the firm's identity. A lawyer or law firm may practice under a trade name or domain name if it is not false, deceptive, or misleading. A lawyer or law firm also may practice under a distinctive website address, social media username, or comparable professional designation, provided that the name is not false, deceptive, or misleading.

13. Comments [3], [4] and [5] give examples of deceptive or misleading firm names. Among other things, they interpret Rule 7.5 to prohibit a law firm name that (i) falsely implies a connection with a government agency, (ii) contains the name of a deceased or retired lawyer not in a continuing line of succession, (iii) contains the name of a lawyer holding public office, or (iv) implies that lawyers are partners when in fact they are not partners. Those Comments provide:

> [3] By way of example, the name of a law firm in private practice is deceptive or misleading if it implies a connection with (i) a government agency, (ii) a deceased or retired lawyer who was not a former member of the firm in a continuing line of succession, (iii) a lawyer not associated with the firm or a predecessor firm, (iv) a nonlawyer, or (v) a public or charitable legal services organization. A lawyer or law firm may not use a name, trade name, domain name, or other designation that includes words such as "Legal Services," "Legal Assistance," or "Legal Aid" unless the lawyer or law firm is a bona fide legal assistance organization.
> [4] It is misleading to use the name of a lawyer holding a public office in the name of a law firm, or in communications on the law firm's behalf, during any substantial period in which the lawyer is not actively and regularly practicing with the firm.
> [5] Lawyers may not imply or hold themselves out as practicing together in one firm when they are not a "firm" as defined in Rule 1.0(h), because to do so would be false and misleading. In particular, it is misleading for lawyers to hold themselves out as having a partnership with one or more other lawyers unless they are in fact partners. It is also misleading for lawyers to hold themselves out as being counsel, associates, or other affiliates of a law firm if that is not a fact, or to hold themselves out as partners, counsel, or associates if they only share offices. Likewise, law firms may not claim to be affiliated with other law firms if that is not a fact.

14. In these inquiries before us, the proposed names do not fit any of the examples of names that would be prohibited as false, deceptive, or misleading. In the first inquiry, the proposed name is merely an acronym using the abbreviated form of the name of the owner of the firm and, in the second inquiry, the proposed name is the name of a street where the law office is located.

15. The third inquiry is slightly different. In the firm of Smith & Jones, LLP, we are told that Smith will soon be retiring but Jones wants to continue practicing under the same name. In former Rule 7.5(b) (i.e., before June 24, 2020), the black letter text expressly provided that, "if otherwise lawful, a firm may use as, or continue to include in its name the name or names of one or more deceased or retired members of the firm or of a predecessor firm in a continuing line of succession." That language was deleted by the recent amendments, but only because it was unnecessary now that the amended black letter text permits trade names that are not false, deceptive, or misleading.

16. In any event, essentially the same the language appears in Comment [2], which says: "It is not false, deceptive, or misleading for a firm to be designated by . . . the names of retired or deceased members where there has been a continuing line of succession in the firm's identity." While the Comments are adopted only by the New York State Bar Association and not by the New York Courts, they are accepted as reliable guides to interpreting the Rules as long as they do not contradict the black letter text. See Preamble, ¶ 13 ("The Comments are intended as guides to interpretation, but the text of each Rule is authoritative"). Here, Comment [2] does not contradict the black letter text. Accordingly, it is not false, deceptive or misleading for the law firm of Smith & Jones, LLP, to continue practicing under the same name after Smith retires.

17. Whether a particular firm name is false, deceptive or misleading is a heavily fact-based inquiry, and the outcome will depend on a close context-based examination of the proposed name.

18. In circumstances where a contrary result might be reached, Rule 7.5(b) is not the only relevant rule. Using a firm name or domain name that is false, deceptive or misleading, or using a name that misrepresents the identity of the lawyer or lawyers practicing in the firm, might also constitute conduct involving deceit or misrepresentation in violation of Rule 8.4(c).

19. The general principles set forth in this opinion govern the ethical analysis of the myriad trade names that New York admitted attorneys may choose for their firms now that the use of trade names is no longer prohibited. The ethical propriety of each name under Rules 7.5(b) and 8.4(c) will always turn on the particular facts and circumstances.

CONCLUSION:

20. A law firm may practice in New York using a name that is not the name of any lawyer practicing in the firm – in other words, under a trade name – so long as the name under which the firm practices is not false, deceptive or misleading. A New York law firm may continue to include the name of a retired partner in its name.

OPINION 1208 (11/16/2020)

TOPIC: Solicitation and Referral of Real Estate Matters by Real Estate Broker Employed by Lawyer as Paralegal

DIGEST: A lawyer who has no financial interest in the commission generated by a real estate transaction may accept referrals for real estate closings from her paralegal who is also a real estate broker, provided such referrals will not present a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests. However, if a significant risk exists, then the lawyer may accept the referral only if the lawyer satisfies the exceptions set forth in Rule 1.7(b), including informed client consent. The lawyer must also ensure that the paralegal's conduct complies with Rule 7.3 governing attorney solicitation whenever the paralegal recommends or refers a client to the lawyer.

RULES: 1.7(a)(2); 1.7(b); 5.3(a); 5.4(c); 7.3(a)(1); 7.3(b); 8.4(a)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a transactional real estate attorney. She employs a paralegal who is also a real estate broker. The paralegal wants to refer his real estate clients to his attorney/employer to represent them in real estate closings. As a real estate broker, the paralegal will earn a percentage of the sale price only if the transaction closes. The attorney has no financial interest in the commission that the paralegal/broker will receive. Rather, the attorney will charge a legal fee to the real estate client on the same basis that she bills other real estate transaction clients. The paralegal will not assist his employer in those closings and will not provide any paralegal services relating to real estate transactions that he has referred.

QUESTIONS:

2. May a lawyer who has no financial interest in the closing of a real estate transaction accept a referral of a real estate closing from the lawyer's paralegal, who is also a real estate broker, where the paralegal will earn a brokerage commission upon the closing of the transaction but will not provide any legal services relative to that transaction?

3. Would the paralegal's referral or recommendation of real estate clients to the lawyer constitute improper solicitation?

OPINION:

Independent professional judgment: Rules 1.7 and 5.4

4. Rule 1.7(a)(2) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") provides that a lawyer may not represent a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that "there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests."

5. In N.Y. State 1043 (2015), we noted that "we have long and consistently stated that a lawyer may not act as a lawyer and a broker in the same real estate transaction, with or without client consent, and whether or not the lawyer charges for legal services." In N.Y. State 916 (2012), we explained that where a lawyer acts as both broker and a lawyer in the transaction, "the broker's personal and financial interest in closing the transaction interferes with the lawyer's ability to render independent legal advice with respect to the transaction consistent with the principles now embodied in Rule of Professional Conduct 1.7(a) . . . ." See also N.Y. 919 (2012) (quoting from N.Y. State 753 (2002) and stating, "The rationale for these opinions is that a lawyer should not have a personal stake in the advice rendered, and a broker who is paid only if the transaction closes cannot be fully independent in advising the client as a lawyer.").

6. In these prior opinions, the ethical concerns primarily derived from "the separate and independent financial interest of the lawyer/broker arising from compensation for the non-legal service." N.Y. State 1043. "This rationale applies as long as the lawyer has a financial interest in the real estate broker's commission whether or not the lawyer is acting as a broker." Id. Here, however, the inquirer has no financial interest in the broker's commission, and thus does not trigger the per se non-waivable conflict that was present in N.Y. State 916 and N.Y. State 1043. If the inquirer had a financial interest in the commission, then representing the client in the closing would be impermissible.

7. Given that the inquirer lacks any financial interest in the broker's commission, the question is whether referrals of these real estate matters by the inquirer's paralegal are so significant to the inquirer's practice financially, or to the inquirer's relationship with the paralegal personally, that these financial or personal considerations would create a conflict of interest under Rule 1.7(a)(2). In other words, are the lawyer's financial and personal interests likely to adversely affect the inquirer's professional judgment regarding each transaction? In terms of Rule 1.7(a)(2), would the inquirer be seriously tempted to close a transaction referred by the paralegal in order to keep the paralegal incentivized to keep the referrals flowing, even if it would be in the client's interest not to close the transaction? In N.Y. State 919 (2012), we explained that even where a lawyer himself will not materially benefit from the consummation of a real estate transaction, "the totality of the lawyer's personal interests might still pose a 'significant risk' that his judgment in representing the client at the closing will be "adversely affected" within the meaning of Rule 1.7(a)(2)."

8. Here, a disabling personal financial conflict of interest is likely to arise if the paralegal refers enough matters to the inquirer that those referrals, in the aggregate, constitute a significant portion of the fees earned in the inquirer's practice as a whole. See N.Y. State 919 (2012) (lawyer's receipt of multiple referrals from a brokerage office where lawyer was employed part time "magnified risks" of a personal interest conflict); see also N.Y. City 2014-1 (2014) (expressing concern that the proposed referral arrangement could create the risk of "divided loyalties" if the lawyer was "dependent" on the referring third-party for "case referrals and legal fees."). Thus, we cannot assess the level of risk that the referral arrangement here poses to the lawyer's exercise of independent professional judgment. We do not know whether those referrals are material to the inquirer's total fee income, and we do not know whether the inquirer's personal and professional relationship with the referring paralegal might increase the risk that the lawyer's independent professional judgment on behalf of the referred real estate clients would be compromised. For example, are the referrals from the paralegal a major source of profit for the inquirer? Is the paralegal a trusted and valuable key employee with respect to paralegal services unrelated to their referral relationship?

9. Unlike the per se non-waivable personal interest conflict that occurs whenever a lawyer has a financial interest in the consummation of a real estate transaction, however, personal interest conflicts are fact-specific and require us to assess all of the circumstances. In each case the lawyer must evaluate whether a reasonable lawyer would conclude that his or her other business or personal interests will pose a "significant risk" of adversely affecting the lawyer's judgment in the matter on behalf of a client. Absent such a significant risk, the lawyer has no personal interest conflict, Rule 1.7(a)(2) does not apply, and the inquirer may accept the representation without the client's consent. See N.Y. State 919 (2012). Conversely, if such a significant risk does exist and Rule 1.7(a)(2) does apply, then the inquirer cannot accept the referred matter unless the conflict is consentable and the inquirer obtains the client's informed consent, confirmed in writing, per Rule 1.7(b).

10. Specifically, Rule 1.7(b) permits a lawyer who has a personal interest conflict under Rule 1.7(a) to represent a client when: "(1) the lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client" and "(4) each affected client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing." If these requirements can be satisfied, the lawyer can accept the representation.

11. Even if the inquirer complies with Rule 1.7 and accepts the referral, the inquirer should also be mindful of the obligation to maintain professional independence. The inquirer must not allow the referring paralegal to direct or regulate any advice rendered to the referred real estate client. See Rule 5.4(c) ("unless authorized by law, a lawyer shall not permit a person who recommends, employs or pays the lawyer to render legal service for another to direct or regulate the lawyer's professional judgment in rendering such legal services").

Restrictions on solicitation by the paralegal: Rules 5.3, 7.3, and 8.4

12. This inquiry also raises a significant question of improper solicitation. Rule 7.3 regulates solicitation and recommendations of professional employment. Rule 7.3(a)(1) explicitly prohibits in-person or telephone contact or real time or computer accessed communication unless the recipient is "a close friend, relative, former client or existing client." Rule 7.3(b) defines "solicitation," in part, as "any advertisement initiated by or on behalf of the lawyer or law firm that is directed to, or targeted at, a specific recipient or group of recipients, the primary purpose of which is the retention of the lawyer or law firm, and a significant motive of which is pecuniary gain." (Emphasis added.)

13. Rule 7.3(b) distinguishes between communications initiated by the lawyer and those initiated by a potential client. See N.Y. State 1049 ¶ (2015) ("A response invited by the potential client does not constitute 'solicitation'"); N.Y. State 1150 ¶ 7 (2018) ("The definition of 'solicitation' in Rule 7.3(b) makes an important distinction between communications initiated by the lawyer and those initiated by a potential client"). Thus, if real estate clients merely ask the paralegal/broker to recommend a lawyer to represent them in real estate transactions, and the paralegal responds by referring them to the inquirer, that practice would not run afoul of Rule 7.3(b). Conversely, if the paralegal on his own initiates "unprompted" recommendations of the inquirer to handle the real estate transactions, it would violate Rule 7.3(b).

14. Moreover, Rule 8.4(a) provides that a lawyer must not "knowingly assist or induce another" to "violate or attempt to violate the Rules of Professional Conduct," and a lawyer must not "do so through the acts of another." In other words, if the Rules prohibit a lawyer from doing something directly, then the lawyer cannot do it indirectly through someone acting on the lawyer's behalf or because of the lawyer's direction or inducement.Thus, if the inquirer assists, directs, or induces the paralegal to solicit real estate clients for the inquirer in a manner that violates Rule 7.3(a)(1), then the lawyer would be violating Rule 8.4(a). See N. Y. State 1150 (2018) (where lawyer's spouse who was also a real estate broker wanted to refer her real estate clients to her husband (the inquiring lawyer), "any outreach by the broker/spouse initiated by or on behalf of the lawyer/spouse, the broker/spouse recommending the inquirer as a lawyer in a real estate transaction stands in the shoes of the inquirer as if the inquirer were personally making the outreach.").

15. Finally, the inquirer has a duty under Rule 5.3(a) "to ensure that the work of non-lawyers who work for the firm is adequately supervised, as appropriate." If the paralegal engages in solicitation that would violate Rule 7.3 if done by a lawyer, then under certain circumstances Rule 5.3(b) may hold the inquirer responsible for the paralegal's conduct.

CONCLUSION:

16. A lawyer who has no financial interest in the commission generated by a real estate transaction may accept referrals for real estate closings from her paralegal who is also a real estate broker, provided such referrals will not present a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests. However, if a significant risk exists, then the lawyer may accept the referral only if the lawyer satisfies the exceptions set forth in Rule 1.7(b), including informed client consent. The lawyer must also ensure that the paralegal's conduct complies with Rule 7.3 governing attorney solicitation whenever the paralegal recommends or refers a client to the lawyer.

OPINION 1209 (12/01/2020)

TOPIC: Retention of former appellate judge with respect to easement on which judge previously ruled.

DIGEST: A former appellate judge, who was on a panel which issued a dispositive order about the scope of an easement, is personally disqualified from representing the owner of the servient estate of the same easement with respect to legal questions involving obstructions to the easement, equitable relief, adverse possession, and "overburdening" of the easement. However, the firm to which the former appellate judge is counsel may, pursuant to Rule 1.12(d), undertake the representation upon appropriate screening and notification.

RULES: 1.11(e), 1.12(a), 1.12(d)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a New York lawyer who formerly served as a New York State appellate judge. Ten years ago, inquiring counsel was on a panel which issued a dispositive order confirming the validity and scope of an easement. Inquiring counsel, having retired from the bench, is now "of counsel" to a firm. That firm has been approached by the owner of the servient estate of the same easement with respect to questions involving the potential legal effect of obstructions to the easement, the possible availability of equitable relief to the owner of the dominant estate, the applicability of adverse possession, and whether subdivision of the dominant estate would result in an "overburdening" of the easement.

QUESTION:

2. Does inquiring counsel's service as a judge in the appellate case preclude inquiring counsel or inquiring counsel's firm from undertaking this new representation?

OPINION:

Is the former judge personally disqualified?

3. Rule 1.12(a) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct ("Rules") provides: "A lawyer shall not accept private employment in a matter upon the merits of which the lawyer has acted in a judicial capacity."

4. "A conflict under Rule 1.12(a) is a non-waivable conflict" (N.Y. State 1064, ¶ 4 (2015)), and should be read in conjunction with both the New York Code of Judicial Conduct (22 NYCRR Part 100) and Judiciary Law § 17. See, Roy D. Simon, Jr., Simon's New York Rules of Professional Conduct Annotated (May 2019 Update) §1.12:2.

5. In N.Y. State 1064 (2015), cited by the Appellate Division in People v. Burks, 172 A.D.3d 1640, 1642 (3d Dep't), lv. to app. den'd, 33 N.Y.3d 1102 (2019), this Committee opined that Rule 1.12(a) prohibited a former family court judge from privately representing a parent in a permanent neglect proceeding because the same parent had appeared before the judge in a previous neglect proceeding, and the judge had issued an order "upon the merits" to put the subject child in foster care. This Committee further opined that Rule 1.12(a) also prohibited the former judge from representing the parent in a proceeding to modify child support when the inquirer, as a judge, had issued orders upon the merits related to custody and visitation in the same matter, and custody and visitation issues would be revisited as part of the application to amend child support.

6. In analyzing a former judge's obligations under Rule 1.12(a), Opinion 1064 identified three terms used in the Rule which this Committee was required to define: "judicial capacity," "matter," and "merits."

7. For purposes of the instant inquiry, there is no need to revisit the questions of "judicial capacity" or "merits," since the inquirer was plainly acting in a "judicial capacity" and ruling on the "merits" when he served on the appellate panel. The sole issue before us is whether the advice which the owner of the servient estate now seeks from inquiring counsel or from inquiring counsel's firm is with respect to the same "matter" that was before inquiring counsel as a jurist.

8. Relying heavily upon Comment [10] to Rule 1.11, this Committee in Opinion 1064 adopted a "facts, parties, and time" test. Comment [10] to Rule 1.11 provides:

> In determining whether two particular matters are the same, the lawyer should consider the extent to which (i) the matters involve the same basic facts, (ii) the matters involve the same or related parties, and (iii) time has elapsed between the matters.

9. Addressing the first test factor – whether the matters "involve the same basic facts" – in the appellate case which came before inquiring counsel, it is apparent that the trial court and then the appellate court were required to determine the intent of the original parties to the easement with respect to the use to be made of the easement. It would appear that this same intent would be relevant in determining whether a subdivision of the dominant property would "overburden" the easement. As explained in John W. Bruce and James D. Ely, Jr., The Law of Easements & Licenses & Land, §8:13 (June 2020 Update) (footnotes omitted): "The scope of an easement may be expanded beyond the terms of the grant or the original usage, but the dominant owner may not unreasonably increase the burden on the servient estate. . . . Since these rights are relative, courts must strive to protect the interests of both parties. . . . What constitutes an undue burden depends on the facts of particular situations, and general conclusions are difficult to draw." As this same analysis could be applied to a consideration of the impact of obstructions, or even the applicability of adverse possession, the earlier litigation, and the present consultation, may be said to involve the same basic facts.

10. Turning to the second test factor – "same or related parties" – the owners of the respective dominant and servient estates are the same as, or in privity with, or successors to, the parties to the earlier litigation. For purposes of the current consultation, those same parties stand in the shoes of their predecessors, asserting the same bundle of legal rights.

11. Turning to the third and final test factor – the time elapsed – a decade has passed since the appellate case on which inquiring counsel sat as a judge. However, the earlier litigation turned upon the construction of the specific written and recorded easement agreement, which remains unchanged. Therefore, the passage of time has little mitigating impact on the relatedness of the matters.

12. Accordingly, it is our opinion that the appellate case and the current consultation involve the same "matter" for purposes of Rule 1.12(a)(1).

Is the former judge's law firm disqualified?

13. We have also been asked whether the firm with which inquiring counsel is associated may take on the representation of the servient estate owner.

14. Under Rule 1.12(d), screening will avoid imputation of a former judge's conflict as long as the prerequisites of that section are followed. Rule 1.12(d) provides:

> (d) When a lawyer is disqualified from representation under this Rule, no lawyer in a firm with which that lawyer is associated may knowingly undertake or continue representation in such a matter unless:
> (1) the firm acts promptly and reasonably to:
> (i) notify, as appropriate, lawyers and nonlawyer personnel within the firm that the personally disqualified lawyer is prohibited from participating in the representation of the current client;
> (ii) implement effective screening procedures to prevent the flow of information about the matter between the personally disqualified lawyer and the others in the firm;
> (iii) ensure that the disqualified lawyer is apportioned no part of the fee therefrom; and
> (iv) give written notice to the parties and any appropriate tribunal to enable it to ascertain compliance with the provisions of this Rule; and
> (2) There are no other circumstances in the particular representation that create an appearance of impropriety.

15. If the inquirer's law firm complies with Rule 1.12(d) by promptly and properly screening off the inquirer and by providing the specified notifications, and if no other circumstances in the particular representation create an appearance of impropriety, then Rule 1.12 will not prohibit the firm from accepting the representation despite the inquirer's personal disqualification.

CONCLUSION:

16. A former appellate judge who was part of a panel which issued a dispositive order in a case involving the scope and extent of an easement is personally disqualified under Rule 1.12(a) from representing the owner of the servient estate of the same easement with respect to questions involving that easement. However, pursuant to Rule 1.12(d), the firm to which the former appellate judge is counsel may undertake the representation upon appropriate screening and notification.

OPINION 1210 (12/02/2020)

TOPIC: Conflicts of interest; definition of law firm; public defender; part-time justice

DIGEST: A county attorney's office represents and advises the county public defender's office on grant funding and other financial and administrative matters. However, the county attorney's office has no access to information concerning the public defender's clients, the two offices do not share common office space or file systems, and the lawyers in the county attorney's office do not supervise or control the legal services provided by the public defender's office. Although the county attorney's office and the public defender's office are not, on these facts, considered a single law firm, an attorney in the public defender's office may nonetheless have a personal conflict of interest in representing clients in criminal cases before a part-time town justice who is also a full-time assistant county attorney. The conflict may arise if lawyers in the county public defender's office have an institutional incentive to curry favor with the part-time justice.

RULES: 1.0(h), 1.7(a)(2), 1.7(b), 1.10(a) & (d), 8.4(f)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is an attorney in a county public defender's office. The public defender's office is represented and advised by the county attorney's office, which represents and advises all county departments, principally with respect to administrative and financial matters such as office leases and applications for grants to fund the public defender's office. The county attorney's office is not involved in the handling of individual public defender cases, does not share office space with the public defender's office, and does not have access to public defender case files or its case management system.

2. A full-time assistant county attorney was recently elected to serve as a part-time town justice but will continue to serve as an assistant county attorney. As a part-time town justice, the full-time assistant county attorney will preside over criminal cases in which assistant public defenders can be expected to appear.

QUESTION:

3. Is an attorney in the public defender's office ethically permitted to represent clients in front of a town justice who also works as an assistant county attorney in the county attorney's office—an office that represents and advises the public defender principally on financial and administrative matters?

OPINION:

4. Three potential conflicts of interest are presented by this inquiry. First, are the county attorney's office and the public defender's office considered to be a single "law firm" for the purpose of Rule 8.4(f) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"), which prohibits a lawyer from causing a judge to violate the judge's ethical obligations under the Rules of Judicial Conduct? Second, as an assistant public defender, does the inquirer have a personal conflict of interest under Rule 1.7(a)(2) arising from an incentive to please or at least avoid antagonizing the county attorney's office? Third, if the inquirer has such a conflict, is that conflict imputed to all attorneys in the public defender's office?

Are the County Attorney's Office and the Public Defender's Office the Same "Law Firm" for Purposes of Rule 8.4(f)?

5. Section 100.6(B)(3) of the Rules of Judicial Conduct prohibits the partners and associates of a part-time judge from practicing law in the court in which the part-time judge presides. Rule 8.4(f) of the Rules of Professional Conduct prohibits a lawyer from causing a judge to violate ethical obligations under the Rules of Judicial Conduct. Accordingly, attorneys in the town justice's law firm—the county attorney's office—may not appear in front of the town justice. See N.Y. State 1115 (2017) (attorney in the public defender's office may not represent a client in the same court where another attorney in the public defender's office serves as a part-time judge). Here, if the public defender's office and the county attorney's office are a single law firm under the Rules, then Rule 8.4(f) would apply to the lawyers in the public defender's office and the inquirer would not be permitted to appear before the part-time town justice.

6. Determining whether a group of lawyers is a single firm "is a fact-intensive inquiry." N.Y. State 1186 (2020); N.Y. State 1105 (2016). Rule 1.0(h), in the "Terminology" section of the Rules, provides that a "firm" or "law firm" "includes, but is not limited to, a lawyer or lawyers in a law partnership, professional corporation, sole proprietorship or other association authorized to practice law; or lawyers engaged in a qualified legal assistance organization, a government law office, or the legal department of a corporation or other organization."

7. With respect to legal organizations that consist of more than one component or section, Comment [4] to Rule 1.0 recognizes that, depending on organizational structure, the entire organization may constitute one single firm or each component may constitute a separate firm. Comment [2] to Rule 1.0 identifies two factors to be considered: (1) whether the group presents itself to the public in a way that suggests it is a single firm; and (2) whether the lawyers in the group have mutual access to information concerning the clients they serve. Our opinions focus on similar factors and place particular emphasis on access to client information. Thus, in N.Y. State 794 (2006), we concluded that the various divisions of a law school clinic constituted a single firm for purposes of the conflict rules where the clinic shared common office and file space, notwithstanding that each division maintained computer databases that were inaccessible to other divisions,.

8. Our opinions also look to a third factor: the independence of the lawyers. Thus, in N.Y. State 914 (2012), we concluded that the members of a panel of lawyers established to provide legal assistance to clients who had conflicts with the local Legal Aid Society did not comprise a single firm. We focused in Opinion 914 on the independence of the members of the panel, noting that: "Neither the Society nor its lawyers may exercise any supervision or control over the legal services provided by Conflicts Panel Lawyers."

9. Here, consistent with these guiding principles, we conclude that the county attorney's office and the public defender are not a single firm. We base this conclusion on several factors – (a) the county attorney's office has no access to information concerning the public defender's clients, (b) the two offices do not share a common office or file space, and (c) the lawyers in the county attorney's office do not exercise any supervision or control over the legal services provided by the lawyers in the public defender's office.

Does the Inquirer Have a Personal Conflict of Interest Under Rule 1.7(a)(2)?

10. Rule 1.7(a)(2) provides:

> (a) Except as provided in paragraph (b), a lawyer shall not represent a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that. . .
> > (2) there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests.

11. Whether a reasonable lawyer would conclude that such a "significant risk" exists here depends on the "personal interests" that flow from the advisory and representational relationship between the county attorney's office and the public defender's office. (We have no jurisdiction to address whether those same interests might obligate the part-time town justice to recuse himself when lawyers from the public defender's office appear in front of him. See Judiciary Law § 14 (forbidding judges from sitting in matters in which they are interested)).

12. Because the county attorney's office advises and represents the public defender's office to secure funding for its operations and with respect to other financial and administrative matters, the inquirer might have an incentive to curry favor with a full-time assistant county attorney. If strong enough, this incentive might create a significant risk that the inquirer's independent professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected.

13. Various factors might magnify the risk of an adverse effect on the independent professional judgment of the inquirer. Does the part-time town justice supervise, or is he personally and substantially involved in the legal services provided by the county attorney's office to the public defender's office? Have the inquirer and the part-time town justice worked together on public defender grant applications or on other significant fiscal matters such as the public defender budget? Are they likely to continue or renew that collaboration? Were their interactions positive and productive, or were they hostile and acrimonious? Have the part-time justice and the inquirer become social friends or professional antagonists? Does the part-time justice have a reputation for vindictive or retaliatory behavior?

14. The inquirer will need to consider these and other relevant factors to determine whether a reasonable lawyer would conclude that the incentive to please or at least not antagonize the part-time town justice is strong enough to create "a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected." Rule 1.7(a)(2).

15. If the inquirer determines that a reasonable lawyer would conclude that there is a significant risk that the inquirer's judgment might be affected by a desire to please or at least not antagonize the part-time town justice, then under Rule 1.7(b)(1) the inquirer must determine if, notwithstanding that risk, the inquirer reasonably believes he can provide competent and diligent representation despite the conflict. If so, then the conflict is consentable, and the inquirer may proceed if he obtains the client's informed consent, confirmed in writing pursuant to Rule 1.7(b)(4). See N.Y. State 968 ¶¶ 21-27 (2013) (describing process for analyzing whether a government lawyer's conflict is consentable).

Is The Inquirer's Conflict Imputed to All Attorneys in the Public Defender's Office?

16. If the inquirer has a personal interest conflict under Rule 1.7(a)(2), then Rule 1.10(a) will impute that conflict to all other lawyers in the law firm (the public defender's office) with which the inquirer is "associated." Thus, Rule 1.7(b) will require all other assistant public defenders to determine consentability and obtain informed consent from their clients whenever they appear before the part-time justice.

17. But even if the inquirer's conflict is non-consentable, that does not automatically make the imputed conflicts non-consentable, because Rule 1.10(d) permits consent to an imputed conflict. See N.Y. State 968 ¶ 25 (2013) ("We do not believe that this condition of nonconsentability extends to all lawyers in the agency").

CONCLUSION:

18. On the facts and circumstances presented by this inquiry, the county attorney's office and the county public defender's office are not a single law firm. Whether Rule 1.7(a)(2) prohibits a lawyer in the public defender's office from representing a client before the part-time town justice depends on whether, in light of the relationship between the two individuals and their respective offices, there is a significant risk that the independent professional judgment of the lawyer in the public defender's office on behalf of a client will be adversely affected. Rule 1.7(b) explains how and when such a personal conflict can be waived, if it exists. If a conflict exists under Rule 1.7(a), then it is imputed to all other lawyers in the public defender's office.

TOPIC: Fees vs. disbursements, charges of contract lawyer or co-counsel

DIGEST: If a lawyer is handling a personal injury matter for a client who dies during the case, the attorney-client relationship automatically terminates, but the lawyer may enter into a new attorney-client relationship with the former client's putative personal representative. The new retainer agreement may provide that the lawyer will retain a probate lawyer in a different firm to file a probate matter and to obtain the appointment of the personal representative to carry on the personal injury case in place of the deceased client. The retainer agreement with the personal representative may also provide that the original lawyer will charge the probate lawyer's legal fees and expenses as a disbursement in the personal injury action.

RULES: 1.1, 1.5(b), 1.5(c), 1.5(g)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a personal injury lawyer. On occasion, a client dies in the course of a lawsuit. Because the inquirer does not have the relevant expertise in probate matters, the inquirer will typically engage a lawyer in another law firm to open a probate matter and seek appointment of a personal representative for the estate of the deceased client. The inquirer then moves in the personal injury action to substitute that personal representative as plaintiff under CPLR § 1015(a). The inquirer advises that in most cases, but for the personal injury litigation, no probate proceeding would need to be filed and no personal representative would need to be appointed, as the estate has no other assets requiring probate.

QUESTIONS:

2. Can the legal fees and expenses charged by the probate counsel and paid by inquirer be classified as a "disbursement" and recouped prior to disbursing any recovery obtained by way of settlement or judgment in the personal injury action?

3. Must the treatment of the probate lawyer's fees and expenses as disbursements in the personal injury action be addressed in an engagement letter or retainer agreement with the decedent's personal representative?

OPINION:

4. At the outset, we note that the death of the client terminates the attorney-client relationship. See, e.g., Pace v. Raisman & Assoc., Esqs., LLP, 945 N.Y.S.2d 118, 121 (App. Div. 2d Dept. 2012); Davis v. Cohen & Gresser LLP, 51 Misc. 3d 1203(A) (Sup. Ct. N.Y. Co. 2016). As a consequence, "[t]he lawyer . . . may not take any further steps in connection with the matter unless and until she is authorized to do so by the deceased's duly qualified personal representative." ABA 95-397. As explained by the Restatement of the Law Governing Lawyers, "A client's death terminates a lawyer's actual authority. . . . The rights of a deceased client pass to other persons—executors, for example, who can, if they wish, revive the representation." Restatement (Third) of the Law Governing Lawyers § 31 cmt. e (2000).

5. Accordingly, in order to proceed with the personal injury action, the inquirer will need to enter into a new attorney-client relationship with the decedent's putative personal representative authorizing the substitution of parties and the continuation of the case. We therefore focus on that second retainer agreement, not the initial retainer agreement with the deceased client, in addressing whether the N.Y. Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") permit the fees and expenses of probate counsel, which the inquirer will be paying and which are necessary to secure the proper appointment of the personal representative, to be treated as a disbursement in the personal injury action.

6. Whether the deceased former client would have had the power, in the initial personal injury retainer agreement, to bind a future personal representative to continue to use inquirer as counsel for the estate, to require the estate to pay for separate probate counsel, or to specify the terms for engaging probate counsel, are questions of law, not ethics, and therefore are beyond our jurisdiction.

Charging the Fees and Expenses of Probate Counsel as a Disbursement in the Personal Injury Action

7. The Rules do not specify how a lawyer should charge for legal services provided by a lawyer associated with a different firm when those services are necessary to serving the client. Should those legal fees be paid out of the lawyer's legal fee (here, out of the inquirer's pocket), or may the lawyer charge them to the client as a disbursement (i.e., out of the client's pocket)? This question is a matter of contract between the lawyer and the client, and in particular depends on the scope of the work that the lawyer has undertaken to perform for the client. See generally ABA 00-420 ("Whether the cost attributable to a contract lawyer is billed as an expense or included in legal services fees is not addressed by the Model Rules and does not seem to be a matter of ethics.").

8. The inquirer and the decedent's personal representative thus have discretion to structure the scope of inquirer's re-engagement in the personal injury action so that the inquirer is not responsible for prosecuting any probate matter necessary to appoint a personal representative. Subject to two caveats, the inquirer and the personal representative may instead permit the inquirer to pay for and charge back the legal fees and expenses arising from the engagement of separate probate counsel as a disbursement in the personal injury action.

9. First, the ancillary legal fees and expenses of the probate lawyer must be reasonably incurred to achieve the objectives of the personal injury litigation. See N.Y. State 769 (2003) (approving a separate charge for representation in obtaining litigation financing where the personal injury contingent fee agreement "did not anticipate or include [a] proposed transaction with [a litigation] financing company"); N.Y. County 739 (2008) ("A common practice in personal injury matters when the client's case requires ancillary legal services related to other specialized fields of law, such as bankruptcy, the calculation of Medicare Set Aside accounts, and disability planning (e.g., special needs trusts), is to charge for said services as a disbursement against the entire proceeds of the settlement"). If the probate proceeding is uncontested, if the only significant estate asset is the personal injury claim, and if the probate application seeks only limited letters to continue the personal injury action, then the legal fees and expenses associated with that proceeding are certainly ancillary to the personal injury action. However, to the extent that the probate proceeding will involve other matters unrelated to the continuation of the personal injury action – for example, a will contest, disputes between heirs, the management or liquidation of estate assets, or the resolution of creditor claims (none of which appear to be present here) – those matters would not be ancillary to the continuation of the personal injury action and the legal fees and expenses so incurred would not be properly chargeable as a disbursement in the personal injury action.

10. Second, charging the legal fees and expenses of the probate lawyer as a disbursement must not violate the prohibition of Rule 1.5 against charging an "excessive" fee or expense, and must also be in compliance with the rules of the Appellate Division that prohibit fees in personal injury actions in excess of stipulated percentages of the recovery. 22 N.Y.C.R.R. §§ 603.25(e) (1st Dep't), 691.20(e) (2nd Dep't), 806.27(a) (3rd Dep't), 1015.15(a) (4th Dep't).

The Engagement Letter (Retainer Agreement).

11. Rule 1.5(b) requires that the lawyer communicate to the client "the scope of the representation and the basis or rate of the fee or expenses for which the client will be responsible" and that the information be communicated in writing where required by statute or court rule. Further, with respect to contingency fee cases, Rule 1.5(c) requires that a lawyer provide to the client a writing stating:

> the method by which the fee is to be determined, including the percentage or percentages that shall accrue to the lawyer in the event of a settlement, trial or appeal; litigation or other expenses to be deducted from the recovery; and whether such expenses are to be deducted before or, if not prohibited by statute or court rule, after the contingent fee is calculated. The writing must clearly notify the client of any expenses for which the client will be liable regardless of whether the client is the prevailing party.

(Emphasis added.)

12. Whether a retainer agreement in a personal injury contingency fee matter meets the requirement to "clearly notify the client" that it may be necessary to incur fees and expenses of additional specialized counsel may depend, for example, on the entire text of the retainer agreement, the customary practices in the legal profession with respect to the particular legal services being out-sourced, and the sophistication of the client. In this regard, N.Y. County 739 (2008) is instructive. That opinion involved the retention of specialized counsel to resolve Medicare, Medicaid and private healthcare liens that were asserted against a personal injury settlement. The question was whether the lawyer could charge lien resolution services as a disbursement. The New York County Lawyers ethics committee observed: "Historically, the resolution of liens on recoveries was considered a routine part of case management." Given that historical context, Opinion 739 concluded that the inquiring lawyer was required to provide lien resolution services "at no extra charge" (i.e., "included in the contingency fee") unless the retainer agreement, among other things, "provides that the attorney may engage an outside law firm for lien resolution and that the fee for said service will be charged as a disbursement."

13. We take no position on whether the retention of probate counsel made necessary by the death of a personal injury client is, as a historical matter, "a routine part of case management" (as with lien resolution in N.Y. County 739), such that personal injury lawyers would customarily file the required probate proceeding to secure appointment of a personal representative of the estate without charging any fee beyond the contingent fee. The disposition of that issue is simply not controlling here, where the inquirer must enter into a separate new retainer agreement with the decedent's personal representative in order to continue the personal injury representation after securing the appointment of a duly qualified personal representative to substitute as party-plaintiff. However, in accordance with N.Y. County 739 and Rule 1.5(b), we conclude that the fees and expenses of probate counsel may only be charged as a disbursement in the personal injury action if that second, new retainer agreement between the inquirer and the putative personal representative – in addition to authorizing inquirer to retain separate probate counsel and to continue the prosecution of the personal injury action in the name of the personal representative – clearly so provides.

CONCLUSION:

14. A lawyer handling a contingent fee personal injury matter may charge as a disbursement in the personal injury action the fees and expenses of a lawyer separately retained, after the death of the personal injury client, to file a probate proceeding on behalf of the putative personal representative of the deceased former client's estate in order to obtain appointment of the personal representative and authorization to continue the personal injury action, where doing so is not part of the legal services that the personal injury lawyer agrees to provide but is a necessary element of that representation. The personal injury lawyer's retainer agreement or engagement letter with the putative personal representative should clearly notify the client that such legal fees and expenses will be charged as a disbursement in the personal injury action.

OPINION 1212 (01/04/2021)

TOPIC: Public Defender's Obligation as to Closed Files and Transfer of Files upon De-Funding of Program

DIGEST: Absent the client's informed consent, a public defender may not deliver open or closed client files to the assigned counsel program. Rather, the public defender's office must facilitate the transfer of open client matters to the client or successor counsel appointed by the assigned counsel program and must maintain the files until this transfer can be accomplished. Closed client files from a defunded program must be maintained in the manner required of dissolving law firms.

RULES: 1.0(h), 1.0(p), 1.15(c)(4), 1.16(e), 7.2(b)(1)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is an attorney with a not-for-profit public defender's office representing defendants in criminal matters as part of a county's assigned counsel program. The county has defunded the public defender's office and is moving to an alternate program to satisfy its obligation to provide counsel in accordance with New York County Law Article 18-B. Once the public defender's office has effectively withdrawn from representing its current clients, the county has requested that the public defender's office turn over open and closed client files to the assigned counsel program, which is administered by an employee of the county attorney's office. The closed files, which span more than 30 years, have all been converted for storage into electronic format.

QUESTIONS:

2. May a defunded public defender's office turn its open client files over to the county's assigned counsel program?

3. May a defunded public defender's office turn its closed client files over to the county's assigned counsel program?

OPINION:

4. County Law Article 18-B requires counties to provide criminal defense representation to qualified indigent persons. A county may fulfill its obligations under Article 18-B by appointing a public defender, by furnishing counsel through a private legal aid bureau or society designated by the county, or through a bar association plan in which the services of private counsel are rotated and coordinated by an administrator. See County Law § 722.

5. The inquiring attorney here is employed by a public defender's office, established under the authority of County Law Article 18-A, which had been funded by the county to provide the mandated representation. A public defender's office is a qualified legal services organization and, therefore, constitutes a law firm under the New York Rules of Professional Conduct ("Rules"). See Rule 1.0(h) and (p); Rule 7.2(b)(1). The assigned counsel program, however, is not a law firm, but rather is defined as an "Entity that sets forth protocols and policies for assigning attorneys to public defense clients and ensure that those attorneys provide quality representation." See N.Y.S. Office of Indigent Legal Services Standards for Establishing and Administering Assigned Counsel Programs – Black Letter Standards with Commentary (July 1, 2019) ("ILS Standards"), §1.4.c (published at https://ils.ny.gov/files/ACP/ACP%20Standards%20with%20Commentary%70119.pdf)

Transfer of Open Client Files

6. Lawyers in the public defender's office who are withdrawing from representing a current client (meaning a client with an "open" file) must comply with Rule 1.16(e) which requires them to "take steps, to the extent reasonably practicable, to avoid foreseeable prejudice to the rights of the client, including giving reasonable notice to the client, allowing time for employment of other counsel, [and] delivering to the client all papers and property to which the client is entitled . . ."

7. In addition, the lawyers in the public defender's office have a responsibility under Rule 1.6 and Rule 1.9(c) to maintain the client's confidential information. As noted in Comment [2] to Rule 1.6, "A fundamental principle in the client-lawyer relationship is that, in the absence of the client's informed consent, or except as permitted or required by these Rules, the lawyer must not knowingly reveal information gained during and related to the representation, whatever its source." Rule 1.9(c) generally applies the duty of confidentiality to former clients. Accordingly, the public defender's office may deliver files maintained in connection with an ongoing representation to the clients themselves, or to lawyers who have been appointed pursuant to Article 18-B as successor counsel in particular criminal cases. However, the public defender's office may not deliver such client files to the assigned counsel program, which is neither a lawyer nor a law firm and which does not represent any of the public defender's clients, absent the informed consent of the clients concerned. If delivery of the file to the client is not possible, and if the client's informed consent to delivery of a client file to the assigned counsel program cannot be obtained, then the lawyers in the public defender's office must take steps to preserve the client's file until successor counsel is appointed.

8. We are mindful that administrative transfer of open client files to successor counsel may place a significant burden on an unfunded not-for-profit entity such as the public defender's office. But as Comment [8A] to Rule 1.16 aptly notes, ". . . lawyers are ordinarily better suited than clients to foresee and provide for the burdens of representation." Although responsibility for the cost of preserving the client files during the orderly transition of representation is an issue of law beyond the jurisdiction of the committee, the inquirer may wish to explore whether this expense may qualify as an obligation of the county under Articles 18-A or 18-B of the County Law.

Transfer of Closed Files

9. Under the Rules, a lawyer has no ethical obligation to maintain the entire contents of closed client files indefinitely, but a lawyer may have an ethical obligation to maintain certain documents indefinitely, such as when the lawyer knows or has reason to know the client may need the documents in the future. See N.Y. State 1192 ¶ 12 (2020). Although a client's right to some or all of what is broadly termed the "client file" is a question of law beyond our jurisdiction, we note that a lawyer may have the right to withhold some parts of a client file. See Sage Realty v. Proskauer Rose, 91 N.Y.2d 30 (1997) (holding that clients are generally entitled to all documents relating to representation, but a law firm is not required to disclose documents that might violate a duty of nondisclosure owed to third party, a duty imposed by law, or firm documents intended only for internal law office use). We also note that Rule 1.15(c)(4), obligates a lawyer to promptly deliver to the client the property of the client (including papers in the client file) that the client is "entitled to receive."

10. In this instance, the lawyers in the public defender's office have not culled through their closed files and undertaken the sometimes complicated case-by-case and page-by-page analysis that may be necessary to identify (i) the portions of each file to which the client is "entitled," including important papers the client may need in the future, and (ii) the portions of the file the lawyer may withhold from the client. The public defender's office has instead taken the reasonable step of converting all the documents in its closed files to an electronic format, a format that is acceptable, if not preferable in this day and age, as long as the evidentiary value of the documents that may be needed for an appeal or other proceeding is not unduly impaired by this method of storage. See N.Y. State 940 (2012) (opining that lawyer satisfies document retention requirements with electronic copies and may destroy original documents, with exceptions, including exception where copies may not be introduced into evidence or otherwise used in place of the originals if the need should arise); see also, N.Y. State 623 (1991) (requiring lawyers to maintain documents of a former client that establish substantial personal or property rights "according to law and/or the reasonably foreseeable needs of the client" unless the former client takes possession of such documents or authorizes their destruction).

11. Whether the files are maintained as paper copies or stored in electronic format, attorneys in the public defender's office have the same obligation as members of a law firm to maintain the closed files of former clients. In N.Y. State 1192 (2020), we noted:

> The professional obligation to maintain closed files or to arrange for their disposition is not limited to those members of the firm who worked on the file when it was active. In N.Y. State 398 (1975), we held that, absent a special agreement to the contrary, the clients of a law partnership employ the firm as an entity and not a particular member of the firm. Consistent with that holding, the ethics committee of the Nassau County Bar Association determined that both partners of a two-member firm in dissolution were fully responsible to every client of the firm, and the lawyers' separate agreement to the contrary could not diminish each lawyer's responsibility to the clients of the firm. Nassau County 40-88 (1988).

12. By analogy, the inquirer's obligation to maintain closed client files continues beyond the defunding of the not-for profit entity in the same fashion as it would in the event of a law firm dissolution. Prior ethics opinions have addressed the breadth of the lawyer's responsibility in situations analogous to that presented by the inquiring lawyer, such as retirement and dissolution. See, e.g., N.Y. State 1192 (2020); N.Y. State 623 (1991); N.Y. State 460 (1977); N.Y. County 725 (1998).

13. As we stated most recently in N.Y. State 1192, a lawyer has no ethical responsibility to maintain closed client files indefinitely except for "original documents of intrinsic value such as wills, deeds or negotiable instruments as well as documents the lawyer knows or should know that the client or third party may need in the future." To the extent the documents contained in the closed client files of the public defender's office fall within these exceptions, we find no material difference in the scope of the inquirer's obligations in this case.

CONCLUSION:

14. Absent the client's informed consent, lawyers in the public defender's office may not deliver open or closed client files to the assigned counsel program. Rather, the public defender's office must facilitate the transfer of open client files to the client or successor counsel appointed by the assigned counsel program and must maintain the files until this transfer can be accomplished. Closed client files must be maintained in the manner required of dissolving law firms.

OPINION 1213 (01/11/2021)

TOPIC: Lawyer paying for recommendation.

DIGEST: A lawyer may not participate in an internet lawyer-client matching service that vouches for the lawyer's credentials, competence and effectiveness, and recommends the lawyer as the "best lawyer" for the needs of the potential client.

RULES: 5.4(a), 7.1(a), 7.2(a)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a lawyer who wishes to participate in an online service that connects potential clients facing traffic violations with attorneys willing to represent them to fight the violations.

2. The lawyer matching service has created a platform that requires the client to upload the ticket and provide additional information. According to the inquirer, a proprietary algorithm then matches the client with "the best local traffic lawyer for their case," and quotes a legal fee that was determined by the lawyer selected by the algorithm. Once the fee is paid, the client is paired with the lawyer, who must accept the case within one day or forego the representation opportunity. The legal fee, net of a service charge to the matching service, is then transferred by the service to the lawyer.

3. The inquirer states that the algorithm is driven by a variety of factors, including lawyer location, fee schedules, success rates, local competition, and customer service. The online lawyer matching service collects customer feedback and, in its sole discretion, may offer a full or partial refund in the event of an unfavorable outcome.

4. The service represents that it is not a law firm, does not offer legal advice, and all the attorneys it connects with clients are neither its employees nor its agents. The online service is not owned by New York-admitted lawyers.

QUESTION:

5. Does the portion of the legal fee paid by the client but retained by the online lawyer matching service constitute an impermissible referral fee?

OPINION:

6. With exceptions not here relevant, Rule 7.2 (a) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") provides:

> A lawyer shall not compensate or give anything of value to a person or organization to recommend or obtain employment by a client, or as a reward for having made a recommendation resulting in employment by a client . . . .

7. Comment [1] to Rule 7.2 states that paragraph (a) "does not prohibit a lawyer from paying for advertising and communications permitted by these Rules" and, insofar as is relevant, that a lawyer

"may pay others for generating client leads such as Internet-based client leads, as long as . . . the lead generator does not recommend the lawyers." Comment [1] to Rule 7.2 elaborates on the prohibition on recommendations by providing that to comply with Rule 7.1 (which prohibits false, deceptive, or misleading lawyer advertising), "a lawyer must not pay a lead generator that states, implies, or creates a reasonable impression that it is recommending the lawyer, . . . or has analyzed a person's legal problems when determining which lawyer should receive the referral."

8. Here, the matching service is a "lead generator," and participating lawyers pay the service a fee for generating leads. As such, the principal issue the committee must determine is whether the service "recommends" lawyers.

9. This committee has observed that the Rules "generally do not allow lawyers to pay for referrals of clients," but the prohibition is not meant to keep "a lawyer from paying for advertising and communications permitted by the Rules . . ." N.Y. State 979 ¶ 4 (2013). The same opinion concluded that a group of lawyer mediators would be paying for joint advertising, rather than paying for prohibited referrals, where a website included a detailed biography of each member of the group, because that format was "reasonably designed to encourage the consumer to select the member with the expertise appropriate to the consumer's needs, rather than to trigger a consumer to call for a referral." N.Y. State 979 ¶12.

10. In 2017, this Committee issued two additional opinions which, through juxtaposition, illustrate the line between a lawyer ethically participating in internet marketing services, on the one hand, and a lawyer unethically paying for a referral, on the other hand. See N.Y. State 1131 (2017) and N.Y. State 1132 (2017).

11. The for-profit service at issue in N.Y. State 1131 charged participating lawyers a fixed monthly fee, and those lawyers submitted their names, contact information, geographic locale and practice areas to the service to include in its database. Potential clients wishing to be contacted by a lawyer sent the service their names and contact information, their geographic locale, and the practice area in which they sought legal advice. The service then searched its database of participating lawyers to identify all lawyers who stated that they engaged in the requested practice area in the requested geographic locale, and selected a lawyer meeting those criteria in the order in which the lawyers had registered with the service – meaning "the first lawyer to register gets the first lead; second lawyer gets the second lead, etc." N.Y. State 1131 ¶ 1.

12. Based principally on the service's use of "neutral" and "mechanical" factors, we concluded that the lawyer matching service described in N.Y. State 1131 did not violate the prohibition against paying for a recommendation, which is the core tenet of Rule 7.2(a). We reasoned:

> . . . [T]o "recommend also includes identifying a particular lawyer or lawyers to a potential client as "a right" or "the right" lawyer for the client situation after an analysis of either the potential client's legal problem or the lawyer's qualifications to address that problem. We believe identifying "a right" or "the right" lawyer implies some qualitative comparative assessment of the lawyers available to perform the services the potential client requires.

> We believe that the Service would not constitute a "recommendation" as long as the Service's advertising does not state or imply that the Service is making a recommendation and makes clear that (i) being included on its list of participating lawyers requires only a payment and the Service does not vet the qualifications of such lawyers, other than, for example, confirming the lawyer's good standing with the licensing authority, if that is the case, (ii) the Service's selection of a participating lawyer from that list is the result of a neutral process that involves no evaluative judgment, and (iii) when a lawyer is chosen by the Service, it does not mean the selected lawyer is the "best" or "right" lawyer for the client's needs or that the lawyer is otherwise preferred over other lawyers. If these three conditions are met, a layer's payment to the Service to participate in its matching service as a lawyer available to contact potential clients is permissible under Rule 7.2(a).

N.Y State 1131 ¶¶ 20-21.

13. We reached a different conclusion, however, in N.Y. State 1132 (2017), where we concluded that the online lawyer matching service operated by Avvo Legal Services ("Avvo") had crossed the line from a permissible marketing service to an impermissible payment for a recommendation in violation of Rule 7.2(a).

14. We noted in N.Y. State 1132 that Avvo gave each participating lawyer a rating that was advertised as helping a potential client "quickly assess a lawyer's background." The rating was scaled from 1 to 10 and calibrated in one-tenth increments, suggesting to the committee a degree of "mathematical precision." N.Y. State 1132 ¶ 27. Avvo advertisements also stated that the model developed to calculate each lawyer's rating "was developed with input from hundreds of attorneys, thousands of customers and many other legal professionals who deeply understand the work attorneys do" and that the rating "enables a potential client to find 'the right lawyer' . . . for their needs," N.Y. State 1132 ¶ 28.

15. Here, the online service that matches lawyers with potential clients to fight tickets has many characteristics similar to the factors that drove our conclusion in N.Y. State 1132 that Avvo's online lawyer matching service violated Rule 7.2(a). Conversely, the matching service has few of the characteristics that led us to approve the online lawyer matching service at issue in N.Y. State 1131. Specifically, the online service here matches the potential client with an attorney based on factors that include attorney success rate, response rate, and customer service rating. The website states that the potential client is not just matched to any lawyer, but to an "experienced traffic attorney" with a "great track record in the court where the ticket will be contested." The service also states that it has collected data and knows which lawyers are successful and which are not in each court served.

16. The online lawyer matching service here in issue plainly strives to give potential clients the impression that it has selected the "best" or "right" lawyer for the potential client's matter, and that the lawyer selected is preferred over other candidates in the service's database. Based on these express and implied representations, the service appears to vouch for a matched lawyer's credentials, competence and effectiveness, making the communication a prohibited recommendation. Accordingly, under Rule 7.2(a), the inquirer's payment for participation in the online service would constitute a prohibited referral fee, not a permitted marketing fee.

17. Beyond the violation of Rule 7.2(a), two additional ethical concerns arise. First, would the inquirer's participation in the online service result in improper fee sharing with a non-lawyer under Rule 5.4(a)? Second, would participation in the online service violate the inquirer's duty under Rule 7.1(a) not to participate in the use or dissemination of advertisements containing statements or claims that are false, deceptive or misleading? See Rule 7.2, Comment [1] (lead generator's communications must be "consistent with" Rule 7.1). Because we conclude that the inquirer's participation in the online matching service violates Rule 7.2(a), we do not need to address these additional concerns now.

CONCLUSION:

18. A lawyer may not participate in an online lawyer-client matching service that vouches for the lawyer's credentials, competence and effectiveness and recommends the lawyer as the "best lawyer" for the needs of the potential client. Accordingly, a lawyer participating in such a lawyer matching service would violate Rule 7.2(a).

OPINION 1214 (01/11/2021)

TOPIC: Frivolous arguments to a court; withdrawal.

DIGEST: A lawyer is ethically prohibited from presenting a frivolous argument to a court. If the lawyer cannot find a non-frivolous basis on which to proceed with a client's motion and the client persists on putting before the court arguments the lawyer believes to be frivolous, the lawyer may seek permission from the court to withdraw from the representation. If the court will not permit the lawyer to withdraw, the lawyer must competently represent the client without engaging in frivolous conduct.

RULES: 1.2(c), 1.4(a)(2), 1.16(c)(4) & (d), 3.1(a)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a lawyer at a legal services office that represents homeowners in residential foreclosure proceedings without charge. That office was initially contacted by a homeowner seeking to challenge a judgment of foreclosure. Generally, the inquirer's office does not accept post-judgment cases, and the homeowner's case was declined. Thereafter, the homeowner filed a pro se application to vacate the judgment of foreclosure alleging defective service of process. The justice presiding in the matter, rather than deciding the motion, requested that the inquirer represent the homeowner and attempt a settlement. The inquirer agreed, and made it clear to the homeowner that the representation was limited to negotiating settlement terms with the foreclosing bank.

2. The settlement negotiations failed, and the court contacted the inquirer to continue the homeowner's representation in connection with the homeowner's previously submitted application to vacate the judgment of foreclosure. The inquirer protested that the agreed scope of the representation had been limited to settlement negotiations, but the court stated, to the contrary, that the inquirer's scope of representation was unlimited and for the entire case.

3. The inquirer has reviewed the motion papers prepared by the homeowner without the benefit of counsel and has concluded that there is no non-frivolous factual or legal basis for vacating the judgment of foreclosure, including the sole ground asserted in those papers.

QUESTIONS:

4. At oral argument of the motion to vacate the foreclosure judgment, may the inquirer rest on the motion papers prepared by the homeowner or, alternatively, simply state the homeowner's position, even though the inquirer believes the homeowner's position to be frivolous?

5. Having never agreed to take on the homeowner's representation beyond attempting to reach a settlement with the foreclosing bank, may the inquirer refuse to participate any further in the matter?

OPINION:

A. Frivolous arguments

6. Rule 3.1(a) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") provides: "A lawyer shall not bring or defend a proceeding, or assert or controvert an issue therein, unless there is a basis in law and fact for doing so that is not frivolous." Here, the inquirer has concluded that there is no basis in law or fact that would support the sole ground the homeowner has raised for seeking to vacate the judgment of foreclosure, or any other ground.

7. Frivolous conduct within the meaning of Rule 3.1(a) is not materially different from frivolous conduct as defined in 22 NYCRR Part 130. In the context of sanctioning attorneys for frivolous conduct in litigation, 22 NYCRR § 130-1.1(c) provides that conduct is "frivolous" if: "(1) it is completely without merit in law and cannot be supported by a reasonable argument for an extension, modification or reversal of existing law; (2) it is undertaken primarily to delay or prolong the resolution of the litigation, or to harass or maliciously injure another; or (3) it asserts material factual statements that are false."

8. The inquirer may not argue or advance frivolous arguments to support the homeowner's motion. It is, however, important for the inquirer to distinguish between arguments that meet the high standard for "frivolous conduct" set forth in 22 NYCRR § 130-1.1(c) and Rule 3.1(a), on the one hand, from arguments that are merely unlikely to succeed but are not frivolous, on the other hand. The inquirer may ethically continue representing the homeowner by advancing any non-frivolous arguments the inquirer reasonably believes support a vacatur application. If the inquirer develops such non-frivolous arguments, then the inquirer must discuss the proposed new or modified position with the homeowner before presenting it to the court. See Rule 1.4(a)(2) (a lawyer must "reasonably consult with the client about the means by which the client's objectives are to be accomplished").

9. If the homeowner insists that the inquirer pursue the frivolous arguments contained in the motion papers the homeowner prepared while acting pro se, the inquirer may seek permission from the court to withdraw on the basis that "the client insists upon taking action with which the lawyer has a fundamental disagreement," see Rule 1.16(c)(4), as well as on any other mandatory or permissive grounds the inquirer has for withdrawal under Rule 1.16. The inquirer must be mindful, however, that: "The nature and extent of information about a client that a lawyer may ethically reveal on a motion to withdraw as counsel depend on whether the information is protected as confidential information under Rule 1.6." N.Y. State 1057 ¶5 (2015).

10. If permission to withdraw is denied by the court, the inquirer must continue the homeowner's representation. See Rule 1.16 (d) ("When ordered to do so by a tribunal, a lawyer shall continue representation notwithstanding good cause for terminating the representation."). But even in that circumstance, the inquirer may still not engage in "frivolous conduct" at the direction or behest of the homeowner. A client has no right to instruct a lawyer to violate a Rules of Professional Conduct, and a lawyer has no right to follow an instruction that the lawyer violate a Rule. Thus, the inquirer must find a means to competently represent the homeowner without putting forth frivolous arguments. Since the homeowner rather than the inquirer submitted the frivolous motion papers, the lawyer is not required to renounce or disavow them, but the inquirer may not rely on any frivolous factual or legal arguments in those papers.

B. Scope of representation

11. We turn now to the inquirer's second question – may the inquirer refuse to continue the homeowner's representation because the inquirer made it clear to the homeowner that the representation would be limited to negotiating settlement terms with the foreclosing bank. Such limited scope representation is acceptable under Rule 1.2(c) "if the limitation is reasonable under the circumstances, the client gives informed consent and where necessary notice is provided to the tribunal and/or opposing counsel." However, whether the inquirer may refuse the judge's request to continue the representation after settlement negotiations failed, whether the judge's request constituted an order and, if an order, whether such order might not be binding on the inquirer under the circumstances, are all questions of law beyond this committee's jurisdiction.

CONCLUSION:

12. A lawyer is ethically prohibited from presenting frivolous arguments on behalf of a client who seeks to vacate a judgment of foreclosure. The lawyer's duty of competence is fulfilled by presenting whatever non-frivolous arguments can be developed to support vacatur. If the lawyer determines that there are no non-frivolous arguments in support of an application to vacate, then the lawyer shall not proceed with the motion. If the client insists on proceeding based on factual claims or legal arguments that are frivolous, the lawyer may seek permission of the court to withdraw from the representation, but the lawyer must not reveal confidential information unless an exception to the duty of confidentiality applies. If the court does not permit withdrawal, the lawyer must continue to represent the client and must provide competent representation to the client without engaging in frivolous conduct. Whether and under what circumstances a lawyer may decline a court order or request to represent a client is a question of law that is beyond this committee's jurisdiction.

OPINION 1215 (01/15/2021)

TOPIC: Limited scope representation in criminal cases

DIGEST: A law firm may not enter into a retainer agreement in a criminal matter limiting the scope of the firm's services to pretrial work unless (i) the limitation is reasonable under the circumstances, (ii) the client gives informed consent, and (iii) the limitation is not prejudicial to the administration of justice.

RULES: 1.1(b), 1.2(a) & (c), 1.16(d), 8.4(c) & (d)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a New York lawyer who employs of counsel attorneys and pays them a flat fee to represent clients in criminal matters. The firm's retainer agreement with these criminal defense clients states that the representation will be handled by an attorney who is of counsel to the firm, and that the scope of the agreement is limited to obtaining a pretrial disposition (such as a guilty plea or dismissal). The retainer agreement further informs the client that if there is no pretrial disposition and the case proceeds to trial, the client must enter into a new agreement with the of counsel attorney, or with another attorney of the client's choosing, in order to secure trial representation.

QUESTIONS:

2. May a law firm enter into a retainer agreement with a criminal defense client stating that the representation will be handled by an of counsel attorney, that the agreement is limited in scope to obtaining a pretrial disposition, and that representation of the client at trial requires the client to separately engage the of counsel attorney, or another attorney, for that purpose?

3. May the law firm pay the of counsel attorney a flat fee for representing the defendant under such a limited scope retainer agreement?

OPINION:

4. In general, there is no ethical prohibition on a law firm entering into an agreement with a client that identifies an individual of counsel attorney who will be handling the client's representation, even in a criminal case, provided that the of counsel attorney is competent to perform the agreed upon services. See Rule 1.1(b) ("A lawyer shall not handle a legal matter that the lawyer knows or should know that the lawyer is not competent to handle, without associating with a lawyer who is competent to handle it"). Nonetheless, a number of ethical issues must be considered in any such arrangement where, as here, the retainer agreement provides for a limited scope of pretrial representation only. Chief among those issues is whether the limited pretrial scope of service is permissible pursuant to Rule 1.2(c) of the Rules of Professional Conduct ("Rules"),

Rule 1.2(c) and limited scope representation.

5. Rule 1.2(c) expressly permits limited scope representation and provides that a lawyer "may limit the scope of the representation if the limitation is reasonable under the circumstances, the client gives informed consent and where necessary notice is provided to the tribunal and/or opposing counsel."

6. We addressed limited scope representation in criminal matters in N.Y. State 856 (2011). The inquirer there was a lawyer working with a union legal services plan that regularly retained lawyers to represent union members in criminal matters "for arraignment purposes only." After arraignment, the legal services plan required the union member to retain the original legal services plan attorney, or another private attorney, to continue the representation or, if the member could not afford to retain private counsel, to seek a court-appointed or legal aid attorney. We concluded that "limiting the representation to arraignment pursuant to the union legal services plan is ethical" if the lawyer complies with Rules 1.2(c) and 8.4(d). We said that a lawyer can comply with those rules by satisfying three conditions (N.Y. State 856 ¶ 9):

> . . . (a) the lawyer must obtain the client's consent after giving the client the information necessary to make an informed decision whether to agree to the limitation, (b) the limitation must be reasonable under the circumstances (i.e., the scope of the representation must be sufficiently broad to enable the lawyer to render competent service), and (c) the limitation must not be prejudicial to the administration of justice. [Emphasis added.]

7. The question here is whether extending the end point of a limited scope criminal representation from arraignment to the entire pretrial phase can satisfy these criteria.

What disclosures are needed to obtain a client's informed consent?

8. A lawyer who intends to limit the scope of a representation in any way must obtain the client's informed consent. What information would a lawyer need to disclose to ensure that a client's consent to representation limited to the pretrial stage was informed? Comment [6A] to Rule 1.2, which appears under the heading "Agreements Limiting Scope of Representation," is instructive:

> [6A] In obtaining consent from the client, the lawyer must adequately disclose the limitations on the scope of the engagement and the matters that will be excluded. In addition, the lawyer must disclose the reasonably foreseeable consequences of the limitation. In making such disclosure, the lawyer should explain that if the lawyer or the client determines during the representation that additional services outside the limited scope specified in the engagement are necessary or advisable to represent the client adequately, then the client may need to retain separate counsel, which could result in delay, additional expense, and complications. [Emphasis added.]

9. Thus, the law firm here would first need to disclose "the matters that will be excluded" by limiting representation to pretrial matters. Plainly that limitation would exclude selecting a jury, delivering an opening statement, and calling witnesses at trial, but would it also exclude issuing trial subpoenas, filing motions in limine, or preparing the case for trial? For reasons we discuss later in this opinion, those latter services cannot be prospectively excluded from the representation when they are necessary to provide competent representation. The law firm would also need to disclose the "reasonably foreseeable consequences" of the limitation, including the risk that the trial court might deny the firm's motion to withdraw from the representation were the case to proceed to trial.

10. In N.Y. State 856, we pointed out that "even if a lawyer validly obtains a client's informed advance consent to withdraw after a discrete stage . . . the lawyer must also comply with Rule 1.16(d)," which provides as follows:

> (d) If permission for withdrawal from employment is required by the rules of a tribunal, a lawyer shall not withdraw from employment in a matter before that tribunal without its permission. When ordered to do so by a tribunal, a lawyer shall continue representation notwithstanding good cause for terminating the representation.

11. Here, once a lawyer has entered an appearance in a criminal matter in a state or federal court in New York, permission for withdrawal is invariably required by the rules of that tribunal. The very real possibility that the judge presiding over a criminal case might deny the law firm's motion to withdraw, especially if the motion were made on or near the eve of trial, should also be disclosed. See, e.g., People v. Young, 38 Misc.3d 381, 953 N.Y.S.2d 840 (N.Y. City Ct. 2012) ("[W]here defendant appears to have met his initial obligation to the firm, but now indicates an inability to pay, and where the matter has gone well past the discovery and motion stages and is ready to be tried, the Court finds that . . . withdrawal is improper."). There is also a possibility that a court might deny the defendant's application to substitute successor counsel, despite compliance with the retainer agreement, if that application is made too close to trial. See People v. Arroyave, 49 N.Y.2d 264, 271, 401 N.E.2d 393, 397 (1980) ("absent exigent or compelling circumstances, a court may . . . deny a defendant's request to substitute counsel made on the eve of or during trial if the defendant has been accorded a reasonable opportunity to retain counsel of his own choosing before that time"). If a motion to withdraw or to substitute other counsel is denied, for whatever reason, the client's representation could be impacted, because the trial would then proceed with the defendant represented by the originally retained lawyer, notwithstanding the understanding of the lawyer and the client to the contrary in the retainer agreement.

Is the limitation to pretrial work "reasonable under the circumstances"?

12. Even if the inquirer's firm makes all of the required disclosures, Rule 1.2(c) permits limited scope representation only if the limitation is "reasonable under the circumstances." We therefore need to consider the "circumstances" carefully to see whether this particular limitation is reasonable.

13. In N.Y. State 856 we said that a lawyer may ethically agree with a client to terminate a representation after "a discrete stage of a matter," and that arraignment was such a "discrete stage." We believe the circumstances are quite different here. In many criminal matters, a bright line cannot be drawn between pretrial work and trial work. The witness interviews, forensic tests, and factual investigation needed to negotiate effectively with a prosecutor are an integral part of pretrial representation in most criminal proceedings. Also, decisions about which legal defenses to present at trial must often be made long before trial. For example, a defense lawyer is required to give advance notice of intent to proffer psychiatric evidence at trial (see C.P.L. 250.10), or when requested by the prosecutor, to give advance notice of intent to present an alibi defense at trial (see C.P.L. 250.20). Therefore, we believe that limiting the scope of criminal defense legal services to pretrial work would ordinarily be unreasonable in a criminal case of any substantive or procedural complexity, or where there is more than a slight possibility that the case will actually proceed to trial.

14. As a general matter, we believe it would be a highly speculative exercise to attempt to predict, at the inception of a criminal case, the likelihood of a negotiated disposition prior to trial. Too much turns on facts that are unknown when an arrest is made and charges are first filed. For example, the defense lawyer is unlikely to know: the character and criminal record of prosecution witnesses (whose testimony could be sterling or could be thoroughly impeached); the nature and availability of defense witnesses; and the results of forensic blood, DNA and ballistics tests. Information obtained from the police and other law enforcement authorities post-arraignment through pretrial discovery, even in a relatively straightforward misdemeanor case, may reveal a basis for a successful motion to suppress eyewitness testimony, admissions, or physical evidence. And, of course, there are multiple intangible factors that may reveal themselves during the course of the prosecution that could affect the ability to negotiate a reasonable disposition.

15. For these reasons, we believe it will only be the rare criminal case, based on facts and circumstances which are highly specific to the particular situation, in which a competent criminal lawyer could predict with a reasonable degree of certainty at the inception of representation that a case will terminate without a trial.

16. In any event, in every criminal case, an agreement to limit the representation to the pretrial phase of the case cannot include a limitation on taking the same steps – at the appropriate times – that would be required of a competent lawyer whose representation was not limited to the pretrial phase of the case. In other words, in a criminal representation, an agreement that limits the scope of the representation to pretrial matters, must nonetheless require the attorney to provide or take the necessary steps to ensure that successor counsel is able to provide all the defense services that are necessary to the provision of competent and effective representation until the final disposition of the case whether by motion, plea agreement, or verdict after trial. Only in that way can the lawyer ensure that the client is not prejudiced by the first attorney's failure to lay an adequate foundation of preparation.

Is the limitation prejudicial to the administration of justice?

17. The third and final factor we discussed in N.Y. State 856 is whether the limitation is "prejudicial to the administration of justice in violation" of Rule 8.4(d). In most circumstances, we think a limitation in the scope of services provided to the pretrial phase of a criminal matter will be prejudicial to the administration of justice unless the lawyer is fully prepared to proceed to trial on the date scheduled by the court if a pretrial disposition is not reached and the court denies a motion to withdraw or to substitute new counsel.

18. Our opinion is rooted in practical considerations. If a criminal defendant who has signed a limited scope retainer agreement is concerned that counsel may abandon the case in the event of trial, the defendant may feel coerced into pleading guilty, notwithstanding the existence of a viable defense or even innocence. A plea coerced by fear of abandonment would be plainly prejudicial to the administration of justice. "In a criminal case," Rule 1.2(a) provides, "the lawyer shall abide by the client's decision, after consultation with the lawyer, as to a plea to be entered . . . ." A defendant should make the choice between pleading guilty and going to trial freely, without fear of abandonment by counsel and without fear that successor counsel will lack sufficient time to prepare for trial.

19. Conversely, if the limited scope lawyer is concerned that the court may not allow the lawyer to withdraw before trial despite a retainer agreement limited to the pretrial phase of the case, the lawyer may urge the defendant to accept a plea offer, even if the client would be better served by rejecting it. That, likewise, would be plainly prejudicial to the administration of justice.

20. Additionally, a lawyer who enters into a retainer agreement that is limited to the pretrial phase of criminal cases may not be competent to actually try a criminal case and yet, if a motion to withdraw is denied, that is what the lawyer will have to do. This would present a grave threat of prejudice to the administration of justice.

21. Finally, there is a risk that if a trial court grants a motion to withdraw shortly before trial, successor counsel will not be afforded the necessary time to prepare sufficiently for trial. This too would substantially prejudice the administration of justice.

22. For all these reasons, we think a limited scope retainer agreement would be prejudicial to the administration of justice, and thus impermissible, unless (i) the lawyer who enters into the limited scope pretrial criminal defense retainer is fully competent to represent the client in defense of the charges (including at any trial), and (ii) that lawyer actually prepares the case and will be ready for trial by the time of the scheduled trial date if the court denies a motion to withdraw or to substitute new counsel, and (iii) the client, after full disclosure of the risks inherent in such a limited-scope agreement, has sufficient sophistication and resolve not to be coerced into accepting a plea offer that the client would not have considered if the client had engaged a lawyer who was committed to continue the representation until the conclusion of the case.

Is the inquirer's firm treating of counsel lawyers unethically by paying a flat fee?

23. Rule 8.4(c) prohibits a lawyer or law firm from engaging in "conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit, or misrepresentation." In the unusual circumstances where a limited pretrial scope engagement is permitted by Rules 1.2(c) and 8.4(d) in criminal cases, we see nothing in the Rules of Professional Conduct preventing the inquirer's firm from paying of counsel lawyers a flat fee to represent defendants as long as neither the inquirer nor anyone else at the inquirer's firm misleads the of counsel lawyers about the reality of their situation – namely, that if the client fails to engage successor trial counsel, and if the court denies the of counsel lawyer's motion to withdraw, then the obligation of defending the client at trial may fall to the of counsel lawyer. Armed with the knowledge of this risk, the of counsel lawyers can decline to accept the limited scope representation, or can insist upon additional payment from the law firm if required to continue the representation through trial.

CONCLUSION:

24. A law firm may not enter into a retainer agreement in a criminal matter limiting the scope of the firm's services to pretrial work unless (i) the limitation is reasonable under the circumstances, (ii) the client gives informed consent, and (iii) the limitation is not prejudicial to the administration of justice. As criminal cases are commonly high stakes matters with unpredictable twists and turns, this standard will be difficult to meet except in rare cases.

OPINION 1216 (01/15/2021)

TOPIC: Government lawyer doing consulting work for private company

DIGEST: A government agency lawyer, doing work on behalf of the government in connection with a software contract between the agency and a private company, may not also work as a consultant to the private company to help it provide such software to other agencies unless there is law expressly allowing such work. Such consulting work could also be prohibited by rules on conflicts of interest or by the rule prohibiting a lawyer from accepting benefits intended to influence the actions of public officials.

RULES: 1.01(a) (h) & (l), 1.7(a)(1)-(2), 1.7(b), 1.11(d)(2) & (f)(3), 5.7(a) & (d)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is an assistant county attorney who played a significant role in the county's successful acquisition and implementation of software to manage the county's contracts and insurance. The county paid a one-time fee and pays an annual maintenance fee for the software. The inquirer continues to provide technical support to county staff on the use of the software.

2. The outside vendor who supplied, customized and installed the software for the county, and who worked closely with the inquirer on the software contract with the county, has offered to employ inquirer as a consultant. In that role, the inquirer would provide "implementation and support services" to other counties that purchase its software. As described by the inquirer:

> Implementation involves discovery of what the entity's contract/insurance process is, consulting with the software company to redesign the software so it best works with the county process, uploading county vendors, users and standard form contracts into the software, training on the software and then go-live with the software. Support of the software primarily consists of answering questions as to how the software works, questions/issues with the software and coordinating with the software developer regarding the same.

QUESTIONS:

3. If the inquirer were to provide such consulting services, would it give rise to a conflict of interest and, if so, would the conflict be waivable?

4. In the event of a dispute between the county and vendor arising from or related to the sale and implementation of the software, would the inquirer's role as a paid consultant to the vendor disqualify the county attorney's office from representing the county and, if so, would the conflict be waivable?

5. Would the answers be different if the inquirer were paid directly by other counties that are clients of the vendor, rather than by the vendor itself?

OPINION:

Rule 1.11

6. Rule 1.11 governs special conflicts of interest for former and current government officers and employees. In relevant part it provides:

> (d) Except as law may otherwise expressly provide, a lawyer currently serving as a public officer or employee shall not: . . .
> > (2) negotiate for private employment with any person who is involved as a party or as lawyer for a party in a matter in which the lawyer is participating personally and substantially.

7. A "matter" includes "any . . . contract, . . . negotiation, . . . or any other representation involving a specific party or parties." Rule 1.0(l).

8. The contractual relationship between the county and the vendor in which inquirer has participated and will continue to participate, is thus a "matter" subject to Rule 1.11(d)(2). As such, "[e]xcept as law may otherwise expressly provide," the inquirer is ethically prohibited from negotiating for private employment with the vendor. See N.Y. State 1187 ¶7 (2020) (lawyer personally and substantially involved in one matter as a public officer may not negotiate to represent a party to that matter, even in another matter "wholly unrelated" to the first matter). This prohibition is not waivable, and it continues until conclusion of the matter in which the inquirer is participating. N.Y. State 1205 ¶¶ 8-9 (2020).

9. Whether there is a local law or policy that falls within the "law" exception of Rule 1.11(d)(2) and which would authorize or provide a procedure for securing county approval of the proposed consulting services arrangement presents an issue of law rather than of ethics, and is therefore a question beyond the committee's jurisdiction.

10. Even if the inquirer's proposed consulting conduct with the software vendor complies with Rule 1.11, the inquirer must also comply with any local laws and policies that govern county employees in general, including any provisions of the municipality's code of ethics relating to outside employment. See N.Y. State 1169 ¶¶ 6-7 (2019). For examples of such laws and policies (from counties other than the one where the inquirer works), see, e.g., Rensselaer County Personnel Policy § 2.12 (before beginning outside employment, employees must obtain advance written approval from their department head; outside employment must not interfere with work performance or schedule; and employees may not use County property, time, or IT systems in connection with outside employment); Suffolk County Standard Operating Procedure A-15(5) (outside employment may not be undertaken on regularly scheduled work time or on sick time, and "may not involve or appear to involve a conflict of interest or a potential conflict of interest").

11. Such local laws and policies could significantly limit the ability of inquirer to provide the outside consulting services, even beyond a requirement that the work be approved by the county attorney's office. For example, an assistant county attorney prohibited from outside employment during regular business hours could find it hard to provide software implementation and support services for other counties that have similar regular business hours. However, we do not opine as to how such local laws and policies might limit the proposed conduct, as our advisory role is limited to interpreting the rules of legal ethics.

Rule 1.7(a)(2)

12. Rule 1.7 sets forth the general rules for conflicts with current clients. It provides, in pertinent part:

> (a) Except as provided in paragraph (b), a lawyer shall not represent a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that . . . (2) there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests.

13. Here, there would be a conflict of interest if a reasonable lawyer would find a "significant risk" that the inquirer's professional judgment as an assistant county attorney would be "adversely affected" by the inquirer's own "financial, business, property or other personal interests" in establishing and maintaining a paid consultancy arrangement with the vendor. See Rule 1.7(a)(2).

14. The inquirer's personal interests could adversely affect the inquirer's professional judgment in representing the county in various ways. For example, if the county were to consider replacing the vendor's software or terminating the vendor's annual contract – actions that would hurt the vendor financially – the inquirer might be inclined (or might even be pressured by the vendor) to advocate for maintaining the relationship with the vendor, unchanged, for fear of being terminated as an outside consultant by the vendor and losing substantial outside income.

15. If a personal interest conflict exists under Rule 1.7(a), the conflict would preclude the inquirer's proposed consulting relationship with the vendor unless the conflict is waivable and is waived by the county in compliance with Rule 1.7(b), which provides, in pertinent part:

> (b) Notwithstanding the existence of a concurrent conflict of interest under paragraph (a), a lawyer may represent a client if: (1) the lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client; . . . and (4) each affected client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing.

16. Thus, waiver can only occur upon the satisfaction of the elements of Rule 1.7(b), including the lawyer's reasonable belief that the lawyer "will be able to provide competent and diligent representation" and the informed consent of the county, confirmed in writing.

17. We do not have sufficient facts to determine whether, in fact, the inquirer's employment as an outside consultant for the vendor would present a personal interest conflict, or if so, whether that conflict would be waivable, but if such a conflict exists, waivability under Rule 1.7(b)(1) seems doubtful in light of the likely nature of the inquirer's divided loyalties. We question that a lawyer with such strong financial interests in maintaining good relations with the vendor could "reasonably believe[]" that the lawyer could provide competent and diligent representation to the client (the county).

18. If the inquirer determines that no local law or policy precludes the proposed consulting arrangement or that such local law or policy "expressly" permits it, and if no personal interest conflict exists, that it is waivable, then the inquirer would still have to consider other ethical issues. In particular, Rule 1.11(f)(3) provides that a lawyer who holds public office shall not "accept anything of value from any person when the lawyer knows or it is obvious that the offer is for the purpose of influencing the lawyer's action as a public official." (Emphasis added.) In determining whether such a purpose is "obvious," relevant factors could include (i) the significance to the inquirer of the amount of money to be paid to the inquirer as a consultant; (ii) the value to the vendor of the inquirer's consulting; and (iii) whether there will be county matters within the inquirer's discretion that could significantly benefit vendor. If the proposed conduct would violate this Rule, then the conduct would be absolutely barred, because the Rule contains no provisions for waiving this conflict.

Rule 5.7

19. As a consultant, the inquirer might be providing only "nonlegal services" (defined by Rule 5.7(c) as "those services that lawyers may lawfully provide and that are not prohibited as an unauthorized practice of law when provided by a nonlawyer"). However, the inquirer's consulting work for the vendor could cross the line into legal services to the vendor (or the vendor's other county customers). In that case, the provisions of Rule 5.7(a) would govern the extent to which such services would be subject to the Rules. For an explanation of Rule 5.7, see, e.g., N.Y. State 1200 (2020) (applying Rule 5.7 to lawyer who was also a wealth advisor) and N.Y. State 1178 (2019) (applying Rule 5.7 to a lawyer serving as a third-party neutral).

Rule 1.7(a)(1)

20. Moreover, if the inquirer's nonlegal consulting work veers into legal services, the inquirer would have at least one law client other than the county that employs inquirer, the proposed conduct would have to comply with the conflicts provision of Rule 1.7(a)(1) (a lawyer shall not represent a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that "the representation will involve the lawyer in representing differing interests," absent effective waiver under Rule 1.7(b)).

Payments Made by the Other County Clients

21. The inquirer asks whether revising the proposed arrangement so that the inquirer would be paid directly by the vendor's other county customers would affect the ethical analysis. In our view, revising the source of payment would not cure problems under Rule 1.11(d)(2), since the other counties would also be parties to a "matter" (the software contract) in which the inquirer would be participating. Likewise, if the inquirer's proposed conduct would violate Rule 1.7(a)(2), the conflict could not necessarily be avoided by obtaining payment directly from the vendor's other county customers because the inquirer would still have a financial interest in the consultancy arrangements. However, if the conduct would violate Rule 1.11(f)(3), then revising the payment arrangements might avoid the violation, because it seems less likely that the vendor's other county customers would pay consulting fees for the purpose of influencing the inquirer's official conduct on behalf of the county that employs inquirer.

Disputes between the County and the Vendor

22. Since we find it doubtful that the Rules of Professional Conduct would permit the inquirer to engage in the proposed conduct, we will only briefly address the conflicts that would arise if a dispute arises between the county and the vendor. If the inquirer were to represent the county in that dispute against the vendor, it would magnify the risk that the consultancy arrangement could adversely affect the inquirer's professional judgment on behalf of the county as the likelihood of alienating the vendor by aggressive advocacy on behalf of the county (or seeking to please the vendor with conciliatory advocacy) would be higher. This would be so even if the inquirer were paid by the other counties rather than by the vendor. Thus the inquirer's personal conduct of such litigation would likely give rise to a conflict, and perhaps an unwaivable conflict, under Rule 1.7(a)(2) and 1.7(b).

23. A conflict under Rule 1.7 would be imputed to other assistant county attorneys under Rule 1.10(a), which provides: "While lawyers are associated in a firm, none of them shall knowingly represent a client when any one of them practicing alone would be prohibited from doing so by Rule 1.7, 1.8 or 1.9, except as otherwise provided therein." A county law department is a "firm." See Rule 1.0(h) (defining "firm" to include "a government law office"); N.Y. State 968 ¶19 (2013) (citing Rule 1.0(h) for proposition that a "firm" is defined to include a federal government law office). However, if the inquirer has a conflict under Rule 1.7 that is imputed to those other assistant county attorneys via Rule 1.10(a), the conflict could be waivable even if the inquirer's own conflict were not. See Rule 1.10(d) ("A disqualification prescribed by this Rule may be waived by the affected client or former client under the conditions stated in Rule 1.7"; Rule 1.7(b) (setting forth conditions for conflict waiver); N.Y. State 968 ¶26 (2013) ("where the nonconsentable nature of Lawyer A's conflict is personal to Lawyer A, the circumstances may well allow the client to consent to representation by Lawyer B" in the same firm).

CONCLUSION:

24. A lawyer who personally and substantially participates in implementing and maintaining management software sold to the county where the lawyer is employed as an assistant county attorney may negotiate terms with and provide consulting services as an outside software implementation consultant to the vendor who provided and maintains that software, in order to assist the vendor's other county clients who are acquiring and implementing the same or similar management software, provided the inquirer complies with local law and policy regarding outside employment, and provided that the consulting arrangement satisfies the requirements of Rule 1.7(a)(1) regarding conflicts arising from differing interests, Rule 1.7(a)(2) regarding personal interest conflicts, and Rule 1.11(f)(3) regarding influence on public officials. Although a review of all the facts and circumstances will determine whether the requirements of these Rules can be satisfied, based on the limited information made available to the committee, it appears doubtful that any conflict would be waivable under Rule 1.7(b)(1). Our conclusion regarding the likelihood of overcoming a possible personal interest conflict would be magnified if a dispute arose between the county and the vendor. Our analysis would not be affected if the vendor's other county clients engaged and paid the inquirer in place of a direct contract with, and direct payments from, the vendor.

OPINION 1217 (01/15/2021)

TOPIC: Law firm name after a partner leaves

DIGEST: A law firm may continue to use the name of a former partner in the firm name where the partner leaves the firm for non-legal employment or becomes "Of Counsel" to the firm unless particular facts and circumstances would make it false, deceptive or misleading to use the former partner's name.

RULE: 7.5(b)

FACTS:

1. A named partner we shall call Baker, one of the founding partners of a law firm we shall call Able, Baker and Charlie, will be leaving the firm to work as a non-lawyer at a university. In the new position Baker will perform no legal services. However, Baker plans to consult on an ongoing basis with Able and Charlie regarding client matters Baker worked on while at the law firm. Baker will maintain a license to practice law in New York.

QUESTIONS:

2. May a law firm continue to include the name of a former partner in the firm name if the former partner will maintain his law license but has left the firm to take a nonlegal position?

3. Would the result be different if the former partner becomes "Of Counsel" to the firm after leaving to take the nonlegal position?

OPINION:

4. As amended effective June 24, 2020, Rule 7.5(b)(1) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") provides:

> (b) (1) A lawyer in private practice shall not practice under:
>
> (i) a false, deceptive or misleading a trade name;
>
> (ii) a false, deceptive, or misleading domain name; or
> (iii) a name that is misleading as to the identity of the lawyer or lawyers practicing under such name.

5. Comment [2] to Rule 7.5 elaborates on Rule 7.5(b) by providing:

> A lawyer or law firm may not use any name that is false, deceptive, or misleading. It is not false, deceptive, or misleading for a firm to be designated by the names of all or some of its current members or by the names of retired or deceased members where there has been a continuing line of succession in the firm's identity. A lawyer or law firm may practice under a trade name or domain name if it is not false, deceptive, or > misleading. A lawyer or law firm also may practice under a distinctive website address, social media username, or comparable professional designation, provided that the name is not false, deceptive, or misleading. [Emphasis added.]

6. In N.Y. State 1207 (2020) we addressed the implications of the Joint Order of the Appellate Divisions altering Rule 7.5(b), emphasizing that the revised Rule is intended to continue to protect the public from being deceived or misled as to the identity of lawyers using or practicing under a firm name. We concluded that under the revised Rule:

> A law firm may practice in New York using a name that is not the name of any lawyer practicing in the firm—in other words, under a trade name—so long as the name under which the firm practices is not false, deceptive or misleading. A New York law firm may continue to include the name of a retired partner in its name.

N.Y. State 1207 ¶ 20.

7. Amended Rule 7.5(b) permits trade names — such as a firm located on "Maple Street" that wishes to practice under the trade name "Maple Street Law Group" — provided such trade names comport with what we described as "the longstanding principle that law firm names must not be false, misleading, or deceptive." N.Y. State 1207 ¶11. Comments [3], [4] and [5] to Rule 7.5 provide examples of deceptive or misleading firm names, none of which suggest any concerns here.

8. There has never been a per se prohibition on keeping a former partner's name in the firm name and nothing in amended Rule 7.5(b) prevents the firm of Able, Baker and Charlie from continuing to use Baker's name in the firm name simply because Baker will continue working outside the firm as a non-lawyer. This is the result whether or not Baker becomes "Of Counsel" to the firm. The touchstone remains whether keeping Baker in the firm name would somehow be false, deceptive or misleading. On the facts presented to us, we have no basis to conclude that it would.

CONCLUSION:

9. A law firm may continue to use the name of a former partner in the firm name after the partner leaves the firm for nonlegal employment and/or becomes "Of Counsel" to the firm unless particular facts and circumstances would make it false, deceptive or misleading to do so.

OPINION 1218 (02/22/2021)

TOPIC: Sharing Legal Fees with Former Associate

DIGEST: Subject to any applicable law, a law firm may pay legal fees on particular cases to an attorney formerly affiliated with the firm and now serving in a non-judicial public office for work previously performed at the firm to the same extent that the attorney would have been paid if still affiliated with the law firm.

RULES: 1.5(g-h), 1.11(f)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a New York lawyer who is a member of a firm that practices in New York. The firm concentrates primarily on contingent fee personal injury matters. The firm has agreements with its lawyers on the amounts that lawyers working on these matters will be paid upon completion of the matter.

2. Recently, a lawyer in the firm was elected to a non-judicial public office in New York and resigned from the firm to assume the public office. Before resigning, this lawyer had worked on particular cases, some of which were resolved before the lawyer resigned from the firm. The resolution of at least one other matter, for which (the inquirer tells us) the lawyer was "responsible," is now "imminent." The resigning lawyer, who remains a member of the bar, has asked to be paid a share of the legal fees from all three cases to the same extent and in the same percentage as if the lawyer were still affiliated with the firm.

3. The inquirer has asked us to assume that, under the firm's arrangements, the firm would be obligated to pay the lawyer as requested, but the inquirer is concerned about whether the payment would run afoul of the N.Y. Rules of Professional Conduct ("Rules"). Solely for our purposes, we construe this assumption to mean that, in the firm's view, the lawyer's resignation did not terminate the existing arrangement between the firm and the lawyer regarding compensation for services previously rendered.

QUESTION:

4. May a law firm pay to a lawyer previously affiliated with the firm a share of legal fees otherwise due and owing to the lawyer after the previously affiliated lawyer has assumed a public office?

OPINION:

5. Our answer is yes. In so concluding, we stress that we offer no view on whether such a payment to the public official is consistent with whatever laws, regulations, ethics codes, or other mandates may govern the public official's receipt of such legal fees. These are questions of law beyond our purview. We are aware that, in New York, some public officials are permitted to earn income from outside sources, provided that the payments are not made to influence "the lawyer's actions as a public official." Rule 1.11(f)(3). See N.Y. State 1169 ¶ 10 (2019) ("Rule 1.11(f) also governs the conduct of lawyers in public office"). But these questions of law are not within our jurisdiction to decide.

Accordingly, we limit ourselves to addressing the Rules and we assume without deciding that complying with the firm's arrangement to share the legal fees with a former colleague and current public servant has no legal impediment and no improper purpose.

6. Rule 1.5 governs the division of legal fees between unaffiliated lawyers. To us, the operative provision is Rule 1.5(h), which says that Rule 1.5(g) "does not prohibit payment to a lawyer formerly associated in a law firm pursuant to" a separation agreement. Rule 1.5(h) is intended to clarify that Rule 1.5(g) – which regulates the division of a legal fee with a lawyer not associated in the firm – is inapplicable when the fee is paid to a formerly affiliated lawyer pursuant to a separation agreement. See Rule 1.5, Cmt. [8] ("Paragraph (g) does not prohibit or regulate division of fees to be received in the future for work done when lawyers were previously associated in a law firm. Paragraph (h) recognizes that this Rule does not prohibit payment to a previously associated lawyer pursuant to a separation or retirement agreement.").

7. We believe that the arrangement the inquirer describes qualifies as a "separation agreement" within the meaning of Rule 1.5(h). Although the inquiry makes no reference to a formal written "separation agreement," nothing in Rule 1.5(h) requires a writing. It appears that the resigning lawyer left in the belief that the firm would honor its prior agreement, whether written or oral, to compensate the lawyer consistent with the firm's standard compensation practice, and it appears that the firm, for purposes of this inquiry, does not say otherwise.

8. On our view, absent circumstances in which a client must consent – and here the Rules do not so require – we see nothing in the Rules that prohibits a law firm from paying a departing lawyer a share of legal fees that the departing lawyer earned in rendering services to a firm's client, in accord with the parties agreement and the firm's standard compensation practice, to the same extent and in the same percentage as if the lawyer were still affiliated with the firm.

CONCLUSION:

9. Unless law prohibits the payment, a law firm may pay a former lawyer in the firm a share of legal fees in matters on which the former lawyer rendered services, in keeping with the parties agreement and the firm's standard compensation practice, in amounts equal to what the former lawyer would have been paid if the former lawyer were still affiliated with the firm, notwithstanding that the former lawyer has since assumed public office.

OPINION 1219 (03/17/2021)

TOPIC: Part-time county attorney, parole violation hearings, conflicts.

DIGEST: A part-time assistant County Attorney whose office does not handle criminal prosecutions can generally represent defendants in State parole violation hearings. A conflict may arise in particular cases, such as where the defendant is adverse to the County Attorney's office in other proceedings or where County employees are involved in the parole violation, and those conflicts may sometimes be unwaivable.

RULES: 1.0(h), 1.7, 1.10(a).

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a part-time assistant County Attorney. The County Attorney is the legal advisor to the County Executive and other officers and employees acting in their official capacity and pursues and defends civil actions by and against the County. The County Attorney's Office does not prosecute criminal actions. The inquirer himself, among other things, advises the sheriff, County probation office and County Executive on administrative matters, represents the County in civil cases, and handles employment related hearings.

2. There are attorneys who report to the County Attorney who handle juvenile justice and Social Services matters, but the inquirer does not engage in that practice. Those attorneys work in a different building from the inquirer and do not save files to shared drives. The inquirer does not have access to those offices or files.

3. The County Attorney wishes to engage the inquirer as an independent contractor to provide assigned County-paid representation to defendants in State parole violation hearings and appeals from those hearings. The parole violation hearings and appeals are held before State administrative tribunals that are part of the State Department of Corrections and Community Supervision, not County judges or officials, and the County generally has no role in those hearings (beyond paying for assigned counsel). While it is conceivable that a violation of a County ordinance could lead to a parole violation, County laws are generally not at issue in those proceedings. The County probation office that the inquirer sometimes advises deals with probation and not parole for State law offenses that would be at issue in the parole violation hearings in which the inquirer would be acting.

QUESTION:

4. May a part-time assistant County Attorney whose office does not handle criminal prosecutions represent defendants in State parole violation hearings?

OPINION:

5. This Committee has long opined that a part-time town or county attorney who has prosecutorial responsibility may not undertake criminal defense work in any court of the State if the attorney has the statutory responsibility to prosecute crimes or offenses under State law. N.Y. State 657 (1993), citing N.Y. State 544 (1982) and earlier opinions. Even in cases in which the part-time municipal attorney has responsibility to prosecute violations of local ordinances, but not State law, our opinions have found criminal defense work permissible only if:

> (2) the defense does not require him to appear before a judicial or other official of the locality he represents, (3) the local government unit by which he is employed, or a violation or construction of one of its ordinances, is not involved, (4) the offense charged is unlike any of those which he prosecutes, and (5) the investigating officers and law enforcement personnel involved are not those with whom he associates as prosecutor.

Id. See also N.Y. State 874 (2011) (citing N.Y. State 544 and 657 as still valid under current N.Y. Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules")). These prohibitions on prosecutors defending criminal cases are ordinarily imputed to the entire county or municipal law office under Rule 1.10(a). N.Y. State 788 (2005) (full-time prosecutor's conflicts imputed to part-time prosecutor); N.Y. State 874 (part-time Social Services attorney cannot represent in a criminal proceeding a respondent in an unrelated Social Services child abuse and neglect proceeding being prosecuted by others in the Social Services office).

6. Where, as here, the part-time municipal attorney has no prosecutorial responsibilities, we have found a similar set of criteria to be applicable:

> It has been held a number of times that a part-time town attorney may practice criminal law without conflict of interest or appearance of impropriety if (1) he has no statutory or other responsibility for prosecution of criminal proceedings on behalf of the town or duties closely related thereto, (2) he does not represent private clients before a town justice in the town he represents, and (3) a violation or construction of an ordinance of that town is not involved.

N.Y. State 315 (1973), modified in N.Y. State 544. See also ABA 34 (1931) ("If the City Attorney's duties and those of his assistants are entirely of a civil character . . ., and he is not required to defend the accused in any court in which a city official performs the duties of judge or magistrate, we find no objection to his conducting the defense of criminal cases.") (quoted in N.Y. State 544).

7. Parole violation hearings are not typical criminal proceedings like those that were at issue in these prior opinions, but we need not consider whether the guidance relating to criminal defense work developed in those opinions would otherwise prohibit parole violation defense work, because (1) the inquirer's practice as a part-time county attorney is entirely civil, as is all of the work of the County Attorney's office; (2) the inquirer would not appear before any County judges or officials in the contemplated parole work; and (3) a violation or construction of County law is not typically at issue in parole violation hearings or appeals. In these circumstances, there is no per se bar on the inquirer conducting State parole violation work.

8. There may be, however, particular cases in which the inquirer would have a conflict. For example, if the conduct of County employees is involved in the parole violation, or the parole violation defendant is a party to a civil case brought by the County Attorney's Office, the inquirer might have a conflict. See N.Y. State 1074 ¶ 8 (2015) (Department of Social Services attorney may accept assignments from county's Assigned Counsel Program except where "the Department is to play any meaningful role in the Family Court proceeding"); N.Y. State 800 ¶¶ 5-6 (2006) (part-time prosecutor may accept assignment to represent indigent persons in Family Court in adjacent county except, inter alia, where prosecutor had worked with law enforcement personnel involved).

9. Where the civil case brought by the County Attorney's Office is pursued by a different unit of the office, as is the case with the child neglect and abuse proceedings, the question would arise whether the conflicts of the County Attorney's Office lawyers who prosecute those proceedings would be imputed to the inquirer. The question of imputation in turn depends on whether the unit handling those proceedings is to be considered to be part of the same "law firm" as the unit in which the inquirer works. See Rules 1.10(a) (imputing conflicts under Rules 1.7 to all lawyers "associated in a firm"), 1.0(h) (definition of "firm" and "law firm" includes "a government law office"). This is "'a fact-intensive inquiry'" that focuses, among other things, on "(1) whether the group presents itself to the public in a way that suggests it is a single firm; . . . (2) whether the lawyers in the group have mutual access to information concerning the clients they serve," and (3) the independence of the lawyers from common supervision. N.Y. State 1210 ¶¶ 6-8 (2020).

10. If a conflict were to arise in a particular case, it may sometimes be waived with the consent, confirmed in writing, of both the individual parole hearing defendant and the County. See N.Y. State 1074 ¶ 10 (noting that where a conflict is consentable, "the informed consent of the Department of Social Services and of the lawyer's client, confirmed in writing, is essential"). Our opinions have long recognized, however, that obtaining informed consent from a client who cannot afford counsel, and may not have effective choice of counsel, presents particular difficulties. See N.Y. State 1105 ¶ 18 (2016) ("when the lawyer seeks consent from a client who is receiving free legal services, the lawyer must consider whether such consent would be freely given"); N.Y. State 490 (1978) (when seeking consent from client of legal aid office, "the staff should be particularly sensitive to any element of submissiveness on the part of their indigent clients; and . . . the staff [must be] satisfied that their clients could refuse to consent without any sense of guilt or embarrassment").

11. In some circumstances, the conflict may by unwaivable. Our prior opinions in this area identify two paradigmatic situations that give rise to unwaivable conflicts. First, while it apparently is unlikely that County employees will appear as witnesses in parole violation hearings, where the relationship with a witness is such that defense counsel could not reasonably conclude he or she could examine the witness as effectively as an unconflicted counsel, no consent can be sought. Rule 1.7(b)(1); see, e.g., N.Y. State 859 ¶ 15 (2011) (citing as example of non-consentable conflict where part-time DSS attorney "might have to impeach the same law enforcement personnel on whom Social Services relies in abuse and neglect proceedings"); N.Y. State 1074 ¶ 10 (same).

12. Second, where a parole violation client is a respondent in a quasi-prosecutorial proceeding—such as a child neglect or child abuse proceeding, if those conflicts are imputed to the inquirer as discussed above—we have held that a part-time prosecutor cannot serve as counsel to the respondent even in an unrelated matter because of the "risk of the public perceiving favoritism at the prosecutor's office." See N.Y. State 788 (2005) (such risk where part-time prosecutor serves as criminal defense counsel "precludes waiver of the conflict"); N.Y. State 859 ¶¶ 13, 16 ("[t]he role of the Social Services attorney when prosecuting child abuse and neglect proceedings is comparable to the role of the DA's office in criminal prosecutions," so part-time Social Services attorney may not represent respondent in an unrelated criminal matter even with consent).

CONCLUSION:

13. A part-time assistant County Attorney whose office does not handle criminal prosecutions can generally represent defendants in State parole violation hearings. A conflict may arise in particular cases, such as where the defendant is adverse to the County Attorney's Office in other proceedings or where County employees are involved in the parole violation, and those conflicts may sometimes be unwaivable.

OPINION 1220 (03/31/2021)

TOPIC: Falsely advertising a partnership among law firms

DIGEST: Separate and independent law firms may not form a PLLC and advertise themselves as members of "ABC Law Group PLLC" because (i) the name would be a false, deceptive or misleading trade name, (ii) the name would be misleading as to the identity of the lawyers practicing under that name, and (iii) the name would falsely imply that the separate firms were practicing law in association with each other.

RULES: 1.0(h), 7.1(c)(2), 7.5(b) & (c)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer proposes to bring together separate law firms into a professional limited liability corporation ("PLLC"), which we shall call "ABC Law Group PLLC." The member law firms in ABC Law Group PLLC will sign an operating agreement that will set forth various terms and conditions of membership. Under this proposal, ABC Law Group PLLC will maintain a website describing the services provided by the group as a whole and offering a profile of each separate member firm. Each firm's profile will be linked to the member firm's own website. Visitors to the ABC Law Group PLLC website who click on a link to a member firm's website will be advised that they are leaving the ABC Law Group PLLC website.

2. Each individual PLLC member's letterhead (and other written materials, including engagement letters) will include the words "Member Law Firm" under the name and trademark of ABC Law Group LLC. Client engagement letters will be between the client and the member law firm, not ABC Law Group PLLC. All billing will be done by the member law firms. Member firms may collaborate with each other, and each attorney in a member firm must be insured under a member law firm's malpractice policy.

QUESTION:

3. Is ABC Law Group PLLC a permissible name? Will ABC Law Group PLLC be considered a "law firm" for the purpose of conflict-of-interest rules?

OPINION:

4. Under Rule 7.5(b) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct ("Rules") as amended effective June 24, 2020, lawyers are permitted to practice under a trade name so long as the name is not false, deceptive or misleading. See N.Y. State 1207 (2020). Here, we have no reason to conclude that, in isolation, the "ABC" portion of the proposed PLLC name violates Rule 7.5(b). Rather, it is the combination of "Law Group" and "PLLC" in the name that violates Rule 7.5(b). This is so because Limited Liability Company Law §1203(b) requires that all members of a PLLC must be individuals who are professionally licensed in New York and who practice their profession within the PLLC.

5. Thus, the combination of "PLLC" together with "ABC Law Group" necessarily implies that it is formed to practice law and that the members of the PLLC are associated for that purpose. As the inquiry makes clear, however, that is not the case. Rather, the PLLC members are not practicing law within the PLLC, the PLLC does not enter into engagement agreements with clients, and the PLLC does not bill clients or undertake legal work on their behalf. Accordingly, by implying that the members of the PLLC are associated in the practice of law when they are not, the use of ABC Law Group PLLC as a firm name violates Rule 7.5(b)(1), which provides that a lawyer or law firm shall not practice under a "false, deceptive or misleading trade name" and Rule 7.5(b)(3), which provides that a lawyer or law firm shall not practice under, "a name that is misleading as to the identity of the lawyer or lawyers practicing under such name."

6. In addition, Rule 7.5(c) provides:

> Lawyers shall not hold themselves out as having a partnership with one or more lawyers unless they are in fact partners.

7. A law "partnership" is a form of law firm. The term "law firm" is defined in Rule 1.0(h) as follows:

> (h) "Firm" or "law firm" includes, but is not limited to, a lawyer or lawyers in a law partnership, professional corporation, sole proprietorship or other association authorized to practice law; or lawyers employed in a qualified legal assistance organization, a government law office, or the legal department of a corporation or other organization.

8. Comment [5] to Rule 7.5 builds on Rule 1.0(h) by elaborating on the prohibition against misrepresenting the business relationship among lawyers. Comment [5] states:

> Lawyers may not imply or hold themselves out as practicing together in one firm when they are not a "firm" as defined in Rule 1.0(h) because to do so would be false and misleading. In particular, it is misleading for lawyers to hold themselves out as having a partnership with one or more lawyers unless they are in fact partners. It is also misleading for lawyers to hold themselves out as being counsel, associates, or other affiliates of a law firm if that is not a fact, or to hold themselves out as partners, counsel or associates if they only share offices. Likewise, law firms may not claim to be affiliated with other law firms if that is not a fact. [Emphasis added.]

9. Thus, lawyers who share office space but have no professional association with each other may not use a designation such as the "777 Lawyers Group" because that would deceive the public about the business status of the lawyers. See N.Y. City 82-44 (1982). (Opinion 82-44 also noted that the designation "777 Lawyers Group" was at that time an "impermissible trade name" under the predecessor to Rule 7.5(b) – but that objection would not apply today.)

10. Nor would our conclusion change if the proposed PLLC and its website were viewed merely as a vehicle for joint advertising. Rule 7.1(c)(2) provides that an advertisement shall not:

> (2) include the portrayal of a fictitious law firm, the use of a fictitious name to refer to lawyers not associated together in a law firm, or otherwise imply that lawyers are associated in a law firm if that is not the case.

11. Because we have determined that establishing an association of separate law firms in a PLLC to be named "ABC Law Group PLLC" would violate Rules 7.1(c)(2), 7.5(b), and 7.5(c), we do not reach the second issue posed by inquirer, as to whether that association would be deemed to constitute a single law firm for conflict of interest purposes. However, law firms forming associations should be aware that some forms of association among separate firms may be deemed to be a single law firm, and therefore all member firms may be required to check for conflicts with all other firms. See N.Y. State 876 (2011) ("Conflicts of interest will be imputed to all lawyers in all firms with which a lawyer is associated as a partner, associate or of counsel"); N.Y. City 2000-4 (2000) ("affiliated" attorneys or law firms "must consider themselves as one unit for conflict clearing purposes").

CONCLUSION:

12. Separate and independent law firms may not form a PLLC and advertise themselves as members of "ABC Law Group PLLC" because (i) the name would be a false, deceptive or misleading trade name, (ii) the name would be misleading as to the identity of the lawyers practicing under that name, and (iii) the name would falsely imply that the separate firms were practicing law in association with each other.

OPINION 1221 (03/31/2021)

TOPIC: Lawyer reaching out to former clients

DIGEST: A lawyer who has changed law firms may contact clients she represented for estate planning purposes at her previous firm, may inform or remind these former clients that she has joined a new firm, and may offer to review their estate planning. Such communications are not advertisements and therefore are not subject to the advertising provisions in Rule 7.1 or the solicitation provisions in Rule 7.3, but they are subject to the more general provisions in Rule 8.4(c) forbidding misrepresentation.

RULES: 1.0(a), 7.1, 7.3, 8.4(c)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer formerly worked at a law firm as an attorney practicing in the elder law area. After notifying the firm that she would be leaving to join another firm, the inquirer sent notice of her impending departure to approximately 1,100 of her current and former clients, most of whom were elderly or disabled. That notice, approved by the firm she was leaving, included a "Client File Retention/Transfer Instruction" form, also approved by the firm, that provided the clients with three options: (1) remain at the inquirer's old firm; (2) follow the inquirer to the new firm and have the client file and unused client funds transferred to the new firm; or (3) request that the file and unused client funds be returned to the client.

2. Shortly after the inquirer's departure, a number of clients who she had been representing advised her that they wished to follow the inquirer to her new firm, and they provided the inquirer with the appropriately completed and signed Client File Retention/Transfer Instruction making that election. The inquirer also received word from dozens of other former clients who advised her that they, similarly, had elected to follow the inquirer to her new firm but had sent their completed and signed Client File Retention/Transfer Instruction to her former firm.

3. The inquirer states that despite her repeated requests over a period of several months, her former firm has not provided her with a list of the clients who have notified the former firm of their election to follow the inquirer to her new firm, and her former firm also has not forwarded their files or transferred their funds. The inquirer notes that many of her elderly or disabled former clients do not have the technical capability to locate her or her new law firm through an online search.

QUESTION:

4. May the inquirer reach out and contact directly the clients she represented at her former firm to remind them that she has joined a new firm and to offer them the opportunity to review and update their estate plans?

OPINION:

5. We note at the outset that this inquiry raises issues of contract and partnership law. Our opinion does not address those issues because they are questions of law and are, therefore, beyond the jurisdiction of this Committee. See, e.g., N.Y. State 1134 ¶ 6 (2017). Furthermore, the Committee only addresses the conduct of an inquirer. Therefore, this opinion does not address the conduct of the lawyers in inquirer's former firm.

6. As a purely ethical matter, the inquirer may reach out and directly contact the clients she represented at her former firm to remind them that she has joined a new firm and to offer them the opportunity to review and update their estate plans. This communication would not violate the rules governing advertising and solicitation because it would be neither an "advertisement" nor a "solicitation" as those terms are defined in the Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules").

7. The term "advertisement" is defined in Rule 1.0(a) as follows:

> (a) "Advertisement" means any public or private communication made by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm about that lawyer or law firm's services, the primary purpose of which is for the retention of the lawyer or law firm. It does not include communications to existing clients or other lawyers.

8. Although Rule 1.0(a) excludes "existing clients" but not former clients, the Rules have been interpreted to exclude former clients as well in some circumstances. Rule 7.1, Cmt. [7] says: "Communications to former clients that are germane to the earlier representation are not considered to be advertising." See also N.Y. State 1129 ¶ 8 (2017); N.Y. State 848 ¶ 11 (2011); see also N.Y. County 748 (2015); N.Y. City Bar 2015-7 (2015); see generally Rule 7.1, Cmt. [6] ("Not all communications made by lawyers about the lawyer or the law firm's services are advertising.").

9. Nor would the inquirer's communication to her former clients be a "solicitation." Because "[a]ll solicitations . . . are advertisements with certain additional characteristics . . . [b]y definition, a communication that is not an advertisement is not a solicitation." Rule 7.3, Cmt. [1]. Therefore, communications by a lawyer to former clients that are germane to the lawyer's earlier representation of such former clients are not subject to the advertising provisions in Rule 7.1 or the solicitation provisions in Rule 7.3. See N.Y. State 1129 ¶ 18. In any event, even if Rule 7.3 applied, it expressly does not prohibit solicitations to a former client. See Rule 7.3(a) ("A lawyer shall not engage in solicitation: (1) by in-person or telephone contact, or by real-time or interactive computer-accessed communication unless the recipient is a close friend, relative, former client or existing client") (emphasis added).

10. In N.Y. County 679 (1990), the Committee specifically addressed the word "germane," stating:

> [T]he word must be given its ordinary meaning of "closely related" or "relevant". See Random House Dictionary (Unabridged ed. 1967). We believe employment or advice may be closely related because it concerns the prior matter or because the subject matter or issues are the same.

11. The inquirer's communications to her former clients, of course, must be truthful. As Rule 8.4(c) states: "A lawyer or law firm shall not . . . engage in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation." See also Comment [6] to Rule 7.1 ("All communications by lawyers, whether subject to the special rules governing lawyer advertising or not, are governed by the general rule that lawyers may not engage in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation, or knowingly make a material false statement of fact or law."); N.Y. State 1184 ¶ 11 (2020).

12. The inquirer's proposed communications, which are germane to her earlier representations of the former clients she seeks to contact, are therefore permissible, and are not governed by the rules governing advertising or solicitation, but are subject to the more general provisions of Rule 8.4(c).

CONCLUSION:

13. A lawyer who has changed law firms may contact clients she represented for estate planning purposes at her previous firm, may inform or remind these former clients that she has joined a new firm, and may offer to review their estate planning. Such communications are not advertisements and therefore are not subject either to the advertising provisions in Rule 7.1 or to the solicitation provisions in Rule 7.3, but the communications are subject to the more general prohibition against "misrepresentation" in Rule 8.4(c).

OPINION 1222 (04/12/2021)

TOPIC: Non-legal services; mediation; unauthorized practice of law

DIGEST: Lawyers may not jointly own a mediation business with nonlawyers if the mediation business employs lawyers to provide legal services to mediation clients. Lawyers may jointly own a mediation business with nonlawyers if the mediation business does not employ any lawyers and provides only nonlegal services. Lawyers who own a mediationbusiness may accept referrals from it, subject to certain restrictions, and may enter into anon-exclusive reciprocal referral agreement with the mediation business. The Rules of Professional Conduct will apply to the mediation business where a mediation client couldreasonably believe that the mediation services are the subject of a client-lawyer relationship and the lawyers who co-own the mediation business do not provide the mediation client with a written disclaimer stating that the mediation services are not legalservices and that the protection of a client-lawyer relationship does not exist with respectto the mediation services.

RULES: 1.7(a)(2) & (b), 1.12(b), 2.4, 5.5(a), 5.7(a)

FACTS:

1. The inquirers are a law firm ("Law Firm") and three partners in that law firm. Law Firm currently offers three types of services: (i) divorce litigation, (ii) collaborative law, and (iii) mediation services.

2. The inquirers believe that Law Firm's mediation services are not attractive because manyclients and potential clients are reluctant to use lawyers as mediators. However, the inquirers havean opportunity to purchase a controlling interest in a divorce mediation business ("Mediation Business"). They plan to own the Mediation Business together with an experienced, respected mediator who is not a lawyer.

3. The Mediation Business and Law Firm will occupy separate locations and will not use theLaw Firm name or the names of any of the inquiring law partners in the Mediation Business practice Following a successful mediation, the Mediation Business might employ lawyers to drafta separation agreement and related documents to effectuate the divorce on the terms agreed by theparties.

QUESTIONS:

4. The inquirers pose five questions:

- May a mediation business co-owned by lawyers and non-lawyers employ lawyers to provide post-mediation legal services to the mediating parties?
- May lawyers and non-lawyers co-own a divorce mediation business?
- May a law firm accept referrals from a mediation business partly owned by partners in the law firm?

- May a law firm and a mediation business enter into a non-exclusive mutual referral agreement?

- How does Rule 5.7 apply to services offered by nonlawyer mediators at a mediation business co-owned by lawyers?

OPINION:

May a mediation business co-owned by lawyers and non-lawyers employ lawyers to provide post-mediation legal services to the mediating parties?

5. Rule 5.4 ("Professional Independence of a Lawyer") of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") governs this question. Rule 5.4(a), (b) and (d) provide, in pertinent part:

> (a) A lawyer or law firm shall not share legal fees with a nonlawyer . . . .
> (b) A lawyer shall not form a partnership with a nonlawyer if any of the activitiesof the partnership consist of the practice of law. . . .
> (d) A lawyer shall not practice with or in the form of an entity authorized to practicelaw for profit, if:
> > (1) a nonlawyer owns any interest therein, except that a fiduciary representative of the estate of a lawyer may hold the stock or interest of thelawyer for a reasonable time during administration;
> > (2) a nonlawyer is a member, corporate director or officer thereof oroccupies a position of similar responsibility in any form of association otherthan a corporation; or
> > (3) a nonlawyer has the right to direct or control the professional judgmentof a lawyer.

6. Under Rule 5.4, the Mediation Business may not employ lawyers to provide legal servicesas proposed. First, Rule 5.4(a) prohibits a lawyer from sharing legal fees with a nonlawyer, so anyrevenues from the legal services could not be shared with the nonlawyers. Second, even if the legalfees could be segregated from the fees for mediation services, or even if the Mediation Business did not charge fees for the legal services, the Mediation Business would still be barred from offering legal services because Rule 5.4(b) prohibits lawyers from jointly owning a business withnonlawyers "if any of the activities of the partnership consist of the practice of law." Third, any lawyer employed by the Mediation Business would be in violation of Rule 5.4(d), which prohibitsa lawyer from practicing with "an entity authorized to practice law for profit."

7. We also direct the inquirers' attention to N.Y. Judiciary Law § 495, which states: "No corporation or voluntary association shall (a) practice or appear as an attorney-at-law for any person in any court in this state . . . (c) . . . or to render legal services or advice, nor (d) furnish attorneysor counsel, nor (e) render legal services of any kind in actions or proceedings of any nature or in any other way or manner . . . .” We do not have authority to construe Section 495, but the inquirersshould be aware of it.

May lawyers and non-lawyers co-own a divorce mediation business?

8. The answer to this question depends on whether mediation services constitute the practice of law.

9. If providing mediation services constitutes “the practice of law,” then the same provisions that prohibited the arrangement addressed in the first question would come into play. Fees earned by the Mediation Business would constitute legal fees that would be shared with the nonlawyers, in violation of Rule 5.4(a); lawyers would be in a partnership (or other entity) with nonlawyers where some of the activities of the partnership would consist of the practice of law, in violation of Rule 5.4(b); and a nonlawyer would own an interest in “an entity authorized to practice law for profit,” in violation of Rule 5.4(d).

10. However, in N.Y. State 1026 (2014), we said: “Mediation is a ‘nonlegal service’ as defined by Rule 5.7(c) . . . .” See also Rule 2.4 (implying a distinction between legal services, on one hand, and mediation services, on the other hand); N.Y. State 1178 (2019) (“Only when a lawyer-mediator engages in services beyond providing neutral services, such as filing papers in court, does the lawyer-mediator cross the line into providing legal services”). Thus, the answer to the second question is that lawyers and non-lawyers may jointly own a business that provides only mediation services and does not provide any legal services. In this regard, we express no opinion whether mediators who prepare a separation agreement and related divorce documents are engaged in the unauthorized practice of law as that is a question of law that we lack jurisdiction to answer.

May a law firm accept referrals from a mediation business partly owned by the partners in the law firm?

11. The Rules of Professional Conduct contain no per se prohibition against accepting referrals. However, when the Mediation Business refers clients who have successfully mediated their divorce to Law Firm, inquirers may have a conflict of interest under Rule 1.7(a)(2) because of theirownership interest in the Mediation Business. Rule 1.7(a)(2) provides:

> (a) Except as provided in paragraph (b), a lawyer shall not represent a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that . . .
> > (2) there is a significant risk that the lawyer’s professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer’s own financial, business, property or other personal interests.

12. If a divorce mediation client expresses unhappiness or second thoughts about the process or results of a “successful” mediation (despite having agreed to the settlement terms), or if an individual inquirer sees reason to question the mediation settlement, the inquirer’s ownership interest might create a “significant risk” of adversely affecting the inquirer’s professional judgmenton behalf of the client. Whether such a risk exists will require a case-by-case analysis, and if doesexist it will be imputed to all lawyers “associated in” the firm. See Rule 1.10(a). If there is a conflict under Rule

1.7(a)(2), then the inquirers will need to determine whether the conflict is consentable (i.e., waivable) under Rule 1.7(b)(1) and, if so, obtain the client's "informed consent,confirmed in writing" under Rule 1.7(b)(4).

May a law firm and a mediation business enter into a non-exclusive mutual referralagreement?

13. Subject to various conditions, Rule 5.8, allows contractual relationships between lawyers and certain nonlegal professionals (such as accountants, social workers, land surveyors, engineersand architects – see 22 NYCRR §§ 1205.3). Rule 5.8(c), however, includes this exception to its application:

> (c) This Rule shall not apply to relationships consisting solely of non-exclusive reciprocal referral agreements or understandings between a lawyer or law firm and a nonlegal professional or nonlegal professional service firm. [Emphasisadded.]

14. Comment [4] to Rule 5.8 elaborates on this language by saying, "A lawyer may enter intosuch an arrangement only if it is nonexclusive on both sides, so that both the lawyer and the nonlawyer are free to refer clients to others if that is in the best interest of those clients." Thus, in N.Y. State 755 (2002) (which construed the Code predecessor to Rule 5.8), we said that non- exclusive reciprocal referral relationships between lawyers and nonlawyers were permissible evenif the nonlawyers are not "professionals," as long as the lawyers do not (among other things) pay for the recommendations. See also N.Y. State 1155 (2018) (concluding that Rule 5.8 "by its terms"does not apply to non-exclusive referral relationship between estate planning lawyer and investment firm); N.Y. State 976 ¶ 19 (2013) (lawyer or law firm may not maintain an "exclusive"contractual arrangement with a company owned by nonlawyers). Accordingly, inquirers may enterinto a non-exclusive mutual referral agreement with the Mediation Business as long as they do notpay for those referrals.

15. What is the meaning of "non-exclusive"? Basically, inquirers may not agree that they will refer clients only and exclusively to the Mediation Business, because in some instances a client of Law Firm may be better served by a referral to a different mediation business. Nor may inquirersagree to accept every referral from the Mediation Business. Sometimes, inquirers will have to turndown referrals because they have a conflict of interest or are too busy or lack legal competence tohandle to handle a particular referral. And of course inquirers may not refer their clients to the Mediation Business if mediation is not an appropriate approach in the particular client's matter.

16. Thus, a non-exclusive reciprocal referral relationship is essentially an agreement to consider referring a client to the nonlawyer professional (here, the Mediation Business), or to consider accepting a referral from the nonlawyer professional. It cannot be a promise to refer everyclient to the Mediation Business or to accept every referral from the Mediation Business.

How does Rule 5.7 apply to services offered by nonlawyer mediators at a mediationbusiness co-owned by lawyers?

17. When nonlegal services are being provided not by a law firm but rather by a nonlegal entity owned by lawyers, the gateway governing provision is Rule 5.7(a)(3), which provides:

> (3) A lawyer or law firm that is an owner . . . of . . . an entity that the lawyer or law firm knows to be providing nonlegal services to a person is subject to these Rules with respect to the nonlegal services if the person receiving the services could reasonably believe that the nonlegal services are the subject of a client-lawyer relationship. [Emphasis added.]

18. Applying Rule 5.7(a)(3) here, we know that each of the inquiring lawyers is an "owner" ofthe Mediation Business and that the Mediation Business is "providing nonlegal services." Thus, the question is whether persons receiving the mediation services "could reasonably believe" that such services "are the subject of a client-lawyer relationship."

19. In the present inquiry there are several factors which appear to support the conclusion thata client of the Mediation Business could not reasonably believe that she or he was receiving legalservices. The Mediation Business and Law Firm offices are separate, their names are different, andthere are no lawyers actually providing mediation services. On the other hand, divorce mediationarises in the context of a legal dispute and – unlike many types of disputes – divorce can ultimatelybe resolved only through the court system. Divorce mediators also often need to explain basic legalprinciples of divorce, such as equitable distribution, joint custody, and maintenance. In addition,as many divorce mediators are, in fact, lawyers, divorcing spouses may not appreciate the difference between a mediator who is a lawyer and one who is not a lawyer. There are doubtless additional relevant factors that may arise in a particular case, including the scope and precise language of any oral or written disclaimer provided by the mediators that they are not providing any legal services.

20. If after weighing all relevant factors, a person receiving divorce mediation services could not reasonably believe that the nonlegal services are the subject of a client-lawyer relationship, theinquiry would be at end. If, however, a person receiving divorce mediation services could reasonably believe that the nonlegal services are the subject of a client-lawyer relationship, compliance with Rule 5.7(a)(4) by the inquirers would be required. Rule 5.7(a)(4) provides:

> (4) For purposes of paragraphs (a)(2) and (a)(3), it will be presumed that the person receiving nonlegal services believes the services to be the subject of a client-lawyerrelationship unless the lawyer or law firm has advised the person receiving the services in writing that the services are not legal services and that the protection ofa client-lawyer relationship does not exist with respect to the nonlegal services, orif the interest of the lawyer or law firm in the entity providing nonlegal services is*de minimis*. [Emphasis added.]

21. In other words, once it is determined that a client of the Mediation Business could reasonably believe that the nonlegal mediation services are legal services, it will be "presumed" that the client actually believes that the services are legal services unless the lawyer's interest in the Mediation Business is "de minimis" (apparently not the case here), or the inquirers who co- own the Mediation Business provide a written disclaimer stating that "the services are not legal services and that the protection of a client-lawyer relationship does not exist with respect to the nonlegal services." The requirement that, in order to rebut the presumption arising under subparagraph (a)(3), the lawyer-inquirers must provide this disclaimer pursuant to subparagraph (a)(4), cannot be avoided by any earlier disclaimer given by a non-lawyer mediator where the balance of factors, notwithstanding the non-lawyer mediator's disclaimer, tips in favor ofconcluding that the client could reasonably believe that the mediation services are the subject of aclient-lawyer relationship under subparagraph (a)(3).

22. Lawyer-owners of a nonlegal entity providing nonlegal services, like the MediationBusiness, are not required to provide this written disclaimer, but if they do not, then the Rules of Professional Conduct apply to the nonlegal mediation services, essentially as if the nonlegal mediation services were being provided by lawyers. Here, for example, if the inquirers do not provide the disclaimer specified in subparagraph (a)(4) to rebut the presumption that arises undersubparagraph (a)(3), the Mediation Business will be required to abide by Rules 1.7, 1.8, 1.9, 1.18,and other Rules governing conflicts of interest (including Rule 1.10(e), which will require the Mediation Business to check each new mediation engagement for conflicts with Law Firm's clients), and must abide by Rule 1.6 regarding the duty of confidentiality.

CONCLUSION:

23. Lawyers may not jointly own a mediation business with nonlawyers if the mediation business employs lawyers to provide legal services to mediation clients. Lawyers may jointly owna mediation business with nonlawyers if the mediation business does not employ any lawyers andprovides only nonlegal services. Lawyers who own a mediation business may accept referrals fromit, subject to certain restrictions, and may enter into a non-exclusive reciprocal referral agreementwith the mediation business. The Rules of Professional Conduct will apply to the mediation business where a mediation client could reasonably believe that the mediation services are the subject of a client-lawyer relationship and the lawyers who co-own the mediation business do notprovide the mediation client with a written disclaimer stating that the mediation services are not legal services and that the protection of a client-lawyer relationship does not exist with respect tothe mediation services.

TOPIC: Dual practice; Rental of office space

DIGEST: Renting law office space for lawful purposes is a permitted nonlegal business for a lawyer. Where a lawyer who owns a nonlegal services business is providing nonlegal services to persons who are not clients, Rule 5.7(a)(3) provides that the nonlegal services entity will be subject to the Rules by virtue of Rule 5.7 only if the person receiving the services could reasonably believe that the nonlegal services are the subject of a client-lawyer relationship.

RULES: 5.7(a)(3) and (4), 7.1(h)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer plans to establish a Professional Limited Liability Company ("PLLC") or a Professional Corporation ("PC") to operate a "Virtual Office Suite" in the first floor of his home. The business would have a reception desk; ten or more independent workstations with stand-alone, non-networked computers for each user; high speed internet access; separate, secure paper filing systems for each user; and one or more shared conference rooms. The inquirer also states that the business would comply with all aspects of Section 470 of the New York Judiciary Law, which provides an exception to the requirement that lawyers who practice New York law must be resident in New York, if the lawyers reside in contiguous states and keep "an office for the transaction of law business" in this State.

QUESTION:

2. May a New York lawyer rent space to other lawyers as a nonlegal business, and provide them with facilities and equipment to operate their separate law practices?

OPINION:

3. We assume for this opinion that the persons who might rent space from the inquirer are lawyers who are not also legal clients of the inquirer.

4. The jurisdiction of this Committee is limited to questions of legal ethics. We do not give opinions on matters of law. Thus, we cannot opine on whether it would be legally permissible to run a nonlegal business in a PLLC. We note, however, that Limited Liability Company Law § 1203(a) authorizes one or more professionals to form a Professional Limited Liability Company "for the purpose of rendering the professional service or services as such professionals are authorized to practice," which would not appear to be the case here. Similarly, we cannot interpret Judiciary Law §470.

5. Although the inquirer refers to his business as rental of "virtual law offices," we are not adopting this terminology. We do not believe there is a generally accepted definition of a "virtual law office." In N.Y. State 1025 (2015), this Committee defined a "virtual law office" as meaning solely an online presence. Compare N.Y. City 2019-2 (which defines a virtual law office, for purposes of that opinion, as a facility that offers business services and meeting and work spaces to lawyers on an "as needed" basis and where the lawyers do not have a dedicated office space, but rather share all space and amenities with other subscribers). The question of what constitutes a physical office for purposes of Judiciary Law §470, as opposed to a mail drop or internet office, is a question of law. In this opinion, we will therefore describe the inquirer's proposal as renting office space and amenities.

Lawyers Operating a Nonlegal Business

6. The rental of office space and amenities – even space to be used by lawyers for the practice of law – is a nonlegal business. The responsibilities of lawyers who provide nonlegal services is governed by Rule 5.7 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"). We have issued several recent opinions on lawyers who also engage in a nonlegal business. See, e.g., N.Y. State 1157 (2018) (engineering), N.Y. State 1155 (2018) (financial planning), N.Y. State 1101 (2016) (real estate brokerage), N.Y. State 915 (2012) (nonlegal consulting). The issue under Rule 5.7 is whether the nonlegal services are not distinct from legal services and thus should be subject to the Rules. Where a lawyer who owns a nonlegal services business is providing nonlegal services to persons who are not clients, Rule 5.7(a)(3) provides that the nonlegal services entity will be subject to the Rules as a result of Rule 5.7 only "if the person receiving the services could reasonably believe that the nonlegal services are the subject of a client-lawyer relationship." (Emphasis supplied.) Rule 5.7(a)(4) creates a presumption that the recipient has such a belief, unless the lawyer has advised the person receiving the nonlegal services in writing that the services are not legal services and that the protection of the client-lawyer relationship does not exist with respect to the nonlegal services. However, in N.Y. State 1222 (2021), we said that presumption does not go into effect until, after weighing all relevant factors under Rule 5.7(a)(3), a person receiving the nonlegal services could reasonably believe that the nonlegal services are the subject of a client-lawyer relationship. In this case we think it unlikely that lawyers renting office space in accordance with the arrangement described by the inquirer could reasonably believe that the rental of office space creates a client-lawyer relationship with the inquirer. Consequently, we do not believe that the Rule 5.7(a)(4) disclaimer is necessary on the facts here.

Office Sharing Arrangements

7. We will not opine here on the conduct of lawyers who might rent space from the inquirer. We have, however, previously opined on the ethical responsibilities of lawyers who share office space, including their responsibility for maintaining confidentiality. See N.Y. State 1102 (2016). In addition, Comment [2] to Rule 1.0 (the definition of firm) notes that "a group of lawyers could be regarded as a firm for purposes of determining whether a conflict of interest exists . . . ."

New York-Resident Lawyers and Judiciary Law § 470

8. A New York resident lawyer may have a nonpermanent office without implicating Judiciary Law § 470. For example, a New York lawyer may work out of his or her residence in New York, but not want to meet clients there or use a home address for business. A New York resident lawyer who spends most of his or her time in court may not need an office other than to meet clients from time to time. A New York resident lawyer may have an office in one New York town but want to explore setting up a location in another New York town. In each of these circumstances, an office that the lawyer does not occupy full-time enables the lawyer, at relatively small expense, to meet both client needs and the lawyer's own law practice management goals.

Section 470 and New York-Admitted Lawyers Not Resident Here

9. The principal issue facing New York-admitted lawyers who are not resident in New York but want to practice here is Section 470 of the Judiciary Law. Section 470, which was adopted at a time when the law provided that only a New York resident could practice law in New York, provides that a person admitted to practice in New York whose office for the transaction of law business is in New York may practice as an attorney even though he or she lives in an adjoining state. In 1979, the New York Court of Appeals struck down the residency requirement of Section 470 on the grounds that it violated the Constitutional Privileges and Immunities Clause. In re Gordon, 48 N.Y.2d 266 (1979). The New York legislature, however, did not amend the statute to fix the problem. New York courts therefore have interpreted Section 470 to apply to all non-resident members of the New York bar. See Lichtenstein v. Emerson, 251 A.D.2d 64 (1st Dep't 1998).

10. In 2015, as part of a federal case challenging the Constitutionality of Judiciary Law § 470, the New York Court of Appeals was asked by the Second Circuit Court of Appeals what constituted an office for the transaction of law business in New York for purposes of the statute. The Court of Appeals opined that the statute required nonresident attorneys to maintain a physical office in New York. See Schoenefeld v. State, 25 N.Y.3d 22 (2015). Although the Court was urged to read Section 470 as requiring only some type of physical presence for the receipt of service, such as an address or the appointment of an agent within the State, the Court of Appeals explained that the phrase "for the transaction of law business" makes this interpretation of the law much less plausible. Nevertheless, the Second Circuit held that Section 470 did not violate the Privileges and Immunities Clause. See Schoenefeld v. Schneiderman, 821 F.3d 273 (2d Cir. 2016).

11. The Second Circuit's conclusion has directed new attention to the purpose of Judiciary Law § 470. See Report of the NYSBA Working Group on Judiciary Law § 470 (October 8, 2018). (The report notes that the Legislature adopted Section 470 because it believed a New York office was necessary so that the non-resident lawyer could be served with process. But the Working Group concluded that non-resident attorneys are subject to disciplinary proceedings within New York State, because service could be made on the Clerk of the Appellate Division based on the designation required at the time of admission and in biennial registrations. The Association's CPLR Committee also determined that a non-resident attorney who practices in New York and who is a defendant in a New York legal matter may be served outside New York.) In January 2019, the New York State Bar Association adopted a resolution calling for the repeal of Section 470. The President of the Bar Association stated: "In a digital era where attorneys across the street and around the world are just a click away on their computer or smart phone, an antiquated rule from over a century ago requiring a physical office in the state no longer serves any purpose." Although bills have been introduced in both houses of the New York legislature that would repeal Judiciary Law § 470, see N.Y. Assembly Bill A5895 (Weprin 2021), N.Y. Senate Bill S700 (Hoylman 2021), no action has been taken on them. Thus, Section 470, as interpreted by the courts, is still the law of New York.[1]

1 Committee Note dated May 19, 2021: On May 12, 2021, the same day that this opinion was released, the New York State Senate adopted S700. The bill has been referred to the Assembly Judiciary and Rules Committees.

Effect of New York Ethical Rules

12. In N.Y. State 1025 (2014), i.e. before the Second Circuit's Schoenefeld decision, we considered the requirement of Rule 7.1(h) that an attorney's advertisement must include the attorney's "principal law office address." In an earlier opinion, we had interpreted this requirement as precluding a "mail drop" as the attorney's sole address, but instead said it must be a physical office at which the attorney is located. See N.Y. State 964 (2013). However, in N.Y. State 1025, we concluded that it was incorrect to interpret the attorney advertising rule as an independent mandate for attorneys who advertise to maintain a physical office address. Accordingly, we held that a lawyer could use a virtual law office address for Rule 7.1(h) purposes, as long as the lawyer complies with all applicable laws and Rules.

13. In 2019, i.e., after the Second Circuit's opinion in Schoenefeld, the New York City Bar's Ethics Committee issued Formal Opinion 2019-2. In it, the Committee concluded that any law office listed on attorney advertising under Rule 7.1(h) must qualify as a law office under Judiciary Law § 470 because the purpose of the two requirements is the same – to disclose an office where the lawyer is present and available for contact, and where personal service or delivery of legal papers could be effected. The opinion concluded that a lawyer may use the street address of a virtual law office as the lawyer's principal office address for the purposes of Rule 7.1(h) as long as the virtual law office qualifies as an office for the transaction of law business under Section 470. It also concluded that a lawyer could use a virtual law office address on letterhead, business cards and the lawyer's website, as long as such use is not misleading under the circumstances. The Committee noted that it could not express an opinion on compliance with Section 470, which is a question of law. But it also noted that the virtual law office in that opinion, like the proposed virtual law office here, included a physical facility at which a lawyer could meet with clients and receive service of process.

14. In light of the continued validity of Judiciary Law § 470, we confirm our opinion in N.Y. State 1025: A non-resident attorney who is admitted to practice in New York and who practices New York law must have an office in New York that meets the minimum requirements of Section 470, but we express no opinion as to what Section 470 requires.

CONCLUSION:

15. Renting law office space for lawful purposes is a permitted nonlegal business for a New York lawyer. Where a lawyer who owns a nonlegal services business is providing nonlegal services to persons who are not clients, Rule 5.7(a)(3) provides that the nonlegal services entity will be subject to the Rules by virtue of Rule 5.7 only if the person receiving the services could reasonably believe that the nonlegal services are the subject of a client-lawyer relationship. In N.Y. State 1025, we allowed a lawyer legally practicing in New York to use a virtual law office address for Rule 7.1(h) purposes. But the principal issue facing New York-admitted lawyers who are not resident in New York is compliance with Judiciary Law § 470. That is a legal issue on which we do not opine.

OPINION 1224 (06/03/2021)

TOPIC: Conflicts of interest; diminished capacity.

DIGEST: When a lawyer is jointly representing two clients as joint purchasers in a transaction and one of them no longer wishes to proceed, the lawyer cannot continue to represent both clients without violating Rule 1.7, which prohibits lawyers from jointly representing clients with differing interests. That one of the clients has diminished capacity does not alter this conclusion.

RULES: Rules 1.7; 1.14

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is an attorney who has known his clients, a husband ("H") and wife ("W"), for over a decade. H and W entered a contract to jointly purchase real property ("Transaction 1"). Shortly afterwards, H was involuntarily committed for a period of time to a psychiatric facility. No petition to appoint a guardian for H was subsequently filed. H wants to move forward with Transaction 1, but W now does not.

2. Separately, just prior to his involuntary commitment, H set up an LLC, with both H and W as members, with the intent that the LLC would buy a second property ("Transaction 2"). No contract has been signed, but H wants to move forward with Transaction 2 while W now does not.

3. W holds a power of attorney ("POA") for H which confers upon W the power to act on behalf of H with respect to real estate transactions, and W has instructed inquirer both to terminate the contract in Transaction 1 and to discontinue negotiations toward a contract in Transaction 2. The inquirer asks if he may ethically follow W's instructions.

QUESTION:

4. Where a husband and wife who are joint clients provide conflicting instructions whether or not to proceed with real estate transactions in which they each have a financial interest, where the wife holds a power of attorney for the husband, and where there is reason to believe that the husband may have diminished capacity, may an attorney follow the instructions of the wife and act contrary to the stated wishes of the husband?

OPINION:

5. Our analysis focuses on Rule 1.7 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"). Under Rule 1.7(a)(1), a lawyer may not represent a client (or clients) if "a reasonable lawyer would conclude" that "the representation will involve the lawyer in representing differing interests," unless the conflict is consentable and the lawyer obtains each affected client's informed consent pursuant to Rule 1.7(b). "Differing interests" are defined in Rule 1.0(f) "to include every interest that will adversely affect either the judgment or the loyalty of a lawyer to a client, whether it be a conflicting, inconsistent, diverse or other interest."

6. Here, it is abundantly clear that clients H and W now have differing interests. Rule 1.7 therefore prohibits the inquirer from representing them both unless they each give their informed consent, confirmed in writing. See Comment [4] to Rule 1.7 ("If a conflict arises after representation has been undertaken, the lawyer ordinarily must withdraw from the representation unless the lawyer has obtained the informed consent of the client under the conditions of paragraph (b)").

7. Implicit in the current inquiry, however, is a question about whether either diminished capacity or a power of attorney require a different outcome. With regard to a client's diminished capacity, Rule 1.14(a) provides that "when a client's capacity to make adequately considered decisions in connection with a representation is diminished, whether because of minority, mental impairment or for some other reason, the lawyer shall, as far as reasonably possible, maintain a conventional relationship with the client." See generally N.Y. State 1144 ¶ 11 (2018) (discussing various aspects of Rule 1.14). By mandating that a lawyer maintain a conventional relationship with a client who has diminished capacity as far as reasonably possible, Rule 1.14(a) requires the inquirer, as much as reasonably possible, to carry out the wishes of H, despite his apparent diminished capacity. See Comment [3] to Rule 1.14 ("the lawyer must keep the client's interests foremost" and must generally "look to the client . . . to make decisions on the client's behalf."). Accordingly, regardless of H's alleged diminished capacity, Rule 1.7(a)(1) prevents the Inquirer from going forward with the joint representation of H and W because they have "differing interests" absent the informed consent of both H and W. Here, however, securing the informed written consent of H and W to the joint representation is not possible because the clients are each directing the attorney to pursue mutually exclusive objectives (go forward and not go forward).

8. The inquirer's remaining question – whether he can honor the instructions of W and terminate the Transactions in reliance on W's use of the POA to act on H's behalf – presents questions of law that are outside the scope of this committee's jurisdiction. We do not opine on issues of law. However, the presence of the POA highlights the conflicted position that inquirer occupies. An unconflicted lawyer might well advise H to seek immediate revocation of the POA so that W does not attempt to use the POA in a manner contrary to H's wishes – but if the inquirer were to do so, he would be acting contrary to W's interests. See Comment [8] to Rule 1.7 ("The critical questions are the likelihood that a difference in interests will eventuate and, if it does, whether it will adversely affect the lawyer's professional judgment in considering alternatives or foreclose courses of action that reasonably should be pursued on behalf of the client.").

CONCLUSION:

9. When a lawyer is jointly representing two clients as purchasers in a transaction and one of them no longer wishes to proceed, the lawyer cannot continue to represent both clients jointly without violating Rule 1.7. That one of the clients has diminished capacity does not alter this conclusion.

OPINION 1225 (07/08/2021)

TOPIC: Counseling clients engaged in recreational marijuana business; accepting partial ownership of recreational marijuana business in lieu of fee; personal use of recreational marijuana.

DIGEST: In light of current federal enforcement policy, the New York Rules of Professional Conduct permit a lawyer to assist a client in conduct designed to comply with New York's Recreational Marijuana Law and its implementing regulations, notwithstanding that federal narcotics law prohibits the activities authorized by that law. A lawyer may also use marijuana for recreational purposes and may, when the law becomes fully effective, cultivate an authorized amount of marijuana plants at home for personal use. Finally, subject to compliance with Rules 1.7 and 1.8(a), an attorney may accept an equity ownership interest in a cannabis business in exchange for legal services.

RULES: 1.1(a); 1.2(d); 1.3; 1.16(b)(2); 1.7; 1.8(a); 8.4(b); 8.4(h).

FACTS:

1. New York legalized cannabis products for medical use in July 2014. On March 31, 2021, Governor Andrew M. Cuomo signed into law Chapter 92 of the Laws of 2021, entitled the "Marihuana Regulation and Taxation Act," creating a regulated recreational cannabis industry in New York (the "Recreational Marijuana Law"). Although marijuana possession and use were legalized for non-medical purposes effective immediately with the adoption of the Recreational Marijuana Law, the authorized commercial sale of cannabis products awaits various administrative rules and regulations and is not anticipated to begin before late 2022.

2. The regulatory framework established by the Recreational Marijuana Law bears many similarities to New York's regulation of alcohol by the New York State Liquor Authority under the Alcoholic Beverage Control Law. A Cannabis Control Board and the Office of Cannabis Management will control the issuance and revocation of licenses for retail dispensaries and on-site consumption establishments and will administer both the adult-use and medical-use programs, promulgating rules, issuing licenses, and investigating and enforcing violations. The cultivation, processing, distribution, and sale of cannabis products will be tightly controlled and, when the law becomes fully effective, individuals will be permitted to grow a limited number of plants in their homes for personal use.

3. Through local legislation that is subject to permissive referendum, the Recreational Marijuana Law gives cities, villages and towns the authority to "opt out" of allowing retail dispensaries and on-site consumption establishments to operate within their jurisdictions. These localities may also regulate the time, place and manner of the operation of these adult-use facilities, provided the Cannabis Control Board does not determine that such restrictions make such operations unreasonably impracticable. Cannabis businesses also remain subject to local zoning regulations.

QUESTIONS:

4. The inquirer is an attorney who wants to provide legal services to a client engaged in the recreational cannabis business in New York. She poses three separate questions:

a. May an attorney ethically provide legal services to assist a client to comply with New York's Recreational Marijuana Law?

b. May an attorney ethically use marijuana recreationally and grow it at home for personal use?

c. May an attorney accept an equity interest in a client's cannabis business in exchange for providing legal services?

OPINION:

Our Prior Opinions Regarding Rule 1.2(d) and New York's Medical Marijuana Law.

5. Rule 1.2(d) of the Rules of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") provides:

> A lawyer shall not counsel a client to engage, or assist a client, in conduct that the lawyer knows is illegal or fraudulent, except that the lawyer may discuss the legal consequences of any proposed course of conduct with a client.

6. Notwithstanding Rule 1.2(d), following the enactment of New York's Compassionate Care Act (the "Medical Marijuana Law"), this committee held in N.Y. State 1024 (2014) that an attorney may ethically provide legal services and advice to doctors, patients, public officials, hospital administrators and others engaged in the cultivation, distribution, prescribing, dispensing, regulation, possession or use of marijuana for medical purposes to help them act in compliance with state regulation regarding medical marijuana, despite the federal narcotics laws that prohibit the possession, distribution, sale or use of marijuana and which provide no exception for medical uses.

7. We noted that the federal government had publicly announced that it was limiting its enforcement of federal narcotics laws and would not ordinarily prosecute individual actors and institutions who acted consistently with state laws that legalized and extensively regulated medical marijuana. Rather, the federal government said it would pursue enforcement only to further certain federal priorities, such as preventing the flow of revenue from marijuana sales to criminal enterprises and preventing marijuana activity from being used as a cover for trafficking other drugs. We reasoned that lawyers could provide a range of valuable assistance to clients seeking to comply with the Medical Marijuana Law consistent with this federal enforcement policy and, because a strong state regulatory system justified the federal policy of forbearance from the enforcement of federal narcotics laws, federal enforcement policy actually depended on the availability of lawyers to establish and promote compliance with a strong and effective state regulatory system.

8. Without minimizing the core tenet of Rule 1.2(d) or a lawyer's fundamental duty not to counsel a client to violate the law or to assist a client in so doing, we concluded that "nothing in the history and tradition of the profession, in court opinions, or elsewhere" suggested that Rule 1.2(d) was intended in this "highly unusual if not unique" circumstance to "preclude lawyers from counseling or assisting conduct that is legal under state law" or to provide assistance "that is necessary to implement state law and to effectuate current federal policy" We identified that "highly unusual and unique circumstance" as "where the state executive branch determines to implement the state legislation by authorizing and regulating medical marijuana, consistent with current, published federal executive-branch enforcement policy, and the federal government does not take effective measures to prevent implementation of the law." (N.Y. State 1024 ¶¶ 6 & 23-25; footnote omitted.)

9. We cautioned, however, that "If federal enforcement were to change materially, this Opinion might need to be reconsidered" (N.Y. State 1024 ¶ 25).

10. The federal enforcement policy we described in N.Y. State 1024 had been articulated in a Department of Justice memorandum issued August 29, 2013, known as the "Cole Memo" (named for then Deputy Attorney General James Cole, who was its author). On January 4, 2018, however, then Attorney General Jeff Sessions rescinded the Cole Memo. Accordingly, this committee, in N. Y. State 1177 (2019), reconsidered the conclusion we had reached in N.Y. State 1024.

11. N.Y. State 1177 adhered to the conclusion of N.Y. State 1024. We noted in Opinion 1177 that General Sessions' successor, William Barr, had testified during his confirmation hearing that he would not target state legal marijuana businesses and would leave it to Congress to act. We further noted that during the interval between our release of N.Y. State 1024 in November 2014, and the rescission of the Cole Memo in January 2018, Congress had in fact acted. Specifically, in December 2014, Congress adopted legislation known as the "Rohrabacher-Blumenauer Amendment" that prohibited the Department of Justice from using any of the funds appropriated by Congress to prevent States from implementing their own State laws that authorized the use, distribution, possession or cultivation of medical marijuana. We reasoned that, in these circumstances, the rescission of the Cole Memo "does not meaningfully change federal law enforcement policy" (N.Y. State 1177 ¶ 9).

12. Accordingly, based on the state of federal law enforcement policy from 2014 through today, and subject to future changes in that policy, we decided in N.Y. State 1024 and affirmed in N.Y. State 1177 that a lawyer may assist a client in conduct designed to comply with the Medical Marijuana Law without violating Rule 1.2(d).

13. We now apply these same principles to answer the inquirer's three questions.

Assisting a Client to Comply with New York's Recreational Marijuana Law.

14. The inquirer's first question is whether an attorney may ethically provide legal services to assist a client to comply with New York's Recreational Marijuana Law. This question does not require us to analyze any change in federal enforcement policy since we issued N.Y. State 1177 (to our knowledge there have been no changes). Rather, the question is whether New York's broader legalization of cannabis for recreational use imports into the analysis any additional factors or competing considerations that would alter the conclusion reached by the committee in N.Y. State 1024 and 1177 regarding medical marijuana. For the reasons that follow, we believe it does not.

15. First, although the Rohrabacher-Blumenauer Amendment is specifically focused on marijuana for medical and not recreational purposes, over the course of three administrations – Presidents Obama, Trump and Biden – the Department of Justice has not, to our knowledge, taken any public position on federal enforcement that distinguishes between medical and recreational marijuana laws in the states. Indeed, unlike the Rohrabacher-Blumenauer Amendment, the Cole Memo (now rescinded) was not limited to medical marijuana. Inasmuch as 17 states, plus Washington, D.C., and Guam, have now legalized the recreational use of marijuana in some form, beginning with Colorado in 2012, it seems fair to say that for nearly a decade federal forbearance in the enforcement of federal narcotics laws has been equally applied to state laws legalizing recreational marijuana and to state laws legalizing medical marijuana.

16. Second, the comprehensive licensing and regulatory system that governs recreational use of marijuana in New York is clearly the type of robust and comprehensive state enforcement system that is squarely intended by federal enforcement policy to be an object of federal forbearance.

17. Third, the need for lawyer assistance to clients to assure compliance with state regulatory requirements in the medical marijuana industry, which justifies continued federal forbearance, applies with equal if not more force to recreational marijuana. For example, the licensing process under New York's Recreational Marijuana Law will function more expeditiously and with more consistency if lawyers can assist with preparing and submitting license applications and can counsel the regulators reviewing those applications. More generally, in a complex regulatory system where cultivation, distribution, possession, sale and use of a product are tightly regulated, legal advice and guidance has immense value. Without the aid of lawyers, the recreational marijuana regulatory system would, in our view, likely break down or grind to a halt. The participation of attorneys thus secures the benefits of the Recreational Marijuana Law for the public at large, as well promotes the interests of the private and public sector clients more directly involved in the law's implementation.

18. Fourth, as we observed in N.Y. State 1024, the tension created between federal and state narcotics laws remains a "highly unusual if not unique" situation that was never intended to fall within the blunt prohibition of Rule 1.2(d) against a lawyer counseling a client to engage in, or engaging in, conduct that the lawyer knows is illegal. The federal decision not to enforce narcotics laws against individuals and organizations engaged in conduct authorized by state law renders sui generis our determination of the issues presented by this inquiry, as well as in N.Y. State 1024 and N.Y. State 1177.

Ownership, Home Cultivation, and Personal Use by an Attorney.

19. The inquirer has been offered an equity stake in a client's cannabis business in exchange for legal services. She would also like to use cannabis products recreationally and grow lawful quantities of marijuana at home for personal use. She asks if this would be allowed under the Rules.

20. For many of the same reasons that lead us to conclude that an attorney may provide legal services to a cannabis business, we conclude that such ownership, home cultivation, and personal use, without more, would not violate Rule 1.2(d). We must, also, however, consider Rule 8.4(b) and (h), which provide:

> A lawyer or law firm shall not:
> > (b) engage in illegal conduct that adversely reflects on the lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness as a lawyer;
> > * * *

> (h) engage in any other conduct that adversely reflects on the lawyer's fitness as a lawyer.

21. The first sentence of Comment [2] to Rule 8.4 provides:

> Many kinds of illegal conduct reflect adversely on fitness to practice law. Illegal conduct involving violence, dishonesty, fraud, breach of trust, or serious interference with the administration of justice is illustrative of conduct that reflects adversely on fitness to practice law.

22. Nothing the inquirer proposes to do involves acts of violence. Moreover, if the inquirer's ownership interest in a cannabis business, her home cultivation of marijuana plants, and her personal recreational use of marijuana comply with the Recreational Marijuana Law, they will fall within the scope of federal forbearance. For that reason, although those activities are technically illegal under federal law, they will not constitute illegal conduct that involves "dishonesty, fraud, breach of trust, or serious interference with the administration of justice." Accordingly, without more, such conduct would not adversely reflect on the inquirer's "honesty, trustworthiness or fitness as a lawyer" within the meaning of Rule 8.4(b).

23. The excessive use of marijuana, however, like excessive consumption of alcohol, may adversely impact a lawyer's ability to competently and diligently represent a client as required by Rules 1.1(a) and 1.3. It could also have more serious consequences and create a physical or mental condition that materially impairs a lawyer's ability to represent a client, requiring mandatory withdrawal from representation (see Rule 1.16(b)(2)). Nothing we say here connotes approval of such excessive use or establishes a protective shield for a lawyer who is facing disciplinary charges, malpractice claims, or other adverse consequences arising out of marijuana use.

24. The second sentence of Comment [2] to Rule 8.4 provides:

> A pattern of repeated offenses, even ones of minor significance when considered separately can indicate an indifference to legal obligation.

25. It is true that growing and harvesting marijuana, as well as repeatedly using marijuana, could be said to reflect a "pattern of repeated offenses" of the federal narcotics laws, but we reject the notion that it is a pattern that indicates an "indifference to legal obligation" where, again, the conduct falls squarely within the scope of federal forbearance and New York explicit authorization.

26. Federal forbearance policy is also relevant to Comment [4] to Rule 8.4, which provides in pertinent part:

> A lawyer may refuse to comply with an obligation imposed by law if such refusal is based upon a reasonable good-faith belief that no valid obligation exists because, for example, the law is unconstitutional, conflicts with other legal or professional obligations, or is otherwise invalid.

27. In our view, the scope of federal forbearance provides inquirer with a "reasonable good-faith belief that no valid obligation exists" to comply with federal narcotics laws that would otherwise prohibit her ownership of an interest in a cannabis business, her home cultivation of marijuana plants for personal use, and her recreational use of marijuana, where and when such activities are authorized by New York State law.

Additional Rules Relevant to Accepting an Equity Interest in Exchange for Legal Services.

28. Accepting an equity interest in the client's cannabis business as compensation for providing legal services also requires compliance with Rule 1.8(a) regarding a business transaction with a client. In N.Y. State 913, ¶¶ 6 & 10 (2012), we concluded "that Rule 1.8(a) applies to negotiation of a fee in which a lawyer is to receive an equity interest in a client or the client's company." Accordingly, "the terms of the transaction must be fair and reasonable to the client, fully disclosed and transmitted in writing in a manner that can be reasonably understood by the client, with the client being advised of the desirability of seeking independent legal advice and given a reasonable chance to do so, and the client signing a writing that describes the transaction and the lawyer's role in the deal, including whether the lawyer was acting for the client in the matter."

29. Further, the inquirer must consider whether acquiring or possessing an equity interest in the client's cannabis business will give rise to a conflict of interest under Rule 1.7(a)(2). A conflict will arise if there is a significant risk that the lawyer's advice or other legal assistance to the client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's financial self-interest. In that event, the lawyer may nevertheless proceed with the representation if (i) the lawyer reasonably believes she can provide competent and diligent representation despite the conflict and (ii) the lawyer obtains the client's informed consent, confirmed in writing. See Rule 1.7(b); N.Y. State 990 ¶ 26 (2013); N.Y. State 913 ¶¶ 13-14.

30. We caution that were the inquirer to engage in any cannabis related activity that constituted a serious violation of New York State law or of other federal laws, or in activity that would materially implicate federal enforcement priorities not subject to federal forbearance – for example, assisting in the transfer of sales revenues from recreational marijuana sales to criminal enterprises, or using a cannabis business as a cover for trafficking in other narcotics – her conduct would fall outside the safe harbor established by this opinion. In that case, her conduct would constitute violations of Rule 1.2(d) and Rules 8.4(b) and 8.4(h).

31. We further caution that law enforcement authorities may have views of their own on the reach of the criminal statutes they enforce, and whether the conduct we find here to be ethically permissible is within the prohibited scope of those statutes presents questions of law on which this committee does not opine. Our jurisdiction is limited to interpreting the Rules of Professional Conduct.

CONCLUSION:

32. In light of current federal enforcement policy, the New York Rules of Professional Conduct permit a lawyer to assist a client in conduct designed to comply with New York's Recreational Marijuana Law and its implementing regulations, notwithstanding that federal narcotics law prohibits the activities authorized by that law. A lawyer may also use marijuana for recreational purposes and may, when the law becomes fully effective, cultivate an authorized amount of marijuana plants at home for personal use. Finally, subject to compliance with Rules 1.7 and 1.8(a), an attorney may accept an equity ownership interest in a cannabis business in exchange for legal services.

OPINION 1226 (08/10/2021)

TOPIC: Use of Domain Name Different from Name of Law Firm

DIGEST: An attorney may use a domain name that differs from the name of the law firm under which the attorney practices, provided the domain name and law firm name, separately or combined, are not false, deceptive, or misleading.

RULES: 7.5(b) (1)

FACTS:

1. In anticipation of opening his own law practice, the inquirer purchased the domain name "JDFamilyLaw.com," with JD being the attorney's initials. Although originally intending to practice law under the law firm name "AB Family Law," the inquirer has decided he wishes to practice under his complete name such as "Law Offices of John Doe" or "John Doe, Attorney at Law."

QUESTION:

2. May the inquirer use a domain name for his website and email address that is different from the name the inquirer uses for the law firm?

OPINION:

3. The cornerstone of our analysis rests upon whether the use of the proposed law firm name and the different proposed domain name, separately or combined, would be false, deceptive, or misleading to clients or to the public. Effective June 24, 2020, a Joint Order of the Appellate Divisions amended Rule 7.5(b) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") to permit lawyers to practice under a trade name – which had previously been forbidden – as long as the trade name is not false, deceptive, or misleading. In N.Y. State 1207 (2020) and N.Y. State 1217 (2021), we emphasized that the purpose of Rule 7.5(b), even in its amended form, was to protect the public from being deceived or misled as to the identity of lawyers using or practicing under a firm name.

4. As amended effective June 24, 2020, Rule 7.5(b)(1) provides:

> (b) A lawyer in private practice shall not practice under:
>
> (i) a false, deceptive or misleading a trade name;
>
> (ii) a false, deceptive, or misleading domain name; or
> (iii) a name that is misleading as to the identity of the lawyer or lawyers practicing under such name.

5. Comment [2] to Rule 7.5 elaborates on Rule 7.5(b) by providing:

> A lawyer or law firm may not use any name that is false, deceptive, or misleading. It is not false, deceptive, or misleading for a firm to be designated by the names of all or > some of its current members or by the names of retired or deceased members where there has been a continuing line of succession in the firm's identity. A lawyer or law firm may practice under a trade name or domain name if it is not false, deceptive, or misleading. A lawyer or law firm also may practice under a distinctive website address, social media username, or comparable professional designation, provided that the name is not false, deceptive, or misleading.

6. Comment [9] to Rule 7.5 specifically notes that "it is proper to practice under the lawyer's or law firm's own name, initials, trade name, domain name, abbreviations, areas of practice, variations of the foregoing, or a combination of those features among other things." Permissible examples of practice names may be found in Comment [10], which approves such names as "AbleBaker Real Estate Lawyers, A&B Real Estate Lawyers, or Dirt Lawyers . . . ." The Comment further suggests permissible descriptive domain names such as www.realestatelaw.com or www.ablerealestatelaw.com or colloquial domain names such as www.dirtlawyers.com . . ." However: "Neither the trade name nor the domain name may be false, deceptive or misleading." Comment [11].

7. The history of Rule 7.5 also shows that a law firm may practice under a name that differs from its domain name. Before the 2020 amendments, when trade names were still prohibited, Rule 7.5(e) addressed domain names, stating: "A lawyer or law firm may utilize a domain name for an internet website that does not include the name of the lawyer or law firm" provided the website and domain name met certain conditions. One condition, stated in Rule 7.5(e)(2), was that "the lawyer or law firm in no way attempts to engage in the practice of law using the domain name" if the domain name did not include the name of the lawyer or law firm. Comment [2] to former Rule 7.5 gave examples of such domain names, including "www.ablerealestatelaw.com," "www.realestatelaw.com," and "www.dirtlawyers.com." Since those domain names would have been prohibited trade names under former Rule 7.5(b), a lawyer who chose such a domain name was required to use a different name for the law firm name.

8. The June 2020 amendments to Rule 7.5 eliminated Rule 7.5(e) because under amended Rule 7.5(b) lawyers and firms were permitted to practice under trade names, including practicing under a domain name – but nothing in amended Rule 7.5(b) was intended to mandate that lawyers use the same name for both the law firm name and the domain name, or to prohibit lawyers from using different words for the law firm name and the domain name. A lawyer who chooses a descriptive domain name (such as "JDFamilyLaw.com") may thus practice under the lawyer's own name (such as "Law Offices of John Doe") as long as neither the law firm name nor the domain name is false, deceptive, or misleading.

9. Here, under Rule 7.5(b) as amended, neither the proposed law firm name nor the proposed domain name is false, misleading, or deceptive. The question is posed therefore whether a lawyer may use a permissible law firm name that differs from a permissible domain name. Is that per se false, deceptive, or misleading? In our view, it is not. Nothing in the Rules prohibits use of a domain name different from the name of the law firm. While one could conceive of circumstances where the differing names might otherwise violate Rule 7.5(b), we have no basis on the facts presented here to conclude that use of the proposed law firm name combined with the proposed domain name would be false, misleading or deceptive.

CONCLUSION:

10. An attorney may use a law firm trade name compliant with these Rules and a different compliant domain name provided the combined use of the two is not false, misleading or deceptive. (16-21)

OPINION 1227 (08/26/2021)

TOPIC: Advertising, solicitation, targeted email to prospective clients

DIGEST: Email communication from out-of-state law firm to a list of specific individuals in New York, seeking clients for future false advertising and products liability class actions, is both an advertisement and a solicitation under Rules 7.1 and 7.3 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct.

RULES: 1.0(a), 7.1, 7.3

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a partner in a California law firm. Although the firm does not have a New York office, one of its partners is admitted to practice in New York. The inquirer proposes to send out an "email blast" to individuals in New York, seeking potential named plaintiffs for future class action cases that the firm would like to commence alleging false advertising and products liability. The inquirer acquired the names and email addresses of these individuals from various lists, but the inquirer has no information about the individuals listed, including whether or not they have been harmed by the advertisements or products that the firm is investigating.

QUESTION:

2. Is the proposed email communication to potential clients a "solicitation" under Rule 7.3 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules")?

OPINION:

3. This inquiry is governed principally by Rule 7.3, entitled "Solicitation and Recommendation of Professional Employment." There is a threshold issue, however, as to whether this committee has jurisdiction to interpret Rule 7.3 as applied to the proposed conduct of an attorney who is not admitted to practice in New York and who practices in a firm that does not maintain an office in New York. We believe we do have such jurisdiction, because paragraph (i) of Rule 7.3 provides:

> (i) The provisions of this Rule [7.3] shall apply to a lawyer or members of a law firm not admitted to practice in this State who shall solicit retention by residents of this State.

4. Accordingly, as New York specifically asserts disciplinary jurisdiction over out-of-state lawyers like the inquirer who solicit retention by residents of New York State, we will proceed to answer the inquiry.

5. Rule 7.3(b) provides that "solicitation" is a form of "advertisement" that satisfies four specific criteria:

> (b) For purposes of this Rule [7.3], "solicitation" includes any advertisement initiated by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm; that is directed to, or targeted at, a specific recipient or group of recipients or their family members or legal representatives, the > *primary purpos*e of which is the retention of the lawyer or law firm, and a significant motive for which is pecuniary gain. It does not include a proposal or other writing prepared and delivered in response to a specific request. [Emphasis added.]

6. Comment [2] to Rule 7.3 elaborates on this definition by stating: "Any advertisement that meets all four of these criteria is a solicitation, and is governed not only by the Rules that govern all advertisements but also by special Rules governing solicitation."

7. Rule 1.0(a) defines "advertisement" as follows:

> (a) "Advertisement" means any public or private communication made by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm about that lawyer or law firm's services, the primary purpose of which is for the retention of the lawyer or law firm. It does not include communications to existing clients or other lawyers.

8. Since the emails will be sent "by or on behalf of" the inquirer's law firm, and since the "primary purpose" of the emails is to locate future clients willing to retain the inquirer's firm and to serve as named plaintiffs in future class action false advertising or product liability cases which the inquirer's firm will commence, the proposed email is an "advertisement" within the meaning of Rule 1.0(a).

9. The proposed email communication clearly satisfies three of the four additional criteria of Rule 7.3(b) for classification as a solicitation. First, the communication will be "initiated" by the lawyer or law firm (rather than responding to a "specific request" from a potential client). Second, the "primary purpose" of the email is to locate clients who will retain the firm for future class action matters involving false advertising and products liability claims. Third, a "significant motive" for the email is the firm's expectation of "pecuniary gain" via future legal fees if it is retained.

10. The only remaining requirement is that the email communication be "directed to, or targeted at, a specific recipient or group of recipients." Comment [3] to Rule 7.3 provides guidance on this question, explaining that an attorney advertisement is "directed to or targeted at" a specific recipient" if it is "addressed so that it will be delivered to the specific recipient or recipients or their families or agents (as with letters, emails, express packages)." Such advertisements are deemed to be solicitations subject to more stringent rules, "because otherwise they would not be readily subject to disciplinary oversight and review." Rule 7.3, Comment [3].

11. This policy of subjecting solicitations to more stringent rules is the crux of the Rule. Newspaper, magazine, and billboard advertisements, like radio and television advertisements, are published or broadcast on "public media," which is accessible and reviewable for compliance purposes. For the most part, website and internet advertising share this characteristic of being accessible and reviewable. In contrast, private communications to individuals or groups of individuals, such as letters, emails, and direct-mail packages, are not as easily accessible to the public or the disciplinary authorities and cannot ordinarily be reviewed or monitored for compliance purposes.

12. The protection of the public from non-compliant lawyer advertising and solicitation is an important aspect of the work of attorney grievance committees. Without the ability to review targeted advertising, these committees could not confirm that such advertisements are not deceptive, false or misleading, and are otherwise in compliance with the Rules.

13. We have reached similar conclusions in prior opinions. In N.Y. State 1009 (2014), we concluded that email sent to a specific recipient is a mode of communication that is considered "targeted" at "specific recipients" within the meaning of Rule 7.3. In N.Y. State 1039 (2014), we concluded that email sent to subscribers to an attorney blog could be solicitations if the attorney obtained the email addresses through an opt-in box on the blog. In N.Y. State 1136 (2014), we found that written communications from a law firm inviting people to a law firm marketing event must comply with Rule 7.3 if the firm is seeking client retention. In contrast, in N.Y. State 1016 (2014), we found that an emailed advertisement sent to all members of internet message boards of which the attorney was a member was not a solicitation.

14. Here, in our view, the inquirer's emails constitute an "advertisement" that is "targeted at" "specific recipients" whose names are on a list of names and email addresses acquired by the firm. It does not matter that the firm has no further information about the recipients, that the recipient group is large, or that members of the group have not been chosen based on particular shared characteristics. The mailing is to a list of specific individuals, and that suffices to define it as a "solicitation" as defined by Rule 7.3(b).

CONCLUSION:

15. The proposed email communication to a list of individuals in New York, seeking clients for future false advertising or products liability class actions, is a solicitation under the Rule 7.3 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct.

OPINION 1228 (08/30/2021)

TOPIC: Submitting draft complaint with demand letter

DIGEST: A lawyer who sends a demand letter to a potential civil defendant may include a draft complaint and a statement that the draft complaint will be filed if the matter is not settled by a certain date, except in unusual circumstances where the threat would violate the prohibition against false statements of fact or law, the prohibition against conduct involving deceit or misrepresentation, the prohibition against threatening frivolous litigation, or a specific prohibition in substantive law.

RULES: 3.1(a) & (b), 3.4(e), 4.1, 8.4(a), 8.4(c)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer represents a party who has a potential civil claim against a business. A previous lawyer for the client sent a demand letter to the principal of the business but received no response. The inquirer has called the principal and left voicemails, but no one has answered the calls or responded to the inquirer's voicemails.

2. The inquirer proposes to "draft a complaint and send it to the company named as the defendant without commencing a lawsuit against the defendant." The inquirer "would provide a deadline by which they must settle or the lawsuit will be filed against them," but would "prefer to file the complaint only as a last resort . . . because the complaint becomes public record."

QUESTION:

3. May the attorney for a potential civil plaintiff enclose a draft complaint in a demand letter to the potential defendant and state that the complaint will be filed if the matter is not settled by a certain date?

OPINION:

4. It is a common practice for attorneys to send demand letters asking for redress of their clients' grievances on a voluntary basis, prior to filing a civil claim in court. Such demand letters can serve useful purposes of informing potential defendants of allegations against them, framing the issues of a dispute, and starting a process of resolving the dispute, possibly without needing to resort to litigation.

5. Rule 3.4(e) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") provides that a lawyer shall not "threaten to present criminal charges solely to obtain an advantage in a civil matter," but that rule applies only to threats of criminal charges. See N.Y. State 772 (2003); N.Y. City 2017-3 (2017); ABA 94-383 (1994). Nothing in the Rules would specifically prohibit the proposed conduct here, which is to threaten a civil suit.

6. Nevertheless, the Rules do impose some restrictions on a threat to file a civil suit. Thus, the Rules generally prohibit falsehood and deception. See Rule 4.1 (in course of representing a client, lawyer "shall not knowingly make a false statement of fact or law to a third person"); Rule 8.4(c)

(lawyer shall not "engage in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation"); ABA 06-439 (2006) (it may be "knowingly false or misleading to seek an advantage" by making "a threat that is baseless . . . because the lawyer has unequivocally stated an intention that does not exist," especially if the threat is made to a non-lawyer).

7. Whether a particular statement should be regarded as one of fact can depend on the circumstances." Rule 4.1, Cmt. [2]. For example, "a party's intentions as to an acceptable settlement of a claim" will ordinarily not be taken as a statement of fact subject to the rule against false statements, Rule 4.1, Cmt. [2]. Nor will "statements regarding . . . willingness to compromise." ABA 06-439. Similarly, threatening a legal proceeding "may not rise to the level of an express or implied assertion of fact or law or of the lawyer's intended future conduct." ABA 06-439.

8. The Committee recognizes that the line between a threat and a statement of fact can sometimes be difficult to discern and that negotiators typically use hyperbole, cajolery, exaggeration, and even strategic deception to achieve their objectives. The Committee also recognizes that experienced negotiators are typically not surprised when such tactics are employed against them. But we also agree with N.Y. City 2017-3 (2017) that "care must be taken by the lawyer to ensure that communications regarding the client's position, which otherwise would not be considered statements 'of fact,' are not conveyed in language that converts them, even inadvertently, into false factual representations."

9. With these principles in mind, we will focus on one particular statement that the inquirer proposes to include in his letter – namely, that if the matter is not resolved by a certain date, the inquirer "will" file the draft complaint in court. On the one hand, if the inquirer's client has authorized the inquirer to file suit unless the adversary gives an acceptable response to the demand letter, then the threat to file suit presents no issue of falsehood or deception. On the other hand, if the inquirer knows that the client will never authorize such threatened litigation under any circumstances, then the threat that the inquirer "will" file suit may be false or deceptive.

10. There are also many gradients in between these extremes. For example, some clients who are contemplating filing suit might be awaiting fee estimates, further legal research, or additional factual investigation. Other clients will file suit only if an adversary fails to respond or denies any responsibility. Still others may be willing to authorize a suit as a last resort, but want to take every possible step to avoid litigation. Even among clients in these categories, client objectives may be shifting, ambiguous or tentative, and are rarely fixed in stone.

11. For all these reasons, we believe that an attorney's threat to file suit if a dispute is not resolved by a certain date will in most cases not rise to the level of a false statement of fact. Yet we can certainly conceive of circumstances where a lawyer's specific threat to sue, despite the client's unequivocal and irrevocable determination not to sue under any circumstances, could rise to the level of factual misrepresentation – and presenting a draft complaint that the client has no intention of ever filing would compound that misrepresentation. Such circumstances, however are in our view infrequent, and we think it would be an unusual situation in which a lawyer's threat to file suit would constitute a "false statement" in violation of Rule 4.1 or a "deceit" or "misrepresentation" in violation of Rule 8.4(c).

12. A separate ethical guardrail is that a lawyer may not threaten to file a lawsuit where such a threat would constitute "frivolous conduct" within the meaning of Rule 3.1(b). That would be an "attempt to violate" Rule 3.1(a), and an attempt to violate a rule is prohibited by Rule 8.4(a). See Rule 3.1(a) & (b)(3) (prohibiting assertion in proceedings of frivolous issues and material factual statements known to be false); Rule 3.1 Cmt. [2] (noting that filing a claim "or similar action taken for a client" is not frivolous "merely because the facts have not first been fully substantiated or because the lawyer expects to develop vital evidence only by discovery," but also noting that lawyers are required to "determine that they can make good-faith arguments in support of their clients' positions"). These standards would apply to statements in the draft complaint that the inquirer proposes to send, as well as to statements in the demand letter itself.

13. In particular contexts, substantive law may also place additional constraints on threatening legal action. See, e.g., Fair Debt Collection Practices Act, 15. U.S.C. §1692(e)(5) (providing that for a debt collector to threaten to take an action that is not intended to be taken is a prohibited false, deceptive or misleading representation or means in connection with debt collection). Such legal constraints, however, are beyond our purview, which is limited to interpreting the Rules of Professional Conduct.

CONCLUSION:

14. A lawyer who sends a demand letter to a potential civil defendant may include a draft complaint and a statement that the draft complaint will be filed if the matter is not settled by a certain date, except in unusual circumstances where the threat would violate the prohibition against false statements of fact or law, the prohibition against conduct involving deceit or misrepresentation, the prohibition against threatening frivolous litigation, or a specific prohibition in substantive law.

OPINION 1229 (09/21/2021)

TOPIC: Lawyer's Rights and Duties after Death of a Client

DIGEST: A lawyer may not settle a claim for a client after the client has died absent authorization from a duly qualified representative of the decedent.

RULES: 1.2(a), 1.16(d)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a New York lawyer who practices personal injury law in New York. Some years ago, a client retained the inquirer on a contingency-fee basis to pursue a claim arising out of a vehicular accident. With the client's approval, the inquirer opted not to commence an action but instead to engage in negotiations directly with the alleged tortfeasor's insurer to achieve an out-of-court resolution of the dispute. The inquirer characterizes the client's claim as weak, an assessment apparently shared by the insurer, whose initial very modest settlement offers the client rejected.

2. More recently, the inquirer negotiated a somewhat higher albeit still modest settlement sum from the insurer, which the inquirer considers both fair and the maximum the insurer is likely to tender. In seeking to obtain the client's approval of the deal, the inquirer learned, for the first time, that the client had passed away from causes unrelated to the accident animating the claim, and that the client had died before the lawyer received the most recent settlement offer. The inquirer notified the insurer of the client's demise. At the time of this notice, the insurer had already forwarded a release to the inquirer for the client's signature with the amount of consideration set forth in the release. Upon learning of the client's death, the insurer did not rescind the offer; according to the inquirer, the insurer said that the coronavirus pandemic has occasioned other similar circumstances. Nevertheless, no binding commitment exists that the insurer will pay the offered amount, and no money has yet been exchanged.

3. As far as the inquirer has been able to ascertain, the client died intestate and with little if any assets. The inquirer retained an investigator in an effort to locate the client. This effort resulted in the discovery of a companion who confirmed both the client's death and the client's lack of meaningful assets. Neither the late client's companion nor the lawyer's investigator have been able to produce a death certificate, which the inquirer sought as a prerequisite for a possible petition to the Surrogate's Court. To the best of the inquirer's knowledge, no probate or like proceedings have been started to dispose of the deceased client's assets.

4. The inquirer holds a power of attorney authorizing the lawyer "to execute documents necessary for the prosecution of the [client's] legal affairs," including such documents as "pleadings," "releases," and "settlement drafts," but this authorization requires that the client be notified "in advance of each such document that is being executed on [the client's] behalf and consent orally to the execution of said documents."

5. The inquirer's contingency-fee agreement with the client entitles the inquirer to a third of the client's recovery after deduction of expenses. Had the client survived and accepted the offer, this agreement would entitle the client to at least half the tendered settlement amount. The inquirer wishes to abandon the matter based on the client's death.

QUESTION:

5. May a lawyer cease to pursue a client's matter, which was never the subject of a judicial proceeding, when the client dies before conclusion of the matter?

OPINION:

6. Our answer is yes. The N.Y. Rules of Professional Conduct ("Rules") say that whether an attorney-client relationship exists is a question of law not ethics. Rules, Preamble ¶ [9]. Nevertheless, we have said that "the death of the client terminates the attorney-client relationship." N.Y. State 1211 ¶ 4 (2020) (citing cases). "As a consequence, '[t]he lawyer . . . may not take any further steps in connection with the matter unless and until [the lawyer] is authorized to do so by the deceased's duly qualified personal representative.'" Id. (quoting ABA 95-397). "A client's death terminates a lawyer's actual authority," and any "rights of the deceased client pass to other persons – executors, for example, who can, if they wish, revive the representation." Restatement (Third) of the Law Governing Lawyers § 31 cmt. e (2000).

7. Rule 1.2(a) allocates to the client the sole decision on whether to settle a matter. Without a client, the inquiring lawyer has no right to accept the proposed settlement offer, no matter whether the counterparty is prepared to proceed. Here, the inquirer's power of attorney only reinforces this conclusion, because, while interpretation of such documents are issues of law not ethics, the document unambiguously invests the client with the power to decide whether to settle. Accordingly, in our judgment, the lawyer has no right to effect the settlement, and as a result is not only free but also ethically obligated to forbear from further steps to obtain the settlement proceeds in the absence of a duly qualified personal representative of the client to instruct the lawyer otherwise.

8. A lawyer in the inquirer's position may, but need not, attempt, as the inquirer did, to identify a personal representative to act on the deceased client's behalf in furtherance of judicial proceedings in an appropriate court to effect the proposed settlement. We note the absence of any pending court proceedings – that the personal injury matter never matured into an action – only to make clear that the lawyer here required no judicial permission to terminate the attorney-client relationship because there was no tribunal involved. Rule 1.16(d) prohibits a lawyer from withdrawing without tribunal permission where required by a tribunal's rules.

CONCLUSION:

9. When a client dies before conclusion of the matter, the lawyer has no right to proceed with the matter and may not accept a settlement offer, made after the client died and without the deceased client's approval, absent the separate endorsement of the decedent's duly qualified personal representative.

OPINION 1230 (10/06/2021)

TOPIC: Firm names; trade names

DIGEST: A law firm may not include on its letterhead the name of deceased attorney who does not stand in a continuing line of succession with the firm.

RULES: 7.5(a) & (b); 8.4(c).

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a solo practitioner who, for sentimental reasons, would like to include his deceased father's name on the firm's letterhead, but not in the firm name. The letterhead would indicate the year his father was born and the year he died, as well as the fact that the inquirer's father had been admitted to practice law in Canada as a "Q.C." (i.e., Queens Counsel).

QUESTION:

2. May a law firm include on its letterhead the name of a deceased attorney who does not stand in a continuing line of succession with the firm?

OPINION:

3. On June 24, 2020, the Appellate Divisions issued a Joint Order amending Rule 7.5. As amended, Rule 7.5(b), which addresses the names under which a lawyer may practice, now provides in pertinent part:

> (b) (1) A lawyer or law firm in private practice shall not practice under:
>
> (i) a false, deceptive, or misleading trade name;
>
> (ii) a false, deceptive, or misleading domain name; or
> (iii) a name that is misleading as to the identity of the lawyer or lawyers practicing under such name.

4. The June 24, 2020 amendment to Rule 7.5(b) deleted language in former Rule 7.5(b) that prohibited a "firm name containing the names other than those of one or more of the lawyers in the firm" except "the name or names of one or more deceased or retired members of the firm or of a predecessor firm in a continuing line of succession." As this Committee stated in New York State 1207 ¶ 11 (2020), "The clear implication of the additions to and deletions from Rule 7.5(b) is that law firm names no longer need to contain the names of lawyers practicing in the firm. However, the Rule as amended reaffirms and makes explicit the longstanding principle that law firm names must not be false, misleading, or deceptive."

5. Comment [2] to amended Rule 7.5, recognizes the longstanding tradition that "[i]t is not false, deceptive, or misleading for a firm to be designated . . . by the names of retired or deceased members where there has been a continuing line of succession in the firm's identity." Comment [3] to amended Rule 7.5, however, gives examples of firm names that are deceptive or misleading, and one such example is a firm name that "contains the name of a deceased or retired lawyer not in a continuing line of succession" (emphasis added). Accordingly, despite the 2020 amendments to Rule 7.5(b), a law firm is still prohibited from using a firm name that includes the name of an attorney who is not in a continuing line of succession with the firm, because such a name would be deceptive or misleading.

6. If including the name of an attorney who is not in a continuing line of succession with the firm would be deceptive or misleading in a law firm name, then including such a name would also be deceptive or misleading on a law firm's letterhead. Rule 7.5(a), which was not amended on June 24, 2020, applies to letterhead (as well as web sites, business cards, announcements, signs, and professional notices). Rule 7.5(a) states:

> A lawyer or law firm may use internet web sites, professional cards, professional announcement cards, office signs, letterheads, or similar professional notices or devices, provided the same do not violate these Rules or any statute or court rule. [Emphasis added.]

7. Among "these Rules" is Rule 8.4(c), which provides that a lawyer or law firm may not "engage in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation."

8 Although Rule 7.5(b) applies by its terms to firm names and not to letterhead, we extend the prohibition against deceptive or misleading firm names to names on a letterhead, both by analogy and pursuant to Rule 8.4(c). If it is deceptive and misleading to list an attorney in the firm name who has had no prior professional affiliation with the firm or its predecessors (i.e., is "not in a continuing line of succession" with the firm), then it is, perforce, equally deceptive and misleading to list the attorney on firm letterhead in a manner that suggests just such a prior professional affiliation. Accordingly, the inquirer may not include the name of his deceased father on his letterhead in the particular fashion that he has proposed.

9. Our opinion does not foreclose the inquirer from honoring his deceased father in some other manner that is related to the inquirer's practice. For example, the inquirer may use the firm website, firm brochures, or even firm letterhead to include an encomium to his late father. The inquirer can pay homage to his father's professional achievements or reputation as a Canadian lawyer, even noting the inquirer's aspiration to model his own professional conduct and career after his father, provided the inquirer makes clear (through a disclaimer or other language) that the inquirer's father never practiced or associated with the inquirer's firm.

CONCLUSION:

10. A law firm may not include on its letterhead the name of deceased attorney who does not stand in a continuing line of succession with the firm.

OPINION 1231 (10/06/2021)

TOPIC: Estate-planning lawyer's financial interest in a company that manages trust assets.

DIGEST: An estate-planning lawyer who has an interest in a nonlegal financial management company that the lawyer hopes to recommend to estate-planning clients as financial manager for the trust assets, has a conflict of interest requiring clients' informed consent, confirmed in writing, at the outset of the representation. Further, if the financial management services and the legal services provided to clients are not distinct from each other, the lawyer is subject to the Rules governing the attorney-client relationship with respect to the nonlegal financial management services. Whether the legal services and nonlegal services are distinct or nondistinct from each other, the lawyer must also comply with the Rules governing business transactions with clients whenever an entity with which the lawyer is affiliated or owns an interest in offers nonlegal services to a client.

RULES: 1.0(e), (j), (q) & (r), 1.7(a) & (b), 1.8(a), 5.7(a).

FACTS:

1. The inquirer provides legal services to clients with respect to estate planning. In that connection, the inquirer sometimes assists clients in establishing revocable or irrevocable trusts. These trusts might subsequently benefit from the inquirer's professional assistance in managing trust assets, and the clients have sometimes expressed interest in receiving that assistance from the inquirer. Rather than providing this assistance through the inquirer's law firm, the inquirer proposes establishing a separate financial management company in which the inquirer would have an ownership interest to be retained by the trustees. The trustees ordinarily are the client-settlors of the trust or the client's family members. The financial management company would charge each trust a fixed percentage of the value of the total assets under management and would not charge any transaction or product-based fees or commissions. The company would disclose to clients that members of the law firm have an interest in the company, and that the company is not rendering legal services. In some cases, the inquirer and the inquirer's law firm would provide ongoing estate planning services to its clients while the financial management company provided financial management services to those same clients or their family members in their role as trustees. The inquirer believes that the inquirer's holding an ownership interest in the financial management company will not affect the advice the inquirer gives in estate planning matters.

QUESTION:

2. Under the New York Rules of Professional Conduct ("Rules"), may a lawyer who provides estate planning advice and assistance, and who establishes revocable and irrevocable trusts for clients, have a financial interest in a separate company that manages the assets held in the trusts?

OPINION:

3. In N.Y. State 1155 (2018), this Committee recognized that, in many circumstances, a lawyer may provide both legal and nonlegal services to the same client, and that Rule 5.7 provides a framework for a lawyer to provide nonlegal services to a client through a separate entity. However, the lawyer must initially determine whether doing so would violate Rule 1.7, which addresses conflicts of interest arising out of a lawyer's personal interests, including the lawyer's business and financial interests. Further, providing both legal and nonlegal services, if otherwise permissible, may also implicate Rule 1.8(a), which concerns lawyers' business transactions with clients. This opinion addresses each of these Rules.

Rule 1.7

4. Rule 1.7(a) provides that a lawyer has a concurrent conflict of interest if a "reasonable lawyer would conclude that . . . there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial [or] business interests." In that event, the lawyer may undertake the representation only if, pursuant to Rule 1.7(b)(1), "the lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation" and, pursuant to Rule 1.7(b)(4), the client gives "informed consent, confirmed in writing". In some circumstances, however, the conflict of interest created by the lawyer's financial or business interest may be so severe that it cannot be cured by consent.

5. In N.Y. State 1155 ¶ 5, we recognized that a lawyer's interest in an ancillary business does not invariably give rise to a conflict of interest under Rule 1.7(a): "In many circumstances, whether there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment will be adversely affected will depend on the size of the lawyer's financial interest in the nonlegal services, and whether the lawyer's actions in the legal matter may affect the lawyer's ability to receive the nonlegal fees."

6. In other situations, even if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that there is a "significant risk" that a lawyer's professional judgment in representing a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's financial interest in the nonlegal services, it may be reasonable for the lawyer to believe that competent and diligent representation can nonetheless be provided. In that event, it would be permissible under Rule 1.7 for a lawyer both to practice law and to own, operate or otherwise affiliate with an entity that provides nonlegal services to some of the lawyer's clients. However, before providing both legal and nonlegal services to a client, the lawyer must disclose the lawyer's financial interest in the nonlegal business, as well as the material risks posed by using a nonlegal entity in which the lawyer has an interest, and reasonably available alternatives to using that entity. See Rule 1.7(b)(4) (requiring a client's informed consent to a consentable conflict of interest) and Rule 1.0(j) (defining "informed consent") and Comments [6] and [7] to Rule 1.0 (explaining "informed consent"). After making that full disclosure, the lawyer must secure the clients' informed consent before proceeding further. See, e.g., N.Y. State 784 (2005) (addressing the provision of nonlegal services to the lawyer's clients through an entertainment management company in which a lawyer has an interest).

7. We have also recognized, however, that lawyers sometimes have an incurable conflict of interest when they refer clients to their businesses or provide services to clients through their businesses. An early decision, predating the adoption of the Rules of Professional Conduct, is N.Y. State 619 (1991), which concluded that a lawyer engaged in estate planning may not recommend or sell life insurance products to clients if the lawyer has a financial interest in selling those products. We reasoned:

> Where a lawyer advises a client on trust and estate matters, a central object of the representation is how best to satisfy the financial needs of the client and of those for whom the client wishes or is obliged to provide. A frequent topic in trust and estate planning is whether and to what extent life insurance products should be used to satisfy some of the client's financial objectives and, if so, which ones. Where a lawyer has a financial inter> est or affiliation with a particular life insurance agency or company, the lawyer's independent professional judgment would unavoidably be affected in considering the appropriateness of or recommending, life insurance products for a particular client. . . .

8. Although we recognized the general principal that disqualification of a lawyer is ordinarily not required if the client consents to the conflict after full disclosure of the circumstances, based on the particular facts presented in N.Y. State 619, we stated:

> Given the wide array of life insurance products sold by various companies at differing prices, not to mention the threshold question of whether life insurance products are the most appropriate or economical way to best satisfy the client's needs, however, we do not believe that there could be meaningful consent by the client to the lawyer having a separate business interest of this kind. Since the client is entitled to rely upon the lawyer's independent professional judgment, the opportunity for overreaching by the lawyer is too great to be tolerated. We do not believe that a lawyer can, consistent with the duty of competent representation . . ., solicit or accept a client's consent to a direct and substantial conflict between the client's and the lawyer's interests.

9. Although other states' ethics committees have taken a different view, for the past three decades this committee has adhered to the view that providing certain types of nonlegal services to law firm clients is fundamentally incompatible with the duty and ability to render independent professional judgment in the provision of legal services. For example, in N.Y. State 1200 (2020), we addressed whether a lawyer may "offer legal services for a fee and wealth management services to the same clients from a separate entity for a separate fee – the creation of the life insurance trust coupled with the sale of an insurance policy being only an illustration." We reviewed prior opinions where we concluded that "the conflict between the legal and non-legal services is so severe that informed consent cannot cure it," in particular, where the lawyer would serve as both a lawyer and a real estate broker in the same transaction, with the result that "the broker's personal financial interest in losing the brokerage transaction [might] interfere[] with the lawyer's ability to render independent advice with respect to the transaction." Id., ¶¶ 5-6 (citations omitted). With respect to the lawyer providing wealth management services, we concluded: "This dual practice creates a conflict that, in our opinion, is not amenable to consent for the same reasons set forth in the foregoing opinions, namely, that the legal fees for creating a life insurance trust are likely modest [compared] to the commissions for selling a life insurance policy. As a result, based on our prior opinions, we believe the dual practice is not subject to informed consent and hence impermissible." Id., ¶ 7.

10. Opinion 1155 emphasized that a lawyer sometimes has an incurable conflict of interest when also serving as a broker of financial products if the lawyer, as a lawyer, is recommending products in which the lawyer also has a financial interest. Id. (citing N.Y. State 619 (1991) & N.Y. State 536 (1981)). However, citing N.Y. State 536 (1981), we recognized that engaging in the dual practice as lawyer and financial planner "would not be unethical, as long as the financial planning corporation did not offer any products (e.g. securities, real estate or insurance) for which it would receive a commission or other form of compensation or act as legal counsel and broker in the same transaction." Based on the earlier precedent, Opinion 1155 concluded "that a lawyer may provide both legal and financial planning advice to clients, but could not also receive brokerage commissions with respect to financial products purchased by clients receiving the lawyer's legal advice."

11. In the present situation, the inquirer asks whether an estate-planning lawyer would have a conflict of interest in advising a client and helping to set up a trust for the client if, after the trust is established, the lawyer recommends, and the client then retains, the lawyer's separate financial management company to manage funds in the trust. We note that the inquirer does not propose to serve as trustee, a situation that would call for further analysis and possibly a different outcome.

12. The first question this situation raises under Rule 1.7 is whether a reasonable lawyer would conclude that there is a significant risk that the lawyer's self-interest will adversely affect the lawyer's professional judgment. We answer this question in the affirmative. If the lawyer intends to recommend the financial management company in which the lawyer has an interest, then the lawyer's advice regarding whether to establish a trust for estate and tax-planning purposes, as opposed to pursuing an alternative course, may be adversely affected by the lawyer's interest in the company being retained to manage funds that the client transfers into the trust. A reasonable lawyer could conclude that the lawyer's interest in providing that later service could influence the decision to recommend establishing a trust rather than recommending an alternative, such as purchasing an annuity or life insurance policy that would not result in a profitable retention of the lawyer's financial management company. We think that risk is significant, not de minimis, so this situation creates a "concurrent conflict of interest" under Rule 1.7(a)(2). Compare N.Y. State 712 (1999) (de minimis financial interest does not establish a personal-interest conflict).

13. Despite the conflict under Rule 1.7(a)(2), the inquirer may proceed if the conditions of Rule 1.7(b) are satisfied. With respect to Rule 1.7(b)(1) – the most important factor in determining whether a conflict is consentable – the inquirer believes he will be "able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client," despite the significant risk. The question is whether the inquirer's belief is "reasonable" within the meaning of Rule 1.7(b)(1) and Rule 1.0(q) and (r) (defining "reasonable" and "reasonable belief"). If so, the inquirer may represent the clients in estate-planning matters, even with the intention of later recommending the company to manage the trust funds, as long as the inquirer obtains each client's "informed consent, confirmed in writing." If not, the representation is "nonconsentable" and the lawyer may not proceed. As explained in Comment [14] to Rule 1.7:

> [14] . . . [S]ome conflicts are nonconsentable. If a lawyer does not reasonably believe that the conditions set forth in paragraph (b) can be met, the lawyer should neither ask for the client's consent nor provide representation on the basis of the client's consent. A client's consent to a nonconsentable conflict is ineffective. . . .

14. We note that lawyers in some other jurisdictions are permitted to provide financial management services to clients whom they represent in estate matters. See Arizona Op. 99-09 ("While we recognize that there are significant potential conflicts of interest inherent in the brokerage of securities and insurance products by estate planning lawyers to their clients, in keeping with our previous opinions, the Committee concludes that the Rules of Professional Conduct do not expressly prohibit a lawyer from engaging in such ancillary business activities so long as the requirements of ER 1.7(b) and ER 1.8(a) are met."); Ron A. Rhoades, The Attorney as "Complete Advisor" – Fiduciary Ancillary Business Models, Florida Bar J., Mar. 2005, https://www.floridabar.org/the-florida-bar-journal/the-attorney-as-complete-advisorfiduciary-ancillary-business-models/.

15. We conclude that the inquirer's belief that the representation will not be adversely affected is reasonable. This situation is different from one where the legal and financial advice are given simultaneously and intertwined, such as where the lawyer simultaneously gives legal advice about what financial product to purchase and seeks to sell that same product to the client. Compare, e.g., N.Y. State 1200 (lawyer may not simultaneously serve as clients' lawyer and wealth manager). Here, because the decision to retain the Company (and the content of the Company's financial advice) are not intertwined with the inquirer's legal advice about whether to create a trust, the benefit to the lawyer is substantially more attenuated and less likely to influence the lawyer's legal judgment. Moreover, the eventual decision whether or not to retain the lawyer's financial management company will be made by a trustee, who may or may not be or become a client of the law firm. Given these considerations, in our opinion, a lawyer who is mindful of the need to give disinterested advice about whether and how to establish a trust can reasonably avoid being affected by his personal financial interest in serving or having his company serve as financial manager.

16. Accordingly, after the inquirer establishes a separate financial management company with the expectation or hope that the company will manage the assets of client trusts, the inquirer must seek and obtain clients' informed consent at the outset of any estate-planning representation that might lead to advice about whether the client should form a trust, or should pursue any other avenues that might call for employing the lawyer's financial management company. The lawyer must explain the risk that the lawyer's advice will be influenced by the lawyer's self-interest, and the lawyer must explain the alternatives. See Rule 1.0(j) (defining "informed consent"). If the informed client then consents to the representation, the lawyer must confirm the client's consent in writing. See Rule 1.0(e) (defining "confirmed in writing") and Rule 1.7(b)(4) (requiring a lawyer to obtain "informed consent, confirmed in writing" to a consentable conflict arising under Rule 1.7).

Rule 5.7

17. The inquiry also implicates Rule 5.7, which governs lawyers' provision of nonlegal services through entities separate from their law firms. N.Y. State 1155 sets forth relevant considerations under Rule 5.7 and, in general, we refer the inquirer to the framework set forth in that opinion. However, we underscore one particular question, namely, whether the provision of estate-planning services through the law firm will be "distinct from" the provision of financial management services within the meaning of Rule 5.7(a). A lawyer must always comply with the Rules of Professional Conduct with respect to legal services, but if the legal and nonlegal services are *non*distinct, then the inquirer must also comply with the Rules even with respect to the nonlegal services.

18. Under Rule 5.7(a), a lawyer who provides nonlegal services to a client that are "not distinct" from the legal services provided to that client is subject to the Rules, such as those governing competence, confidentiality, and conflicts of interest, with respect to the provision of nonlegal services as well as legal services. Even if the legal and nonlegal services are "distinct," the lawyer is subject to the Rules with respect to the nonlegal services if the client "could reasonably believe that the nonlegal services are the subject of a client-lawyer relationship," see Rule 5.7(a)(3), and it "will be presumed that the person receiving the nonlegal services to be the subject of a client-lawyer relationship" unless the lawyer advises the client in writing to the contrary. See Rule 5.7(a)(4). If the legal and nonlegal services are nondistinct from each other, however, then, as Opinion 1155 discussed, the nonlegal services are subject to the Rules no matter what disclaimer the lawyer provides.

19. N.Y. State 1155 recognized that whether legal and nonlegal services are distinct depends on the facts, but that the most significant consideration is whether the services are integrated. Here, for example, the legal and nonlegal services may or may not be integrated. If the lawyer, in the role of financial manager, discusses with the client how to invest trust assets at the same time as the lawyer, as legal advisor, advises about whether to establish a trust, or if the lawyer drafts a trust instrument naming the company as financial manager, then the services will be nondistinct. Conversely, the services are most likely to be distinct if the lawyer does not offer and provide financial management advice or services through the company until after the trust is established. As we stated in N.Y. State 1155, ¶ 15:

> When a patron of the nonlegal service business uses only that service and not legal services, there is no integrated whole and the nonlegal services are by definition distinct. When, however, the patron of nonlegal financial planning services is also using or has received related legal services of the lawyer, whether the legal and nonlegal services are distinct will depend on the nature of the legal and nonlegal services. When the legal services involve estate planning and the financial planning services including planning investments that would affect the size and composition of the estate or the educational or retirement plan, even if the nonlegal services are provided from a separate entity and at times are not overlapping, we believe the services would be nondistinct. Therefore, the provisions of the Rules will apply to the nonlegal services. [Emphasis added.]

Rule 1.8(a)

20. Even if, in any given estate-planning representation, the legal and nonlegal services are "distinct," the inquirer must nonetheless comply with Rule 1.8(a), which governs business dealings with clients. See N.Y. State 896 (2011) (a law firm providing nonlegal lien search services and legal services must comply with Rule 1.8(a)). As N.Y. State 896 summarizes: "Rule 1.8(a) requires that: (i) the nonlegal services be provided on terms that are 'fair and reasonable' to the client, (ii) the terms on which the nonlegal services will be provided are fully disclosed to the client in writing in understandable form, (iii) the client is advised to seek the advice of independent counsel about the lawyer's provision of the nonlegal services, and (iv) the client gives informed consent, in a writing signed by the client, to the terms of the transaction in which the nonlegal services are provided and to the lawyer's inherent conflict of interest." Id., ¶11.

CONCLUSION:

21. An estate-planning lawyer who has an interest in a nonlegal financial management company that the lawyer hopes to recommend to estate-planning clients as financial manager for the trust assets, has a conflict of interest requiring clients' informed consent, confirmed in writing, at the outset of the representation. Further, if the financial management services and the legal services provided to clients are not distinct from each other, the lawyer is subject to the Rules governing the attorney-client relationship with respect to the nonlegal financial management services. Whether the legal services and nonlegal services are distinct or nondistinct from each other, the lawyer must also comply with the Rules governing business transactions with clients whenever an entity with which the lawyer is affiliated or owns an interest in offers nonlegal services to a client.

OPINION 1232 (11/09/2021)

TOPIC: Attorney advertising

DIGEST: A lawyer who contacts a medical fertility clinic to request to be included on the clinic's website as a lawyer who practices in the area of assisted reproduction is engaged in attorney advertising, but not solicitation.

RULES: 7.1, 7.2, 7.3

FACTS:

1. The inquiring lawyer would like to contact a medical clinic, which specializes in fertility procedures, to request that he be included on their website as a potential referral for legal representation and consultation in the area of assisted reproduction. The clinic's website mentions a number of attorneys in New York that the clinic suggests could be retained in that area of practice. The lawyer would not be seeking to be retained by the medical clinic.

QUESTION:

2. Does the proposed communication to the medical clinic constitute attorney advertising, and if so, is it also a solicitation?

OPINION:

3. New York Rule of Professional Conduct ("Rule) 1.0(a) defines "advertisement" as follows:

> (a) "Advertisement" means any public or private communication made by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm about that lawyer or law firm's services, the primary purpose of which is for the retention of the lawyer or law firm. It does not include communications to existing clients or other lawyers.

4. The inquirer's proposed communication with the clinic is attorney advertising because the inquirer seeks to communicate his area of practice on the clinic's website in order to be considered for retention by those who view the website. The inquirer must therefore meet the requirements for attorney advertising set forth in Rule 7.1.

5. However, as we will now explain, the communication is not a "solicitation" under the Rules.

6. Rule 7.3(b) provides that "solicitation" is a form of "advertisement" that satisfies certain specific criteria:

> (b) For purposes of this Rule [7.3], "solicitation" includes any advertisement initiated by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm; that is directed to, or targeted at, a specific recipient or group of recipients or their family members or legal representatives, the primary purpose of which is the retention of the lawyer or law firm, and a significant > motive for which is pecuniary gain. It does not include a proposal or other writing prepared and delivered in response to a specific request.

7. The inquirer is seeking the website posting for the "primary purpose" of "retention" for "pecuniary gain," but that posting will not be "directed to" or "targeted at" a specific recipient or group of recipients or their family members or legal representatives. Thus, the website posting does not meet all of the elements of a solicitation. Comment [4] to Rule 7.3 explains:

> Unless it falls within Comment [3], an advertisement in public media such as newspapers, television, billboards, websites or the like is presumed not to be directed to or targeted at a specific recipient or recipients.  Likewise, an advertisement by a patent lawyer is not directed or targeted within the meaning of the definition solely because the magazine is geared toward inventors. Similarly, a lawyer could advertise on television or in a newspaper to the general public that the lawyer practices in the area of personal injury or Workers' Compensation law. The fact that some recipients of such advertisements might actually be in need of specific legal services at the time of the communication does not transform such advertisements into solicitations.

8. Comment [3] to Rule 7.3 provides that a website-posted advertisement will constitute a solicitation "if it makes reference to a specific person or group of people whose legal needs arise out of a specific incident to which the advertisement explicitly refers." (Emphasis added.) But Comment [5] to Rule 7.3 makes clear that a "specific incident" within the meaning of Comment [3] involves "potential claims for personal injury or wrongful death" arising from a "particular identifiable event (or a sequence of events of related events occurring at approximately the same time and place) that causes harm to one or more people. Specific incidents include such events as traffic accidents, plane or train crashes, explosions, building collapses, and the like."

9. Because the website posting requested by inquirer does not fall within the circumstances described within Comments [3] [4] and [5] of the Rule 7.3, it would not be a prohibited solicitation.

10. We caution, however, that the inquirer should not offer anything of value to the clinic in exchange for being included on its website as such an offer would constitute an improper payment of a referral fee. See Rule 7.2 (prohibiting, with limited exceptions, compensating or giving anything of value to a person or organization to recommend or obtain employment by a client, or as a reward for having made a recommendation resulting in employment by a client").

CONCLUSION:

11. A lawyer who contacts a medical fertility clinic to request to be included on the clinic's website as a lawyer who practices in the area of assisted reproduction is engaged in attorney advertising, but not solicitation.

OPINION 1233 (12/07/2021)

TOPIC: Law firm associates and the phrase "and Associates" in law firm name

DIGEST: A sole practitioner may not refer to associates of other law firms with whom she works as "associates" of her firm and may not include in her law firm name the phrase "and Associates" when she is referring to associates employed by another firm.

RULE: 7.5(b)

FACTS:

1. Inquirer is a sole practitioner who works with other law firms on all of her matters. Inquirer's law firm does not employ any lawyers.

QUESTIONS:

2. May the inquirer refer to the lawyers in the firms with which she works as "associates" of the inquirer's law firm? With reference to those lawyers, may the inquirer include in her firm name the phrase "and Associates"?

OPINION:

3. Rule 7.5(b)(1)(iii) provides:

> A lawyer in private practice shall not practice under . . . a name that is misleading as to the identity of the lawyers practicing under such name.

4. Comment [5] to Rule 7.5 provides:

> Lawyers may not imply or hold themselves out as practicing together in one firm when they are not a 'firm' . . . because to do so would be false and misleading. . . . It is also misleading for lawyers to hold themselves out as being counsel, associates, or other affiliates of a law firm if that is not a fact, or to hold themselves out as partners, counsel, or associates if they only share offices. Likewise, law firms may not claim to be affiliated with other law firms if that is not a fact.

5. The term "associate" has a recognized meaning in the legal profession. It refers to a lawyer who is a paid employee of a law firm, not a partner or shareholder in that firm. See N.Y. State 1137 ¶ 9 (2017) ("The term 'associate' often conveys the status of a junior lawyer who is not a partner or principal but is regularly employed by the firm.") See also N.Y. City 1996-8 (the term associate "has been interpreted by courts and other ethics committees to mean a salaried lawyer-employee who is not a partner of a firm").

6. Accordingly, a lawyer may not refer to other lawyers as "associates," unless those lawyers are actually paid employees of the lawyer's law firm. It is not sufficient that the inquiring lawyer works with those lawyers and their law firms on a frequent or even exclusive basis.

7. By parity of reasoning, the inquiring lawyer may not include in her firm name the phrase "and Associates" in reliance upon the fact that she works on all her matters with other law firms that do employ associates. Using the phrase "and Associates" when she has no associates would be false, deceptive, and misleading in at least two respects. First, it would falsely imply that inquirer's firm is larger than it actually is and possesses greater professional resources to devote to a client's service. Second, it would falsely imply that inquirer, as an employer of associates, had the capacity to control and give direction to junior attorneys when, in fact, the power to supervise or control the activities of those junior attorneys is vested in their supervisors at the other firms that employ them.

8. Even though the inquirer may not use a law firm name implying that she has "associates" in the traditional sense of employed junior lawyers, her firm might have a sufficiently close relationship with lawyers at other firms to describe them in her marketing materials as "associated" or "affiliated" with her firm. However, whether she may do so without running afoul of the prohibition on "false, deceptive, or misleading" advertising, see Rule 7.1(a), or violating the prohibition against conduct involving "deceit" or "misrepresentation," see Rule 8.4(c), is a fact-based inquiry, and we lack sufficient context to make that determination.

CONCLUSION:

9. A sole practitioner may not refer to associates employed by other law firms with whom she works as "associates" of her firm and may not include in her law firm name the phrase "and Associates" when she is referring solely to associates employed by another firm.

OPINION 1234 (12/07/2021)

TOPIC: Ownership of New York Law Firm by Nonlawyers

DIGEST: A New York lawyer may not be a partner, associate or employee of a law firm in New York or in another jurisdiction that has direct or indirect ownership by nonlawyers in accordance with the rules applicable in that jurisdiction, unless the lawyer is licensed in the other jurisdiction and principally practices in such jurisdiction, and the predominant effect of the lawyer's conduct is not in New York. A New York lawyer may be employed in a senior leadership position in a law firm in another jurisdiction that has nonlawyer ownership in accordance with the rules of that jurisdiction, as long as the lawyer principally practices in such jurisdiction, and the predominant effect of the lawyer's conduct is not in New York. Whether a New York lawyer may practice with a valid license in another jurisdiction after retiring from the practice of law in New York is a question of law on which we cannot opine. If a lawyer may lawfully do so, then whether the New York Rules will continue to apply to the lawyer will depend on the type of retirement the lawyer chooses.

RULES: 5.4(d) and 8.5(b)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a New York lawyer practicing with a New York law firm. He resides overseas and does not currently have any clients physically located in New York, but other New York attorneys in his firm are apparently practicing in New York and serving New York clients. The inquirer is pending admission to the bars in certain U.S. states and foreign countries which permit nonlawyer ownership of law firms. Recently, a publicly traded law firm based in England (the "English firm") has proposed to purchase the inquirer's New York firm, or to merge with it. The English firm has nonlawyer ownership, although the majority shareholder and other shareholders are attorneys licensed in England and Wales.

QUESTION:

2. The inquirer asks questions about three distinct scenarios:

   A. May the inquirer sell his New York firm in its entirety to the English firm if the New York firm would become a wholly-owned subsidiary of the English firm and would employ New York licensed attorneys as employees and not as shareholders? If not, may the inquirer sell a majority interest in the New York firm to the English firm, with the inquirer and other New York attorneys remaining as shareholders?

   B. May the inquirer be employed directly by the English firm in a senior leadership role based in the United Kingdom or European Union if he continues to practice in New York? If not, would it make a difference if the inquirer ceased to practice law in New York, removed references to New York admission, and did not advise clients on matters of New York law, but continued to practice under his licenses elsewhere?

   C. May the inquirer retire from the practice of law in New York, while continuing to practice with a valid license in another jurisdiction?

OPINION:

Ownership of All or Part of a New York Law Firm by Nonlawyers

3. Although we answer questions only about an inquirer's own proposed conduct, and not the conduct of other lawyers, the inquirer's first question is in effect a question on behalf of both himself and his firm. (New York is one of the only jurisdictions in the United States where a law firm as an entity is subject to discipline.) This opinion will therefore discuss the application of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") to other New York lawyers in the inquirer's firm, since their conduct may affect whether the inquirer and his firm may ethically enter into the proposed transaction.

4. Rule 5.4 (Professional Independence of a Lawyer) prohibits a lawyer or law firm from sharing legal fees with a nonlawyer, prohibits a lawyer from forming a partnership with a nonlawyer if the activities of the partnership include practicing law, and prohibits a lawyer from practicing in an entity authorized to practice law for profit in which a nonlawyer owns any interest or serves as a director or officer or has the right to direct or control the professional judgment of a lawyer. Specifically, Rule 5.4 provides:

> (a) A lawyer or law firm shall not share legal fees with a nonlawyer [except in certain circumstances not relevant here].
> (b) A lawyer shall not form a partnership with a nonlawyer if any of the activities of the partnership consist of the practice of law.
> * * *
> (d) A lawyer shall not practice with or in the form of an entity authorized to practice law for profit, if:
> > (1) a nonlawyer owns any interest therein, except that a fiduciary representative of the estate of a lawyer may hold the stock or interest of the lawyer for a reasonable time during administration;
> > (2) a nonlawyer is a member, corporate director or officer thereof or occupies a position of similar responsibility in any form of association other than a corporation; or
> > (3) a nonlawyer has the right to direct or control the professional judgment of a lawyer.

5. Comment [1] to Rule 5.4 explains that the purpose of the Rule is to protect the independence of the lawyer's professional judgment. Similarly, Comment [2] to the Rule notes: "This Rule also expresses traditional limitations on permitting a third party to direct or regulate the lawyer's professional judgment in rendering legal services to another."

6. Another provision of the Rules that is relevant to multi-jurisdictional practice is Rule 8.5, the provision governing disciplinary authority and choice of law. That Rule provides:

> (a) A lawyer admitted to practice in this state is subject to the disciplinary authority of this state, regardless of where the lawyer's conduct occurs. A lawyer may be subject to the disciplinary authority of both this state and another jurisdiction where the lawyer is admitted for the same conduct.
> (b) In any exercise of the disciplinary authority of this state, the rules of professional conduct to be applied shall be as follows:
>
> > (1) For conduct in connection with a proceeding in a court before which a lawyer has been admitted to practice (either generally or for purposes of that proceeding), the rules to be applied shall be the rules of the jurisdiction in which the court sits, unless the rules of the court provide otherwise; and
> > (2) For any other conduct:
> >
> > > (i) If the lawyer is licensed to practice only in this state, the rules to be applied shall be the rules of this state, and
> > > (ii) If the lawyer is licensed to practice in this state and another jurisdiction, the rules to be applied shall be the rules of the admitting jurisdiction in which the lawyer principally practices; provided, however, that if particular conduct clearly has its predominant effect in another jurisdiction in which the lawyer is licensed to practice, the rules of that jurisdiction shall be applied to that conduct.

7. Thus, under Rule 8.5(b)(2)(ii), if a lawyer is licensed to practice in New York and another jurisdiction (as the inquirer here will be if his pending applications for admission to other bars are approved), then the New York Rules of Professional Conduct apply only in two circumstances: (a) the lawyer "principally practices" in New York and the "predominant effect" of the lawyer's conduct is in New York; or (b) the lawyer does not principally practice in New York but the "particular conduct" at issue "clearly has its predominant effect" in New York. (In contrast, whether the dual-licensed lawyer principally practices in New York or elsewhere, if the "predominant effect" is in the lawyer's non-New York jurisdiction, then the New York Rules will not apply.)

8. Our Committee has written a number of opinions on Rule 5.4 and Rule 8.5 as they apply to arrangements between a New York lawyer or law firm, on the one hand, and a non-New York law firm with nonlawyer owners in a jurisdiction that permits nonlawyer ownership of law firms, on the other hand. See N.Y. State 1166 (2019), N.Y. State 1093 (2016), N.Y. State 1041 (2014), N.Y. State 1041 (2014), N.Y. State 1038 (2014), N.Y. State 1027 (2014), N.Y. State 1023 (2014). Our opinions may be divided into two groups: (1) opinions where the lawyer proposes to principally practice law in New York, and (2) opinions where the lawyer will not principally practice in New York and the lawyer's conduct will not have its predominant effect in New York.

If the Inquiring Lawyer or Other Lawyers in the Firm will Practice in New York

9. In N.Y. State 1038 (2014), the inquirer was a New York lawyer who was also admitted in D.C., a jurisdiction that allows a law firm to have nonlawyer partners in limited circumstances. The inquirer proposed to join the D.C. firm and to staff an office in New York to handle New York cases. The inquirer would either join the D.C. firm as a partner or be a partner in a separate wholly-owned subsidiary of the D.C. firm, which the New York lawyer would independently manage. Applying Rule 8.5, the Committee determined that the lawyer's "conduct" was equivalent to "practicing in New York in a partnership with a nonlawyer partner and sharing legal fees from New York matters with a nonlawyer partner." This, we decided, was not conduct "in connection with" a particular New York proceeding in a court within the meaning of Rule 8.5(b)(1), even if the New York lawyer would be involved in New York litigation. Rather, the applicable provision was Rule 8.5(b)(2) ("any other conduct") and, since the lawyer was "licensed to practice in this state and another jurisdiction" (New York and D.C.), the questions were (a) where did the lawyer "principally practice[]" and (b) in which of these jurisdictions did the lawyer's conduct clearly have its "predominant effect"? We concluded that the conduct of practicing in New York with a partnership with a nonlawyer partner and sharing legal fees from New York matters with the nonlawyer partners would have its predominant effect in New York. Here, similarly, since the purpose of the proposed arrangement seems to be to have an office in New York staffed by New York lawyers, the "predominant effect" would clearly be in New York. Consequently, the New York Rules of Professional Conduct will apply, rather than the Rules of the non-New York jurisdiction, and the proposed firm here would likewise violate Rule 5.4.

10. Our other opinions addressing Rule 5.4 and Rule 8.5 have employed a similar analysis. See, e.g., N.Y. State 1190 (2020) (a professional limited liability company with nonlawyer members may not provide legal services in New York), N.Y. State 1041 (2014) (a New York lawyer may practice in a foreign country with an entity that includes a nonlawyer supervisor or owner if the predominant effect of the lawyer's practice is not in New York), N.Y. State 911 (2012) (a New York lawyer may not establish the New York office of a U.K. law firm with nonlawyer owners, because, even if the New York lawyers also were admitted in the U.K., the predominant effect of their conduct would be in New York); N.Y. State 889 (2011) (a lawyer licensed in both New York and D.C. may practice in a D.C. firm with nonlawyer members if he principally practices in D.C. and receives a majority of his revenue from D.C. cases and matters, but if the partnership were created for the purpose of practice in New York, establishing it in D.C. would be ineffective to circumvent the New York rules on fee sharing.)

11. In N.Y. State 1038, we also addressed whether a New York firm could be a wholly-owned subsidiary of a non-New York law firm with nonlawyer owners, rather than being directly owned by nonlawyers. We did not find the answer to this question directly in Rule 5.4, but we concluded that such indirect ownership by nonlawyers would be prohibited, because Rule 8.4(a) prohibits a lawyer from violating the Rules indirectly "through the acts of another." If a New York law firm were owned by a non-New York firm with nonlawyer owners, the New York firm would be violating Rule 5.4(d) indirectly, through the acts of non-New York lawyers who permitted their firm to have nonlawyer owners. In addition, Opinion 1038 noted that Rule 5.4(d) prohibits a lawyer (whether a partner, associate, or employee of a law firm) from practicing "with or in the form of an entity authorized to practice law for profit, if . . . a nonlawyer owns any interest therein" or "has the right to direct or control the professional judgment of a lawyer." (Emphasis added.) We interpreted the term "owns any interest therein" in Rule 5.4(d) to extend to an indirect ownership interest. Thus, the inquirer here may not escape Rule 5.4(d) by practicing in a law firm that is a wholly-owned subsidiary of a non-New York law firm with nonlawyer owners.

Would it Make a Difference if the UK Firm Owned Less Than a Majority of the New York Firm?

12. A limited number of U.S. jurisdictions have modified their versions of Rule 5.4 to allow some nonlawyer ownership of a law firm and to allow lawyers to share legal fees with nonlawyers. In 2021, for example, Arizona eliminated its version of Rule 5.4 entirely and substituted a system in which Arizona law firms with nonlawyer owners may be certified by the Arizona Supreme Court as "alternative business structures." In 2020, the Utah Supreme Court created a pilot program – a so-called legal-regulatory "sandbox" – that allows Court-approved entities to include nonlawyer owners. Decades ago, the District of Columbia modified its version of Rule 5.4 to allow firms to have nonlawyer partners if (among other restrictions) those nonlawyers provide professional services that assist the law firm in delivering legal services. See also Wash. R. of Prof'l Conduct 5.9 (authorizing ownership by Limited License Legal Technicians). Moreover, the American Bar Association and certain states have committed to exploring the issue of nonlawyer ownership of legal service providers, sometimes where nonlawyers own less than a majority of the firm. See generally ABA 499 (2021) (discussing jurisdictions that allow nonlawyer ownership of law firms and concluding that lawyers in other jurisdictions may ethically have a "passive" ownership interest in such law firms).

13. New York is not among the jurisdictions that allow nonlawyer ownership. New York Rule 5.4(d) prohibits a New York lawyer from practicing in an entity authorized to practice law for profit if a nonlawyer owns any interest. Cf. N.Y. City 2020-1 entitled "Ongoing Relationships with Alternative Legal Business Entities" (concluding that a New York lawyer may enter into a non-exclusive ongoing co-counsel relationship with a firm with nonlawyer owners as long as the New York lawyer is not employed by the firm, is not a partner or shareholder in the firm, and has no similar role with the firm).

May the inquirer be employed directly by the English firm in a senior leadership role based in the UK/EU?

14. The inquirer's second question assumes the firm will not have a New York office but that the inquirer would be employed in the U.K. in a senior leadership position.

15. The inquirer does not describe what his duties as a senior leader would be, but we assume he would not be practicing law in New York. Not only would practicing New York law implicate the problems under Rule 5.4 discussed above, but it also would implicate Section 470 of the New York Judiciary Law. Under that statute,"[a] non-resident attorney who is admitted to practice in New York and who practices New York law must have an office in New York that meets the minimum requirements of Section 470, but we express no opinion as to what Section 470 requires." N.Y. State 1223 ¶ 14 (2021); see also N.Y. State 1025 (2014) (an attorney who is admitted to practice in New York and advertises his or her law practice in New York, but who does not reside in New York, must have an office that meets the minimum requirements of Judiciary Law §470, whatever those requirements may be). Section 470 would not be applicable if no lawyer in the firm were practicing law in New York.

16. If the inquirer in his capacity as a senior leader principally practices in the U.K. and his activities do not clearly have their predominant effect in New York, then we see no problem with this role.

May the Inquirer Retire from Practice in New York and Continue to Practice with a Valid License in Another Jurisdiction?

17. Finally, the inquirer asks if he may "retire" from the practice of law in New York but continue to practice in another jurisdiction in which the inquirer is licensed. As we pointed out in N.Y. State 1172 ¶8 (2019), there are several ways by which a lawyer might seek to "retire" from law practice in New York.

18. One way of retiring is for the lawyer to stops practicing law in New York, but to retain his or her license through ongoing registration with the Office of Court Administration and compliance with New York's mandatory continuing legal education (CLE) requirements. Such a person is still a New York lawyer and remains subject to the Rules, including Rule 5.4 and Rule 8.5. Consequently, if the inquirer used this method to retire, Rule 8.5(b)(2)(ii) would apply, requiring an analysis of where the lawyer "principally practices" and where his conduct clearly has its "predominant effect".

19. Another way of retiring from New York law practice is for a lawyer to change his or her New York registration status to "retired" under Section 118.1(g) of the Rules of the Chief Administrative Judge, 22 NYCRR §118.1(g). Lawyers who retire via this method are exempt from paying the biennial registration fee and from complying with the mandatory CLE requirement, but they may render legal services "without compensation." Those lawyers remain members of the bar and thus are subject to the Rules, including Rule 5.4 and Rule 8.5. As we said in N.Y. State 1172, this change in registration does not strip the lawyer of a license to practice law but instead places parameters on the lawyer's practice. However, under §118.1(g) this form of retirement does not appear to be available to lawyers who confine their practice to a foreign jurisdiction. Moreover, in Matter of Attorneys in Violation of Judiciary Law § 468-a [DaCunzo], __ A.D.3d ___ (Nov. 4, 2021), the court held that a lawyer may not "retire" from practice in New York but continue to practice in another jurisdiction because §118.1(g) provides that the practice of law includes the giving of legal advice in New York "or elsewhere." The DaCunzo court therefore held that respondent's claim that she was retired was improper because she still practiced outside New York. Whether this interpretation is correct is a question of law on which we cannot opine, but the inquirer should research the law carefully before choosing this method of retirement.

20. A third method of "retiring" is for a lawyer to voluntarily and formally resign from the New York bar. The Rules for Attorney Disciplinary Matters of the Supreme Court, Appellate Division, which are contained in 22 NYCRR Part 1240, provide for voluntary resignation from the bar for non-disciplinary reasons as follows:

> § 1240.22 Resignation for Non-Disciplinary Reasons; Reinstatement (a) Resignation of attorney for non-disciplinary reasons. (1) An attorney may apply to the Court for permission to resign from the bar for non-disciplinary reasons by submitting an affida> vit in the form in Appendix E to these Rules. . . . (2) When the Court determines that an attorney is eligible to resign for non disciplinary reasons, it shall enter an order removing the attorney's name from the roll of attorneys and stating the non-disciplinary nature of the resignation.

21. If this form of resignation has been accepted by one of the Appellate Divisions, such individual is no longer a member of the New York bar and therefore is no longer subject to the New York Rules of Professional Conduct.

CONCLUSION:

22. A New York lawyer may not be a partner, associate or employee of a law firm in New York or in another jurisdiction that has direct or indirect ownership by nonlawyers in accordance with the rules applicable in that jurisdiction, unless the lawyer is lawfully practicing in the other jurisdiction and principally practices in such jurisdiction, and the predominant effect of the lawyer's conduct is not clearly in New York. A New York lawyer may be employed in a senior leadership position in a law firm in another jurisdiction that has nonlawyer ownership in accordance with the rules of that jurisdiction, as long as the lawyer principally practices in such jurisdiction, and the predominant effect of the lawyer's conduct is not clearly in New York. Whether a New York lawyer may retire from the practice of law in New York while continuing to practice in another jurisdiction is a question of law on which we cannot opine. If a lawyer may lawfully do so, then whether the New York Rules will continue to apply to the lawyer will depend on the type of retirement the lawyer chooses.

OPINION 1235 (01/03/2022)

TOPIC: Firm Name; Trade Names; Assumed Names

DIGEST: A law firm may operate under two different assumed names that distinguish separate practice areas of the firm, provided that no particular facts and circumstances would make it false, deceptive, or misleading to do so.

RULE: 7.5(b)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer's law firm is developing a new practice area that will differ substantially from the firm's current practice area. To keep the practices separate and to enhance branding for the new practice area, the firm will operate the two practice areas under separate assumed names (also referred to as d/b/a or "doing business as" certificates). Each practice area, using its assumed name, will have its own marketing materials and website. The firm name will be disclosed wherever the assumed names are posted or published.

QUESTION:

2. May a law firm operate under more than one assumed name?

OPINION:

3. On June 24, 2020, the New York Courts amended Rule 7.5(b) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") to permit lawyers to practice under trade names that are not false, deceptive, or misleading, We applied the amended rule to several situations in N.Y. State 1207 ¶ 5 (2020), stating: "A law firm may practice in New York using a name that is not the name of any lawyer practicing in the firm – in other words, under a trade name – so long as the name under which the firm practices is not false, deceptive or misleading." In N.Y. State 1226 ¶ 9 (2021), we applied amended Rule 7.5(b) to domain names. The inquirer in Opinion 1226 wished to use a domain name for his website and email address that was different from the name he used for the law firm. We approved, saying: "Nothing in the Rules prohibits use of a domain name different from the name of the law firm." We cautioned, however, that we "could conceive of circumstances where the differing names might otherwise violate Rule 7.5(b) . . . ."

4. The same analysis applies to the current inquiry. In our view, there is nothing inherently false, deceptive or misleading in a single law firm using two separate assumed names when holding itself out or marketing itself as a provider of legal services in two distinct practice areas, but there could well be particular facts and circumstances that would cause us to reach a different conclusion in a different case. No such particular facts or circumstances were presented to us here, especially where the firm will disclose its full name wherever the assumed names are posted or published, so we conclude that using two distinct "d/b/a" names for different practice areas within the same firm would not be false, deceptive, or misleading and thus would not violate Rule 7.5(b).

CONCLUSION:

5. A law firm entity may operate under two different assumed names that distinguish separate practice areas provided that no particular facts and circumstances would make it false, deceptive, or misleading to do so.

OPINION 1236 (01/13/2022)

Modifies N.Y. State 613 (1990)

TOPIC: Divorce mediation, limited scope legal services, non-resident lawyers, ghostwriting DIGEST: A New York lawyer may perform divorce mediation services for New York clients from his office in another state, provided that he makes effective disclosure of the differences in his role as mediator/neutral and lawyer and explains that he is not representing either party when he serves as a mediator. Where the mediation is successful, the lawyer may thereafter represent one of the parties to prepare a settlement agreement or other papers for the client to file pro se in the divorce proceeding, provided the lawyer obtains informed written consent from the non-represented mediation party.

A New York lawyer may also, in a pending or contemplated divorce action, enter a limited scope retainer with New York clients undertaking to provide legal advice, negotiate a settlement, or prepare legal documents for filing by the client pro se with a court in New York, provided the lawyer informs the prospective client regarding the relative risks of limited representation and benefits of full-service representation. In connection with providing these legal services, the New York lawyer cannot call himself a "legal consultant" instead of a lawyer.

A New York lawyer who resides in Florida but represents New York divorce clients over the internet from his law office in Florida must comply with the physical office requirement of New York Judiciary Law § 470.

RULES: 1.2(c), 1.12(b), 2.4, 8.4(b)-(c)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a matrimonial attorney admitted in New York and Florida. He is closing his New York office and moving to Florida. He plans to open a Florida office to provide divorce mediation services for New York clients over the internet, and to serve as what he refers to as a "legal consultant" on issues of New York divorce law. His services as a legal consultant would include negotiating divorce settlements and drafting legal papers to be filed pro se by New York clients in New York courts.

2. The inquirer proposes to advise any New York client that wishes to retain him as a "legal consultant" of the risks associated with not having a full-service attorney representing the client, to make clear that he would not appear on the client's behalf in court, and to disclose that he would not be maintaining a physical law office in New York.

QUESTIONS:

3. The facts provided by the inquirer raise five related questions:

    a. If a mediation is successful, may the lawyer-mediator represent one of the parties in preparing a settlement agreement (or other papers) for the client to file pro se in the divorce proceeding?

b. May a New York lawyer, in connection with a pending or contemplated divorce action, enter a limited scope retainer with a New York client undertaking to provide legal advice, negotiate a settlement, and/or prepare legal documents for the client to file pro se with a New York court?

c. May a lawyer prepare legal papers on behalf of a pro se client for submission to court without disclosing his role in preparing those papers?

d. May a New York lawyer providing limited legal services market himself as a "legal consultant" instead of a lawyer?

e. Must a New York lawyer who resides outside New York but provides legal services to New York clients via the internet maintain a physical office in New York?

OPINION:

May a lawyer who has successfully handled a divorce mediation subsequently prepare papers for one of the mediation parties to file in a New York court to obtain a judgment of divorce?

4. The inquirer plans to offer mediation services over the internet to divorcing couples. If the parties to the mediation process reach a settlement agreement, the inquirer hopes to be retained by one of the mediation parties to prepare a marital settlement agreement and the other requisite pleadings and documents to be filed in a New York court to obtain a judgment of divorce.

5. When serving as a neutral, a lawyer is governed Rule 2.4 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"). Rule 2.4(a) provides that a lawyer serves as a "third-party neutral" when the lawyer "assists two or more persons who are not clients of the lawyer to reach a resolution of a dispute or other matter that has arisen between them." In N.Y. State 1178 (2019), we concluded that "lawyer-mediators are not engaged in the representation of a client and are not providing legal services to the parties to the mediation." As a result, while Rule 2.4 expressly applies to lawyers acting as mediators, the Rules governing the representation of clients do not. See N.Y. State 1178.

6. However, when serving as a mediator, a lawyer-mediator must make certain disclosures. Rule 2.4(b) requires a lawyer-mediator to "inform unrepresented parties that the lawyer is not representing them." Rule 2.4(b) continues: "When the lawyer knows or reasonably should know that a party does not understand the lawyer's role in the matter, the lawyer shall explain the difference between the lawyer's role as a third-party neutral and a lawyer's role as one who represents a client." The effort should be made even where the legal issues in the matrimonial mediation are subtle or complex, or the parties are unequal in their sophistication and bargaining power. See N.Y. State 1178 ¶ 8.

7. Rule 2.4 addresses a lawyer's duties during a mediation, but not after. For a lawyer's duties after a mediation, we must examine Rule 1.12(b), which addresses specific conflicts of interest of mediators or other third-party neutrals. Rule 1.12(b)(1) says that in most circumstances, "unless all parties to the proceeding give informed consent, confirmed in writing, a lawyer shall not represent anyone in connection with a matter in which the lawyer participated personally and substantially as . . . (1) an arbitrator, mediator or other third-party neutral . . . ." (Emphasis added.) In other words, Rule 1.12(b)(1) expressly permits a lawyer-mediator at the conclusion of the mediation to represent one of the parties to the mediation with the "informed consent" of all parties to the mediation.

8. What must the lawyer mediator disclose to obtain "informed consent" to representing one of the parties against the other after the mediation? We believe the lawyer mediator must make clear that (i) he is representing only one of the parties, and (ii) the unrepresented spouse should consult independent counsel. Thus, if the lawyer mediator makes such disclosure and obtains consent from all parties to the mediation, the lawyer mediator may draft a post-mediation settlement agreement or other legal document relevant to the divorce proceeding for only one of the parties. In so doing, as the lawyer has clearly crossed the line from providing mediation services to providing legal services, he becomes subject to the full panoply of legal and ethical rules applicable to the provision of those legal services. See N.Y. State 1178 (2019), citing N.Y. State 1026 (2014) (concluding that a lawyer performs legal services when the lawyer drafts and files divorce papers on behalf of the parties).

May a lawyer enter into a limited scope retainer agreement regarding a pending or potential New York divorce proceeding which provides that the lawyer is being retained to perform discrete out-of-court legal tasks?

9. Separate and apart from his mediation practice, the inquirer also proposes to perform a host of legal services for New York divorce clients pursuant to a limited scope retainer. The scope of his representation would be limited to providing legal advice, negotiating divorce settlements, and drafting legal papers pertinent to the divorce. The inquirer would not file court papers or appear in court.

10. Rule 1.2(c) expressly permits limited scope representation subject to certain conditions. It provides that a lawyer "may limit the scope of the representation if the limitation is reasonable under the circumstances, the client gives informed consent and where necessary notice is given to the tribunal and/or opposing counsel." See N.Y. State 856 (2011) (limited scope representations are permissible if the client gives informed consent, the scope of the representation is reasonable, and the limitation is not prejudicial to the administration of justice). Comments [6] – [8] to Rule 1.2 provide helpful guidance on limited scope representation.

11. In particular, Comment [6A] to Rule 1.2 provides that in obtaining consent from the client "the lawyer must adequately disclose the limitations on the scope of the engagement" as well as the "reasonably foreseeable consequences of the limitation." Comment [6A] also explains that such consequences could include "delay, additional expense and complications" if the lawyer or client later determines that additional services outside the limited scope specified "are necessary or advisable" to adequately represent the client. In that case, "the client may need to retain separate counsel."

12. Further, Comment [8] to Rule 1.2 provides that in a limited scope representation, as in all agreements concerning a lawyer's representation, a lawyer must act in accord with the Rules of Professional Conduct and other law. Thus, to the extent the inquirer seeks to continue to provide legal services for a fee for New York clients despite the closure of his New York office, he may only do so if he complies with "other law." We do not opine on questions of law, so we offer no opinion on which particular "other law" applies to a lawyer who has closed his New York office but continues to practice in another jurisdiction where he is licensed, but the inquirer should consider the applicability of 22 NYCRR § 118.1(g) (governing retired lawyers), which may mandate continuing his biennial attorney registration, filing the required forms, paying the required fee, and completing the mandatory continuing legal education requirements. See N.Y. State 1172 ¶ 8 (2019). If the inquirer is closing his New York office but continuing to practice in New York remotely, then he should also consider the implications of New York Judiciary Law § 470 (discussed below).

13. We believe such limited scope can be reasonable provided the client understands the risks associated with not having a full-service legal representation at every stage of the proceeding inside and outside of the courtroom, the client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing, and the inquirer complies with other applicable ethics rules and law. In fact, such limited scope representation may be the only viable alternative for clients who cannot afford more extensive representation and, for both clients and the courts, is normally preferable to no legal representation at all. See N.Y. County 742 (2010) (noting that "limited scope legal arrangements with pro se litigants can provide equal access to justice for pro se litigants who do not qualify for or are without access to free legal services but who are nonetheless unable to afford prevailing legal fees,"). Nor does a limitation on the scope of the inquirer's services appear to be prejudicial to the administration of justice, because counsel's assistance can avoid delay and needless motion practice often caused by a pro se litigant's lack of familiarity with legal and procedural issues. Id.

May a lawyer prepare legal papers on behalf of a pro se client for submission to court without disclosing his role in preparing those papers?

14. The inquirer here does not intend to appear as counsel of record on any matter in which he has provided limited scope legal services. Rather, whether preparing an uncontested application for a divorce judgment following a successful mediation or preparing papers in a contested matter, the inquirer intends the clients to submit papers to the court pro se. Must the inquirer disclose his behind-the-scenes role as a "ghostwriter" of these applications? Rule 1.2(c) addresses this issue but does not answer it, stating: "A lawyer may limit the scope of the representation if the limitation is reasonable under the circumstances, the client gives informed consent and where necessary notice is provided to the tribunal and/or opposing counsel." (Emphasis added.)

15. Based on the plain language of Rule 1.2(c), N.Y. County 742 (2010) concluded that disclosure of the fact that a pro se litigant's court submission was prepared by counsel is required only "where necessary," not in every case. Specifically, N.Y. County 742 said that disclosure was "necessary" where mandated by a procedural rule, a court rule, particular judge's rule, a judge's order in a particular case, or whenever the failure to disclose an attorney's assistance in ghostwriting would constitute a "misrepresentation." We relied on N.Y. County 742 in N.Y. State 856 ¶ 10 (2011) ("we think notice of the limited representation is 'necessary' under Rule 1.2(c) only if a court rule requires such notice, and we lack jurisdiction to interpret court rules"), and we still agree with N.Y. County 742 that disclosure of ghostwriting is not required unless any of those circumstances apply. To the extent we held in N.Y. State 613 (1990) that disclosure of the identity of the lawyer to the court and the opposing party is required whenever a lawyer ghostwrites pleadings for a pro se party, we overrule that opinion, because it was issued before New York adopted Rule 1.2(c).

May the lawyer call himself a "legal consultant" and not a lawyer with respect to his intended limited scope of services?

16. The inquirer intends to use the term "legal consultant" in his retainers and in dealing with adverse counsel in negotiating divorce settlements. We do not approve, as the inquirer's use of the term "legal consultant" would have the potential to confuse or mislead clients or adverse counsel.

17. Although the Rules do not define the term "legal consultant," the "Rules of the Court of Appeals for the Licensing of Legal Consultants" (22 NYCRR Part 521) make clear that the term refers to a member in good standing of a recognized legal profession in a foreign country who intends to practice as a legal consultant in New York and maintain an office New York for that purpose. See 22 NYCRR § 521.1(a)(1) and (5). The inquirer does not qualify as a "legal consultant" under Part 521.

18. Apart from the problem of Part 521, the phrase "legal consultant" has no fixed meaning but seems to suggest that the person is something more than an ordinary layman but less than a lawyer. It thus seems as if the inquirer desires to use the term "legal consultant" in the hope that it will relieve him of some of the duties and obligations that are imposed upon lawyers. It does not. When the inquirer represents or advises clients or otherwise acts as a lawyer, he remains subject to all legal and ethical rules applicable to the provision of legal services. See N.Y. State 1178 (2019).

19. Thus, the use of the term "legal consultant" has the potential to mislead clients and others in violation of Rule 8.4(c), which prohibits a lawyer from engaging in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit, or misrepresentation.

Must an attorney residing in Florida and practicing law in New York over the internet maintain a physical office in New York?

20. The inquiry raises a final question: may the inquirer practice law in New York via the internet if he resides in Florida and does not maintain a physical office in New York? While this Committee does not opine upon questions of law, we note that New York Judiciary Law § 470 provides that a non-resident attorney admitted in New York may practice law in New York only if that attorney maintains an office for the practice of law in New York, and this requirement has been upheld by the New York Court of Appeals and the Second Circuit Court of Appeals. See Schoenefeld v. State of New York, 25 N.Y. 3d 22 (2015) (holding that a New York attorney who resides outside New York must maintain a physical office in New York); Schoenefeld v. State of New York, 821 F.3d 273 (2d Cir. 2015) (rejecting a constitutional challenge to § 470's physical office requirement). As we noted in N.Y. State 1025 ¶ 21 (2014), a lawyer is "required to comply with applicable law," and a violation of Judiciary Law § 470 "may adversely reflect on the lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness," which would violate Rule 8.4(b). Therefore, to be entitled to practice law in New York, a non-resident member of the New York bar "must have an office that meets minimum requirements of Judiciary Law § 470 . . . ." N.Y. State 1025 ¶ 22. But as in Opinion 1025, since this Committee does not decide issues of law, we offer no opinion as to what type of "physical office" Judiciary Law § 470 requires.

CONCLUSION:

21. A New York lawyer may perform divorce mediation services for New York clients from his office in another state, provided that he makes effective disclosure of the differences in his role as mediator/neutral and lawyer and explains that he is not representing either party when he serves as a mediator. Where the mediation is successful, the lawyer may thereafter represent one of the parties to prepare a settlement agreement or other papers for the client to file pro se in the divorce proceeding, provided the lawyer obtains informed written consent from the non-represented mediation party.

22. A New York lawyer may also, in a pending or contemplated divorce action, enter a limited scope retainer with New York clients undertaking to provide legal advice, negotiate a settlement, or prepare legal documents for filing by the client pro se with a court in New York, provided the lawyer informs the prospective client regarding the relative risks of limited representation and benefits of full-service representation. In connection with providing these legal services, the New York lawyer cannot call himself a "legal consultant" instead of a lawyer.

23. A New York lawyer who resides in Florida but represents New York divorce clients over the internet from his law office in Florida must comply with the physical office requirement of New York Judiciary Law § 470.

TOPIC: Conflict of interest and referral fees; serving as lawyer on a real estate transaction referred by real estate broker associated with lawyer's real estate agency

DIGEST: A lawyer may not accept the referral of real estate closings from a real estate agent who is associated with a real estate company owned by the lawyer where the real estate agent and the real estate company will split the brokerage commission earned on the real estate transaction, regardless of whether the attorney agrees to waive in favor of the real estate clients the portion of the real estate commission due to his real estate agency.

RULES: 1.7(a)(2); 1.7(b); 7.2(a)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer, an attorney and real estate broker, is an owner and principal of a real estate company, separate from his law practice, that offers real estate brokerage services. At this time, the only other brokers associated with the real estate company are his mother and a friend. Historically, the real estate company has performed real estate brokerage services primarily for family and friends. The attorney has not performed legal services on matters for which he has earned a brokerage commission. Where the attorney has performed legal services in relation to a sale on which he was also a broker, he has waived any brokerage commission in favor of the client.

2. Another real estate agent is considering leaving that agent's current real estate brokerage agency to join the attorney's real estate company. This real estate agent is more active than the brokers currently associated with the lawyer's real estate company. The real estate agent and the real estate company will split the commissions earned as a result of brokering real estate transactions in accordance with a pre-agreed percentage breakdown.

3. At his current agency, the real estate agent refers some of his real estate clients to the attorney, by including the attorney's name alongside the names of other attorneys. After associating with the attorney's brokerage firm, the real estate agent would like to continue referring potential clients to the attorney to perform legal services.

QUESTIONS:

4. May a lawyer accept the referral of real estate closings from a real estate agent who is associated with a real estate company owned by the lawyer where the real estate agent and the real estate company owned by the attorney will split the brokerage commissions earned on the real estate transaction?

5. If not, may the lawyer accept the referral if his real estate company were to waive in favor of the real estate clients the portion of the real estate commission due to his real estate company, while allowing the associated real estate broker to keep his agreed share of such commissions?

OPINION:

6. The general provisions addressing conflicts of interest relating to current clients are set forth in Rule 1.7 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"). A lawyer with a conflict of interest as defined by Rule 1.7(a) may not represent a client unless the conflict is both waivable and properly waived by the client under Rule 1.7(b).

7. Rule 1.7(a)(2) defines a "personal interest" conflict as arising when a reasonable lawyer would conclude that "there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests."

8. Our opinions have consistently concluded that a conflict arises when a lawyer acts as a lawyer and a broker in the same real estate transaction. They have also concluded that such conflicts are per se non-waivable. N.Y. State 1043 (2015) ("we have long and consistently stated that a lawyer may not act as a lawyer and a broker in the same real estate transaction, with or without client consent, and whether or not the lawyer charges for legal services"); N.Y. State 1177 (2017) ("A lawyer who receives a broker's commission in a real estate transaction may not also serve as the lawyer for the buyers [without charging for the service], even if the buyers are long-time clients and friends and have requested both kinds of services."). We have reasoned that, where a lawyer acts as both broker and lawyer in the same transaction, "the broker's personal and financial interest in closing the transaction interferes with the lawyer's ability to render independent legal advice with respect to the transaction consistent with the principles now embodied in Rule of Professional Conduct 1.7(a) . . . ." That is because "a lawyer should not have a personal stake in the advice rendered, and a broker who is paid only if the transaction closes cannot be fully independent in advising the client as a lawyer." N.Y. State 916 (2012); see also N.Y. State 933 ¶7 (2012) ("the personal interest of a lawyer-real estate broker in the brokerage fee that will be generated by a closing of a real estate transaction so conflicts with the lawyer's responsibility to provide independent legal judgment with respect to that transaction as to preclude the dual roles and to make the conflict non-consentable by the client"); N.Y. State 1015 (2014) (quoting N.Y. State 753 and citing later opinions).

9. As owner of the real estate company offering real estate brokerage services, the inquirer has a financial interest in the brokerage commissions that associated brokers generate and split with that real estate company. Our prior opinions make clear that the lawyer cannot also provide legal services with respect to real estate transactions that generate a commission for the real estate company. The arrangement would convey upon the lawyer a financial interest in the real estate transactions that would interfere with the lawyer's ability to be fully independent in giving legal advice to the clients. It would therefore constitute a per se non-waivable conflict as in our prior opinions noted above.

10. Citing N.Y. State 1208 (2020), the inquirer asks whether the same result would adhere if his real estate company were to waive in favor of the real estate clients the portion of the real estate commission due to his real estate company, while allowing the associated real estate broker to keep his agreed share of such brokerage commissions.

11. The issue in Opinion 1208 was whether an attorney could accept referrals for real estate closings from her paralegal who was also a real estate broker. Because the attorney had no financial interest in the paralegal-broker's commission, we concluded that the referrals "did not trigger the per se non-waivable conflict that was present in N.Y. State. 916 and N.Y. State 1043." Accordingly, the appropriate inquiry was whether or not, under the particular facts and circumstances, a referral by the paralegal-broker created a "significant risk that the lawyer's interest would be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests." If a significant risk did not exist, then no Rule 1.7(a)(2) conflict arose. If a substantial risk did exist, then the attorney could accept the referral only upon satisfying the exceptions set forth in Rule 1.7(b), including informed written client consent.

12. In Opinion 1208, the real estate clients would owe the same amount in commission regardless of whether the inquiring attorney, or some other attorney, provided legal services in connection with the closing. By contrast, under the fact pattern described here, any clients of the real estate broker who choose to avail themselves of the inquirer's legal services in connection with a referred real estate transaction will receive a discount to the real estate commission they owe with respect to the referred real estate transaction.

13. The inquirer's proposal to waive the real estate company's portion of the commission owed by the real estate clients implicates Rule 7.2(a), relating to "Payment for Referrals." With certain exceptions not implicated here, Rule 7.2(a) provides that "[a] lawyer shall not compensate or give anything of value to a person or organization to recommend or obtain employment by a client, or as a reward for having made a recommendation resulting in employment by a client." In exchange for the real estate broker's referrals, the inquirer proposes to provide the real estate broker with the ability to charge the clients who hire the inquirer a lower commission without a corresponding reduction in the amount the broker will earn as a commission. Because this ability to charge a lower commission constitutes "something of value" that is given in exchange for a referral, the arrangement would violate Rule 7.2(a).

14. In N.Y. State 845 part C (2010), the question was whether a broker may share part of her brokerage commission with a referring lawyer who represents a buyer or seller in the transaction if the referring lawyer obtains informed client consent and remits or credits the referral fee to the client. In considering the question, we acknowledged that "the attorney will . . . have an incentive to refer real estate clients to a broker who pays a referral fee (i.e., shares her commission)" even where the lawyer remits or credits the referral fee to the client "because the referral fee (in effect a reduced real estate broker commission) will enable the attorney to offer potential clients a reduced brokerage fee (or an equivalent cash payment or credit) for utilizing the attorney's services, thus attracting more business to the attorney." We nevertheless approved the payment of part of the brokerage commission in exchange for recommending the broker – where accompanied by informed client consent and a remittance of the commission to the client – because, "although a referral fee gives the lawyer a financial incentive to refer a client to that particular broker even if the fee is passed on to the client, clients are generally aware that they have many real estate brokers to choose from, and clients are generally capable of evaluating different brokers." ¶ 18.

15. In N.Y. State 845 part C (2010), the attorney was able to offer a reduced fee as a result of referring business to a real estate broker. By contrast, the inquirer here posits a circumstance where the attorney is enabling the real estate broker to enjoy the possibility of enhanced business prospects resulting from a reduced brokerage commission in connection with referrals to the attorney. Our opinions have indicated that the former is acceptable, at least under certain circumstances. See N.Y. State 845 part C. Rule 7.2(a) makes clear that the latter is not.

CONCLUSION:

16. A lawyer may not accept the referral of real estate closings from a real estate agent who is associated with a real estate company owned by the lawyer where the real estate agent and the real estate company will split the brokerage commission earned on the real estate transaction, regardless of whether the attorney agrees to waive in favor of the real estate clients the portion of the real estate commission due to his real estate agency.

OPINION 1238 (03/14/2022)

TOPIC: Conflict of interest; full-time attorney in county attorney's office with part-time outside practice

DIGEST: A full-time lawyer in a county attorney's office who represents the county in civil litigation in state and federal courts may represent private clients in Family Court, or accept appointments as assigned counsel to represent indigent persons in Family Court, provided neither the county nor any of its agencies is a party to the proceeding and either no conflict of interest exists under Rule 1.7(a) or, if there is a waivable conflict, both the county and the Family Court client give informed consent to the conflict, confirmed in writing, pursuant to Rule 1.7(b)(4).

RULES: 1.0(h), 1.7 (a)-(b), 1.10(a), 1.11(f)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a permanent, full-time attorney in the County Attorney's Office, assigned to defend the county in civil litigation in state and federal courts. Neither the inquirer nor any other lawyer in the County Attorney's Office appears in Family Court as a member of the County Attorney's Office, but the county is represented in Family Court by counsel in the Family Law Division of the county's Department of Social Services.

2. Assignments to represent indigent clients in criminal cases and Family Court matters are made pursuant to the 18-B program, which is governed by a contract between the county and the county bar association. The inquirer did not draft or negotiate that contract, and inquirer plays no role in approving assigned counsel appointments or claims for compensation.

3. With the permission of the county attorney, the inquirer has embarked upon the private practice of law while retaining his position in the County Attorney's Office. In his private practice, the inquirer declines representation in any Family Court matter in which the county is a party.

QUESTION:

4. May a full-time assistant county attorney represent clients in Family Court matters in which the county is not a party, including assigned counsel matters pursuant to the 18-B program?

OPINION:

5. This committee has established and repeatedly affirmed a per se rule that prohibits a part-time prosecutor from representing a defendant in a criminal proceeding anywhere in New York state. See e.g., N.Y. State 788 (2005); N.Y. State 657 (1993); N.Y. State 184 (1971); N.Y. State 171 (1970).

6. In N.Y. State 800 (2006), however, when faced with a part-time prosecutor who proposed to represent indigent persons in Family Court proceedings in an adjacent county, we declined to extend the per se prohibition. Instead, we identified three types of Family Court proceedings in which the part-time prosecutor would be barred from representation: (a) matters in which the prosecutor was then working or had previously worked with the law enforcement officials involved, (b) juvenile delinquency proceedings and (c) cases involving Persons in Need of Supervision ("PINS"). Id. ¶ 5.

7. Outside these strictures, we opined that whether the part-time prosecutor could accept a Family Court assignment depended "on all the relevant facts and circumstances." Id. ¶ 4. We said:

> The attorney must avoid all conflicts of interest, ensuring that neither the attorney's own interests, nor the attorney's simultaneous work as a prosecutor preclude the attorney from exercising independent judgment on behalf of his or her clients. In many cases, a conflict might not be apparent at the outset of the case. For this reason, the attorney must be careful to avoid cases where a conflict is likely to occur.

N.Y. State 800 ¶ 4 (footnotes omitted).

8. In N.Y. State 1074 (2015) we applied the same facts-and-circumstances test to a part-time Department of Social Services attorney who wanted to accept assignments to represent indigent persons in criminal and Family Court matters, noting that the attorney had made a "well advised" decision not to accept child abuse and neglect cases from the assigned counsel program, two additional types of Family Court proceedings which we deemed "off limits" under the rationale of N.Y. State 800. Id. ¶ 6. In importing the part-time prosecutor facts-and-circumstances test to the Department of Social Services attorney we concluded:

> We cannot say that the Rules invariably forbid a lawyer to accept the representation of an indigent defendant in a traffic violation merely by virtue of the lawyer's role as a part-time lawyer handling Medicaid, paternity, or child support issues for the Department of Social Services. Likewise, we cannot say that the Rules invariably forbid a lawyer to accept a representation in a Family Court proceeding between, say, two private individuals in which the Department of Social Services has no involvement.

N.Y. State 1074 ¶5.

9. Here, a full-time assistant county attorney wants to represent clients in Family Court proceedings to which the county is not a party, including assigned counsel 18-B matters. Neither he nor any other attorney in the County Attorney's Office represents the county in juvenile delinquency, PINS, or child abuse or neglect cases. In our view, provided that law enforcement officers with whom the attorney is working or with whom he has previously worked as assistant county are not involved in the Family Court proceeding, there is no basis in the Rules or in our prior opinions that would give rise to a per se prohibition. As in N.Y. State 800 and N.Y. State 1074, the ethical propriety of each intended Family Court representation would be governed by the same facts-and-circumstances test.

10. Our conclusion is consistent with our most recent opinion in this area, N.Y. State 1219 ¶ 7 (2021), where we opined that the inquirer, a part-time assistant county attorney, was not subject to a "per se bar" on representing convicted defendants in state parole violation hearings where "(1) the inquirer's practice as a part-time county attorney is entirely civil, as is all of the work of the County Attorney's office; (2) the inquirer would not appear before any County judges or officials in the contemplated parole work; and (3) a violation or construction of County law is not typically at issue in parole violation hearings or appeals." Rather, we noted "[t]here may be . . . particular cases in which the inquirer would have a conflict. For example, if the conduct of County employees is involved in the parole violation, or the parole violation defendant is a party to a civil case brought by the County Attorney's Office, the inquirer might have a conflict." Id. ¶ 8 (citing N.Y. State 1074 ¶ 8 (2015) and N.Y. State 800 ¶¶ 5-6 (2006)).

11. In applying the facts-and-circumstances test here, two important factors regarding the inquirer's practice are the full-time character of the inquirer's public practice, and the particular sensitivity of family law matters. Especially in this context, the inquirer's Family Court representation could give rise to situations where a reasonable lawyer would conclude there is a significant risk that the attorney's professional judgment would be adversely affected by his personal interests, including his status in the County Attorney's Office, under Rule 1.7(a)(2) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"). Specifically, Rule 1.7 (a)(2) provides:

> (a) Except as provided in paragraph (b), a lawyer shall not represent a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that either:
> > (1) * * *; or
> > (2) there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property, or other personal interests.

12. For example, county policies that concern child protective services, adoption, custody and visitation, support, family offense, guardianship, delinquency, paternity, foster care, or other county policies and procedures affecting children and families may be implicated in a Family Court case. See N.Y. State 800. An assistant county attorney representing a private or an assigned counsel client in such a case may feel constrained in advancing the most advantageous or persuasive legal arguments, or in pursuing the most promising factual inquiries, if those actions might embarrass county officials or conflict with county policy and risk antagonizing the County Attorney.

13. If the inquirer determines that a conflict of interest exists in a particular matter under Rule 1.7(a)(2), the lawyer's representation may nonetheless be permitted under Rule 1.7(b) which provides:

> (b) Notwithstanding the existence of a concurrent conflict of interest under paragraph (a), a lawyer may represent a client if:
> > (1) the lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client;
> >
> > (2) the representation is not prohibited by law;
> >
> > (3) the representation does not involve the assertion of a claim by one client against another client represented by the lawyer in the same litigation or other proceeding before a tribunal; and
> > (4) each affected client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing.

14. We have previously opined that government may waive a conflict pursuant to Rule 1.7(b), provided the conflict is waivable under the Rules and "(i) the lawyer was reasonably certain both that the entity was legally authorized to waive the conflict of interest and that all legal prerequisites to the consent had been satisfied and (ii) the lawyer reasonably believed that the process by which the consent was granted was sufficient to preclude any reasonable perception that the consent was provided in a manner inconsistent with the public trust." N.Y. State 1130 ¶15 (2017).

15. Even if there is no conflict or if there is a waivable conflict and informed consent to the representation is properly sought and secured from both the county and the Family Court client, three caveats are in order.

16. First, this committee's jurisdiction is limited to the Rules and we do not opine on questions of law. Therefore, the inquirer should be mindful that, independent of any ethical concerns, his proposed conduct may violate a statute, local law, or municipal ethics code concerning outside private employment by an assistant county attorney.

17. Second, Rule 1.11(f)(2) cautions that a lawyer who holds public office shall not "use the public position to influence, or attempt to influence, a tribunal to act in favor of the lawyer or of a client." See also N.Y. State 1065 ¶ 11 (2015) ("even assuming there is no conflict under Rule 1.7(a), the inquirer is prohibited from using any influence he may have as a public official to influence or attempt to influence, any tribunal to act in favor of the [inquirer's] proposed client.").

18. Third, our conclusion might be different if the attorneys in the Family Law Division of the Department of Social Services were considered to be part of the same "law firm" as the County Attorney's Office. See Rule 1.0(h) (definition of "firm" and "law firm" includes a "government law office." That is because our analysis relies heavily on the fact that the County Attorney's Office, and the inquirer, are engaged exclusively in civil practice and the attorneys in the Family Law Division represent the Department of Social Services in all Family Court matters.

19. We have opined that the defense function in juvenile delinquency proceedings "although not categorized as 'criminal' is indistinguishable from defense in an adult criminal proceeding" and that "PINS proceedings are functionally indistinguishable from juvenile delinquency proceedings" (N.Y. State 800 ¶¶ 7, 8). Citing N.Y. State 657 (1993) and N.Y. State 788 (2009), we have also opined:

> The role of the Social Services attorney when prosecuting child abuse and neglect proceedings is comparable to the role of the D.A.'s office in criminal prosecutions. In both, the attorney represents the interests of the state in matters with grave consequences (incarceration in one, custody and parentage in the other). Like the D.A. in criminal prosecutions, the Social Services prosecutor has a special role that is "inherently incompatible" with the role of defense counsel.

N.Y. State 859 ¶ 13 (2011).

20. Accordingly, following the broadening of the per se rule that prohibits a part-time prosecutor from representing a defendant in a criminal proceeding anywhere in New York State to include Department of Social Service and assistant county attorneys who prosecute these quasi-criminal matters in Family Court, if the attorneys in the Family Law Division here prosecute juvenile delinquency,

PINS or child abuse and neglect proceedings, which appears likely, its lawyers would not be permitted to accept private clients or 18-B counsel assignments to defend such matters in the Family Court. That per se prohibition would apply to the inquirer if the two offices are, in effect, the same law firm for imputation purposes under Rules 1.10(a) which provides: "While lawyers are associated in a firm, none of them shall knowingly represent a client when any one of them practicing alone would be prohibited from doing so by Rule 1.7 . . . except as otherwise provided therein."

21. Whether the lawyers in the County Attorney's Office and the Family Law Division of the Department of Social Services are in the same "firm" as defined by Rule 1.0(h) is a "fact-intensive inquiry" that focuses, among other things, on (1) whether the County Attorney's Office, on the one hand, and the Family Law Division or the Department of Social Services, on the other hand, present themselves to the public in a way that suggests they are a single firm; (2) whether the lawyers in each office have mutual access to the same information concerning the clients that they each serve; and (3) whether the lawyers in each office are independent from the direction and control of supervising attorneys in the other office. See N.Y. State 1219 ¶ 9 (2021); N.Y. State 1210 ¶¶ 6-8 (2020).

CONCLUSION:

22. A full-time lawyer in a county attorney's office who represents the county in civil litigation in state and federal courts may represent private clients in Family Court, or accept appointments as assigned counsel to represent indigent persons in Family Court, provided neither the county nor any of its agencies is a party to the proceeding and either no conflict of interest exists under Rule 1.7(a) or, if there is a waivable conflict, both the county and the Family Court client give informed consent to the conflict, confirmed in writing, pursuant to Rule 1.7(b)(4).

OPINION 1239 (03/22/2022)

TOPIC: An Attorney's Ethical Obligation When a Court Orders Forensic Analysis of Hard Drive Containing Client Confidential Information

DIGEST: An attorney in receipt of a court order directing production of his hard drive containing the confidential information of clients who have not waived privilege or consented to disclosure, has the obligation to advise non-waiving clients of the existence of the court order. Absent the clients' informed consent to waiver of the attorney-client privilege and consent to disclosure, an attorney must consult with the non-waiving clients about the reasonable steps necessary to avoid or limit production of confidential information and undertake those steps before complying with the court order.

RULES: 1.0(j), 1.4 (a)(1), 1.4(a)(3), 1.6(a), 1.6(b)(6)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is an attorney who provided transactional services to a client who is now in litigation over the transaction. The attorney has received a trial court order directing him to turn over for a forensic analysis a hard drive in a computer that contains data of the client (who has waived the attorney-client privilege) but also contains the data of non-party clients who have not waived the attorney-client privilege or consented to the disclosure of their confidential information.

QUESTIONS:

2. When confronted with a discovery order requiring production of data stored on a lawyer's hard drive, what steps must the lawyer take to protect the confidential information of other clients stored on that hard drive who are not parties to the litigation and who have not waived the attorney-client privilege or consented to the disclosure of the client's confidential information?

OPINION:

3. Rule 1.6(a) of the Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") provides "A lawyer shall not knowingly reveal confidential information, as defined in this Rule, or use such information to the disadvantage of a client or for the advantage of the lawyer or a third person, unless the client gives informed consent, as defined in Rule 1.0(j) . . ." As noted in Comment [2] to Rule 1.6, "[a] fundamental principle in the client-lawyer relationship is that, in the absence of the client's informed consent, or except as permitted or required by these Rules, the lawyer must not knowingly reveal information gained during and related to the representation, whatever its source."

4. An exception to this Rule may be found in Rule 1.6(b)(6) providing a lawyer "may reveal or use confidential information to the extent that the lawyer reasonably believes necessary . . . when permitted or required under these Rules or to comply with other law or court order." Although nothing in Rule 1.6(b) mandates disclosure by the attorney, per se, other law may require that a lawyer disclose confidential information. Whether such other law supersedes the protections of Rule 1.6 is generally a question of law beyond the scope of this committee. When it appears that disclosure is required by law or court order – as here, for example, as a result of a trial court discovery ruling – the lawyer must consult with the client before making the disclosure. If the lawyer concludes that Rule 1.6 is superseded, Rule 1.6(b)(6) provides a safe harbor allowing the lawyer to make the disclosure as necessary to comply with the law or court order. See Comment [12] to Rule 1.6.

5. We have addressed the lawyer's duty of reasonable care to avoid the disclosure of a client's confidential information in a number of different contexts. See, e.g., N.Y. State 1020 (2014) (cloud storage); N.Y. State 940 (2012) (off-site backup tapes); N.Y. State 939 (2012) (office sharing); N.Y. State. 842 (2010) (online data storage). What is reasonable in the specific context of an already-issued court order directing the production of confidential information has been addressed in the Comments to Rule 1.6:

> A tribunal or government entity claiming authority pursuant to other law to compel disclosure may order a lawyer to reveal confidential information. Absent informed consent of the client to comply with the order, the lawyer should assert on behalf of the client nonfrivolous arguments that the order is not authorized by law, the information sought is protected against disclosure by applicable privilege or other law, or the law is invalid or defective for some other reason. In the event of an adverse ruling, the lawyer must consult with the client to the extent required by Rule 1.4 about the possibility of an appeal or further challenge, unless such consultation would be prohibited by other law. If such review is not sought or is unsuccessful, paragraph (b) (6) permits the lawyer to comply with the order.

Comment [13] to Rule 1.6.

6. To be sure, the facts before us are complicated by the client's waiver of the client-lawyer privilege and consent to the disclosure of confidential information as it pertains to that client's communications. That waiver, however, does not impact the lawyer's obligation to take reasonable steps to safeguard the duty of confidentiality owed to the non-party clients whose interests were not represented when the court issued its order or to notify the non-party clients of the existence of the court order.

7. The involvement of the confidential information of non-waiving clients imposes upon the lawyer an obligation to notify the affected clients of what has occurred. In the event of an adverse ruling on the disclosure of confidential communication – as is the case here - Comment [13] to Rule 1.6 requires the attorney to "consult with the client to the extent required by Rule 1.4 about the possibility of an appeal or further challenge . . . ." Given the general communication obligations under Rule 1.4, the attorney must notify the affected clients of the extent to which their confidential information may be subject to unauthorized review. In addition to requiring an attorney to keep the client reasonably informed about the status of the matter (see Rule 1.4(a)(3)), Rule 1.4 also requires an attorney to promptly inform the client of any circumstance with respect to which the client's informed consent is required and any material developments in the matter. See Rule 1.4(a)(1)(i) and (iii).

8. In N.Y. City 2017-5, the New York City Bar Association applied Rule 1.4 to explain an attorney's obligation to advise a client when an electronic device containing confidential information is reviewed or seized upon a border crossing. Comparing the unauthorized access (even if sanctioned by law) to an attorney's obligation to divulge the loss of a client's file (N.Y. City 2015-6) and the obligation to advise a client of a significant error or omission by the attorney in the rendition of legal services (N.Y. State 1992 (2016)), that committee held:

> Disclosure will provide the client an opportunity to determine whether to file a legal challenge, assuming one is available, or to undertake any other available responses.

9. The facts present by the inquiring attorney are not materially different. The non-waiving clients must be consulted about the reasonable efforts the attorney will undertake to preserve the confidentiality of their confidential information stored on the lawyer's hard drive.

10. If a non-waiving non-party client is provided sufficient information so as to meet the Rule 1.0(j) definition of informed consent, the that client may waive the intrusion upon his or her confidential information. If not, the attorney must take reasonable steps to preserve the non-waiving non-party clients' confidential information. Depending upon the facts presented, the legitimate interests of the waiving party client and the counterparty in the litigation may be satisfied by less intrusive means than mirroring the entire hard drive containing the confidential information of the non-waiving non-party clients.

11. Reasonable steps that the inquirer may take in furtherance of his mandatory obligation to minimize or eliminate any impact on non-party non-waiving clients' confidential information include (a) seeking to establish agreed search terms or other protocols that a mutually acceptable ESI vendor could implement; (b) in the event the waiving client's electronic file has been stored in a fashion that allows for segregated duplication, securing an agreement to produce only that portion of the file that concerns the waiving client; (c) negotiating a confidentiality order limiting production for "attorney eyes only"; (d) seeking the appointment of a special master to review the privilege issues; (e) seeking in camera review of the confidential information by the court (see N.Y. State 1057 (2015)); (f) in the absence of agreement, moving to reargue the motion leading to the court's decision outlining less intrusive means by which the legitimate goals of the litigation may be advanced; (g) in the absence of a court order revisiting the terms of the order, moving to stay enforcement pending appeal; and (h) appealing.

12. In N.Y. State 1198 (2020), this committee addressed the obligations of a former government attorney receiving a subpoena or court order and reached essentially the same conclusions we reach here regarding consultation with the client, reasonable efforts, and the safe harbor of Rule 1.6(b)(6). Reviewing a prior American Bar Association opinion, we stated:

> In 2016, the American Bar Association Standing Committee on Ethics and Professional Responsibility issued Formal Opinion 473, which detailed a lawyer's obligation upon receiving a subpoena relating to the lawyer's representation of a client. The ABA Committee opined that "a lawyer must obey a court order, subject to any right to move the court to withdraw or modify the order or to appeal the order. But a lawyer facing a court order requiring the disclosure of client confidential information still is faced with complex, critical and fact-intensive questions on how to respond – e.g., what challenges should be considered, what specific information should be disclosed, and what protective measures should be sought. In making these judgments the lawyer must balance obligations inherent in the lawyer's dual role as an advocate for the client and an > officer of the court." Initially, if the client is available, the lawyer must consult the client. If instructed by the client or if the client is unavailable, the lawyer must assert all reasonable claims against disclosure and seek to limit the subpoena or other demand on any reasonable ground. ABA Formal Opinion 473 (2016). We agree.

N.Y. State 1198 ¶12.

13. Accordingly, pursuant to the safe harbor provision of Rule 1.6(b)(6), after consulting with the non-waiving non-party clients and taking reasonable, albeit unsuccessful, steps to protect their confidential information, the inquirer here is not ethically required to be held in contempt of court to protect confidential information stored on his hard drive and may comply with the court directing the production of his hard drive for forensic analysis.

14. Although N.Y. State 528 (1981) suggested that where the order is "subject to a good faith challenge, the lawyer should be free to postpone" compliance with the court order directing production of confidential information "pending timely exhaustion of available further review," we believe the better course would be to seek a stay of enforcement from the trial or appellate court. We also observe that the expense associated with opposing disclosure of the non-waiving non-party client's confidential information in these circumstances appears to fall on the attorney. As Comment [8a] to Rule 1.16 states ". . . lawyers are ordinarily better suited than clients to foresee and provide for the burdens of representation."

CONCLUSION:

15. An attorney has the obligation to advise non-waiving clients of a court order directing duplication and production of their confidential information. Absent the clients' informed consent to waiver of the attorney-client privilege and consent to disclosure, an attorney must consult with the clients about the reasonable steps necessary to avoid or limit production of confidential information and undertake those steps before complying with the court order.

OPINION 1240 (04/08/2022)

TOPIC: Duty to protect client information stored on a lawyer's smartphone.

DIGEST: If "contacts" on a lawyer's smartphone include any client whose identity or other information is confidential under Rule 1.6, then the lawyer may not consent to share contacts with a smartphone app unless the lawyer concludes that no human being will view that confidential information, and that the information will not be sold or transferred to additional third parties, without the client's consent.

RULES: 1.6

FACTS:

1. When the inquiring lawyer downloads or accesses an app on his smartphone, the lawyer is sometimes asked whether the lawyer gives consent for that app to access the lawyer's "contacts" on the smartphone. The lawyer's contacts include clients in criminal representations.

QUESTION:

2. May a lawyer consent for an app to access contacts on the lawyer's smartphone that include the lawyer's current, former or prospective clients?

OPINION:

3. Rule 1.6(c) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") requires a lawyer to "make reasonable efforts to prevent the inadvertent or unauthorized disclosure or use of, or unauthorized access to" the confidential information of current, former and prospective clients. Rule 1.6(a), in turn, provides that confidential information "consists of information gained during or relating to the representation of a client, whatever its source, that is (a) protected by the attorney-client privilege, (b) likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed, or (c) information that the client has requested be kept confidential."

4. Rule 1.6(c) has been interpreted to require a lawyer to take reasonable care to protect clients' confidential information when carrying electronic devices containing such information across the border (see N.Y. City 2017-5 (2017)), when using an online storage provider to store clients' confidential information (see N.Y. State 842 (2010)), and when sending emails containing confidential information (see N.Y. State 709 (1998)).

5. In N.Y. State 820 (2008), we applied this general principle to a lawyer's use of an e-mail service provider that scans e-mails for keywords and sends or displays targeted computer-generated advertisements to the lawyer using the service based on the words in the e-mail communications. We concluded that using such a service is permissible if "[u]nder the particular e-mail provider's published privacy policies, no individuals other than e-mail senders and recipients read the e-mail messages, are otherwise privy to their content or receive targeted advertisements from the service provider." We reasoned: "Merely scanning the content of e-mails by computer to generate computer advertising . . . does not pose a threat to client confidentiality, because the practice does not increase the risk of others obtaining knowledge of the e-mails or access to the emails' content." In contrast, we stated it would not be permissible to use the service "if the e-mails were reviewed by human beings or if the service provider reserved the right to disclose the e-mails or the substance of the communications to third parties without the sender's permission (or a lawful judicial order)." Accordingly, we opined that a "lawyer must exercise due care in selecting an e-mail service provider to ensure that its policies and stated practices protect client confidentiality" in conformance with these governing principles.

6. In N.Y. State 1088 (2016), we addressed whether an attorney could disclose to a potential client the names of actual clients the attorney had represented in the same practice area. To answer that inquiry, we needed to determine, as a threshold matter, whether and under what circumstances the names of current or past clients could be "confidential information," as defined in Rule 1.6(a). We stated, first, that clients' names will be confidential information if the clients have requested keeping their names confidential. See N.Y. State 1088 ¶ 6 (2016). We then opined:

> If the client has not requested that the lawyer keep the client's name confidential, then the lawyer must determine whether the fact of representation is generally known and, if not, whether disclosing the identity of the client and the fact of representation is likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client. This will depend on the client and the specific facts and circumstances of the representation.

N.Y. State 1088 ¶ 7.

7. We discussed in Opinion 1088 what it meant to be "generally known" within the meaning of Rule 1.6(a) (¶ 8) and stated, "The client is more likely to find that disclosure of the fact of a current or prior representation by a lawyer is embarrassing or detrimental where the representation involves or involved criminal law, bankruptcy, debt collection or family law." Id. ¶ 9. Finally, we noted there might be other factors, other than the subject matter of the representation, that are relevant to determine whether the client would object to being identified as the lawyer's client. Id. ¶ 10.

8. Contacts stored on a smartphone typically include one or more email addresses, work or residence addresses, and phone numbers (collectively sometimes called "directory information"), but contacts often also include additional non-directory information (such as birth date or the lawyer's relationship to the contact). Social media apps may seek access to this information to solicit more users to the platform or to establish links between users and enhance the user experience. Apps which sell products or services may seek such access to promote additional sales. Apps that espouse political or social beliefs may seek such access to disseminate their views. These are but three examples of how an attorney's contacts might be exploited by an app, but there are more, and likely many more to come.

9. Insofar as clients' names constitute confidential information, a lawyer must make reasonable efforts to prevent the unauthorized access of others to those names, whether stored as a paper copy in a filing cabinet, on a smartphone, or in any other electronic or paper form. To that end, before an attorney grants access to the attorney's contacts, the attorney must determine whether any contact – even one – is confidential within the meaning of Rule 1.6(a). A contact could be confidential because it reflects the existence of a client-attorney relationship which the client requested not be disclosed or which, based upon particular facts and circumstances, would be likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed. N.Y. State 1088 (2016).

10. Some relevant factors a lawyer should consider in determining whether any contacts are confidential are: (i) whether the contact information identifies the smartphone owner as an attorney, or more specifically identifies the attorney's area of practice (such as criminal law, bankruptcy law, debt collection law, or family law); (ii) whether people included in the contacts are identified as clients, as friends, as something else, or as nothing at all; and (iii) whether the contact information also includes email addresses, residence addresses, telephone numbers, names of family members or business associates, financial data, or other personal or non-public information that is not generally known.

11. If a lawyer determines that the contacts stored on his smartphone include the confidential information of any current or former client, the lawyer must not consent to give access to his contacts to an app, unless the attorney, after reasonable due diligence, including a review of the app's policies and stated practices to protect user information and user privacy, concludes that such confidential contact information will be handled in such a manner and for such limited purposes that it will not, absent the client's consent, be disclosed to additional third party persons, systems or entities. See N.Y. State 820 (2008).

CONCLUSION:

12. If "contacts" on a lawyer's smartphone include any client whose identity or other information is confidential under Rule 1.6, then the lawyer may not consent to share contacts with a smartphone app unless the lawyer concludes that no human being will view that confidential information, and that the information will not be sold or transferred to additional third parties, without the client's consent.

OPINION 1241 (05/31/2022)

TOPIC: New York attorney with out-of-state office; attorney advertising and letterhead

DIGEST: A lawyer who is admitted to practice in both New York and Florida, but whose only physical office is in Florida, may state on the letterhead of his Florida office that he is "admitted to the New York Bar," provided that this statement does not violate the applicable Rules of Professional Conduct.

RULES: 1.0(a), 7.1(a), 7.5(a), 8.4(c) & 8.5(b)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is an attorney admitted in both New York and Florida. He is closing his New York office and moving to Florida, where he plans to open an office to provide legal services to clients in Florida and New York. All New York legal services will be provided remotely from the inquirer's physical location in Florida. Among other things, the inquirer's legal services will include legal advice on New York and Florida law with respect to litigation pending or contemplated in New York and Florida courts, and the inquirer will negotiate on behalf of clients regarding such litigation, but he will not file an appearance in any New York court. He intends to state on the letterhead of his Florida office that he is "Admitted to the New York Bar."

QUESTION:

2. If a lawyer is admitted in New York and Florida but maintains a physical office only in Florida, may the lawyer state on the letterhead of his Florida office that he is admitted to the Bar of New York State?

OPINION:

A. Which jurisdiction's Rules of Professional Conduct apply to the inquirer's letterhead?

The first step in analyzing a multijurisdictional question is to determine which jurisdiction's Rules of Professional Conduct ("Rules") will govern the inquirer's conduct. In New York, the answer is found in Rule 8.5(b), which provides as follows (emphasis added):

> (b) In any exercise of the disciplinary authority of this state, the rules of professional conduct to be applied shall be as follows:
> > (1) For conduct in connection with a proceeding in a court before which a lawyer has been admitted to practice (either generally or for purposes of that proceeding), the rules to be applied shall be the rules of the jurisdiction in which the court sits, unless the rules of the court provide otherwise; and
> > (2) For any other conduct:
> > > (i) If the lawyer is licensed to practice only in this state, the rules to be applied shall be the rules of this state, and

> (ii) If the lawyer is licensed to practice in this state and another jurisdiction, the rules to be applied shall be the rules of the admitting jurisdiction in which the lawyer principally practices; provided, however, that if particular conduct clearly has its predominant effect in another jurisdiction in which the lawyer is licensed to practice, the rules of that jurisdiction shall be applied to that conduct.

3. Thus, New York Rule 8.5(b) divides a lawyer's conduct into two categories: (1) conduct related to a proceeding in a court where the lawyer has been admitted generally or pro hac vice, and (2) all other conduct.

Rule 8.5(b)(1): Conduct in connection with proceedings before New York courts

4. The inquirer will advise clients in pending litigation in New York and Florida courts. New York Rule 8.5(b)(1) addresses all conduct "in connection with" those proceedings. If the inquirer sends a letter to a court or to opposing counsel regarding pending litigation, his use of the letterhead would be "in connection with" litigation before a New York or Florida court. His use of the letterhead will thus fall under Rule 8.5(b)(1), and the applicable ethics rules will be the rules of the jurisdiction in which the court sits.

Rule 8.5(b)(2): All other conduct

5. If the inquirer uses his letterhead for purposes not in connection with a pending proceeding before a New York court – for example, if he were to advise a New York client about a threatened litigation or non-litigation matter – then his letterhead and its use would fall under the purview of Rule 8.5(b)(2), which governs "all other conduct." Rule 8.5(b)(2) divides lawyers into two categories: (i) lawyers licensed to practice only in New York, and (ii) lawyers licensed in New York and another state. Because the inquirer is presently licensed in both New York and Florida, his conduct would fall under Rule 8.5(b)(2)(ii).

6. Rule 8.5(b)(2)(ii) requires a two-stage inquiry for lawyers licensed in more than one jurisdiction. First, we ask where the lawyer "principally practices"? The inquirer is closing his New York office and moving to Florida, so it appears at first blush that he "principally practices" in Florida. But determining where a lawyer principally practices is not based solely on physical location. Rather, it requires a multi-factor analysis. See N.Y. State 1027 ¶ 14 (2014) ("when a lawyer is licensed in more than one jurisdiction, various factors are relevant to determining the one in which the lawyer principally practices"). Two important factors are (i) "the location of the clients the lawyer serves" and (ii) "the activities the lawyer performs in each jurisdiction." Id.

7. Here, the inquirer does not indicate where his clients are located or whether he will represent any clients in Florida matters. If he works primarily for New York clients with respect to matters pending in New York courts, it may be that he principally practices in New York. But if he works primarily for Florida clients or on Florida matters, then he may principally practice in Florida. We lack sufficient facts to determine where the inquirer principally practices. See N.Y. State 1041 ¶ 14 (2014) ("ultimately, the determination of 'principally practices' is question of fact that is beyond the Committee's jurisdiction to decide").

8. Wherever the inquirer principally practices, however, Rule 8.5(b)(2)(ii) also requires us to consider an exception: does the "particular conduct" at issue "clearly" have its "predominant effect in another jurisdiction in which the lawyer is licensed to practice"? If so, then "the rules of that jurisdiction shall be applied to that conduct."

9. Determining the state where the "predominant effect" of a lawyer's conduct occurs when the lawyer's conduct is not in connection with a proceeding pending before a court is a question of fact requiring a nuanced analysis. In N.Y. State 1041 ¶ 15 (2014), a lawyer was admitted in New York but was "based" in the U.K. and "principally practiced" in the U.K. If most of his clients were in New York, however, we said the "predominant effect" of the lawyer's conduct would occur in New York, and the New York Rules would apply. But exactly where the predominant effect would occur was "a question of fact" that the Committee could not determine.

10. Here, we cannot determine whether the inquirer "principally practices" in New York or Florida. We also cannot determine where the "predominant effect" of his conduct will clearly be felt. Thus, we cannot determine whether the New York or Florida Rules of Professional Conduct apply when his conduct is not in connection with pending litigation.

Rules 7.1(a), 7.5(a), and 8.4(c)

11. If the New York Rules govern, then the inquirer must comply with Rule 7.5(a), which provides: "A lawyer or law firm may use internet web sites, professional cards, professional announcement cards, office signs, letterheads or similar professional notices or devices, provided the same do not violate these Rules or any statute or court rule." (Emphasis added.) At least three of "these Rules" are relevant.

12. One relevant New York Rule is Rule 7.1(a), which provides that a lawyer or law firm "shall not use or disseminate . . . any advertisement that: (1) contains statements or claims that are false, deceptive or misleading . . . ." (Emphasis added.) An "advertisement" is defined in Rule 1.0(a) as "any public or private communication made by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm about that lawyer or law firm's services, the primary purpose of which is for the retention of the lawyer or law firm." Here, the letterhead would not constitute an "advertisement" unless the statement about admission to the New York Bar is for the primary purpose of retention, which we cannot determine. In N.Y. State 964 ¶ 13 (2013), we said that where a letterhead "is used in the ordinary course of professional practice or social intercourse without the primary intent to secure retention, it does not constitute advertising."

13. If, however, the inquirer's primary purpose in stating that he is "Admitted to the New York Bar" is to attract clients who find that credential impressive, then his letterhead is an advertisement. Even if prospective clients reach out to him first, his letterhead would still be an advertisement if its primary purpose is to persuade them to retain him. Rule 7.1(a) permits an advertisement to include "dates of admission to any bar." It follows that a lawyer may list the jurisdictions in which he has been admitted to the bar (with or without the dates of admission). Thus, whether the inquirer's letterhead is an "advertisement" or not, Rule 7.1(a) permits him to state that he is admitted to the New York Bar.

14. A second relevant Rule is Rule 7.5, which governs law firm names and letterhead. See Rule 7.5, Cmt. [6] (stating that a "lawyer or law firm may use . . . letterheads . . . provided they do not violate any statute or court rule and are in accordance with Rule 7.1"). The inquirer's proposed Florida letterhead appears to comply with Rule 7.5. His truthful statement that he is admitted to the New York Bar does not "violate any statute or court rule" of which we are aware, and the statement is "in accordance with Rule 7.1" as we explained above.

15. A third relevant Rule is Rule 8.4(c), which is broader than Rules 7.1(a) and 7.5(a) because it is not restricted to advertisements or letterhead. Rule 8.4(c) provides that a lawyer or law firm shall not "engage in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation." Here, as long as the inquirer remains admitted to practice in New York, the statement on his Florida letterhead that he is "Admitted to the New York Bar" does not involve dishonesty, fraud, deceit, or misrepresentation.

16. Of course, as we cautioned in N.Y. State 1235 ¶ 23 (2022), a New York lawyer who resides in Florida but represents New York clients over the internet from his law office in Florida "must comply with the physical office requirement of New York Judiciary Law § 470." Compliance with § 470 is a question of law on which we do not opine.

17. We also caution that we have no jurisdiction to interpret the Florida Rules of Professional Conduct or other relevant Florida law. Thus, the inquirer should obtain guidance on Florida law to determine whether the Florida Rules or other law apply to his conduct.

CONCLUSION:

18. Under the New York Rules of Professional Conduct, a lawyer who is admitted to practice in both New York and Florida may state on the letterhead of his Florida office that he is "Admitted to the New York Bar," even though his only physical office is in Florida.

OPINION 1242 (07/07/2022)

TOPIC: Conflicts; Town Attorney

DIGEST: A town attorney is prohibited from representing a private client before boards of a neighboring town with respect to zoning and land use matters if the town attorney has conflicting personal interests, unless the conflict is consentable and the town attorney obtains informed consent from both the town board that appointed him and the private client. In any case, Rule 1.11(f)(2) prohibits the town attorney from using his official position to improperly influence a tribunal to act in a private client's favor.

RULES: 1.0(f) & (w); 1.7(a)(1)-(2) & (b); and 1.11(f)(2)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a town attorney who, with the consent of the town board that appointed him, has continued to maintain a private practice. In his private practice, the inquirer represents a client who has commercial real estate interests both within the town he serves and in neighboring towns. The inquirer would like to represent the private client on a zoning and land use matter in one of those neighboring towns.

QUESTION:

2. May a town attorney represent a private client on a zoning and land use matter in another town if the private client also has commercial real estate interests within the town the town attorney serves?

OPINION:

3. Absent informed consent from each affected client, Rule 1.7(a) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct ("Rules") prohibits concurrent representations when a reasonable lawyer would conclude that either:

> (1) the representation will involve the lawyer in representing differing interests; or
> (2) there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property, or other personal interests. [Emphasis added.]

Rule 1.7(a)(1): Differing interests among clients

4. "Differing interests" are defined in Rule 1.0(f) to include "every interest that will adversely affect either the judgment or the loyalty of a lawyer to a client, whether it be a conflicting, inconsistent, diverse or other interest."

5. Zoning and land use issues come before the town board, planning board, zoning board and perhaps other boards in the town which the inquirer serves. These boards normally fall within the definition of a "tribunal" in Rule 1.0(w), which provides that the term "Tribunal" denotes "a court, an arbitrator in an arbitration proceeding or a legislative body, administrative agency or other body acting in an adjudicative capacity. . . ."

6. The zoning and land use issues that come before these boards may be of regional or countywide importance. The same or similar zoning and land use issues, implicating the same or similar development and land use policies and concerns, may come before boards of coordinate jurisdiction in neighboring towns – for example, the protection of environmentally sensitive areas, the preservation of open space and agricultural lands, waterfront development, the creation of multi-family or two-family zoning districts, or the expansion of commercial uses in business districts.

7. It would appear, at first blush, that the town attorney would be representing "differing interests" in a situation where the same or similar land use issues were at play in both the inquirer's own town and a neighboring town, and the inquirer took a position on a land use issue on behalf of the private client in the neighboring town that contradicts the position favored by the town board that appointed him. The Comments to Rule 1.7, however, indicate that Rule 1.7 does not ordinarily require client consent to such a conflict, which is often called a "positional" or "issue" conflict. Specifically, Comment [24] to Rule 1.7 provides in pertinent part:

> [24] Ordinarily a lawyer may take inconsistent legal positions in different tribunals at different times on behalf of different clients. The mere fact that advocating a legal position on behalf of one client might create precedent adverse to the interests of a client represented by the lawyer in an unrelated matter does not create a conflict of interest. . . .

8. Accordingly, even if the inquirer here, in representing his private client before a neighboring town's board, were to take a position inconsistent with a position that the town board employing him would take, there would be no conflict of interest within the meaning of Rule 1.7(a)(1).

Rule 1.7(a)(2): Personal interest conflicts

9. Nevertheless, the inquirer may have a conflict under Rule 1.7(a)(2) if there is a significant risk that his personal and financial interests would adversely affect the inquirer's professional judgment in representing the town board that employs him or the private client in the neighboring town. As the rest of Comment [24] to Rule 1.7 states:

> [24] . . . A conflict of interest exists, however, if there is a significant risk that a lawyer's action on behalf of one client will materially limit the lawyer's representation of another client in a different case; for example, when a decision favoring one client will create a precedent likely to weaken seriously the position taken on behalf of the other client. . . . Similar concerns may be present when lawyers advocate on behalf of clients before other entities, such as regulatory authorities whose regulations or rulings may significantly implicate clients' interests. If there is significant risk of an adverse effect on the lawyer's professional judgment, then absent informed consent of the affected clients, the lawyer must decline the representation. [Emphasis added.]

10. A significant risk might exist here. For example, the inquirer might not zealously advocate for a position that would benefit the private client in the neighboring town if that position would be contrary to the preferred land use policies of the town board that employs him. The inquirer in that case might "pull his punches" out of concern that the town board that appointed him would be so displeased that the town board would fire him or refuse to renew his appointment, or that the town board would revoke its consent for him to continue to maintain a private practice. Alternatively, in order to avoid displeasing his private client, the inquirer might soften his positions on behalf of his town board employer or recommend that the town board adopt land use policy positions less hostile to, and more consistent with, the best interests of his private client.

11. In N.Y. State 1216 (2021), we addressed a similar dynamic in a different context. The inquirer there, an assistant county attorney, was responsible for the implementation of a particular vendor's insurance management software in the county that employed him. The same vendor then offered to retain the assistant county attorney as a consultant to facilitate the vendor's sale of the software to other counties. In addressing the "financial, business, property or other personal interests" arising under Rule 1.7(a)(2), we expressed concern that the vendor might pressure the assistant county attorney not to fully assert the county's contractual rights or not to assert the county's best bargaining position when the software service agreement with his county employer came due for renewal, because the inquirer might fear that the outside vendor would terminate him and thereby cut off a significant source of income. Id. ¶ 14.

12. We lack sufficient facts to determine here whether there is a "significant risk" under Rule 1.7(a)(2) that the inquirer's personal and financial interests would adversely affect his professional judgment in representing either the town board which employs him or his private client. The inquirer will have to assess the level of risk himself in light of all of the facts and circumstances, including the factors listed in Comment [24] to Rule 1.7 (quoted above).

Rule 1.7(b): Consentability and consent

13. Even if the inquirer determines that a conflict of interest exists under Rule 1.7(a)(2), the concurrent representation may nonetheless be permitted under Rule 1.7(b) which provides:

> (b) Notwithstanding the existence of a concurrent conflict of interest under paragraph (a), a lawyer may represent a client if:
> > (1) the lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client;
> >
> > (2) the representation is not prohibited by law;
> >
> > (3) the representation does not involve the assertion of a claim by one client against another client represented by the lawyer in the same litigation or other proceeding before a tribunal; and
> > (4) each affected client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing.

14. We have previously opined that a unit of government may waive a conflict pursuant to Rule 1.7(b), provided the conflict is waivable under the Rules and "(i) the lawyer was reasonably certain both that the entity was legally authorized to waive the conflict of interest and that all legal prerequisites to the consent had been satisfied and (ii) the lawyer reasonably believed that the process by which the consent was granted was sufficient to preclude any reasonable perception that the consent was provided in a manner inconsistent with the public trust." N.Y. State 1130 ¶15 (2017). The inquirer should determine whether any conflict waiver by the town board satisfies these criteria. See also, N.Y. State 1238 ¶ 14 (2022) (quoting same passage from N.Y. State 1130).

Additional caveats

15. Even if there is no conflict under Rule 1.7(a), or if there is a waivable conflict and informed consent to the representation is properly sought, secured, and confirmed in writing under Rule 1.7(b) from both the town in which the inquirer serves and the private client, two additional caveats are in order.

16. First, this committee interprets the Rules and we do not opine on questions of law. Therefore, the inquirer should be mindful that, independent of any ethical concerns, the inquirer's proposed conduct may violate applicable law governing town attorneys, including but not limited to the Public Officers Law, the General Municipal Law, the Town Law, and the town's own ethics code. See N.Y. State 1130 ¶ 7 (2017).

17. Second, the inquirer must also be mindful of Rule 1.11(f)(2) which cautions that a lawyer who holds public office shall not "use the public position to influence, or attempt to influence, a tribunal to act in favor of the lawyer or of a client" (other than the town that employs him). See also Rule 1.11, Cmt. [3] (Rule 1.11(f) is designed to "prevent the lawyer from exploiting public office for the advantage of another client"); and N.Y. State 1065 ¶ 11 (2015) ("even assuming there is no conflict under Rule 1.7(a), the inquirer is prohibited from using any influence he may have as a public official to influence or attempt to influence, any tribunal to act in favor of the [inquirer's] proposed client.").

CONCLUSION:

18. A town attorney is prohibited from representing a private client before boards of a neighboring town with respect to zoning and land use matters if the town attorney has conflicting personal interests, unless the conflict is consentable and the town attorney obtains informed consent from both the town board that appointed him and the private client. In any case, Rule 1.11(f)(2) prohibits the town attorney from using his official position to improperly influence a tribunal to act in a private client's favor.

OPINION 1243 (07/07/2022)

TOPIC: Public Defender; Part-Time Judge; Conflict of Interest

DIGEST: A part-time assistant public defender whose law partner is a part-time town court judge is precluded from representing clients of the public defender's office in the town court where the part-time judge serves because such representation would appear to violate Judiciary Law § 471 and the Rules of Judicial Conduct found in 22 NYCRR Part 100, thereby constituting a violation of Rule 8.4(f). A full-time assistant public defender whose father-in-law is the same part-time judge is similarly precluded from appearing in the town court, but under certain circumstances he may participate outside of court in defending clients of the public defender's office. These prohibitions are not imputed to other attorneys in the public defender's office.

RULES: 1.7, 1.8, 1.9, 1.10(a), 8.4(f)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a county public defender who practices exclusively out of the public defender's offices. A part-time assistant public defender on the inquirer's staff is the first cousin of, and law partner with, a part-time town court judge in a town within the same county. The part-time assistant public defender does not maintain an office in the public defender's office and performs his public defender duties from the law offices he shares with his law partner, the part-time town court judge. Another full-time assistant public defender who practices exclusively out of the public defender's office is the son-in-law of the part-time town court judge.

QUESTIONS:

2. May an assistant public defender who is a law partner and first cousin of a part-time town court judge represent public defender clients in the town court in which the judge serves?

3. May a full time assistant public defender who is the son-in-law of a part-time judge but shares no office space with the part-time judge represent clients of the public defender's office in the town court in which the judge serves?

4. If the answer to either question is no, would the disqualification be imputed to all lawyers in the public defender's office?

OPINION:

Disqualification Pursuant to Rule 8.4(f)

5. Rule 8.4(f) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct ("Rules") provides that a "lawyer or law firm shall not . . . (f) knowingly assist a judge or judicial officer in conduct that is in violation of applicable rules of judicial conduct or other law." (Emphasis added.) This Committee's authority is limited to interpreting the Rules, and we have no jurisdiction to decide questions of law. Nonetheless, we call the inquirer's attention to provisions of the New York Judiciary Law and the Rules of Judicial Conduct ("RJC") that are pertinent to his inquiry. See, e.g., N.Y. State 1115 ¶ 14 (2017) (citing various provisions of the Judiciary Law and RJC when analyzing a public defender's duties under Rule 8.4(f)).

6. Regarding "law," the first provision that we consider relevant to the inquirer's situation is Section 471 of the Judiciary Law, which provides:

> A law partner of, or person connected in law business with a judge, shall not practice or act as an attorney or counsellor, in a court, of which the judge is, or is entitled to act as a member . . . .

7. Regarding "rules of judicial conduct," Section 100.6(B)(3) of the RJC provides:

> A part-time judge:
>
> . . . .
> (3) shall not permit his or her partners or associates to practice law in the court in which he or she is a judge, and shall not permit the practice of law in his or her court by the law partners or associates of another judge of the same court who is permitted to practice law, but may permit the practice of law in his or her court by the partners or associates of a judge of a court in another town, village or city who is permitted to practice law . . . .

8. Section 100.3(E)(1)(e) of the RJC provides:

> (1) A judge shall disqualify himself or herself in a proceeding in which the judge's impartiality might reasonably be questioned, including but not limited to instances where:
>
> (e) The judge knows that the judge or the judge's spouse, or a person known to be within the fourth degree of relationship to either of them, or the spouse of such person, is acting as a lawyer in the proceeding or is likely to be a material witness in the proceeding. Where the judge knows the relationship to be within the second degree, (i) the judge must disqualify him/herself without the possibility of remittal if such person appears in the courtroom during the proceeding or is likely to do so, but (ii) may permit remittal of disqualification provided such person remains permanently absent from the courtroom.

9. Section 100.3(F) of the RJC describes the remittal procedure, in which the court and the parties can waive judicial disqualification in some circumstances where such disqualification would otherwise be required. In pertinent part, Section 100.3(F) provides:

> A judge disqualified by the terms of subdivision (E), except . . . subparagraph (1)(e)(i) of this section. may disclose on the record the basis of the judge's disqualification. If, following such disclosure of any basis for disqualification, the parties who have > appeared and not defaulted and their lawyers, without participation by the judge, all agree that the judge should not be disqualified, and the judge believes that he or she will be impartial and is willing to participate, the judge may participate in the proceeding. The agreement shall be incorporated in the record of the proceeding.

10. The judge's son-in-law stands within the second degree of relationship to the part-time judge in this inquiry, and the judge's cousin stands within the fourth degree of relationship to the part-time judge. See RJC § 100.0(C) (setting out how the "degree of relationship" is calculated for various categories of people under the RJC).

11. Based on the apparent bar of Judiciary Law § 471, and because there seems to be no remittal provision in the RJC for disqualification required of a part-time judge pursuant to RJC §100.6(B)(3), the part-time assistant public defender who is a law partner with the part-time judge may not represent clients in town court proceedings. This is the case notwithstanding the part-time assistant public defender's status as a first cousin of the part-time judge which, placing them in the fourth degree of relationship to each other, might otherwise permit remittal pursuant to RJC § 100.3(F).

12. On the other hand, Judiciary Law § 471 does not appear applicable to the full-time assistant public defender who is not a law partner with, or otherwise "connected in law business" with the part-time judge (his father-in-law), with whom he stands in the second degree of relationship. Based on that second degree relationship, it also appears that the remittal provision of RJC § 100.3(F) is applicable. Accordingly, although the full-time assistant public defender may not appear before any judge of the town court, he may participate outside the courtrooms in proceedings pending in the town court if (i) the prosecutor and the defendant agree that the judge presiding should not be disqualified and (ii) the judge presiding believes he can be impartial.

13. Our opinion here is consistent with our opinion in N.Y. State 1115 (2017), where we determined that members of a public defender's office may not represent a client in a city court where another member of the public defender's office serves as a part-time judge. We reasoned that the inquirer's proposed conduct would violate Rule 8.4(f) by causing a judge to violate the command of the RJC not to "permit his or her partners or associates to practice law in the court in which he or she is a judge." RJC §100.6(B)(3). N.Y. State 1115 was part of a long line of opinions issued by this Committee dealing with the ethical constraints placed upon associates and partners of part-time judges, including inquiries involving members of public defenders' offices. See, e.g., N.Y. State 29 (1966) (an associate of a part-time town court judge may not appear before either judge of a town court consisting of two judges); N.Y. State 65 (1967) (applying the prohibition to partners, as well); N.Y. State 497 (1978) (improper for an assistant public defender to share office space with a village justice where any member of the public defender's staff appeared in the justice court); N.Y. State 701 (1998) (lawyer who is co-counsel with a part-time judge in a civil case may not appear before another judge on the part-time judge's court because the public might perceive that the administration of justice is not fairly and impartially served).

Lack of Imputation Pursuant to Rule 1.10(a)

14. Pursuant to Rule 1.10(a), certain conflicts are imputed to all lawyers associated with the attorney whose conduct or situation gave rise to the conflict. Rule 1.10(a) provides:

> While lawyers are associated in a firm, none of them shall knowingly represent a client when any one of them practicing alone would be prohibited from doing so by Rule 1.7, 1.8 or 1.9, except as otherwise provided therein. [Emphasis added.]

15. Rules 1.7, 1.8 and 1.9 all concern conflicts with current or former clients. Here, neither the disqualification of the part-time assistant public defender nor the disqualification of the full-time public defender arises from a conflict of interest with a current or former client under Rules 1.7, 1.8 or 1.9. Under Rule 1.10(a), disqualifications based on Rule 8.4(f) are not imputed to other attorneys in public defender's office or to the public defender himself.

16. We recognize that certain language in N.Y. State 1115 ¶ 8 might be read to imply that disqualifications under Rule 8.4(f) are imputed to attorneys "associated" in the same firm, but that was not the Committee's intention. Rather, Opinion 1115's discussion of Rule 1.10(a) was intended to emphasize that all the assistant public defenders in the public defender's office in that inquiry were associated with the part-time judge, who was also an assistant public defender in the same office. Therefore, all lawyers associated with the part-time judge in law practice were disqualified. Here, in contrast, the part-time judge is associated only with the part-time assistant public defender who is his first cousin and law partner.

CONCLUSION:

17. A part-time assistant public defender whose law partner is a part-time town court judge is precluded from representing clients of the public defender's office in the town court where the part-time judge serves because such representation would appear to violate Judiciary Law § 471 and the Rules of Judicial Conduct found in 22 NYCRR Part 100, thereby constituting a violation of Rule 8.4(f). A full-time assistant public defender whose father-in-law is the same part-time judge is similarly precluded from appearing in the town court, but under certain circumstances he may participate outside of court in defending clients of the public defender's office. These prohibitions are not imputed to other attorneys in the public defender's office.

OPINION 1244 (10/06/2022)

TOPIC: Referral fees paid to retired lawyers

DIGEST: A retired lawyer may receive a referral fee as long as the retiree maintains joint responsibility for the referred matter.

RULES: 1.5, 5.1, 5.4

FACTS:

1. The inquirer was a sole New York lawyer who practiced contingency-fee personal injury law in New York. While in practice, the inquirer handled cases only in the venue where the inquirer had an office, and referred matters outside that venue to other unaffiliated lawyers (A and B). Last year, in contemplation of retirement, the inquirer reached agreement with another unaffiliated lawyer (C) to take over the inquirer's remaining unresolved matters. This agreement provided for the inquirer to receive a third of the C's net recovery from each of the referred cases, that is, a third of C's legal fee. The inquirer's arrangements with A and B, made before retirement was considered, are not materially different.

2. About a year ago, the inquirer closed the office the inquirer had maintained. Before doing so, the inquirer communicated with each current and former client about the impending retirement. Separately, the inquirer wrote to those clients whose matters had been referred to C, together with an invitation to contact the inquirer about the client's matter with any questions or concerns. According to the inquirer, no client has complained about C's services. Meanwhile, C has entered engagement letters with each of the referred clients, as have A and B.

3. The inquirer is currently registered with the Office of Court Administration (OCA) as an active lawyer. The inquirer wishes to change his status to "retired." The inquirer is concerned, however, that this change of status may adversely affect the fee arrangements on the referred cases or insurance coverage if the inquirer receives compensation for the referred cases.

QUESTIONS:

4. May a retiring lawyer end "joint responsibility" for a matter upon retirement in order to share in a legal fee the claim for which arose before retirement?

5. Does a lawyer's duty to share "joint responsibility" to share a legal fee depend on whether successor counsel enters into a separate engagement letter with the referred client?

6. Does a retired lawyer's receipt of a legal fee for previously referred cases affect the retired lawyer's insurance coverage?

OPINION:

7. Rule 1.5(g) of the N.Y. Rules of Professional Conduct ("Rules") says:

> (g) A lawyer shall not divide a fee for legal services with another lawyer who is not associated in the same law firm unless:
> > (1) the division is in proportion to the services performed by each lawyer or, by a writing given to the client, each lawyer assumes joint responsibility for the representation;
> > (2) the client agrees to employment of the other lawyer after a full disclosure that a division of fees will be made, including the share each lawyer will receive, and the client's agreement is confirmed in writing; and
> > (3) the total fee is not excessive.

8. In N.Y. State 1201 (2020), we considered issues similar to those in this inquiry. There, the inquirer had received a referral in a contingency-fee matter from a lawyer with whom the inquirer had agreed to share in any legal fee but who later retired under the OCA rules. Those rules provide that a "retired" lawyer may not receive compensation for legal services rendered while retired. 22 N.Y.C.R.R. § 118.1(g); see N.Y. State 1201 ¶ 5. The issues we addressed, among others, were whether paying the referral fee was an impermissible fee-sharing arrangement under Rule 5.4(a), which forbids sharing legal fees with non-lawyers, or under the above-quoted Rule 1.5(g), which regulates fee-sharing between unassociated lawyers. N.Y. State 1201 ¶ 8.

9. In that opinion, we concluded that Rule 5.4(a) was "inapposite" because an OCA-retired lawyer is still a lawyer; only the courts may strip of a person of a law license. Id. ¶ 17. An individual's status with the OCA does not alone affect the person's membership in the bar, and expressly allows a retired lawyer to perform legal services for no compensation. Thus, no issue arises about sharing fees with a non-lawyer. As for Rule 1.5(g), we decided that the retired recipient of the referral fee must continue to bear "joint responsibility" for the matter, and modified prior opinions suggesting that an OCA-retired lawyer could not discharge that responsibility. Id. ¶¶ 12, 18. We adhere to these views.

10. Accordingly, the answer to this inquiry's first question – whether the inquirer may end "joint responsibility" for the referred matters upon retirement – is no, at least as long as the inquirer wishes to share in the legal fees that the referred cases may generate. In N.Y. State 1201, drawing on lessons from N.Y. State 961 (2013), we likened the assumption of "joint responsibility" to the duties of a supervisory lawyer under Rule 5.1. "As a member of the bar, for example, such a [retired] lawyer could remain available for consultation, could oversee case developments to assure compliance with the Rules, and would remain jointly responsible to the client for the matter, with continued exposure to any financial and ethical repercussions." N,Y, State 1201 ¶ 18.

11. The answer to the inquirer's second question – whether successor counsel's engagement letters with the referred clients ousts the duty of "joint responsibility" – is likewise no. Rule 1.5(g) proscribes sharing a fee with an unassociated lawyer unless the division is in proportion to the services each provides (not applicable here) or the unassociated lawyer assumes "joint responsibility" for the matter. That successor counsel may also bear responsibility for the matter does not allow for fee-sharing with an unassociated lawyer unless the latter remains jointly responsible. Indeed, Rule 1.5(g) requires that the client consent to the division of fees in a writing that discloses both the referring lawyer's joint responsibility and anticipated share of the fee. This language would be meaningless if successor counsel's engagement letter eviscerated the referring lawyer's continuing duty to the client.

12. Finally, the inquirer's third inquiry – about the impact of receiving a referral fee on the inquirer's insurance coverage – is outside our jurisdiction. Nothing in the Rules addresses this issue. As we have said, both its own rules and our opinions allow an OCA-retired lawyer to continue to perform legal services. Nevertheless, insurance coverage is a contract issue and thus a question of law, on which we do not opine.

CONCLUSION:

13. If a retired lawyer wishes to receive a referral fee on matters now handled by successor counsel, the retired lawyer must continue to bear "joint responsibility" for the matters of which clients are informed and to which they consent.

OPINION 1245 (11/16/2022)

TOPIC: Legal Fees, Minimum Fees, Nonrefundable Fees

DIGEST: A lawyer may charge a minimum fee to provide a defined legal service provided (a) the service is performed as agreed; (b) the engagement letter provides in plain language how the minimum fee will be calculated and the circumstances under which it will be "incurred"; and (c) the minimum fee is reasonable and not excessive and was therefore fully "earned."

RULES: 1.5; 1.5(a); 1.5(a)(1)-(8); 1.5(d)(4); 1.16(e)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer proposes to include language in an engagement letter that will fix a "minimum fee" for drafting and finalizing a separation and severance agreement between the inquirer's client and the client's employer. That minimum fee equates to a fixed number of hours of the inquirer's time at a stated hourly rate, and the client would agree to pay for any additional time required to complete the matter at that same rate. The engagement letter will also expressly advise the client that the minimum fee shall be due and owing even if the inquirer expends fewer hours than the fixed number of hours covered by the letter.

QUESTION:

2. Does the financial obligation imposed by the inquirer upon the client in the engagement letter constitute a prohibited "nonrefundable fee?"

OPINIONS:

3. Rule 1.5(d)(4) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") sets forth a requirement of full transparency as to what the lawyer must do or accomplish in order to earn a minimum fee, as well as the ultimate reasonableness of the amount of the minimum fee, as two touchstones for ethical propriety. In pertinent part, Rule 1.5(d)(4) thus provides:

> A lawyer shall not enter into an arrangement for, charge or collect
> * * *
> (4) a nonrefundable retainer fee; provided that a lawyer may enter into a retainer agreement with a client containing a reasonable minimum fee clauses if it defines in plain language and sets forth the circumstances under which such fee may be incurred and how it will be calculated;

4. As with all legal fees, a minimum fee, and an agreement to pay a minimum fee, is subject to Rule 1.5(a) which provides that "A lawyer shall not make an agreement for, charge, or collect an excessive or illegal fee or expense." See also Rule 1.5 Cmt. [4] ("A lawyer may charge a minimum fee, if that fee is not excessive, and if the wording of the minimum fee clause of the retainer agreement meets the requirements of paragraph (d)(4).").

5. To determine whether a fee, including a minimum fee, is reasonable or excessive, Rule 1.5(a) sets forth a list of eight nonexclusive factors:

> (1) the time and labor required, the novelty and difficulty of the questions involved, and the skill requisite to perform the legal services properly;
> (2) the likelihood, if apparent or made known to the client, that the acceptance of the particular employment will preclude other employment by the lawyer;
> (3) the fee customarily charged in the locality for similar legal services;
> (4) the amount involved and the results obtained;
> (5) the time limitations imposed by the client or by circumstances;
>
> (6) the nature and length of the professional relationship with the client;
> (7) the experience, reputation and ability of the lawyer or lawyers performing the services; and
> (8) whether the fee is fixed or contingent.

6. In N.Y. State 1202 (2020), we examined several proposed fee agreements, all involving flat or fixed fees. We concluded that "a lawyer may charge a non-excessive minimum fee . . . [but] may not charge a non-refundable fee." N.Y. State 1202 ¶ 12. Other opinions that have discussed nonrefundable fees include N.Y. State 599 (1989) (non-excessive minimum fee agreements are permissible, but ultimately subject to the attorney's obligation under ethics rules to return unearned fees); N.Y. City 2015-2 (nonrefundable flat monthly fees may be permitted if they are not excessive, are fully earned and do not impede a client from terminating the representation); and N.Y. City 1991-3 at II (a minimum fee can satisfy the requirement of reasonableness).

7. Here, the proposed retainer letter is not a general retainer in which a client agrees to pay an attorney an agreed sum for that lawyer to be available for an agreed period and where that agreed sum is earned upon receipt. See N.Y. State 816 ¶ 3. Rather, there is a specific legal service to be provided by the attorney which is at the heart of the engagement with the client. It is in this specific context that the reasonableness of the minimum fee under the criteria of Rule 1.5(a) must be considered. For example, was the inquirer required by the client to act expeditiously and, as a result, was she precluded for a time from providing legal services to other clients? Does the inquirer possess the requisite ability, experience and skill for negotiating and drafting employment-related documents? How many hours would such an attorney have anticipated expending on this matter in relation to the minimum number of hours that were incorporated into the engagement letter? Were there particular facts and circumstances known to the inquirer that suggested the existence of novelties or complexities that would complicate and extend the resolution of the agreement? Was the hourly rate used to calculate the minimum fee consistent with hourly rates in the legal community for the same or similar legal services? Did the inquirer obtain a good result for her client?

8. Against this background, the committee does not have sufficient facts to determine whether the inquirer's proposed minimum fee satisfies the requirements of Rule 1.5(d)(4) and is not, therefore, a prohibited nonrefundable fee.

9. The committee also does not address what additional considerations may come into play when an attorney is discharged or withdraws, with or without cause, before completing the legal service that was the subject of the minimum fee retainer letter. These events implicate highly fact-sensitive issues of law on which the committee has no jurisdiction to opine. We note, however, that consistent with the principle that a minimum fee must be reasonable and not excessive, Rule 1.16(e) requires a refund, upon withdrawal, of that portion of a fee that has not been earned:

> Even when withdrawal is otherwise permitted or required, upon termination of representation, a lawyer shall . . . promptly refund[] any part of a fee paid in advance that has not been earned. . . .

CONCLUSION:

10. A lawyer may charge a minimum fee to provide a defined legal service provided (a) the service is performed as agreed; (b) the engagement letter provides in plain language how the minimum fee will be calculated and the circumstances under which it will be "incurred"; and (c) the minimum fee is reasonable and not excessive and was therefore fully "earned."

OPINION 1246 (11/16/2022)

TOPIC: Partnership with Non-U.S. Lawyer; partner who is also a member of a firm with non-lawyer ownership or management; whether business management and strategy may be the practice of law; affiliation of law firms; co-naming of law firms; billing for services of another law firm.

DIGEST: Rule 7.5(d) recognizes a partnership between a lawyer licensed in New York and one admitted in a non-U.S. jurisdiction under certain circumstances. "Administrative duties" in law firm management may involve the practice of law, depending on the circumstances. The sole fact that an English solicitor is a member of a U.K. ABS does not make it unethical for a New York lawyer to partner with that solicitor. "Co-branding" between law firms must avoid misleading the public as to the true relationship between the firms. Where two law firms provide services to the same client, one firm may charge the fees and expenses of the other firm as a disbursement and then pay the other firm what it is owed if the fees and expenses otherwise comply with the Rules.

RULES: 1.5(g), 1.10(a), 5.4(b), 5.4(d), 5.5, 5.5(b), 7.2(a), 7.5(d), 8.5.

FACTS:

1. The inquirer, a New York lawyer, proposes to become a partner in a New York law firm ("Firm XYZ") that is formed as a Delaware limited liability partnership and is expected to be registered in New York as a foreign limited liability partnership. Firm XYZ will have a majority partner ("S" or "Solicitor") who is a solicitor in England and Wales but not admitted in New York. S is based in, and practices law solely from, the United Kingdom ("U.K."). S's role in Firm XYZ would involve matters of strategy, business and general management, but the inquirer represents that S will not practice English or any other law from Firm XYZ.

2. S is also the managing partner of, and has a controlling interest in, a law firm in the U.K. that is in the form of an "Alternative Business Structure" ("ABS") i.e., which has, or is permitted to have, non-lawyer ownership/control. The firm we'll call "Firm ABS" is expected to have seven or eight partners or members, of which six will be solicitors in the U.K. and one or two will be corporations with non-lawyer ownership. At least one corporate member will have an equity stake in Firm ABS and will have certain veto rights, although it will have no active involvement or control rights in respect of the operation and management of Firm ABS. The inquirer is not admitted in England, will not be a member of Firm ABS, and will practice solely in New York for clients of Firm XYZ.

3. The inquirer states that Firm XYZ and Firm ABS would be separate, independent and distinct legal entities. They would have no parent/subsidiary relationship, although S would have an ownership interest in each. They would not share partnership profits, although the inquirer states that compensation of lawyer members or partners across the two firms might consider, among other factors, the aggregate profits of the two law firms. In addition, the inquirer states that Firm XYZ and Firm ABS may share legal fees, proportionally and in compliance with the Rules. For example, when the law firms represent a client together on the same matter, the combined fees may be presented on a single invoice to the client (after disclosure and client consent), with the law firm receiving the combined fees in the first instance and providing a subsequent payment of the other law firm's share of those fees. Finally, the law firms would be "co-branded".

QUESTIONS:

4. May a New York lawyer become a partner of a New York law firm which has a partner who is an English lawyer not admitted in New York?

5. Does it matter that the English lawyer purports not to practice law with the New York firm?

6. Does it matter if the English lawyer is also a partner of a U.K. law firm that is an "Alternative Business Structure," i.e. has, or is permitted to have, non-lawyer ownership?

7. May Firm XYZ be affiliated with Firm ABS via common ownership by S?

8. May Firm XYZ and Firm ABS be otherwise "affiliated"?

9. May Firm XYZ and Firm ABS be co-branded?

10. May the Firms share legal fees from a common client and may the total fee be billed initially by Firm ABS?

OPINION:

11. The jurisdiction of this Committee is primarily to give opinions interpreting the New York Rules of Professional Conduct. This inquiry implicates several New York laws, including Section 121-1500 of the New York Partnership Law, which are not considered here.

Partnership with a Solicitor Admitted in the U.K.

12. The New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") prohibit partnerships between lawyers and non-lawyers if any of the activities of the partnership consist of the practice of law. See Rule 5.4(b). We have often noted that this provision, which seems to disallow a partnership with any lawyer not admitted in New York, is not that restrictive. As we explained in N.Y. State 1072 (2015), Rule 5.4(d) is tempered by Rule 7.5(d):

> Rule 7.5(d) . . . recognizes partnerships "between or among lawyers licensed in different jurisdictions." See N.Y. State 658 (1993); see also N.Y. State 542 (1982). We also previously have noted that the reference in Rule 7.5(d) to "lawyers licensed in foreign jurisdictions" includes lawyers licensed in foreign countries. See N.Y. State 542.

13. As we pointed out in N.Y. State 1072, it is not sufficient that the foreign lawyer is licensed as a lawyer in another country. The New York firm must also inquire into two other factors:

> (i) whether the foreign country's educational requirements for admission are generally similar to those for New York attorneys and (ii) whether the standards of professional conduct and discipline governing the foreign attorney are essentially compatible with New York's standards. See N.Y. State 542 (1982); N.Y. State 658 (1993).

14. In N.Y. State 542, we concluded that lawyers admitted only in the United Kingdom met this requirement:

> The general similarity of our educational requirements for admission to practice, as well as the essential compatibility of our standards of professional conduct and discipline, have inevitably led us to consider such persons beyond the traditional proscription against lay partnerships.

15. If the names of the partners of Firm XYZ are listed on the letterhead of the firm, the letterhead must indicate that S is admitted only in England and Wales (or not admitted to practice in New York)

Does it Matter that the U.K. Solicitor Purports Not to Practice Law with Firm XYZ?

16. The inquiry states that S is based in, and practices law solely from, the U.K. S's role in Firm XYZ would involve matters of strategy, business and general management. Inquirer represents that S will not practice English or any other law from Firm XYZ. We addressed similar facts in N.Y. State 1093 (2016). That opinion involved a New York lawyer who practiced principally with a U.K. ABS that had non-lawyer partners. The lawyer also wanted to become a partner of a New York law firm. In that opinion, we said the answer depended on the application of Rule 8.5 – the choice of law rule – which, in turn, depended on the jurisdiction in which the lawyer "principally practiced". As here, we were told that the lawyer would not practice any type of law in New York, but would merely provide management and administrative activities. We noted that what constitutes the practice of law is a question of law that is beyond the jurisdiction of our Committee. See Judiciary Law § 478 (practicing or appearing as attorney-at-law without being admitted and registered), Rule 5.5, Cmt. [2] ("The definition of the "practice of law" is established by law and varies from one jurisdiction to another.") However, we noted that the determination of what constitutes the practice of law depends greatly on the facts:

> While some law firms hire managers who are non-lawyers and whose role is limited to purely administrative matters, many other law firms employ full-time managing partners who are lawyers admitted to practice in New York. Although some of these managing partners do not represent any clients, they may play active roles in determining which clients their firms should represent, including assessing whether representation would involve conflicts of interest and evaluating the merits of cases, and they may actively oversee the conduct of matters being handled by the firm to ensure that the firm complies with law and professional standards. We therefore cannot rule out the possibility that a New York lawyer managing a New York law firm will be exercising legal judgment. This is one plausible reason that the New York firm would make the person handling management and administrative activities a partner rather than an employee.

Does it Matter that the Solicitor is also a Partner in a U.K. ABS?

17. The New York Rules preclude a New York lawyer from practicing law in any capacity with an entity authorized to practice law if a nonlawyer (a) is a partner, (b) owns an interest in the entity, (c) is a member, director or officer or has a position of similar responsibility, or (d) has the right to direct or control the professional judgment of a lawyer. Rule 5.4(b) & (d). The New York Rules also preclude a New York lawyer from sharing legal fees with a non-lawyer or from forming a partnership with a non-lawyer if any of the activities of the partnership consist of the practice of law. Rule 5.4(a) & (b). Those principles normally prohibit a New York lawyer from becoming a partner in a firm with non-lawyer owners or supervisors.

18. In two prior opinions, this Committee considered whether Rule 5.4 prohibited a New York lawyer from being a partner or associate of a U.K. firm formed as an Alternative Business Structure. See N.Y. State 1093 (2016) (a New York lawyer who is also admitted in a foreign jurisdiction and is practicing with non-lawyer partners in that jurisdiction may also practice in a separate New York law firm without violating the New York Rules of Professional Conduct as long as the lawyer (i) principally practices in the foreign jurisdiction or (ii) the predominant effect of the lawyer's practice with the foreign firm is in the foreign jurisdiction and (iii) the New York firm includes representations by the UK firm in its conflict of interest system); N.Y. State 1041 (2014). See also N.Y. State 1038 (New York lawyer with New York-based practice may not partner with nonlawyer or practice in law firm owned by parent firm that has nonlawyer partner.)

19. This inquiry does not involve a New York lawyer practicing principally outside the U.S. The inquirer would not be a partner, associate or other employee of a U.K. ABS. The U.K. ABS would have no ownership in Firm XYZ or any right to control S's independent professional judgment or role in Firm XYZ. Under Rule 8.5, concerning disciplinary authority, the Rules apply to a foreign lawyer only if the lawyer is admitted here or appears in court here. We therefore see no basis for finding a violation of Rule 5.4 by the New York lawyers in Firm XYZ based solely on the fact that S would be a partner of both firms. Nevertheless, as noted in paragraph 24 below, the conflict of interest considerations discussed in N.Y. State 1093 would apply.

May Firm XYZ and Firm ABS be otherwise "affiliated"?

20. The inquiry does not specify how the firms would be "affiliated," other than through the fact that S is a member of and possesses a majority interest in each. Consequently, we do not have sufficient facts to answer the question. We have previously issued opinions on referral relationships, including firms that wanted to be "associated" or "correspondents", see, e.g., N.Y. State 806 (2007), N.Y. State 538 (1981), stressing that the propriety of the proposals was dependent on the facts.

21. We advised in N.Y. State 538 that the inquirer should consider (and we believe the present inquirer should consider) several factors, including Judiciary Law § 479 (making it unlawful for any person to solicit legal business on behalf of a New York attorney) and the predecessor provision to Rule 7.2(a) (which prohibits a lawyer from compensating or giving anything of value to a person or organization to obtain employment by a client, or as a reward for having made a recommendation resulting in employment by a client, with certain exceptions not applicable here.)

22. In addition, we cautioned that fees should be divided only in accordance with the predecessor to Rule 1.5(g), which currently provides:

> A lawyer shall not divide a fee for legal services with another lawyer who is not associated in the same law firm unless:

> (1) the division is in proportion to the services performed by each lawyer or, by a writing given to the client, each lawyer assumes joint responsibility for the representation;
>
> (2) the client agrees to employment of the other lawyer after a full disclosure that a division of fees will be made, including the share each lawyer will receive, and the client's agreement is confirmed in writing; and
> (3) the total fee is not excessive.

23. In this case, the inquirer represents that legal fees will be shared "proportionally," which we assume means in proportion to the services provided by each firm.

24. Finally, because S will be a member of both Firm XYZ and Firm ABS, the two firms must comply with the conflict provisions of Rule 1.10(a). See N.Y. State 1093, N.Y. State 876 (2011) (Where a lawyer is "associated" with more than one law firm within the meaning of the imputation rule, all of the law firms with whom the lawyer is associated are treated as one law firm for purposes of conflicts of interest.)

May Firm XYZ and Firm ABS be co-branded?

25. The inquiry does not give us any information about what being "co-branded" would entail. We assume that co-branding means that the firms would have similar names.

26. Before June 2020, Rule 7.5 prohibited a lawyer in private practice from practicing under a trade name, or a firm name containing names other than one or more of the lawyers in the firm, with certain exceptions not relevant here. Then, however, the Rules were changed to allow a firm to use any name that is not false, deceptive or misleading, including one that is misleading as to the lawyers practicing under such name:

> (b) (1) A lawyer in private practice shall not practice under:
> (i) a false, deceptive or misleading a trade name;
>
> (ii) a false, deceptive, or misleading domain name; or
> (iii) a name that is misleading as to the identity of the lawyer or lawyers practicing under such name.

27. As we noted in N.Y. State 1207 (2020), this allows a name that does not include the name of any lawyer in the firm, and a name based on its street address. Comments [3], [4] and [5] to Rule 7.5 give examples of deceptive and misleading firm names. However, as we noted in N.Y. State 1207, whether a particular name is false, deceptive or misleading is a heavily fact-based inquiry and beyond the jurisdiction of our Committee.

28. The concern with co-branding two completely separate firms is the possibility that it will mislead the public as to the nature of the relationship between the firms and may indicate that the firms are branches of a single firm. Cf. Rule 7.5(d), which allows partnerships between lawyers licensed in different jurisdictions, as long as any enumeration of the members and associates of the firm make clear the jurisdictional limitations of those lawyers not licensed to practice in all listed jurisdictions, and allowing the same firm name to be used in each jurisdiction.

29. In N.Y. State 1093 (2016), which involved a New York law firm and a U.K. ABS with a common partner, we assumed that the New York firm would not be managed in such a way that it operated as a branch of the U.K. ABS. See also N.Y. State 911 (2012) (a foreign law firm with non-lawyer members or managers may not have a branch in New York). We also stated that a profit-sharing arrangement (which we are told is not present here) would implicate the same concerns.

30. The inquirer states that, although the firms would not share profits, the compensation of partners across the two firms may consider, among other factors, the aggregate profits of the two firms. We believe this would be an indicator that the firms are being managed as a single firm.

31. We believe that a co-branding arrangement could also raise concerns that Firm XYZ is a branch of the U.K. ABS, without disclosure of the exact nature of the relationship between the two firms.

Joint Billing

32. The inquiry states that, when the two law firms represent a client together on the same matter, the combined fees may be presented on a single invoice to the client (after disclosure and client consent), with the law firm receiving the combined fees in the first instance and providing a subsequent payment of the other law firm's share of those fees. We assume that both firms are proving legal services, and that one firm is not entitled solely to a referral fee (i.e. dividing a single legal fee).

33. In N.Y. State 1211 (2020), we considered how counsel in one matter may charge the client for the fees and disbursements of another lawyer who performs related legal services for the client. We noted that Rule 1.5(b) requires that the New York lawyer communicate with the client "the scope of the representation and the basis or rate of the fee or expenses for which the client will be responsible." We also advised that there are two caveats when two firms supply services in the same matter. First, the fees of both firms must be reasonably incurred to achieve the objectives of the representations. Second, charging the legal fees and disbursements of the second firm as disbursements of the first firm must not violate the prohibition of Rule 1.5 against charging an "excessive" fee or expense. However, we concluded that how the client would actually be billed was a matter of contract law with the client, citing ABA 00-420 ("Whether the cost attributable to a contract lawyer is billed as an expense or included in legal service fees is not addressed by the Model Rules and does not seem to be a matter of ethics.") Here, although each firm would be calculating its own fees and expenses, the retainer agreement of one of the law firms may provide that such firm will charge the fees and expenses of the other firm as long as the fees of both firms were reasonably incurred to achieve the objectives of the representations, the total fees and expenses of the two firms are not excessive and the work performed by each firm is made clear to the client.

CONCLUSION:

34. Rule 7.5(d) recognizes partnerships between a lawyer licensed in New York and one admitted in a foreign jurisdiction, as long as the foreign country's educational requirements for admission are generally similar to those for New York attorneys and the standards of professional conduct and discipline governing the foreign attorney are essentially compatible with New York's standards.

35. Although the role of English lawyer here would involve matters of strategy, business and general management, and the inquirer states that the English lawyer will not practice law from the New York firm, we cannot rule out that administrative duties will involve the practice of law. For example, if the foreign lawyer plays an active role in determining which clients the New York firm should represent, including assessing whether representation would involve conflicts of interest and evaluating the merits of cases, or actively oversees the conduct of matters being handled by the firm, the foreign lawyer might be deemed to be exercising legal judgment and thus practicing New York law without a license.

36. No New York-admitted lawyer would be a member or employee of the U.K. ABS. The U.K. ABS would have no ownership in Firm XYZ or any right to control S's independent professional judgment or role in Firm XYZ. We therefore see no basis for finding a violation of Rule 5.4 based solely on the fact that S would be a partner of both firms.

37. We cannot opine as to affiliations between law firms without sufficient facts, but our prior opinions address referral relationships, and the problems of describing relationships between firms without being deceptive or misleading.

38. The issue with co-branding two completely separate firms is the possibility that it will mislead the public as to the nature of the relationship between the firms and may indicate that the firms are branches of a single firm.

39. Where two law firms provide services to the client on the same or ancillary matters, it is permissible for the retainer agreements to provide that one of the firms will charge the fees and expenses of the other firm as a disbursements on its own invoice and then pay the other firm what it is owed, as long as the fees of both firms were reasonably incurred to achieve the objectives of the representations and the total fees and expenses of the two firms are not excessive.

TOPIC: Conflict of interest in representing county and serving subpoenas on county departments.

DIGEST: A lawyer who represents certain separate County Departments in diverse matters as an independent contractor for the County Attorney may request and serve subpoenas for documents and witnesses upon a County Department for which he does not perform legal services and which is not represented by the County Attorney without obtaining client consent, as each department is considered separate for purposes of analysis under Rule 1.7 (a)(1).

RULES: 1.7 (a)(1)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer works part time as an independent contractor for a County Attorney while maintaining a private practice. In his contract work, the inquirer represents the County's Department of Mental Health, seeking treatment over objection orders, the County's Department of Health, enforcing fines for violations of the County's Sanitary Code, and the County Sewer District, collecting unpaid sewer taxes. His duties do not extend to providing legal advice to County management or personnel. The inquirer determines his own legal strategy for each of his contract matters and his day-to-day work is not supervised by the County Attorney's office.

2. In private practice the inquirer accepts assignments representing indigent individuals in child custody proceedings in Family Court. In those cases, it is occasionally required that the inquirer request that the Family Court issue subpoenas for records and witnesses from the County's Department of Social Services (DSS) and Child Protective Services (CPS), which is an arm of DSS.

3. The County Attorney does not represent DSS or CPS. DSS has its own attorneys, including a director of legal services, all of whom are appointed under Section 66 of the New York State Social Services Law. While that section provides that DSS attorneys may be deputized by the County Attorney, this has not occurred in the county where the inquirer is employed and practices. The duties and responsibilities of the DSS legal unit are independent of the County Attorney's duties and responsibilities, and DSS attorneys, not the County Attorney, would represent DSS employees who may occasionally be subpoenaed by the inquirer should representation become necessary.

QUESTION:

4. Do the inquirer's requests to the Family Court to issue subpoenas to the County Department of Social Services present a conflict-of-interest?

OPINION:

5. Questions regarding conflicts of interest between part-time government lawyers and the interests they represent in their private practice have regularly come before this Committee, particularly when the lawyer is a part-time prosecutor. N.Y. State 1065 (2015) provides a thorough analysis of the conditions the Committee has set on part-time prosecutors' private practice. Issues have also arisen in cases where the part-time government lawyer practices civil law for the municipality. In those cases, the Committee has carefully reviewed the interests the lawyer represents in the lawyer's government service to ensure that the interests represented in the private practice do not conflict. Thus, in N.Y. State 1074 (2015), the inquirer was employed part-time by a county's Department of Social Services handling a wide variety of matters including paternity and child-support matters, liens, guardianships, and occasionally child abuse and neglect cases. The question was whether the lawyer could participate in his private practice in the County's Assigned Counsel Program by representing indigent individuals in Criminal and Family Court proceedings-but not child abuse and neglect matters. The Committee said that the lawyer could accept assignments in Criminal and Family Court matters, "provided that the Department or others in law enforcement with whom the lawyer works are not materially involved." The Committee went on to say that the lawyer could not accept assigned clients "in matters within the Department's jurisdiction" or in matters where the lawyer would "be required to cross-examine law enforcement officials with whom the lawyer is now engaged as a part time lawyer at the Department of Social Services or has recently done so."

6. Here, the inquirer's work for the County is limited to (a) representing the County's Health Department enforcing fines imposed for violations of the County Sanitary Code; (b) representing the County Sewer District in collecting district-imposed sewer taxes, and (c) representing the County's Department of Mental Health in proceedings under the Mental Hygiene Law for court-ordered mental health treatment. In private practice, the inquirer declines representation in any Family Court matters in which the County is a party.

7. This Committee has opined, "When a governmental body is organized into a number of separate departments or agencies, such department or agency, and not the parent governmental unit, should be treated as the client for purposes of the rule which forbids the concurrent representation of one client against another." N. Y. State 447 (1976.)

8. The inquirer has asked if requesting and serving subpoenas for documents and witnesses from one department of County government – the Department of Social Services – gives rise to a conflict of interest with inquirer's representation of other County departments, the Departments of Health and Mental Health, and the County Sewer District. However, since the inquirer does not represent DSS, this does not present a situation where the inquirer would be requesting documents and witnesses from a Department or from County employees for whom the inquirer provides legal services. Therefore, Rule 1.7(a)(1) is not implicated.

9. Moreover, even if the inquirer did represent DSS, it is not clear that he would be prohibited from seeking information pursuant to subpoena from that Department under Rule 1.7(a)(1). Although we need not reach that issue on the facts presented, we recognize that subpoenaing documents or witnesses from a current client in a matter unrelated to the lawyer's current representation of that client can raise conflict issues. For example, N.Y. City 2017-6 (2017) dealt with the question of whether a conflict can arise should one lawyer be called upon to request discovery on behalf one client from a current client in an unrelated matter and determined that, "Issuing a subpoena to a current client to obtain testimony from that client will ordinarily give rise to a conflict of interest . . . But that said, the Committee can envision exceptional situations where subpoenaing a witness will not be directly averse to the witness." The American Bar Association has similarly opined in Formal Opinion 92-367 (1992), that, "A lawyer who in the course of representing a client examines another client as an adverse witness in a matter unrelated to the lawyer's representation of the other client or conducts third party discovery of the client in such a matter, will likely face a conflict that is disqualifying in the absence of appropriate client consent."

10. Here, however, the subject matters that are involved in the inquirer's representations are singularly disparate: on the one hand, treatment over objection orders under the Mental Hygiene law, the collection of sewer taxes, and the enforcement of fines for the Department of Health; and on the other hand, child custody matters. The Departments themselves and their employees appear sufficiently distinct that they would be different clients for purposes of the Rule 1.7(a)(1) analysis, and the inquirer, therefore, would not be representing differing interests.

CONCLUSION:

11. A lawyer who represents certain separate County Departments in diverse matters as an independent contractor for the County Attorney may request and serve subpoenas for documents and witnesses upon a County Department for which he does not perform legal services and which is not represented by the County Attorney without obtaining client consent, as each Department is considered separate for purposes of analysis under Rule 1.7 (a)(1).

(07-22)

TOPIC: Dispute over credit card payment for legal services

DIGEST: If a client disputes a credit card payment of legal fees by requesting a chargeback, the lawyer may dispute the chargeback by providing information to the credit card provider about the services rendered, including the disclosure of the retainer agreement and client invoices if (a) the information is not confidential; (b) the client gives informed consent to disclose the confidential information, or (c) absent consent, the lawyer reasonably believes that the disclosure of confidential information is necessary to establish or collect the lawyer's lawfully earned fee. Such disclosures should be limited or redacted to reveal only what is objectively reasonable to rebut the chargeback request and prove the lawyer's entitlement to his fee. Participation in the resolution of the chargeback dispute initiated by the client does not relieve the lawyer of his obligations pursuant to the New York State Fee Dispute Resolution Program.

RULES: 1.6

FACTS:

1. The inquirer receives credit card payments from clients for services rendered. When clients who make credit card payments later dispute the lawyer's services by seeking a "chargeback," the credit card provider allows the lawyer an opportunity to dispute the chargeback by providing information about the services rendered.

QUESTION:

2. In a dispute with a client who has requested a "chargeback" for credit card payments to the lawyer, may the lawyer provide information, such as the retainer agreement and invoices, to the credit card provider to establish the lawyer's entitlement to payment for the lawyer's legal services?

OPINION:

3. It has been recognized for nearly a half century that lawyers may accept credit card payments for legal services. In N.Y. State 362 (1974), we concluded: "The use of credit cards to pay for legal fees is an innovation which should not be discouraged where the participating lawyer complies with the appropriate safeguards . . . [because] it fills a need for a segment of the public that conceivably might not otherwise have access to legal services." Among the necessary safeguards are the protection of clients' confidential information.

4. After making a credit card payment, a client may assert that the lawyer did not render the services for which the client paid, or that the lawyer did not render the services competently and may request a "chargeback" from the credit card provider. In that event, the credit card provider may withhold or withdraw payment to the lawyer. However, the credit card provider may decline to charge back the disputed payment if the lawyer provides satisfactory information about the services rendered. The inquirer asks whether providing information such as the retainer agreement and invoices would violate the duty of confidentiality.

5. Rule 1.6(a)(1) establishes the basic duty of confidentiality. It provides, subject to exception:

> A lawyer shall not knowingly reveal confidential information, as defined in this Rule, or use such information to the disadvantage of a client or for the advantage of the lawyer or a third person, unless . . . the client gives informed consent, as defined in Rule 1.0(j).

6. The list of exceptions to nondisclosure is set forth in Rule 1.6(b). One of these exceptions is that "A lawyer may reveal or use confidential information to the extent that the lawyer reasonably believes necessary . . . to establish or collect a fee." See Rule 1.6(b)(5)(ii).

Would the disclosure of the retainer agreement or client invoices constitute disclosure of confidential information?

7. The first question we must address is whether a retainer agreement or client invoices are "confidential information" within the meaning of Rule 1.6(a). Our professional conduct rules define confidential information somewhat differently, and slightly more narrowly, than the rules of most other states. Rule 1.6(a) provides in pertinent part:

> "Confidential information" consists of information gained during or relating to the representation of a client, whatever its source, that is (a) protected by the attorney-client privilege, (b) likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed, or (c) information that the client has requested be kept confidential.

8. Under this definition, information about the fact and nature of the lawyer's representation, and the fact that services were rendered, may or may not be confidential, depending on the circumstances. Information in invoices about the general nature of services performed is not invariably either privileged, likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed, or information that the client has requested be kept confidential. On the one hand, even the existence of a lawyer-client relationship is sometimes confidential information under Rule 1.6(a). See N.Y. State 1088 (2016) ("The client is more likely to find that disclosure of the fact of a current or prior representation by a lawyer is embarrassing or detrimental where the representation involves or involved criminal law, bankruptcy, debt collection or family law."). On the other hand, there may be contexts where the information to be provided to the credit card provider is not privileged, its disclosure would not embarrass or prejudice the client, and the client has not requested that it be kept confidential. Whether nonprivileged information about the general nature of the lawyer's services is confidential "will depend on the client and the specific facts and circumstances of the representation." Id.

If the retainer agreement and invoices are confidential information, has the attorney secured the client's informed consent to their disclosure?

9. If a lawyer determines that the retainer agreement and client invoices are confidential information, he may nonetheless disclose them with client consent pursuant to Rule 1.6(a)(1) in accordance with the definition of informed consent set forth in Rule 1.0(j), which provides:

> "Informed consent" denotes the agreement by a person to a proposed course of conduct after the lawyer has communicated information adequate for the person to make > an informed decision, and after the lawyer has adequately explained to the person the material risks or the proposed course of conduct and reasonably available alternatives.

10. Rule 1.0(j) offers guidance on the content of disclosures the lawyer should make to obtain informed consent. Here, we will also offer guidance on the timing of those disclosures. A lawyer has two basic choices—at the time the dispute arises, or before the dispute arises. Thus, a lawyer may ask the client to give informed consent for the lawyer to disclose confidential information to the credit card provider at the time the dispute arises so that the credit card provider can address the dispute based on fuller information. To obtain informed consent at that juncture, the lawyer should explain the limited purpose of the disclosure to the client, along with the lawyer's assessments of any risk of further disclosure associated with providing the confidential information to the credit card provider. If appropriate, the lawyer might also describe any redactions the lawyer proposes to make to the retainer agreement and the invoices where the redacted information is not necessary or relevant to the resolution of the dispute. Alternatively, a lawyer may obtain the client's informed consent to disclose confidential information to a credit card company in the event of a requested charge back in advance of the dispute (e.g., in the retainer agreement), and the lawyer may rely on that advance consent unless and until the client withdraws that consent (which the client is free to do). Cf. N.Y. State 1061 (2015) ("If the client revokes consent, the revocation will prohibit the lawyer to make future reports of the client's payment status to the System but will not require the lawyer to remove any past reports to the System.").

If the retainer agreement and invoices are confidential information, and the attorney has not secured the client's informed consent to their disclosure, is disclosure "reasonably necessary to establish or collect a fee"?

11. If the client has not consented to allow the lawyer to disclose the retainer agreement, the lawyer's invoices, or other confidential information relevant to the dispute, the lawyer must determine whether an exception to the duty of confidentiality applies. As noted, one of those exceptions is Rule 1.6(b)(5)(ii), which will permit disclosure to the credit card company "to the extent that the lawyer reasonably believes necessary . . . to establish or collect a fee."

12. The fee collection exception will apply sometimes, but not always. For example, it will not apply if the lawyer can allay the client's concerns and persuade the client to withdraw the objection or resolve the dispute, thereby obviating the need to persuade the credit card company that the charge is legitimate. To that end, the lawyer may, where practicable, seek to resolve the dispute, based on full or partial payment, explaining to the client that if an agreed resolution is not reached, the lawyer will submit information about the representation to the credit card provider to the extent reasonably necessary to establish and collect the lawyer's fee. See Rule 1.6, cmt. [14] ("Before making a disclosure, the lawyer should, where practicable, first seek to persuade the client to take suitable action to obviate the need for disclosure."). Whether direct communication with the client for the purpose of compromising the fee or withdrawing the chargeback request is "practicable" will turn on many factors, including the availability of the client and the client's willingness to engage in a discussion, as well as the credit card company's deadline for the lawyer to respond to the chargeback request. The Rule 1.6(b)(5)(ii) exception will apply either if no resolution of the fee dispute is reached with the client or if the client does not withdraw the dispute. But even if the exception applies, the lawyer may submit to the credit card company only such information as the lawyer "reasonably believes necessary" to dispute the chargeback and release the funds to pay the lawyer's legitimately earned fee in accordance with the fee agreement.

13. If the lawyer invokes the exception in Rule 1.6(b)(5)(ii) to provide documents such as a retainer agreement or invoices, the lawyer must first redact information that the lawyer does not reasonably believe necessary to establish or collect the lawyer's fee. See Rule 1.6, Cmt. [14] ("[A] disclosure adverse to the client's interest should be no greater than the lawyer reasonably believes necessary to accomplish the purpose"); N.Y. State 1118 (2017) ("The inquirer may disclose confidential information reasonably necessary to collect a fee, but must take all reasonable measures, such as redaction . . . , to limit the disclosure of confidential information to information that is objectively reasonable to prove his entitlement to his fee.").

Does the chargeback review procedure relieve the attorney from compliance with the New York State Fee Dispute Resolution Program?

14. The New York State Fee Dispute Resolution Program (the "Program") "provides for the informal and expeditious resolution of fee disputes between attorneys and clients through arbitration and mediation." See 22 NYCRR Part 137.0. The Program applies to civil matters where the dispute involves an amount that is $1,000 or more but less than $50,000 (see 22 NYCRR § 137.1 (a) & (b)(2)) "whether or not the attorney has already received some or all of the fee in dispute." See 22 NYCRR § 137.2(a). Where, as here, "the attorney and client cannot agree as to the attorney's fee," the Program requires that the attorney forward by certified mail or personal service a "Notice of Client's Right to Arbitrate." See 22 NYCRR § 137.6(a). The Program has rules concerning the contents of that notice, additional arbitration procedures, and the conduct of the hearing. See generally 22 NYCRR §§ 137.6 & 137.7. The Program also provides the opportunity for judicial de novo review of an arbitration award. See 22 NYCRR §§ 137.8, 15. Although the inquirer may here dispute the chargeback request by providing information to the credit card provider in conformance with this opinion, the chargeback dispute process initiated by the client does not relieve the inquirer from his obligations under the Program. Notice of Client's Right to Arbitrate should, therefore, be provided to the client in accordance with the Program requirements contemporaneously with contesting the chargeback.

CONCLUSION:

14. If a client disputes a credit card payment of legal fees by requesting a chargeback, the lawyer may dispute the chargeback by providing information to the credit card provider about the services rendered. The disclosure may include the retainer agreement and invoices to the client if (a) the information is not confidential; or (b) if the information is confidential but (i) the client gives informed consent to disclose the confidential information, or (ii) the client does not give informed consent, but the lawyer reasonably believes that the disclosure of confidential information is necessary to establish or collect the lawyer's fee. Such disclosures should be limited or redacted to reveal only what is objectively reasonable to rebut the chargeback request and prove the lawyer's entitlement to his fee. Participation in the resolution of the chargeback dispute initiated by the client does not relieve the lawyer of his obligations pursuant to the New York State Fee Dispute Resolution Program.

OPINION 1249 (01/05/2023)

TOPIC: Confidentiality; joint clients; return of clients' files when there has been joint representation

DIGEST: In a joint representation, there is a presumption that the lawyer will share confidential information received from each co-client with the other co-client, but that presumption does not extend to confidential information the lawyer received prior to the inception of the joint representation.

RULES: 1.6(a), 1.7, 1.9, 1.15(c)(4), 1.16(e)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer, a New York attorney, has represented the husband ("Husband") with respect to estate planning matters since 2006. In 2019, Husband asked inquirer to also represent his wife ("Wife"), with respect to estate planning matters and the inquirer prepared a new, joint engagement letter which Husband and Wife both signed. The 2019 engagement letter contains language which states that because the inquirer is representing both Husband and Wife, no communication that each has with the inquirer can be kept confidential from the other. Husband and Wife are now getting divorced, and Husband has instructed the inquirer not to render any more professional services on his behalf. He has also asked the inquirer to send him copies of all documents in his file, which would include Wife's communications with the inquirer and documents the inquirer received from Wife. Shortly after receiving Husband's communication, the inquirer received a request from Wife asking the inquirer to send her all documents in the file, which would include Husband's communications with the inquirer and documents received from Husband.

QUESTIONS:

2. Upon termination of a joint representation, may an attorney provide to each co-client copies of communications exchanged with, and documents received from, the other co-client?

3. Upon termination of a joint representation, may an attorney provide to a co-client copies of communications exchanged with the other co-client, and documents received from the other co-client, prior to the onset of the joint representation?

OPINION:

4. Rule 1.15(c)(4) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (Rules") provides that "a lawyer shall . . . promptly pay or deliver to the client or third person as requested by the client or third person the funds, securities, or other properties in the possession of the lawyer that the client or third person is entitled to receive." Rule 1.16(e), which addresses termination of representation and the client's file, provides that "a lawyer shall take steps, to the extent reasonably practicable, to avoid foreseeable prejudice to the rights of the client, including . . . delivering to the client all papers and property to which the client is entitled."

5. We have previously held that determining whether a client is entitled to specific property is a question of law. N.Y. State 1070 (2015), citing N.Y. State 766 (2003). Although the committee's jurisdiction does not extend to questions of law, we have noted that the Court of Appeals held, in Sage Realty Corp. v. Proskauer Rose Goetz & Mendelsohn, 91 N.Y.2d 30, 34 (1997), that "upon termination of the attorney-client relationship, where no claim for unpaid legal fees is outstanding," a lawyer must "presumptively accord [the client] full access to the entire attorney's file on a represented matter with narrow exceptions." Under Sage Realty, those narrow exceptions require a "substantial showing . . . of good cause to refuse." Id. at 37. A possible basis for a "good cause" refusal to turn over documents in a client's file that the client would otherwise be entitled to receive is where a document constitutes confidential information of another person who has not consented to its release. See N.Y. State 970 (2013) (if an executor of a decedent's estate is legally entitled to the same access that the decedent had when alive, then the decedent's former attorney should ordinarily provide the executor access to all the decedent's files).

6. Rule 1.6 addresses an attorney's ethical obligation to protected confidential information and provides in pertinent part:

> (a) A lawyer shall not knowingly reveal confidential information as defined in this Rule, or use such information to the disadvantage of a client or for the advantage of the lawyer or a third person, unless:
> (1) the client gives informed consent, as defined in Rule 1.0(j).

7. "Confidential Information" is defined in Rule 1.6 as consisting of:

> information gained during or relating to the representation of a client, whatever its source, that is (a) protected by the attorney-client privilege, (b) likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed or information that the client has requested be kept confidential.

8. "Informed Consent is defined in Rule 1.0(j) as denoting:

> the agreement by a person to a proposed course of conduct after the lawyer has communicated information adequate for the person to make an informed decision, and after the lawyer has adequately explained to the person the material risks of the proposed course of conduct and reasonably available alternatives.

9. In N.Y. State 1070 (2015), we said, "[I]n a joint representation, there is a presumption that the lawyer will share material information disclosed by one co-client in the matter with the other co-clients." See also, Restatement Third, The Law Governing Lawyers § 60 cmt. l ("Sharing of information among the co-clients with respect to the matter involved in the representation is normal and typically expected."); N.Y. City 2017-7 (even in the absence of a conflict of interest that would require an attorney to obtain informed consent to represent joint clients, "the attorney must be satisfied that the clients understand that, at least to the extent relevant to the representation, information disclosed to the lawyer by one joint client may be shared with the other joint client").

10. In joint representations, a lawyer owes each client an equal duty of loyalty and an equal duty of communication. Comment [31] to Rule 1.7 highlights this principle by stating that "the lawyer has an equal duty of loyalty to each client, and each client has the right to be informed of anything bearing on the representation that might affect the client's interests and the right to expect that the lawyer will use that information to that client's benefit. . . . At the outset of the common representation and as part of the process of obtaining each client's informed consent, the lawyer should advise each client that information will be shared . . ." Comment [33] to Rule 1.7 similarly provides: "[E]ach client in the common representation has the right to loyal and diligent representation and the protection of Rule 1.9 concerning the obligations to a former client."

11. Accordingly, based on each client's consent to disclosure contained in the joint engagement letter, as well as the presumption that the lawyer will share confidential information with each co-client during a joint representation, Husband and Wife are each entitled to receive copies of the communications the other has exchanged with the inquirer, as well as documents the other has provided to the inquirer during the period of joint representation. See N.Y. State 761 (2003) (the attorney for co-clients must share all material information relating to the representation with the co-clients, unless the co-clients have consented to an alternative agreement).

12. However, we do not see any basis to conclude, on these facts, that Husband has given informed consent for the inquirer to disclose to Wife his communications with inquirer, or the documents he submitted to inquirer, prior to the inception of the joint representation. We are not told of any language in the joint engagement letter supporting that conclusion, and we do not believe that the presumption that co-clients in a joint representation have agreed to share confidential information with each other during the joint representation should be retroactively applied to incorporate separate and discrete confidential information obtained by the inquirer prior to the joint representation from one of the clients who was at that point not yet a co-client.

13. Our conclusion here conforms with our holding in N.Y. State 1070 (2015), where a joint client requested that the inquirer (Lawyer A) deliver the client file to successor counsel (Lawyer B) but not tell Lawyer A's other joint clients. We pointed out that there are exceptions to the presumption requiring disclosure of confidential information to joint clients, including where disclosure would violate an obligation to a third party or where the lawyer has promised confidentiality with respect to disclosure. We concluded that if Lawyer A were to comply with the client's request not to disclose delivery of the client file, he would breach a duty to the other joint clients to keep them informed of material developments, and that breach of the duty of communication would violate the Rules. In the instant matter, if the inquirer provides Wife with Husband's communications and with documents that Husband provided to inquirer prior to the inquirer's joint representation of Husband and Wife, the inquirer will similarly breach the duty of confidentiality owed to Husband.

CONCLUSION:

14. In a joint representation, there is a presumption that the lawyer will share confidential information received from each co-client with the other co-client, but that presumption does not extend to confidential information the lawyer received prior to the inception of the joint representation.

OPINION 1250 (01/06/2023)

TOPIC: Multi-jurisdictional practice; partnership with non-United States lawyers; imputation of conflicts

DIGEST: The New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") govern the conduct of an attorney admitted to practice only in New York who partners with a non-United States law firm. Whether the Rules permit a New York lawyer to form a partnership with an Italian law firm depends on whether the New York lawyer, upon independent inquiry, is satisfied that the training and ethical standards applicable to the Italian lawyer are comparable to those of an American lawyer. Conflicts of interest arising under Rules 1.7, 1.8 or 1.9 are imputed vicariously between the New York admitted lawyer and the Italian law firm pursuant to Rule 1.10(a).

RULES: 1.10(a); 5.4(b); 8.5(a); 8.5(b)(2)(ii)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a solo practitioner admitted in New York and no other jurisdiction and has a physical office in New York only. While continuing to provide legal services as a solo practitioner, he would like to enter into a separate limited liability partnership for the practice of law with an Italian firm that practices law in Italy. None of the partners in the Italian firm are licensed to practice law in New York or in any other jurisdiction in the United States. The Italian firm will also continue to practice law in Italy in a separate entity (i.e., not in the LLP with the inquirer).

QUESTIONS:

2. Which jurisdiction's disciplinary rules apply to govern inquirer's proposal to enter into a partnership with an Italian law firm?

3. May a New York lawyer enter into a partnership with an Italian law firm?

4. Is the law firm created by the partnership between the New York lawyer and the Italian firm subject to New York's rules on conflicts of interest?

OPINION:

What Disciplinary Rules Apply?

5. The first question the committee must address is what rules apply to determine the ethical propriety of the inquirer's proposed conduct. Because he is admitted to practice in New York, the inquirer is always subject to the disciplinary authority of this State, regardless of where any alleged conduct may take place. See Rule 8.5(a). The inquirer is also not subject to the "predominant effect" principles of Rule 8.5(b)(2)(ii) that might subject the inquirer to the disciplinary authority of another jurisdiction, because the inquirer is not admitted in any other jurisdiction, and New York's version of Rule 8.5(b)(2)—unlike ABA Model Rule 8.5(b)(2)—applies only to lawyers who are admitted in more than one jurisdiction.

May a New York Lawyer Partner with a Lawyer Admitted to Practice in Italy?

6. Rule 5.4 proscribes a number of relationships between a lawyer and a non-lawyer. E.g., "a lawyer shall not form a partnership with a nonlawyer if any of the activities of the partnership consist of the practice of law." Rule 5.4(b). Were "non-lawyer" construed to mean anyone not licensed to practice law in New York, the partnership contemplated by the inquirer and, doubtless hundreds if not thousands of other multi-jurisdictional firms, would be in violation of Rule 5.4(b) and other provisions of Rule 5.4, as well. See, e.g., N.Y. State 542 (1982). We have long expressed the view, however, and repeat it here today, that a New York-licensed lawyer may properly partner with a lawyer duly licensed in another jurisdiction provided that the New York lawyer, upon independent inquiry, is satisfied that the "training of and ethical standards applicable to the foreign lawyer are comparable to those of an American lawyer." N.Y. State 646 (1993). As we explained in N.Y. State 1072 (2015), which considered a proposed partnership between a New York firm and a Japanese benrishi, restricting partnerships to lawyers with comparable training and ethical standards will help to assure that a proposed multi-jurisdictional partnership "will not compromise the [New York] lawyer's ability to abide by the ethical standards of this State, including the standards governing attorney-client confidentiality."

Must the New York Attorney and the Italian Firm Clear Potential Conflicts of Interest?

7. Although the inquirer and the Italian firm have structured their relationship to limit their joint practice and will continue to separately practice law in separate entities in each location in addition to practicing in partnership with each other, the "firms must still comply with the conflict provisions of Rule 1.10(a), which will impute conflicts of each firm to the other[s]." Rule 1.10(a) provides:

> (a) While lawyers are associated in a firm, none of them shall knowingly represent a client when any one of them practicing alone would be prohibited from doing so by Rule 1.7, 1.8 or 1.9, except as otherwise provided therein.

8. We described the effect of Rule 1.10(a) in N.Y. State 876 (2011):

> For decades, both this Committee and various New York courts have consistently stated that where a lawyer is "associated" with more than one law firm within the meaning of the imputation rule, all of the law firms with whom that lawyer is associated are treated as one law firm for purposes of conflicts of interest. Accordingly, under Rule 1.10(a), all conflicts in each firm are imputed to all lawyers in all of the firms associated with a common lawyer. [Citations omitted.]

9. Rule 1.10(e) requires a New York law firm to check all proposed engagements against current and previous engagements. As N.Y. State 876 indicates, when two firms share a common partner or other member, they are treated as one for conflicts purposes. Here, the New York lawyer is a common partner in his own firm and the Italian firm with whom he is forming an LLP. Consequently, in order to comply with Rule 1.10(e), the New York firm must include engagements of the Italian firm in his conflict checking system.

CONCLUSION:

10. The New York Rules of Professional Conduct govern the conduct of an attorney admitted to practice in New York only who partners with a non-United States law firm. Whether the Rules permit a New York lawyer to partner with an Italian law firm depends on whether the New York lawyer, upon independent inquiry, is satisfied that the training and ethical standards applicable to the Italian lawyer are comparable to those of an American lawyer. Conflicts of interest arising under Rules 1.7, 1.8 or 1.9 are imputed vicariously between the New York admitted lawyer and the Italian law firm pursuant to Rule 1.10(a).

OPINION 1251 (01/09/2023)

TOPIC: YouTube channel; general legal information; advertising

DIGEST: As a general proposition, creating videos for a YouTube channel to educate the public or legal profession about matters of general or specific interest is a permitted activity and does not necessarily constitute "advertising" as that term is defined in the Rules of Professional Conduct, but in some circumstances it might constitute advertising.

RULES:1.0(a), 7.1

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is an attorney admitted in New York and a non-U.S. jurisdiction who maintains a law office in New York. She would like to create a YouTube channel to offer content about "being a lawyer in the United States, work/life balance, tips for law students and general legal information for the public." The inquirer intends to use her full name on the channel, which she hopes to generate income through sponsorships and affiliate links.

QUESTION:

2. May an attorney create a revenue-producing YouTube channel, linked to the attorney's professional practice name, that provides general legal information to the public and the profession?

OPINION:

3. It is not unethical for a lawyer to write articles, give lectures, or write a blog about topics of general or specific interest, including the law. In fact, such activities are encouraged and protected, reflecting well on the legal profession and its members as examples of lawyers maintaining interest and involvement in their communities and seeking to contribute to the general well-being of the public. An attorney so inclined, however, must be mindful of Rule 7.1 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct ("Rules") which would impose certain requirements if the content of the medium were deemed to constitute "advertising."

4. Advertising is defined by Rule 1.0(a) as:

> any public or private communication made by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm about that lawyer or law firm's services, the primary purpose of which is for the retention of the lawyer or law firm. It does not include communications to existing clients or other lawyers.

Comment [7] to Rule 7.1, states in pertinent part:

> Topical newsletters, client alerts, or blogs intended to educate recipients about new developments in the law are generally not considered advertising. However, a newsletter, client alert, or blog that provides information or news primarily about the lawyer or > law firm (for example, the lawyer or law firm's cases, personnel, clients or achievements) generally would be considered advertising.

5. In conformance with this standard, in N.Y. State 848 ¶ 19 (2010) we stated that whether a law firm's educational newsletter would constitute attorney advertising depended on "the content of the communication, the intent (purpose) of the communication, and the targeted audience of the communication."

6. Here, without more facts, the committee cannot determine whether the inquirer's YouTube videos would constitute advertising under this three-part standard (content, intent, and audience) and, accordingly, would be governed by Rule 7.1. To the extent that the YouTube videos provide general legal information for the public about "being a lawyer in the U.S." and "work-life balance," the videos would not constitute advertising. To the extent, however, that the YouTube videos include information and news about the lawyer and her law practice for the primary purpose of retention of the inquirer, they would constitute advertising.

7. If the content of the YouTube channel does not otherwise constitute advertising, publishing and linking the inquirer's name and contact information with the channel will not, in and of itself, push the content of the videos across the line into advertising. As provided in Comment [8] to Rule 7.1 in the context of certain law firm marketing and branding:

> Some communications by a law firm that may constitute marketing or branding are not necessarily advertisements. For example, pencils, legal pads, greeting cards, coffee mugs, T-shirts or the like with the law firm name, logo, and the contact information printed on them do not constitute "advertisements" within the definition of this Rule if their primary purpose is general awareness and branding, rather than the retention of the law firm for a particular matter.

(Emphasis added.)

8. That the inquirer may receive income from her YouTube activities by way of sponsorship or advertising does not alter the analysis. There is nothing per se improper about a lawyer engaging in two separate income-generating businesses, only one of which is the practice of law. If the inquirer were to make referrals on her YouTube channel to other attorneys or professionals, however, which resulted in referral fees or other forms of compensation being paid to the inquirer, she might be subject to other rules, such as Rule 1.5(g) (governing a division of fees between lawyers in different firms). We do not address those other rules here.

9. Another concern would arise if the inquirer's YouTube channel has features similar to social media sites that, under certain conditions, allow third-party viewers to interact with the site by posting comments or questions. If that is the case, the inquirer must proceed carefully in responding to such viewers and must not provide individual legal advice or disclose confidential information, even if the initiating viewer may have done so. See N.Y. State 899 (2011) (a lawyer may not engage in solicitation on interactive social sites on the Internet but may respond with a private written proposal outside the site; and a lawyer may provide only general answers, not individual advice, in response to legal questions on the site).

10. Finally, if the inquirer's YouTube channel will be linked to her website or other forms of firm advertisements, it is worth considering whether it would be prudent to label the videos as "Attorney Advertising", as required by Rule 7.1(f), even if such disclaimers are not technically required. See N.Y. State 1039 ¶ 9 (2014) ("We do not opine on whether the [attorney advertising] label is actually required here, but we recognize that many lawyers take a conservative approach to whether educational material prepared for clients is an advertisement and thus should bear the label 'attorney advertisement' as required by Rule 7.1(f)").

CONCLUSION:

11. As a general proposition, creating videos for a YouTube channel to educate the public or legal profession about matters of general or specific interest is a permitted activity and does not necessarily constitute "advertising" as that term is defined in the Rules of Professional Conduct, but in some circumstances, it might constitute advertising.

OPINION 1252 (01/11/2023)

TOPIC: Referral Fees

DIGEST: A licensed attorney who only provides nonlegal services to real estate clients may receive referral fees from a third-party investment advisor.

RULES: 1.7, 1.8, 5.7

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a member of the New York State bar but does not engage in the practice of law. Instead, the inquirer works as a real estate broker.

2. A financial advisor has approached the inquirer and offered to pay referral fees to the inquirer for any clients that the inquirer refers to the advisor.

QUESTION:

3. May the inquirer accept referral fees from the investment advisor?

OPINION:

4. At bottom, the inquiring lawyer asks whether the vast number of opinions this Committee has issued concerning the permissibility of referral fees apply to her because the inquirer does not engage in the practice of law but instead works as a real estate broker. In general, those decisions have found the receipt of referral fees from third party service providers to be permissible only where the personal conflict of interest for the lawyer receiving such fees can be overcome through disclosure to the client and obtaining the client's consent. See N.Y. State 1086 (2016) (collecting opinions). We have often found that the conflict is "so great that disclosure to and consent from the client will not cure the conflict." See id. However, our starting point here is whether the New York Rule of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") apply to the inquirer with respect to the receipt of referral fees.

5. A lawyer's provision of nonlegal services to clients is addressed in Rule 5.7. Because the inquirer is not providing any legal services, thereby eliminating the need to differentiate between the provision of legal and nonlegal services, see Rule 5.7(a)(1) & (2), the only potentially applicable provision is Rule 5.7(a)(3) which provides that:

> A lawyer or law firm that is an owner, controlling party or agent of, or that is otherwise affiliated with, an entity that the lawyer or law firm knows to be providing nonlegal services to a person is subject to these Rules with respect to the nonlegal services if the person receiving the services could reasonably believe that the nonlegal services are the subject of a client-lawyer relationship.

6. Although we do not think clients of a real estate broker would typically believe they are subject to a client-lawyer relationship, Rule 5.7(a)(4) provides that the lawyer must simply inform the client in writing that the services are not legal services, and that the protection of a client-lawyer relationship does not exist with respect to the nonlegal services to eliminate any presumption that the services are legal in nature.

7. In that case, the lawyer is excused from complying with the Rules dependent upon the existence of a representation or a client-lawyer relationship, such as Rules 1.7 and 1.8 concerning conflicts of interest, although the lawyer is still subject to certain Rules that apply regardless of whether the lawyer is representing a client. See Rule 5.7, Cmt. [4] (Rules 1.9 (prohibiting misuse of confidences or secrets of former clients), 8.3 (requiring reporting of certain misconduct) and 8.4 (prohibiting lawyers from engaging in illegal, dishonest, fraudulent or deceptive conduct) apply to lawyers "irrespective of the existence of a representation"). Therefore, the inquiring lawyer may accept referral fees from a third party investment advisor.

CONCLUSION:

8. A lawyer who only provides nonlegal real estate broker services to clients may accept referral fees from a third party investment advisor.

OPINION 1253 (02/23/2023)

TOPIC: Conflicts of interest among family members

DIGEST: A lawyer who represents the Executor of an estate and simultaneously represents a beneficiary of the estate in an unrelated matter does not have a concurrent conflict of interest. "Differing interests" may arise where lawyer simultaneously represents both an estate's Executor/beneficiary and a co-beneficiary as co-defendants in civil litigation for damages and, if so, the lawyer may not continue the representation of both co-defendants unless the lawyer reasonably believes that she will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client and each affected client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing. If the Executor instructs the lawyer to file a cross-claim against the co-beneficiary in the civil litigation, then the conflict would become non-consentable.

RULES: 1.0(f) and 1.7(a)(1)-(2) & (b)(1), (b)(3) & (b)(4)

FACTS:

1. The inquiring lawyer ("Lawyer") represents an estate in several matters arising from the conduct of the decedent ("Father") and the decedent's two adult children ("Son" and "Daughter").

2. Father entered into a contract to sell a parcel of real estate. When negotiating the contract and preparing for the closing, Father asked Son to speak for him and act as his agent. We are told by Lawyer that Father, the contract vendee ("Buyer"), the real estate broker, and the attorney who represented both Father and Buyer in the transaction all understood that Son was speaking and acting not for himself but rather for Father.

3. The contract of sale never closed. Buyer sued Father for breach of contract and sued Son for tortious interference with the contract ("Real Estate Litigation"). Since Lawyer believes that everyone in the real estate transaction understood that Son was acting as an agent for a disclosed principal, Lawyer believes that Buyer's separate claim against Son is meritless.

4. Father and Son jointly retained Lawyer to defend them in the litigation. As part of that retention, Father and Son signed a "Conflict Waiver." Father, however, did not sign personally. Rather, the retainer agreement and the conflict waiver were executed by Daughter pursuant to a power of attorney as Father's "Attorney-in-Fact."

5. Father and Son each agreed to pay Lawyer's attorney fees in the Real Estate Litigation equally while the suit was pending, with the understanding that they would be fully reimbursed out of the net proceeds of the sale when the property at issue was ultimately sold. (Son did not own any interest in the property.)

6. At the time of his Father's death, Lawyer was also representing Father in the sale of a separate and unrelated parcel of real property (the "Unrelated Sale") — but in that sale Lawyer was dealing with Father exclusively through Daughter in her capacity as the holder of Father's power of attorney. (Son was not involved in any way in the Unrelated Sale.)

7. While the Real Estate Litigation and the Unrelated Sale were pending, Father died, and by operation of law Father ceased to be Lawyer's client. Father's estate plan named Daughter as Executor of Father's estate. Lawyer entered an appearance in Surrogate's Court on Daughter's behalf and prepared a petition seeking letters testamentary for Daughter. The Real Estate Litigation (which is pending in different court) has been stayed until Father's personal representative (Daughter) is formally substituted for Father, but that has not yet occurred. Father's will bequeathed all of his property per stirpes, so Daughter and Son will eventually split the estate equally. Lawyer is not aware of any disagreement between Daughter and Son over the validity of the will or any of its terms.

8. When Lawyer and Daughter were discussing a retainer agreement for Lawyer to represent Father's estate, however, Daughter asked Lawyer if Son should be blamed for the failure of the real estate transaction and forced to pay his own attorney fees for defending himself in the Real Estate Litigation, rather than reimbursing Son for his attorney fees (per the agreement between Father and Son) out of the proceeds from the eventual sale of the property.

9. Lawyer explained to Daughter the "dangers" of attempting to shift blame onto Son, whereupon Daughter told Lawyer that she was only asking questions and did not herself blame Son. Lawyer recognizes that Daughter's hypothetical inquiry regarding Son's conduct raises the potential for conflict between Daughter and Son, but Lawyer nevertheless believes that she can provide competent and diligent representation both (i) to Daughter as Executor and (ii) to Daughter and Son as co-defendants in the Real Estate Litigation.

QUESTIONS:

10. Lawyer poses three related questions:

A. May Lawyer continue to represent Daughter, in her capacity as Executor of Father's estate, in the sale of the separate and unrelated parcel of real property in Father's estate?

B. May Lawyer represent Daughter generally in her capacity as Executor of Father's estate?

C. May Lawyer continue to represent Daughter, again in the capacity as Executor of Father's Estate, as well as Son, as defendants in the Real Estate Litigation?

OPINION:

11. All Lawyer's questions involve conflicts with current clients (as opposed to conflicts with former clients or prospective clients). We begin, therefore, by setting out Rule 1.7 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"). Rule 1.7 provides as follows:

Rule 1.7 Conflict of Interest: Current Clients

(a) Except as provided in paragraph (b), a lawyer shall not represent a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that either:

(1) the representation will involve the lawyer in representing differing interests; or

(2) there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests.

(b) Notwithstanding the existence of a concurrent conflict of interest under paragraph (a), a lawyer may represent a client if:

(1) the lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client;

(2) the representation is not prohibited by law;

(3) the representation does not involve the assertion of a claim by one client against another client represented by the lawyer in the same litigation or other proceeding before a tribunal; and

(4) each affected client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing. [Emphasis added.]

Question A: Representing Daughter as Executor in the Unrelated Real Estate Sale

12. Rule 1.7 does not prevent Lawyer from representing Daughter in her capacity as Executor of Father's estate for purposes of completing the Unrelated Sale of Father's real property. Son is not a party to the Unrelated Sale, and nothing suggests that Son has "differing interests" from Father's estate with respect to the Unrelated Sale.

13. Thus, we perceive no conflict of interest under Rule 1.7(a)(1) flowing from Lawyer's representation of Daughter as Executor in the Unrelated Sale, and we see no need for Lawyer to obtain informed consent to a conflict (because there is no conflict requiring consent). Lawyer may ethically continue to represent Daughter as Executor in the Unrelated Sale.

Question B: Representing Daughter as Executor Generally

14. In contrast, representing Daughter as Executor generally raises the potential for conflict. Daughter could revisit and reconsider the role Son played in the real estate transaction and decide to blame Son for the failure of the Real Estate Litigation. (Shifting blame from Father's estate to Son would leave more money in Father's estate for Daughter to inherit.) Daughter could also search for grounds to rescind the fee reimbursement arrangement to which Father had agreed. Thus, Daughter and Son could eventually come to loggerheads, which would require Lawyer to represent one current client (Daughter as Executor) against another current client (Son). Under Rule 1.7(a)(1), a lawyer may not represent one current client against another current client without informed consent from both clients, confirmed in writing.

15. Although Daughter apparently arrived at a point where she told Lawyer that she was only asking him a "hypothetical question" about blaming Son and has said she does not actually intend to blame Son or to unwind the fee reimbursement arrangement, the potential for Daughter to back-pedal is plainly there. Indeed, the potential for Daughter to turn against Son would exist even if Daughter had said nothing, because Lawyer should advise Daughter how to maximize Father's estate, and Daughter is entitled to Lawyer's unconflicted advice on whether she could or should act against Son which might include denying Son legal fee reimbursement or even cross-claiming against Son in the Real Estate Litigation.

16. Rule 1.7(a)(1) precludes representation without informed consent if the representation "will" involve a lawyer in representing "differing interests." The term "differing interests" is defined in Rule 1.0(f) to include "every interest that will adversely affect either the judgment or the loyalty of a lawyer to a client, whether it be a conflicting, inconsistent, diverse, or other interest." A helpful explanation of this language appears in Comment [8] to Rule 1.7, which provides as follows:

> [8] Differing interests exist if there is a significant risk that a lawyer's exercise of professional judgment in considering, recommending or carrying out an appropriate course of action for the client will be adversely affected or the representation would otherwise be materially limited by the lawyer's other responsibilities or interests. . . . The conflict in effect forecloses alternatives that would otherwise be available to the client. The mere possibility of subsequent harm does not itself require disclosure and consent. The critical questions are the likelihood that a difference in interests will eventuate and, if it does, whether it will adversely affect the lawyer's professional judgment in considering alternatives or foreclose courses of action that reasonably should be pursued on behalf of the client.

17. If Daughter has a non-frivolous basis to blame Son for the failure of the real estate transaction and a non-frivolous basis for depriving Son of reimbursement for legal fees in the Real Estate Litigation, that would create "differing interests," and thus a concurrent conflict under Rule 1.7(a)(1). As such, Lawyer could not jointly represent both Daughter in her general capacity as Father's executor and Son at the same time unless (i) the conflict arising out of the Real Estate Litigation were consentable and (ii) Lawyer obtained the requisite informed consent from "each affected client" (meaning both Daughter and Son). This means that Lawyer must reasonably believe that she "will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client," per Rule 1.7(b)(1), and "each affected client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing," per Rule 1.7(b)(4).

18. Here, we think the conflict is consentable (i.e., waivable) under Rule 1.7(b), given Daughter's statement that she does not intend to act against Son and given Lawyer's belief that Daughter has no valid basis to do so. On these facts, as long as Daughter (as Executor) does not change her mind and decide to take action against Son, it will be reasonable for Lawyer to believe that she can provide competent and diligent representation both to Daughter (as Executor and beneficiary) and to Son (as a co-beneficiary).

Question C: Jointly Representing Daughter and Son in the Real Estate Litigation

19. Representing both Son and Daughter as defendants in the Real Estate Litigation is another variation of the potential conflict of interest that Lawyer faces. In the litigation, Daughter and Son have the same differing interests already described with respect to the Daughter's general capacity as executor and the Son's capacity as an estate beneficiary. That is, Daughter, as Executor for Father's estate, has an interest in maximizing the value of Father's estate (perhaps by cross-claiming against Son for damages and denying Son reimbursement for legal fees) and an interest in maximizing her own inheritance (by the same means). Son, in contrast, has an opposite interest in minimizing his own liability for damages and in minimizing his own legal fees.

20. The existence of these "differing interests" is perhaps more obvious in the context of the Real Estate Litigation because Lawyer would be representing two clients in the same lawsuit, and Rule 1.7(a)(3) prohibits a lawyer from representing "one client against another client represented by the lawyer in the same litigation . . . before a tribunal." But the source and nature of the conflict is the same. Accordingly, as is the case with respect to Lawyer's representation of Daughter as Executor generally, Lawyer cannot specifically represent both Son and Daughter in the Real Estate Litigation unless Lawyer reasonably believes that she can provided competent and diligent representation to both Daughter and Son (i.e., the conflict is consentable) and Lawyer obtains informed consent from each client per Rule 1.7(b)(4).

21. We have not been asked to address the validity or scope of the conflict waiver that Father and Son signed when retaining Lawyer to jointly represent them in the Real Estate Litigation. Nonetheless, Lawyer should be aware that the scope, terms, and disclosures relating to the waiver are critical to establish its validity.

CONCLUSION:

22. A lawyer who represents the Executor of an estate and simultaneously represents a beneficiary of the estate in an unrelated matter does not have a concurrent conflict of interest. "Differing interests" may arise where a lawyer simultaneously represents both an estate's Executor/beneficiary and a co-beneficiary as co-defendants in civil litigation for damages and, if so, the lawyer therefore may not continue the representation of both co-defendants unless the lawyer reasonably believes that she will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client and each affected client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing. If the Executor instructs the lawyer to file a cross-claim against her co-beneficiary in the civil litigation, then the conflict would become non-consentable.

OPINION 1254 (03/03/2023)

TOPIC: Affiliation with a lawyer not admitted in New York

DIGEST: A New York-admitted lawyer may affiliate and share fees with an out-of-state lawyer residing in New York and practicing immigration law in New York only if (1) neither the lawyers nor their firm would be engaged in the unauthorized practice of law (which is a question that this Committee may not answer), and (2) the lawyers' communications with clients and the public are not misleading.

RULES: 5.5(b), 7.1(a), and 7.5(a)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer, a New York-licensed lawyer living outside New York, concentrates on personal injury matters. The inquirer proposes to affiliate in practice with a lawyer (the Immigration Lawyer) who is admitted only outside New York but who resides in New York and practices immigration law (and only immigration law) from an office located in New York. The inquirer proposes to practice under the law firm name and address of the Immigration Lawyer. The Immigration Lawyer employs a staff to support the immigration practice, and that staff would also assist the inquirer in personal injury matters (although the Immigration Lawyer would not).

QUESTION:

2. May a lawyer admitted in New York affiliate in a law practice with a lawyer who is not admitted in New York but who resides in New York and practices immigration law from an office in New York? If so, may the lawyers practice under the law firm name and address of the New York resident lawyer?

OPINION:

3. In N.Y. State 863 (2011), we stated: "Whether a lawyer who is not admitted to practice law in New York State may engage in a practice within New York State exclusively limited to immigration law is purely a question of law that is not answered by the New York Rules of Professional Conduct and is therefore beyond our jurisdiction." That remains the case, because the unauthorized practice of law (UPL), including by out-of-state lawyers, is governed by law (see Judic. Law § 484), and this Committee's mandate is limited to interpreting the New York Rules of Professional Conduct and not other law.

4. The proposed arrangement raises two UPL questions arising from the Immigration Lawyer's activities that we cannot answer, but we consider it important to comment on them in a general fashion.

5. The first UPL question is whether the Immigration Lawyer, who resides and practices in New York but is not admitted to practice in New York, is engaged in the unauthorized practice of law, given that his practice is restricted to immigration law. If the Immigration Lawyer is engaged in the unauthorized practice of law, then the inquirer may not affiliate in a law practice with the Immigration Lawyer, because doing so would impermissibly assist in the Immigration Lawyer's ongoing violation of New York law. See, e.g., N.Y. State 1160 (2019) ("It would not be proper for the inquiring New York attorney to affiliate, and share fees with, a solely out-of-state-licensed attorney, resident in New York" whose work would constitute the unauthorized practice of law); N.Y. 801 (2006) ("Where the legal services performed in New York by an out-of-state attorney would constitute the unauthorized practice of law in New York under DR 3-101(A) [the predecessor to Rule 5.5(a)], it is unethical for a New York attorney to form a partnership with the out-of-state attorney."); see also Rule 5.5(b) ("A lawyer shall not aid a nonlawyer in the unauthorized practice of law.").

6. Even assuming the Immigration Lawyer is not currently engaged in the unauthorized practice of law under New York law in his solo practice, one would need to address a second UPL question relating to his proposed affiliation with the inquirer.

7. The second UPL question is whether New York's UPL law would permit the Immigration Lawyer's law firm to represent clients not only in federal immigration matters (which is his exclusive area of practice) but also in state law matters, such as personal injury matters (which is the inquirer's area of practice). Even if the Immigration Lawyer does not personally participate in the other legal matters, the UPL laws could conceivably apply, either because the law firm as an entity represents clients in matters for which resident lawyers must have a New York law license or if the Immigration Lawyer would be employing and supervising the nonlawyers in the office assisting inquirer in the prosecution of the personal injury matters.

8. Assuming the inquiring New York lawyer would thereby not be assisting in the unauthorized practice of law (or in any other violation of law), the inquirer may affiliate with the Immigration Lawyer and practice under that lawyer's law firm name, subject to Rule 7.1(a), which forbids a lawyer or law from engaging in false or misleading advertising. For example, communications must be clear that the Immigration Lawyer is not admitted to practice law in New York and may perform only the specified legal work in New York that is excepted from the UPL law. In addition, to comply with Rule 7.5(a), the letterhead of the law firm and the lawyers affiliated with it must not mislead clients or the public about the nature and limits of the firm's practice.

CONCLUSION:

9. A New York-admitted lawyer may affiliate and share fees with an out-of-state lawyer residing in New York and practicing immigration law in New York only if (1) neither the lawyers nor their firm would be engaged in the unauthorized practice of law (which is a question that this Committee may not answer), and (2) the lawyers' communications with clients and the public are not misleading.

OPINION 1255 (05/26/2023)

TOPIC: Romantic Relationship Between Criminal Defense Attorney and County Deputy Sheriff

DIGEST: Where a criminal defense attorney is in a romantic relationship with a county deputy sheriff, the attorney must determine if a reasonable lawyer would conclude there is a significant risk that the attorney's independent professional judgment on behalf of the client will be adversely affected. If such a significant risk exists but the attorney reasonably believes he or she can provide competent and diligent representation, the attorney may request client consent to the conflict. If the attorney's belief would be unreasonable, the conflict would be nonconsentable. If the attorney has a nonconsentable conflict, then the conflict is imputed to the attorney's firm, but the imputation may be waived with client consent, even if the inquirer's conflict is nonconsentable as to the individual lawyer, so as to allow other lawyers in the firm to accept or continue the representation. If the attorney has a consentable conflict but fails to obtain consent, then the conflict is imputed to the attorney's entire firm.

RULES: 1.0(j), 1.7(a) and (b), 1.10(a), (d) and (h)

Partially modifies N.Y. State 660

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a criminal defense attorney who is in a romantic relationship with a county deputy sheriff. She states that the deputy sheriff was a "secondary or supporting officer" in two prior cases against her clients, both of which ended in negotiated non-criminal dispositions. The inquirer is currently representing a client accused of a double homicide in a prosecution in which the deputy sheriff is again a "supporting officer."

QUESTIONS:

2. Where a criminal defense attorney is in a romantic relationship with a county deputy sheriff, may the attorney represent clients in cases in which the deputy sheriff was involved?

3. If the attorney is disqualified from the representation, will the other lawyers in the inquirer's firm also be disqualified by imputation?

OPINION:

A Romantic Relationship Presents a Rule 1.7(a)(2) Personal Interest Conflict.

4. We have previously opined on the rules governing disqualification based on personal interest under Rule 1.7(a)(2) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct ("Rules"). See N.Y. State 1119 (2017) (former work colleagues). Here, the romantic relationship between the inquirer and the deputy sheriff is clearly such a personal interest and we revisit Rule 1.7(a)(2) in that context.

5. Rule 1.7 (a)(2) provides that a lawyer may not represent a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that "there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own . . . personal interests" unless the conflict is consent-able under Rule 1.7(b) and the conflicted lawyer obtains the client's informed consent, confirmed in writing.

6. Here, whether such a significant risk exists will depend, among other factors, upon (i) the closeness of the relationship between the inquirer and the deputy sheriff, (ii) whether the deputy sheriff played a significant role in investigating the matter, (iii) whether the actions of the sheriff's department are an issue in the case, and (iv) whether the deputy sheriff will be a trial witness subject to cross-examination by the inquirer.

7. Concern would arise if the deputy sheriff played a significant role in investigating the matter, or if the deputy sheriff would be subject to cross-examination, because the inquirer might be tempted to "pull her punches" in defending her client. The inquirer might also be inclined to accept a negotiated plea of guilty to resolve the matter without exposing deficiencies in the investigation or implausible testimony given by the deputy sheriff or others in the sheriff's office.

8. Concern would also arise that the inquirer might reveal client confidential information to the deputy sheriff. Rule 1.7, Comment [11] addresses matters where related lawyers are involved on opposite sides of a case, but we believe it is also relevant here:

> [11] When lawyers representing different clients in the same matter or in substantially related matters are closely related, there may be a significant risk that client confidences will be revealed and that the lawyer's family relationship will interfere with both loyalty and professional judgment. As a result, each client is entitled to know of the existence and implications of the relationship between the lawyers, before the lawyer agrees to undertake the representation. Thus, a lawyer who has a significant intimate or close family relationship with another lawyer ordinarily may not represent a client in a matter where that other lawyer is representing another party, unless each client gives informed consent, as defined in Rule 1.0(j).

But see N.Y. State 409 (1975) (citing ABA 340 to the effect that it should not be assumed that a lawyer whose husband or wife is a lawyer will not obey all disciplinary rules, and thus it should not be assumed that one spouse will disclose confidences or secrets of the client to his or her spouse in violation of the ethical proscription).

A Personal Interest Conflict Arising from a Romantic Relationship May be Consentable

9. As Comment [11] to Rule 1.7 suggests, if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that there is a significant risk that the attorney's professional judgment on behalf of the client would be adversely affected, then the attorney may still represent the client as long as the waiver and consent provisions of Rule 1.7(b) are met. These require that:

> (1) the lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client;
> (2) the representation is not prohibited by law;

> (3) the representation does not involve the assertion of a claim by one client against another client represented by the lawyer in the same litigation or other proceeding before a tribunal; and
> (4) each affected client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing.

10. Rule 1.0(j) in the terminology section of the Rules) defines informed consent as follows:

> "Informed consent" denotes the agreement by a person to a proposed course of conduct after the lawyer has communicated information adequate for the person to make an informed decision, and after the lawyer has adequately explained to the person the material risks of the proposed course of conduct and reasonably available alternatives.

11. Accordingly, the lawyer must explain both the risks that his or her professional judgment could be adversely affected and the reasonably available alternatives (including representation by other lawyers in the firm, or in other firms).

12. Under Rule 1.7(b), a conflict of interest is sometimes nonconsentable:

> Consentability is typically determined by considering whether the interests of the clients will be adequately protected if the clients consent to representation burdened by a conflict of interest. Thus, under paragraph (b)(1), notwithstanding client consent, representation is prohibited if, in the circumstances, the lawyer cannot reasonably conclude that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation. * * *"

Rule 1.7, Comment [15].

13. Determining whether a conflict is nonconsentable depends on the facts and circumstances. Here, for example, we believe the conflict would be nonconsentable if the deputy sheriff was significantly involved in the investigation of the matter and is expected to be called as a prosecution witness at trial. In that circumstance (and there may well be others), client consent would not be effective because the inquirer could not reasonably conclude that she could provide competent and diligent representation to her client to defend against the murder charges.

14. Our conclusion that the inquirer, based on particular facts and circumstances, might ethically continue her representation – either because there is not a "significant risk" under Rule 1.7(a)(2) or because the conflict is consentable and the lawyer has obtained informed consent pursuant to the requirements of Rule 1.7(b) – is dependent on the fact that the inquirer and the deputy sheriff are not opposing attorneys in the matter. The conflict would be nonconsentable if the romantic relationship were between the prosecutor and the defense attorney, not the defense attorney and the deputy sheriff.

15. Thus, in N.Y. State 660 (1994), decided under the former New York Code of Professional Responsibility, an associate in a law firm with a significant criminal defense practice was dating an assistant district attorney in the county in which the associate's firm was located. They dated frequently and had a close personal relationship. The Committee concluded that "[u]nder the circumstances, it would not be unreasonable to assume that they each had a personal interest in one another's reputation, success and welfare" that "ordinarily would operate to disqualify the lawyers from undertaking an adverse representation without the consent of their respective clients."

16. Noting that a "scintilla of partiality, which might be waivable by private parties in other contexts, is intolerably suspect and prejudicial to the public's regard for the criminal justice system," we stated:

> Irrespective of the subjective intent of the prosecutor and defense counsel, and regardless of howsoever scrupulous they may be in the conduct of their professional obligations, the appearance of partiality in the administration of justice is so strong that a couple who date frequently should not be permitted to appear opposite one another in criminal cases.
> We leave for another day the issue of how to determine when friendship and warm regard become so fraught with emotion as to provide a basis for disqualification under DR 5-101(A). Whatever hereafter may be said of friendships in varying degrees, we believe that a frequent dating relationship is clearly over the line that separates ethically cognizable conflicting interests from those which are not. A dating relationship between adversaries is inconsistent with the degree of professional judgment required by DR 5-101(A).

N.Y. State 660 (emphasis added).

Personal Conflicts of Interest Are Imputed to Other Lawyers in the Firm.

17. If the inquirer's personal conflict is nonconsentable under Rule 1.7(b), or if the client declines consent, may another lawyer in the inquirer's firm handle the representation with the consent of the client? Rule 1.10(a) is the basic rule on imputation of conflicts of interest. With exceptions not here relevant, Rule 1.10(a) provides:

> (a) While lawyers are associated in a firm, none of them shall knowingly represent a client when any one of them practicing alone would be prohibited from doing so by Rule 1.7, 1.8 or 1.9 . . . .

18. Because the disqualification here would be under Rule 1.7, and no exceptions apply, there would be imputed disqualification of the inquirer's entire firm under Rule 1.10(a).

19. Notably, the Rules of Professional Conduct in New York differ from the Model Rules of the American Bar Association (the ABA) on whether personal interest conflicts are imputed within a law firm. Rule 1.10 of the ABA Model Rules specifically provides that personal conflicts of interest of one lawyer in a firm are not imputed to other lawyers in the firm unless the conflict presents a significant risk of materially limiting representation by the other lawyers in the firm. Comment [11] to Section 1.7 of the ABA Model Rules contains a sentence not included in the same Comment to Rule 1.7 of the New York Rules, namely: "The disqualification arising from a close family relationship is personal and not imputed to members of firms with whom the lawyers are associated." In New York, however, the conflict here would be imputed to all lawyers in the firm under Rule 1.10(a).

20. In N.Y. State 660, decided under the former New York Code of Professional Responsibility, we noted the paradox that conflicts with non-spouses would be imputed while conflicts with spouses, which are now covered by Rule 1.10(h) would not be imputed. We said:

> The issue as to whether defense counsel's firm would be disqualified raises what appears as something of an anomaly in applying the provisions of DR 5-105(D) [the predecessor to Rule 1.10(a)]. Because disqualification of the associate is based on DR 5-101(A) [the predecessor to Rule 1.7(a)], a literal reading of DR 5-105(D), as amended effective September 1, 1990, would automatically impute the associate's disqualification to the entire firm. See N.Y. State 632 (1992). DR 9-101(D) [now Rule 1.10(h)] expressly prohibits spouses from undertaking adverse representation [without client consent]. The only operative difference between the general rule of DR 5-101(A) and the more specific prohibition of DR 9-101(D) is that the latter does not trigger automatic imputed disqualification under DR 5-105(D), for reasons bearing more on sociology and economics than traditional notions of conflicting interests.
> It should be evident that a spousal relationship is significantly closer than that of a dating couple. Among other things, a dating relationship is usually devoid of the community of financial interests present in the spousal relationship. Consequently, and most anomalously, if the Code were to be applied literally, the closer relationship of spouses would not require automatic disqualification of the entire firm, while the more casual relationship of a dating couple would seem to impute firm-wide disqualification. This result would be as illogical as it is manifestly inconsistent. Notwithstanding that the dating relationship invokes the proscriptions of DR 5-101(A), for purposes of applying standards of imputed disqualification, we believe that it should not be subject to greater constraint than the relationship of spouses addressed by DR 9-101(D). Thus, whether other lawyers in the firm will be disqualified depends on the facts and circumstances. See N.Y. State 638, at 8-11 (1992); N.Y. State 632, at 2-3 (1992); see also N.Y. State 654, at 5 (1993) (discussion of appropriate factors to be considered). If the lawyer concludes that another lawyer in the firm may undertake or continue the representation of a defendant prosecuted by the assistant district attorney in question, the associate must be effectively screened from any participation in the matter and must be apportioned no part of the fee therefrom.

21. In the nearly 30 years since N.Y. State 660 was issued, New York has amended its ethics rules many times – yet no amendments have been made to the provisions imputing personal interest conflicts. Indeed, in 2008 when the New York State Bar Association recommended replacing the Code of Professional Responsibility with a version of the Model Rules, the Bar Association recommended amending Rule 1.10 to eliminate imputed disqualification for personal conflicts of interest absent special circumstances. The New York Administrative Board of the Courts declined to adopt this recommendation in favor of the language quoted above. In 2020, the State Bar again recommended an amendment to Rule 1.10 that would eliminate imputation of personal conflicts of interest, but that proposal is still pending before the Administrative Board. In light of the failure to adopt this proposal by the Administrative Board in 2008 and its failure to act on the most recent proposal, we must conclude that Rule 1.10(h) and Comment [11] to Rule l.7 mean what they say, no matter how inconsistent. We therefore partially modify N.Y. State 660, to the extent that it concludes that whether other lawyers in the firm will be automatically disqualified depends on the facts and circumstances. The imputation of the personal conflict to the inquirer's entire firm is automatic and would not be dependent on facts and circumstances.

A Nonconsentable Rule 1.7(a)(2) Personal Conflict of Interest May be Waived

22. Despite the imputation of the nonconsentable conflict to other lawyers in the inquirer's firm, Rule 1.10(d) allows the client to waive the imputed disqualification and consent to the representation by other lawyers in the firm. Rule 1.10(d) provides:

> A disqualification prescribed in this Rule may be waived by the affected client or former client under the conditions stated in Rule 1.7.

23. Thus, if another lawyer in the inquirer's firm reasonably believes he or she will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to the client and the client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing, then that other lawyer may undertake the representation. In other words, the client may waive the conflict imputed to other lawyers in the inquirer's firm even if the inquirer's own conflict would be nonconsentable. See N.Y. State 994 (2013), N.Y. State 975 (2013), N.Y. State 973 (2013), N.Y. State 968 (2013) (only the underlying conflict, and not the nonconsentability of that conflict, is imputed).

CONCLUSION:

24. Where a criminal defense attorney is in a romantic relationship with a county deputy sheriff, the attorney must determine if a reasonable lawyer would conclude there is a significant risk the attorney's independent professional judgment on behalf of the client will be adversely affected. If such a significant risk exists but the attorney reasonably believes he or she can provide competent and diligent representation, the attorney may request client consent to the conflict. If such a belief would be unreasonable, the conflict would be nonconsentable. If the lawyer is disqualified, the disqualification is imputed to the lawyer's firm, but the imputed conflict may be waived with client consent, even if the inquirer's conflict is nonconsentable as to the inquirer, so as to allow other lawyers in the firm to accept or continue the representation.

OPINION 1256 (05/26/2023)

TOPIC: Lawyer purchasing claims from clients of his law firm through a company he owns and then prosecuting those claims by retaining the law firm, or by retaining another law firm with which the lawyer has no affiliation.

DIGEST: A lawyer may not purchase claims through a company he owns from clients of a law firm where the lawyer is employed and then prosecute those claims by retaining the law firm. Whether a lawyer can purchase claims through a company he owns from clients of a law firm where the lawyer is employed, and then prosecute those claims by retaining another law firm with which the lawyer has no affiliation is not expressly governed by the New York Rules of Professional Conduct. Assuming such conduct is not illegal under Judiciary Law section 488, it is subject to the provisions of Rule 1.8(a), which govern business transactions with clients.

RULES: 1.8(a), 1.8(i), 8.4(a).

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is employed by a law firm in which he has no ownership interest. The firm's practice includes litigation against insurance companies that have denied or disclaimed insurance coverage. Rather than engage the firm to pursue such coverage claims on behalf of the insureds, some clients would prefer to sell and assign their claims outright to the law firm for an agreed price.

QUESTIONS:

2. The inquirer asks if a company he owns can purchase denied insurance claims from clients of the law firm where he is employed and then retain that law firm to litigate those claims?

3. If not, may a company that the inquirer owns purchase the denied insurance claims and retain another law firm with which the inquirer has no employment affiliation to litigate on behalf of the company?

OPINION:

4. Rule 1.8(i) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct provides that "[a] lawyer shall not acquire a proprietary interest in the cause of action or subject matter of litigation the lawyer is conducting for a client." That provision prevents the inquirer from purchasing, on behalf of a corporation he owns, the denied insurance claims of clients of the law firm where he works, and then retaining that law firm to litigate those claims. See also Restatement Third, The Law Governing Lawyers § 36 ("Forbidden Client–Lawyer Financial Arrangements") (discussing the prohibition in Rule 1.8(i)).

5. While it is a question of law beyond the scope of our jurisdiction, the inquirer should also consider whether the proposed conduct violates the prohibitions in Judiciary Law section 488, entitled "Buying demands on which to bring an action." See Judiciary Law § 488(1) ("An attorney or counselor shall not . . . [d]irectly or indirectly, buy, take an assignment of or be in any manner interested in buying or taking an assignment of a bond, promissory note, bill of exchange, book debt, or other thing in action, with the intent and for the purpose of bringing an action thereon.").

6. The inquirer's second question is whether a company he owns can purchase the denied insurance claims and retain another law firm with which the inquirer has no employment affiliation to litigate the claims on behalf of the company. While this conduct is not expressly governed by Rule 1.8(i), we note that "[a] lawyer or law firm shall not . . . violate or attempt to violate the Rules of Professional Conduct . . . through the acts of another." Rule 8.4(a).

7. Assuming that the purchase of a client's denied insurance claim, with the intent to prosecute that claim through another law firm, is not illegal under the provisions of the Judiciary Law and other substantive law, it would be subject to Rule 1.8(a), which governs business transactions with clients. See N.Y. State 1231 (2021) (an estate-planning lawyer who has an interest in a nonlegal financial management company that the lawyer hopes to recommend to estate-planning clients must comply with Rule 1.8(a)). Rule 1.8(a)(1) requires that the terms of the transaction be "fair and reasonable to the client." Furthermore, "the terms of the transaction [must be] fully disclosed and transmitted in writing in a manner that can be reasonably understood by the client." Rule 1.8(a)(1). Rule 1.8(a)(2) requires that the client be advised in writing of the desirability of seeking the advice of independent legal counsel on the transaction and be provided with a reasonable opportunity to seek independent counsel. See Rule 1.8(a), Comment [2] ("When necessary, the lawyer should discuss both the material risks of the proposed transaction, including any risk presented by the lawyer's involvement and the existence of reasonably available alternatives, and should explain why the advice of independent legal counsel is desirable."). Finally, Rule 1.8(a)(3) requires that the client give an "informed consent, in a writing signed by the client, to the essential terms of the transaction and the lawyer's role in the transaction, including whether the lawyer is representing the client in the transaction."

8. While a client need not be independently represented when consummating a business transaction with her lawyer, certain requirements in Rule 1.8(a) are deemed satisfied if independent representation exists. As Comment [4] to Rule 1.8 states:

> If the client is independently represented in the transaction, paragraph (a)(2) is inapplicable, and the requirement of full disclosure in paragraph (a)(1) is satisfied by a written disclosure by either the lawyer involved in the transaction or the client's independent counsel. The fact that the client was independently represented in the transaction is relevant in determining whether the agreement was fair and reasonable to the client, as paragraph (a)(1) further requires.

CONCLUSION:

9. A lawyer may not purchase claims through a company he owns from clients of a law firm where the lawyer is employed and then prosecute those claims by retaining the law firm. The question of whether a lawyer can purchase claims through a company he owns from clients of a law firm where the lawyer is employed, and then prosecute those claims by retaining another law firm with whom the lawyer has no affiliation, is not expressly governed by the New York Rules of Professional Conduct. Assuming such conduct is not illegal under Judiciary Law section 488, it is subject to the provisions in Rule 1.8(a), which govern business transactions with clients.

OPINION 1257 (05/26/2023)

TOPIC: Conflicts of Interest; Former District Attorney in Public Defender's Office

DIGEST: A former district attorney may be employed by a public defender's office in the same county. The former district attorney shall not personally represent a public defender client in a matter in which he was personally and substantially involved as district attorney or in which he is conflicted because he acquired "confidential government information" within the meaning of Rule 1.11(c). Where a conflict exits, it is not imputed to all lawyers in the public defender's office, and the public defender can assign another attorney in the office to represent the affected client, if appropriate measures are taken to effectively screen the former district attorney from the matter in accordance with Rule 1.11(b).

RULES: 1.0(l), 1.9(c), 1.11(a)-(c)

FACTS:

1. An attorney from a county public defender's office has asked if the office can hire the former district attorney of the same county as a full-time assistant public defender. The public defender is authorized to have three full-time attorneys who defend criminal cases, as well as a full-time and a part-time attorney who handle matters in Family Court. The former district attorney would work solely in Family Court, with an office in a building separate from that of the public defender and the assistant public defenders who handle criminal cases outside of Family Court.

QUESTIONS:

2. May a county public defender's office hire a former district attorney to serve as an assistant public defender in the same county?

3. If so, how should the public defender's office identify and address potential conflicts of interest?

OPINION:

Rule 1.11 establishes a special conflicts rule regarding former government attorneys.

4. Conflicts regarding former government lawyers are governed by Rule 1.11 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"), which is entitled "Special Conflicts of Interest for Former and Current Government Officers and Employees." As its title indicates, Rule 1.11 is a special rule for government lawyers that establishes special standards for (a) determining whether a former client conflict of interest exist; (b) enumerating notice and screening requirements that obviate the imputed disqualification of attorneys associated in the same firm with the former government lawyer, and (c) protecting confidential information acquired during government service.

The Standard for Disqualification Under Rule 1.11(a).

5. We begin with Rule 1.11(a). which imposes two distinct restrictions on former government lawyers and provides, in pertinent part:

> (a) Except as law may otherwise expressly provide, a lawyer who has formerly served as a public officer or employee of the government:
> (1) shall comply with Rule 1.9(c); and
> (2) shall not represent a client in connection with a matter in which the lawyer participated personally and substantially as a public officer or employee, unless the appropriate government agency gives its informed consent, confirmed in writing, to the representation. ***

(Emphasis added)

6. Subparagraph (a)(1) incorporates the general provision set forth in Rule 1.9(c), including its exceptions, which governs whether a lawyer may use or reveal protected confidential information of a former client. Rule 1.9(c) pertains to all lawyers, not just former government lawyers. Subparagraph (a)(2), in contrast, is unique to former government lawyers and provides in pertinent part that a former government attorney:

> shall not represent a client in connection with a matter in which the lawyer participated personally and substantially as a public officer or employee, unless the appropriate government agency gives its informed consent, confirmed in writing, to the representation.

7. "Matter" is defined in Rule 1.0(l) to include any "representation involving a specific party or parties." All criminal cases and family court cases meet this definition.

8. Accordingly, under Rule 1.11(a)(2), unless the district attorney's office and the client give their informed consent, confirmed in writing, the former district attorney would be precluded in his capacity as an assistant public defender from participating in a particular Family Court matter in which he "participated substantially and personally" when he was the district attorney. See N.Y. State 776 (2004) (a former prosecutor may not defend an accused if the lawyer participated personally and substantially in prosecuting the defendant on the same charges while serving as a prosecutor).

9. As we said in N.Y. State 748 (2001), which construed DR 9-101 (the predecessor to Rule 1.11):

> The fact that a former government lawyer was counsel for the government in unrelated matters at the same time that the defendant's case was investigated or prosecuted is not enough to demonstrate personal and substantial participation under DR 9-101 or to require disqualification under that rule. See N.Y. State 638 (1992). At the same time, a former prosecutor must still carefully assess the circumstances of his or her service in the prosecutor's office to determine whether he or she may be deemed to have partici> pated "personally and substantially" in the investigation or prosecution of a criminal defendant. Relevant facts include, but are not limited to, (1) the extent to which the former prosecutor served in a more than nominal supervisory role; (2) the extent to which the former prosecutor had knowledge of government confidences and secrets relevant to the proposed representation of the same defendants; (3) the extent to which the former prosecutor provided coverage for other ADAs; (4) the extent to which the former prosecutor was kept apprised of cases in the office; and (5) the extent of the former prosecutor's access to the case files and other information regarding cases in the prosecutor's office.

10. We believe that the "relevant facts" (or factors) under former DR 9-101 remain relevant to an analysis under Rule 1.11(a), which uses the same standard ("participated personally and substantially") that appeared in DR. 9-101.

11. Here, because the inquiry concerns the former district attorney himself and not an assistant district attorney in that office, the former government lawyer's name appeared on all charging instruments and other papers filed against defendants in the county. This does not, however, in and of itself establish that the former district attorney "participated personally and substantially" within the meaning of Rule 1.11(a)(2)). Rather, the emphasis is on whether and to what extent the former district attorney's general supervisory role regarding all prosecutions brought in his name within his jurisdiction could tip the balance in favor of disqualification in a particular matter on behalf of a client of the public defender office. The tipping point is the personal and substantial participation standard, measured by the relevant factors set forth in N.Y. State 748 (quoted above). The former district attorney will need to examine these factors with respect to each matter in which he is asked to represent a client in the public defender's office.

Subject to enumerated conditions, Rule 1.11(b) allows other lawyers in the public defender's office to accept representations from which the former district attorney is disqualified.

12. Rule 1.11(b) sets forth an exception to Rule 1.11(a). If Rule 1.11(a) disqualifies a former government lawyer from a matter, then Rule 1.11(b) allows other lawyers in a firm with which the disqualified former government lawyer is "associated" to "undertake or continue representation in such a matter" if "the firm acts reasonably and promptly" to take certain specified actions specified in subparagraph (b)(1) and "there are no other circumstances in the particular representation that create an appearance of impropriety" within the meaning of subparagraph (b)(2)). The actions specified in subparagraph (b)(1) are to:

> (i) notify, as appropriate, lawyers and nonlawyer personnel within the firm that the personally disqualified lawyer is prohibited from participating in the representation of the current client;
> (ii) implement effective screening procedures to prevent the flow of information about the matter between the personally disqualified lawyer and the others in the firm;
> (iii) ensure that the disqualified lawyer is apportioned no part of the fee therefrom; and

(iv) give written notice to the appropriate government agency to enable it to ascertain compliance with the provisions of this Rule;

13. Here, provided the public defender and the other assistant public defenders employed in that office operate in conformance with the conditions specified in subparagraph (b)(1) and the "circumstances in the particular representation" do not "create an appearance of impropriety" under subparagraph (b)(2), then the other attorneys in the public defender office may represent the county or individual clients of the public defender office in Family Court matters from which the former district attorney himself is ethically barred under Rule 1.11(a).

Under Rule 1.11(c), other attorneys in the firm who accept the representation of a client whom the former government attorney is disqualified from representing must be screened from acquiring confidential government information.

14. Paragraph (c) of Rule1.11 restricts the use of "confidential government information" that a former government attorney "acquired when the lawyer was a public officer or employee." "Confidential government information" is defined in Rule 1.11(c) as "information that has been obtained under government authority and that, at the time this Rule is applied, the government is prohibited by law from disclosing to the public or has a legal privilege not to disclose, and that is not otherwise available to the public." The former government attorney "may not represent a private client whose interests are adverse to that person in a matter in which the [confidential government] information could be used to the material disadvantage of that person."

15. However, even where a former government lawyer is personally disqualified from representation under Rule 1.11(c), other lawyers in the same firm with which the former government lawyer is associated may undertake or continue that representation "if the disqualified lawyer is timely and effectively screened from any participation in the matter" in accordance with the same four conditions established in paragraph (b) of Rule 1.11.

CONCLUSION:

16. A former district attorney may be employed by a public defender's office in the same county. The former district attorney shall not personally represent a public defender client in a matter in which he was personally and substantially involved as district attorney or in which he is conflicted because he acquired "confidential government information" within the meaning of Rule 1.11(c). Where a conflict exits, it is not imputed to all lawyers in the public defender's office, and the public defender can assign another attorney in the office to represent the affected client, if appropriate measures are taken to effectively screen the former district attorney from the matter in accordance with Rule 1.11(b).

OPINION 1258 (06/05/2023)

Withdrawn by N.Y. State 1258A (04/19/2024)

TOPIC: Credit card fees as an "expense"

DIGEST: A lawyer may pass on a merchant processing fee to clients who pay for legal services by credit card provided that both the amount of the legal fee and the amount of the processing fee are reasonable, and provided that the lawyer has explained to the client and obtained client consent to the additional charge in advance.

RULES: 1.5(a)-(b)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer accepts credit card payments for payment of legal services. Credit card companies charge the inquirer between 3.5% and 3.75% of the invoiced amount as a merchant processing fee.

QUESTION:

2. May a lawyer pass on the merchant processing fee to the client as an expense?

OPINION:

3. New York lawyers may allow their clients to pay for legal services by credit card provided: "(i) the amount of the legal fee is reasonable; (ii) the lawyer complies with the duty to protect the confidentiality of client information; (iii) the lawyer does not allow the credit card company to compromise the lawyer's independent professional judgment on behalf of the client; (iv) the lawyer notifies the client before the charges are billed to the credit card and offers the client the opportunity to question any billing errors; and (v) in the event of any dispute regarding the lawyer's fee, the lawyer attempts to resolve all disputes amicably and promptly and, if applicable, complies with the fee dispute resolution program set forth in 22 N.Y.C.R.R. Part 137." N.Y. State 1050 ¶5 (2015).

4. Rule 1.5(a) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct ("Rules") prohibits charging a client "an excessive fee or expense" (emphasis added) and sets forth a non-exclusive list of factors to consider in determining whether a fee is excessive. A merchant processing fees that a lawyer wishes to charge back to a client who pays for legal services by credit card is an "expense" within the meaning of Rule 1.5(a). Rule 1.5(b) requires a lawyer to advise the client in writing "fee and expenses for which the client will be responsible."

5. Provided the attorney complies with Rule 1.5, nothing prohibits a lawyer from increasing the invoiced amount for legal services by an amount equal to the merchant processing fee incurred when accepting credit card payments. Thus, in N.Y. State 1050 (2015), in addition to allowing the inquiring lawyer to pass on to a client the credit card company's processing fee for payment of the firm's advance payment retainer by credit card, we allowed the lawyer to charge an additional nominal amount to compensate for the additional merchant processing fee incurred on that processing fee up-charge. We stated:

> A lawyer may, as an administrative convenience, charge a client a nominal amount over the actual processing fees imposed on the lawyer by a credit card company in connection with the client's payment by credit card of the lawyer's advance payment retainer, as long as (i) the client receives disclosure of the up-charge and consents to it before the lawyer imposes it, (ii) the amount of the up-charge is nominal, and (iii) the total amount of the advance payment retainer and the processing fees charged (including the up-charge) are reasonable under the circumstances.

6. N.Y. State 1050, ¶18. The same principles apply here with respect to merchant processing fees assessed on legal fees that a client pays by credit card after the advance retainer.

7. Ethics opinions issued by bar associations in other states have reached similar conclusions on this issue. See, e.g., Illinois Op. 14-01 (2014); D.C. Op. 348 (2009).

CONCLUSION:

8. A lawyer may pass on a merchant processing fee to clients who pay for legal services by credit card provided that both the amount of the legal fee and the amount of the processing fee are reasonable, and provided that the lawyer has explained to the client and obtained client consent to the additional charge in advance.

Withdraws N.Y. State 1258 (06/05/2023)

OPINION 1259 (06/06/2023)

TOPIC: Collaboration between lawyer and paralegal

DIGEST: Subject to various Rules regarding fee sharing, referral fees, solicitation, aiding the unauthorized practice of law, and supervision of nonlawyers, a lawyer may enter into a non-exclusive agreement with a paralegal who refers clients to the lawyer and completes forms for submission to judicial and non-judicial bodies.

RULES: 5.3, 5.4(a), 5.5(b), 5.8, 7.2(a)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is an attorney who primarily practices immigration law. The inquirer has been approached by an individual who operates a document-preparation business and who is characterized by the inquirer as a "paralegal." The paralegal proposes to enter into a "collaboration agreement" that "implies both referring clients to my firm and completing forms that would later on be submitted to the immigration authorities (court and non-court cases)."

QUESTIONS:

2. What ethical rules govern an agreement between a lawyer and an independently employed paralegal who wishes to refer clients to the lawyer and prepare documents for the lawyer's use in his legal practice?

3. On what basis, if any, could the lawyer ethically compensate the paralegal?

OPINION:

4. This Committee does not give general advice on structuring business arrangements, nor does it critique proposed business plans. Rather, our jurisdiction is limited to addressing attorney inquiries regarding specific acts of proposed future conduct. Accordingly, our response to the current inquiry is to call attention to some of the important ethical principles which, under the New York Rules of Professional Conduct ("Rules"), would pertain to any relationship or business plan that the inquirer may pursue with the independently employed paralegal.

5. In accepting the inquirer's characterization of the nonlawyer with whom she is contemplating a business relationship as a "paralegal," the Committee does not opine on whether that characterization is appropriate when such person is, as here, independently employed. Although more than 50 years ago this Committee described a "paralegal" in N.Y. State 255 (1972) as a "lay person employed by a lawyer to perform certain law office functions for which legal training and bar admission are not necessary" we note that the generally accepted meaning of the term has likely evolved. See also N.Y. State 1079 (2015) ("it is not deceptive for a lawyer to use the title 'paralegal' to describe a layperson who . . . who is not a graduate of a paralegal program or certified by any certifying body.")

6. Turning to the principles that shape the answer to this inquiry, the Committee begins with the rule, firstly, that a lawyer must not share legal fees with the paralegal. Rule 5.4 (a). See also N.Y. State 1068 (2015) (no fee-splitting with a nonlawyer). The paralegal may, of course, be appropriately compensated for the value of the paralegal services on an hourly or per document basis.

7. Second, the inquirer may accept referrals from the paralegal but must not pay the paralegal a fee for referrals. Rule 7.2(a). See also N.Y. State 942 (2012) (it would violate Rule 7.2(a) to give something of value to a non-lawyer firm in exchange for referrals); N.Y. State 1132 (2017) (although lawyers may ethically pay nonlawyers for advertising and marketing services, they must not pay for a "recommendation").

8. Third, the inquirer should be mindful not to aid the paralegal in the unauthorized practice of law, a violation of Rule 5.5(b), although the question of whether certain collaborative actions taken by the inquirer might constitute the unauthorized practice of law presents issues of law on which this committee does not opine.

9 Fourth, the inquirer must appropriately supervise the work of the paralegal with respect to the inquirer's clients. Rule 5.3. The duty to provide appropriate supervision of "nonlawyers" extends to all nonlawyers "employed by or retained or associated with the law firm, including nonlawyers outside the firm working on firm matters." Rule 5.3, Cmt [2] (emphasis supplied). The lawyer must ensure that the paralegal is "given appropriate instruction and supervision concerning the ethical aspects of their employment, particularly regarding the obligation not to disclose confidential information." Id. When a lawyer uses a nonlawyer outside the firm to assist the lawyer in rendering legal services to the client, the lawyer "must make reasonable efforts to ensure that the services are provided in a manner that is compatible with the professional obligation of the lawyer and law firm." Rule 5.3, Cmt [3]. As such, the inquirer "should communicate directions appropriate under the circumstances to give reasonable assurance that the nonlawyer's conduct is compatible with the professional obligations of the lawyer." Id.

10. Fifth, the inquirer must not "allow, assist, or induce" the paralegal "to engage in conduct that the lawyer could not engage in directly," in particular, the in-person solicitation of business for the inquirer. See N.Y. State 1068 ¶ 11 (2015); see also N.Y. State 705 (1997).

11. Finally, Rule 5.8 is also relevant to this inquiry. Paragraphs (a) and (b) of that Rule permit lawyers to contract with nonlegal professionals included in a list of professions jointly established and maintained by the Appellate Divisions to provide, on a systematic and continuing basis, both legal and nonlegal services. Although paralegals are not included in that list, and although it is not even certain that paralegals would be considered professionals within the meaning of Rule 5.8 (see N.Y. State 255 (1972) ("paralegal" is a "lay person employed by a lawyer to perform certain law office functions for which legal training and bar admission are not necessary"), paragraph (c) of Rule 5.8 expressly allows "relationships consisting solely of non-exclusive reciprocal referral agreements or understandings between a lawyer or law firm and a nonlegal professional or nonlegal professional service firm." As we said in N.Y. State 765, "It is important to emphasize that . . . any [such] reciprocal referral understanding, agreement or contract . . . must be nonexclusive. That is, a lawyer can never agree to refer all clients, or a specified quota . . . because the lawyer must continue to exercise professional judgment on behalf of the client." And as stated in Comment [4] to Rule 7.2, "R]eciprocal referral arrangements must not interfere with the lawyer's professional judgment as to making referrals or as to providing substantive legal services."

CONCLUSION:

12. Subject to various Rules regarding fee sharing, referral fees, solicitation, aiding the unauthorized practice of law, and supervision of nonlawyers, a lawyer may enter into a non-exclusive agreement with a paralegal who refers clients to the lawyer and completes forms for submission to judicial and non-judicial bodies.

OPINION 1260 (07/10/2023)

TOPIC: Responsibilities of a lawyer in a non-legal position.

DIGEST: A lawyer employed as a lawyer's assistant to provide both legal services and nonlegal services to the supervising lawyer's client is subject to the Rules set forth in the New York Rules of Professional Conduct. Because the services provided by the legal assistant are part of a package of legal services provided by the supervising lawyer to the client, the assistant's nonlegal services are not "distinct" from the legal services being provided to the client, so the exception in Rule 5.7(a)(4) that contemplates that the Rules of Professional Conduct might not apply to nonlegal services provided by a lawyer to a client if they are distinct from legal services provided to that client is not available.

RULES: 5.1(b)(2), 5.2(a), 5.3(a), 5.7

FACTS:

1. The inquiring attorney is employed as "Confidential Assistant" to a School Attorney, a full-time civil service position that the inquirer characterizes as primarily secretarial and administrative, and which does not require a law degree or admission to the bar (though the inquiring attorney has both). The stated responsibilities for the position include the preparation of documents for signature by the School Attorney and the revision of drafts of legal documents and reports. The position requires the incumbent to have "good knowledge" of the organization, functions, laws, policies, and regulations both of the office of the School Attorney and of the School District.

QUESTION:

2. In performing his duties as a Confidential Assistant to the School Attorney, is the inquirer governed by the New York Rules of Professional Conduct ("Rules")?

OPINION:

3. When a lawyer exercises professional legal judgment in providing services that a nonlawyer would be lawfully permitted to provide, the lawyer is engaged in the practice of law and is governed by the Rules. See N.Y. State 709 (1998) (citing N.Y. State 636 (1992)) ("[E]ven though trademark searches and application filings may be performed by non-lawyers, to the extent that the attorney invokes his or her professional legal judgment in conducting searches or filing applications, the business becomes the practice of law"). Accordingly, the inquirer here is bound by the Rules with respect to the various duties he performs in the supporting role of Confidential Assistant to the School Attorney to the extent that the inquirer applies his professional legal judgment in the performance of those duties.

4. What then about the purely clerical or administrative duties that the inquirer also undertakes for the School Attorney? Do the Rules govern those actions as well?

5. To answer that question, we first turn to Rule 5.7, entitled "Responsibilities Regarding Nonlegal Services." Rule 5.7 distinguishes between "legal services" and "nonlegal services" provided by lawyers and defines nonlegal services to mean "those services that lawyers may lawfully provide and that are not prohibited as an unauthorized practice of law when provided by a nonlawyer." Rule 5.7(c). Where the legal services provided are "not distinct" from the nonlegal services, a lawyer "is subject to these Rules with respect to the provision of both legal and nonlegal services. Rule 5.7(a)(1) (emphasis added).

6. Where the legal services provided "are distinct" from the nonlegal services, the lawyer "is subject to [the] Rules with respect to the nonlegal services if the person receiving the services could reasonably believe that the nonlegal services are the subject of a client-lawyer relationship." Rule 5.7(a)(2) (emphasis added).

7. Under Rule 5.7(a)(4), there is a rebuttable presumption that the person receiving nonlegal services that are distinct from legal services nonetheless believes that the nonlegal services are the subject of client-lawyer relationship, and thereby governed by the Rules, "unless the lawyer has advised the person receiving the services in writing that the services are not legal services and that the protection of the client-lawyer relationship does not exist with respect to the nonlegal services . . ."

8. The application of Rule 5.7 to the inquirer's situation, however, is shaped by the fact that the inquirer's client is not the School Attorney to whom the inquirer reports. Rather, the client is the School District. The School Attorney, assisted by the inquirer as a subordinate School District employee, is providing legal services to that client (the School District), not unlike a nonlawyer secretary or nonlawyer administrative assistant employed in a private law office.

9. Accordingly, a Rule 5.7(a)(4) notice to the client (the School District) cannot rebut the presumption that the inquirer's clerical or administrative nonlegal services are subject to a client-lawyer relationship (i.e., School District-inquirer). Because the legal services rendered by the School Attorney are "not distinct" from the supporting nonlegal services rendered by the inquirer, the Rule 5.7(a)(4) escape hatch is not available here. Whether the inquirer's services are legal services or nonlegal services, those services are provided as part of a package of legal services rendered by the School Attorney to the School District. As such, the inquirer's nonlegal clerical and administrative services cannot be "distinct" from the legal services being provided to the client by the School Attorney to whom the Confidential Assistant (the inquirer) reports and for whom he works. Accordingly, we conclude that all duties performed by the inquirer to assist the School Attorney in providing legal services to the School District are governed by the Rules of Professional Conduct.

10. Our conclusion that all duties performed by the inquirer to assist the School Attorney in providing legal services to the School District are governed by the Rules is in harmony with Rule 5.1, entitled "Responsibilities of Law Firms, Partner, Managers and Supervisory Lawyers, and Rule 5.3, entitled "Lawyer's Responsibility for Conduct of Nonlawyers." Both Rules 5.1 and 5.3 would require the School Attorney to take appropriate action to assure that the inquirer, as Confidential Assistant, whether acting as a lawyer or nonlawyer, conduct himself in accordance with the Rules. See Rule 5.1(b)(2) ("A lawyer with direct supervisory authority over another lawyer shall make reasonable efforts to ensure that other lawyers in the firm conform to these Rules"); Rule 5.3(a) ("A lawyer with direct supervisory authority over a nonlawyer shall adequately supervise the work of the nonlawyer, as appropriate."); and Comment [2] to Rule 5.3 ("With regard to nonlawyers, who are not themselves subject to these Rules, the purpose of the supervision is to give reasonable assurance that the conduct of all nonlawyers employed by or retained by or associated with the law firm, including nonlawyers outside the firm working on firm matters, is compatible with the professional obligations of the lawyers and firm").

CONCLUSION:

11. A lawyer employed as a lawyer's assistant to provide both legal services and nonlegal services to the supervising lawyer's client is subject to the Rules set forth in the New York Rules of Professional Conduct. Because the services provided by the legal assistant are part of a package of legal services provided by the supervising lawyer to the client, the assistant's nonlegal services are not "distinct" from the legal services being provided to the client, so the exception in Rule 5.7(a)(4) that contemplates that the Rules of Professional Conduct might not apply to nonlegal services provided by a lawyer to a client if they are distinct from legal services provided to that client is not available.

OPINION 1261 (07/27/2023)

TOPIC: Conflicts of Interest

DIGEST: An attorney may not represent a current criminal defense client in connection with providing testimony before a grand jury against a former criminal defense client unless the former client gives informed consent in writing and the disclosure of such representation will not be prejudicial or detrimental to the interests of the current client. Inasmuch as such disclosure and consent of the former client would not be required if the attorney withdrew from the current client's representation and was succeeded by counsel untainted by the prior representation, the conflicted attorney should give serious consideration to, and discuss with the current client, whether such withdrawal would be in the current client's best interests.

RULES: 1.0(e), 1.0(j), 1.2(a), 1.4(a)(b),1.6, 1.9, 4.2

FACTS:

1. The inquirer was assigned as counsel to represent two defendants in unrelated criminal matters. In one of the matters the inquirer was subsequently relieved as counsel for the defendant (now "Former Client"), but he continues as counsel in the other matter for the remaining defendant ("Current Client"). Although the inquirer is unaware of any information the Current Client possesses about the Former Client, he has been advised by the district attorney that the Current Client will be called to testify before the grand jury concerning the Former Client. The Former Client and the Current Client never mentioned each other in their respective confidential client-attorney conversations with the inquirer, and the inquirer believes that the subject matter of the Current Client's anticipated grand jury testimony has no evidentiary relevance to the Current Client's case.

QUESTIONS:

2. May the inquirer continue to represent the Current Client?

3. May or must the inquirer inform the Former Client that the Current Client may testify as a witness against the Former Client before the grand jury?

OPINION:

Is there a Conflict of Interest Between the Former Client and the Current Client if the Inquirer Represents the Current Client in Connection with His Testimony Against the Former Client?

4. Rule 1.9 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct ("Rules") governs the duties owed to former clients. Paragraph (a) of Rule 1.9 provides:

> A lawyer who has formerly represented a client in a matter shall not thereafter represent another person in the same or a substantially related matter in which that person's interests are materially adverse to the interests of the former client unless the former client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing.

5. Accordingly, absent Former Client consent, the inquirer would be precluded from representing the Current Client if the matter in which the Current Client will testify is "substantially related" to the matter in which the inquirer previously represented the Former Client and the interests of the Current Client and Former Client in that substantially related matter are "adverse."

6. Comment [3] to Rule 1.9 provides guidance for determining whether matters are "substantially related" and states in pertinent part: "Matters are related for purposes of the Rule if they involve the same transaction or legal dispute . . ." Here, the Current Client will be giving testimony in the matter pending against the Former Client, which is the very same matter in which the inquirer previously represented the Former Client. Accordingly, because the two matters are in fact the same matter, the "substantial relationship" component has been established, and we turn to the question of whether the interests of the Current Client and Former Client are "adverse" to each other in that singular matter.

7. As with any criminal defendant, the interest of the Former Client is to defeat the criminal charges pending against him or to secure the most favorable negotiated plea disposition. Whether and to what extent the Former Client succeeds in achieving these objectives depends in large part on the quality and quantity of admissible incriminating evidence in the possession and control of the district attorney. Although we are unaware of the particular criminal charges lodged against the Former Client, or the specific relevance to those charges of the Current Client's grand jury testimony, that testimony is sought by the district attorney to support the prosecution case in some important respect. Whether the evidence to be presented by the Current Client is only marginally useful to the district attorney in prosecuting the Former Client, or whether it provides proof of a key element required for criminal liability, it is certainly adverse to the Former Client's interests for the Current Client to testify against him.

8. Conversely, the Current Client shares the same objectives as the Former Client in his own unrelated criminal case – namely, to defeat the charges or to obtain the most favorable negotiated plea disposition. The prospect of cooperating with the district attorney and providing testimonial evidence against a defendant in another case, who happens here to be the Former Client, may provide the Current Client with substantial leverage for plea negotiations in the Current Client's own case. To the extent that the Current Client's testimony fills a gap in the proof required to sustain a conviction against the Former Client, corroborates a key element of the charges against the Former Client, or refutes a defense interposed by the Former Client, that leverage may be substantial. Accordingly, from the perspective also of the Current Client, the interest of the Current Client in securing a more favorable disposition of charges against him also puts the Current Client in a position of material adversity to the Former Client.

May the Former Client Waive the Rule 1.9 Conflict of Interest?

9. Even though the inquirer has a conflict of interest with the Former Client under Rule 1.9(a) based on substantial relationship and material adversity, Rule 1.9(a) expressly provides that an attorney may represent a current client notwithstanding a conflict of interest with a former client if the former client "gives informed consent, confirmed in writing." Rule 1.0(j) defines "informed consent" as follows:

> "Informed consent" denotes the agreement by a person to a proposed course of conduct after the lawyer has communicated information adequate for the person to make an informed decision, and after the lawyer has adequately explained to the person the material risks of the proposed course of conduct and reasonably available alternatives.

10. The process by which the inquirer in this case would seek to obtain informed consent from the Former Client, however, implicates other ethical rules and concerns.

11. First, we believe that the testimony of a grand jury witness is (at least initially) cloaked by statute in secrecy, and we do not know whether and when (if ever) the grand jury testimony of the Current Client will be disclosed to the Former Client. The parameters and timing of any such disclosure are matters of law on which this Committee does not opine. Nonetheless, to the extent that the Current Client's grand jury testimony against the Former Client remains secret, it is not likely to be in the Current Client's interest for the Former Client to know that the Current Client is providing evidence against him. Such knowledge might invite witness tampering, intimidation, physical violence, or other actions by the Former Client or the Former Client's friends and allies that are prejudicial or damaging to the Current Client. Proceeding down a path which could foreseeably result in harm to the Current Client raises issues of competence under Rule 1.1(c)(2) ("A lawyer shall not intentionally . . . prejudice or damage the client during the course of the representation . . .").

12. Second, the situation raises issues of communication under Rule 1.4, which requires the inquirer to promptly inform the Current Client of "material developments" and to keep the client "reasonably informed about the status of the matter." See Rules 1.4(a)(1)(iii) and (3). See also Rule 1.4(b) ("A lawyer shall explain a matter to the extent reasonably necessary to permit the client to make informed decisions regarding the representation."); and Rule 1.2(a) ("[A] lawyer shall abide by a client's decisions concerning the objectives of representation and, as required by Rule 1.4, shall consult with the client as to the means by which they are to be pursued.")

13. Third, issues regarding the duty of confidentiality arise under Rule 1.6. Both the substance of the Current Client's grand jury testimony and the naked fact that the Current Client is to provide secret grand jury testimony against the Former Client may well be "confidential information" within the meaning of Rule 1.6, which provides that a "lawyer shall not reveal confidential information . . . or use such information to the disadvantage of a client" unless certain requirements are met, including that the client gives informed consent. "Confidential information" consists of information gained during or relating to a representation of a client, whatever its source, that is (a) protected by the attorney-client privilege, (b) likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed, or (c) information that the client has requested be kept confidential." Accordingly, the same concern for the Current Client's safety that arises under Rule 1.1(c)(2) may be relevant here. It is likely to be "detrimental" to the Current Client for the Former Client to know that the Current Client is to be a witness against him, especially if a likely consequence of that knowledge would be witness tampering, intimidation, physical violence against the Current Client, or even adverse social consequences.

14. Fourth, issues concerning withdrawal under Rule 1.16 must be considered. Rule 1.16(c)(1) allows an attorney (subject to the court's approval) to withdraw from representing a client where such withdrawal "can be accomplished without material adverse effect on the interests of the client." Here, the inquirer should consider whether the duty of confidentiality to the Current Client will prohibit the inquirer from obtaining the informed consent of the Former Client because the inquirer may simply be unable to reconcile the Current Client's interest in leveraging his cooperation in providing testimony adverse to the Former Client in order to secure a more favorable plea disposition with the interest of the Current Client in avoiding the risk of harm occasioned by the Former Client's knowledge of that cooperation. It may well be that both of these important interests of the Current Client can be protected only if the Current Client is represented by an attorney who is not ethically obligated to seek informed consent from the Former Client regarding the Current Client's anticipated grand jury testimony, because only in that event can the secrecy of the Current Client's testimony before the grand jury be protected from disclosure to the Former Client. If the Former Client is not informed of the Current Client's grand jury testimony, the risk of physical or other harm to the Current Client will be substantially reduced or eliminated entirely.

15. Finally, even if (i) the inquirer determines that the Current Client will not be prejudiced by the Former Client learning that the Current Client will be providing grand jury testimony against him, (ii) the inquirer fully explains to the Current Client the benefits to be gained by cooperating with the district attorney and the risks of disclosing the Current Client's cooperation to the Former Client, and (iii) the inquirer obtains the Current Client's consent to disclose confidential information to the Former Client in order to seek the Former Client's consent to the inquirer's continued representation of the Current Client, the inquirer must still be mindful that, absent consent, Rule 4.2 requires the inquirer to communicate through the Former Client's current counsel in the Former Client's criminal case, not directly with the Former Client. Rule 4.2(a) provides:

> In representing a client, a lawyer shall not communicate or cause another to communicate about the subject of the representation with a party the lawyer knows to be represented by another lawyer in the matter, unless the lawyer has the prior consent of the other lawyer or is authorized to do so by law.

16. In sum, without knowing the particulars of the charges or the evidence against the Former Client, and without knowing the details of the testimony the Current Client can offer the district attorney, we cannot say that the path for obtaining the consent of the Former Client to the continued representation of the Current Client by the inquirer is impassable. We can, however, say that there are many obstacles that must be surmounted along that road, all of which would be avoided by permissive withdrawal pursuant to Rule 1.16.

May or Must the Inquirer Inform the Former Client of the Current Client's Testimony?

17. Nothing in the Rules requires the inquirer to inform the Former Client about the Current Client's testimony either before or after it is given. Moreover, Rule 1.1(c)(2) may prohibit the inquirer from informing the Former Client about the Current Client's grand jury testimony because doing so may prejudice or harm the Current Client. Laws governing grand jury secrecy (on which we do not opine) may also prohibit the inquirer from informing the Former Client about the Current Client's grand jury testimony. Even if the inquirer can navigate around Rule 1.1(c)(2) and grand jury secrecy laws, the inquirer would still have to obtain the Current Client's informed consent without transgressing Rules 1.2, 1.4 and 1.6. That is a tall order.

CONCLUSION:

18. An attorney may not represent a current criminal defense client in connection with providing testimony before a grand jury against a former criminal defense client unless the former client gives informed consent in writing and the disclosure of such representation will not be prejudicial or detrimental to the interests of the current client. Inasmuch as such disclosure and consent of the former client would not be required if the attorney withdrew from the current client's representation and was succeeded by counsel untainted by the prior representation, the conflicted attorney should give serious consideration to, and discuss with the current client, whether such withdrawal would be in the current client's best interests.

OPINION 1262 (12/14/2023)

TOPIC: Recognition of lawyer on not-for-profit organization's website

DIGEST: A lawyer may pay for an advertisement on the website of a not-for-profit organization that provides online medical information for victims of toxic chemicals. Separately, the lawyer may make a financial contribution to the not-for-profit organization in exchange for the organization's agreement to list the lawyer as a "sponsor" on the organization's website. But the lawyer may not make a financial contribution to the organization in exchange for the organization's agreement to list the lawyer on a page that discusses legal options for victims of toxic chemicals, because such a listing would constitute a prohibited "recommendation" in exchange for something "of value."

RULES: 1.0(a), 7.1(a) & 7.2(a)

FACTS:

1. Inquirer is a lawyer who represents alleged victims of toxic chemicals in personal injury lawsuits. A not-for-profit organization is publishing a website with medical information for victims of toxic chemicals. Inquirer tells us it would be advantageous for their law practice to be identified on the website as a financial supporter or "sponsor" of the organization, because some alleged victims of these toxic products who visit the organization's website may not yet be represented by counsel for a potential personal injury lawsuit.

2. Specifically, in exchange for Inquirer's financial donation: (i) the organization's website would acknowledge the Inquirer's practice on a page headed "Thank you to our Sponsors" (or similar words); (ii) the organization would list Inquirer's practice on a page that discusses legal options for victims; and (iii) Inquirer will make an additional payment to place an advertisement on the page discussing legal options for alleged victims. Neither Inquirer nor any employee of Inquirer's law firm will serve as an officer or director of the organization.

QUESTIONS:

Inquirer poses three questions:

3. May a lawyer pay for an advertisement on the not-for-profit organization's website?

4. May a lawyer agree to be acknowledged as a "sponsor" of the not-for-profit organization's website in exchange for making a financial contribution to the organization?

5. May a lawyer agree to be listed on the not-for-profit's website as a resource for alleged victims of toxic chemicals in exchange for a financial contribution to the not-for-profit organization?

OPINION:

The three questions raise issues regarding advertisements, sponsorships, and recommendations. We will cover these issues one by one.

Advertisements

6. The first question is whether a personal injury lawyer may pay for an advertisement on a not-for-profit organization's website. Our answer is yes, as long as the advertisement complies with the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"). Nothing in the Rules imposes restrictions on where a lawyer may advertise.

7. The advertisement would thus have to comply with Rule 7.1(a), which prohibits lawyers from disseminating any advertisement that "contains statements or claims that are false, deceptive or misleading" or that "violates a Rule." If the Inquirer complies with Rule 7.1(a), then a permitted method of advertising would include the Inquirer's advertisement on an organization's website. Cf. N.Y. State 915 (2012) ("Assuming relevant advertising rules are adhered to, a law firm's website may link to the website of a nonlegal entity, and vice versa.").

Sponsorships

8. The second question is whether a personal injury lawyer may contribute financially to a not-for-profit organization in exchange for the organization's agreement to acknowledge the lawyer as a "sponsor" on the organization's website. Specifically, if the lawyer makes a donation to the organization, the lawyer will be listed on the organization's website on a page headed "Thank you to our Sponsors" (or words to that effect). We see nothing in the Rules that would prohibit this arrangement. Many law firms sponsor not-for-profit organizations and activities. The sponsorship of not-for-profit organizations and activities can have positive effects and in the appropriate circumstances should be encouraged. However, the sponsorship should not involve the organization's additional commentary regarding the quality, effectiveness, suitability, etc., of the sponsor.

9. Even though a lawyer may sponsor a not-for-profit organization, the question arises whether the organization's listing of the lawyer as a sponsor of the not-for-profit organization in exchange for a financial contribution would constitute an "advertisement" that would be subject to the Rules governing advertising. We will now analyze that question.

Rule 1.0(a) defines the term "advertisement." It says:

> "Advertisement" means any public or private communication made by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm about that lawyer or law firm's services, the primary purpose of which is for the retention of the lawyer or law firm. It does not include communications to existing clients or other lawyers.

10. A lawyer who agrees to be listed as a sponsor in exchange for a financial contribution to an organization appears to satisfy at least two of the four components of the definition of an "advertisement" – the listing is (i) a "public . . . communication" that is (ii) "by or on behalf of a lawyer . . . ." We do not reach the third element (i.e., whether the listing is "about the lawyer or law firm's services") because we believe that the listing will generally not satisfy the fourth element, which is that the "primary purpose" is "for the retention of the lawyer or law firm." A communication does not fall within the definition of an "advertisement" unless it meets all four of the elements set out in Rule 1.0(a).

11. Sponsorships of non-profit organizations are common and generally indicate support of the organization and, to the extent they serve a professional purpose, they serve to promote general brand awareness. Comment [8] to Rule 7.1 draws a distinction between general marketing and branding, on one hand, and advertisements for purposes of the Rules, on the other hand. Specifically, Comment [8] says:

> [8] . . . Some communications by a law firm that may constitute marketing or branding are not necessarily advertisements. For example, pencils, legal pads, greeting cards, coffee mugs, T-shirts or the like with the law firm name, logo, and contact information printed on them do not constitute "advertisements" within the definition of this Rule if their primary purpose is general awareness and branding, rather than the retention of the law firm for a particular matter.

12. We relied on Comment [8] in N.Y. State 937 ¶ 4 (2012), where we concluded that a lawyer who provided a promotional gift with the law firm's logo in a local hospital welcome package was not engaged in advertising. We explained that "when the intent of a communication is . . . to raise general brand awareness, that intent will be considered its primary purpose." Thus, "even if such communications are more fundamentally motivated by the aim of increasing a lawyer's business, they are not advertising within the meaning of the Rules."

13. Like the promotional gift in N.Y. State 937, a law firm sponsorship of a not-for-profit organization, a social service organization, or a similar organization aims to increase "general brand awareness" of the law firm. Such a sponsorship may also have the purpose of supporting an organization because the law firm believes in the organization's mission and wants to be associated with that mission. While such purposes may have the overall aim of increasing a lawyer's business, they do not demonstrate that the "primary purpose" of the sponsorship "is for the retention of the lawyer or law firm." Accordingly, a sponsorship – without more – is not an "advertisement" within the meaning of the Rules.

Recommendations

14. The Inquirer's financial contribution to the organization will also entitle him to be listed on a page of the organization's website that discusses legal options for victims. In our view, this implicates Rule 7.2 ("Payment for Referrals"). The relevant paragraph is Rule 7.2(a), which provides as follows (with exceptions not relevant here):

> (a) A lawyer shall not compensate or give anything of value to a person or organization to recommend or obtain employment by a client, or as a reward for having made a recommendation resulting in employment by a client. . . . [Emphasis added.]

15. When an organization's website lists sponsors of the organization, that alone does not constitute a "recommendation" within the meaning of Rule 7.2(a). But if, as here, the organization separately lists (or otherwise singles out) the names of contributing lawyers or law firms who represent victims of toxic chemicals, we believe that the listing rises to the level of a recommendation. Thus, making a financial contribution to an organization in exchange for being listed on a resource page as a lawyer who serves victims of specified products violates Rule 7.2's edict that a lawyer "shall not compensate or give anything of value to a person or organization to recommend . . . employment by a client . . . ." Cf. N.Y. State 1132 (2017) (a lawyer may not pay a "marketing fee" to an entity if the fee includes "an improper payment for a recommendation").

16. We recognize that in N.Y. State 908 (2012) we said that an attorney could ethically appear as a "featured attorney" on the home page of the website of a local bar association to which the attorney belonged. There, however, our approval applied only if the home page contained an appropriate disclaimer stating that the featured attorney had been randomly selected and was neither being endorsed nor recommended by the association over any other attorney. The situation before us now is different because (i) Inquirer here would not be randomly selected but would be listed on the organization's website because he made a financial contribution to the organization, and (ii) the organization's inclusion of Inquirer on a list of lawyers who serve victims of certain products impliedly recommends the lawyer. The combination of a financial contribution to an organization in exchange for an implied recommendation from the organization contravenes the prohibition in Rule 7.2(a).

CONCLUSION:

17. A lawyer may pay for an advertisement on the website of a not-for-profit organization. Separately, a lawyer who makes a financial contribution to a not-for-profit organization in exchange for the organization's agreement to list the lawyer as a "sponsor" on the organization's website is not engaging in advertising within the meaning of the Rules. But the lawyer may not make a financial contribution to the organization in exchange for the organization's agreement to list the lawyer on a page that lists or discusses legal options for victims of toxic chemicals.

OPINION 1263 (02/05/2024)

TOPIC: Part-time town attorney's representation of criminal defendants in centralized arraignment part.

DIGEST: A part-time town attorney who has no prosecutorial responsibilities may, in his role as a part-time county public defender, represent criminal defendants at arraignments before a justice of the same town's court even if that justice sometimes sits on rotation in a centralized arraignment part.

RULES: 1.7(a)(1), (b)

FACTS:

1. County X recently established a centralized arraignment part (CAP). A CAP is an off-hours arraignment part held in local criminal courts (including town courts) on a rotating basis. The purpose of the CAP is to conduct arraignments and other preliminary proceedings incident to those arraignments. See New York Judiciary Law § 212(1)(w). Judges and justices of local criminal courts in the county are periodically assigned to the CAP. Town Z has only one town justice, and that town justice sits on the CAP on a rotating basis.

2. The Inquirer is an Assistant Public Defender in County X. The Chief of the county public defender's office (Chief PD) works part time in the public defender's office and also works part time as a town attorney in Town Z. The Chief PD has no criminal prosecutorial responsibilities for Town Z but nevertheless does not appear on behalf of criminal defendants in the town court in Town Z. The Inquirer wants to know whether the Chief PD/part time town attorney may represent criminal defendants at arraignments in the CAP even though a justice in Town Z sits on the CAP on rotation.

QUESTION:

3. May a part-time town attorney who has no prosecutorial responsibilities and who is also a part-time public defender represent criminal defendants at arraignment in a county's centralized arraignment part even though a justice of the same town's court sometimes sits on rotation in the centralized arraignment part?

OPINION:

4. In N.Y. State 184 (1971) the Committee stated that a part-time attorney for a local government is disqualified from the private practice of criminal law if the part-time attorney has prosecutorial responsibilities for the local government. This per se disqualification from practicing criminal law extends not only to the local courts where the attorney is employed but also to all courts throughout the state.

5. The basis for this per se disqualification from the private practice of criminal law in all state courts was that, because a local prosecutor represents the people of the state, a prosecutor who also represents criminal defendants in a state court would simultaneously be representing the people in some matters and opposing the people in other matters, thus giving rise to an appearance of professional impropriety.

6. In N.Y. State 234 (1972) the Committee addressed a variation on this question. A part-time town attorney who had no prosecutorial responsibilities asked whether he could represent private clients in criminal proceedings in state courts other than the court of the town he represented. The Committee began by reiterating the per se rule applicable to part-time town attorneys with prosecutorial responsibilities, explaining that "acting as a prosecutor one day and as defense counsel another gives rise to an appearance of professional impropriety." As to the specific issue raised in Opinion 234, the Committee stated that the attorney's representation of a criminal defendant would not create an appearance of impropriety if the attorney had no responsibilities with respect to criminal proceedings on behalf of the town, and the attorney "may therefore, represent clients in criminal matters, except before a town justice in the town he represents . . . ."

7. Ten years later, in N.Y. State 544 (1982) (which interpreted the former Code of Professional Responsibility), the Committee modified the per se rule applicable to part-time municipal attorneys with prosecutorial responsibilities. The modified rule articulated in Opinion 544 stated that if the attorney's prosecutorial responsibilities related solely to violations of local ordinances, then the attorney could ethically represent criminal defendants provided that the attorney also met certain other criteria. One of those other criteria was that "the defense does not require him to appear before a judicial or public officer of the locality the attorney publicly represents." The Committee explained that, because the prosecutor is a representative of the locality, appearing before a judicial officer of the locality on behalf of a criminal defendant would be seen as "representing an interest adverse to that locality."

8. In N.Y. State 657 (1993) the Committee adhered to the criteria stated in N.Y. State 544 (1982), reiterating that even if part-time municipal attorneys have no prosecutorial responsibilities, they nevertheless "may not undertake criminal defense cases pending before judicial officers of the same locality, notwithstanding their ability to handle such matters in other courts of the state." (Emphasis added.) The Committee explained in Opinion 657 that "[t]he prohibition on the lawyer/part-time public official's appearance in the courts of the locality engaging the lawyer, flows from representation of the 'locality,' not from the particular type of representation undertaken on behalf of the locality."

9. Similarly, in N.Y. State 874 (2011) the Committee extended this principal to independent contractors. Quoting N.Y. State 657, the Committee in Opinion 874 stated that "an 'independent contractor' or other 'local part-time attorneys for municipalities, regardless of their title or actual responsibilities, may not undertake criminal defense cases pending before judicial officers of the same locality, notwithstanding their ability to handle such matters in other courts of the State.'"

10. As explained above, the Committee's prior opinions have concluded that even part-time municipal attorneys who have no prosecutorial responsibilities may not appear on behalf of criminal defendants in the court of the municipality in which they are employed. This consistent conclusion was based on the view that, in so appearing, the attorney would be representing an interest adverse to the locality and would thus be representing "differing interests." Today, the Rules of Professional Conduct include the same definition of "differing interests" that was construed in N.Y. State 544. See Rule 1.0(f) ("'Differing interests' include every interest that will adversely affect either the judgment or loyalty of a lawyer to a client, whether it be a conflicting, inconsistent, diverse, or other interest"). In addition, Rule 1.7(a)(1) provides that "a lawyer shall not represent a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that . . . the representation will involve the lawyer in representing differing interests," which is substantially similar to the former Code conflict language construed in N.Y. State 544.

11. The present inquiry does not require the Committee to reconsider or modify its prior opinions on part-time municipal attorneys. We adhere to the view that even part-time municipal attorneys who do not prosecute cases on behalf of a local government may not appear on behalf of criminal defendants in the municipality's court. To the extent such an appearance would amount to "representing an interest adverse to that locality" (N.Y. State 544), the Committee believes that no such adverse representation would occur in the situation presented here because the CAP is not the court of the town for which the attorney acts as a part-time town attorney. This factor, along with the limited nature of the proceedings in the CAP, essentially eliminates any perception that the attorney is simultaneously representing both the town and a criminal defendant adverse to the town. In other words, the attorney would not be representing "differing interests."

12. The situation here is similar to that of a part-time town attorney who represents criminal defendants in courts of other towns, which is permitted under N.Y. State 544 (1982) if certain criteria are met. It is true that one of the criteria stated in N.Y. State 544 and other opinions is that "the defense does not require [the attorney] to appear before a judicial or public officer of the locality the attorney publicly represents." However, in referring to judicial officers or town justices of the same town, the prior opinions referred in substance to the same town's court. Our prior opinions did not contemplate a situation like the situation here, where the town justice is sitting not in the town court but rather on rotation in a centralized court that has only limited jurisdiction over arraignments and related preliminary proceedings. These factors negate any concern that the Chief PD would be representing "differing interests."

CONCLUSION:

13. A part-time town attorney who has no prosecutorial responsibilities may, in his role as a county public defender, represent criminal defendants at arraignments before a justice of the same town's court when the justice is presiding in a centralized arraignment part.

OPINION 1264 (03/01/2024)

TOPIC: Listing of Degrees by Attorney Working in Nonlegal Capacity

DIGEST: An attorney who has earned a juris doctor degree may use a "J.D." designation on letterhead and business cards while working in a nonlegal capacity as long as the lawyer takes care to ensure that any relevant audience is not misled to believe that he or she is acting in a legal capacity.

RULES: 1.0(a), 7.1(a) & (b), 8.4(c), 8.5(a) & (b)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is admitted to practice in New York State and is working remotely from New York as a development officer for a university located in another state. The university would like the inquirer to use the "J.D." ("Juris Doctor") designation after his name on letterhead and business cards.

QUESTION:

2. May a New York lawyer use the "J.D." designation on letterhead and business cards while working remotely from New York State as an employee of a university in another state?

OPINION:

3. In N. Y. State 1089 (2016), we noted that "[a] New York lawyer is bound by the New York Rules of Professional Conduct [the "Rules"], not only with respect to law practice but also with respect to nonlegal activities, both personal and professional." We also opined in Opinion 1089 that "when a lawyer engages in a non-legal business, it is not misleading for the lawyer to identify himself or herself as a lawyer – but a lawyer who does so must take care to avoid confusion. The lawyer must ensure that any relevant audience is not misled to believe that the lawyer is acting as a lawyer."

4. Rule 7.1(b) states that "an advertisement may include information as to: (1) legal and nonlegal education; degrees and other scholastic distinctions." The inquirer's proposed communications as a development officer are not "advertisements" under the Rules because "the primary purpose of [the communications]" is not "for the retention of the lawyer or law firm." Rule 1.0 (a) ("'Advertisement' means any public or private communication made by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm about that lawyer or law firm's services, the primary purpose of which is for the retention of the lawyer or law firm."). It must be noted, however, that even beyond the context of advertising, Rule 8.4(c) prohibits lawyers from engaging in "conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation."

5. This Committee and another ethics committee in New York have opined that when a lawyer engages in a non-legal enterprise, such as working in university's development office (as the inquirer does here), "it is not misleading for the lawyer to identify himself or herself as a lawyer." N.Y. State 1089; see also N.Y. City 1994-5 (1994) (opining that an attorney may properly append the suffix "Esq." to his or her name when not acting in a legal capacity). Similarly, we do not believe that the use of the designation "J.D." on letterhead or a business card by one who has earned a juris doctor degree constitutes "dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation" in violation of Rule 8.4(c). See N.Y. State 105(a) (1969) (opining that a lawyer may "list any earned law degrees" including J.D. and LL.M.).

We repeat, however, that the inquirer must take care to avoid confusion and "must ensure that any relevant audience is not misled to believe that the [inquirer] is acting as a lawyer" when the lawyer engages in a non-legal capacity. See N. Y. State 1089 (discussing various ways to dispel any such confusion).

6. The inquirer has only disclosed being licensed as an attorney in New York State. If the inquirer is also licensed in another jurisdiction, however, then pursuant to Rule 8.5(a) he may be "subject to the disciplinary authority of both this state [New York] and another jurisdiction where the lawyer is admitted for the same conduct." In other words, if the inquirer is licensed as an attorney in another jurisdiction outside of New York, then his proposed conduct may also be regulated by the professional conduct rules of that other jurisdiction, and the analysis under the other jurisdiction's rules of professional conduct may lead to a different conclusion, especially if the other jurisdiction has adopted a different version of Rule 8.5(b). Compare ABA Model Rule 8.5(b) with New York Rule 8.5(b).

7. If the inquirer is admitted only in New York, then the New York Rules of Professional Conduct will apply. See Rule 8.5(b)(2)(i) ("If the lawyer is licensed to practice only in this state, the rules to be applied shall be the rules of this state"). But if the inquirer is admitted in New York and in another jurisdiction, then under New York Rule 8.5(b) the answer will depend on whether or not the inquirer's conduct occurs in connection with a proceeding in a court before which the inquirer has been admitted.

8. If the inquirer's conduct occurs in connection with a proceeding in a court before which he has been admitted (permanently or pro hac vice), then Rule 8.5(b)(1) governs, and ordinarily the rules of the jurisdiction where the court sits will apply.

9. For all other conduct (including conduct of any kind not in connection with a court proceeding), then Rule 8.5(b)(2)(ii) governs, and the main questions will be where the inquirer "principally practices" and where the "predominant effect" of his conduct clearly occurs. Answering those questions requires a complex, multi-factored analysis. See N.Y. State 1027 (2014) (analyzing Rule 8.5(b) line by line). We do not undertake that analysis because we do not know whether the inquirer is licensed to practice in a jurisdiction other than New York, but if he is licensed outside New York, then he should undertake that analysis himself.

CONCLUSION:

10. A lawyer who has earned a juris doctor degree may use a "J.D." designation on letterhead and business cards while working in a nonlegal capacity as long as the lawyer takes care to ensure that any relevant audience is not misled to believe that he or she is acting in a legal capacity.

OPINION 1265 (04/26/2024)

TOPIC: Conflicts of interest, former clients

DIGEST: A lawyer formerly employed by a Legal Aid Society office would not have a conflict in representing a client in a matter adverse to a party who had been represented by other lawyers in that office at that time unless the lawyer, while at Legal Aid, acquired confidential information that was material to the new matter and the matters were substantially related.

RULES: 1.0(h), 1.6(a), 1.9(b)-(c)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer was employed by the Legal Aid Society of her county for a number of years, representing clients in Family Court. She left employment at Legal Aid and practiced in another area of the law and now is representing clients in the same Family Court in private practice (not as an employee of the Legal Aid Society). She inquires whether she has a conflict in representing clients adverse to a party that was represented in Family Court by another Legal Aid Society lawyer during the time she was employed by the Society.

QUESTION:

2. Does a lawyer formerly employed by the Legal Aid Society have a conflict of interest in appearing in Family Court adverse to a party who was represented by a different Legal Aid Society lawyer during the time that the inquiring lawyer was employed by the Society?

OPINION:

3. This inquiry is governed by Rule 1.9 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"), and in particular by Rule 1.9(b), which provides:

> Unless the former client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing, a lawyer shall not knowingly represent a person in the same or a substantially related matter in which a firm with which the lawyer formerly was associated had previously represented a client: (1) whose interests are materially adverse to that person; and (2) about whom the lawyer had acquired information protected by Rules 1.6 or paragraph (c) of this Rule that is material to the matter. [Emphasis added.]

4. The Rules define the term "firm" to include a Legal Aid Society office. See Rule 1.0(h) (defining "firm" to include "lawyers in a law partnership, professional corporation, sole proprietorship or other association authorized to practice law" and "lawyers employed in a qualified legal assistance organization"). Paragraph (c) of Rule 1.9, also referred to in the excerpt quoted above, bars a lawyer who formerly represented a client, or whose law firm formerly represented a client, from using confidential information of the client protected by Rule 1.6 adverse to the former client or revealing such information in most circumstances.

5. Rule 1.6(a) provides that a "lawyer shall not reveal confidential information. . . or use such information to the disadvantage of a client" unless certain requirements are met. "'Confidential information' consists of information gained during or relating to the representation of a client, whatever its source, that is (a) protected by the attorney-client privilege, (b) likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed, or (c) information that the client has requested be kept confidential."

6. Under Rule 1.9(b), a lawyer who did not herself represent a client of the Legal Aid Society would have a conflict in representing someone "materially adverse" to that former Legal Aid Society client only if the lawyer had "acquired" confidential information that was "material" to the new matter and if the matters were "substantially related." Comment [3] to Rule 1.9 explains that "[m]atters are substantially related for purposes of this Rule if they involve the same transaction or legal dispute or if, under the circumstances, a reasonable lawyer would conclude that there is otherwise a substantial risk that confidential factual information that would normally have been obtained in the prior representation would materially advance the client's position in the subsequent matter." We are unable to determine whether the two matters in question here are substantially related. But even if the matters were substantially related, if the lawyer did not acquire material confidential information about the former matter on which other Legal Aid Society lawyers worked (but on which the inquirer personally did not work), then the lawyer would have no conflict appearing adverse to the former Legal Aid Society client.

CONCLUSION:

7. A lawyer formerly employed by a Legal Aid Society office would not have a conflict in representing a client in a matter adverse to a party who had been represented by other lawyers in that office at that time unless the lawyer, while at Legal Aid, acquired confidential information that was material to the new matter and the matters were substantially related.

OPINION 1266 (06/14/2024)

TOPIC: Disclosing confidential information to government agency that is funding a client's representation.

DIGEST: An attorney may not report a client's confidential information to a government agency that funds the representation of the client without the client's informed consent.

RULE: 1.0(j), 1.4, 1.6(a)-(b), 1.8(f), 1.9(c), 1.18(b)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer receives funding from a government agency to support the representation of clients in immigration matters. The agency requires information from funding recipients regarding individual representations, including the identity of individual clients, personal information regarding the clients, and the outcome of the representations.

QUESTION:

2. When a lawyer receives funding from a government agency to represent clients, under what circumstances may the lawyer provide information to the funder regarding the clients and their matters?

OPINION:

3. Rule 1.6(a) provides in pertinent part that "[a] lawyer shall not knowingly reveal confidential information . . . unless . . . the client gives informed consent [or] . . . the disclosure is impliedly authorized to advance the best interests of the client and is either reasonable under the circumstances or customary in the professional community" or an exception in Rule 1.6(b) applies. The rule defines confidential information as "information gained during or relating to the representation of a client, whatever its source, that is (a) protected by the attorney-client privilege, (b) likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed, or (c) information that the client has requested be kept confidential." A lawyer is subject to a similar duty of confidentiality with respect to a prospective client, and the duty of confidentiality continues even after the lawyer's relationship with the client or prospective client ends. See Rules 1.18(b) & 1.9(c).

4. Although client identities and other information sought by the funding agency are unlikely to be protected by the attorney-client privilege, any or all of the information may be confidential information subject to Rule 1.6(a), either because the client seeks to keep it confidential or because its disclosure would be embarrassing or detrimental to the client. Cf. N.Y State 1088 (2016) (clients' identities may be, but are not necessarily, confidential information). That is for the lawyer to determine in consultation with the client or prospective client. Addressing a similar question in N.Y. State 1059 (2015), we observed that it was uncertain whether information sought by a third-party – in that instance, the Vera Institute of Justice, which was conducting research regarding immigration proceedings – would be "confidential information" of minor clients in immigration proceedings. But we stated that the lawyer for the minor clients could not disclose information relating to any such representation without determining in the individual case that the information was not confidential under Rule 1.6(a). We observed:

> Here, with the exception of the last item of data sought (the results of interviews designed to capture the client's understanding of immigration proceedings), the data being sought disclose procedural steps in the course of administrative or court proceedings, and such information is clearly not protected by the attorney-client privilege. Whether disclosure of the information to Vera would be embarrassing or detrimental to the clients depends on the context and the precise nature of the information involved. It is not, however, readily apparent that disclosure to a research organization of the fact that a child is involved in removal proceedings or that a court or administrative body has taken certain procedural steps would be embarrassing or detrimental to the child in the typical case. Those facts will already be known to the parts of U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services most concerned with the clients' cases, so the disclosure here will merely bring it to the attention of Vera, which is required by contract to redact and/or anonymize the data before disclosing it to the granting agencies. Nevertheless, not every case is typical, so the inquirers must weigh in each case whether disclosure would be embarrassing or detrimental to the child.

Id. at para. 9 (emphasis added).

5. In some contexts, lawyers have been able to share information with funders in anonymized or aggregated form without thereby disclosing confidential information. See N.Y State 1059 (2015). In the inquirer's situation, if it were possible to provide information in this manner so that "there [were] no reasonable likelihood that the [agency] will be able to ascertain the identity of the client," Rule 1.6, Cmt. [4], then disclosure would be permissible. However, we understand that, in this case, the agency requires that individual clients be identified. Therefore, if the information in question, such as the client's identity and the outcome of the representation, will be "confidential information" (for example, if the disclosure would be embarrassing or detrimental to the client), then the lawyer may not share that information with the funding agency unless (i) the client gives informed consent, or (ii) the disclosure is impliedly authorized, or (iii) a confidentiality exception applies pursuant to Rule 1.6(b).

6. We do not believe the lawyer is impliedly authorized to disclose information to the funding agency. Comment [5] to Rule 1.6 addresses the concept of implied authorization, in part, as follows:

> Except to the extent that the client's instructions or special circumstances limit that authority, a lawyer may make disclosures of confidential information that are impliedly authorized by a client if the disclosures (i) advance the best interests of the client and (ii) are either reasonable under the circumstances or customary in the professional community. In some situations, for example, a lawyer may be impliedly authorized to admit a fact that cannot properly be disputed or to make a disclosure that facilitates a satisfactory conclusion to a matter.

See generally N.Y. State 1084 (2016) (lawyer may have implied authority to disclose deceased client's confidential information to exonerate a co-defendant, if doing so is consistent with the deceased client's previous wishes). In retaining a lawyer in an immigration matter, a client does not impliedly authorize the lawyer to disclose confidential information to a funder, because doing so does not advance the client's interests in the immigration matter in which the lawyer represents the client. Therefore, the client would not expect the information to be disclosed. Cf. N.Y. State 991 (2013) ("The 'impliedly authorized' exception is intended mainly for situations in which time is of the essence and it is impractical for the lawyer to wait for the client's informed consent (such as during settlement negotiations or trial), or for situations in which revealing information about a client with diminished capacity is 'necessary to take protective action to safeguard the client's interests.'").

7. Nor do we believe any exception in Rule 1.6(b) to the confidentiality duty applies. The only plausible candidate is Rule 1.6(b)(6), which allows a lawyer to disclose confidential information "to the extent that the lawyer reasonably believes necessary . . . when permitted or required . . . to comply with other law . . . ." It may be that when lawyers accept government funding to represent clients in immigration matters, lawyers undertake a statutory or regulatory obligation – and not just a contractual obligation – to report back specified information relating to the representations. Whether that is true, and whether such a requirement would pass constitutional muster, are questions of law that we cannot answer. But even assuming that there is such a legal obligation, it does not follow that the lawyer must undertake a representation that would be subject to such a disclosure obligation. And if the lawyer does accept a representation eligible for government funding, the lawyer is not also required to accept that government funding in connection with the representation of any given client. In any event, any such federal law requiring individualized disclosures about clients in exchange for government funding does not relieve a lawyer of the obligation, before undertaking the representation, to obtain the client's informed consent to make the requisite disclosures. See also Rule 1.4. Clients are entitled to know that if they accept a lawyer's free services, the lawyer will be required to disclose their confidential information to a government agency, and they are entitled to make an informed decision whether to retain the lawyer subject to that condition.

8. Rule 1.0(j) defines "informed consent" as:

> the agreement by a person to a proposed course of conduct after the lawyer has communicated information adequate for the person to make an informed decision, and after the lawyer has adequately explained to the person the material risks and reasonably available alternatives to the proposed course of conduct.

Comment [6] to Rule 1.0 provides the following guidance regarding informed consent:

> The lawyer must make reasonable efforts to ensure that the client or other person possesses information reasonably adequate to make an informed decision. Ordinarily, this will require communication that includes a disclosure of the facts and circumstances giving rise to the situation, any explanation reasonably necessary to inform the client or other person of the material advantages and disadvantages of the proposed course of conduct, and a discussion of the client's or other person's options and alternatives. In some circumstances it may be appropriate for a lawyer to advise a client or other person to seek the advice of other counsel. . . . In determining whether the information and explanation provided are reasonably adequate, relevant factors include whether the client or other person is experienced in legal matters generally and in making decision of the type involved, and whether the client or other person is independently represented by other counsel in giving the consent.

9. Accordingly, if the client gives informed consent before the representation commences or at the outset of the representation, the lawyer may undertake the representation and, relying on the client's consent, make the requisite disclosures to the government agency. N.Y. State 1059 (2015), para. 12.

10. Some prospective clients may be incapable of understanding the risks of disclosure of their information to the government agency and/or incapable of making a reasoned judgment whether to retain the lawyer subject to the disclosure obligation. In that event, or if the prospective client declines to give informed consent, the lawyer may not undertake the representation subject to an obligation to disclose confidential information to the funding agency. The lawyer may decline the representation, represent the client without funding conditioned on disclosure of confidential information, or seek an agreement by the government agency to forgo receiving confidential information.

11. All of what we have said above is consistent with Rule 1.8(f), which provides that a lawyer shall not accept "compensation for representing a client, or anything of value related to the lawyer's representation of the client, from one other than the client" (which would include the government) unless three conditions are satisfied, including: "(1) the client gives informed consent" and "(3) the client's confidential information is protected as required by Rule 1.6." In our view, the government funding in this situation is either "compensation for representing a client" or it is something "of value related to the lawyer's representation of the client . . . ." Accordingly, each client's confidential information must be "protected as required by Rule 1.6," which means that the lawyer cannot disclose the information at issue without obtaining the client's informed consent.

CONCLUSION:

12. A lawyer may disclose information relating to a representation to a government agency that funds the representation if the information is not confidential under Rule 1.6(a). However, the lawyer may not disclose the client's confidential information to the agency unless the client gives informed consent.

(17-23)

TOPIC: Paying for a recommendation or referral.

DIGEST: A website that promises to connect potential clients with attorneys whom the website claims have excellent qualifications and are carefully vetted, constitutes an "advertisement" on behalf of the lawyers available through the website (see Rule 1.0(a) and Rule 7.1), and the lawyers' payment to the business providing this service constitutes an improper payment for a recommendation in violation of Rule 7.2(a). The inquirer's operation of the website, in turn, violates Rule 8.4(a) because it induces this misconduct by the lawyers who offer their services.

RULE: 1.0(a), 7.1(a), (f), &(h), 7.2(a), 8.4(a).

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a lawyer who is a part owner of a business that connects potential clients with attorneys. The connection between the potential clients and the attorneys occurs either when a potential client either (i) texts a specified number provided by the business's website or (ii) clicks on a chat box on the website. The website then instructs the potential client to select the area of law in which the individual needs assistance. In return, the website represents that the potential client will be linked directly with a lawyer in the relevant area of law with "excellent qualifications. The website promises to match the potential clients with lawyers who have strong reputations in the appropriate area of law. The website also assures potential clients that the website carefully vets the attorneys in the website's network and connects people with top-flight attorneys. Lawyers who wish to participate in this service pay a fee to the business operating the service.

2. The inquirer asks whether the website is required to state on its home page that it is "Attorney advertising." The business model described in the inquiry also raises issues about whether it involves a payment for a recommendation.

QUESTIONS:

3. Does the inquirer's website constitute an "advertisement" on behalf of the participating lawyers that is governed by the Rules' advertising guidelines?

4. Do payments from participating lawyers to the business in exchange for being listed on the website constitute an impermissible payment for a recommendation?

OPINION:

5. As a threshold matter, this opinion does not address whether the business implicates §495(1)(d) of the Judiciary Law, which prohibits a corporation from "furnish[ing] attorneys or counsel" as that is a question of law beyond our committee's jurisdiction.

Advertising and Required Disclosures

6. Rule 7.1 governs lawyer advertisements. Rule 1.0(a) defines "advertisement" for purposes of the various regulations on advertising contained in the Rules. Rule 1.0(a) provides:

> "Advertisement" means any public or private communication made by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm about that lawyer or law firm's services, the primary purpose of which is for the retention of the lawyer or law firm. It does not include communications to existing clients or other lawyers.

Here, because the lawyers pay for the privilege of participating in the website, the business's website is a communication "on behalf of" the lawyers participating in the website's service for the "primary purpose" of retention of the lawyers by potential clients. The website is therefore an "advertisement" within the meaning of Rule 1.0(a). See N.Y. State 1132 (2017) (website of business that markets the services of participating lawyers is an "advertisement" governed by the Rules); N.Y. State 1131 (2017) (website on which potential clients provide their contact information and agree to be contacted by participating lawyers is an "advertisement" by or on behalf of the lawyers and is subject to the Rules advertising regulations).

7. Rule 7.1(a) prohibits a lawyer from participating in an advertisement that "(1) contains statements or claims that are false, deceptive or misleading or (2) violates a Rule." Rule 7.1 also requires that certain advertisements contain prescribed disclosures, such as the label "Attorney Advertising," and information about the lawyer or lawyers whose services are advertised. See Rules 7.1(f), 7.1(h); N.Y. State 1131. Even though the business, not the participating lawyers, creates and disseminates the business's website, each participating lawyer is taking part in this advertising and therefore has a duty to ensure that the content of the website follows Rule 7.1's prescriptions.

8. Rule 7.1(h) requires that "[a]ll advertisements shall include the name, principal law office and telephone number of the lawyer or law firm whose services are being offered." We have previously determined that lawyers may not engage in advertising on the internet, including group advertising, without complying with Rule 7.1(h). See N.Y. State 1131, N.Y. State 839 (2010).

Referrals and Referral Fees

9. Rule 7.2(a) states that a lawyer shall not "compensate or give anything of value to a person or organization to recommend or obtain employment by a client, or as a reward for having made a recommendation resulting in employment by a client . . . "T Rule contains three exceptions that are not relevant to this inquiry: (1) referrals without monetary rewards, which are permitted by Rule 5.8, (2) referrals to another lawyer, which are permitted by Rule 1.5(g), and (3) referrals by a qualified legal assistance organization, which are permitted by Rule 7.2(b). The first exception is inapplicable because, among other things, the website receives monetary rewards from the participating lawyers. The second exception only applies to situations where a lawyer is dividing a fee for legal services. And the third exception does not apply because the website here does not constitute a "qualified legal assistance organization" as defined in Rule 1.0(p) ("an office or organization of one of the four types listed in Rule 7.2(b)(1)-(4) that meets all of the requirements thereof").

10. Since the business that is the subject of this inquiry does not qualify for any of the Rule 7.2(a) exceptions, the dispositive question is whether the participating lawyers are paying the business to "recommend" the participating lawyers or to obtain employment of the participating lawyers by clients. See N.Y. State 1131. Guidance is contained in portions of Comment [1] to Rule 7.2, which was amended in 2015 to illustrate how the prohibition on paying for referrals or employment applies to paying for client leads. In relevant part, Comment [1] states that:

> [A] lawyer may pay others for generating leads, such as Internet-based client leads, as long as . . . the lead generator does not recommend the lawyers. . . To comply with Rule 7.1, a lawyer must not pay a lead generator that states, implies, or creates a reasonable impression that it is recommending the lawyer, or making the referral without payment from the lawyer, or has analyzed a person's legal problems when determining which lawyer should receive the referral. [Emphasis added.]

Comment [1] to Rule 7.2, includes the following definition of the term "recommendation":

> A communication contains a recommendation if it endorses or vouches for a lawyer's credentials, abilities, competence, character, or other professional qualities.

Moreover, as we observed in N.Y. State 1131 ¶ 20 (2017), to "recommend" also includes identifying a specific lawyer or lawyers to a potential client as "a right" or "the right" lawyer for the client's situation following an analysis of the client's legal problem. See also N.Y. State 799 (2007) ("For example, if a potential client describes a slip-and-fall incident on an intake form and the website determines that the problem calls for a personal injury lawyer and then recommends one or more attorneys in that area, the website is "recommending" those lawyers").

11. Here, it is difficult to escape the conclusion that the language contained on the business's website creates the impression that the business is indeed recommending the participating lawyers. The website represents that the potential client will be linked with a lawyer in the relevant area of law with excellent qualifications. The website promises to offer lawyers with strong reputations in the appropriate area of law. The website also assures potential clients that they carefully vet the attorneys in their network and match people with top-flight attorneys. The most reasonable inference to be drawn from that representation is that the business has engaged in a substantive review of the lawyers' work and determined that they have excellent qualifications in their areas of practice. See N.Y. State 1132 (although Avvo claimed on its website that its rating did not constitute an endorsement of any particular lawyer, Avvo's use of a rating system together with its statement that Avvo worked only with "highly qualified lawyers" created the impression that it was "recommending" the participating lawyers).

12. In the inquiry before us, the website's explicit claim that it uses a review process aimed at finding the lawyers who deliver a high level of service constitutes a substantive recommendation. Cf. N.Y. State 1131 (a business that accepts only participating lawyers who are in good standing in their jurisdiction would not render the business's selection of a lawyer a recommendation if it uses neutral, non-qualitative criteria); N.J. Committee on Attorney Advertising Op. 2004-1 (lawyer may pay flat fee to internet marketing company for an exclusive website listing for a particular location in specific practice area if the listing includes a prominent, clear disclaimer indicating that listings are not endorsements); Arizona Op. 11-02 (internet advertisement listing one lawyer for each zip code are acceptable where an advertisement does not imply that the website listing is an endorsement).

13. Because lawyers participating in the website are violating Rule 7.2(a) by paying for recommendations, the inquirer's operation of the website violates Rule 8.4(a), which forbids a lawyer to "induce another" to violate the Rules of Professional Conduct. In our view, the website induces unwary lawyers to violate the Rules by paying for recommendations.

CONCLUSION:

14. A website that promises to connect potential clients with attorneys whom the website claims have excellent qualifications and are carefully vetted, constitutes an "advertisement" on behalf of the lawyers available through the website (see Rule 1.0(a) and Rule 7.1), and the lawyers' payment to the business providing this service constitutes an improper payment for a recommendation in violation of Rule 7.2(a). The inquirer's operation of the website, in turn, violates Rule 8.4(a) because it induces this misconduct by the lawyers who offer their services.

OPINION 1268 (07/03/2024)

TOPIC: Confidential information; publication of article about issues arising in a case handled by the lawyer

DIGEST: After the termination of the representation, a lawyer may publish an article that discusses legal issues in the representation, as long as the article does not reveal confidential information without the consent of the client. Confidential information does not include a lawyer's "legal knowledge or legal research" or information that is "generally known" in the local community or in the trade, field or profession to which the information relates. But information is not generally known merely because it is available in court files.

RULES: 1.1(c), 1.6(a), 1.7(a), 1.7(b), 1.8(b), 1.9(c), 7.1(r).

FACTS:

1. The inquirer represents one of two partners ("Client A") in a contentious dissolution of a business. The case has raised several interesting legal issues. The inquirer also writes on legal issues and would like to write an article about the case. Client A is very wary of publicity and believes that publicity about the case could be damaging to his reputation.

QUESTION:

2. May the inquirer publish an article on legal issues arising in a case in which he represented one of the parties, if the article isn't published until after the conclusion of the proceeding and discusses the issues only from a strictly intellectual perspective?

OPINION:

3. Rule 7.1(r) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") encourages lawyers to speak publicly and write for publication on legal topics to help lay persons identify legal problems. Similar policy considerations apply to lawyers who speak or write for the legal community on legal issues that may arise. See also Rule 7.1, Cmt. [9] ("[L]awyers should encourage and participate in educational . . . programs concerning the legal system, with particular reference to legal problems that frequently arise"); N.Y. State 1251 ¶ 3 (2023) ("It is not unethical for a lawyer to write articles, give lectures, or write a blog about topics of general or specific interest, including the law. In fact, such activities are encouraged and protected, reflecting well on the legal profession and its members as examples of lawyers . . . seeking to contribute to the general well-being of the public").

4. The inquirer's concern is that Client A is wary of publicity and believes that publicity about the case could be damaging to his reputation. That raises the question whether the proposed article would violate any other provisions of the Rules.

The Duty of Loyalty and the Duty Not to Harm the Client

5. One of the hallmarks of the legal profession is the duty of loyalty to the client. See Rule 1.7, Cmt. [1] ("Loyalty and independent judgment are essential aspects of a lawyer's relationship with a client"); Preamble to the Rules, ¶ 2 ("The touchstone of the client-lawyer relationship is the lawyer's obligation to act with loyalty during the period of the representation.").

6. Rule 1.1(c)(2) reflects the lawyer's duty of loyalty to the client by prohibiting the lawyer from acting against the interests of the client. It says: "A lawyer shall not intentionally prejudice or damage the client during the course of the representation except as permitted or required by these Rules." The exception refers to Rules that authorize a lawyer to take actions that might prejudice or damage the client in limited circumstances, such as disclosures permitted under Rule 1.6(b), withdrawal permitted by Rule 1.16, and disclosure to a court under Rules 3.3(a) and (b). None of those Rules apply here.

7. By its terms, Rule 1.1(c) applies during the course of the representation. Thus, Rule 1.1(c) does not apply to former clients. See Roy Simon, SIMON'S NEW YORK RULES OF PROFESSIONAL CONDUCT ANNOTATED ("Simon's") at § 1.1:44 ("the word 'during' makes clear that the duty not to prejudice or damage the client applies only to current clients, not to former clients.") (emphasis in original).

8. Similarly, Rule 1.8(b) – one of the rules concerning "specific" conflicts of interest with current clients – provides that a lawyer may not use information relating to representation of a client to the disadvantage of the client unless the client gives informed consent or the disclosure is permitted or required by the Rules. But this Rule, too, applies only to current clients. Indeed, the title of Rule 1.8 is "Current Clients: Specific Conflicts of Interest" (emphasis added).

When Does a Current Client Become a Former Client?

9. Different confidentiality rules apply once a client becomes a former client. The lawyer's confidentiality duties to a former client are set forth in Rule 1.9(c), which prohibits a lawyer from using or revealing the former client's confidential information unless there is an exception in Rule 1.6 (the confidentiality rule). Specifically, Rule 1.9(c) reads, in relevant part, as follows:

> (c) A lawyer who has formerly represented a client in a matter . . . shall not thereafter:
> > (1) use confidential information of the former client protected by Rule 1.6 to the disadvantage of the former client, except as these Rules would permit or require with respect to a current client or when the information has become generally known; or
> > (2) reveal confidential information of the former client protected by Rule 1.6 except as these Rules would permit or require with respect to a current client.

10. The inquirer will therefore have to determine whether Client A remains a current client in the matter of the representation. In N.Y. State 1008 (2014), we addressed this issue, noting that whether a person is a current client or a former client is a mixed issue of fact and law that the Committee cannot resolve. See Rules, Scope ¶ 9 ("principles of substantive law external to these Rules determine whether a client-lawyer relationship exists. . . . Whether a client-lawyer relationship exists for any specific purpose can depend on the circumstances and may be a question of fact."). We stated in Opinion 1008, however, that termination of the attorney-client relationship does not depend on whether the lawyer has sent a termination letter. Rather, a representation often ends when the lawyer has accomplished the purpose of the representation. As we explained in Opn 1008 ¶ 10:

> . . . [A]n attorney-client relationship may also terminate without a termination letter. See, e.g., Revise Clothing, Inc. v. Joe's Jeans Subsidiary, Inc., 687 F. Supp. 2d 381, 389-91 (S.D.N.Y. 2010) ("'In what is perhaps the most typical situation, an attorney-client relationship . . . is terminated, simply enough, by the accomplishment of the purpose for which it was formed in the first place,'"; Miller v. Miller, 203 A.D.2d 338, 339, 610 N.Y.S.2d 88, 89 (2d Dep't 1994) ("When the Family Court matter concluded, so did the attorney-client relationship"); Restatement (Third) of the Law Governing Lawyers § 31(2)(e) (2000) ("a lawyer's actual authority to represent a client ends when . . . the lawyer has completed the contemplated services").

Sometimes, on the other hand, even accomplishing the purpose of the representation does not end the representation of the client. As we said in N.Y. State 1008 ¶ 11:

> . . . Other circumstances, such as a longstanding pattern of representation over the years or the client's reasonable belief that a lawyer needs to perform additional legal work to fulfill the purpose of the representation, could also preserve an attorney-client relationship, even if the Law Firm has no specific pending assignment . . . at a given moment.

The remainder of our opinion here assumes that the attorney-client relationship in the particular matter before us has indeed ended, and that Client A is now a former client.

Would the Article Use Confidential Information in Violation of Rule 1.6?

11. As noted above, a lawyer's duty of confidentiality to a former client is set forth in Rule 1.9(c), which depends on whether information is "protected by Rule 1.6." Rule 1.6(a) prohibits a lawyer from knowingly revealing "confidential information" (as defined in Rule 1.6), or using it to the disadvantage of the client or for the advantage of the lawyer, unless the client gives informed consent. Rule 1.6 defines the term "confidential information" – and thus defines the information "protected by Rule 1.6" – as follows:

> "Confidential information" consists of information gained during or relating to the representation of a client, whatever its source, that is (a) protected by the attorney-client privilege, (b) likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed, or (c) information that the client has requested be kept confidential. "Confidential information" does not ordinarily include (i) a lawyer's legal knowledge or legal research or (ii) information that is generally known in the local community or in the trade, field or profession to which the information relates.

In addition, the client and lawyer may agree that other information will be held confidential. See Rule 1.6, Cmt. [4A] ("[W]here the client and the lawyer have so agreed, a client may have a proprietary interest in a particular product of the lawyer's research.").

12. The inquirer states that Client A is worried about information the inquirer gained during or relating to the representation that is "likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed." Whether any particular information meets this requirement is a question of fact that we cannot resolve. However, if the article would discuss the legal issues arising in the matter from a strictly intellectual perspective without discussing particular facts of the matter that are not generally known, and if the lawyer has not agreed with the client to refrain from publishing material related to the matter, we do not believe the article would run afoul of Rule 1.9(c).

13. The definition of confidential information in the black letter text of Rule 1.6 (quoted earlier) excludes the lawyer's "legal knowledge or legal research." Comment [4A] elaborates by saying: "The accumulation of legal knowledge or legal research that the lawyer acquires through practice ordinarily is not client information protected by this Rule." Consequently, an article restricted to discussing legal issues and either omitting or masking the facts that come from Client A's matter should not run afoul of Rule 1.6 unless the inquirer has agreed with the client to keep "a particular product of the lawyer's research" confidential. But if the article uses facts from the client's matter, the inquirer should ensure that readers cannot use those facts to ascertain the identity of the client. See Rule 1.6, Cmt. [4] ("A lawyer's use of a hypothetical to discuss issues relating to the representation . . . is permissible so long as there is no reasonable likelihood that the listener will be able to ascertain the identity of the client."); N.Y. State 1026 ¶ 15 (2014) (in the context of a lawyer writing a novel based on her career as a lawyer-mediator, the Committee stated that "if confidential information is sufficiently altered, disguised, rearranged, and infused with the inquirer's own imagination so that no one can trace particular information to a particular client, then the book will not reveal 'confidential information' within the meaning of Rule 1.6.").

14. Another important exception in the definition of "confidential information" excludes information that is "generally known" in the local community or in the trade, field or profession to which the information relates. We explained the meaning of the phrase "generally known" in N.Y. State 991 ¶¶ 20 (2013): "In our view, information is generally known only if it is known to a sizeable percentage of people in 'the local community or in the trade, field or profession to which the information relates.'". . . As explained by Rule 1.6, Cmt. [4A], "Information is not 'generally known' simply because it is in the public domain or available in a public file."

15. In N.Y. State 1057 (2015), the inquirer's client wanted him to use allegations the client had made in pleadings in other cases about lawyers and judges involved in those cases. The inquirer asked us if he could provide copies of these pleadings to the judge in support of his withdrawal motion, even if using those documents might prejudice the judge against the client. After quoting Comment [4A] to Rule 1.6, we said in Opinion 1057:

> Here, we believe that, unless the allegations in the client's other lawsuits were reported in the public media, or unless the client himself has widely publicized the allegations, the documents in the client's other cases do not fall within the [generally known] exception and therefore constitute confidential information of the client.

See generally ABA 479 (2017) (discussing the "generally known" exception).

16. We continue to believe that pleadings and other documents filed in a court case are not "generally known" within the meaning of Rule 1.6. Consequently, facts set forth in a court decision should be deemed to be confidential unless those facts are "known to a sizeable percentage of people" in the community, trade, field or profession.

Undermining or Negating the Lawyer's Work for the Client

17. As noted above, after termination of the relationship with Client A, Rule 1.9 would prohibit the inquirer from thereafter representing another client whose interests are materially adverse in a "substantially related" matter. A subset of this prohibition involves representations that would involve the inquirer in attacking or undermining work done for Client A. See Rule 1.9, Cmt. [1] ("a lawyer could not properly seek to rescind on behalf of a new client a contract drafted on behalf of a former client"). We believe the same principle would apply to an article written by the inquirer – a lawyer may not write an article about a former client that attacks or undermines the legal work the lawyer did for that client. However, it is our understanding that the proposed article would not undermine any positions taken by the inquirer in the representation.

CONCLUSION:

18. After the termination of the representation, a lawyer may publish an article that discusses legal issues in the representation, as long as the article does not reveal confidential information without the consent of the client. Confidential information does not include a lawyer's "legal knowledge or legal research" or information that is "generally known" in the local community or in the trade, field or profession to which the information relates. But information is not generally known merely because it is available in court files.

OPINION 1269 (07/16/2024)

TOPIC: Part-Time Judge; Part-Time Public Defender; Conflict of Interest;

DIGEST: A part-time assistant public defender whose law partner is both his cousin and a part-time town court judge may not represent clients of the public defender's office in the town court where his cousin/law partner and his cousin's co-judge serve because that representation would violate Rule 8.4(f). The assistant public defender may, however, represent defendants in a centralized arraignment part when his cousin and his cousin's co-judge are not presiding, even when the case is subsequently assigned to the town court where his cousin is a part-time judge, as long as the assistant public defender no longer represents the client after the arraignment and does not appear on behalf of the client in the town court where his cousin is a judge. Such limited representation at the centralized arraignment part does not violate Rule 8.4(f).

RULES: 1.0(h), 8.4(f)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is an attorney who is the Public Defender in a County Public Defenders' Office. Two of that county's Assistant Public Defenders ("APDs") work part-time and perform their APD duties out of their own private offices. These duties include client contact, correspondence, drafting motions and pleadings, and maintaining case files.

2. One of the part-time APDs is also a partner in a private law firm. His partner is a part-time judge in the local town court and is also his cousin. One other judge, a non-lawyer, serves in the same town court.

3. The attorneys working in the Public Defender's Office have represented defendants at the centralized arraignment part of the county jail as counsel at first appearance ("CAFA"). The APDs have rotating assignments to appear as CAFA in the centralized arraignment part. Similarly, local town court judges take turns presiding over this centralized arraignment part on a rotating basis. The inquirer, his law partner cousin/judge, and his cousin's co-judge, all take turns appearing in this centralized arraignment part. After arraignment, a case is transferred to the appropriate town court with jurisdiction over the charges. When the APD's cousin or his cousin's co-judge is presiding over the centralized arraignment part, the APD does not appear as CAFA for any defendants. There are cases, however, where the APD appears as CAFA in the centralized arraignment part but the case is then transferred to the town court where his cousin presides. In these situations, the APD will no longer represent the defendant in the case after the arraignment, and another APD will be assigned instead.

QUESTION:

4. May a part-time Assistant Public Defender whose cousin and law partner is a part-time town court judge appear solely as CAFA at a defendant's arraignment in a centralized arraignment part if neither the APD's cousin nor his cousin's co-judge are presiding, if the case will be transferred immediately after arraignment to the town court where the Assistant Public Defender's cousin presides as a part-time judge (after which another attorney will take over as counsel for the defendant)?

OPINION:

5. The question asks about two related situations: (A) May an APD represent a defendant in the town court before his cousin or his cousin's co-judge? and (B) if so, may an APD represent a defendant solely as CAFA in a centralized arraignment part when neither the APD's cousin nor his cousin's co-judge are presiding if the defendant's case will be transferred immediately after arraignment to the cousin's town court, where another attorney will take over the representation?

A part-time Assistant Public Defender may not represent clients in a town court where his law partner/cousin, or the law partner/cousin's co-judge, preside

6. The part-time APD clearly cannot appear in the town court in which his cousin and his cousin's co-judge preside. This follows from N.Y. State 1243 (2022), where we said that a part-time APD whose law partner is both his cousin and a part-time town court judge is precluded from representing clients of the public defender's office in the town court where the part-time judge serves because such representation would appear to violate both Judiciary Law Section 471 and the Rules of Judicial Conduct found in 22 NYCRR Part 100, thereby constituting a violation of Rule 8.4(f) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct ("Rules").

7. Rule 8.4(f) states that: "a lawyer or law firm shall not . . . (f) knowingly assist a judge or judicial officer in conduct that is a violation of applicable rules of judicial conduct or other law." The "applicable rules of judicial conduct" include the Rules of the Chief Administrative Judge set forth in 22 NYCRR Part 100, and "other law" includes sections of the Judiciary Law that may be applicable to the inquiry. Interpreting the New York Judiciary Law is beyond the Committee's jurisdiction, so we express no views on it, but the rules of judicial conduct are within our jurisdiction so we will discuss their relevance to this inquiry.

8. Section 100.6(B)(2) of the rules of judicial conduct provides that a part-time judge "shall not practice law in the court on which the judge serves, or in any other court in the county in which his or her court is located . . ." (This seems consistent with Judiciary Law § 16, which states: "A judge shall not practice or act as an attorney or counsellor in a court of which he is, or is entitled to act as a member, or in an action, claim, matter, motion or proceeding originating in that court.")

9. This prohibition also applies to the part-time judge's partners and associates as well. Rule 1.0(h) of the Rules defines "firm" or "law firm" as including but not limited to, "a lawyer or lawyers in a law partnership, professional corporation, sole proprietorship or other association authorized to practice law; or lawyers employed in a qualified legal assistance organization, a government law office, or the legal department of a corporation or other organization."

10. Section 100.6(B)(3) of the Rules of Judicial Conduct prohibits a law partner from practicing in the town court where his partner and cousin work as a part-time judge. (A part-time judge "shall not permit his or her partners or associates to practice law in the court in which he or she is a judge, and shall not permit the practice of law in his or her court by the law partners or associates of another judge of the same court who is permitted to practice law . . ."). Correspondingly, § 471 of the New York Judiciary Law states that:

> The law partner or clerk of a judge shall not practice before him, as attorney or counsellor in any cause, or be employed in any cause which originated before him. A law partner of, or person connected in law business with a judge, shall not practice or act as an attorney or counsellor, in a court, of which the judge is, or is entitled to act as a member, or in a cause originating in that court; except where the latter is a member of a court, ex officio, and does not officiate or take part, as a member of that court, in any of the proceedings therein.

11. As noted in N.Y. State 1243 (2022), the remittal provision in § 100.3(F) of the Rules of Judicial Conduct allows the court and the parties in some cases to waive judicial disqualification, but § 100.3(F) does not appear to apply in situations described in RJC 100.6(B)(3).

A part-time Assistant Public Defender may represent a defendant in a centralized arraignment part when neither his law partner cousin nor his cousin's co-judge are assigned, when the case will be sent for adjudication to his cousin's town court as long as the case is reassigned to another Assistant Public Defender after arraignment

12. The part-time APD says he does not appear as a CAFA when his cousin or his cousin's co-judge are presiding in the centralized arraignment part. Occasionally, however, he does represent defendants in the centralized arraignment part as a CAFA when the case will be transferred for jurisdictional reasons to the town court where his cousin presides. When such a transfer to the cousin's town court occurs, another APD is assigned to the case after the arraignment.

13. Section 100.2 of the Rules of Judicial Conduct, entitled "A judge shall avoid impropriety and the appearance of impropriety in all of the judge's activities," sets forth in § 100.2 (A) and (B) the following requirements for judicial conduct:

> A. A judge shall respect and comply with the law and shall act at all times in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary.
> B. A judge shall not allow family, social, political or other relationships to influence the judge's judicial conduct or judgment.

14. If the APD continued to represent the client after a transfer to his cousin's town court, that representation would violate Rule 8.4(f) (which provides that "a lawyer or law firm shall not . . . (f) knowingly assist a judge or judicial officer in conduct that is a violation of applicable rules of judicial conduct or other law") because the APD would be causing his cousin to violate §§ 100.6(B)(3) and 100.2 (A) and (B) (quoted above).

15. As we noted in N.Y. State 1115 ¶ 11 (2017), which discusses Rule 8.4(f):

> Under this provision, a lawyer may not knowingly undertake a representation when doing so would cause a judge to violate his or her own ethical obligations under the Rules of Judicial Conduct (such as the obligation in § 100.6(B)(3) not to "permit his or her partners or associates to practice law in the court in which he or she is a judge").

16. In our view, a part-time APD may appear in the centralized arraignment part for the sole purpose of representing a defendant for arraignment, when the defendant's charges will subsequently be transferred to the same town court on which the part-time APD's cousin/law partner sits, provided the APD does not represent a client in front of his cousin or his cousin's co-judge. That would be consistent with the strictures discussed in N.Y. State 1115. The APD's cousin (as judge) or the APD's cousin's co-judge are not under the APD's control and as judges they will presumably take whatever action they deem appropriate when a case that the APD appeared on at the central arraignment part comes before them in their town court, but under Rule 8.4(f) the APD may not knowingly assist them in conduct that violates the applicable rules of judicial conduct or other law.

CONCLUSION:

17. A part-time assistant public defender whose law partner is both his cousin and a part-time town court judge may not represent clients of the public defender's office in the town court where his cousin and law partner, and his cousin's co-judge, serve because that representation would violate Rule 8.4(f). The assistant public defender may, however, represent defendants in a centralized arraignment part when his cousin and his cousin's co-judge are not presiding, even when the case is subsequently assigned to the town court where his cousin is a part-time judge, as long as the assistant public defender no longer represents the client after the arraignment and does not appear on behalf of the client in the town court where his cousin is a judge. Such limited representation at the centralized arraignment part does not violate Rule 8.4(f).

OPINION 1270 (08/06/2024)

TOPIC: Engagement letters; Recording attorney-client communications; Withdrawing from employment; Advance consent to withdrawal.

DIGEST: A lawyer's engagement letter or retainer agreement may prohibit the client from making audio or video recordings of communications between the lawyer and client provided the engagement letter or retainer agreement: (a) does not mislead the client regarding circumstances under which the lawyer may seek to withdraw from the representation; and (b) does not purport to serve as the client's irrevocable advance consent to the lawyer's withdrawal if the client violates the prohibition.

RULES: 1.16

FACTS:

1. The inquirer contemplates including in his retainer agreements and engagement letters a "No Recording Clause" prohibiting each client from recording any communication between the two of them via audio or video absent the other's informed consent.

2. The inquirer seeks further to reserve the right to withdraw from a representation if a client violates the No Recording Clause.

QUESTIONS:

3. May a retainer agreement or engagement letter include a No Recording Clause?

4. If so, may the lawyer withdraw from the representation if the client violates the No Recording Clause (subject to permission of the tribunal in matters pending before a tribunal)?

5. May a retainer agreement or engagement letter provide that the client consents in advance to the lawyer's withdrawal from representation if the client breaches the No Recording Clause?

OPINION:

6. Nothing in the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") expressly prohibits (or expressly authorizes) the inclusion of a No Recording Clause in a retainer agreement or engagement letter. From that silence, we infer that a retainer agreement may include a No Recording Clause, subject to other provisions of the Rules that may apply to attorney-client relationships and agreements, including several provisions of Rule 1.16.

7. Rule 1.16(b) prescribes the circumstances in which withdrawal is mandatory and Rule 1.16(c) explains when withdrawal is permissive. When a lawyer desires to withdraw from a matter pending before a tribunal, however, the lawyer must comply with Rule 1.16(d), which requires a lawyer to seek permission from the tribunal if the rules of the tribunal so require, and requires a lawyer to "continue representation notwithstanding good cause for terminating the representation" if the tribunal so orders. Moreover, whether a matter is pending before a tribunal or not, the withdrawing lawyer must comply with Rule 1.16(e), which requires the lawyer to "take steps, to the extent reasonably practicable, to avoid foreseeable prejudice to the rights of the client," including various steps specified in the rule.

8. Subject to the conditions set out in Rule 1.16, a lawyer's withdrawal based on a client's violation(s) of a No Recording Clause would be ethically permissible. See, e.g., Rule 1.16(c)(1) (withdrawal is permissible when it "can be accomplished without material adverse effect on the interest of the client"); Rule 1.16(c)(7) (withdrawal is permissible when "the client fails to cooperate in the representation or otherwise renders the representation unreasonably difficult for the lawyer to carry out employment effectively"); Rule 1.16(c)(10) (withdrawal is permissible when "the client knowingly and freely assents to termination of the employment"); Rule 1.16(c)(12) (withdrawal is permissible when "the lawyer believes in good faith, in a matter pending before a tribunal, that the tribunal will find the existence of other good cause for withdrawal.").

9. A client's violation of a No Recording Clause will not always satisfy the conditions in Rule 1.16. For example, a client's single, inadvertent, or immaterial violation of a No Recording Clause, standing alone, is not likely to render a "representation unreasonably difficult for the lawyer to carry out employment effectively" within the meaning of Rule 1.16(c)(7) or to constitute "other good cause for withdrawal" within the meaning of Rule 1.16(c)(12). But a client's multiple minor violations of a No Recording Clause, or a client's single deliberate or material violation, are more likely to satisfy the conditions permitting withdrawal.

10. In N.Y. State 719 (1999), in opining on the predecessor to Rule 1.16 in the Code of Professional Responsibility, we noted that our analysis of provisions in engagement letters and retainer agreements permitting a lawyer to withdraw is governed by two principles.

11. The first principle is that an engagement letter or retainer agreement may not purport to authorize an attorney to withdraw from a representation under circumstances in which withdrawal would be impermissible under the rule governing withdrawal (then DR 2-110, now Rule 1.16).

12. The second principle is that an engagement letter may not mislead the client with regard to the attorney's obligations, including the attorney's obligation to continue as counsel in the absence of a permissible ground for withdrawing from the representation (or in the face of a tribunal's order that the attorney must continue the representation even if the attorney has a permissible ground for withdrawal).

13. In N.Y. State 719, we applied these principles to our analysis of DR 2-110, which was the predecessor of Rule 1.16. We said:

> [The withdrawal rule] does not authorize a lawyer to enter into, or act in reliance on, a retainer agreement which purports to set forth conditions for terminating the representation that would not otherwise justify withdrawal. . . . It is axiomatic that a lawyer may not enter into an agreement with a client in which the client expressly authorizes or permits the lawyer to violate a Disciplinary Rule. . . .

14. We believe that our analysis of the withdrawal rule in the former Code of Professional Responsibility (DR 2-110) fully applies today under Rule 1.16. Thus, a lawyer may not enter into, or act in reliance on, a letter of engagement or retainer agreement that sets forth conditions for terminating the representation that would not justify withdrawal under Rule 1.16.

15. Whether the client's breach rises to a level justifying the lawyer's withdrawal will be a case-by-case inquiry. In any case, if the client breaches the No Recording Clause, the lawyer must seek the permission of the tribunal pursuant to Rule 1.16 (d) before withdrawing, and the lawyer must inform the client that the tribunal's permission will be required even if the client breaches the No Recording Clause. In other words, the lawyer may not mislead the client into believing that the lawyer will have unfettered discretion to withdraw based on the No Recording Clause in the letter of engagement if the client breaches that clause. Rather, both the lawyer and the tribunal will need to assess all of the facts and circumstances at the time the lawyer seeks to withdraw.

CONCLUSION:

16. A lawyer's letter of engagement or retainer agreement may prohibit a client from making video recordings and audio recordings of communications between the lawyer and client, provided the letter of engagement or retainer agreement: (a) does not mislead the client regarding circumstances under which the lawyer may seek to withdraw from the representation; and (b) does not serve as irrevocable advance consent by the client to withdrawal by the lawyer if the client violates the prohibition.

OPINION 1271 (08/20/2024)

TOPIC: Sharing of Legal Fees with Non-Lawyer; Impermissible Referral Fees; Non-Refundable Retainer

DIGEST: A lawyer violates Rule 5.4(a), which prohibits a lawyer from sharing legal fees with a non-lawyer, if she pays a percentage of a legal fee to an online service owned by non-lawyers, on which attorneys can bid on potential clients' legal services requests. Payment to the online service for access to the platform would also violate Rule 7.2(a), prohibiting a lawyer from paying for a recommendation, because the online service's website claims to vet and evaluate the skill of the participating lawyers. If the online service has no mechanism to refund the unearned portion of a fee to a lawyer who withdraws or is discharged by the client before completing the work, that would violate Rule 1.5(d)(4)'s prohibition against nonrefundable fees.

RULES: 1.2, 1.5(d)(4), 5.4(a), 5.8, 7.2(a)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is considering contracting with a company that operates a website through which her firm would bid against other attorneys for clients in need of legal services (hereinafter referred to as the "Online Bidding Service"). She inquires whether the Online Bidding Service's fee structure violates any of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules").

2. The Online Bidding Service does not charge an upfront fee to participating attorneys. Instead, the client pays 50 percent of the eventual legal fee to the Service. The Service then deducts 15 percent of that 50 percent before delivering the remainder to the winning bidder (i.e., the lawyer who submitted the winning bid).

3. Once the attorney has completed the legal work requested by the client, the attorney submits the legal work to the client through the Online Bidding Service's website. The client then has "a certain amount of time" to review and request changes.

4. After changes are made at the client's request (or after the specified period of time elapses without the client requesting changes), the Online Bidding Service will collect the remaining 50 percent of the fee from the client and deliver payment to the attorney.

5. According to the Online Bidding Service's website, in situations where a client is dissatisfied with the services provided by the attorney service, the Online Bidding Service will "attempt to negotiate a settlement," but will take no binding action. If client and attorney are unable to reach a settlement, "they can go to the state bar associations to deal with it."

6. It is unclear whether the Online Bidding Service has a process for returning fees paid in advance if the attorney fails to perform the contracted work and has not earned the full advance fee.

7. The Online Bidding Service screens potential participating attorneys in several ways. The Online Bidding Service reviews the information provided by applicant attorneys and verifies that they are licensed and in good standing. The Online Bidding Service also conducts video or phone interviews of attorney applicants to determine "cultural fit and client service skills." In addition, the Online Bidding Service evaluates the "basic contract drafting and review skills" of applicant lawyers. The Online Bidding Service proclaims on its web page that it can connect potential clients with lawyers who are experts in helping their clients sign favorable contracts. In addition, the Online Bidding Service claims that all its participating lawyers are vetted by its team and reviewed by users.

QUESTIONS:

8. Does the portion of the legal fee retained by the Online Bidding Service violate the prohibition against sharing legal fees with non-lawyers?

9. Does the portion of the legal fee retained by the Online Bidding Service violate the rule against paying for referrals?

OPINION:

10. The answer to both questions is "yes." Use of the Online Bidding Service as described by the inquirer to obtain potential clients would violate multiple Rules.

Sharing of Legal Fees with Non-Lawyers

11. Rule 5.4(a) states that a "lawyer or law firm shall not share legal fees with a nonlawyer," subject to certain exceptions that are not applicable here. Comment [1] to Rule 5.4(a) explains that "[t]hese limitations are to protect the lawyer's professional independence of judgment."

12. Here, the Online Bidding Service is owned by non-lawyers and collects as payment for its service 7.5% (= 15% of 50%) of the total legal fee agreed between lawyer and client. Thus, if the inquirer were to pay the Online Bidding Service under its fee structure, she would be sharing a legal fee with non-lawyers in violation of Rule 5.4(a). The fact that the Online Bidding Service collects its fee from the client before delivering the remainder to the lawyer does not avoid the application of this Rule. Thus, a lawyer who participates in the Online Bidding Service and accepts payment through the method utilized by the Online Bidding Service shares a legal fee with a non-lawyer by allowing the Online Bidding Service to retain a portion of the legal fee. See N.Y. State 942 (2012) ("Lawyer may not ethically enter into arrangement with a non-lawyer firm to accept referrals of clients whose legal fees, in an amount not disclosed to the client, would be taken from the fee paid by the client to the non-lawyer firm"); N.Y. City 2014-1 (2014) (if a nonlawyer organization charges the client more for legal services than it pays the Lawyer, then the arrangement could constitute impermissible fee splitting) (citing N.Y. State 942).

13. In short, the fee violates Rule 5.4(a).

Impermissible Referral Fees

14. Payment by a lawyer to the Online Bidding Service to generate clients also violates Rule 7.2(a), because it would be an impermissible payment for a referral.

15. Rule 7.2(a) provides: "A lawyer shall not compensate or give anything of value to a person or organization to recommend or obtain employment by a client, or as a reward for having made a recommendation resulting in employment by a client . . . ." Comment [1] to Rule 7.2 explains the meaning of the word "recommendation" by stating: "A communication contains a recommendation if it endorses or vouches for a lawyer's credentials, abilities, competence, character, or other professional qualities."

16. In addition, Rule 7.2(c) provides:

> [A] lawyer may pay others for generating clients leads, such as Internet-based client leads, as long as (i) the lead generator does not recommend the lawyers, (ii) any payment to the lead generator is consistent with Rules 1.5(g) (division of fees) and 5.4 (professional independence of the lawyer), (iii) the lawyer complies with Rule 1.8(f) (prohibiting interference with a lawyer's independent professional judgment by a person who recommends the lawyer's services), and (iv) the lead generator's communications are consistent with Rules 7.1 (Advertising) and 7.3 (Solicitation and Recommendation of Professional Employment)."

17. In N.Y. State 1131 (2017), this Committee stated that advertising and marketing fees paid to an online service that matches attorneys with clients do not violate Rule 7.2(a) if the service matches attorneys using mechanical, non-discretionary factors. However, in N.Y. State 1132 (2017), we concluded that Avvo's ratings of participating lawyers "on a scale of 1 (Extreme Caution) to 10 (Superb)" and Avvo's description of participating lawyers as "highly qualified" expressly stated or at least implied or created the reasonable impression that Avvo was "recommending" those lawyers. Likewise, in N.Y State 1213 (2021), this Committee disapproved of attorneys paying fees to an online referral service matching clients seeking representation in traffic matters with attorneys that the service claimed had a "great track record in the court where the ticket will be contested." And in N.Y. State 1267 (2024), this Committee opined that an attorney would be paying an impermissible referral fee under Rule 7.2(a) if the attorney signed up with a web referral service that claimed it applied a "thorough vetting process" to its participating attorneys, who it described as "top tier."

18. Here, the Online Bidding Service states that it verifies the information provided by participating attorneys and that the participating attorneys are licensed and in good standing. If the Online Bidding Service did no more than that to screen attorneys, payment to it would not constitute improper payment for a recommendation. But the Online Bidding Service also conducts interviews with potential participants and claims in its marketing materials that it has assessed participating attorneys' "basic contract drafting and review skills." It further claims that its attorneys are "experts in helping their clients sign favorable contracts." The Online Bidding Service's claims that it has assessed the qualifications and competence of participating attorneys, like the claims of the nonlawyer entity discussed in Opinion 1267, are improper recommendations under the Rules.

19. We recognize that in N.Y. State 1132, N.Y. State 1213, and N.Y. State 1267, the referral service matched clients with attorneys, whereas the Online Bidding Service here allows potential clients to bid on attorneys, leaving the ultimate choice of attorney selection to the client. Nevertheless, the operative question is whether the service "recommends" the lawyers by endorsing the lawyers' qualifications and competence. Pursuant to Comment [1] to Rule 7.2 (quoted above), we believe the Online Bidding Service is recommending the lawyers here because "it endorses or vouches for a lawyer's credentials, abilities, competence, character, or other professional qualities."

20. Because the Online Bidding Service recommends the lawyers participating in its service and charges the lawyers who participate in the service, the inquirer's payment to the Online Bidding Service to participate in the Service would be an impermissible referral fee under Rule 7.2(a).

Non-Refundable Retainers

21. Finally, the fee arrangement utilized by the Online Bidding Service implicates Rule 1.5(d)(4), which forbids non-refundable retainer fees. According to the inquirer, if a client discharges the attorney before the fifty percent advance fee has been earned, the attorney must return the unearned portion. Based on the information the inquirer has provided to us, there does not appear to be a mechanism for the attorney to return the portion of the client's fee paid to the Online Bidding Service, raising the specter of the attorney being unable to return to the client an unearned fee. The failure to return the unearned portion of the fee would be an additional violation of Rule 1.5. See Rule 1.5, Cmt. [4]. See also Matter of Cooperman, 83 N.Y.2d 465 (1994) (holding that non-refundable retainer fee agreements violate public policy and the former Code of Professional Responsibility).

CONCLUSION:

22. If the inquirer were to pay the Online Bidding Service under the Service's fee structure to participate in the Online Bidding Service, she would be sharing a legal fee with non-lawyers in violation of Rule 5.4(a). She would also be violating Rule 7.2(a), which prohibits lawyers from paying for a recommendation, because the Online Bidding Service claims to vet and evaluate the skill of the participating lawyers, thus constituting a "recommendation." In addition, if the Online Bidding Service fails to provide a mechanism to return to the client the unearned portion of the fee, that failure would potentially violate Rule 1.5(d)(4), which prohibits nonrefundable legal fees.

OPINION 1272 (08/27/2024)

TOPIC: Conflict of Interest when part-time Department of Social Services Attorney represents clients adverse to Department of Social Services

DIGEST: Regardless of the scope of a part-time attorney's work for a county Department of Social Services ("DSS"), the part-time DSS attorney may not represent private clients in Family Court in matters in which DSS has an interest or otherwise plays a meaningful role even if DSS and the attorney's client wish to consent, because that situation presents a non-consentable conflict of interest. Consent to representation may permit the inquirer to proceed in other matters in which DSS is in some way involved, however, depending on the specific facts and circumstances.

RULES: 1.7(a) & (b)

FACTS:

1. The Inquirer is a part-time attorney for a county Department of Social Services ("DSS"). The Inquirer's role is limited to representing DSS in child support and paternity matters before the Family Court Support Magistrate.[1] The attorney does not handle confirmation hearings or any other matters that come before the Family Court judge. The attorney also does not handle any child protective matters, nor does the attorney have access to DSS files in such matters. The Inquirer asks whether she may represent clients from her private practice in Family Court in matters in which DSS is involved.

QUESTION:

2. May a part-time DSS attorney whose work for DSS is limited to representing DSS in child support and paternity matters before the Family Court Support Magistrate represent private clients in Family Court in matters in which DSS is involved?

OPINION:

3. Rule 1.7(a) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") provides as follows:

> (a) Except as provided in paragraph (b) [of Rule 1.7], a lawyer shall not represent a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that either:
> > (1) the representation will involve the lawyer in representing differing interests; or
> > (2) there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests.

4. The Inquirer represents DSS part time and represents private clients the rest of the time. DSS is thus her client. If DSS seeks relief in a Family Court proceeding or otherwise takes a position regarding the outcome of the matter, but the Inquirer represented a private client whose position is adverse to that of DSS in the matter, then the Inquirer would be representing "differing interests" within the meaning of Rule 1.7(a)(1) even if the DSS matter and the private matter are not related. See Rule 1.7, Cmt. 6 ("absent consent, a lawyer may not advocate in one matter for a client against another client that the client represents in some other matter, even when the matters are wholly unrelated").

1 Support Magistrates are appointed and empowered to hear, determine and grant relief in Family Court support and paternity proceedings. Family Court Act § 439.

5. To provide some examples, it would be a conflict of interest under Rule 1.7(a)(1) for the inquirer to represent a private client as respondent (i.e., opposing party) in a Family Court Article 5 proceeding brought by DSS as assignee of an individual receiving public assistance or in a child protective proceeding brought by DSS under Family Court Article 10. Even if DSS is represented by another DSS attorney in such matters and the Inquirer has no involvement in the matter, Rule 1.10 "imputes the conflict of the lawyer to the entire legal unit of the Department [of Social Services] by virtue of the lawyer's part-time affiliation with it." N.Y. State 1074 (2015). This means that the inquirer would have a conflict of interest in such situations simply by virtue of the fact that one client (DSS) is adverse to another client (her private client).

6. Nevertheless, there may be matters in which DSS is involved but in which DSS does not have any particular interest in the course or outcome of the matter. For example, DSS may have conducted a previous investigation that is no longer relevant except as background, or a DSS social worker may be called upon to testify regarding facts that are not in dispute. Such a matter might not implicate Rule 1.7(a)(1) because the Inquirer would not be representing "differing interests," but the Inquirer would still need to consider whether she has a conflict of interest under Rule 1.7(a)(2) (quoted above), which would prohibit her from representing a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that there is a "significant risk" that her professional judgment on behalf of her client would be "adversely affected" by her own "financial, business, property or other personal interests." Thus, the Inquirer would need to consider, among other issues, whether her interest in maintaining her part-time position with DSS would constrain her in advancing arguments that might cast DSS or its staff in a bad light or be contrary to the positions DSS has taken in other matters.

7. Whether Rule 1.7(a)(1) or (a)(2) applies in any particular matter would depend on the specific facts and circumstances, but by way of general guidance it is the Committee's view that there would be a conflict if a part-time DSS attorney were to represent a private client in any matter in which DSS plays a "meaningful role." We believe that DSS would play a meaningful role both in matters in which the interests of a DSS client conflict with the interests of the opposing party, as well as in certain other matters in which DSS does not have a direct interest but is nevertheless involved in an important way.

8. The Committee previously articulated similar guidance in N.Y. State 1074 (2015). There, a part-time DSS attorney sought to accept assignments to represent indigent individuals both in criminal matters and in Family Court proceedings. Because the attorney did not intend to accept assignments in child abuse and neglect cases, the Committee concluded that the rule set out in N.Y. State 859 (2011) barring a prosecutor from acting as criminal defense counsel did not apply. Opinion 1074 continued that whether the attorney could take on other types of assigned criminal or Family Court cases depended on the particular facts and circumstances of each case. Specifically, Opinion 1074 stated:

> Although it is true that many Family Court proceedings implicate the Social Services Department, there are certain proceedings there that typically do not. For instance, a couple in a dispute over custody, or the occupancy or possession of marital assets, would not ordinarily excite the interest of the Department of Social Services. This is why we believe that the issue is best left to the facts and circumstances of the matter, in which the lawyer may assess whether the lawyer's part-time employment in the Department of Social Services would be an issue. If the Department is to play any meaningful role in the Family Court proceeding, then the lawyer should decline the assignment; if not, then we see no reason why the lawyer may not appear in the Family Court on matters in which the Department plays no meaningful role. [Emphasis added.]

9. If the Inquirer's representation of a private client creates a conflict of interest under Rule 1.7(a)(1) or (2), then the next question is whether that conflict is waivable under Rule 1.7(b). Rule 1.7(b) provides as follows:

> (b) Notwithstanding the existence of a concurrent conflict of interest under paragraph (a), a lawyer may represent a client if:
> (1) the lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client;
>
> (2) the representation is not prohibited by law;
>
> (3) the representation does not involve the assertion of a claim by one client against another client represented by the lawyer in the same litigation or other proceeding before a tribunal; and
> (4) each affected client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing.

10. The Committee addressed the waiver issue in N.Y. State 1074, stating:

> The most important element of the analysis [under Rule 1.7(b)] is the lawyer's reasonable belief "that the lawyer may provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client." We cannot negate the possibility that a part-time lawyer for the Department of Social Services may reach such a reasonable belief in undertaking the defense of a criminal defendant provided that the matter is one in which the lawyer is not then working or has not recently worked with the law enforcement officials involved, and does not involve any issue within the jurisdiction of the Department of Social Services. For example, a DWI or a larceny charge against a stranger to the Department, in which none of the law enforcement officials with whom the lawyer works or has recently worked, cannot readily be said to entail the serious issues that a lawyer in the inquirer's position might otherwise raise. But for the lawyer to be engaged in matters within the Department's jurisdiction, which a Family Court appearance would inevitably invoke, or for the lawyer to be required to cross-examine law enforcement officials with whom the lawyer is now engaged as a part-time lawyer at the Department of Social Services or has recently done so, would present exactly the > problems that our earlier opinions found impermissible. In all events, the informed consent of the Department of Social Services and of the lawyer's client, confirmed in writing, is essential to the undertaking. [Emphasis added.]

11. In referring to "matters within the Department's jurisdiction," the Committee was referring to matters in which DSS is so directly involved, as a party or otherwise, as to preclude the attorney's forming a reasonable belief, within the meaning of Rule 1.7(b)(1), that "the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client." Absent such a reasonable belief, the conflict is non-consentable (i.e., non-waivable) even if the conflicting parties desire to waive the conflict.

12. Whether the Inquirer here might be able to form such a belief in matters in which DSS is involved only indirectly would depend on the particular facts and circumstances of the matter. But even if the Inquirer reasonably believed that she could render competent and diligent representation to each affected client per Rule 1.7(b)(1), "the informed consent of the Department of Social Services and of the lawyer's client, confirmed in writing, [would be] essential to the undertaking." See N.Y. State 1074 (2015).

13. Finally, because the Committee addresses only issues arising under the New York Rules of Professional Conduct, we express no view with respect to any statute, ordinance or municipal ethics code that may bear upon the present inquiry.

CONCLUSION:

14. Regardless of the scope of a part-time attorney's work for a county Department of Social Services ("DSS"), the part-time DSS attorney may not represent private clients in Family Court in matters in which DSS has an interest or otherwise plays a meaningful role even if DSS and the attorney's client wish to consent, because that situation presents a non-consentable conflict of interest. Consent to representation may permit the inquirer to proceed in other matters in which DSS is in some way involved, however, depending on the specific facts and circumstances.

OPINION 1273 (08/28/2024)

TOPIC: Referral of real estate matters to lawyer from real estate broker who is also employed by lawyer as an associate

DIGEST: A lawyer may accept real estate clients referred by an associate in the lawyer's firm who is also a licensed real estate broker, provided the lawyer does not share legal fees or real estate commissions with the broker/associate and the lawyer obtains the client's informed consent, confirmed in writing.

RULES: 1.0(j), 1.7(a) and (b)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer has an associate who is also a real estate broker. The broker/associate would like to refer her real estate clients to the inquirer for legal representation in real estate matters and the inquirer would like to accept those referrals. The inquirer would not pay the broker/associate a referral fee for any matter in which the broker/associate was working as a realtor, and the inquirer would not receive any portion of any real estate commissions that the client paid to the broker/associate.

2. The inquirer states that referrals from the broker/associate would represent only a small part of the inquirer's law practice revenue and that clients would be advised of the employer/employee affiliation between the inquirer and the broker/associate.

QUESTIONS:

3. May the inquirer accept real estate clients referred to him by the broker/associate for legal representation in matters in which she is serving as a realtor?

OPINION:

4. In New York, a lawyer may not serve as both a realtor and a lawyer in the same real estate transaction. As the Committee wrote in N.Y. State 1043 (2015), "we have long and consistently stated that a lawyer may not act as a lawyer and a broker in the same real estate transaction, with or without client consent, and whether or not the lawyer charges for legal services." Opinion 1043 explained that "where the lawyer acts as both broker and a lawyer in the same transaction, 'the broker's personal and financial interest in closing the transaction interferes with the lawyer's ability to render independent legal advice with respect to the transaction consistent with the principles now embodied in Rule of Professional Conduct 1.7(a) . . . .'" See also N.Y. State 1015 (2014); N.Y. State 916 (2012); and N.Y. State 933 (2012).

5. In N.Y. State 1237 (2022), where a lawyer who owned a real estate company planned to split the brokerage commission earned on a real estate transaction with the real estate agent, we reaffirmed our view that a lawyer may not act as a lawyer and a broker in the same real estate transaction. In Opinion 1237 we wrote: "Our opinions have consistently concluded that a conflict arises when a lawyer acts as a lawyer and a broker in the same real estate transaction. They have also concluded that such conflicts are per se non-waivable" because of the inherent tension between a lawyer's duty to render independent advice to the client, on one hand, and the lawyer's personal interest receiving a broker's fee, which is earned only upon closing of the transaction, on the other hand. That tension renders the conflict unwaivable (i.e., non-consentable). See N.Y. State 1237 (2022), ¶ 8. Thus, returning to the present inquiry, neither the inquirer nor the broker/associate could act as both lawyer and broker on any matter referred to the inquirer by the broker/associate.

6. Referrals from real estate brokers to lawyers are not barred in all situations, however. For example, in N.Y. State 1208 (2020), this Committee opined that a lawyer was permitted to receive referrals from her paralegal who was also a licensed real estate broker, where the lawyer made full disclosure of her (the lawyer's) personal interest conflict to the client and obtained the client's informed consent, confirmed in writing, as required by Rule 1.7(b). Opinion 1208 noted that the ethical concerns in prior opinions "primarily derived from the separate and independent financial interest of the lawyer/broker arising from compensation for the non-legal service." Opinion 1208 observed that "[t]his rationale applies as long as the lawyer has a financial interest in the real estate broker's commission whether or not the lawyer is acting as a broker." N.Y. State 1208 ¶ 6 (citing N.Y. State 1043). In Opinion 1208, the Committee determined that the lawyer "had no financial interest in the broker's commission," and therefore, the per se non-waivable conflict that was present in N.Y. State 916 and N.Y. State 1043 because of the lawyer's interest in the broker's commission in those situations was not triggered. But Opinion 1208 advised lawyers to be mindful about maintaining professional independence even if they had no interest in the broker's commission, and cautioned the lawyer not to permit the paralegal to "direct or regulate any advice rendered to the referred real estate client." N.Y. State 1208 ¶ 11.

7. Here, the inquirer asks whether an associate who is also a real estate broker may refer real estate matters in which the associate is acting as a realtor but not as a lawyer. The inquirer would obtain informed client consent from the affected clients, would not allow the broker/associate to participate in the legal work on real estate matters the associate referred to the lawyer, and would not share real estate commissions or legal fees with the broker/associate in referred matters. The inquirer believes that referrals from the broker/associate are unlikely to constitute a significant portion of the inquirer's law practice or to generate significant income.

8. The test for determining whether the conflict is consentable turns on the significance of the likely brokerage revenue to the lawyer and whether such revenue will affect the lawyer's independent professional judgment. As we noted in Opinion 1208, "a disabling personal financial conflict of interest is likely to arise if the paralegal refers enough matters to the inquirer that those referrals, in the aggregate, constitute a significant portion of the fees earned in the inquirer's practice as a whole." N.Y. State 1208 ¶8. Rule 1.7(a)(2) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") provides that (absent a client's informed consent, confirmed in writing) a lawyer should not represent a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that "there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests." If there is such a personal interest conflict, Rule 1.7(b) provides that the lawyer may nonetheless represent the client in the transaction if the lawyer "reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation," the representation is not prohibited by law, and the client "gives informed consent, confirmed in writing." Rule 1.7(b)(1), (2) and (4).

9. Rule 1.0(j) defines "informed consent" as follows:

> "Informed consent" denotes the agreement by a person to a proposed course of conduct after the lawyer has communicated information adequate for the person to make an informed decision, and after the lawyer has adequately explained to the person the material risks of the proposed course of conduct and reasonably available alternatives."

See also Rule 1.0, Comment [6] (explaining "informed consent").

10. Comment [18] to Rule 1.7 elaborates on "informed consent" by stating:

> Informed consent requires that each affected client be aware of the zelevant circumstances, including the material and reasonably foreseeable ways that the conflict could adversely affect the interests of that client. Informed consent also requires that the client be given the opportunity to obtain other counsel if the client so desires. See Rule 1.0(j). The information that a lawyer is required to communicate to a client depends on the nature of the conflict and the nature of the risks involved, and a lawyer should take into account the sophistication of the client in explaining the potential adverse consequences of the conflict. . . .

11. We conclude that the conflict of interest arising from the broker/associate's referral of a matter to the inquirer is consentable under these circumstances, and thus Rule 1.7 permits the conflict to be waived by the client if the lawyer obtains the client's informed consent, confirmed in writing, per Rule 1.7(b)(4).

CONCLUSION:

12. A lawyer may accept real estate clients referred by an associate in the lawyer's firm who is also a licensed real estate broker, provided the lawyer does not share legal fees or real estate commissions with the broker/associate and the lawyer obtains the client's informed consent, confirmed in writing.

OPINION 1274 (09/12/2024)

TOPIC: Conflicts of interest, former clients, government lawyers

DIGEST: A lawyer employed in the counsel's office of a state agency would not have a conflict in representing the agency in an enforcement action against a client the lawyer had formerly represented in private practice unless the lawyer would normally be expected to have acquired confidential information in the course of the lawyer's prior representation that was material to the enforcement action. If there were a conflict, the conflict would be imputed to the counsel's office, and screening would not suffice to avoid imputation, absent consent of the former client.

RULES: Rules 1.6(a), 1.9(b)-(c), 1.10(a) & (e), 1.11(d)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is employed in the counsel's office of a state agency that licenses certain categories of health care providers. Prior to beginning employment at the agency in 2022, the inquirer was in private practice in a law firm that represented a client that is licensed by the agency to provide certain health care services. The same client also provides other services that are not licensed by the agency. The law firm's representation of the client was primarily conducted by another lawyer, but the inquirer was brought in for two of the client's matters: a discrimination complaint by an employee in a facility that is not licensed by the state agency; and a coverage dispute with an insurer pertaining to a claim of abuse by an employee in one of the client's facilities that is also not licensed by the state agency.

2. Recently, the inquirer learned that his agency-employer is considering bringing an enforcement action against the inquirer's former client over a range of deficiencies in the client's licensed facilities, including staffing deficiencies, failure to report incidents, renovations conducted without the required inspection by the agency, and improper treatment practices. The inquirer asks whether he may work on the matter or instead must be screened from it.

QUESTIONS:

3. Does a lawyer currently employed by a state agency have a conflict of interest in working on an enforcement action against a client that the lawyer previously represented in private practice?

4. If the lawyer does have a conflict, is the conflict imputed to the other lawyers in the office of the state agency in which the lawyer works?

OPINION:

5. This inquiry is governed by Rule 1.9 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"), and in particular by Rule 1.9(b), which provides:

> (b) Unless the former client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing, a lawyer shall not knowingly represent a person in the same or a substantially related matter in which a firm with which the lawyer formerly was associated had previously represented a client: (1) whose interests are materially adverse to that person; and (2) about > whom the lawyer had acquired information protected by Rules 1.6 or paragraph (c) of this Rule that is material to the matter.

6. The term "firm," which appears in Rule 1.9(b), is defined in Rule 1.0(h) to include "lawyers employed in a . . . government law office, or the legal department of a corporation or other organization"). Notably, Rule 1.9(c), which is also referred to in the quoted excerpt from paragraph (b), in most circumstances bars a lawyer who formerly represented a client, or whose law firm formerly represented a client, from using confidential information of the client protected by Rule 1.6 adverse to the former client or from revealing such information. Thus, we need to turn to Rule 1.6 to understand Rule 1.9.

7. Rule 1.6(a) prohibits a lawyer from knowingly revealing "confidential information" or using it to the disadvantage of the client or for the advantage of the lawyer, unless the client gives informed consent. Rule 1.6 defines the term "confidential information" as follows:

> "Confidential information" consists of information gained during or relating to the representation of a client, whatever its source, that is (a) protected by the attorney-client privilege, (b) likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed, or (c) information that the client has requested be kept confidential. "Confidential information" does not ordinarily include (i) a lawyer's legal knowledge or legal research or (ii) information that is generally known in the local community or in the trade, field or profession to which the information relates.

8. Under Rule 1.9(b), the inquirer would have a conflict only if he or his prior firm had represented the client in a matter that was substantially related to the potential enforcement action and the lawyer had acquired confidential information that was material to the new matter. Comment [3] to Rule 1.9 explains that "[m]atters are substantially related for purposes of this Rule if they involve the same transaction or legal dispute or if, under the circumstances, a reasonable lawyer would conclude that there is otherwise a substantial risk that confidential factual information that would normally have been obtained in the prior representation would materially advance the client's position in the subsequent matter." Thus, whether or not the inquirer actually obtained material confidential information during the prior representation, a conflict arises under Rule 1.9 if he would normally have obtained such information during the prior representation, because in that instance the prior and current matters would be "substantially related."

9. Comment [3] notes, as an example of a substantially related matter, that "a lawyer who has represented a businessperson and learned extensive private financial information about that person may not then represent that person's spouse in seeking a divorce." By contrast, Comment [3] says that "a lawyer who has previously represented a client in securing environmental permits to build a shopping center . . . would not be precluded, on the grounds of substantial relationship, from defending a tenant of the completed shopping center in resisting eviction for nonpayment of rent." Further, "[i]n the case of an organizational client, general knowledge of the client's policies and practices ordinarily will not preclude a subsequent representation. On the other hand, knowledge of specific facts gained in a prior representation that are relevant to the matter in question ordinarily will preclude such representation." (Emphasis added.) Comment [3] also notes that "[i]nformation acquired in a prior representation may have been rendered obsolete by the passage of time."

10. In this case, the inquirer will need to determine whether confidential information that a lawyer would "normally" have acquired in the course of handling a discrimination complaint or an insurance coverage dispute of the kind that he handled – in each case in a facility that was not covered by the agency license at issue – would materially advance the agency's position in the potential enforcement action against the former client. The inquirer would need to make the same determination with respect to any confidential information that he acquired about other matters handled by the firm even if he did not work on them (e.g., if he had been consulted about them, discussed them informally, or overheard other lawyers discussing them). The fact that the matters concerned different facilities than those that would be the subject of the enforcement action would be relevant but not necessarily dispositive. For example, a conflict would exist under Rule 1.9 if the inquirer learned facts touching on the challenged practices that were applicable to both the licensed and other facilities. The passage of time may also be relevant, so it is relevant when the challenged practices arose in relation to the time period addressed in the discrimination and coverage disputes, and whether information from that time period is still current.

11. If the inquirer concludes that he has a conflict arising out the prior representation, he would be barred from representing the agency in the potential enforcement action unless he received the informed consent of the former client.

12. If the inquirer has a conflict, then the conflict would be imputed to the other lawyers in the agency counsel's office under Rule 1.10. Rule 1.10(a) provides:

> (a) While lawyers are associated in a firm, none of them shall knowingly represent a client when any one of them practicing alone would be prohibited from doing so by Rule . . . 1.9, except as otherwise provided therein.

Rule 1.10(d) provides that the imputed disqualification can be waived by the former client. Screening alone would not suffice to cure the imputed disqualification except as a condition of consent. N.Y. State 1186 ¶ 26 (2020) ("Firewalls and screens cannot prevent imputation of a conflict under Rule 1.10(a)" unless the Rules provide otherwise).

13. Rules 1.9, and the imputation of Rule 1.9 conflicts under Rule 1.10, apply to current government lawyers as they do to lawyers in a private firm. Comment [9B] to Rule 1.11 states:

> Where a government law office's representation is materially adverse to a government lawyer's former private client, . . . the representation would, absent informed consent of the former client, . . . be prohibited by Rule 1.9. Rule 1.10 remains applicable to that former client so as to impute the conflict to all lawyers associated in the same government law office.

14. We note that under the ABA Model Rules of Professional Conduct, upon which the New York Rules are in many respects based, imputation pursuant to Rule 1.10 does not apply to current government lawyers. ABA Model Rule 1.10(e) ("The disqualification of lawyers associated in a firm with former or current government lawyers is governed by Rule 1.11."); ABA Model Rule 1.11, Cmt. [2] ("Because of the special problems raised by imputation within a government agency, paragraph (d) [of Rule 1.11, which addresses conflicts of a current government lawyer] does not impute the conflicts of a lawyer currently serving as an officer or employee of the government to other associate government officers or employees, although ordinarily it will be prudent to screen such lawyers.").

15. In 2008, when the New York State Bar Association proposed to the New York Courts that New York adopt what became the current New York Rules, the State Bar proposed that Rule 1.10 would not apply to government law offices. See New York State Bar Association, Proposed New York Rules of Professional Conduct, Rule 1.10(e) ("The disqualification of lawyers associated in a firm with former or current government lawyers is governed by Rule 1.11."), Rule 1.11(d)(1) ("Except as law may otherwise expressly provide, a lawyer currently serving as a public officer or employee: (1) shall comply with Rules 1.7 and 1.9 but is not subject to Rule 1.10 . . . .") & Rule 1.11(e) (providing for imputed disqualification in government law offices unless screening is put in place) (Feb. 1, 2008).[2] The Courts did not adopt those proposed provisions, and the State Bar revised the Comments to conform to the black letter text as adopted by the Courts. In revising the Comments, the State Bar promulgated Comment [9B], which, as quoted above, states that conflicts under Rule 1.9 are imputed to lawyers in a government law office as they would be in a private law office.[3]

16. We recognize that the imputation of former-client conflicts to government law offices may present serious difficulties for government agencies, and that agencies will often find it impossible to obtain consent from the particular lawyer's former client. A separate conflict rule in Rule 1.11(d)(1) that bars a government lawyer who has participated in a matter personally and substantially while in private practice from participating in the same matter at the government agency, but conflicts arising under subparagraph (d)(1) are not imputed to the government law office, which contains a "rule of necessity" that states that the disqualification is overridden where "under applicable law no one is, or by lawful delegation may be, authorized to act in the lawyer's stead in the matter." See Rule 1.11, Cmts. [9A] & [9B] (describing non-imputation and the rule of necessity); N.Y. State 1029 ¶¶ 5-10, 19-26 (2014) (outlining differences between Rule 1.9 conflicts and Rule 1.11(d)(1) conflicts). Neither Rule 1.9 nor Rule 1.10 contains a similar rule of necessity. Whether such a rule of necessity overriding Rule 1.9 conflicts and imputation of those conflicts can be derived from sources outside the Rules of Professional Conduct is a question of law on which we do not opine.

CONCLUSION:

17. A lawyer employed in the counsel's office of a state agency would not have a conflict representing the agency in an enforcement action against a client the lawyer had formerly represented in private practice unless the lawyer would normally be expected to have acquired confidential information in the course of the lawyer's prior representation that was material to the enforcement action. If there were a conflict, the conflict would be imputed to the counsel's office, and screening would not suffice to avoid imputation, absent consent of the former client.

OPINION 1275 (10/23/2024)

TOPIC: Disciplinary Authority and Choice of Law; Immigration Practice

DIGEST: A lawyer admitted to practice in New York who principally practices before federal immigration courts in another state must comply with any reporting obligations in that state's Rules of Professional Conduct.

RULES: 8.3(a), 8.5(a) & (b)

FACTS:

1. The Inquirer is admitted to practice in New York State (State A) but principally practices before federal immigration courts in a different state (State B). While working on a client's matter, the Inquirer became aware that another attorney who is admitted in a third state (State C) has potentially violated the Rules of Professional Conduct in a matter that is not in connection with a proceeding in a court.

QUESTION:

2. Does the Inquirer have an obligation to report another attorney's potential violation of the Rules of Professional Conduct?

OPINION:

3. The Inquirer requests guidance regarding his obligations under the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules").

4. Rule 8.3(a) states that a "lawyer who knows that another lawyer has committed a violation of the Rules of Professional Conduct that raises a substantial question as to that lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness as a lawyer shall report such knowledge to a tribunal or other authority empowered to investigate or act upon such violation." The question is whether the New York Rules of Professional Conduct apply to the Inquirer, given that he is also admitted to practice in State B and principally practices in State B. The answer to this question is governed by Rule 8.5 ("Disciplinary Authority and Choice of Law").

5. In N.Y. State 1058 ¶ 6 (2015), which addressed an inquiry from a lawyer admitted solely in New York but is authorized by federal law to practice immigration law in another state, we said:

> Under Rule 8.5(a), a lawyer admitted in New York is subject to the disciplinary authority of this state no matter where the lawyer's conduct occurs — but that does not necessarily mean that the New York Rules will apply. Rather, the rules of conduct that a New York disciplinary authority will apply will depend on the choice of law rules set forth in Rule 8.5(b). . . .

6. Rule 8.5(b) provides:

> (b) In any exercise of the disciplinary authority of this state, the rules of professional conduct to be applied shall be as follows:
>
> > (1) For conduct in connection with a proceeding in a court before which a lawyer has been admitted to practice (either generally or for purposes of that proceeding), the rules to be applied shall be the rules of the jurisdiction in which the court sits, unless the rules of the court provide otherwise; and
> > (2) For any other conduct:
> >
> > > (i) If the lawyer is licensed to practice only in this state, the rules to be applied shall be the rules of this state, and
> > > (ii) If the lawyer is licensed to practice in this state and another jurisdiction, the rules to be applied shall be the rules of the admitting jurisdiction in which the lawyer principally practices; provided, however, that if particular conduct clearly has its predominant effect in another jurisdiction in which the lawyer is licensed to practice, the rules of that jurisdiction shall be applied to that conduct.

7. Any obligation to report the potential violation described by the inquirer does not relate to "conduct in connection with a proceeding in a court" under Rule 8.5(b)(1), so the matter is governed by Rule 8.5(b)(2), which applies to "any other conduct."

8. The inquirer is formally admitted to practice solely in New York, which might seem to indicate that Rule 8.5(b)(2)(i) applies – but N.Y. State 1058 (2015) noted that "if a New York lawyer is permitted to engage in conduct in another jurisdiction without being formally admitted in that jurisdiction, the lawyer should be deemed to be 'licensed to practice' in the other jurisdiction . . . ." We will assume for purposes of this opinion that the Inquirer is permitted to practice in federal immigration courts in State B, and is therefore deemed licensed to practice in State B. When a lawyer is licensed to practice law "in this state and another jurisdiction," Rule 8.5(b)(2)(ii) applies. See also N.Y. State 1054 (2015), N.Y. State 1042 (2014), N.Y. State 1041 (2014), and N.Y. State 815 (2007) (all applying this principle).".

9. The inquirer practices "almost exclusively" in State B before federal immigration courts. Therefore, under Rule 8.5(b)(2)(ii), State B is the jurisdiction in which the inquirer "principally practices" and we believe that the State B's Rules of Professional Conduct will govern the inquirer's reporting obligations if a New York disciplinary authority examines the inquirer's conduct. See N.Y. State 750 (2001) ("Because the attorney [who represents individuals in immigration matters] is admitted to practice in New York and Illinois, and the jurisdiction in which the attorney principally practices is Illinois, the ethics rules of Illinois are applicable to the inquirer's question").

10. The inquirer's conduct could, however, also be examined by the disciplinary authorities in State A and State B because, as New York Rule 8.5(a) states: "A lawyer may be subject to the disciplinary authority of both this state and another jurisdiction where the lawyer is admitted for the same conduct." Whether the ethics rules of federal immigration courts or any other jurisdiction's Rules of Professional Conduct require the Inquirer to report the potential violation is a question beyond our jurisdiction on which we offer no opinion. See, e.g., N.Y. State 1058 ¶ 8 ("We do not opine on the specific ethical obligations governing immigration lawyers").

CONCLUSION:

11. A lawyer admitted to practice in New York who principally practices before federal immigration courts in another state must comply with any reporting obligations in that state's Rules of Professional Conduct.

OPINION 1276 (10/23/2024)

TOPIC: Fake social media accounts offering legal services

DIGEST: A lawyer who knows that an unknown or unidentified person is creating fake social media accounts in order to scam the public has no duty under the Rules of Professional Conduct to take any action to combat the fake accounts.

RULES: 3.3(a)(3) & (b), 8.3(a), and 8.4(a)-(c)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer ("Inquirer"), an immigration lawyer, maintains a social media account. On this account Inquirer creates and posts videos explaining various aspects of the immigration process. However, certain unknown imposters and scammers have used Inquirer's name, photo, and immigration videos to create fake accounts on the same social media platform. People who see the videos posted on a fake account may be tricked into paying supposed legal fees to the person operating the fake account, thinking they are retaining Inquirer, but the fake accounts provide no legal services (or any other services), so the would-be clients lose their money. Inquirer does not know who these imposters and scammers are but he has reported these fake accounts to the social media platform and has asked the platform to remove them. So far, the platform has not removed or blocked the fake posts or fake accounts.

2. Inquirer has created and posted videos on his own social media page warning prospective clients not to fall for scams like the fake accounts, but he wants to know if he must take additional action.

QUESTION:

3. Does a lawyer have any ethical obligations with regard to fake social media accounts in which scammers use the lawyer's social media videos to attract clients?

OPINION:

4. We first consider whether Inquirer is engaging in any affirmative misconduct. Rule 8.4 ("Misconduct") provides, in pertinent part, that a lawyer or law firm "shall not":

> (a) violate or attempt to violate the Rules of Professional Conduct, knowingly assist or induce another to do so, or do so through the acts of another;
> (b) engage in illegal conduct that adversely reflects on the lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness as a lawyer;
> (c) engage in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation . . . .

5. The Inquirer is not doing any of these things. Instead, he is the victim of misconduct by others (who may not even be lawyers), and those others – over Inquirer's objection – are engaging in improper conduct. Far from assisting or inducing the scammers to engage in this conduct, Inquirer is trying to impede or stop the scammers and to warn the public about them. He therefore is not violating Rule 8.4(a)-(c).

6. We next consider whether Inquirer is engaging in misconduct by failing to take more robust action to counteract or stop the fake accounts. Only a few provisions in the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") require a lawyer to report misconduct. In our view, these provisions do not apply here.

7. Rule 3.3(a)(3) provides that lawyers who come to know that they have offered false material evidence to a tribunal must "take reasonable remedial measures, including, if necessary, disclosure to the tribunal." This provision does not apply here because Inquirer has not offered the fake videos (the false evidence) to a tribunal.

8. Rule 3.3(b) provides that lawyers who represent a client before a tribunal and who know that a person "intends to engage, is engaging or has engaged in criminal or fraudulent conduct related to the proceeding" must "take reasonable remedial measures, including, if necessary, disclosure to the tribunal." The Inquirer here knows that some unidentified "person" is engaging or has engaged in criminal or fraudulent conduct, but Rule 3.3(b) does not apply because that criminal or fraudulent conduct is not related to any pending "proceeding."

9. Rule 8.3(a) provides that a lawyer who "knows that another lawyer has committed a violation of the Rules of Professional Conduct that raises a substantial question as to that lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness as a lawyer shall report such knowledge to a tribunal or other authority empowered to investigate or act upon such violation." This provision does not apply here because the Inquirer does not know whether any person creating fake social media accounts is a lawyer.

10. Thus, the three provisions of the Rules of Professional Conduct we have identified that require a lawyer to report various kinds of misconduct do not apply to the situation here. Likewise, no other provision in the Rules would require Inquirer to take action to combat the fake social media accounts at issue here.

CONCLUSION:

11. A lawyer who knows that some unknown or unidentified person is creating fake social media accounts in order to scam the public has no duty under the Rules of Professional Conduct to take any action to combat the fake accounts.

OPINION 1277 (11/26/2024)

TOPIC: Crowdfunding on behalf of indigent clients

DIGEST: A non-profit criminal defense organization may set up and administer GoFundMe pages for the benefit of indigent current clients, provided that the financial assistance is rendered as gifts, not loans, and the financial assistance does not promise financial assistance prior to retention or as an inducement to continue the lawyer-client relationship.

RULES: 1.6(a), 1.8(e)(4), & 1.9(c)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer works for a non-profit indigent criminal defense organization. The organization's clients include incarcerated individuals who will have no financial resources when released. The inquirer has submitted this inquiry on behalf of the non-profit organization.

QUESTION:

2. May a non-profit legal defense organization set up and administer GoFundMe pages intended to help the organization's indigent clients raise funds from the public to cover their living expenses upon release from incarceration?

OPINION:

How GoFundMe operates

3. GoFundMe is a for-profit crowdfunding platform that seeks donations to enable individuals or groups to raise funds either for registered 501(c)(3) charities or for private causes. Donations sent to a GoFundMe page may be transferred either to the person setting up the page or to a beneficiary. GoFundMe charges no fee to set up a GoFundMe page, but GoFundMe automatically deducts a standard transaction fee (2.9% + $0.30) from each donation.

4. As a threshold matter, this Committee does not opine on issues of law and expresses no opinion on the legality or implications of the proposed GoFundMe activity under the Internal Revenue Code or other applicable law.

Rule 1.8(e): Financial assistance to indigent clients

5. Until 2020, Rule 1.8(e) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") (and the Code of Professional Responsibility before that) generally prohibited lawyers from advancing or guaranteeing financial assistance (such as living expenses or medical expenses) to a client in connection with contemplated or pending litigation unless certain exceptions applied. On June 24, 2020, however, the Appellate Divisions approved new Rule 1.8(e)(4), which allows lawyers to provide financial assistance to indigent clients under specific conditions.

6. Rule 1.8(e), which states the general rule, provides that a lawyer "shall not advance or guarantee financial assistance to a client" unless one of four exceptions applies. Regarding the instant inquiry, which is from a non-profit criminal defense organization, we believe that the exception stated in Rule 1.8(e)(4) applies. Rule 1.8(e)(4) states:

> (e) While representing a client in connection with contemplated or pending litigation, a lawyer shall not advance or guarantee financial assistance to the client, except that:
> > (4) a lawyer providing legal services without fee, a not-for-profit legal services or public interest organization, or a law school clinical or pro bono program, may provide financial assistance to indigent clients but may not promise or assure financial assistance prior to retention, or as an inducement to continue the lawyer-client relationship. Funds raised for any legal services or public interest organization for purposes of providing legal services will not be considered useable for providing financial assistance to indigent clients, and financial assistance referenced in this subsection may not include loans or any other form of support that causes the client to be financially beholden to the provider of the assistance.

7. Rule 1.8(e)(4) – often called the "humanitarian exception" – thus expressly applies to a "not-for-profit legal services or public interest organization" that is serving indigent clients and is "providing legal services without fee." Financial assistance to clients under the humanitarian exception must not come from "[f]unds raised for any legal services" and must be in the form of gifts, not "loans." Thus, so long as the funds raised on the GoFundMe page are disbursed as outright gifts to indigent clients, the inquirer may administer the proposed GoFundMe page as described in the inquiry. See generally, Simon's New York Rules of Professional Conduct Annotated § 1.8:76 (Thomson Reuters, 24th ed. 2024) (phrase-by-phrase analysis of the "humanitarian exception" to the general rule against financial assistance to litigation clients).

8. Comment [10A] to Rule 1.8, which the New York State Bar Association added to the Comments in 2020 to explain the "humanitarian exception," elaborates on Rule 1.8(e)(4) as follows:

> Subparagraph (e)(4) allows lawyers providing legal services "without fee," not-for-profit legal services and public interest organizations, and law school clinical and pro bono programs, to provide financial assistance (beyond court costs and expenses of litigation) to indigent clients in connection with contemplated or pending litigation. Examples of financial assistance permitted under subparagraph (e)(4) include payments to cover food, rent, clothing, personal incidentals, and medicine. If financial assistance may have adverse consequences for the client, including, e.g., for receipt of government benefits, receipt of social services, or tax liability, the lawyer should consult with the client about these consequences. See Rule 1.4(b) ("A lawyer shall explain a matter to the extent reasonably necessary to permit the client to make informed decisions regarding the representation"). Subparagraph (e)(4) does not permit lawyers, organizations, or programs to provide financial assistance beyond court costs and expenses of litigation to clients who are not indigent.

Duty of confidentiality to current and former clients

9. The lawyers in the inquiring criminal defense organization should also be mindful to comply with the Rules governing confidentiality when administering the GoFundMe page. Rule 1.6(a) prohibits a lawyer from knowingly revealing "confidential information" or using it to the disadvantage of the client or for the advantage of the lawyer, unless the client gives informed consent. Rule 1.6 defines the term "confidential information" as follows:

> "Confidential information" consists of information gained during or relating to the representation of a client, whatever its source, that is (a) protected by the attorney-client privilege, (b) likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed, or (c) information that the client has requested be kept confidential. "Confidential information" does not ordinarily include (i) a lawyer's legal knowledge or legal research or (ii) information that is generally known in the local community or in the trade, field or profession to which the information relates.

10. Thus, unless a client gives informed consent (or some other exception to the duty of confidentiality applies, which we doubt is the case here), the lawyers in the organization must take care to ensure that no information is included on the GoFundMe that is likely to be "embarrassing" or "detrimental" to the client, or that could waive the attorney-client privilege, or that the client has requested be kept confidential.

11. Moreover, if the inquiring organization's indigent clients become former clients upon release from incarceration (or at some other point), we caution that Rule 1.9(c) imposes a duty of confidentiality on lawyers toward former clients similar to that imposed by Rule 1.6 toward current clients.

Prohibition against promising financial assistance

12. Finally, under the express language of Rule 1.8(e)(4), the inquiring organization "may not promise or assure financial assistance [via the GoFundMe page] prior to retention" by an indigent client and may not promise such financial assistance "as an inducement to continue the lawyer-client relationship" after the organization is retained. These twin prohibitions seem unlikely to come into play here, given that the inquiring organization does not charge any fees for providing legal services, but these prohibitions are written into subparagraph (e)(4) so we mention them here as a precaution.

CONCLUSION:

13. A non-profit criminal defense organization may set up and administer GoFundMe pages for the benefit of indigent current clients, provided that the financial assistance is rendered as gifts, not loans, and the financial assistance does not promise financial assistance prior to retention or as an inducement to continue the lawyer-client relationship.

OPINION 1278 (02/05/2025)

TOPIC: Disclosure of prior relationship with witness.

DIGEST: Under Rule 3.8(b), a prosecutor is required to timely disclose her past romantic relationship with a law enforcement officer in any case where the officer is to be a witness whose testimony could be subject to challenge. Rules 3.3(a)(1) and 3.4(a)(3) may also be implicated if New York's discovery law requires disclosure of the past romantic relationship. Whether a lawyer's past romantic relationship with a witness implicates a personal interest that would create a "significant risk" of adversely affecting the lawyer's judgment within the meaning of Rule 1.7(a)(2) depends on the facts and circumstances of that prior relationship and its likely impact on the objectivity and conduct of the lawyer in question.

RULES: 1.7(a)(2) & (b), 3.3(a)(1), 3.4(a)(3), and 3.8(b).

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a prosecutor who had a romantic relationship with a member of law enforcement. That relationship ended years ago and the law enforcement officer moved away – but now the law enforcement officer has now returned to the jurisdiction where the prosecutor works, and he may become a witness in one of the prosecutor's cases. They were not in a relationship during any ongoing cases. The inquirer wants to know if she is ethically required to disclose the former relationship.

QUESTION:

2. Must a prosecutor, who was in a now-ended relationship with a witness, disclose the former relationship?

OPINION:

3. Rule 3.8 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") sets out "special" ethical responsibilities that apply to prosecutors and other government lawyers in criminal cases. Relevant to the current inquiry, Rule 3.8(b) requires that:

> A prosecutor or other government lawyer in criminal litigation shall make timely disclosure to counsel for the defendant or to a defendant who has no counsel of the existence of evidence or information known to the prosecutor or other government lawyer that tends to negate the guilt of the accused, mitigate the degree of the offense, or reduce the sentence, except when relieved of this responsibility by a protective order of a tribunal. [Emphasis added.]

Information that "tends to negate the guilt of the accused" includes information that could be used to impeach the credibility of a prosecution witness by exposing the bias of a witness whose testimony could be subject to challenge by the defense. See California Rules of Professional Conduct, Rule 3.8 Cmt. [3] (disclosure of exculpatory evidence includes, "at a minimum, the duty to disclose impeachment evidence"); cf. N.Y. City 2016-3, n. 12 ("Evidence or information that would be useful solely to impeach a witness will not invariably 'tend to negate the guilt of the accused'"); see also Giglio v. United States, 405 U.S. 150, 154 (1972) (evidence that tends to negate the guilt of the accused includes impeachment evidence); People v. Steadman, 82 N.Y.2d 1, 7 (1993) ("The prosecutor's duty is not lessened because Brady material may affect only the credibility of the witness")[1]. Because the law enforcement officer's prior romantic relationship with the prosecutor could make him a biased witness in favor of the prosecution, defense counsel could use that prior relationship to impeach the witness's credibility by exposing the witness's potential bias. As such, the inquirer has a duty to timely disclose that prior relationship whenever the witness's testimony could be subject to challenge.

4. Moreover, although answering questions of law is beyond the jurisdiction of this committee, it is important to note that New York's criminal discovery statute expressly requires prosecutors to timely disclose "all evidence and information . . . that tends to: . . . impeach the credibility of a testifying prosecution witness," C.P.L. 245.20(k)(iv), and to then certify to the court that the prosecutors have complied with their discovery obligations. C.P.L. 245.50(1). Since a prosecution witness's former romantic relationship with the prosecutor could be used to impeach the credibility of that witness by exposing his potential bias, a prosecutor's failure to disclose the existence of that relationship could run afoul of the prosecutor's statutory discovery obligations. If non-disclosure does indeed violate the law, then that non-disclosure could, in turn, run afoul of the prosecutor's ethical obligations under Rule 3.3(a)(1) to avoid making false statements to a tribunal and the prosecutor's obligations under Rule 3.4(a)(3) to disclose "that which the lawyer is required by law to reveal."

5. In addition to the disclosure obligations discussed above, the inquirer must also consider whether her handling of a case where a former romantic partner would be a witness would create a personal interest conflict. Rule 1.7(a)(2) generally prohibits a lawyer from representing a client "if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that…there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests." (Emphasis added.) Notwithstanding the existence of such an interest, Rule 1.7(b)(1) nonetheless permits the lawyer to represent a client if:

> (1) the lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client;
> (2) the representation is not prohibited by law;
> (3) the representation does not involve the assertion of a claim by one client against another client represented by the lawyer in the same litigation or other proceeding before a tribunal; and

1 Notably, both the Association of the Bar of the City of New York and the American Bar Association Standing Committee on Ethics and Professional Responsibility have concluded that Rule 3.8 is not simply an ethical codification of Brady and its progeny. See N.Y. City 2016-3; ABA 09-454 (2009) (both noting that Brady's materiality requirement and Brady's timing requirements appear to differ from the plain language of Rule 3.8).

(4) each affected client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing.

6. Whether a lawyer's prior romantic relationship with a witness implicates a personal interest that would create a "significant risk" of affecting the lawyer's judgment depends on facts and circumstances of that prior relationship and its likely effect on the conduct and objectivity of the lawyer. See N.Y. State 1255 (2023) (concluding that where defense attorney was in current romantic relationship with a county deputy sheriff who was a "supporting officer" in one of the attorney's cases, the attorney must determine if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that there is a significant risk that the attorney's independent professional judgment on behalf of the client will be adversely affected.) For example, if the prosecutor holds significant hostility towards the witness (e.g., if the relationship did not end well) such that the prosecutor's in-court interactions with the witness would be substantively affected or her desire to settle the case to avoid interaction with the witness would be increased, then it could be reasonably concluded that there is a significant risk that the lawyer's personal interest will adversely impact her representation. It is for the inquirer, who is aware of the totality of the circumstances, to determine whether a reasonable lawyer would conclude that there is a significant risk that the attorney's judgment would be affected by the prior relationship.

7. If the inquirer concludes that there is such a risk that her judgment would be adversely affected by the prior relationship, she then must determine whether she reasonably believes that she can still provide competent and diligent representation, see Rule 1.7(b)(1), and whether she can otherwise comply with the requirements of Rule 1.7(b), including obtaining the informed consent of the client, confirmed in writing, per Rule 1.7(b)(4). See N.Y. State 1255.

CONCLUSION:

8. Under Rule 3.8(b), a prosecutor is required to timely disclose her past romantic relationship with a law enforcement officer in any case where the officer is to be a witness whose testimony could be subject to challenge. Rules 3.3(a)(1) and 3.4(a)(3) may also be implicated if New York's discovery law requires disclosure of the past romantic relationship. Whether a lawyer's past romantic relationship with a witness implicates a personal interest that would create a "significant risk" of adversely affecting the lawyer's judgment within the meaning of Rule 1.7(a)(2) depends on the facts and circumstances of that prior relationship and its likely impact on the objectivity and conduct of the lawyer in question.

OPINION 1279 (02/18/2025)

TOPIC: Prohibited referral fees

DIGEST: A promise by a lawyer to pay a nonlawyer referrer to perform "administrative" work in connection with each matter referred to the lawyer constitutes a thing of "value" as compensation for or as a reward for a referral and thus violates Rule 7.2(a).

RULES: 7.2(a)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer represents medical providers in arbitration proceedings against insurance carriers. The medical providers in these arbitrations are disputing claim denials by the insurance carriers. When a matter settles or the inquirer's client prevails, the inquirer is paid by the insurance carrier.

2. The inquirer's friends and family have offered to refer medical providers to him if the inquirer pays them a fee for the referrals. In response to such offers, the inquirer proposes to pay the referring individuals a flat fee for "administrative, non-attorney related work" by the referring individuals whether or not the inquirer is eventually paid by the insurance carrier. The work by the referring individuals would include their completion and online filing of an arbitration request form for each matter that they refer to the inquirer. (We understand that completing and filing arbitration requests may lawfully be done by a person other than the inquirer and may be done by a non-lawyer.)

QUESTION:

3. May the inquirer pay a flat fee for "administrative, non-attorney related work" (such as completing and filing arbitration forms) to non-attorney individuals who refer a medical provider to the inquirer that the inquirer eventually secures as a client?

OPINION:

4. Rule 7.2(a) of the Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") states that "[a] lawyer shall not compensate or give anything of value to a person or organization to recommend or obtain employment by a client, or as a reward for having made a recommendation resulting in employment by a client." Comment [1] to Rule 7.2 amplifies this basic prohibition: "Lawyers are not permitted to pay others for channeling professional work." The only exceptions to Rule 7.2(a) appear in Rules 1.5(g) and 5.8, which are inapplicable here. In short, Rule 7.2(a) forbids payment to anyone who refers a potential client to a lawyer if the payment is a quid pro quo for referring the client. See N.Y. State 1014, ¶6 (2014) (The vice that these rules address is the payment to what have been described as "touts," runners" and "ambulance chasers.").

5. The Inquirer's proposal to compensate referrers by paying them a flat fee payment for completing and filing a form requesting arbitration (and/or other administrative filings) on behalf of the referred client would run afoul of Rule 7.2(a) because such paid work would be a thing of "value" within the meaning of the Rule. In our view, paying a referrer with an opportunity for paid work is as much a thing of value as a direct payment for the referral.

6. To elaborate, the paid work that the inquirer would like to promise to referrers is a "reward" to referrers for delivering clients to the attorney. It is thus "compensation" and a thing "of value" and is equivalent to a payment for a referral, which is prohibited by Rule 7.2(a). See N.Y. State 1237 ¶13 (2022) ("In exchange for the real estate broker's referrals, the inquirer proposes to provide the real estate broker with the ability to charge the clients who hire the inquirer a lower commission without a corresponding reduction in the amount the broker will earn as a commission. Because this ability to charge a lower commission constitutes 'something of value' that is given in exchange for a referral, the arrangement would violate Rule 7.2(a)."). We think the arrangement proposed by the inquirer here is analogous to the arrangement we said was prohibited by Rule 7.2(a) in N.Y. State 1237, so we reach the same conclusion.

CONCLUSION:

7. A promise by a lawyer to pay a nonlawyer referrer to perform "administrative" work in connection with each matter referred to the lawyer constitutes a thing of "value" as compensation for or as a reward for a referral, and thus violates Rule 7.2(a).

OPINION 1280 (03/31/2025)

TOPIC: Conflicts of interest, class actions

DIGEST: Under the New York Rules of Professional Conduct a lawyer may in some circumstances proceed pro se while also representing individual co-plaintiffs or co-defendants in the same matter. But whether a lawyer could proceed pro se as a class representative and also represent the class is a question that is governed by class action law and not by the Rules of Professional Conduct, and thus is a question that is beyond this Committee's jurisdiction.

RULES: Rule 1.7

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is considering commencing a class action lawsuit against New York State in which the class would consist of every registered attorney in the State. He asks whether he could act as both the named plaintiff and counsel for the class, noting that every New York attorney would participate in any recovery obtained if the action were successful.

QUESTION:

2. May a lawyer simultaneously be both a named plaintiff and counsel for the class in a class action?

OPINION:

3. For the most part, this question is governed not by the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"), but by class action law, and thus is beyond our jurisdiction.

4. In non-class actions, there is no per se bar under the Rules to a lawyer proceeding pro se and representing a co-party with aligned interests. For example, subject to any applicable court rules, one spouse might appear pro se and represent the other spouse in an action in which the two act as co-plaintiffs or co-defendants with respect to a claim by or against both. Or one neighbor might proceed pro se and represent other neighbors in a lawsuit concerning a common threat to the neighborhood.[2]

5. Under Rule 1.7(a), a lawyer both representing a client and proceeding pro se in the same action will often have a personal conflict of interest, in that there would be "a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests." For example, a particular litigation strategy might advance one client's interests more than another client's interests, or a settlement might be in the interests of some clients but not others. Under Rule 1.7(b), however, a conflict arising under Rule 1.7(a) can be waived in most cases if the lawyer "reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client . . . [and] each affected client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing."

2 The right of an individual to proceed pro se is protected by statute. See, 28 U.S.C. §1654 ("In all courts of the United States the parties may plead and conduct their own cases personally or by counsel as, by the rules of such courts, respectively, are permitted to manage and conduct causes therein."); N.Y. CPLR § 321 ("A party . . . may prosecute or defend a civil action in person or by attorney, except that a corporation or voluntary association shall appear by attorney . . . ."). The terms under which a lawyer may represent a client in a matter in which the lawyer has a personal interest are addressed by the Rules.

6. But courts and commentators widely recognize that lawyers' duties to class members are not governed entirely by the Rules.[3] On many issues, the ethics rules provide limited guidance and courts resolve questions by reference to class action law.[4] Whether a lawyer would be permitted to act as a named plaintiff and also represent the class is thus largely, if not entirely, governed by class action law, not by the Rules.

7. We note that some courts have held that, under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 23, a lawyer is prohibited from representing a class in which the lawyer is a class representative.[5] Our jurisdiction is limited to interpreting the Rules, however, and we cannot opine on matters arising under class action law.

CONCLUSION:

8. Under the Rules a lawyer may in some circumstances proceed pro se in a matter where the lawyer also represents co-plaintiffs or co-defendants. But whether a lawyer could proceed pro se as a class representative and also represent the class is a question that is governed by class action law and not the Rules, and thus is a question that is beyond this Committee's jurisdiction.

Moore, Ethical Duties of Class Counsel Also Representing Class Representatives, 72 FLA. L. REV. FORUM 160, 166 (2020-2022) (noting that "the rules of professional conduct do not currently provide adequate protection for the class" and discussing the courts' duties to monitor the adequacy of representation as part of the class action lawsuit); Eli Wald, Class Actions' Ethical "KISS": The Class Action Lawyer's Client Is the Class, 74 HASTINGS L.J. 1433, 1458 (2023) (noting that "[t]he Model Rules fail to offer a consistent, clear answer to the fundamental question of whom class counsel represents" . . . and that "[f]or some purposes, courts follow the Model Rules; for many others, they do not").

4 See, e.g., N.Y. City 2004-1 ("The standards used by courts in deciding whether to approve class representation . . . draw to a considerable extent on standards of professional responsibility, but ultimately they are found in caselaw construing Rule 23 . . . ."). Some commentators have suggested that classes in class actions should be seen as a kind of entity or organizational client, and that courts substitute for the governance structures that would direct class counsel under ordinary application of the Rules. Nancy J. Moore, Who Should Regulate Class Action Lawyers?, 2003 U. ILL. L. REV. 1477, 1487 ("a class differs from other types of entity clients under Rule 1.13. For one thing, it is the court, rather than a decision-making body within the class itself, that is empowered to make decisions normally reserved for clients."); Wald, supra, at 1452-55 (suggesting that courts should be considered "constituents" of the class for purposes of overseeing class counsel). In any case, whether a court will or should consent to a particular class counsel's conflict is governed by considerations outside the Rules.

OPINION 1281 (04/09/2025)

TOPIC: Payments from lawyer's trust account; Pay.gov

DIGEST: With the client's prior written approval, a lawyer may make an otherwise proper payment of funds from the lawyer's trust account in the form of an online payment through Pay.gov

RULES: 1.15(c), (d) & (e)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer's clients are criminal defendants whom a court has ordered to make criminal debt payments (e.g., to pay fines or to make restitution) to the Clerk of a U.S. District Court. The district court does not accept cash for such payments but instead requires that payment be made either by check or through Pay.gov, an online payment program of the U.S. Department of the Treasury (described below). If payment is made through Pay.gov, the court requires that criminal debt payments be made by debit card or "Bank account (ACH)"—i.e., direct debit.

2. To assist clients who are required to make criminal debt payments but do not have bank accounts, the inquirer deposits cash received from such clients into the lawyer's trust account and issues a check payable to the Clerk on the client's behalf. The lawyer asks whether it would be permissible to make such payments from the trust account through Pay.gov, rather than by check. (The inquiry does not specify whether the attorney seeks to make such payments by debit card or by direct debit).

3. Pay.gov is the Government-wide Web transaction portal operated by the Fiscal Service of the United States Department of the Treasury, which is accessed at: http://www.fiscal.treasury.gov and described at www.pay.gov. Pay.gov facilitates the collection of money owed to agencies of the U.S. government. Pay.gov supports various forms of payment, including credit card, debit card and direct debit, but each agency determines the forms of payment it accepts for each type of charge or obligation. As noted above, the present inquiry involves criminal debt payments, which the court requires to be paid by debit card or direct debit if Pay.gov is used.

4. The Pay.gov system operates as follows. First, the website of an agency (in this case, a court) directs a user (such as the inquirer's clients) to a collection page hosted by Pay.gov. To make a criminal debt payment, the user inputs information about the payor, including a case number, a defendant number, a payment amount, and a transaction ID. For payment by direct debit, the user inputs the bank routing and account numbers; for payment by debit card, the user inputs the debit card number. The Pay.gov system allows third parties to make payments on behalf of other persons, as long as they know the case number and check the third-party payor box on the payment form.

5. Once Pay.gov receives payment information, Pay.gov processes ACH (Automated Clearing House) debits. The resulting collected funds are forwarded to the Collections Information Repository (CIR) of the U.S. Treasury's Bureau of the Fiscal Service, a data archive and reporting tool that allows agencies to view and download information for agency-settled transactions. CIR also interfaces with several revenue collection systems to facilitate the movement of funds from commercial banks to the U.S. Treasury. The ACH Network is a nationwide electronic fund transfer (EFT) system that provides for the inter-bank clearing of electronic credit and debit transactions and for the exchange of payment-related information among participating financial institutions. See 82 FR 42597 (Sept. 11, 2017) (explaining an amendment to 31 CFR Part 210, the Department of the Treasury, Bureau of Fiscal Service's rule governing the use of the Automated Clearing House Network by Federal agencies).

QUESTION:

6. May a lawyer make an otherwise-proper payment of funds from the lawyer's trust account in the form of an online payment through Pay.gov?

OPINION:

7. Rule 1.15 of the N.Y. Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") sets forth the requirements a lawyer must follow in holding funds belonging to a client and in maintaining the special account, commonly referred to as a trust account, in which such funds must be held. Rule 1.15(e), entitled "Authorized Signatories," provides as follows:

> (e) All special account withdrawals shall be made only to a named payee and not to cash. Such withdrawals shall be made by check or, with the prior written approval of the party entitled to the proceeds, by bank transfer. Only a lawyer admitted to practice law in New York State shall be an authorized signatory of a special account. (Emphasis added.)

8. This provision was added to the former Code of Professional Responsibility in 1990 by the Appellate Divisions. Unlike many other Code provisions, it was not originally proposed by the N.Y. State Bar Association. An article written by one of our Committee members notes that one of the changes to this section "would allow lawyers to withdraw funds from the trust account by international (as well as domestic) bank wire transfer with the consent of the party entitled to the funds." See Marjorie E. Gross, The Long Process of Change: The 1990 Amendments to the New York Code of Professional Responsibility, XVIII Fordham Urban L. J. 283 (1991).

9. Unlike the phrase "electronic funds transfer," which is defined in a statute,[6] the phrase "bank transfer" is not a statutorily-defined term. Nevertheless, the Committee believes that the phrase "bank transfer" is sufficiently broad to include not only wire transfers, but also transfers via the ACH network initiated through Pay.gov. The Washington State Bar Association reached the same conclusion in a similar context in its Advisory Opinion 2210 (2012), which stated:

> . . . [W]hen a debit card is used to pay a filing fee, funds are transferred from the bank account associated with the debit card (here, the lawyer's trust account) to the bank account for the recipient of the filing fee (such as the court). Use of a debit card to pay a filing fee directly is therefore a bank transfer under RPC 1.15A(h)(5).

61 The federal Electronic Funds Transfer Act (EFTA) defines "electronic fund transfer" to include online payments like those here at issue. See 15 U.S.C § 1693a(7). The EFTA applies only to transfers from bank accounts "established primarily for personal, family, or household purposes." 15 U.S.C. § 1693a(2). We do not interpret statutes, which are beyond our jurisdiction, but we reference the statutory definition here to highlight the lack of a statutory definition of the term "bank transfer."

10. The purpose of Rule 1.15(e) is to prohibit cash withdrawals or other payments that would not be secure or readily traceable. A "bank transfer" allows a lawyer to make an otherwise-proper payment of funds from the lawyer's trust account in the form of an online payment through Pay.gov, which is consistent with that purpose. The Committee is sensitive to the desire of lawyers, clients and courts to use payment mechanisms that are quicker, cheaper and more convenient than older methods (such as paper checks).

11. The Committee notes that Rule 2(c) of the ABA Model Rules on Client Trust Account Records provides that trust account withdrawals "shall be made only by check payable to a named payee and not to cash, or by authorized electronic transfer." (Emphasis added.) As explained in Comment [4] to Rule 1.15(h), an "electronic transfer" includes a transfer in which "an electronic payment is initiated through a secure web environment."

12. We also conclude that making a payment from a trust fund account via Pay.gov would be permissible under 1.15(c)(4). Rule 1.15(c)(4) provides "that a lawyer shall promptly pay or deliver to the client or third person the funds . . . in the possession of the lawyer that the client of third person is entitled to receive."

13. In making a payment from a trust account via Pay.gov, a lawyer must follow the same requirements in Rule 1.15(d) and (e) that apply to other permissible withdrawals. Rule 1.15(d) provides that only a lawyer who is signatory to the trust account can initiate such a payment, payment confirmations must be retained, and payments must be recorded in the trust account ledger. In addition, because the payment is a "bank transfer," Rule 1.15(e) requires the client's advance written "approval" (which we interpret to have the same meaning as the client's advance written "consent"). However, lawyers should avoid authorizing scheduled or recurring automatic withdrawals from a trust account. Automatic withdrawals could result in an automatic ACH debit not covered by a cleared cash deposit from the client who owes the money, which would in turn lead to conversion of escrow funds belonging to other clients.

CONCLUSION:

13. With the client's prior written approval, a lawyer may make an otherwise proper payment of funds from the lawyer's trust account in the form of an online payment through Pay.gov.

OPINION 1282 (07/07/2025)

TOPIC: Disclosing Confidential Information to Non-Legal Staff

DIGEST: A New York lawyer working in another state for a non-profit organization that operates both an immigration legal clinic and a shelter for non-citizens may not share information gained during or relating to the legal clinic's representation with the shelter's nonlawyer staff unless (1) the information is not privileged and the disclosure would not be embarrassing or detrimental to the client; (2) the client gives informed consent to the disclosure; or (3) the disclosure advances the best interests of the client and is reasonable or customary under the circumstances.

RULES: 1.0(j), 1.6(a), 8.5(a) & (b).

FACTS:

1. The inquirer — a lawyer licensed exclusively in New York State — works outside New York in an immigration legal clinic operated by a non-profit organization. The non-profit organization also operates a shelter and provides various support services to non-citizens. When a new person arrives at the shelter, the legal clinic conducts a legal intake. According to the inquirer, the legal clinic operates under a "general directive" not to share information from the legal clinic with nonlawyers on the shelter's staff – but following this directive is difficult because the shelter staff "needs information from the legal clinic to assist residents." For example, after the legal intake, the immigration clinic typically sends the shelter staff an email outlining the forms of legal relief available to the new shelter resident and the expected timetable for providing the legal services needed to secure those forms of relief.

QUESTION:

2. May a New York lawyer working for an immigration legal clinic outside New York disclose client information to nonlawyer staff at a shelter that houses the legal clinic's clients?

OPINION:

3. Since the inquirer is a lawyer who is licensed exclusively in New York state but practices in another state, we must first determine—as a threshold matter—which jurisdiction's professional responsibility rules apply to the inquirer's conduct. Under Rule 8.5(a) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"), "a lawyer admitted to practice in this state is subject to the disciplinary authority of this state, regardless of where the lawyers' conduct occurs." Under Rule 8.5(b)(2)(i), "if the lawyer is licensed to practice only in this state" (which is the case here), then the New York Rules apply to the lawyer's conduct.

4. It is beyond our committee's purview to consider whether the disciplinary authority of the state in which the inquirer is practicing would instead apply that other state's rules to the inquirer's conduct. It is also beyond our committee's jurisdiction to determine whether the inquirer's practice of law in that state is authorized or unauthorized, because that is a question of law.

5. New York Rule 1.6 defines "Confidential information" as "information gained during or relating to the representation of a client, whatever its source, that is (a) protected by the attorney-client privilege, (b) likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed, or (c) information that the client has requested be kept confidential." Rule 1.6(a) bars a lawyer from knowingly revealing confidential information, or from using such information for the advantage of a lawyer or a third person, unless "the client gives informed consent, as defined in Rule 1.0(j)" or "disclosure is impliedly authorized to advance the best interests of the client and is either reasonable under the circumstances or customary in the professional community," or the disclosure is permitted by Rule 1.6(b), which lists various exceptions to the duty of confidentiality.

6. Here, the information ascertained by the inquirer during the legal intake pertaining to the forms of relief available to the shelter resident (the immigration clinic's client) will nearly always meet the definition of "confidential information." The information will normally be "protected by the attorney-client privilege" and may involve information that is "likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed." The confidential information is likely to be disclosed because the nature of relief available in immigration court is often tied to sensitive personal information, such as whether an individual has been subjected to human trafficking, has been raped, or holds certain political beliefs. Thus, disclosing to the shelter's nonlawyer staff the forms of relief available to the shelter resident may, under the circumstances, require or anticipate the disclosure of information likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client. Disclosing the timetable for likely relief is less likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client, but in some cases such disclosure might provide clues to I.C.E. about actions to be taken on behalf of the client, so such disclosure could be detrimental to the client.

7. Thus, whether the information gained during intake is "confidential information" involves a case-by-case analysis of that information. See N.Y. State 1059 (2015) (whether disclosure of information about the client's understanding of immigration proceedings "would be embarrassing or detrimental to the clients depends on the context and precise nature of the information involved.").

8. Before disclosing confidential information to the shelter's nonlawyer staff, therefore, the inquirer must find an exception to the duty of confidentiality. One exception is to seek the client's informed consent to disclose the information. See Rule 1.0(j). For consent to be informed, the inquirer must make full disclosure of "information adequate for the person to make an informed decision, and after the lawyer has adequately explained to the person the material risks of the proposed course of conduct and reasonably available alternatives." Id. That discussion should include the impact of the disclosure on the attorney-client privilege (such as whether disclosure will waive the privilege). Additionally, the client's consent must be voluntary. N.Y. State 1059; N.Y. State 490 (1978). Notably, lawyers providing services to indigent clients "should be particularly sensitive" to their clients' vulnerable position; and requests for consent to disclosure "should be made only under circumstances where the staff is satisfied that their clients could refuse to consent without any sense of guilt or embarrassment." N.Y. State 490.

9. Finally, if a minor is involved, the inquirer will need to ascertain whether the individual is "capable of understanding the risks of disclosure and of making a reasoned judgment." N.Y. State 1059 (discussing the sensitive inquiry required to determine whether a minor is capable of providing informed consent).

10. Alternatively, confidential information may be disclosed pursuant to Rule 1.6(a)(2) if disclosure would "advance the best interests of the client and is either reasonable under the circumstances or customary in the professional community." The inquirer asserts that the disclosure of the relief sought on behalf of shelter residents and the timing of the relief would advance the best interests of the clients by helping the shelter staff assist the residents. If such disclosures are designed to advance the best interests of these clients and if it is reasonable or customary under the circumstances to make such disclosures, then the disclosures could be justified as "impliedly authorized" under Rule 1.6(a)(2).

11. Rule 1.6(b) sets forth a number of other exceptions to the duty of confidentiality, but none of them apply to the inquirer's question so we will not elaborate on them.

CONCLUSION:

12. A New York lawyer working in another state for a non-profit organization that operates both an immigration legal clinic and a shelter for non-citizens may not share information gained during or relating to the legal clinic's representation with the shelter's nonlawyer staff unless (1) the information is not privileged and the disclosure would not be embarrassing or detrimental to the client; (2) the client gives informed consent to the disclosure; or (3) the disclosure advances the best interests of the client and is reasonable or customary under the circumstances. circumstances.

OPINION 1283 (08/18/2025)

TOPIC: Attorney's Referrals to Title Abstract Company Owned by Referring Attorney

DIGEST: An attorney who owns an interest in a title abstract agency that brokers title insurance may not simultaneously (i) represent a client in a real estate transaction and (ii) act as agent for a title insurance underwriter in the same transaction, unless the attorney performs purely ministerial functions for the title agency and does not negotiate on behalf of the underwriter. Under Rule 1.10(a) (as amended effective January 1, 2025), whether the attorney's conflict (which is based on a financial interest in the title abstract agency) will be imputed to the whole firm depends on whether there is a "significant risk that the representation will be materially limited or that the independent professional judgment of the participating lawyers in the firm will be adversely affected."

RULES: 1.7(a)(2), 1.8(a), 1.10(a)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a lawyer in a small New York law firm that concentrates in real estate closings. The inquirer and another partner of the firm are considering obtaining an ownership stake in a title agency.

2. The title agency would act as agent for the title insurance underwriter.

3. Neither the inquirer nor his partner would "be involved in the day-to-day running of the title agency nor in any underwriting decisions or recommendations." The title agency and law firm would office in different locations and would not share any employees. The law firm would "occasionally" refer clients to the title agency but would not be the title agency's sole source of business.

4. When a client of the inquirer's law firm engages the title agency, the inquirer would be screened from the matter and would not participate in negotiations between the law firm and the title agency regarding omitting exceptions to title.

5. The inquirer would require a written waiver of the conflict from law firm clients who use the inquirer-owned title agency. The law firm would disclose in its engagement letter that the owners of the law firm also own an interest in the title agency, and the law firm would explain the potential conflict of interest between the law firm and the client.

6. The inquirer acknowledges that this Committee has over the years issued multiple opinions concluding it would be a non-consentable conflict of interest for an attorney who owns a interest in a title agency simultaneously to represent a client in a real estate transaction and act as agent for title insurance agency in the same transaction. Notwithstanding this Committee's prior opinions, the inquirer asserts that "for many decades it is common practice in many areas of New York State ([and] neighboring states like New Jersey and Connecticut), for attorneys to represent clients in transactions when they also act as the title agent for an agency in which they have an ownership interest."

7. The inquirer also notes that in 2014 the New York State Legislature enacted Insurance Law § 2113(e), which states: "For the purposes of this chapter, an attorney or his or her law firm may represent a client in a matter and may also act as a title insurance agent in such matter subject to applicable law."

QUESTIONS:

8. Under the circumstances proposed, does Insurance Law § 2113(e) alter this Committee's analysis of the ethical propriety of an attorney representing a client under the circumstances proposed?

9. Does revised Rule 1.10(a), which states that conflicts are not automatically imputed to all members of a firm where a lawyer's conflict is financial or otherwise personal in nature, apply to this inquiry?

OPINION:

This Committee's Prior Opinions on Related Issues

10. This Committee has issued multiple opinions concluding that a lawyer may not represent a client in a real estate transaction and also act as title agent for the insurance underwriter if the attorney owns an interest in the title agency. Such a combination of roles creates a non-consentable conflict of interest.

11. In N.Y. State 595 (1988), for example, applying the former Code of Professional Responsibility (the "Code"), this Committee opined that a lawyer performing anything more than ministerial title work for a title abstract company owned by that lawyer, such as acting as agent for the underwriter, would create a non-consentable conflict of interest if the lawyer were to also represent a party to the transaction. "[T]he dual roles are improper," we said, "because they require a law firm, which as a principal in an abstract company prepares a title report showing exceptions to title and recommending whether a title insurance policy will be issued, to negotiate these issues, as counsel for a party in the underlying transaction, with itself." Id. at p.6.

12. In 1991, the Real Property Law Section of the New York State Bar Association asked us to reconsider N.Y. State 595. But in N.Y. State 621 ? 5 (1991), we adhered to the result reached in Opinion 595. We again emphasized that an attorney who acts as agent for an underwriter and represents a client in the underlying real estate transaction is beholden to two masters with potentially irreconcilable interests. We noted two problems: "the danger of the attorney using his or her fiduciary leverage over the real estate client to dictate the choice of title insurer" and "the ultimate risk that the client may not get the right title insurance."

13. In N.Y. State 738 (2001), we revisited the issue in the context of an attorney who represented clients in real estate matters and wanted to refer those clients to a title abstract company owned by the attorney's spouse. We explained that the conflict was not consentable under the former Code because "a 'disinterested lawyer' would believe that the conflict inherent in those dual roles would adversely affect the representation of the real estate client." See also N.Y. State 731 (2000) ("[T]he lawyer for a party in a real estate transaction may not permit employees to solicit the lawyer's clients to engage the services of a title company in which the lawyer has an ownership interest. Nor may the lawyer compensate employees for making such referrals.").

14. In N.Y. State 891 (2011), we opined that the reasoning of those prior opinions remains valid under the current New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"). Specifically, we concluded that an attorney "may refer a client to a title company in which the attorney has a financial interest provided that the attorney may not represent the client in the transaction in which that title company will provide title services to the client unless the services are purely ministerial or if, among other things, the attorney passes the commission on to the client and where exceptions to title are not negotiable." (Emphasis added.)

15. On the other hand, this Committee has also consistently opined that "a lawyer could, with consent after disclosure, refer real estate clients to a title abstract company in which the lawyer or his or her spouse had an ownership interest for purely ministerial abstract work, but not where the abstract company provided the additional service of preparing a title report or serving as an agent for the title underwriter." N.Y. State 974 (2013) n.1 (internal quotation marks omitted) (emphasis added).

Insurance Law § 2113(e)

16. The inquirer queries whether Insurance Law § 2113(e), passed in 2014, might lead this Committee to reconsider its earlier opinions, the most recent of which we issued in 2013, before § 2113(e) took effect. Insurance Law § 2113(e) states: "For the purposes of this chapter, an attorney or his or her law firm may represent a client in a matter and may also act as a title insurance agent in such matter subject to applicable law."

17. This Committee does not opine on questions of law and thus does not here opine on the legality of an attorney with an ownership interest in a title agency acting as agent for the underwriter while representing a real estate client in the same transaction. Further, because we here opine, consistent with our previous opinions, that under certain circumstances inquirer may both represent clients in a real estate transaction and act as title agent for a title company in which the attorney has an ownership interest in the same transaction, we need not address whether and to what extent the Legislature intended to address this Committee's ethics opinions with Insurance Law § 2113(e). We note only that we are not aware of any legislative history that speaks to this point.

Impact of Allegedly Common Practices in Other Jurisdictions

18. The inquirer asserts that in parts of New York and other jurisdictions, such as Connecticut and New Jersey, "it is common practice . . . for attorneys to represent clients in transaction where they also act as the title agent for an agency in which they have an ownership interest." We do not know whether the inquirer's assertion is accurate, but in any event the fact that a practice is common would not bear on our analysis under the Rules of Professional Conduct.

19. Further, this Committee is not aware of any New Jersey or Connecticut ethics opinion that validates the inquirer's proposed arrangement. To the contrary, in In Re Opinion 682 of the Advisory Comm. on Professional Ethics, 147 N.J. 360 (1997), the Supreme Court of New Jersey held that, under Rule 1.7 of the New Jersey Rules of Professional Conduct, it would create a non-consentable conflict of interest for an attorney who owns a beneficial interest in a title abstract company both to act as title insurance agent and to represent a real estate client in the same transaction. The reasoning of the Supreme Court of New Jersey on the inherent conflict of interest is similar to this Committee's reasoning on this point. See id. at 368-369.

20. Thus, we adhere to our prior opinions, which state that an attorney who owns an interest in a title company while representing a real estate client in a transaction and simultaneously acting as agent for the underwriter creates a non-consentable conflict of interest, unless the title agent performs only ministerial tasks.

Imputation of Conflicts Under Amended Rule 1.10(a)(2)

21. Under the former version of Rule 1.10, the personal financial interest conflict of the attorneys who own an interest in a title agency would have been imputed to all lawyers in the firm. Until January 1, 2025, Rule 1.10(a) stated that "[w]hile lawyers are associated in a firm, none of them shall knowingly represent a client when any one of them practicing alone would be prohibited from doing so by Rule 1.7, 1.8 or 1.9, except as otherwise provided therein." Thus, a lawyer's financial and other personal conflicts of interest arising under Rule 1.7(a)(2) were automatically imputed to the lawyer's entire firm unless the client consented to allow lawyers other than the personally conflicted lawyer to work on the matter.

22. However, the Appellate Divisions issued a Joint Order, effective January 1, 2025, amending Rule 1.10(a) so that it now states, in pertinent part:

> (a) While lawyers are associated in a firm, none of them shall knowingly represent a client when any one of them practicing alone would be prohibited from doing so by Rule 1.7, 1.8 or 1.9, except as otherwise provided therein, unless:
>
> > (1) the prohibition is based on a lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests within the meaning of Rule 1.7(a)(2), and
> > (2) under the circumstances, a reasonable lawyer would conclude that there is no significant risk that the representation will be materially limited or that the independent professional judgment of the participating lawyers in the firm will be adversely affected.

23. Here, the inquirer's conflict arises under Rule 1.7(a)(2) from the financial interest created by the inquirer's ownership interest in a title insurance agency. Pursuant to revised Rule 1.10(a)(2), however, the conflict will not be imputed to all attorneys in inquirer's firm if "a reasonable lawyer would conclude that there is no significant risk that the representation will be materially limited or that the independent professional judgment of the participating lawyers in the firm will be adversely affected."

24. This Committee has consistently opined that an attorney who represents a real estate client may also act as title agent for the underwriter, even if the attorney owns an interest in the title agency, provided that the work does not involve negotiation on behalf of the underwriter. See N.Y. State 595; N.Y. State 621; N.Y. State 891.

25. We note that, assuming inquirer will perform purely ministerial services as agent to the underwriter, when the inquirer refers a client to the title abstract company in which it owns an interest, the disclosure must include notice of the availability of other abstract companies, the nature of inquirer's ownership in the title company, and the fee structure involved with the title company. See N.Y. State 595 and N.Y. State 755.

CONCLUSION:

26. An attorney who owns an interest in a title abstract agency that brokers title insurance may not simultaneously (i) represent a client in a real estate transaction and (ii) act as agent for a title insurance underwriter in the same transaction, unless the attorney performs purely ministerial functions for the title agency and does not negotiate on behalf of the underwriter. Under Rule 1.10(a) (as amended effective January 1, 2025), whether the attorney's conflict (which is based on a financial interest in the title abstract agency) will be imputed to the whole firm depends on whether there is a "significant risk that the representation will be materially limited or that the independent professional judgment of the participating lawyers in the firm will be adversely affected."

OPINION 1284 (09/16/2025)

TOPIC: Multi-Jurisdictional Practice; Referral Fees; Division of Fees

DIGEST: Lawyers admitted in New York and a foreign jurisdiction who associate with a lawyer admitted only in the foreign jurisdiction may divide a fee with that lawyer because Rule 1.5(g) explicitly permits lawyers associated in the same law firm to share fees. But the New York-licensed attorneys in the firm must exercise supervision pursuant to Rule 5.1 over the non-New York partner to the extent such partner's conduct implicates the New York Rules of Professional Conduct.

RULES: 1.0(a), 1.0(h),1.5(g), 5.1, 5.1(c), 5.3, 5.4(b, 5.5(a), 7.1(a) & (c), 7.2(a), 7.5(d), 8.5(a)

FACTS:

1. The inquiring attorney ("Attorney 1") and his colleague ("Attorney 2") are licensed in New York State and in a foreign country. Both lawyers reside in New York and handle cases in both jurisdictions. They plan to create two entities: (i) a New York PLLC ("NY PLLC"), of which they will be the members, to provide legal services in New York and (ii) a Foreign Country Limited Liability Company ("FC LLP"), in which they will be partners, to provide legal services in the foreign country but not in New York.

2. The two New York attorneys intend to include a third attorney ("Attorney 3"), who is licensed in the foreign country but not New York, as a partner in FC LLP. Attorney 3 will be a partner only in FC LLP, and will not be a member or employee of NY PLLC. Rather, with respect to NY PLLC, Attorney 3 will not manage clients or cases, will not use resources of NY PLLC, and will be identified on the FC LLP website as an "attorney admitted to practice only in foreign country. Not affiliated with the New York office of NY PLLC." New York PLLC intends to give a 30% referral fee to Attorney 3 for any New York cases Attorney 3 refers to NY PLLC.

QUESTIONS:

3. May New York attorneys pay a referral fee to an attorney who is admitted in a foreign country but not in New York?

4. Are members of a New York PLLC required to exercise supervise responsibility over an attorney who is not a member or employee of the New York PLLC?

OPINION:

5. As a preliminary matter, Attorneys 1 and 2, both of whom are admitted in New York (as well as in a foreign jurisdiction), are "subject to the disciplinary authority of this state regardless of where their conduct occurs." Rule 8.5(a). Moreover, because Attorneys 1 and 2 are admitted in New York and in another jurisdiction, they may be "subject the disciplinary authority of both this state and another jurisdiction where [the lawyers] are admitted for the same conduct." Id. In this opinion we opine only on the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") and do not purport to opine on the rules or law of any other jurisdiction.

6. In N.Y. State 1072 (2015), we observed that while Rule 5.4(b) "seemingly disallow[s] a partnership with any lawyer not admitted to practice in New York, [it] is tempered by Rule 7.5(d), which recognizes partnerships 'between or among lawyers licensed in different jurisdictions.'" See N.Y. State 658 (1993); see also N.Y. State 542 (1982). Clearly, today there are many national and international law firms with New York offices, so many New York lawyers are partners with non-New York lawyers who are admitted in other jurisdictions. Indeed, Rule 7.5(d) assumes the legitimacy and validity of partnerships between lawyers licensed in New York and lawyers licensed in non-US jurisdictions. See N.Y. State 1072 ¶ 15 (2015) (Rule 7.5(d)'s reference to "'lawyers licensed in other jurisdictions' includes lawyers licensed in jurisdictions outside the United States").

7. In previous opinions this Committee has addressed the concern that a person who qualifies as an "attorney" in another country may differ in the educational background, ethical standards and other qualifications which would be required of an attorney in this jurisdiction. In N.Y. State 1072 ¶ 16 we opined that "the mere fact that a foreign 'lawyer' is licensed in another country is not by itself sufficient to reach the conclusion that a New York lawyer may permissibly form a partnership with the foreign lawyer." Rather, we stated that "an inquiry needs to be made into (i) whether the foreign country's educational requirements for admission are generally similar to those for New York attorneys and (ii) whether the standards of professional conduct and discipline governing the foreign attorney are essentially compatible with New York's standards. See N.Y. State 542 (1982); N.Y. State 658 (1993)."

8. Accordingly, we advised in Opinion 1072 that "[b]efore a New York lawyer may ethically form a partnership with the foreign lawyer, the New York lawyer must conclude that the partnership would not be likely to compromise the New York lawyer's ability to uphold the standards of professional conduct in this State." Thus, before agreeing to admit Attorney 3 to FC LLP as a partner, the Inquirer will need to investigate the requirements to become and remain a lawyer in the foreign country in which Attorney 3 is admitted to make sure that a New York lawyer may ethically partner with a lawyer from that country.

Would payment of a referral fee by Attorneys 1 and 2 to Attorney 3 violate the New York Rules of Professional Conduct?

9. If the Inquirer determines that a New York lawyer may ethically partner with a lawyer from the jurisdiction where Attorney 3 is a lawyer, then paying a referral fee to Attorney 3 would not violate the Rules. Attorneys 1 and 2 will be associated in the same firm - FC PLLC - with Attorney 3, and Rule 1.5(g) explicitly permits a lawyer to divide a fee with another lawyer associated in the same law firm without meeting the conditions set out in Rule 1.5(g) for dividing a fee with a lawyer not associated in the same firm. Moreover, Rule 7.2 ("Payment for Referrals"), which prohibits a lawyer from giving anything "of value" to a person as a reward for recommending the lawyer paying the referral fee does not regulate lawyers in the same firm. Lawyers associated in the same firm may ethically compensate or give credit to each other for referring business to that firm. For example, law firms may (and typically do) give "origination credit" to a partner for bringing business to the firm even if another partner in the firm does the work. Rule 7.2 does not apply to intra-firm compensation arrangements.

Are members of the NY PLLC required to exercise supervising responsibility over Attorney 3 even though Attorney 3 will not be a member or employee of NY PLLC?

10. Even though Attorney 3 will not be a member or employee of NY PLLC, the members of NY PLLC will be required to make reasonable efforts to ensure that any partner in the firm who is subject to the New York Rules – including Attorney 3 and FC LLP – complies with the New York Rules of Professional Conduct. In N.Y. State 762 (2003), which construed provisions in the old Code of Professional Responsibility equivalent to today's Rule 5.1, this Committee concluded that:

> New York lawyers with management or supervisory authority in law firms with New York offices, as well as the firms themselves, are required to make reasonable efforts to ensure that lawyers subject to the New York Code who are affiliated with the firm in such offices comply with the New York Code. A New York firm has broad supervisory responsibility under DR 1-104(C) [now covered under Rules 5.1 and 5.3] with respect to non-lawyers and lawyers licensed in foreign countries in the New York office and must ensure that compliance by foreign lawyers with the ethical rules of a foreign jurisdiction does not compromise the firm's adherence to the New York Code.

11. In interpreting Rule 5.1, we stand by our analysis and conclusions in Opinion 762. We also made clear in Opinion 762 that "New York lawyers may enter into partnerships with lawyers who are bound by ethics rules other than the New York Code." A New York law firm must therefore make reasonable efforts to ensure that any lawyer associated in FC LLP who is subject to the New York Rules complies with the Rules. We see no reason to modify that conclusion.

CONCLUSION:

12. Lawyers admitted in New York and a foreign jurisdiction who associate with a lawyer admitted only in the foreign jurisdiction may divide a fee with that lawyer because Rule 1.5(g) explicitly permits lawyers associated in the same law firm to share fees. But the New York-licensed attorneys in the firm must exercise supervision pursuant to Rule 5.1 over the non-New York partner to the extent such partner's conduct implicates the New York Rules of Professional Conduct.
