Updated through Opinion 1284 (09/16/2025)

New York State Bar Association publications are intended to provide current and accurate information to help attorneys maintain their professional competence. Publications are distributed with the understanding that NYSBA does not render any legal, accounting or other professional service. Attorneys using publications or orally conveyed information in dealing with a specific client's or their own legal matters should also research original sources of authority.

We consider the publication of any NYSBA practice book as the beginning of a dialogue with our readers. Periodic updates to this book will give us the opportunity to incorporate your suggestions regarding additions or corrections. Please send your comments to: Publications Department, New York State Bar Association, One Elk Street, Albany, NY 12207 or publications@nysba.org.

OPINION 726 (02/02/2000)

TOPIC: Staff counsel; law firm.

DIGEST: A group of lawyers who are salaried employees of an insurance company and whose practice is exclusively in defense of the company's policy holders may hold themselves out as a law firm only if (a) they undertake to act consistently with the professional responsibilities of a law firm and (b) they disclose that they are employees of the insurance company.

CODE: DR 1-102, 1-104(A), (B), 2-102(A)(4), (B), (C), 5-105(D), (E), 5-107(A), (B); EC 2-13.

QUESTION:

May staff counsel of an insurance company hold themselves out as a law firm when they are salaried employees working exclusively on behalf of the company's policy holders?

OPINION:

Whether a group of lawyers employed by an insurance company to represent policy holders[1] may refer to themselves on their letterhead, business cards, and elsewhere as a law firm (e.g., as "Law Firm of A, B, and C," "Law Offices of A, B & C," "A, B & C, Attorneys at Law"), depends on whether doing so would be misleading. See DR 2-101(A) ("A lawyer . . . shall not use or disseminate or participate in the preparation or dissemination of any public communication or communication to a prospective client containing statements or claims that are false, deceptive or misleading"); DR 2-102(B) ("A lawyer in private practice shall not practice under . . . a name that is misleading as to the identity of the lawyer or lawyers practicing under such name"); see also DR 2-102(C) ("A lawyer shall not hold himself or herself out as having a partnership with one or more other lawyers unless they are in fact partners."); see generally DR 1-102(A)(4) ("A lawyer or law firm shall not . . . [e]ngage in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit, or misrepresentation").

Clearly, it would be misleading and, therefore, impermissible for lawyers to hold themselves out to the public as a law firm if they do not function as a "law firm" for purposes of the Code of Professional Responsibility, which imposes certain ethical responsibilities on law firms. Under the Code,

1 The general rule in New York is that corporations may not practice law and accordingly their lawyer-employees may represent only the corporation and not third parties. Nonetheless, it is not impermissible per se for lawyers employed by an insurance company to represent policy holders in litigation in which the insurance company has a duty to defend and indemnify the policyholder. See Nassau Co. 95-5 (1995); N.Y. State 109 (1969) (attorneys may be employed as house counsel for insurance company on salary basis); see also N.Y. State 519 (1980). Although in individual cases (e.g., where the insurance company disclaims its obligation to indemnify) the representation may give rise to an impermissible conflict of interest, we recognized in N.Y. State 109 (1969) that such a conflict is not inevitable. Where the representation is permissible, however, the lawyer employed by the insurance company, like a private lawyer whose fee is paid by the insurance company, must secure the policy holder's consent to the representation after disclosure of this relationship and, thereafter, must represent that client with undivided loyalty. DR 5-107(A), (B); see generally N.Y. State 721 (1999); N.Y. State 716 (1999).

for example, the law firm as an entity, as well as individual attorneys with management responsibility in the firm, must make reasonable efforts to ensure that all lawyers in the firm conform to the disciplinary rules. DR 1-104(A), (B). Certain of the lawyers' conflicts of interest will be imputed to each other, DR 5-105(D), and records of the lawyers' prior and current engagements must be checked to ensure individual and collective compliance with the conflict rules. DR 5-105(E); see generally N.Y. State 720 (1999). Within a law firm, lawyers may assist each other in cases, discuss strategy, share confidences, and otherwise pool their resources of intellect and labor. Cf. EC 4-2. If lawyers do not acknowledge the professional responsibilities that come with being in a law firm, but act exclusively as individual attorneys or individual attorney-employees, it would be misleading for them to represent themselves to the public as a law firm.

Even if the insurance company's lawyers undertake to work together on behalf of policy holders and consistently with the above--described disciplinary rules regulating law firms, however, there is at least a risk that lawyers may mislead clients and others if they refer to themselves as a law firm by using a style of name that traditionally designates a law partnership. First, clients and others may be misled to believe that the law firm is a partnership, rather than a group of individual employees.[2] Second, clients and others may be misled to believe that the lawyers are independent, rather than employed by the insurance company.[3] Finally, clients and others may be misled to believe that the lawyers' practice includes representing clients in addition to the insurance company's policy holders. In light of these risks, some authorities appear to close the door to any name other than "Law Division of [Insurance Company]" or the equivalent. Cincinnati Insurance Co. v. Wills, 717 N.E.2d 151 (Ind. 1999) (noting that "it is difficult to come up with a proper reason for this designation"); California Op. 1987-91.

While cognizant of the risks, some other courts and ethics committees have acknowledged legitimate reasons why staff counsel who share professional responsibility for representing policy holders might seek to use a firm name. Doing so may denote that the lawyers are independent from their employer in the sense that their clients are the policy holders, not the company. Kentucky Op. 99-1. The firm name may also "reflect the nature of their association" (that is, that they practice collectively, not individually). In re Weiss, Healey & Rea, 536 A.2d 266, 269 (N.J. 1988).

In New Jersey, the state Supreme Court remanded the matter to a special committee. See In re Weiss, Healey & Rea, supra. That committee's report recommended that insurance company lawyers be permitted to practice under a firm name without any explanation or disclaimer when the lawyers share professional and financial responsibility for representing policy holders. Report of the Ad Hoc Supreme Court Committee on Law Firm Names, 125 N.J.L.J. 316 (Feb. 8, 1990). That state thereafter amended its disciplinary rules to implement this recommendation. See N.J. Comm. On the Unauthorized Practice of Law, Supplement to Op. 23 (1994).

2 See In re Weiss, Healey & Rea, 536 A.2d 266, 268-69 (N.J. 1988); N.J. Op. 593 (1986).

3 See West Virginia State Bar Lawyer Disciplinary Board, Op. 99-01, pp. 12-13; In re Youngblood, 895 S.W.2d at 331-332 (representation that attorney-employee is separate and independent from insurer employer "is, at least, false, misleading and deceptive. It may be fraudulent depending upon the circumstances under which it was made"); In re Weiss, Healey & Rea, 536 A.2d at 269-70; Virginia State Bar Op. 775 (1986); Ohio Board of Commissioners on Grievances and Discipline Op. 95-14 (1995); but see Nassau Co. Op. 95-5 (1995) (insurance company's attorneys, who are employed on a salary basis as house counsel to represent and defend insureds, need not identify themselves as insurance company employees; however, it is not ethically improper for them to do so).

We concur with those authorities that permit the use of a law firm name as long as it is accompanied by an explanation that the lawyers are employees of the particular law firm. See Oregon Op. 1998-153 ("[T]he letterhead used must indicate the relationship between the firm and the Law Division. For example, the letterhead could contain an asterisk identifying the firm as the Law Division for the Insurance Company."); West Virginia Op. 99-01 ("captive law firms" must "disclose their affiliation with the insurance company on their letterhead, business cards, phone book identification, phone answering method, office entrances and pleadings and . . . explain this relationship to each client," except possibly "in pleadings or other communications that might be submitted to a jury").

Our conclusion is that where insurance company lawyers undertake to act consistently with the professional responsibilities of a law firm (see DR 1-102, 1-104, 5-105 [E]), they may hold themselves out to the public as a law firm as long as they take adequate measures to avoid creating any misunderstandings about the nature of their practice, their relationships with each other, or their relationship with the insurance company that employs and pays them. In the very least, this will ordinarily mean that, in their letterhead and other public communications with those who might otherwise misunderstand, the lawyers must clearly explain that they are employees of the particular insurance company. Such an explanation is required in New York to comply with Code provisions that are intended to prevent lawyers from misleading clients, prospective clients, and third parties concerning the nature of the lawyers' practice. To the extent that a court rule or other legal obligation makes it inappropriate or impermissible to disclose an affiliation with the insurance company employer to a jury or other adjudicative body, such rule or obligation supercedes the disclosure otherwise required by the Code.

CONCLUSION:

A group of lawyers who are salaried employees of an insurance company and whose practice is exclusively in defense of the company's policy holders may hold themselves out as a law firm only if (a) they undertake to act consistently with the professional responsibilities of a law firm, including the responsibilities imposed on law firms as entities by DR 1-102, DR 1-104, and DR 5-105(E), and (b) they provide a clear explanation in their public communications that they are employees of the insurance company. The Code does not require such an explanation in communications with juries or other adjudicating bodies if other legal obligations are inconsistent with such disclosure in that context.

TOPIC: Referral of personal injury matters by accounting firm in return for sharing of fees.

DIGEST: Attorney may not accept referral from accounting firm in return for agreement to share contingent fees with accounting firm on personal injury matter.

CODE: DR 2-103(B), (D), 2-107, 3-102(A).

QUESTION:

May an attorney accept referrals from an accounting firm in return for an agreement to share the attorney's contingent fee with the accounting firm?

FACTS:

An attorney plans to enter into a relationship with an accounting firm whereby the accounting firm would send the attorney its personal injury referrals. The attorney would charge a contingency fee of not more than 25-27 percent, while the accounting firm would enter into its own, separate contingency fee agreement "in the range" of seven or eight percent in exchange for accounting services, including "financial planning and counseling with respect to the recovery." The client may not actually need or want financial planning services.

OPINION:

We believe that the arrangement is prohibited by the New York Lawyer's Code of Professional Responsibility ("Code"). The proposal implicates two separate Disciplinary Rules, and violates each.

First, DR 2-103(B) provides that:

> [a] lawyer shall not compensate or give anything of value to a person or organization to recommend or obtain employment by a client, or as a reward for having made a recommendation resulting in employment by a client, except that a lawyer may pay the usual and reasonable fees or dues charged by a qualified legal assistance organization or referral fees to another lawyer as permitted by DR 2-107.

As one commentator has noted, "[t]he phrase 'of value' covers a lot of territory." Roy Simon, Simon's New York Code of Professional Responsibility Annotated 84 (1999 ed.). See, e.g., N.Y. State 698 (1998) (lawyer may not agree to arrangement whereby medical consultant would refer clients in personal injury cases and lawyer would retain consultant to assist in the representation); Nassau County 98-10 (1998) (lawyer may not agree to discount his fee to clients referred by real estate brokers, because doing so may "give an incentive to clients to utilize these brokers' services [thereby giving something of value to brokers] in exchange for the brokers' promotion of attorneys' legal services"); see also N.Y. State 659 (1994) (lawyer may include advertising material in an information package distributed by a car dealer; however, the car dealer may not discuss the advertisement with its customers and, if any payment is made to distribute the advertisement, it must be clear that the third party is neither endorsing nor recommending the use of the lawyer's services); N.Y. State 566 (1984)

(law firm may not pay a fee to be listed under the category "Professional Services" in a real estate brokerage firm's brochure which recommends that home buyers secure the services of an experienced law firm and lists only the particular law firm as one that concentrates in that area of law); Nassau County 89-10 (a lawyer may not permit a relative who is a health care professional to send a letter to his patients announcing that the lawyer's office is open and offering complementary consultations to the patients); Nassau County 87-43 (lawyer may not arrange for financial planners and insurance agents to distribute lawyer's promotional material).

By limiting the legal fee to less than the legal and customary maximum and permitting the balance to be made available to the accounting firm for its separate fee, the proposed arrangement involves compensation by the lawyer to the accounting firm in connection with the referral of the client. This conclusion is inescapable if the client has not sought any accounting services and may not even wish to receive any. Although the attempt to limit the two separate fees to the legal maximum is helpful in avoiding issues under DR 2-106(A)'s prohibition of excessive fees, see N.Y. State 572 (1985) (lawyer should reduce legal fee so that separate contingency fee of consultant, together with legal fee, will not be excessive), it does not address the violation of DR 2-103(B) posed by the proposed arrangement, under which the accounting firm is to receive a fee in connection with the referral of the client. Since the accounting services are not sought and may not be desired by the client, the accountant's separate fee agreement appears to "serve as a pretext for avoidance of the prescriptions of" the Code. N.Y. State 698 (1997) (quoting N.Y. State 668 [1994]).

Second, the proposed arrangement violates DR 3-102(A)'s prohibition on fee splitting with non-lawyers. The accounting firm's fee, although entered into separately with the client, is for services not sought by the client and appears to constitute a portion of the contingency fee that would otherwise have been paid to the lawyer. As we recently noted in N.Y. State 705(1997), an arrangement in which a non-attorney company is "'signing up clients and passing them on to lawyers, with a fee skimmed off the top'" (internal citation omitted) constitutes unethical fee-splitting as well as improper solicitation.

CONCLUSION:

For the reasons discussed, an attorney may not ethically enter into the proposed arrangement.

TOPIC: Communicating with represented party; communicating with unrepresented party; advice to non-client concerning risk of self-incrimination

DIGEST: In civil hearing under General Municipal Law, if pro se civil claimant against municipality faces criminal charges relating to the subject of the claim, attorney for municipality may not communicate directly with the claimant unless attorney is (1) legally authorized to do so, (2) ascertains that the claimant is not receiving legal advice in connection with the civil claim, or (3) receives counsel's permission; if claimant is unrepresented, municipality's attorney has discretion whether to advise claimant of the risk of self-incrimination.

CODE: Canons 6,7; DR 7-101, 7-104(A)(1), (2); EC 7-14, 7-18

QUESTION:

Under General Municipal Law §50-h, an attorney for a New York municipality may take testimony from a person who has filed a claim against the municipality pursuant to General Municipal Law §50-e. On occasion, a pro se claim is filed regarding police matters (typically alleging false arrest or excessive use of force) when criminal charges are still pending against the claimant. A transcript of testimony given by the claimant at the hearing could be obtained by the District Attorney by subpoena or court order and used against the claimant in the pending criminal proceeding. May the municipality's attorney advise the claimant that his or her testimony might be incriminating and used against the claimant in a subsequent criminal proceeding? Must the attorney do so?

OPINION:

Whether the municipality's attorney may advise the claimant about the risk of self-incrimination depends in part on whether the claimant is "represented" for purposes of DR 7-104. DR 7-104(A)(1) governs communications with parties who are known to be represented in the particular matter, while DR 7-104(A)(2) governs communications with those who are unrepresented. Additionally, because the inquiry involves the conduct of an attorney for a municipality, not for a private party, the attorney's professional obligations as an advocate, including the attorney's obligation to serve zealously, competently and loyally on behalf of the client, must be understood in light of the concurrent obligation of a government attorney in a civil case, as in a criminal case, to "seek justice":

> A government lawyer in a civil action or administrative proceeding has the responsibility to seek justice and to develop a full and fair record, and should not use his or her position or the economic power of the government to harass parties or to bring about unjust settlements or results. The responsibilities of government lawyers with respect to the compulsion of testimony and other information are generally the same as those of public prosecutors.

1. DR 7-104(A)(1)

If the claimant is represented with respect to the matter on which the municipality's attorney would communicate with the claimant, the permissibility of communicating directly with the claimant would principally be governed by DR 7-104 (A)(1), which provides:

> A. During the course of the representation of a client a lawyer shall not:
> > 1. Communicate or cause another to communicate on the subject of the representation with a party the lawyer knows to be represented by a lawyer in that matter unless the lawyer has the prior consent of the lawyer representing such other party or is authorized by law to do so.

Although the claimant under the stated facts appears generally to be unrepresented with respect to the claim against the municipality, since the written notice of claim presumably shows no attorney representing the claimant, this does not preclude the possibility that the claimant's criminal defense lawyer is providing advice concerning how the claimant's testimony with respect to the civil claim might affect the criminal case. The municipality's attorney is aware of the likelihood if not certainty that the claimant has a lawyer with respect to the pending criminal charges, but may not be certain whether the criminal defense lawyer is advising the claimant regarding the legal implications of the related civil claim against the municipality. Thus, there is a question whether the municipality's attorney has any duty of inquiry, or whether the municipality's attorney may communicate directly with the claimant on the theory that the claimant is not "known" to be represented in the matter that would be the subject of communications.

This Committee has previously found that, in some circumstances, a lawyer must confirm that an individual is not represented by counsel in the particular matter before communicating directly with that individual. For example, where a party was known at one time to be represented, but it is reasonable to question whether there is continued representation, "a lawyer must undertake a complete and thorough inquiry to determine the ultimate fact of existing or continuing representation" before communicating directly with the opposing party. N.Y. State 663 (1994) (where opposing party claims to be represented by counsel, but the putative lawyer fails to respond, a lawyer may communicate directly with the party only after a complete and thorough inquiry into the question of whether the party is represented); cf. N.Y. State 650 (1993) (lawyers staffing corporation's "help line" telephone as part of corporation's "compliance with the law" program are correctly "require[d] to inquire if the caller is represented by counsel in the matter about which the caller is reporting"); N.Y. State 607 (1990) (lawyer representing person injured in an automobile accident who has no information whether the driver is represented may send correspondence to the driver, but must inform that party to refer the documents to counsel if the party is represented).

Under the circumstances presented here, the municipality's attorney would have a similar duty of inquiry before communicating directly with the claimant as proposed. The attorney knows that the claimant faces a criminal charge arising out of the same situation which generated the notice of claim in the civil matter and knows that the claimant is almost certainly represented, or about to be represented, in connection with the criminal charge. Although the criminal defense lawyer apparently is not prosecuting the 50-e claim on behalf of the client, that lawyer may be advising the client about whether there is a risk that testimony in the 50-h hearing may be used against the client in the criminal case - the very subject of the municipal attorney's proposed communication. That being so, the municipal attorney may not communicate with the claimant about the risk of self-incrimination unless the municipal attorney ascertains that the claimant is not represented with respect to this matter. Among other possibilities, this may be determined by asking the claimant whether the claimant's criminal defense lawyer or any other lawyer is advising the claimant concerning the 50-h hearing. If it is determined that the claimant is represented in the matter, then direct communications with the claimant are limited by DR 7-104(A)(1) to those that are "authorized by law" (e.g., questioning in the context of the 50-h hearing itself) or those to which the claimant's attorney has given prior consent.

Assuming that the claimant is unrepresented in the matter, one must consider whether DR 7-104(A)(2) bars the municipality's attorney from advising the claimant of the risk of self-incrimination. DR 7-104(A)(2) provides:

> A. During the course of the representation of a client a lawyer shall not:
> 2. Give advice to a party who is not represented by a lawyer, other than the advice to secure counsel, if the interests of such party are or have a reasonable possibility of being in conflict with the interests of the lawyer's client.

Additionally, an Ethical Consideration contained in Canon 7 provides:

> If one is not represented by counsel, a lawyer representing another may have to deal directly with the unrepresented person; in such an instance a lawyer should not undertake to give advice to the person who is not represented by a lawyer, except to advise the person to obtain a lawyer.

EC 7-18.

Although the disciplinary rule, by its terms, forbids a lawyer from giving any advice to a party whose interests conflict with those of the lawyer's client, other than the advice to secure counsel, the rule has been understood to allow a lawyer, additionally, to give certain non-controvertible information about the law to enable the other party to understand the need for independent counsel. For example, in N.Y. State 477 (1977), we opined that the inquiring attorney for an executor of a will could ethically advise the surviving spouse that the spouse might have a right of election against the will as to which independent counsel could give advice. We explained:

> A balance must be struck. The executor's lawyer cannot advise the surviving spouse to exercise a right of election, but he can advise him to seek independent counsel. Cf. DR 7-101(A) with DR 7-104 (A) (2). And, to make certain that the surviving spouse understands the need for independent counsel, as a matter of professional privilege the executor's lawyer may inform him of the possible existence of a right to elect a statutory share against the will.

Similarly, an opinion of the New York County Lawyers' Association noted that, in advising an unrepresented plaintiff to retain counsel, the defendant's lawyer could identify legal issues as to which an independent lawyer could advise the plaintiff:

> At the outset of their dealings, pursuant to DR 7-104(A)(2), inquirer should advise plaintiff that there may be legal issues, such as the possible attorney's charging lien, affecting plaintiff's right to recovery under whatever settlement is reached and that plaintiff should consult a lawyer to advise him about such issues because the inquirer is barred from doing so . . .

N.Y. County 708 (1995).

These opinions are consistent with the general rationale of DR 7-104(A)(2), which is to "protect unrepresented people"[4] as well as with the understanding that "[t]he legal system in its broadest sense functions best when persons in need of legal assistance or advice are represented by their own counsel." EC 7-18. Accordingly, we believe that DR 7-102(A)(2) does not forbid the municipality's attorney from informing the claimant that testimony in the 50-h hearing might be used against the claimant in the pending criminal prosecution, where the municipal attorney's purpose is to enable the unrepresented claimant to appreciate the possible value of a lawyer's advice.

These opinions interpreting DR 7-104(A)(2), as well as the rule itself, also make clear that a lawyer may advise an unrepresented opposing party to secure counsel, and provide related information, consistent with the duty to represent the client competently and zealously. See Canons 6 and 7. Generally speaking, the municipality's attorney's task is to gather evidence in the 50-h hearing that may assist the municipality in determining whether to settle the claim or in defending against it. Cf. N.Y. State 463 (1977) ("[I]n litigated matters, traditionally a lawyer serves his client, not only as advocate and advisor, but also as an investigator of the facts relevant to his client's cause. The gathering of information and the marshaling of evidence are an inseparable part of the lawyer's duty to serve his client with zeal and competence.") It may be that the municipality's attorney can carry out this task more effectively if the claimant is unrepresented or is unaware that the risk of self-incrimination suggests the need to be represented. Even so, there is nothing in the Code that compels the municipality's attorney to exploit the claimant's ignorance about the need for legal assistance. This is especially so given that the municipal attorney has a duty to "seek justice." The municipal attorney might reasonably conclude that the municipality's interest in dealing fairly with the public justifies advising the unrepresented claimant to secure a lawyer, even in circumstances where a private party's lawyer would be disinclined to give this advice.

At the same time, however, there is nothing in the disciplinary rules that explicitly requires the municipality's attorney to advise the unrepresented claimant about the need for a lawyer or the risk of self-incrimination. Therefore, the Code permits the municipality's law department to decide, as a matter of sound public policy and professional judgment, whether or not to advise unrepresented claimants about the need for an attorney and the risk of self-incrimination. If the municipality's law department has no policy on the subject and responsibility for conducting of the 50-h hearing is delegated to individual municipal attorneys, the Code affords those individual municipal attorneys the same discretion. The municipal attorneys may make this decision in light of their professional understanding of the municipality's interests and objectives and their understanding of their general obligation, acknowledged in EC 7-14, to "seek justice and to develop a full and fair record, and . . . [not] to bring about unjust settlements or results."

CONCLUSION:

Except where authorized by law, a municipality's attorney may not communicate with a civil claimant who faces criminal charges relating to the civil claim unless the attorney first ascertains that the claimant is unrepresented concerning the subject matter of the proposed communication or, if the claimant is represented, secures the permission of the claimant's lawyer. If the claimant is not receiving advice of counsel concerning the advisability of testifying in the 50-h hearing, the attorney may advise the unrepresented claimant about the risk of self-incrimination and about the advisability of securing an independent lawyer's advice concerning this risk, but is not required to do so.

TOPIC: Fees interest on disbursements in contingency fee cases.

DIGEST: Not improper for a lawyer to charge interest on disbursements in contingency fee matters under certain conditions.

CODE: DR 2 106(A), (B) & (D).

QUESTION:

May a lawyer charge interest on disbursements paid by the lawyer on the client's behalf in a contingency fee representation?

OPINION:

This Committee has previously opined that it is not per se improper for a lawyer to charge interest with respect to delinquent accounts for payment of professional fees as long as (1) the lawyer clearly advises the client before performing services of the fact that interest will be charged on accounts which are delinquent for more than a stated period of time, (2) the stated period is reasonable under all the circumstances of the matter, (3) the rate of interest is reasonable, (4) the fee is not excessive, and (5) the client consents to the interest charge. N.Y. State 399 (1975).

The issue addressed in this Opinion is whether a similar interest charge may be imposed on disbursements in contingent fee cases. Although this Committee has not addressed that specific question, the Association of the Bar of the City of New York's Committee on Professional and Judicial Ethics has addressed a somewhat similar situation. In N.Y. City 1997-1, that committee concluded that a lawyer in contingent fee matter who actually borrowed funds from a bank in order to advance litigation expenses for the client could charge the client interest on the funds advanced to pay these litigation expenses at the rate charged by the bank, as long the interest charge did not exceed the interest charges actually incurred by the lawyer, the provision was clearly explained to the client in advance and agreed to by the client, and, pursuant to DR 2-106(D), the lawyer provided the client with a writing stating the method by which the fee is to be determined.

The present inquiry differs from that posed to the City Bar in that the inquirer does not intend to borrow the funds that will be advanced to the client. However, this distinction is not necessarily material. A lawyer who advances funds for a client is losing the use of those funds, which has an economic cost. While one lawyer is out of pocket, and the other lawyer is not, in both scenarios a lawyer in a contingency matter has incurred a cost and seeks to pass it on to the client.

Accordingly, we conclude that under the Code (and subject to any legal restrictions), a contingent fee attorney may impose an interest charge on unpaid disbursements as long as (1) the client is clearly advised that an interest charge will be imposed on disbursements that are not paid within a stated period of time and the client consents to that arrangement before it goes into effect, (2) the client is billed for the disbursements promptly after they have been incurred so the client may decide whether to pay the disbursements or incur the interest charge, (3) the period of time between the bill and the imposition of the interest charge is reasonable, (4) the disbursement itself is appropriate, see generally ABA 93-379 (1993), and (5) the interest rate is reasonable. Cf. DR 2-106(A) & (B) (a fee cannot be excessive). Although the reasonableness of a rate cannot be determined in the abstract, we do not believe that an interest rate exceeding the lawyer's actual or putative cost of obtaining funds would ever be reasonable in a contingency fee matter.

In addition, because the interest charge is part of a contingent fee arrangement, the interest charge must be included in the written statements required at the beginning and end of a contingent fee representation. See DR 2-106(D).

Finally, it is important to note that the amount of and methodology for calculating contingent fees in wrongful death and personal injury cases are governed by court rule. See 22 NYCRR § 603.7(e) (1st Dep't), § 691.20(a)-(c) (2nd Dep't), § 806.13(b) (3rd Dep't), § 1022.31(b) (4th Dep't). Whether the proposed interest charge is permissible under these provisions is a question of law on which we do not opine. Contingent fees in other kinds of cases may be subject to court review and/or approval. Whether a court would consider an interest charge appropriate in reviewing and/or approving a contingency fee is also beyond the scope of this Opinion.

CONCLUSION:

If not prohibited by law, a lawyer may charge clients in contingency fee cases interest on unpaid disbursements if the conditions enumerated in this Opinion are met.

OPINION 730 (07/27/2000)

TOPIC: Settlement agreements; restrictive covenants.

DIGEST: Attorney may not enter into settlement agreement that restricts attorney's right to practice law by prohibiting future representation of clients in cases where attorney might use information not protected as a confidence or secret under Code but nevertheless covered by terms of settlement agreement.

CODE: DR 2-108(B); 4-101.

QUESTION:

In connection with the settlement of an employment discrimination case in which the attorney represents the plaintiff employee, may the attorney for the plaintiff-employee agree not to disclose any information concerning: (1) any matters relating directly or indirectly to the settlement agreement or its terms; (2) the business or operations of the defendant corporation; and (3) the termination of the client's employment with the defendant corporation?

OPINION:

DR 2108(B) provides, "In connection with the settlement of a controversy or suit, a lawyer shall not enter into an agreement that restricts the right of a lawyer to practice law." This rule is intended (1) to preserve the public's access to lawyers who, because of their background and experience, "might be the best available talent to represent these individuals," (2) to prevent parties from "buying off" the opposing lawyer, and (3) to prevent a conflict between a lawyer's present client and the lawyer's future ones. ABA Op. 93371 (1993). The rule "prohibits lawyers from making or entering agreements that restrict a lawyer's right to represent certain clients or to sue specified parties as part of the settlement of a controversy between private parties." Annotated Model Rules of Professional Conduct 46869 (4th ed. 1999) (citing ethics opinions). This rule applies equally to a lawyer who would propose or offer such an agreement and to a lawyer who would accept it.

In the employment discrimination context, DR 2-108 (B) would prohibit an agreement by the employee's lawyer not to represent other employees in claims of discrimination against the defendant employer. Although the proponent of such a restriction might argue that it is needed to prevent the lawyer's improper use or disclosure of information learned in the course of the representation that the lawyer may have a duty to keep confidential, such a restriction is far broader than necessary to serve this purpose and may not be justified on this ground. Cf. Ala. Op. RO9201.

The specific agreements presented in this inquiry do not directly restrict the inquirer's right as a lawyer to practice law or to represent similar clients. Nevertheless, the confidentiality language is likely to restrict the inquirer in a relationship with any future client employed (or formerly employed) by the same employer, because the language is so broad that the mere representation of an employee in the future by the inquirer could raise an issue as to whether the confidentiality agreement has been breached. The question is whether DR 2108(B) forbids an attorney from agreeing to such confidentiality terms because they have the effect of restricting on the attorney's right to represent other clients in future cases against the present client's employer.

In general, conditions of settlement that require conduct on the part of a lawyer are permissible if they do not effectively restrict the lawyer from continuing or undertaking other representations and the lawyer's own client has the right to hold the lawyer to the particular conduct. For example, confidentiality provisions that, subject to limited exceptions, prohibit the parties and their lawyers from disclosing the terms of a settlement are common and do not violate DR 2108(B). The obligation to preserve the confidentiality of settlement terms does not effectively restrict the lawyer from representing other clients. Further, the terms of a confidential settlement are client "confidences" or "secrets" within the meaning of DR 4101, which establishes the lawyer's ethical duty of confidentiality. Therefore, the lawyer may not disclose the settlement terms without client consent and, conversely, the client may insist that the lawyer keep this information confidential. Since lawyers may not disclose confidential settlement terms without client consent, it is not an impermissible restriction on the right to practice law to require, as a condition of settlement, that the party's lawyer will not disclose this information. Likewise, other restrictions on disclosure of information covered by the confidentiality rule would ordinarily be permissible. Cf. Az. Op. 9504 (1995) (inhouse corporate lawyer may agree to nondisclosure of client confidences as condition of severance agreement).

At the same time, however, terms of a settlement agreement may violate DR 2108(B) if their practical effect is to restrict the lawyer from undertaking future representations and if they involve conditions or restrictions on the lawyer's future practice that the lawyer's own client would not be entitled to impose. See, e.g., ABA Op. 417 (2000) (limitation contained in settlement agreement would effectively bar future representations because the lawyer's inability to use information could materially limit and adversely affect representation of future clients); Colo. Op. 92 (1993) ("Prohibited restrictions may include barring a lawyer representing a settling claimant from subpoenaing certain records or fact witnesses in future actions against the defending party, preventing the settling claimants[‘] lawyer from using a certain expert witness in future cases, and imposing forum or venue limitations in future cases brought on behalf of nonsettling claimants."); N.M. Op. 19855 (1995) (lawyer may not agree, upon settlement, to disclose her entire work product to the opposing party, because doing so "may inhibit her representation of subsequent clients. If this were to occur, defense counsel would accomplish indirectly what they cannot accomplish by directly precluding the attorney from representing other plaintiffs with similar claims.").[5]

In this case, the proposed confidentiality terms appear to apply to some information that, ordinarily, the plaintiff's lawyer would have no duty to keep confidential under DR 4101. For example, there is almost certainly information about "the business or operations of the defendant corporation" that is public information or that can be learned in future representations without relying on confidences or secrets of the current client. The duty of confidentiality under DR 4101 would not preclude the lawyer from disclosing such information. The settlement terms would also be overbroad insofar as information about the defendant's business was learned by the lawyer prior to the representation or insofar as it was understood at the outset of the representation that the lawyer could use information of this nature in representing future clients. For similar reasons, the proposed settlement term that would prohibit disclosure of "any information concerning any matters relating directly or indirectly to the settlement agreement or its terms" appears to be overbroad.

5 We note that, by its terms, the rule applies only to restrictions on the lawyer's right to practice law that are imposed in the context of a settlement. Therefore, the rule does not restrict the lawyer and client from entering into a retainer agreement that clarifies the application of the conflict-of-interest rules or expands upon them by restricting the lawyer from undertaking certain future representations of others in matters that may be adverse to the client or that otherwise implicate the client's interests.

These provisions would restrict the lawyer's right to practice law by requiring the lawyer to avoid representing future clients in cases where the lawyer might have occasion to use information that was not protected as a confidence or secret under DR 4101 but was nevertheless covered by the settlement terms. A settlement proposal that calls on the lawyer to agree to keep confidential, for the opposing party's benefit, information that the lawyer ordinarily has no duty to protect, creates a conflict between the present client's interests and those of the lawyer and future clients –precisely the problem at which DR 2108(B) is aimed. Cf. DR 5101(A) ("a lawyer shall not . . . continue employment if the exercise of professional judgment on behalf of the client will be or reasonably may be affected by the lawyer's own financial, business . . . or personal interests unless a disinterested lawyer would believe that the representation of the client would not be adversely affected thereby and the client consents to the representation after full disclosure of the implications of the lawyer's interest").

An agreement restricting a lawyer's right to practice law may be enforceable even if it violates the disciplinary rule. See, e.g., Feldman v. Minars, 230 A.D.2d 356, 658 N.Y.S.2d 614 (1st Dept. 1997) (holding that agreement not to solicit clients is enforceable even assuming it violates the rule).[6] Whether this particular proposed agreement, if entered into, would be enforceable or what the consequences of breach would be are questions of law on which this Committee does not opine. Even if an agreement is enforceable, however, it may be impermissible under the Code. See N.Y. City 19993 (1999). Accordingly, whether or not the proposed restrictions on disclosure are enforceable, this Committee concludes that, because they are overly broad and would have the effect of restricting the practice of law, they are prohibited by DR 2108(B).

CONCLUSION:

For the reasons stated, the question is answered in the negative.

(2-00)

6 The court's decision in Feldman v. Minars has been strongly criticized insofar as it further found that an agreement not to solicit clients would not violate the rule. See Simon's New York Code of Professional Responsibility 17779 (2000 ed.). The intermediate appellate court's restrictive reading of the rule was influenced by its view that the rule is "an anachronism, illogical and bad policy." It may be worth noting that, despite the expression of this view in a 1997 decision, the Appellate Division made no change to DR 2108(B) when it amended the Code, effective June 30, 1999.

TOPIC: Conflict of interest; referral of real estate clients to attorney-owned abstract company; employees of lawyer.

DIGEST: Lawyer may not compensate employees for soliciting parties to real estate transaction to engage services of title insurance agency in which lawyer has ownership interest.

CODE: DR 5-101(A); 5-105(C); EC 5-2.

QUESTION:

In connection with representing mortgage lenders and brokers in real estate transactions, may a lawyer compensate the lawyer's employees for soliciting clients or other parties to the transaction to engage the services in that transaction of a title insurance agency in which the lawyer has an ownership interest?

OPINION:

A lawyer represents various mortgage lenders and brokers in real estate transactions. When acting as counsel for such clients in these transactions, the lawyer or employees of the law firm review the title insurance report and policy to assure that, upon closing of the transaction, the mortgage lender has a valid mortgage and appropriate lien against the borrower's property. The title company may be selected by either the lender or the borrower (or the agents of either one or the other). The lawyer owns a title company, but the lawyer does not participate in its day-to-day operations, including making decisions about the insurability of a particular transaction. The lawyer proposes to provide monetary incentives to employees of the law firm based upon the employees' success in soliciting lenders or borrowers to engage the services of the lawyer's title company in transactions in which the law firm represents the lender.

In this Committee's view, the proposed compensation arrangement is impermissible under DR 5101(A). As we recognized in N.Y. State 595 (1988) and further confirmed in N.Y. State 621 (1991), a lawyer may not ethically represent a client in a real estate transaction if the lawyer also acts as a principal in the title insurance agency engaged for that transaction. It follows from this that the lawyer for a party in a real estate transaction may not permit employees to solicit the lawyer's clients to engage the services of a title company in which the lawyer has an ownership interest. Nor may the lawyer compensate employees for making such referrals.

At the outset, this inquiry may implicate issues of federal and state law including the Real Estate Settlement Procedures Act of 1974, 12 U.S.C. § 2601 et seq, and the New York State Insurance Law which are beyond the jurisdiction of this Committee to address. This Opinion assumes, without deciding, that the arrangements proposed comply with all applicable statutes and regulations and addresses only the consistency of the proposal with the Code of Professional Responsibility.

In Opinion 595, this Committee considered whether the Code permits a law firm to refer clients to a title abstract company in which the law firm held an interest. In the facts posed in that earlier inquiry, the title abstract company not only performed title searches, but also (as in the inquiry you pose) prepared the title report and either issued or acted as agent for the underwriter of the title insurance policy. This question was analyzed primarily under DR 5101(A), which concerns conflicts of interest involving a lawyer's personal or financial interests and the lawyer's representation of a client. The Committee recognized that the client's interests inherently conflict with those of the title company regarding what risks will be insured:

> Typically this conflict occurs when the lawyer-owned abstract company prepares a title report or serves as an agent for the title underwriter. In either of these situations, the dual roles [of representing a lender and owning the abstract company] are improper because they require a law firm which as a principal in the abstract company prepares a title report showing exceptions in title and recommending whether a title insurance policy will be issued, to negotiate these issues, as counsel for a party in the underlying transaction, with itself.

N.Y. State 595 (1988). The sharpness of this conflict and particularly the differing economic interests of the lender or borrower and the insurer persuaded us that a lawyer ordinarily could not adequately represent the interests of a party in a real estate transaction in which the lawyer held an ownership interest in a title company preparing the title report and issuing (or acting as an agent for the issuer of) the title insurance policy. Id. We concluded that the lawyer could undertake the representation with the informed consent of the parties only in situations in which the title abstract company performed only the ministerial service of conducting a title search.

This Committee's conclusion in Opinion 595, to which we adhere, resolves the question raised by this inquiry. Although the language of DR 5101(A) has been amended since the issuance of N.Y. State 595, we do not believe that the amendments alter the conclusion reached in that opinion. At the time N.Y. State 595 was issued, DR 5101(A) contained no explicit limit on the types of conflicts that could be subject to client consent; nevertheless, in that opinion and in prior ones, this Committee imported the explicit limits on consentable conflicts contained at the time in DR 5105(C) or in EC 52. At that time, DR 5105(C) required a lawyer to determine, in resolving whether client consent could cure a conflict, that it was "obvious" that the lawyer could adequately represent the interests of the client in the matter presenting the conflict; EC 52, now as then, counsels a lawyer to decline a proffered engagement if (among other things) a "reasonable probability" exists that the lawyer's personal interests will adversely affect the advice to be given or the services rendered to the client.

Today, as a result of a recent amendment, DR 5101(A) explicitly limits when client consent may cure a conflict to those circumstances in which "a disinterested lawyer would believe that the representation of the client will not be adversely affected." As explained when the change was proposed, the "disinterested lawyer" standard is more "understandable and objective" than the "obviousness" test. N.Y. State Bar Association, Special Committee to Review the Code of Professional Responsibility, Proposed Amendments to New York Lawyer's Code of Professional Responsibility 61 (Mar. 4, 1997). However, the essential analysis is unchanged.

Accordingly, a lawyer may not ethically refer a client in a real estate transaction to a title company in which the lawyer holds an interest. It follows that a lawyer may not compensate the lawyer's employees for making such referrals.

Nothing in this opinion is intended to detract from this Committee's longstanding view that "it is not improper for a lawyer to engage in a business other than the practice of law provided that the lawyer does not violate any ethical or legal rules." N.Y. State 583 (1987). Nor does this inquiry require consideration of whether a lawyer engaged in some other business may compensate a law firm's employees based on permissible referrals made to that other business. Rather, we note only that, on the facts presented, N.Y. State 595 compels the conclusion that, when a lawyer is representing a lender in a real estate transaction, the lawyer may not compensate the lawyer's employees for referring the borrower or lender to a title insurance company in which the lawyer holds an interest, regardless of whether the lawyer's client (or any other party to the transaction) consents to the lawyer's dual role.

CONCLUSION:

For the reasons stated, the question is answered in the negative.

OPINION 732 (09/28/2000)

TOPIC: Trade name; firm name

DIGEST: A lawyer named "X" whose law firm includes a number of associates may practice under the name "The X Group"

CODE: DR 2-102(A); DR 2-102(B); EC 2-11

QUESTION:

Under DR 2-102(B), may an attorney use his or her surname together with the word "group" as a law firm name where the attorney's firm has a number of associates?

OPINION:

The question is raised by an attorney ("X") who has a number of associates as to whether the attorney's firm may do business under the name "The X Group." This question is governed by DR 2-102(B), which provides in pertinent part:

> A lawyer in private practice shall not practice under a trade name, a name that is misleading as to the identity of the lawyer or lawyers practicing under such name, or a firm name containing names other than those of one or more of the lawyers in the firm . . . .

DR 2-102(B) restricts the use of trade names to protect the public from being deceived about the identity, responsibility or status of the individuals using the name. Matter of Von Wiegen, 63 N.Y.2d 163, 177, 481 N.Y.S.2d 40, 47 (1984); see EC 2-11 ("The name under which a lawyer practices may be a factor in the selection process. The use of a trade name or an assumed name could mislead non-lawyers concerning the identity, responsibility, and status of those practicing thereunder . . ."); N.Y. State 636 (1992); N.Y. State 459 (1977); N.Y. State 495 (1978); Matter of Shepard, 92 A.D.2d 978, 459 N.Y.S.2d 632, 633 (3d Dept. 1983); see also Friedman v. Rogers, 440 U.S. 1, 14 (1978) (provision prohibiting the use of trade name by optometrists was not unconstitutional because it furthered the state's interest by protecting the public from deceptive and misleading use of trade names).

Thus, the question is whether the name, "The X Group," would be misleading to the public. Earlier decisions provide some guidance, but ultimately the question whether a particular term would or would not be deceptive calls for an individual determination. By way of example, in Von Wiegen, the court held that the use of the phrase "The Country Lawyer" in flyers distributed by the attorney and on his letterhead is not prohibited under DR 2-102. The court reasoned the phrase was simply a motto separate from the attorney's name. The court further held that the public would not be misled because of the format of the flyer and the balance of the letterhead. In contrast, the Third Department held that the use of a firm name "The People's Law Firm of A, Attorney, P.C." in advertising was deceptive and misleading under DR 2-102(A) because the word "People's" misrepresented the nature of the firm. Therefore, DR 2-102(B) prohibited the use of such name by a lawyer as it constituted a prohibited and misleading trade name. Matter of Shepard, 92 A.D.2d at 978. Likewise, in N.Y. State 636 (1992), this committee concluded that a lawyer could not use a firm name that did not include the name of any attorneys associated with the firm, because doing so would be misleading.

We do not believe that the name "The X Group" would deceive the public about the identity, responsibility or status of those who use the name. A group is simply "a number of individuals bound together by a community of interest, purpose or function." Webster's Third New World Dictionary (7th ed. 1993). The name "The X Group" signifies nothing more than that the attorney X practices law together with a group of other individuals, which is in fact the case. Unlike the term "People," which the court in Shepard found to be misleading to the public, the term "Group" is not misleadingly suggestive, would not induce clients to select the law firm based on erroneous assumptions about the firm, and would not misrepresent the nature of the entity operating under that name.

CONCLUSION:

For the reasons stated, the question is answered in the affirmative.

OPINION 733 (10/05/2000)

TOPIC: Sharing legal fees with non-lawyer employees

DIGEST: Non-lawyers may be compensated based on a profit sharing arrangement but may not be paid a percentage of profits or fees attributable to particular client matters referred by the employee.

CODE: DR 2103(B); DR 3102(A)(3); EC 38

QUESTION:

Does the 1999 amendment to DR 3-102(A)(3) of the New York Lawyer's Code of Professional Responsibility, which permits non-lawyer employees to be compensated based on a "profit-sharing" arrangement, allow a lawyer to pay a non-lawyer employee a percentage of fees attributable to matters referred by the employee?

OPINION:

DR 3-102(A)(3) addresses the topic of lawyers dividing legal fees with non-lawyer employees. The rule recently was amended to expand the circumstances in which a non-lawyer employee may be compensated based on a profit-sharing arrangement:

> A lawyer or law firm may compensate a non-lawyer employee, or include a non-lawyer employee in a retirement plan, based in whole or in part on a profit-sharing arrangement.

The New York State Bar Association Special Committee to Review the Code of Professional Responsibility, which prepared the amendment to DR 3-102(A)(3), offered the following explanation of the change:

> Incorporates the substance of Model Rule 5.4(a)(3) in allowing non-lawyer employees of a lawyer or law firm to participate in a profit-sharing plan with respect to their salaries and bonuses and otherwise to be compensated, in whole or in part, based on the profitability of the lawyer or law firm. Under the current rule, non-lawyer employees may participate in profit-sharing only as part of a retirement plan.

Whereas the Disciplinary Rule previously limited profit-sharing arrangements with non-legal employees to retirement plans, the rule now expressly permits non-lawyer compensation to be "based in whole or in part on a profit-sharing arrangement." See also EC 3-8 ("profit-sharing compensation or retirement plans of a lawyer or law firm which include non-lawyer office employees are not improper"); cf. Utah State Bar, Ethics Advisory Op. Comm., Op. 139 (1994) (non-lawyer office administrator may be compensated based on a percentage of the net or gross income of the firm so long as compensation is not tied to receipt of particular fees).

The Committee has been asked whether DR 3-102 as amended to permit "profit-sharing compensation" would now allow payment to a non-lawyer employee of a percentage of fees attributable to matters referred by the employee as compensation for the referral. Although the Disciplinary Rule as amended provides greater latitude with respect to compensation arrangements for non-lawyer employees that have profit sharing as a component, the particular compensation arrangement suggested continues to be unethical.[7]

DR 3-102 generally prohibits the sharing of legal fees with non-lawyers. It has long been believed that "fee-splitting between lawyer and layman . . . poses the possibility of control by the lay person, interested in his own profit, rather than the client's fate." Emmons v. State Bar, 86 Cal. Rptr. 367, 372 (Ct. App. 1970). The Code's approbation of lay compensation based on "profit sharing" does not represent a departure from the general prohibition against fee sharing. Rather, it specifies a particular situation where the dangers of lay interference with the exercise of independent professional judgment that are inherent in most fee sharing arrangements are not present. See EC 3-8. The limited circumstance contemplated by the 1999 amendment – compensation based on a lawyer or law firm's business performance – is just that; it is not an endorsement of or a departure from the general prohibition against sharing of legal fees.

Indeed, that general prohibition survives not only in DR 3-102; a particular application of the prohibition is reflected in DR 2-103(B), which provides that "a lawyer shall not compensate or give anything of value to a person or organization to recommend or obtain employment by a client or as a reward for having made a recommendation resulting in employment by a client." Cf. N.Y. State 731 (2000) (lawyer may not compensate employees for making a referral to a title company owned by the lawyer). This specific prohibition is not in conflict with the authority to compensate non-lawyers based on a profit sharing arrangement. While non-lawyers may be paid based on a lawyer or law firm's profitability or business performance, a non-lawyer may not be paid a percentage of fees attributable to matters referred by the employee. Indeed, a contrary construction of the new amendment to DR 3-102 would conflict directly with Section 491 of the Judiciary Law, which provides:

> 1. It shall be unlawful for any person, partnership, corporation, or association to divide with or receive from, or to agree to divide with or receive from, any attorney-at-law or group of attorneys-at-law, whether practicing in this state or elsewhere, either before or after action brought, any portion of any fee or compensation, charged or received by such attorney-at-law or any valuable consideration or reward, as an inducement for placing, or in consideration of having placed, in the hands of such attorney-at-law, or in the hands of another person, a claim or demand of any kind for the purpose of collecting such claim, or bringing an action thereon, or of representing claimant in the pursuit of any civil remedy for the recovery thereof. But this section does not apply to an agreement between attorneys and counsellors-at-law to divide between themselves the compensation to be received.

Thus, DR 3-102's allowance of profit-sharing arrangements between lawyers and non-lawyers may not be used to circumvent the specific prohibition on fee sharing reflected in Judiciary Law §491 and DR 2-103(B). DR 3-102 does not countenance a compensation arrangement whereby a lawyer pays a non-lawyer employee a percentage of fees attributable to matters referred by the employee. Other compensation arrangements that have profit sharing as a component would be permitted under the amendment to DR 3-102, provided the arrangement is not designed to reward a lay person for having made the referral or recommendation resulting in employment.

7 Whether and under what circumstances a lawyer may now compensate a non-lawyer employee based on the profitability of a particular client's matter where the payment is not compensation for a referral is beyond the scope of this opinion.

CONCLUSION:

Under DR 3-102(A)(3) as amended, a lawyer may compensate non-lawyer employees based on profit sharing but may not tie remuneration to the success of specific efforts by employees to solicit business for lawyers or law firms.

OPINION 734 (11/01/2000)

TOPIC: Attorney's obligation to report to a client a significant error or omission that may give rise to a possible malpractice claim.

DIGEST: A legal services organization is subject to the same ethical standards as other law offices, and therefore must report to the client a significant error or omission that may give rise to a possible malpractice claim, and depending on the circumstances, it may be required to withdraw its representation of the client.

CODE: DR 5101(A); DR 6102; DR 2110(A)(2); EC 2-6; EC 28; EC 232; EC 51; EC 5-11; EC 77; and EC 78.

QUESTIONS:

1. Is a Legal Aid Society ("Society"), which provides legal services to low-income clients, bound by the ethical standards which require attorneys to disclose significant errors and omissions to their clients?

2. If so, may the Society continue as counsel if, after having made full disclosure of such an error, a client still wants the organization to continue its representation?

OPINION:

As a general rule, whether an attorney has an obligation to disclose a mistake to a client will depend on the nature of the lawyer's possible error or omission, whether it is possible to correct it in the pending proceeding, the extent of the harm resulting from the possible error or omission, and the likelihood that the lawyer's conduct would be deemed unreasonable and therefore give rise to a colorable malpractice claim. Ordinarily, since lawyers have an obligation to keep their clients reasonably informed about the matter and to provide information that their clients need to make decisions relating to the representation, the Society's lawyer would have an obligation to disclose to the client the possibility that they have made a significant error or omission. See N.Y. State Op. 396 (1975); EC 77, EC 78.

DR 5101(A) governs the question of whether the Society and its lawyers have a conflict of interest arising out of their personal interest in avoiding civil liability and, if so, whether the lawyers may nevertheless continue the representation with "the client's consent to the representation after full disclosure of the implications of the lawyer's interest." In general, under DR 5101(A), the lawyers would have a conflict of interest if "the exercise of professional judgment on behalf of the client will be or reasonably may be affected by the lawyer's own" interest, and, in that event, the Society could continue the representation with the client's informed consent only if "a disinterested lawyer would believe that the representation of the client will not be adversely affected thereby."

This Committee's prior opinions provide guidance about how these principles generally apply when a lawyer has made a significant error or omission in the course of the representation, although their application will obviously vary depending on the facts of the particular case. For example, in N.Y. State 275 (1972), we addressed the situation of a lawyer who failed to file a claim within the statute of limitations period. We held that a lawyer had a professional duty to notify the client promptly that the lawyer had committed a serious and irremediable error, and of the possible claim the client may have against the lawyer for damages. Because the error could not be remedied and the representation was all but concluded, we further held that the lawyer should withdraw from the matter after having made the necessary full disclosure. In such a situation, not only was there an inherent conflict between the interest of the client and the lawyer's own interest, but, from an objective perspective, one could not be confident that the quality of the lawyer's work would be unaffected if the representation continued. We advised that, upon withdrawing, the lawyer should recommend that the client retain other counsel. See also DR 5101(A); DR 6102; EC 51; EC 26; and EC 511; N.Y. State 295 (1973) (reaffirming N.Y. State 275); N.Y. City 19952 (1995) (a lawyer failed to settle a judgment within time period prescribed by procedural rules).

Of course, not every possible error creates a possible claim for malpractice. Some errors can be corrected during the course of the representation. Others are not particularly harmful to the client's cause. In some cases, it may be questionable whether the lawyer acted erroneously at all. Therefore, when a lawyer makes a mistake in the representation of a client, the likelihood that the lawyer's representation will be affected adversely because of the lawyer's interest in avoiding civil liability will depend upon all the relevant facts.

Earlier opinions also make clear that the Society is subject to the same general standard as other law offices, even though its clients, who have limited financial resources, may find it more difficult to retain other counsel. See N.Y. City 19952 (1995) (holding that a legal services organization that may have committed malpractice should withdraw its representation and advise an indigent client to obtain legal advice from an attorney not employed by the organization); DR 5101(A); EC51; and EC 511. If the Society is required to withdraw from the representation because of the possibility that its lawyers' representation will be adversely affected by their own or the Society's interest, another legal services organization may be willing to undertake representation of the client or the client may be able to retain a private attorney on a contingency fee or on a pro bono basis. Unfortunately, it is also possible that the client may go unrepresented if another attorney is unavailable or unwilling to assume the matter. In any case, the Society cannot withdraw its representation until it "has taken steps to the extent reasonably practical to avoid foreseeable prejudice to the rights of the client," the specifics of which would depend on the circumstances of a particular case. See DR 2110(A)(2); DR 6102; EC 26; EC 28; and EC 232. However, if the matter is in litigation, the Society must seek permission from the Court before withdrawing. DR 2110(A)(1).

CONCLUSION:

The Society is bound by the same ethical standards as other law offices, and therefore has an obligation to report to the client that it has made a significant error or omission that may give rise to a possible malpractice claim. In such a situation, the Society will be required to withdraw as counsel if its continued representation would be adversely affected by its interest in avoiding civil liability.

TOPIC: Communications in noncriminal matters with independent contractors of adverse parties

DIGEST: Lawyer in civil litigation may properly communicate with independent contractor of adverse corporate party unless lawyer knows independent contractor has retained counsel in the matter or, under the Court of Appeals analysis in Niesig v. Team I, is represented by the corporation's counsel in the matter. However, lawyer may not knowingly elicit information protected by the attorney-client privilege or the work-product doctrine that the accountant has an obligation to keep confidential.

CODE: DR 7104(A)(1)

QUESTION:

In civil litigation, may a lawyer communicate with an independent contractor hired by the opposing corporate party without obtaining the consent of opposing counsel?

OPINION:

A lawyer represents a party in a civil matter pending in a New York court. The opposing party, a corporation, is represented by counsel in the lawsuit. The lawyer would like to contact and interview an accountant who has been working for the corporation for several hours per week as an independent contractor.

The question of whether the lawyer may interview the accountant is primarily governed by DR 7-104(A)(1), which provides:

> A. During the course of the representation of a client a lawyer shall not:
> > 1. Communicate or cause another to communicate on the subject of the representation with a party the lawyer knows to be represented by a lawyer in that matter unless the lawyer has the prior consent of the lawyer representing such other party or is authorized by law to do so.

The purpose of this rule is to preserve the proper functioning of the attorney-client relationship and to shield the adverse party from improper approaches. N.Y. State 652 (1993); N.Y. State 607 (1990).

Outside the criminal context, where the scope and application of the rule has been hotly debated,[1] this Committee and other authorities have uniformly interpreted the rule to apply to any person or entity who is represented in a matter. Thus, the rule applies to a represented party to a transaction as well as a party to a lawsuit; it applies to one who retains counsel in connection with a dispute even prior to the filing of a lawsuit; and during a civil lawsuit it applies to represented witnesses, potential witnesses and others with an interest or right at stake, although they are not nominal parties to the lawsuit. See, e.g., N.Y. State 607 (1990); N.Y. State 656 (1993) ("we have [previously] described DR 7-104's scope as applicable to represented 'persons,' not merely technical parties") (citing N.Y. State 463 (1977) and N.Y. State 650 (1993)); Roy Simon, Simon's New York Code of Professional Responsibility Annotated 448 (2000 ed.); see also Monceret v. The Board of Prof'l Responsibility, 2000 Tenn. Lexis 430 (Tenn. 2000) (attorney barred from communicating with a represented witness); In re Illuzzi, 159 Vt. 155 (1992) (attorney barred from communicating with two insurance companies, not named parties in the lawsuit, after they had retained counsel to defend personal injury claims, without defense counsel's prior consent).

Although the Appellate Divisions, in recently amending the Code, declined to accept the New York State Bar Association's proposal that the term "party" in DR 7104 be changed to "person" for reasons of clarity (and not to effect a substantive change in the rule), we do not understand that the decision to retain the term "party" was intended to cut back on the long-standing, universal understanding concerning the scope of DR 7-104(A)(1) in noncriminal cases.

Thus, the question is whether the accountant employed as an independent contractor is known to be "represented" in the matter. (We have previously identified circumstances in which a lawyer has a duty of inquiry before concluding that the individual is unrepresented. See N.Y. State 728 (2000) and opinions cited therein.) If the accountant has personally retained a lawyer to provide legal assistance to him in connection with the lawsuit (e.g., regarding the accountant's role as a witness), then the accountant is clearly represented for purposes of the rule. In that event, the lawyer may not communicate with the accountant about the matters involved in the lawsuit without the consent of the accountant's counsel.

Assuming the accountant has not personally retained counsel, the question is whether, for purposes of DR 7-104(A)(1), he or she would be considered to be represented by the corporation's counsel. This question is governed by the analysis set forth by the Court of Appeals in Niesig v. Team I, 76 N.Y. 2d 363, 371 (1990). In Niesig, the Court recognized that "corporations act solely through natural persons, and unless some employees are also considered parties, corporations are effectively read out of the rule." The Court held that when a corporation is represented in a matter, DR 7-104(A)(1) therefore forbids communications with those "corporate employees whose acts or omissions in the matter under inquiry are binding on the corporation (in effect, the corporation's 'alter ego') or imputed to the corporation for purposes of its liability, or employees implementing the advice of counsel. All other employees may be interviewed informally." Id. at 374. The Court further stated, "This test . . . permit[s] direct access to employees who [are] merely witnesses to an event for which the corporate employer is sued." Id. at 375.

1 The extent to which DR 7104(a)(1) and the similar "no contact" rule found in Rule 4.2 of the ABA Model Rules of Professional Conduct apply to criminal matters has been the subject of considerable controversy. See, e.g.,Grievance Comm. for S. Dist. of N.Y. v. Simels, 48 F.3d 640, 643 (1995); United States v. Israel SantiagoLugo, 162 F.R.D. 11, 12 (1995). Consequently, and also because of additional Constitutional considerations that may be applicable in criminal proceedings, the Committee at this time expresses no opinion as to the application of DR 7104(A) in the criminal context. For an extensive discussion of the issues regarding application of DR 7104(A) in criminal matters, see Bruce A. Green, A Prosecutor's Communications with Defendants: What Are the Limits?, 24 Crim. L. Bull. 283 (1988).

We so no reason why the analysis in Niesig would not apply to independent contractors hired by a corporation as it applies to corporate employees and officers. For example, if the lawyer in this inquiry were to know that the accountant had the legal authority to bind the corporation or was responsible for implementing the advice of the corporation's counsel, the lawyer would be prohibited from communicating with the accountant without the consent of the corporation's counsel.

If the accountant has not personally retained counsel in the matter and is not considered to be represented by the corporation's counsel under the Niesig standard, however, then DR 7-104(A)(1) would not bar the lawyer from communicating with the accountant. This Committee has consistently opined that a lawyer may properly interview an unrepresented witness for the opposing side in a proceeding without the consent of opposing counsel. N.Y. State 577 (1986) (adversary's expert witness); N.Y. State 463 (1977) (child's mother in a paternity proceeding instituted by the Commissioner of Social Services against the putative father).

The extent of permissible communications may be limited, however, if it is known or learned that the accountant possesses information that is protected by the corporation's attorney-client privilege or as attorney work product. We have recognized that a lawyer may not deliberately elicit privileged information from one who is not authorized to make disclosure. N.Y. State 700 (1998). Therefore, the lawyer communicating with the accountant may not knowingly elicit information protected by the attorney-client privilege or the work-product doctrine that the accountant has an obligation to keep confidential. Further, if the lawyer knows in advance or learns in the course of conversation with the accountant that the only relevant information possessed by the accountant is protected from disclosure, as might be the case if the accountant were retained in the matter to lend expert assistance to the corporation's counsel, see, e.g., United States v. Schwimmer, 892 F.2d 237 (1989); United States v. Kovel, 296 F.2d 918 (2nd Cir., 1961), then it would be improper thereafter to communicate with the accountant at all concerning the matter even if the accountant were unrepresented.

CONCLUSION:

Under DR 7104(A), a lawyer who represents a civil litigant may properly communicate with an independent contractor who is employed by the adverse corporate party without consent of opposing counsel if the independent contractor is not represented in the matter. For purposes of the ethical restriction, the independent contractor is "represented" if the independent contractor has retained counsel in the matter or, under the Court of Appeals analysis in Nieseg v. Team I, is represented by the corporation's counsel in the matter. In communicating with an independent contractor who is unrepresented, the lawyer may not knowingly elicit information protected by the attorney-client privilege or the work-product doctrine that the accountant has an obligation to keep confidential.

MODIFIES: N.Y. State 258 (1972)

TOPIC: Mediation; matrimonial matters

DIGEST: Lawyer-mediator may not draft and file separation agreement and divorce papers on behalf of spouses as joint clients unless the lawyer can satisfy the "disinterested lawyer" test of DR 5-105(C)

CODE: DR 5-101(A), DR 5-105(A) & (C), EC 5-20

QUESTIONS:

May an attorney engaged in matrimonial mediation draft and file a separation agreement and divorce papers that incorporate terms agreed upon by the marital parties in the course of the mediation?

OPINION:

As we have recognized in the past, a lawyer who serves as a mediator to assist in the resolution of a possible dispute does not "represent" either party as a client for purposes of the conflict-of-interest rules and other rules governing the lawyer-client relationship. Therefore, even in many situations where a lawyer could not properly represent two clients with differing interests, the lawyer may serve them both as a mediator. This is true in matrimonial as well as other legal contexts. In N.Y. State 258 (1972), although we concluded that a lawyer may not jointly represent the spouses in a divorce proceeding, we also observed, "A lawyer approached by husband and wife in a matrimonial matter and asked to represent both, may . . . properly undertake to serve as a mediator or arbitrator." Accord N.Y. City 80-23 (1981) ("The Code's recognition that lawyers may serve as mediators (EC 5-20), as well as ethical aspirations which recognize a lawyer's duty to assist the public in recognizing legal problems and aiding those who cannot afford the usual costs of legal assistance (EC 2-1; EC 2-25), make it inconceivable to us that the Code would deny the public the availability of non-adversary legal assistance in the resolution of divorce disputes").

This is not to say that all matrimonial disputes are appropriate candidates for mediation. Matrimonial mediation may be undertaken in many circumstances, but in some circumstances, as the Association of the Bar of the City of New York recognized in N.Y. City 80-23 (1981), > the complex and conflicting interests involved in a particular matrimonial dispute, the difficult legal issues involved, the subtle legal ramifications of particular resolutions, and the inequality in bargaining power resulting from differences in the personalities or sophistication of the parties make it virtually impossible to achieve a just result free from later recriminations or bias or malpractice, unless both parties are represented by separate counsel. In the latter circumstances, informing the parties that the lawyer "represents" neither party and obtaining their consent, even after a full explanation of the risks, may not be meaningful; the distinction between representing both parties and not representing either, in such circumstances, may be illusory.

Thus, there will be situations where the lawyer-mediator must not initially undertake, or must thereafter end, the mediation because a party's interests cannot fairly be protected without obtaining independent legal advice, or because a party needs a lawyer's assistance to protect against overreaching. However, the fact that the parties may begin with differing interests that would preclude a joint representation does not, in and by itself, foreclose the possibility of mediation.

The question now before us is whether, at the conclusion of any mediation, having assisted the parties in achieving the general terms of a settlement (which the lawyer-mediator would typically outline in a document), the lawyer-mediator may then proceed to represent the parties and draft and file legal documents on their behalf – in particular, the separation agreement and divorce papers. At that point, of course, the lawyer would be representing two clients who expect to become facial adversaries in a matrimonial litigation, and the representation would be subject to DR 5-105(A) and (C), which address the joint representation of clients with differing interests.

Ethical Consideration ("EC") 5-20, on its face, might appear to foreclose any aspect of a joint representation, inasmuch as it provides:

> A lawyer is often asked to serve as an impartial arbitrator or mediator in matters which involve present or former clients. The lawyer may serve in either capacity after disclosing such present or former relationships. A lawyer who has undertaken to act as an impartial arbitrator or mediator should not thereafter represent in the dispute any of the parties involved.

(Emphasis added.) In our judgment, however, this provision is directed at situations in which the mediation does not successfully resolve the dispute between the parties, and the lawyer-mediator proposes to go from being a mediator between the two parties to representing only one of the parties "in the dispute." Thus, as we recognized in Opinion 258 in the matrimonial context in particular, a lawyer who serves as mediator in a matrimonial dispute may not later represent one party against the other if the dispute is not successfully resolved in mediation. We do not believe, however, that it is categorically improper for a lawyer, after successfully concluding a mediation, to represent both parties to the mediation with the consent of each, if there is no longer a "dispute" between them.

As to whether a lawyer-mediator – or, for that matter, any other lawyer – may represent parties to a divorce for the limited purpose of drafting and filing a settlement agreement and divorce papers, or whether such a joint representation is categorically forbidden by DR 5-105(A) and (C), we turn first to Opinion 258, where we opined :

> It would be improper for a lawyer to represent both husband and wife at any stage of a marital problem, even with full disclosure and informed consent of both parties. The likelihood of prejudice is so great in this type of matter as to make impossible adequate representation of both spouses, even where the separation is "friendly" and the divorce uncontested.

We reasoned that dual representation would never satisfy the then "obviousness" test of DR 5-105(C)[2] because of the "substantial likelihood of prejudice or professional conflict of interest in every matrimonial problem."

We now modify our previous view to the extent reflected in this opinion. There can be no question that the representation of parties who are on opposite sides of a divorce case invariably involves representation of "differing interests" for purposes of DR 5-105(A). Therefore, DR 5-105(C) would forbid the dual representation unless, in any particular case, a disinterested lawyer would believe that the lawyer can competently represent the interests of each spouse and each client consents to the representation after full disclosure of the implications of the simultaneous representation and the advantages and risks involved. However, because there will be occasions when a "disinterested lawyer" would believe that the lawyer-mediator can competently represent the interests of each spouse by preparing and filing the settlement agreement and divorce papers, we reject the dictate of Opinion 258 that the joint representation is per se impermissible in any and all circumstances.

We remain convinced, however, that in the generality of cases, even if the spouses agree on the broad outlines of a settlement at the conclusion of the mediation, a disinterested lawyer will not be able to conclude that he or she can competently represent the interests of each spouse. Although there is general agreement on broad settlement terms, many particulars may remain to be worked out in the course of drafting a settlement agreement. Even with respect to the terms on which there appears to be agreement, one or both spouses may benefit from a disinterested lawyer's advice as to whether the agreement meets with the spouse's legitimate objectives and what other procedural alternatives may be available to achieve more favorable terms. One or both spouses may thus benefit from a disinterested lawyer's advice as to (1) his or her legal options, (2) how the settlement terms will or will not meet the client's interests, and (3) alternative ways to fashion a settlement agreement. Likewise, one or both may benefit from the assistance of a disinterested lawyer in negotiating the terms and/or thereafter drafting the terms.

In short, under the disinterested lawyer test of DR 5-105(C), the lawyer may not represent both spouses unless the lawyer objectively concludes that, in the particular case, the parties are firmly committed to the terms arrived at in mediation, the terms are faithful to both spouses' objectives and consistent with their legal rights, there are no remaining points of contention, and the lawyer can competently fashion the settlement agreement and divorce documents. In those circumstances, the per se ban of N.Y. State 258 should be relaxed to permit spouses to avoid the expense incident to separate representation and permit them to consummate a truly consensual parting, provided both spouses consent to the representation after full disclosure of the implications of the simultaneous representation and the advantages and risks involved.[3]

Because the "disinterested lawyer" test cannot easily be met, the lawyer-mediator may not prepare and file a settlement agreement and divorce papers after the conclusion of the mediation as a matter of regular practice on behalf of spouses who are otherwise unrepresented.[4] Nor may the lawyer-mediator, in advertising, a retainer agreement, or other communications with potential clients, state or imply that, in the ordinary course, the lawyer will routinely prepare and file the divorce papers after the mediation is completed. The likelihood that joint representation will satisfy the standard of DR 5-105(C) is so uncertain prior to the start of the mediation that it would be misleading for the lawyer to indicate that preparing and filing the divorce papers for the spouses is part of the lawyer's standard practice.

2 The "obviousness" test has been replaced by the "disinterested lawyer" test, which has been codified in DR 5-101(A) and DR 5-105(C).

3 Full disclosure should include advising both clients of the risk of a legal challenge, since "the absence of independent representation is a significant factor to be taken into consideration when determining whether a separation agreement was freely and fairly entered into" when "the same attorney represented both parties in the preparation of the agreement." Levine v. Levine, 56 N.Y.2d 42, 451 N.Y.S.2d 26, 28 (1982).

In reaching our conclusion, we are not unmindful of the decision in Levine v. Levine, 56 N.Y.2d 42, 451 N.Y.S.2d 26 (1982), in which the Court of Appeals held that the mere fact that a separation agreement was prepared by one attorney representing both husband and wife was not sufficient, "in and of itself, to establish overreaching requiring a rescission of the agreement." In Levine, after a non-jury trial, the trial court "found no evidence of coercion, undue influence or overreaching practiced by the husband," and made specific factual findings "that the agreement was fair" and "that the attorney had 'managed to preserve neutrality' throughout his joint representation of the couple." Under those circumstances, while acknowledging that "the potential conflict of interest inherent in such joint representation suggests that the husband and wife should retain separate counsel," the Court of Appeals stated that "the parties have an absolute right to be represented by the same attorney provided 'there has been full disclosure between the parties, not only of all relevant facts but also of their contextual significance, and there has been an absence of inequitable conduct or other infirmity which might vitiate the execution of the agreement.' (Christian v. Christian, 42 NY2d 63, 72, supra.)"

Although the Court's reference to the parties' "absolute right to be represented by the same attorney" might be read to supersede DR 5-105(A) and (C), we do not believe that was the Court's intention. We are not aware of any published decisions since 1982, when the Court decided Levine, that hold, on the basis of the Court's dicta, that a lawyer may represent spouses jointly in divorce proceedings even when the representation would otherwise be forbidden by DR 5-105(C) because a disinterested lawyer would not believe that the lawyer can competently represent the interests of each. Further, we note that, in Levine, the Court did not explicitly address the propriety of the joint representation under the disciplinary rules. Rather, the question before the Court was whether a court would grant the extraordinary remedy of rescission on a particular set of facts. The answer did not turn on whether or not the lawyer properly undertook the representation.[5] Even if, after the representation has come to an end, a court in full possession of all relevant facts concludes that there was "an absence of inequitable conduct or other infirmity which might vitiate the execution of the agreement," it may nevertheless have been improper to undertake the representation at the outset, in light of the facts then known to the lawyer and the risk that one or both spouses would be disadvantaged by the lack of independent counsel.

4 If the spouses are independently represented by lawyers who are prepared, insofar as necessary, to advise about the settlement terms, negotiate unresolved terms, and review the settlement agreement and other papers, then we see no restriction on the lawyer-mediator serving as drafter and reducing to writing an oral agreement that encompasses a mutually agreeable understanding between the parties on all issues. In essence, the lawyer will then be serving as a mere amanuensis, and will not be exercising independent professional judgment on behalf of one spouse or the other with respect to the settlement terms.

5 It is well-settled that in a litigation context, the "ethical standards that guide attorneys in their professional conduct . . . cannot be applied as if they were controlling statutory or decisional law". S & S Hotel Ventures v. 777 S.H. Corp., 69 N.Y.2d 437, 515 N.Y.S.2D 735, 738 (1987). Conversely, an ethical violation does not create a cause of action in favor of third parties where the facts do not fit within an acknowledged category of tort or contract liability. Shapiro v. McNeil, 92 N.Y.2d 91, 677 N.Y.S.2d 48, 50 (1998).

Finally, we note that, in cases where it is permissible for the lawyer-mediator to draft and file divorce papers, if the lawyer does not make a formal appearance in the divorce proceeding, the lawyer must ensure that his or her role is disclosed to the court. Otherwise, there is a risk that the court will be misled to believe that the papers were prepared by the parties themselves, and, further, the court will not know which lawyer is responsible in the event it has concerns about the preparation and contents of the legal documents. See N.Y. State 613 (1990).

CONCLUSION:

An attorney-mediator may prepare divorce documents incorporating a mutually acceptable separation agreement and represent both parties only in those cases where mediation has proven entirely successful, the parties are fully informed, no contested issues remain, and the attorney-mediator satisfies the "disinterested lawyer" test of DR 5-105(C).

OPINION 737 (02/01/2001)

TOPIC: Escrow accounts

DIGEST: A lawyer may not issue a check from an attorney escrow account drawn against a bank or certified check that has not been deposited or has not cleared.

CODE: DR 9102

QUESTION:

In payment of a client's obligations to a third party, may a lawyer issue an attorney escrow check against undeposited or uncleared client funds delivered to the lawyer in the form of a bank or certified check?

OPINION:

Disciplinary Rule (DR) 9-102 establishes the framework for how lawyers must handle clients' funds. For example, DR 9102(A) provides that a lawyer is a fiduciary with respect to the client whose funds are maintained in the lawyer's escrow account and prohibits the lawyer from commingling such funds with the lawyer's own. DR 9102(B)(1) requires a lawyer to maintain an escrow account for client funds "separate from any business or personal accounts of the lawyer or the lawyer's firm, and separate from any accounts which the lawyer may maintain as executor, guardian, trustee or receiver, or in any other fiduciary capacity." DR 9102(C)(4) requires a lawyer to promptly pay to the client from escrow those funds which the client is entitled to receive. DR 9102(D) requires certain bookkeeping records be maintained for escrow accounts which, pursuant to subdivision (1) thereof, "specifically identify the date, source and description of each item deposited, as well as the date, payee and purpose of each withdrawal or disbursement."

Implicit in this framework is that a lawyer will not draw on funds belonging to Client A for the benefit of Client B. Yet this is literally what occurs where a lawyer maintains funds belonging to multiple clients in a single unsegregated escrow account and issues a check in payment of the obligation of one client before certified checks or bank checks delivered to the attorney's possession for the benefit of that client in amounts sufficient to cover that obligation are deposited into the lawyer's escrow account and cleared. The issue before this Committee is whether there are practical considerations which, with appropriate safeguards, may permit a relaxation of the ethical proscription against a lawyer, in effect, granting Client B a temporary loan out of funds belonging to Client A.

The issue arises most often in the context of residential real estate closings. In many parts of the State, the seller's attorney or a real estate broker typically holds funds from the buyer in an escrow account. The amount, which in some transactions may be as much as ten percent of the purchase price, represents the buyer's down payment delivered upon execution of a residential purchase contract. This down payment — cleared by the time of closing — may be sufficient for the seller's closing obligations if there is adequate pre-closing planning and communication between the attorneys for the seller, the attorneys for the purchaser and the attorneys for the purchaser's lending institution concerning the correct closing figures and the manner of the purchaser's payment of the balance due. Sometimes, however, open taxes, open judgments or other liens will first appear in a continuation title search run immediately prior to or at the closing in amounts that exceed the funds already cleared and in escrow. As these encumbrances constitute a cloud on title that must be cleared at the closing in order for the seller to convey good title, the purchaser's title agent must be given adequate funds from or on behalf of the seller to cure the problem or to omit them from the title commitment. For this purpose, only a bank check, a certified check or an attorney's check will typically be accepted.

In these circumstances — where the earnest money or down payment deposited and cleared in escrow is insufficient to satisfy the seller's closing obligations and where bank or certified checks in the proper amounts are not available at the closing — it might seem that a practical solution to avoid the delay, inconvenience and expense of an adjournment would be for the seller's attorney to accept for deposit in his or her escrow account the bank or certified checks tendered by the purchaser or the purchaser's lender for the balance of the purchase price, checks usually made payable to the seller, which the seller then endorses over to the seller's attorney for deposit in the escrow account. The seller's attorney would then issue checks drawn on the escrow account payable in the amounts required to satisfy the seller's closing obligations, including the open taxes, judgments or other liens that encumber the good title that the seller is contractually obligated to convey, and remits the balance of the proceeds to his or her client. Apparently, the title companies and others will accept the escrow check of the seller's attorney, notwithstanding actual knowledge that the bank checks and certified checks delivered to the seller's attorney at the closing have not yet been deposited into the attorney's escrow account and, perforce, have not yet cleared. The seller's attorney is often willing to issue such escrow checks because there are sufficient funds, already cleared on deposit in the attorney's escrow account, to cover the checks issued at the closing. To the extent the total amount of the escrow checks issued at closing thus exceeds the buyer's down payment or earnest money, the funds on deposit in the attorney's escrow account that are used to cover the excess are indisputably funds belonging to other clients.

There are a number of arguments that can be advanced in favor of interpreting DR 9102 to allow a lawyer to issue escrow checks on behalf of Client B that are covered by cleared funds in the same escrow account deposited on behalf of Client A where the lawyer is in physical possession of bank or certified checks appropriately endorsed for deposit into the lawyer's escrow account on behalf of Client B that, if and when cleared, would be sufficient to cover those escrow checks. Some of these arguments have been favorably considered by the authorities in other states. Thus, Florida and Illinois have adopted specific rules permitting lawyers to disburse uncleared funds. See Rule 1.15 of the Illinois Rules of Professional Conduct; Rule 51.1(g) of the Rules Regulating the Florida Bar. In addition, New Jersey, North Carolina, and Virginia have approved of the practice, see N.J. Eth. Op. 454 (1980), N.C. Eth. Op. RPC 191 (1997), and Va. Eth. Op. 183 (1996), while South Carolina has not. See In re Hensel, 2000 WL 640239 (S.C. Sup. Ct. May 15, 2000), S.C. Adv. Op. 7820 (1978). On balance, however, we find none of the arguments sufficiently persuasive to subvert the obvious intended core purpose of DR 9102 — to maintain the integrity of a client's funds for the benefit of that client only, until payment of those funds to, for or on behalf of that client and no other client, is due.

First, it can be argued that an attorney comes into "possession" of funds on behalf of Client B within the meaning of DR 9102(A) when he or she receives the bank checks or certified checks properly endorsed for deposit into his escrow account on behalf of Client B at the closing. Because the risk that a certified check or bank check will not clear is considered to be negligible, it can be argued that the receipt should be analogized to the receipt of cash. However, even cash can be lost or stolen between the time of the closing and the time of the bank deposit, and until the cash is deposited and credited to the escrow account, the cash does not generate available funds. A bank or cashier's check may also be subject to a stop payment order if the check was procured by fraud. See, e.g., U.S. Printnet, Inc. v. Chemung Canal Trust Co., 270 A.D.2d 544, 703 N.Y.S.2d 821, 823 (3rd Dept. 2000), and cases cited therein. In addition, the checks themselves may turn out to be forgeries. See, e.g., U.S. v. Van Shutters, 163 F.3d 331 (6th Cir. 1998) (counterfeit bank checks were used to purchase automobiles) and U.S. v. Werber, 787 F. Supp. 353 (S.D.N.Y. 1992) (same). Finally, there has been at least one recent case where a fully licensed mortgage broker was unable to meet its obligations, defaulting on its own checks. See "New York State Banking Department Suspends Mortgage Banker's License," Press Release issued July 5, 2000 by NYS Banking Department, available at http://www.banking.state.ny.us.pr/ (visited 12/5/00).

Second, it is doubtless correct that bank checks and certified checks are ordinarily accepted as a proper tender of payment in business transactions and it is therefore argued to be unreasonable to hold an attorney to a higher standard in the administration of his escrow account. The commercial reasonableness of the practice, however, does not fairly address the situation where one client's funds are being used to cover the checks issued on behalf of another client. If a commercial party chooses to accept the minimal risk of loss associated with the acceptance of a bank check or certified check, that same party will bear any loss that actually comes to pass. However, if Client A's funds are used to cover the checks written by an attorney for the benefit of Client B, and the bank or certified check deposited after the checks are issued to cover Client B's obligations is for whatever reason unpaid, it is Client A, a stranger to the transaction, not Client B, a party to the transaction, who will suffer the loss.

Third, it may indeed be true that in most cases it is incidental closing expenses that will be paid if the subject practice is allowed and that, therefore, any loss, already a remote possibility, will likely be in a nominal amount. In the same vein, it is argued that prohibiting the practice will engender delay and inconvenience and may adversely affect the economy. Whether or not these are accurate statements of the risk and the peril seems, however, beside the point. If a client's funds may not be invaded for the benefit of another, the principle must hold no matter what the size or extent of the planned invasion and no matter what may be the detriment to third parties of withholding the use of that client's funds.

Fourth, the practice of writing escrow checks at a closing drawn on the funds of other clients and against undeposited or uncleared bank or certified checks, if prohibited as unethical, can be argued to have a greater adverse impact upon persons of moderate or low income. This is because, where the price of real estate in a given community is lower, the legal fees associated with the closings are often lower as well. There is more pressure upon attorneys who practice in these communities to generate fees on a volume basis and less time may be spent in preparing for closings generally with a view toward "working out" what title and other problems exist at that time. It is these attorneys who may be compelled to raise their fees in order to carry on their residential real estate practices if more pre-closing preparation time is required to satisfy ethical obligations. Alternatively, if additional pre-closing preparation time is eschewed in favor of an occasional adjournment of a closing in order to allow the seller additional time to clear an unexpected title objection or to allow the purchaser additional time to obtain a bank or certified check in a previously uncalculated or uncommunicated payoff amount, this is still likely to result in additional cost to the parties, as the purchaser's lender will often charge a fee to adjourn a closing and the lender itself will often charge a fee to extend a loan commitment.

Although the Committee is sympathetic to the concerns of all parties to a residential real estate transaction who quite understandably would prefer to avoid the increased legal fees or costs that might be associated with an adjournment of a closing, these considerations are insufficient to overcome the fiduciary obligation that an attorney owes to the attorney's other clients whose funds must not be invaded.

Fifth, it has been suggested that Client A, by allowing his funds to be deposited in an unsegregated attorney escrow account has implicitly consented to the possibility that those funds might be drawn upon in behalf of a Client B, including the small risk that a bank or certified check deposited into the escrow account for the benefit of Client B might be dishonored. The implied consent is said to arise from knowledge of the widespread practice of attorneys writing escrow checks against undeposited or uncleared bank or certified checks. Far from assuming Client A's consent to the practice, this Committee would assume the very opposite — that Client A, if asked, would vigorously object to putting his funds at risk and granting a no-interest loan for the benefit of Client B with whom Client A shares neither a social nor a business bond.

Nor can we ascertain any conditions or qualifications to the issuance of attorney escrow checks against undeposited or uncleared bank or certified checks that might ethically purify the practice. For example, the practice has been found acceptable provided, among other things, that the attorney immediately makes good any loss. See N.C. Eth. Op. RPC 191 (1997). But if the attorney is personally willing to take the risk that the checks will not clear, we see no reason why the attorney should not simply advance the disbursements necessary to effect the closing out of his own operating account and await a refund from his escrow account if and when the bank or certified check clears. From a practical as well as a fiduciary perspective, it is far more appropriate for the attorney for both Client A and Client B to make a temporary, no-interest loan to Client A than it is for Client B to make such loan. The attorney has knowledge of the facts and circumstances pertaining to the closing and can evaluate the degree of risk associated with acceptance of the proffered bank or certified check. Client B, on the other hand, neither knows or controls anything and has consented to nothing.

Finally, we note that our conclusion appears to be in seeming conformance with several recent disciplinary determinations of the Appellate Division, Second Department, and we are unaware of any determinations of the First, Third or Fourth Departments which suggest a contrary result. See Matter of Abbatine, 263 A.D.2d 228, 700 N.Y.S.2d 211 (2d Dept. 1999) (five year suspension ordered for attorney who, inter alia, issued escrow check for $4,147.18 from unsegregated escrow account against $10,000 deposit made 16 days later); Matter of Ferguson, 259 A.D.2d 186, 694 N.Y.S.2d 113 (2d Dept. 1999) (one year suspension ordered for attorney who, inter alia, issued escrow check against "wired" funds not yet received); and Matter of Joyce, 236 A.D.2d 116, 119, 665 N.Y.S.2d 430, 431 (2d Dept. 1997) (indefinite suspension ordered for attorney who, inter alia, "[o]n at least four occasions . . . issued checks from his escrow account for a particular transaction in advance of depositing the subject funds into his escrow account, causing checks to clear against the funds of other clients or third parties").

CONCLUSION:

The Committee welcomes further study of the problem addressed in this opinion with a view toward devising solutions that adhere to ethical requirements. However, for the reasons stated, the question is answered in the negative.

TOPIC: Conflict of interest: referral of clients to title abstract company owned by attorney's spouse

DIGEST: Improper for attorney to refer real estate client to title abstract company in which the attorney's spouse has an ownership interest for other than purely ministerial work

CODE: DR 5101(A), 5105(C)

QUESTION:

May an attorney who represents clients engaged in real estate matters refer those clients to a title abstract company in which the attorney's spouse has an ownership interest?

OPINION:

In N.Y. State 595 (1988), this Committee opined that it was ethically permissible for a law firm to refer real estate clients to a title abstract company in which the firm had an ownership interest "for purely ministerial abstract work," provided the clients gave "an advance, informed consent after full disclosure of the nature of the abstract company's fee structure and the law firm's proprietary interest in the abstract company," and the referral was accompanied by "a notice stating the client's entitlement to receive any appropriate credit for a non-service related fee or disbursement related to the abstract company's role in the transaction." Where, however, the abstract company rendered the additional service of preparing a title report or serving as an agent for the title underwriter, we concluded that "a prohibited conflict of interest arises that may not be cured by the consent of those concerned with the transaction." In N.Y. State 621 (1990), we adhered to the result reached in N.Y. State 595 and clarified and amplified the reasons why the conflict inherent in the dual roles as attorney and principal in an abstract company preparing a title report or acting as agent for the title underwriter was not curable by appropriate disclosure, informed consent and some appropriate credit against the legal fee.

For the reasons stated in N.Y. State 595, as clarified and amplified in N.Y. State 621, we now adhere to the same per se result where the abstract company to which a lawyer refers real estate clients for preparation or procurement of a title report and policy is owned by the attorney's spouse.[6]

We note at the outset that the "obviousness" test of DR 5-105(C) – which this Committee read into the closely analogous conflict of interest proscribed by DR 5101(A) – has now been replaced by a "disinterested lawyer" test that has been expressly incorporated in both DR 5105(C) and DR 5101(A). Under DR 5101(A), as amended in 1999, a client's informed consent after full disclosure is insufficient to cure a conflict of interest where "the exercise of professional judgment on behalf of the client will be or reasonably may be affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property, or personal interests," unless "a disinterested lawyer would believe that the representation of client will not be adversely affected thereby."

6 As we noted in footnote 3 to N.Y. State 621, it is not feasible for this Committee "to prescribe different ethical rules for the variety of ownership, organizational and operational structures that may characterize abstract companies and the differing clients they serve."

The gravamen of the conflict enunciated in our prior opinions was that the dual roles of attorney and owner impermissibly "require a law firm, which as a principal in the abstract company prepares a title report showing exceptions in title and recommending whether a title insurance policy will be issued, to negotiate these issues, as counsel for a party in the underlying transaction, with itself." N.Y. State 595, at 6. In our view, a "disinterested lawyer" would believe that the conflict inherent in those dual roles would adversely affect the representation of the real estate client for the same reasons the conflict would not pass muster under the prior "obviousness" test imported into DR 5101(A). See N.Y. State 731 (2000)(noting that notwithstanding replacement of the "obviousness" test with the "disinterested lawyer" standard, "the essential analysis is unchanged").

Turning now to the precise question before us, we held in N.Y. State 208 (1971) that a lawyer for a real estate client could not also act as a broker in the same transaction, notwithstanding prior disclosure and client consent. We reached the same per se result in N.Y. State 244 (1972), where the real estate broker was the lawyer's spouse because of the "intimate relationship, including financial" between husband and wife. In N.Y. State 291 (1973), we again held that where a lawyer or spouse has an interest in a brokerage agency, the lawyer could not accept both a legal fee and a brokerage commission from the same client in connection with the same transaction "for the reasons stated in N.Y. State 244 (1972)."

In N.Y. State 340 (1974), we reached the same per se result where the attorney's spouse was a salesperson, rather than an owner, in the brokerage agency, reasoning as follows:

> The intimate relationship and economic interests of husband and wife are inseparable; the acts of one directly affecting the other. The representation by the attorney of customers of the spouse's brokerage firm has been disapproved. N.Y. State 244 (1972). For the same reasons the representation by the attorney of customers of the spouse salesperson is disapproved.

In N.Y. State 493 (1978), we cited with approval and continued to adhere to the view expressed in the above four opinions "that a lawyer cannot act in that capacity on behalf of any party to a real estate transaction in which the lawyer or his spouse has acted as broker . . ." (emphasis added).

In the criminal field, we held in N.Y. State 654 (1993) that the district attorney could not represent the People in the same case in which the district attorney's spouse represents a defendant. While criminal cases implicate Canon 9 considerations of fairness and the appearance of fairness to a greater extent than civil cases "[b]ecause the criminal justice system pits the power of the state against an individual on pain of loss of liberty or even life" (N.Y. State 654, at 1), the reasoning of N.Y. State 654 was grounded upon the same rationale as the brokerage commission cases, to wit:

> The professional and financial success of one spouse necessarily benefits the other. N.Y. State 340 (1974); see also ABA 340 (1975). Where a client's interest conflicts with that of the lawyer's spouse, or the spouse's client, we previously have analyzed the situation as involving a possible conflict with the lawyer's self-interest under DR 5101(A) and as creating a potentially impermissible appearance of impropriety under Canon 9. E.g., N.Y. State 583 (1987); N.Y. State 493 (1978) (lawyer may not represent party to real estate transaction in which lawyer's spouse was the broker); N.Y. State 409 (1975) (assistant district attorney and assistant public defender spouses cannot be adversaries in the same case); N.Y. State 378 (1975) (defense lawyer and probation officer who are spouses may not be involved in same criminal case); N.Y. State 368 (1974) (assistant county attorney and spouse may not be adversaries in the same case).

While N.Y. State 654 was also grounded upon DR 9101(D) (added to the Code in 1990), which proscribes certain representations where the lawyers on both sides are related as parent, child, sibling or spouse, we pointed out in the opinion that "DR 9101(D) provides a more explicit textual basis in the Code for the above-cited opinions that, prior to its enactment, the Committee based on DR 5101(A) and Canon 9." Indeed, the inclusion of "spouse" in the relationships proscribed by new DR 9101(D) reinforces the continued viability of our prior opinions on the spousal conflicts in the brokerage commission cases.

In short, the fact that the title abstract agency to which a lawyer refers a real estate client is owned, in whole or in part, by the lawyer's spouse, does not insulate the lawyer from the reach of N.Y. State 595 and N.Y. State 621.

CONCLUSION:

An attorney may not refer a real estate client to a title abstract company for other than ministerial title work where the lawyer's spouse has an ownership interest in the abstract company.

TOPIC: Lawyer referral service; legal fees, domestic relations

DIGEST: Lawyer who represents low or moderate income individual in matrimonial action for a reduced fee may include in retainer agreement provision contemplating an application to the court for counsel fees from the client's spouse at lawyer's customary rate.

CODE: Canon 2, EC 2-25, DR 1-102, DR 2-103(D)(3), DR 2-106(C) (2)(a), Canon 9.

QUESTION:

May an attorney who has agreed to represent a low or moderate income individual in a matrimonial action as part of a bar association sponsored lawyer referral service include in the retainer agreement a provision contemplating an application to the court for counsel fees from the client's spouse based on the attorney's customary rate instead of the reduced rate afforded the client?

OPINION:

Consistent with Canon 2's admonition that "a lawyer should assist the legal profession in fulfilling its duty to make legal counsel available," the Code of Professional Responsibility authorizes bar associations to sponsor or operate lawyer referral services to aid individuals who need assistance in locating lawyers competent to handle their particular problems. DR 2-103(D)(3). Lawyers participating in certain bar association sponsored lawyer referral services fulfill their responsibility to render public interest and pro bono legal service by providing professional services at a reduced fee to individuals of limited financial means. EC 2-25 ("A lawyer has an obligation to render public interest and pro bono legal service. A lawyer may fulfill this responsibility by providing professional service at no fee or at a reduced fee to individuals of limited financial means or to public service or charitable groups or organizations, or by participation in programs and organizations specifically designed to increase the availability of legal services.")

The question presented here is whether a lawyer who has agreed to represent an individual of limited financial means at a reduced rate in a matrimonial action may include in the retainer agreement a provision contemplating that the lawyer may apply to the court pursuant to Domestic Relations Law §237 for counsel fees from the client's spouse, based on the lawyer's higher customary rate.

There is nothing in DR 2-103 itself that would prohibit the proposed retainer agreement. New York has not adopted regulations governing referral services, nor are there any ethics opinions that address this question. Whether such an arrangement is ethically permissible depends, in our view, on whether it would constitute a contingent fee in violation of DR 2-106(C)(2). Because we conclude that it does not constitute a prohibited contingency fee, we answer this question in the affirmative, subject to the conditions we outline below.

For at least a century, the New York courts have proscribed retainer agreements providing for a contingency fee dependent upon procuring a divorce or on the amount of alimony obtained. See Van Vleck v. Van Vleck, 47 N.Y.S. 470 (4th Dep't 1897). That prohibition survives today in DR 2-106(C)(2)(a), which provides that:

> [A] lawyer shall not enter into an arrangement for, charge, or collect any fee in a domestic relations matter the payment or amount of which is contingent upon the securing of a divorce or in any way determined by reference to the amount of maintenance, support, equitable distribution or property settlement.

The public policy reasons behind the prohibition of contingent fees in matrimonial actions is to avoid a situation where a lawyer may have an incentive to promote the breakup of the marriage. Although the proposed retainer might be seen as creating a "contingency" because the lawyer is paid at one rate by the client and another if the court orders payment from the client's spouse, it would not appear to be a contingency fee prohibited by the Code. The higher fee which the lawyer may receive from the client's spouse is not contingent upon the dissolution of the marriage or on the amount or distribution of the marital assets because a reconciliation or settlement between the parties does not, by itself, preclude an application for counsel fees made within the context of a pending action. Sadofsky v. Sadofsky, 78 A.D.2d 520, 431 N.Y.S.2d 594 (2nd Dept. 1980)(approving wife's application for fees pursuant to DRL §237 although fee application was filed after the parties reconciled, on the grounds that the statute does not require a contrary result, and because applications for counsel fees may be prosecuted by an attorney in his or her own name in the same proceeding). Accordingly, the proposed retainer agreement will not have the effect, or be seen as having the effect, of creating an incentive for the lawyer to seek a dissolution of the marriage in order to assure or enhance the lawyer's fee.

Moreover, we note that an analogous "contingency" results when a court permits a party to a matrimonial action to proceed in forma pauperis pursuant to CPLR §1102(d) and assigns counsel without compensation without prejudice to a motion by counsel for compensation pursuant to Domestic Relations Law §237, as is the practice in at least some courts. Lawyers in these courts may fulfill their pro bono responsibilities by representing indigent clients without forgoing the ability to seek compensation from the client's spouse at the lawyer's customary rate. In light of this practice, bar associations sponsoring reduced fee lawyer referral services may believe that prohibiting lawyers who voluntarily agree to represent clients for a reduced fee from applying for compensation at their customary rates may have the effect of discouraging lawyers from participating in such programs. Because we conclude that the proposed retainer provision is not prohibited by DR 2-106(C)(2)(a), we find no basis for substituting our judgment for that of the sponsoring bar association. Nor are we unmindful of the public policy behind the provisions of the Domestic Relations Law authorizing the court to order that the more affluent spouse bear the cost of the less affluent spouse's lawyer.

For the same reasons, we find no reason to limit our conclusion to lawyers who undertake reduced rate representation under the aegis of a bar association program. It is of vital interest to the profession that lawyers be encouraged to accept pro bono assignments, including assignments at reduced fees, and we are loath to place obstacles in the path of attorneys who are willing to render such service either through participation in a bar association program or on their own. EC 2-25.

We note that DR 2-106(C)(2)(b) requires that in domestic relations matters a written retainer agreement be signed by the lawyer and the client "setting forth in plain language the nature of the relationship and the details of the fee agreement." Accordingly, the lawyer should state his or her intention to seek court-ordered counsel fees from the client's spouse at the lawyer's customary rate, rather than at the reduced rate being charged to the client, in plain language in the written retainer.

Finally, we caution that in any ultimate application to the court for counsel fees, the lawyer should disclose to the court the terms of the retainer, including the fact that the lawyer has agreed to represent the client for a reduced fee. See DR 1-102(A)(5) (forbidding conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice); see also DR 1-102(A)(4) ("A lawyer . . . shall not engage in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit, or misrepresentation."). In this way, the court can make a fully informed decision whether, in light of the lawyer's agreement to accept a reduced fee from the client, it is appropriate to grant the application.

Because it is not within the Committee's jurisdiction to consider questions of law, we do not opine on whether the proposed retainer agreement comports with the requirements of Part 1400 of the Rules of the Appellate Divisions governing fees in domestic relations cases.

CONCLUSION:

A lawyer who has agreed to represent a low or moderate income individual in a matrimonial action for a reduced fee may include in the retainer a provision contemplating an application to the court for counsel fees from the client's spouse at the lawyer's customary rate, provided that in the making of an application, the lawyer informs the court of the terms under which the lawyer has accepted the engagement.

TOPIC: Advertising; firm name

DIGEST: A lawyer may not place an advertisement in the Yellow Pages in which the lawyer uses the firm name "A", or inserts the letter "A" before the firm name, in order to insure favorable placement.

CODE: DR 2-101(A), DR 2-102(B), EC 2-11.

QUESTION:

May a lawyer place an advertisement in the Yellow Pages in which the lawyer uses the firm name "A", or inserts the letter "A" before the firm name, in order to insure favorable placement?

OPINION:

This question implicates two provisions of the Code of Professional Responsibility: DR 2-101(A), which contains the general rules governing advertising, and which allows advertising that does not contain claims that are false, deceptive or misleading, and DR 2-102(B), which prohibits lawyers from practicing under a trade name.

Using a name that is not the legal name of one or more partners or former partners in the law firm constitutes use of a trade name within the meaning of DR 2-102(B). DR 2-102(B) separately prohibits trade names and names that are misleading as to the identity of the lawyers practicing under the name. See also EC 2-11. Adding the letter "A" before the name may not be misleading as to the name of the lawyer or lawyers practicing in the firm. The public is certainly used to such a stratagem in the Yellow Pages in other contexts. However, it turns what would otherwise be a representation of the one or more lawyers practicing in the firm (or the name or names of one or more deceased or retired members of the firm or a predecessor firm in a continuing line of succession) into a trade name – something more than the firm name.

Our conclusion with respect to trade names alone would be enough to dispose of this issue. However, we also wish to call attention to EC 2-10. Although DR 2-101(A) prohibits only advertising that is false, deceptive or misleading, EC 2-10 admonishes that, in advertising, "a lawyer should strive to communicate . . . information without undue emphasis upon style and advertising stratagems which serve to hinder rather than to facilitate intelligent selection of counsel." Inserting the letter "A" before the firm name in order to obtain a more prominent position in the Yellow Pages listing is such a stratagem and should not be condoned.

CONCLUSION:

A lawyer may not place an advertisement in the Yellow Pages in which the lawyer uses the firm name "A", or inserts the letter "A" before the firm name, in order to insure favorable placement.

OPINION 741 (05/25/2001)

TOPIC: Referrals; solicitation.

DIGEST: Lawyer may not participate in a business network that requires reciprocal referrals.

CODE: DR 1-102(A)(2), 2-103(A), (B), 5-101(A), 6-101(A).

QUESTION:

May an attorney ethically participate in a business network that requires members to refer clients to and to accept referrals from other network members?

OPINION:

An attorney wishes to join the local chapter of a business networking organization. Material distributed by the organization indicates that there is a onetime registration fee of $50 as well as annual dues of $240. Only one person from each profession may join a local chapter. The purpose of the organization is to promote networking in order to increase business through marketing. To that end, members attend weekly meetings, receive newsletters, and refer business to each other.

Several aspects of a lawyer's participation in the organization present ethical issues. The first is that an attorney participating in the organization is apparently required to refer clients to other members of the organization. Membership in the organization requires a member to follow its policies, including the following: "Participants are required to bring bona fide referrals and/or visitors to their chapter." The organization's Code of Ethics states: "I will take responsibility for following up on the referrals I receive."

When an attorney's clients seek advice as to the hiring of a real estate broker or an insurance agent, the client should be able to rely on the attorney's independent advice in making a recommendation. The organization's policies, however, would require the attorney to refer the client to the real estate broker or insurance agent who is a member of the organization. Thus, the attorney's personal interests may affect his or her professional judgment. It may be that, with respect to a specific client, the attorney would have referred the client to a broker or agent other than the one who has joined the organization.

The obligation to make referrals to members of the organization creates a conflict of interest under DR 5101(A), which provides:

> A lawyer shall not accept or continue employment if the exercise of professional judgment on behalf of the client will be or reasonably may be affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property, or personal interests, unless a disinterested lawyer would believe that the representation of the client will not be adversely affected thereby, and the client consents to the representation after full disclosure of the implication's of the lawyer's interest.

When a client seeks the attorney's professional advice with respect to a referral, the attorney may properly refer the client to a member of the organization only if the client is informed as to the attorney's membership in the organization and the obligation to refer the client to another member of the organization. See Nassau County Op. 978 (1997) (attorney may agree to refer clients to a medical group provided it is in the client's best interests of the client consents after full disclosure).

Second, we interpret the provision in the policies together with the provision in the organization's Code of Ethics to mean that if another member of the organization has a client who needs legal assistance, that member is required to refer that client to the attorney, as the only attorney in the chapter. We note that in some cases, it would be unethical for the attorney to agree to represent a particular client who is referred. For example, DR 6101(A) provides that "[a] lawyer shall not: 1. Handle a legal matter which the lawyer knows or should know that he or she is not competent to handle . . ." Obviously, there will be some referrals that the attorney is not qualified to handle and he or she cannot agree to undertake representation in these matters. Nor could the attorney agree in advance to accept a matter without knowing whether it will involve the attorney in a matter beyond his or her competence. Likewise, if the attorney did not have adequate time to devote to a matter, representation would not be warranted. Finally, some representations may involve a possible conflict of interest, either with other current or former clients, or with the attorney's own interests, and such a representation would be ethically impermissible.

More importantly, participation in the organization would run afoul of DR 2103(B), which provides:

> A lawyer shall not compensate or give anything of value to a person or organization to recommend or obtain employment by a client, or as a reward for having made a recommendation resulting in employment by a client, except that a lawyer may pay the usual and reasonable fees or dues charged by a qualified legal assistance organization. . . .

Qualified legal assistance organizations are defined in DR 1103(D) and the organization is not one that is exempt from the prohibition of DR 2103(B).

Because the attorney is required to pay substantial dues to the organization in exchange for membership that entitles the attorney to referrals from other members and is required to make referrals to these members, the attorney would be transferring something "of value" in order to obtain referrals, which is prohibited by DR 2103(B). See N.Y. State 566 (1984) (lawyer may not pay a real estate brokerage firm to endorse or recommend the lawyer); Nassau County Op. 978 (1997) (precluding a lawyer from entering into a "mutual referral relationship" with a health care organization because it constitutes "a thing of value" received for referrals); N.Y. State 524 (1980) (lawyer may not donate legal services to charitable organization for fundraising auction because the lawyer would be directing his or her fee to the organization in return for obtaining employment by a client); see also N.Y. State 691 (1997) (lawyer permitted to make charitable donation to nonprofit organization that provides clients with a referral list of attorneys only so long as the donation is clearly intended to be charitable and not part of a tacit arrangement of compensation in exchange for referrals); N.Y. State 659 (1994) (lawyer may permit car dealer to distribute materials that includes lawyer's advertising so long as lawyer does not pay car dealer a fee).

Finally, the organization's materials tout the benefits of "word of mouth" advertising. They state that belonging to the organization is "like having dozens of sales people working for you because all the other members carry several copies of your business cards around with them. When they meet someone new who could use your products or services they hand your card out and recommend your services." DR 2103(A) prohibits a lawyer from engaging in in-person solicitation, other than from a close friend, relative, client or former client. DR 1102(A)(2) prohibits a lawyer from circumventing a Disciplinary Rule through actions of another. It is ethically permissible for a lawyer to ask another person to hand out his or her business card, without stating more. See N.Y. State 659 (1994). If, however, the other members of the organization (to whom the attorney must make referrals) are encouraged to recommend the lawyer's services orally, this oral conversation might violate the Code. See, e.g., In re Alessi, 60 N.Y.2d 229 (1983); In re Greene, 54 N.Y.2d 118 (1981) (referral arrangement between lawyer and real estate broker).

CONCLUSION:

A lawyer may not participate in a business networking organization that requires the lawyer to refer clients to other members in exchange for their referral of legal business.

OPINION 742 (05/25/2001)

TOPIC: Confidentiality; Duty to report violations of law

DIGEST: Lawyer who learns in the course of representing client that a third party non-lawyer has violated applicable law may not report same if the information would be protected as a confidence or secret of the client.

CODE: DR 1-103; DR 1-105(A), (B); DR 4-101(A), (C); DR 7-102 (B)

QUESTION:

The inquirer is an attorney admitted in New York and working overseas for a private company. In the course of employment, the inquirer has come across information indicating that a party (not a lawyer) with whom the inquirer's employer has a business arrangement engaged in a violation of law in connection with obtaining an agreement to which the employer and the third party are two of the contracting parties. Although the inquirer worked on the agreement that is the subject of the inquiry, the inquirer's services were not involved in the violation of law that occurred. No other lawyer was involved, and the matter has not been presented to any tribunal. Does the inquirer have an obligation to report the violation of law where the malfeasor is not the client?

OPINION:

Although the inquirer is employed overseas, as an attorney admitted in New York the attorney is subject to the New York Lawyer's Code of Professional Responsibility (the "Code"). See DR 1-105(A) (lawyer admitted to practice in this state is subject to the disciplinary authority of this state, regardless of where the lawyer's conduct occurs). Whether the rules of professional conduct that would be applied are those of New York or some other jurisdiction depends on whether the lawyer is also admitted in another jurisdiction and, if so, the place where the lawyer "principally practices" or where the lawyer's conduct has its "predominant effect." See DR 1-105(B)(2).

Because questions of law are beyond this Committee's jurisdiction, we are unable to advise whether the inquirer would have any legal duty to report a particular violation of law and, if so, to whom.[7] On the facts presented, we cannot identify any ethical obligation to report a violation of law. A lawyer's reporting obligations under the Code are found in DR 1-103, concerning conduct of another lawyer or judge, and in DR 7-102, concerning fraud upon a person or tribunal. The former provision is not applicable because the facts presented in the inquiry do not involve the conduct of another lawyer or a judge. DR 7-102(B)(1) is applicable to situations where a lawyer's client has perpetrated a fraud in the course of the representation, which is not the case here. Finally, DR 7-102(B)(2) is applicable to a lawyer who receives information "clearly establishing" that a person other than the client "has perpetrated a fraud upon a tribunal." The terms "fraud" and "tribunal" are defined in the "Definitions" section of the Code. Specifically, the term "tribunal" is defined to include "all courts, arbitrators and other adjudicatory bodies." Regardless of whether the conduct described would amount to a "fraud" within the meaning of the Code, it did not involve a tribunal and the 7 Likewise, the Committee has no authority to determine whether particular conduct amounts to a violation of law. For purposes of responding to this inquiry we assume that, as reported in the inquiry, such a violation has occurred.

inquirer accordingly would have no obligation to report same under DR 7-102(B)(2). See also N.Y. State 523 (1980) (limiting DR 7-102(B)(2) to "information bearing upon a fraud committed in a proceeding where the lawyer's professional services are, or have been, employed)."

Indeed, the inquirer may be prohibited under the Code from reporting to a law enforcement authority the information acquired. DR 4-101 of the Code prohibits a lawyer from revealing or using to its disadvantage confidences or secrets of a client. As used in the Code, the term "secrets" refers to information gained in the professional relationship the disclosure of which "would be embarrassing or would be likely to be detrimental to the client." DR 4-101(A). The information need not be obtained from the client to constitute a secret; it is enough that it was "gained in the professional relationship." Accordingly, information regarding a violation of law committed by a third party in the course of obtaining a business agreement with a client may be protected from disclosure as a "secret" if disclosure would be detrimental to the client. Cf. N.Y. State 523 (1980) (construing DR 7-102(B)(2); "lawyers should not be required to reveal frauds committed by persons other than their clients when the information would otherwise be protected as a client confidence or secret under Canon 4"). Even if a "secret," the information may be disclosed if it satisfies the "future crime" exception embodied in DR 4-101(C)(3) (permitting a lawyer to reveal the "intention of a client to commit a crime and the information necessary to prevent the crime"). Because this Committee does not decide questions of law, we express no opinion on whether disclosure would be permitted under this rule.

CONCLUSION:

A lawyer who receives information that a third party engaged in a business arrangement with a client may have violated the law in the course of obtaining that arrangement may not report the violation to a law enforcement authority if the information is protected as a confidence or secret.

TOPIC: Labor union; lawyer for organization.

DIGEST: Union attorney who represents union member in an arbitration proceeding must keep union member's confidences. Union attorney who represents union in grievance proceeding under collective bargaining agreement must make clear to union member who is the subject of the proceeding that union member is not the client and that union member's disclosures will not be kept in confidence; having done so, attorney may share disclosures with union and, at union's direction, may distribute arbitrator's decision.

CODE: DR 4101(A), (B) and (C)(1); 5107(B); 5108(A)(2);5109(A)

QUESTION:

Many unions employ attorneys to conduct arbitration proceedings for the benefit of union members who were disciplined by their employers. Depending on the context, the party to the proceeding may be the union or the union member.

In some contexts, the employee and the employer are the parties to the proceeding. This is true, for example, where the arbitration concerns disciplinary charges against a public sector employee under Civil Service Law §75. In that event, the union furnishes and pays the attorney for the employee, but the employee is the client.

In other contexts, although the subject of the arbitration is disciplinary charges against a union member, the union and the employer are the parties to the proceeding. This may be true of proceedings involving either public or private sector employees where a collective bargaining agreement ("CBA") between the union and the employer so provides. In that event, the union has a duty of fair representation but is nevertheless the party to the arbitration. Although the union's lawyer is seeking to protect the union member's interests under the CBA, the lawyer is nevertheless a lawyer for the union, and not necessarily the union member. Ordinarily, to represent the union effectively, however, the union's attorney must communicate with the union member and learn information from the union member concerning the subject of the proceeding.

After hearing testimony and receiving other evidence at the arbitration, the arbitrator transmits his or her decision to the attorney for each party. Depending on the forum, the arbitrator 's decision may also be transmitted to the Public Employment Relations Board, the American Arbitration Association, the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service or some similar agency. Traditionally, arbitration awards become part of the history of the CBA and may have precedential value both to the union and to the employer.

After the arbitrator issues a decision, may the attorney distribute copies of the decision to other union members if requested to do so by the union?

OPINION:

Under DR 4101, the union attorney has a duty to protect the "confidences" and "secrets" of the attorney's client. The terms "confidence" and "secret" are defined in DR 4101(A) as follows:

> "Confidence" refers to information protected by the attorney-client privilege under applicable law, and "secret" refers to other information gained in the professional relationship that the client has requested be held inviolate or the disclosure of which would be embarrassing or would be likely to be detrimental to the client.

The arbitrator's decision is unlikely to contain client confidences, since the attorney-client privilege will not apply to testimony and evidence introduced at the arbitration. However, the decision is likely to include "secrets" of the client. As discussed below, the critical question in this context is, who is the client of the union attorney?

Duty of confidentiality where the employee is the party

When the employee is the party to the arbitration, the union's attorney represents the employee and, thus, owes the employee a duty of confidentiality under DR 4101. This is true notwithstanding that the union supplies and pays the attorney for the employee; indeed, DR 5107(B) specifically provides that when a third party pays the lawyer's fee, the lawyer may not allow that third party to compromise the lawyer's duty to maintain the confidences and secrets of the client. This is comparable to the situation discussed in our earlier opinions where an attorney is retained by an insurance carrier to represent a policyholder. In that situation, the policyholder is the client, and the lawyer must preserve the policyholder's confidences and secrets. See, e.g., Feliberty v. Damon, 72 N.Y.2d 112, 120, 531 N.Y.S. 2d 778, 782 (1988); N.Y. State 716 (1999); N.Y. State 721 (1999); N.Y. State 73 (1968); DR 5107(B).

Because the employee is the client in this context, the lawyer may not disclose the employee's "confidences" and "secrets" without the employee's consent. Although the lawyer has disclosed the employee's "secret" in the arbitration proceeding, that information continues to be a "secret" under DR 4101 "if the client has requested [it] be held inviolate or the disclosure of [the information] would be embarrassing or would be likely to be detrimental to the client," unless the information has become generally known. Therefore, the lawyer may not disclose the information outside the arbitration hearing without the client's consent. Cf. N.Y. State 721 (1999). Accordingly, whether or not the arbitration decision is a publicly available document, if it contains the union member's secrets, the attorney may not provide it in full to the union or circulate it in full to other union members or to the union without the union member's consent. DR 4101(B); DR 5108(A)(2); N.Y. State 721 (1999). If it is possible to redact the decision so that the employee is not directly identified and cannot conceivably be identified indirectly from the unredacted portions of the decision, however, it may be possible to distribute a copy that is so redacted. See N.Y. State 718 (1999).

Duties where the union is the party

In some situations, the CBA between the union and the employer provides the union with control of a "grievance"–that is, an allegation that a CBA has been improperly interpreted or applied, such as the failure to comply with provisions regarding the treatment of an individual or group of individuals, as in the case of discipline or discharge. The union (and not the individual union member) is the formal party initiating, pursuing and resolving the grievance. See Archibald Cox, Rights Under a Labor Agreement, 69 Harv. L. Rev. 601, 62730 (1956). In this context, the union is the attorney's client. Union attorneys who interact with bargaining unit members do not always make clear, however, that they represent the union exclusively. See generally Russell G. Pearce, The Union Lawyer's Obligations to Bargaining Unit Members: A Case Study of the Interdependence of Legal Ethics and Substantive Law, 37 S. Tex. L. Rev. 1095, 111214 (1996).

When the union's lawyer fails to make it unambiguously clear to the employee that the employee is not a client, the employee may disclose information to the lawyer under the mistaken belief that the lawyer represents the employee as well as the union and the mistaken belief that the lawyer will keep any confidences and secrets. If the lawyer fails to dispel that understanding and interacts with the employee in a manner that makes the understanding reasonable, the lawyer may inadvertently create a lawyer-client relationship with the employee at least for purposes of DR 4101 if not for all purposes. See generally Restatement (Third) of the Law Governing Lawyers §14, Comment e. Therefore, at the outset of their discussions, the lawyer must fully explain to the employee the relationship between the lawyer, the employee and the union, including that information imparted by the employee may be disclosed by the attorney to the union and shared by the union with its other members. Cf. DR 5109(A). Among other things, the lawyer should advise the union member of the union's practice (if it exists) of distributing the arbitrator's decision to other union members.

Whether, having done that, the lawyer still owes "derivative duties" to the employee is a matter of law that we cannot answer as it is beyond our jurisdiction. We are unaware of any contractual or legal duty that the union owes to its member to preserve the confidentiality of information imparted by the member to the union's attorney, and the inquirer has not advised us that such a duty exists. However, if the CBA or some other agreement or provision of law requires the union to preserve the employee's confidences and secrets, then the lawyer would ordinarily have a duty to do so as well, as an agent of the union. Cf. Pearce, supra, at 111517.

Assuming that the union itself has no confidentiality obligation to the employee, then the lawyer has none either, so long as the lawyer has made it clear to the employee that the lawyer does not represent the employee and that whatever is told to the lawyer may be shared with the union. In that event, the union may determine whether to direct the lawyer to distribute the decision of the arbitrator and the lawyer may comply. As a matter of good practice, however, the lawyer should consider advising the union of the possibility of distributing a redacted version that avoids identifying the employee directly by name or indirectly by the facts.

CONCLUSION:

For the reasons stated above, when an in-house or staff attorney is employed by the law department of a labor union to represent a union member in an arbitration in which the member is a party, the attorney owes the member a duty of confidentiality and therefore may not disseminate copies of an arbitration decision that contains the member's secrets. When the attorney represents the union as a party pursuant to a collective bargaining agreement, the attorney must make clear to the union member that the attorney represents only the union and that information imparted by the member may be shared with the union and disseminated more broadly at the union's direction; having done so, the attorney may distribute copies of the arbitration decision if directed to do so by the union. OPINION 744 (05/25/2001)

TOPIC: Litigation costs

DIGEST: When plaintiff retains lawyer to bring multiple lawsuits, plaintiff must ultimately be responsible for all litigation expenses, but lawyer may agree that expenses arising from unsuccessful lawsuits will be paid out of recoveries obtained in successful lawsuits, provided the total amount recovered is greater than the total cost of litigation.

CODE: DR 5103(B)

QUESTION:

While representing a plaintiff in multiple lawsuits (e.g., collection matters) pursuant to a single retainer agreement, may an attorney agree that the recoveries obtained on successful claims will be used to offset litigation costs associated with unsuccessful lawsuits?

OPINION:

The inquiry is governed by DR 5103(B), which establishes the client's ultimate responsibility for the costs of litigation. DR 5103(B) provides that "[a] lawyer may advance or guarantee the expenses of litigation . . . provided the client remains ultimately liable for such expenses."

As long as there are sufficient funds recovered on successful claims to offset the expenses associated with the unsuccessful claims, the proposed arrangement would not violate DR 5103(B) because the client would then bear the ultimate responsibility for litigation costs. The lawyer's understanding with the client must provide, however, that if the total costs and expenses of litigation exceed the amounts recovered on the client's claims, the client will be responsible to pay the difference.

CONCLUSION:

When a plaintiff retains a lawyer to bring multiple lawsuits, the plaintiff must be ultimately responsible for all litigation expenses, but the lawyer may agree that expenses arising from unsuccessful lawsuits will be paid out of recoveries obtained in successful lawsuits, provided the total amount recovered is greater than the total cost of litigation.

TOPIC: Conflict of Interest; referral fee

DIGEST: A lawyer who is disqualified from a matter on non-consentable conflict of interest grounds may not receive a referral fee. A lawyer with a consentable conflict of interest who nevertheless refers the matter to another attorney may receive a referral fee.

CODE: DR 2-107(A) and (D); DR 6-101

QUESTION:

When a lawyer is disqualified from a matter due to a conflict of interest, may the disqualified lawyer receive a referral fee from the lawyer to whom the matter is referred? Would the result be any different if the conflict were consentable by the client?

OPINION:

From the time the New York Lawyers' Code of Professional Responsibility was adopted until it was significantly amended in 1990, DR 2-107(A) prohibited a lawyer from receiving a referral fee merely for "forwarding" a matter to another lawyer. In its pre-amendment form, the Code allowed a lawyer to divide fees with a lawyer in another firm only "in proportion to the services performed and responsibility assumed by each" See N.Y. State 535 (1981) (citing DR 2-107[A] before the 1990 amendments). The amended version of DR 2-107(A), however, now permits a division of legal fees where the following three conditions are satisfied:

> (1) The client consents to employment of another lawyer after a full disclosure that a division of fees will be made.
> (2) The division is in proportion to the services performed by each lawyer or, by a writing given the client, each lawyer assumes joint responsibility for the representation.
> (3) The total fee of the lawyers does not exceed reasonable compensation for all legal services they rendered the client.
> (Emphasis added).
> Similarly, EC 2-22 provides:
> Without the consent of the client, a lawyer should not associate in a particular matter another lawyer outside the lawyer's firm. A fee may properly be divided between lawyers properly associated if the division is in proportion to the services performed by each lawyer or, by a writing given to the client, each lawyer assumes joint responsibility for the representation and if the total fee is reasonable.

In our view, where a lawyer is unable to assume sole responsibility for a matter due to a conflict of interest, that lawyer is also disqualified from assuming joint responsibility and, therefore, the referring lawyer may not accept a referral fee from the receiving lawyer. See, Nassau County Bar Op. 98-07 (1998) (an attorney who is barred from handling a matter due to a conflict of interest may not share in the fee for that matter after the attorney refers the matter to another lawyer); accord, ABA Informal Op. 1088 (1968); Florida Ethics Op. 89-1 (1989); Illinois Advisory Op. 9026 (1990); The State Bar of Michigan Standing Committee on Professional and Judicial Ethics RI-116 (1992); N.J. Ethics Op. 629 (1989); Philadelphia Ethics Op. 89-12 (1989); Virginia Ethics Op. 1160 (1988); but see, Iowa Ethics Op. 87-32 (1988). Without now deciding what the precise contours of joint responsibility are, we conclude that joint responsibility is more than financial accountability and malpractice liability.

This leaves one remaining issue for our consideration. There are a variety of factual circumstances in which a lawyer may accept or continue employment notwithstanding a conflict of interest. See, e.g., DR 5-101(A) ("A lawyer shall not accept or continue employment if the exercise of professional judgment on behalf of the client will be or reasonably may be affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property, or personal interests, unless a disinterested lawyer would believe that the representation of the client will not be adversely affected thereby and the client consents to the representation after full disclosure of the implications of the lawyer's interest.") In the case of such a "consentable" conflict, if the lawyer nonetheless chooses to refer the matter – for example, to a more skilled or experienced practitioner in conformity with DR 6-101(A)(1) – we see no reason why the referring lawyer may not ethically receive a referral fee from the receiving lawyer, provided the standard for obtaining client consent is fully met.

CONCLUSION:

A disqualified lawyer cannot assume "joint responsibility" for a matter and therefore, may not be paid a referral fee, unless the referring lawyer obtains client consent under the same standard that would have allowed the lawyer to accept or continue "sole responsibility" for the matter.

TOPIC: Representing incapacitated client; petitioning for appointment of guardian; attorney-in-fact under durable power of attorney; representation of oneself as attorney-in-fact/petitioner

DIGEST: Lawyer serving as client's attorneyinfact may not petition for appointment of guardian without client's consent unless lawyer determines that client is incapacitated, that there is no practical alternative through use of power of attorney or otherwise to protect client's best interests, and that no one else is available to serve as petitioner. Subject to conflict of interest restrictions, lawyer may represent self in proceeding if client does not oppose petition and lawyer will not be a witness.

QUESTION:

When an attorney, who has been named by a client as attorney-in-fact in a durable power of attorney, later determines the client is no longer competent to handle his or her own affairs, may the attorney petition for appointment of a guardian and, if so, may the attorney represent him- or herself (as petitioner) in the guardianship proceeding?

LEGAL BACKGROUND:

Durable Power of Attorney

In 1975, the New York legislature amended the law relating to powers of attorney to permit the granting of a power which would remain in full force even after the grantor became incompetent.[8] This enables individuals to plan for the possibility of future disability by designating persons of their choice to manage their financial affairs[9] This "durable" power was seen as a means of handling matters that might otherwise require the expense, delay, inconvenience and possible embarrassment of having a court appoint a guardian who might be unknown to the grantor. The statute provides a detailed form for the granting of a number of specific and general powers which vest the grantee with a virtually alter-ego status for the grantor. There are some limitations not pertinent to this opinion.[10] Although the power to retain an attorney in the future is not among the specific powers listed in the statutory form, neither does the statute specifically prohibit the retention of an attorney by the attorney-in-fact.

Guardianship under Article 81 of the Mental Hygiene Law

Article 81 of the Mental Hygiene Law was enacted in 1993. The statute allows for the judicial appointment of a legal guardian for one's personal needs, property management or both,[11] when a person is incompetent to conduct his or her own affairs.[12] The statute contemplates a system which is tailored to meet the specific needs of the individual by taking into account the personal wishes, preferences and desires of the alleged incapacitated person. The guardian is to engage in the least restrictive form of intervention, consistent with the concept that the needs of persons with incapacities are as diverse and complex as they are unique to the individual.[13]

Also, the agent cannot perform acts which, by their nature, by public policy or by contract, require personal performance. Zaubler v. Picone, 100 A.D.2d 620 (2d Dept 1984). Examples are voting and commencing a divorce action in behalf of the principal.

There is a two-pronged test to determine whether a guardian should be appointed. First, the court must consider all of the evidence, including the report of a "court evaluator," and the sufficiency and reliability of all available resources.[14] Included among the "resources" to be considered is a valid power of attorney.[15] Second, the individual must agree to the appointment or must be incapacitated.[16] A determination of incapacity must be based on clear and convincing evidence that the person is likely to suffer harm because he or she is unable to provide for his or her personal needs and/or property management and cannot adequately understand and appreciate the nature and consequences of this inability.[17]

A guardianship proceeding may be brought by one of seven different categories of persons or entities, including "a person otherwise concerned with the welfare of the person alleged to be incapacitated."[18] The court is authorized to award legal fees to the petitioner's counsel, payable from the assets of the incompetent individual.[19]

An attorney-in-fact is required to account to a later-appointed guardian during the continuance of the appointment, notwithstanding the durable nature of the power.[20] It is not clear from New York statutes whether the guardian has the power to revoke a durable power of attorney,[21] although the uncertainty is not germane to this inquiry. The differing and seemingly overlapping roles of the attorneyinfact and Article 81 guardian cause some confusion, but the statute contemplates dismissal of a petition for appointment of a guardian where it is determined that the alleged incapacitated person had, in lucid times, carefully thought out and provided for how his or her affairs might be handled under such circumstances. The existence of a durable power of attorney can be a factor in such a dismissal.[22]

OPINION:

May the attorney-in-fact petition for the appointment of a guardian?

For the reasons discussed below, the lawyer who serves as the client's attorney-in-fact may petition for the appointment of a guardian without the client's consent only if the lawyer determines that the client is incapacitated and that there is no practical alternative, through the use of the power of attorney or otherwise, to protect the client's best interests.

Although no disciplinary rule of the Code expressly addresses the representation of an incapacitated client, the obligations of lawyers representing clients with questionable capacity are addressed by ECs 7-11[23] and 7-12.[24] Additional guidance is afforded by various opinions of bar association ethics committees in the state, see, e.g., N.Y. City 1997-2; N.Y. City 19877; Nassau County 98-2, and in the secondary literature. See, e.g., Nancy M. Maurer & Patricia W. Johnson, "Ethical Conflicts in Representing People With Questionable Capacity," in Representing People With Disabilities (N.Y.S. Bar Ass'n, 2d ed. 1997); Association of the Bar of the City of New York, Committee on Professional Responsibility, "A Delicate Balance: Ethical Rules for Those Who Represent Incompetent Clients," 52 The Record 34 (1997) ("A Delicate Balance"). Additionally, guidance may be found in the literature on legal ethics outside New York. See, e.g., Annotated Model Rules of Professional Conduct ("Annotated Model Rules") 20927 (4th ed. 1990) (annotation to Rule 1.14 of ABA Model Rules of Professional Conduct); Restatement (Third) of the Law, The Law Governing Lawyers ("Restatement"), §24 (2000). The following general principles emerge from this material.

The lawyer-client relationship is an agency relationship that is ordinarily created by express or implied agreement between the lawyer and client. See Restatement, supra, §14. Therefore, the client must ordinarily have the capacity to enter into this agreement, id. §14, comment d, and to determine the objectives of the representation. Cf. EC 7-7; DR 7-101(A)(1). Under agency principles, a lawyer's authority to act for the client would ordinarily terminate upon the client's permanent, total incapacity as it would upon the client's death, but this is not invariably true. See Restatement, supra, §31, com-

23 EC 711 provides: "The responsibilities of a lawyer may vary according to the intelligence, experience, mental condition or age of a client, . . . Examples include the representation of an illiterate or an incompetent . . . ."

24 EC 712 provides:

> Any mental or physical condition that renders a client incapable of making a considered judgment on his or her own behalf casts additional responsibilities upon the lawyer. Where an incompetent is acting through a guardian or other legal representative, a lawyer must look to such representative for those decisions which are normally the prerogative of the client to make. If a client under disability has no legal representative, the lawyer may be compelled in court proceedings to make decisions on behalf of the client. If the client is capable of understanding the matter in question or of contributing to the advancement of his or her interests, regardless of whether the client is legally disqualified from performing certain acts, the lawyer should obtain from the client all possible aid. If the disability of a client and the lack of a legal representative compel the lawyer to make decisions for the client, the lawyer should consider all circumstances then prevailing and act with care to safeguard and advance the interests of the client. But obviously a lawyer cannot perform any act or make any decision which the law requires the client to perform or make, either acting alone if competent, or by a duly constituted representative if legally incompetent.

ment e. In court proceedings, for example, it may be appropriate for a lawyer to continue to represent the totally incapacitated client in order to protect his or her interests.[25]

In the course of representing a client, a lawyer generally "must provide independent, zealous and competent representation and must preserve the client's confidences in accordance with the provisions of the Code of Professional Responsibility." N.Y. City 1997-2. This is true even where, because of the client's age or mental condition, the client's ability to participate fully in making decisions relating to the representation is impaired. Id. When representing a client whose ability to make considered decisions is impaired, the lawyer "must, as far as reasonably possible, maintain a normal client-lawyer relationship with the client and act in the best interests of the client." Restatement, supra, §24(1). This includes a responsibility to "maintain the flow of information and consultation as much as circumstances allow," including, where it will be helpful, through "the use of a relative, therapist, or other intermediary." Id. §24, comment c. Although the lawyer may accept direction from those who are legally authorized to direct the representation on behalf of the client, the lawyer's ultimate responsibility is to the client. See N.Y. State 371 (1975); cf. N.Y. State 698 (1998).

The lawyer's responsibilities may vary, however, depending on the client's age or mental condition. EC 7-11. Further, the lawyer may have additional responsibilities when "[a]ny mental or physical condition . . . renders a client incapable of making a considered judgment on his or her own behalf," including a responsibility "in court proceedings to make decisions on behalf of the client." EC 7-12. The lawyer may not, however, "perform any act or make any decision which the law requires the client to perform or make, either acting alone if competent, or by a duly constituted representative if legally incompetent." Id.[26]

As ECs 7-11 and 7-12 reflect, there is generally no bar to representing a client whose decision making capacity is impaired, but who is capable of making decisions and participating in the representation. Insofar as the client is making reasoned decisions concerning those matters that are for the client to decide and these decisions appear to be in the client's best interests, there would ordinarily be no need for the lawyer even to consider withdrawing from the representation or seeking the appointment of a guardian who would substitute his or her judgment for that of the client. When a client's capacity to make decisions is impaired, seeking to withdraw is generally seen as the least satisfactory response because doing so leaves the client without assistance when it is most needed. See Annotated Model Rules, supra, at 225 (citing authority). Seeking the appointment of a guardian or conservator over the client's objection is also generally to be avoided if possible. Often, notwithstanding his or her impairment, the client will be capable of making those decisions relating to the representation that are

25 According to the Restatement:

> The general rule . . . may be inappropriate as applied to a lawyer's beneficial efforts to protect the rights of an incapacitated client. Such a client continues to have rights requiring protection and often will be able to participate to some extent in the representation. . . . If representation were terminated automatically, no one could act for a client until a guardian is appointed, even in pressing situations. Even if the client has been adjudicated to be incompetent, it might still be desirable for the representation to continue, for example to challenge the adjudication on appeal or to represent the client in other matters. Although a lawyer's authority therefore does not terminate automatically in such circumstances, the lawyer must act in accordance with the principles of § 24 [dealing with a client with diminished capacity] in exercising continuing authority.

Restatement, supra § 31, comment e.

26 There is disagreement about the scope of this limitation; for example, authorities disagree as to whether or not, in a court proceeding, a lawyer may settle a case when the client lacks capacity to do so. Maurer & Johnson, supra, at 1-7 & n.41.

entrusted to the client. See Restatement, supra, §24 comment c ("Disabilities in making decisions vary . . . ; they may impair a client's ability to decide matters generally or only with respect to some decisions at some times"), quoted with approval in N.Y. City 1997-2. Even where the client is incapable of making necessary decisions, however, it will often be preferable not to seek the appointment of a guardian because doing so would be "embarrassing for the client," Restatement, supra, §24 comment b, or "too expensive, traumatic, or otherwise undesirable or impractical in the circumstances." Id. § 24 comment d.

Thus, seeking a guardian is appropriate only in the limited circumstances where "a client's diminished capacity is severe and no other practical method of protecting the client's best interests is available." Id. §24 comment e. Accord "A Delicate Balance," supra, at 43 (noting "the almost universal view . . . that guardianships, though occasionally necessary, are often quite onerous: they may drain the client's estate, result in protracted legal proceedings, and substitute the judgment of a total stranger for those of the client, the client's family, and the client's personal attorney"); ABA Formal Op. 96-404 (1996) ("The appointment of a guardian is a serious deprivation of the client's rights and ought not be undertaken if other, less drastic solutions are available."); Recommendations of the Conference on Ethical Issues in Representing Older Clients, 62 Fordham L. Rev. 989, 991 (1994) ("Recommendations") ("The lawyer should refer or petition for guardianship of the client only if there are no appropriate alternatives."). In such drastic circumstances, notwithstanding the duty of confidentiality imposed by DR 4-101, the lawyer may reveal client confidences and secrets to the limited extent necessary to protect the client. See N.Y. City 1987-7 (1987) (when the client is unable to care for him- or herself or property because of alcoholism, and will face financial, if not personal, ruin as a result, the lawyer may disclose confidences to the court in seeking appointment of a conservator, but should seek the court's permission to do so in camera and under seal), discussed in Maurer & Johnson, supra, at 1-16.

When a question arises concerning the client's capacity, "[c]lients with disabilities should be presumed capable of making decisions and participating in the lawyer-client relationship." Maurer & Johnson, supra, at 1-9. In determining whether the client has the capacity to direct the representation, "the lawyer must take account not only of information and impressions derived from the lawyer's [communications with the client], but also of other relevant information that may reasonably be obtained, and the lawyer may in appropriate cases seek guidance from other professionals and concerned parties." N.Y. City 19972; see generally Recommendations, supra, 62 Fordham L. Rev. at 991.

In light of these general principles, it appears that seeking appointment of a guardian without the client's informed consent will be proper only if the lawyer believes the client is incapacitated, the lawyer cannot adequately protect the client's interests by using the power granted in the durable power of attorney, and there is no other practical alternative that is less restrictive. See Recommendations, supra, 62 Fordham L. Rev. at 991 (recommending the following as examples of protective actions that the lawyer may take as a preferable alternative to petitioning for guardianship the following: involving family members, use of durable powers of attorney, use of revocable trusts, referral to private care management, referral to longterm care ombudsman, use of care and support systems, referral to disability support groups, and referral to social services or other government agencies). As discussed above, Article 81 favors the least intrusive intervention available to meet the personal and financial needs of a person alleged to be incapacitated; in fact, courts construing that statute have penalized persons for bringing frivolous Article 81 petitions when other resources could be used to meet the client's needs.[27] Assuming that the client has sufficient assets and a valid power of attorney, the holder of the power of attorney may be able to meet the personal and financial needs of the incapacitated client by hiring necessary personnel to care for those needs, including taking the step of applying for admission to a nursing home under the broad powers of the durable power of attorney.[28] Absent sufficient assets, public assistance may be brought to bear in the process of applying for admission to a nursing home. If there is no valid health care proxy, there is a provision in the statute to bring a proceeding for the appointment of a limited guardian to handle the health care needs of the person whose needs are at issue.[29] In sum, the appointment of a guardian should be sought only where necessary and, in many situations, the lawyer's ability to continue to exercise the power of attorney will make the appointment of a guardian unnecessary.

Finally, even if petitioning for appointment of a guardian is warranted, the lawyer who serves as both lawyer and attorney-in-fact for the client is not necessarily the preferable person to serve in the additional role as petitioner under Article 81. Rather, unless the client consents, "[t]he lawyer should act as petitioner only of there is no one else available to act." Recommendations, supra, 62 Fordham L. Rev. at 991. Thus, the lawyer should initially ascertain whether a family member, friend, or other concerned individual is available to serve in that role.

May the attorney represent him- or herself as petitioner in the guardianship proceeding?

If the lawyer currently represents the client, and the client opposes the appointment of a guardian, then the lawyer may not also represent him- or herself (or anyone else) as petitioner in an Article 81 proceeding. Doing so would place the lawyer in a position where he or she is advocating on behalf of one client (the petitioner) in opposition to another current client, thereby creating an impermissible conflict of interest under DR 5-105(A). Indeed, in that event, the client might well expect to receive the attorney's assistance in opposing the guardianship petition. Even if the alleged incapacitated person was formerly a client but is no longer one, if he or she objects to the appointment of a guardian the lawyer may be barred by DR 5-108(A) from representing him- or herself (or anyone else) as petitioner, since the current representation would likely be adverse to a former client in a matter substantially related to the subject of the former representation. In that event, as attorney-in-fact, the lawyer should retain separate counsel to process the Article 81 matter.

If the client does not object to appointment of a guardian, the attorney may be forbidden from serving as a lawyer in the guardianship proceeding if there will be a contested hearing under Article 81 on the issue of client incompetence and it is obvious that the attorney would be called as a witness in the Article 81 hearing on that issue. In that event, too, the lawyer should retain separate counsel to process the Article 81 matter. DR 5-102(A); N.Y. State 635 (1992).

27 See, for example, Matter of Crump (Parthe), 640 N.Y.S. 2d 147, vacated and withdrawn 230 A.D. 2d 950 (2d Dep't 1996), where the court ordered the earlier appointed guardian to return the property to the alleged incapacitated person and required the petitioner to pay the guardian's compensation, her own legal fees, the fees of the court evaluator and those of her expert. The court found that the alleged incapacitated person had sufficient assets and valid durable power of attorney and health care proxy.

28 Cf. Matter of Maher, 207 A.D. 2d 133 (2d Dept 1994) (affirming trial court's determination that there was no need for an appointed guardian for property management pursuant to Article 81, because the allegedly incapacitated person's attorney had the client's power of attorney).

29 N.Y. Mental Hyg. Law §81.22 (a)(8).

If the client does not oppose the guardianship petition and the lawyer will not serve as a witness, then we are aware of no categorical ethical restriction against the attorney-in-fact representing him- or herself as petitioner in the Article 81 proceeding. Although serving in the dual role means that there is no independent individual client to whom the lawyer is accountable, given other safeguards, we do not believe that this in itself makes the dual role impermissible. For example, while there is an absence of accountability (when an attorney-in-fact hires him- or herself) concerning the extent of attorney fees in processing the Article 81 matter, the court will oversee the reasonableness of such fees. Mental Hygiene Law Sec. 81.16 (f) (". . . court may award reasonable compensation for the attorney for the petitioner . . ."). While there would also be an absence of client scrutiny of the attorney's conduct when the petitioner in the proceeding is not another competent person or entity,[30] once the petition is presented, the court must appoint a "court evaluator," whose duties include consulting with the person alleged to be incapacitated, determining whether the person wishes separate legal counsel, investigating and reporting to the court as to the nature of the incapacity and what action should be taken.[31]

The lawyer must consider whether the lawyer's own interests, including any interests arising out of the role as attorneyinfact, may reasonably affect the lawyer's exercise of professional judgment as lawyer in the Article 81 proceeding, in which event there may be an impermissible conflict of interest under DR 5101. However, we conclude that when one petitions under Article 81 in one's role as attorneyinfact, the dual role as attorneyinfact and lawyer for oneself as attorneyinfact does not give rise to a conflict per se. Although we are unaware of any prior ethics opinions precisely on point, we note that, in other contexts, lawyers have been permitted to serve in a fiduciary capacity and, at the same time, to represent themselves as fiduciaries. See, e.g., N.Y. State 610 (1990) (observing that "it is not improper under the Code for a lawyer-draftsman to serve as executor of a will so long as the decision to nominate the attorney is the product of the client's own free will."); N.Y. State 471 (1977) (opining that it would be ethically proper for an attorney to serve as a receiver in a mortgage foreclosure action and retain the attorney's firm as counsel for the action). Moreover, although this committee cannot offer opinions on questions of law, we note that we are unaware of any legal restraint on a person holding both attorneyinfact and attorney at law roles.[32]

Finally, as a matter of sound practice, this problem should be considered and addressed with the client at the time the power of attorney is drafted. Ideally, the lawyer and client will make provisions concerning the client's future incapacity, including the possible need to retain counsel for an Article 81 proceeding and whether the attorney will serve as counsel in the proceeding.[33]

30 The proceeding may be brought by seven different categories of persons or entities, including "the person alleged to be incapacitated", or "a person otherwise concerned with the welfare of the person alleged to be incapacitated." Entities include the department of social services, a hospital, a school, and a residential health care facility. Id. §81.06.

32 2A N.Y. Jur. 2d §19, citing Ginsberg. v. Brody, 185 N.Y.S. 46 (N.Y. App. Term 1920).

33 One can add provisions to the statutory form of durable power of attorney if they are not inconsistent with other provisions of the statutory short form. N.Y. Gen. Oblig. Law §51503. While the naming of an attorney to conduct an Article 81 proceeding is not included in the specified powers, it would not be inconsistent with those powers.

CONCLUSION:

A lawyer serving as a client's attorneyinfact may not petition for the appointment of a guardian without the client's consent unless the lawyer determines that the client is incapacitated; there is no practical alternative, through the use of the power of attorney or otherwise, to protect the client's best interests; and there is no one else available to serve as petitioner. Subject to conflict of interest restrictions, if the lawyer petitions for the appointment of a guardian, the client does not oppose the petition, and the lawyer will not be a witness in a contested hearing, the lawyer may represent him- or herself in the proceeding.

Overrules: N.Y. State 443

Modifies: N.Y. State 690

TOPIC: Contingent Fees; Domestic Relations

DIGEST: Lawyer may not agree to a contingent fee retainer to collect maintenance, child support and/or alimony due based upon an already rendered final judgment following a divorce.

CODE: DR 2-106(B), 2-106(C)(2), 2-106(D); EC 2-1, 2-20; Definition 10.

QUESTION:

May a lawyer enter into an arrangement for, charge or collect a contingent fee in a post-divorce action to collect unpaid maintenance, child support and/or alimony under a final judgment previously entered (hereinafter a "matrimonial collection action")?

OPINION:

This Committee first confronted this question in N.Y. State 443 (1976). In that opinion, the Committee opined that under the then-current provisions of the New York Lawyer's Code of Professional Responsibility ("Code") there was nothing improper in entering into a contingent fee retainer to collect past due alimony and past due child support payments. In reaching that determination, the Committee observed that EC 220 cautioned that "contingent fee arrangements in domestic relations cases are rarely justified," but it expressly distinguished "actions affecting the marital status of the parties," the apparent focus of EC 220, from "cases solely for the collection of past due alimony and of past due child support payments."

Thereafter, the ethics committees of two other bar associations in New York State reached the same conclusion. In N.Y. County 660 (1984), the committee approved a contingent fee arrangement to collect past due alimony and child support, finding that "[i]n such collection matters there is little risk of conflict of interest since the financial relationship between the parties has already been set and the lawyer's duty is merely to enforce the prefixed obligation." Nassau County 9018 reached the same conclusion about an action to collect past due maintenance and a distributive award under a final judgment of divorce previously entered. The committee viewed such an action, in essence, as no different from a standard collection case:

> [S]ince the "domestic relations" case has already been terminated by a judgment, any enforcement proceedings are technically not a part of the earlier "domestic relations case," and, practically, do not involve the "unique character" of a domestic relations case. Enforcement proceedings would, rather, involve the standard collection mechanisms afforded to any judgment creditor under the Civil Practice Law and Rules. Successful collection of the sums would, additionally, produce a fund out of which the fee can be paid. Finally, a divorced client, who by the very nature of the requested representation is being denied both past-due maintenance and a distributive award, might be unable economically to afford competent representation if a contingent fee is unavailable.

A few years ago, this Committee cited N.Y. State 443 with approval in N.Y. State 690 (1997). In that opinion, the Committee concluded that a lawyer who represents a wife in a divorce proceeding may represent the wife in bringing a tort action for assault against her husband and charge a contingent fee in that tort action. The Committee cited N.Y. State 443 for the proposition that actions affecting the marital property can be distinguished from other actions between the spouses.

Despite N.Y. State 690's passing reference to N.Y. State 443 and the concurrence of two other ethics committees in New York State, the subsequent history of the Code and its interplay with the Appellate Division rules governing procedures for attorneys in domestic relations matters (22 NYCRR Part 1400) (hereinafter "Part 1400") require us to conclude that N.Y. State 443 must be overruled.

In 1990, the Code was amended to add DR 2-106(C)(2), a provision based upon Model Rule 1.5(d). The 1990 version of DR 2-106(C)(2) prohibited a lawyer from "enter[ing] into an arrangement for, charg[ing] or collect[ing] . . . any fee in a domestic relations matter, the payment or amount of which is contingent upon the securing of a divorce or upon the amount of maintenance, support, equitable distribution, or property settlement." Consequently, in 1990, for the first time, the Code contained a disciplinary rule expressly prohibiting a contingent fee in certain domestic relations matters.

In November 1993, the Appellate Division of the New York State Supreme Court adopted the rules contained in Part 1400. The scope provision of these rules is very broad, covering not only the initial proceedings to obtain a divorce, custody, child support, and/or maintenance, but also subsequent proceedings "to enforce or modify a judgment or order in connection with any such claims, actions or proceedings." Rule 1400.2 requires an attorney to provide a prospective client in such a domestic relations matter with a statement of client's rights and responsibilities that includes the following sentence: "Your attorney may not request a fee that is contingent on the securing of a divorce or on the amount of money or property that may be obtained."

Effective July 14, 1994, the Appellate Division amended DR 2-106(C)(2) to clarify, among other things, that the scope of the prohibition on contingent fees in domestic relations matters was limited to "domestic relations matters to which Part 1400 of the joint rules of the Appellate Divisions is applicable."

In 1999, the Code provisions prohibiting contingent fees in domestic relations matters were amended again. First, subdivision 10 of the Code's Definitions was added to define "domestic relations matters," incorporating the following language from the scope provision of Part 1400:

> Domestic relations matters means representation of a client in a claim, action or proceeding, or preliminary to the filing of a claim, action or proceeding, in either Supreme Court or Family Court, or in any court of appellate jurisdiction, for divorce, separation, annulment, custody, visitation, maintenance, child support, or alimony, or to enforce or modify a judgment or order in connection with any such claims, actions or proceedings.

Second, DR 2-106(C)(2) was amended by replacing the word "upon" with the phrase "in any way determined by reference to," so that DR 2-106(C)(2)(a) now reads:

(C) A lawyer shall not enter into an arrangement for, charge or collect:

(2) Any fee in a domestic relations matter:

(a) The payment or amount of which is contingent upon the securing of a divorce or in any way determined by reference to the amount of maintenance, support, equitable distribution, or property settlement.

That change in DR 2-106(C)(2)'s language was recommended by the New York State Bar Association, and adopted by the Appellate Division, "to confirm the breadth of the prohibition against result-based attorneys' fees in matrimonial cases." NYSBA Special Committee to Review the Code of Professional Responsibility Report to the House of Delegates 31 (Feb. 29, 1996). As a result of that change, "the dollar amount of maintenance, support, equitable distribution, or a property settlement cannot even be a factor, much less the sole determinant, of the amount of the legal fee in a domestic relations matter." Roy D. Simon, Jr., Simon's New York Code of Professional Responsibility Annotated 182 (2001).

Thus, the literal language of the Code, as amended in 1999, prohibits an attorney from entering into a contingent fee retainer in a matrimonial collection action. The Code's definition of a domestic relations matter would encompass such a collection action, because it would be an action "to enforce . . . a judgment or order in connection with [prior] claims, actions or proceedings" for maintenance, child support, and/or alimony. Further, the amount of the legal fee would be predicated, at least in part, upon the amount of maintenance, child support, and/or alimony recovered, in violation of the literal language of DR 2-106(C)(2).

We question, however, whether prohibiting a contingent fee in a matrimonial collection action serves the public policies animating DR 2-106(C)(2)(a). First, the rule supports the institution of marriage by prohibiting a fee arrangement that would create an economic incentive for a lawyer to fight against reconciliation of the husband and wife and that encourages "bitter and wounding court battles." See V.W. v. J.B., 165 Misc.2d 767, 629 N.Y.S.2d 971, 973 (N.Y. Co. 1995), rev'd sub nom Weinstein v. Barrett, 640 N.Y.S.2d 103 (1st Dep't 1996). See generally Wolfram, Modern Legal Ethics § 9.4.4 (1986); Restatement (Second) of Contracts, §190(2). Second, it supports the interests and autonomy of the represented spouse and the children by prohibiting a fee arrangement that would create an economic incentive for a lawyer to seek a distribution of property that favors the lawyer, possibly sacrificing the interests of the client and the client's children. See generally Wolfram, Modern Legal Ethics § 9.4.4 (1986).

Arguably, neither of these policies is undermined when a lawyer enters into, charges or collects a contingent fee retainer in a matrimonial collection action. First, the fee award is not predicated upon securing a divorce or any other result inconsistent with reconciliation or preservation of the marriage. A matrimonial collection action, as defined above, only arises after a divorce decree already has been rendered. Second, in a matrimonial collection action, a court has already entered a final judgment fixing the amount of maintenance, child support and/or alimony to be paid. Thus, in theory at least, the interests of the client and the client's children could not be sacrificed by the lawyer's pursuit of the largest fee.[34] Viewed from that perspective, the matrimonial collection action is nothing more 34 The Committee is aware, however, that the previously-ordered amount of maintenance, child support and/or alimony may be the subject of overall settlement negotiations when, as sometimes happens, the matrimonial collection action causes the defaulting spouse to seek a future modification of those fixed amounts.

The majority of ethics committees in other states that have considered the propriety under Model Rule 1.5 of a contingent fee retainer in a matrimonial collection action have reached that conclusion, determining that a contingent fee arrangement in a matrimonial collection action is not contrary to the public policies underlying Model Rule 1.5[35].2 See e.g., Arizona Op. 93-04; North Carolina RPC 155 (1993); Kansas Op. 9213; South Carolina Op. 9205; Oregon 1991-13; Pa. Inf. Op. 90-98; New Jersey Op. 618 (1988); Colorado Op. 67 (1985; updated for change to the Model Rules in 1995). But see New Hampshire Op. 1990 - 91/15 (1991) (interpreting New Hampshire Rule 1.5(d) to prohibit a contingent fee arrangement for the collection of past due amounts of a property settlement owed under an existing divorce decree).

Moreover, contingent fee arrangements may make available to the public legal services that otherwise could not be afforded, thus serving a lawyer's duty to make legal services fully available. EC 2-1. There is some basis to believe that, at least in some cases, the availability of a contingent fee arrangement might make available to the public attorneys who otherwise might not be willing to take on a matrimonial collection action. See, e.g., Nassau County 9018.[36]

There is no "legislative history" regarding the adoption of the broad definition of "domestic relations matter" in Part 1400 or the definition's subsequent incorporation into the Code. Consequently, we cannot say whether the specific issue of contingent fee agreements in matrimonial collection actions – as opposed to other domestic relations actions – was considered in connection with the definition's adoption. Because contingent fee agreements in collection actions may not undermine the public policy of DR 2-106(C)(2)(a), and in light of other states' favorable treatment of such agreements, we believe that the prohibition on such fees should be reviewed and reconsidered. At present, however, we are constrained to read the Code in accordance with its literal language. Because that language so clearly prohibits a contingent fee arrangement in a matrimonial collection action, we conclude that such a contingent fee arrangement is prohibited by DR 2106(C)(2)(a). We therefore overrule N.Y. State 443 and modify N.Y. State 690 with respect to its passing reference to N.Y. State 443.

CONCLUSION:

Under DR 2-106(C)(2)(a), a lawyer may not enter into an arrangement for, charge or collect a contingent fee in a post-divorce action to collect past due maintenance, child support and/or alimony based upon a final judgment previously entered.

35 We note, however, that the language of Model Rule 1.5 differs from the language of DR 2106(C)(2)(a) because of the Code's definition of a "domestic relations matter." Therefore, unlike DR 2106(C)(2)(a), Model Rule 1.5 does not literally prohibit a contingent fee arrangement in a matrimonial collection action.

36 Domestic Relations Law § 237(c) and § 238, which provide for the delinquent spouse's payment of the other spouse's attorneys' fees in certain situations, may limit the circumstances in which a contingent fee arrangement might be necessary to obtain an attorney willing to represent a client in a matrimonial collection action.

TOPIC: Former prosecutors; conflict of interest.

DIGEST: A former prosecutor may represent criminal defendants investigated and prosecuted during former prosecutor's tenure with a district attorney's office if he or she did not participate personally and substantially in the investigation or prosecution of the defendant, and where doing so violates neither the duty to represent the new client zealously nor the duty to protect the former client's (the government's) confidences and secrets.

CODE: DR 9-101(B); DR 4-101; Canon 7.

QUESTION:

May a former prosecutor who handled white collar criminal prosecutions, appellate work, post-conviction motions, investigations, and occasionally covered for other prosecutors in a twenty-attorney district attorney's office, and who now works in the appeals unit of a Legal Aid office, represent criminal defendants who were indicted and charged during the prosecutor's tenure with the district attorney's office if such representation is limited to defendants in matters in which he or she had no role in the prosecution or investigation of the case and received no confidential or non-public information regarding the matter?

OPINION:

DR 9-101(B)(1) of the Lawyer's Code of Professional Responsibility (the "Code") provides that, except as otherwise expressly permitted by law, a lawyer "shall not represent a private client in connection with a matter in which the lawyer participated personally and substantially as a public officer or employee." All lawyers in the firm are disqualified from "knowingly" undertaking or continuing such representation unless the disqualified lawyer is effectively screened from any participation in the matter, is apportioned no part of the fee, and there are no other circumstances that create an appearance of impropriety.

In this Committee's Opinion 502, we concluded that a former Assistant District Attorney ("ADA") is disqualified from representing someone indicted during the ADA's tenure as a prosecutor only "where he had access to confidential or non-public information relating to the matter in which he is later retained to act in a private practice or where the circumstances attendant upon the management and operation of the district attorney's office, as well as the character of his former employment, reasonably suggest that he had such access." NY. State 502 (1978). Opinion 502 quotes the "substantial responsibility" language in a prior version of DR 9-101, and cites ABA Opinion 342, in which the ASA Standing Committee on Ethics and Professional Responsibility defined the phrase "substantial responsibility" as follows:

> "substantial responsibility" envisages a much closer and more direct relationship than that of a mere perfunctory approval or disapproval of the matter in question It contemplates a responsibility requiring the official to become personally involved to an important, material degree, in the investigative or deliberative processes regarding the transactions or facts in question. . . . it is not necessary that the public employee or > official shall have personally and in a substantial manner investigated or passed upon the particular matter, for it is sufficient that he had such a heavy responsibility for the matter in question that it is unlikely he did not become personally and substantially involved in the investigative or deliberative processes regarding that matter

In 1990, DR 9-101 was amended to require that a former government lawyer be disqualified from representing a criminal defendant investigated and prosecuted when the lawyer was a government prosecutor only if he or she "participated personally and substantially" in the matter.'[37] The amendment of DR 9-101 made clear that disqualification must be based on the lawyer's "personal participation to a significant extent" Thus, where an ADA has participated substantially in the investigation or prosecution of a related matter involving a person that he or she wishes to represent in private practice, DR 9-101(B) disqualifies the lawyer from taking on such representation. See, e.g., General Motors Corp. v. City of New York, 501 F.2d 639 (2d Cir. 1974) (lawyer who was substantially involved in antitrust action against plaintiff while working for the Department of Justice was disqualified from representing municipality in similar antitrust action against General Motors); Flushing Savings Bank v. Ahearn, 465 N.Y.S. 2d 574 (2d Dep't 1983) (lawyer disqualified from representing bank in foreclosure action where as an ADA he supervised a related extensive investigation and prosecution involving some of the same parties); see also Board of Education of City of New York v. Nyquist, 590 F.2d 1241, 1247 (2d Cir.1979).

The fact that a former government lawyer was counsel for the government in unrelated matters at the same time that the defendant's case was investigated or prosecuted is not enough to demonstrate personal and substantial participation under DR 9-101 or to require is qualification under that rule. See N.Y. State 638 (1992). At the same time, a former prosecutor must still carefully assess the circumstances of his or her service in the prosecutor's office to determine whether he or she may be deemed to have participated "personally and substantially" in the investigation or prosecution of a criminal defendant. Relevant facts include, but are not limited to, (1) the extent to which the former prosecutor served in a more than nominal supervisory role; (2) the extent to which the former prosecutor had knowledge of government confidences and secrets relevant to the proposed representation of the same defendants; (3) the extent to which the former prosecutor provided coverage for other ADAs; (4) the extent to which the former prosecutor was kept apprised of cases in the office; and (5) the extent of the former prosecutor's access to the case files and other information regarding cases in the prosecutor's office. As we noted in Opinion 638, "theappearance of improprietywill not, standing alone, require disqualification in the usual case." N.Y. State 638 (1992).

Even where a former government prosecutor did not participate personally and substantially in the investigation or prosecution of the criminal defendant that the lawyer now wishes to represent, he or she has a duty to protect confidences and secrets that he or she learned as a result of her former position as a government prosecutor. The former prosecutor is prohibited from representing a criminal defendant where to do so would require a violation of either the duty to protect the former client's (here, the government's) confidences and secrets under DR 4-101, or the duty to represent the new client (the defendant) zealously under Canon 7. As we explained in Opinion 638:

37 This language is derived from ABA Model Rule 1.11 (a) and 18 U.S.C. § 207(a)(1)(B).

> [A lawyer who] possesses a confidence and secret within the meaning of DR 4-101(A), which is not otherwise permitted to be disclosed by one of the several preconditions of DR 4-101(C), but which nevertheless must be used under Canon 7 to discharge faithfully and zealously the current proposed representation . . . unquestionably cannot represent the [new client] zealously under Canon 7 without violating . . . DR 4-101(B)

If a former prosecutor is disqualified from representing a defendant under DR 9-101(B), other attorneys in the Legal Aid office may represent the defendant provided that the office effectively screens the former ADA from any participation in the matter pursuant to DR 9-101(8) and that there are no other circumstances attendant to the particular representation that create an appearance of impropriety in the defendant's representation by any attorney in the office.

We note that Opinion 638 also analyzed the conflict that you present under a prior version of DR 5-108. DR 5-108 concerns conflicts of interest involving former clients generally. The version of DR 5-108 discussed in Opinion 638 provided that "[e]xcept with the consent of a former client after full disclosure a lawyer who has represented the former client in a matter shall not . . . [u]se any confidences or secrets of the former client except as permitted by DR 4-101 [1200.19] (C) or when the confidence or secret has become generally known." Based on this language, the Committee concluded that former government attorneys had a duty under DR 5-108 and DR 4-101 to protect a former client's confidences and secrets. In 1999, DR 5-108 was amended to direct former government lawyers to the personal and substantial participation test in DR 9-

101(B). The rule now provides that "[e]xcept as provided in DR 9-101 [1200.45] (B) with respect to current or former government lawyers, a lawyer who has represented a client in a matter shall not, without the consent of the former client after full disclosure . . . [u]se any confidences or secrets of the former client except as permitted by DR 4-101 1200.19 or when the confidence or secret has become generally known." DR 5-108(A) [N.Y.C.R.R. § 1200.27(A)] (emphasis added). Although the current version of DR 5-108 does not eliminate the need to analyze the former government lawyer conflict issue under DR 4 101and Canon 7, the amendment of DR 5-108 appears to have obviated the need to analyze the conflict under DR 5-108.

CONCLUSION:

A former ADA may represent a criminal defendant charged or indicted while the ADA was in the prosecutor's office if he or she did not participate in a material way in the investigation or prosecution of the defendant or learn confidences and secrets relevant to the defendant's case such that the proposed representation necessarily would lead to a violation of either DR 4-101 or Canon 7. If the former prosecutor is disqualified under DR 9-101(B) or DR 4-101, his or her current law office may represent the defendant provided that the office screens the former prosecutor in accordance with 9-101(B), the former prosecutor is apportioned no part of the fee earned from the representation, and there is no circumstance attendant to the defendant's representation that creates an appearance of impropriety.

TOPIC: Use of computer software to surreptitiously examine and trace e-mail and other electronic documents

DIGEST: Lawyers may not ethically use available technology to surreptitiously examine and trace e-mail and other electronic documents.

CODE: DR 1-102(A)(4), DR 1-102(A)(5), DR 4-101, DR 7-102(A)(8), Canon 4, Canon 7, EC 4-1

BACKGROUND:

Modern computer technology enables sophisticated users who receive documents by electronic transmission to "get behind" what is visible on the computer screen and determine, among other things, revisions made at various stages, and sometimes even the authors of the revisions. Use of this technology would enable a lawyer who receives e-mail and electronic documents from counsel for an opposing party to obtain various kinds of information that the sender has not intentionally made available to the lawyer. For example, a lawyer who has received the final draft of a contract from counsel for a party with whom the lawyer is negotiating would be able to see prior drafts of the contract and, perhaps, learn the identity of those who made the revisions, without the knowledge or consent of the sending lawyer. How to effectively "block" recipients from access to deletions and prior versions of the "visible" document appears to be unclear and a matter of debate among sophisticated computer users. See, e.g., M. David Stone, "Deleting Your Deletions," P.C. Magazine November 20, 2000.

It is also possible for an e-mail sender to determine the subsequent route of the e-mail, including comments on the e-mail written by its ultimate recipients. Through use of this application a lawyer can place a "bug" in e-mail he or she sends to opposing counsel and learn the identity of those with whom the first recipient shares the message and comments that these persons may make about it. Even if a user can avoid applications that make it possible to place a bug in the user's e-mail, the recipient's forwarded messages can still be traced if the user forwards the message to someone who has not taken these measures. Accordingly, it is virtually impossible to render one's e-mail system "bug-proof." See www.privacyfoundation.org/privacywatch, "E-Mail Wiretapping", posted February 5, 2001.

QUESTION:

May a lawyer ethically may use available technology to surreptitiously examine and trace e-mail and other electronic documents in the manner described?

OPINION:

This new technology permits a user to access confidential communications relating to another lawyer's representation of a client, including "confidences" and "secrets" within the scope of DR 4-101 of the Lawyer's Code of Professional Responsibility ("Code")[38] For this reason, we conclude that the use of computer technology in the manner described above constitutes an impermissible intrusion on 38 The Code defines "confidence" as "information protected by the attorney-client privilege under applicable law"; the term "secret" includes all "other information gained in the professional relationship that the client has requested be held inviolate or the disclosure of which would be embarrassing or would be likely to be detrimental to the client." DR 4-101(A).

the attorney-client relationship in violation of the Code. The protection of the confidences and secrets of a client are among the most significant obligations imposed on a lawyer. As explained in EC 4-1:

> Both the fiduciary relationship existing between lawyer and client and the proper function of the legal system require the preservation by the lawyer of confidences and secrets of one who has employed or sought to employ the lawyer. A client must feel free to discuss anything with his or her lawyer and a lawyer must be equally free to obtain information beyond that volunteered by the client. . . . The observance of the ethical obligation of a lawyer to hold inviolate the confidences and secrets of a client not only facilitates the full development of facts essential to proper representation of the client but also encourages non-lawyers to seek early legal assistance.

Although the precise question presented in this inquiry has not previously been answered by this Committee or, to our knowledge, by other ethics authorities, we believe the circumstances described are substantively analogous to less technologically sophisticated means of invading the attorney-client relationship that we and other authorities have addressed and rejected as inconsistent with the ethical norms of the profession. For example, the strong public policy in favor of protecting attorney-client confidentiality is expressed in the prohibition against lawyers (1) soliciting the disclosure of unauthorized communications, see, e.g., Dubois v. Gradco Sys., Inc., 136 F.R.D. 341, 347 (D. Conn. 1991) (Cabranes, J.) (Although former employees of adverse corporate party are not within reach of the no-contact rule "it goes without saying that plaintiff's counsel must take care not to seek to induce or listen to disclosures by the former employees of any privileged attorney-client communications to which the employee was privy"); see also ABA Formal Op. 91-359; (2) exploiting the willingness of others to undermine the confidentiality principle, see N.Y. State 700 (1997); ABA Formal Op. 94-382; and (3) making use of inadvertent disclosures of confidential communications, see ABA Formal Op. 92-368.

The Code prohibits a lawyer from engaging in conduct "involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation," DR 1-102(A)(4) and "conduct that is prejudicial to the administration of justice." DR 1-102(A)(5). We believe that in light of the strong public policy in favor of preserving confidentiality as the foundation of the lawyer-client relationship, use of technology to surreptitiously obtain information that may be protected by the attorney-client privilege, the work product doctrine or that may otherwise constitute a "secret" of another lawyer's client would violate the letter and spirit of these Disciplinary Rules. Accord MMR/Wallace Power & Indus. Inc. v. Thames Assocs., 764 F. Supp. 712, 718-19 (D. Conn. 1991) (spirit if not the letter of ethical rules precludes an attorney from acquiring, inadvertently or otherwise, confidential information about his adversary's litigation strategy); In re Wisehart, 721 N.Y.S. 2d 356*,* 281 A.D. 2d 23, (1st Dep't 2001) (respondent suspended for two years for using documents purloined by his client from opposing counsel); N.Y. City 1989-1 (client's interception of adversary's communications with counsel involved dishonesty and deceit; lawyer may not help client take advantage of such wrongdoing).

In the present inquiry, although counsel for the other party intends the lawyer to receive the "visible" document, absent an explicit direction to the contrary counsel plainly does not intend the lawyer to receive the "hidden" material or information about the authors of revisions to the document. To some extent, therefore, the "inadvertent" and "unauthorized" disclosure cases provide guidance in the present inquiry.

In N.Y. State 700 (1997), we concluded that a lawyer who receives an unsolicited and unauthorized communication from a former employee of an adversary's law firm may not seek information from that person if the communication would exploit the adversary's confidences or secrets. Despite the fact that the Code does not expressly require a lawyer to refrain from encouraging a breach of client confidentiality by opposing counsel's staff, we determined that because use of such information would undermine confidentiality and the attorney-client relationship, it was conduct "involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation," DR 1-102(A)(4), and "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice." DR 1-102(A)(5).

In N.Y. State 700 we cited ABA Formal Op. 92-368 in support of our conclusion that the strong public policy in favor of confidentiality outweighed what might be seen as the competing principles of zealous representation (Canon 7) and encouraging more careful conduct. ABA 92-368 concluded that a lawyer who receives confidential materials under circumstances where it is clear that they were not intended for the receiving lawyer (a) should not examine the materials once the inadvertence is discovered, (b) should notify the sending lawyer of their receipt, and (c) should abide by the sending lawyer's instructions as to their disposition.

The circumstances of the present inquiry present an even more compelling case against surreptitious acquisition and use of confidential or privileged information than that presented by the "inadvertent" or "unauthorized" disclosure decisions. First, to the extent that the other lawyer has "disclosed", it is an unknowing and unwilling, rather than inadvertent or careless, disclosure. In the "inadvertent" and "unauthorized" disclosure decisions, the public policy interest in encouraging more careful conduct had to be balanced against the public policy in favor of confidentiality. No such balance need be struck here because it is a deliberate act by the receiving lawyer, not carelessness on the part of the sending lawyer, that would lead to the disclosure of client confidences and secrets.

Nor need we balance the protection of confidentiality against the principles of zealous representation expressed in Canon 7. Our Code carefully circumscribes factual and legal representations a lawyer can make, people a lawyer may contact, and actions a lawyer can take on behalf of a client. Prohibiting the intentional use of computer technology to surreptitiously obtain privileged or otherwise confidential information is entirely consistent with these ethical restraints on uncontrolled advocacy.

Although our jurisdiction does not extend to questions of law, we note that the misuse of some aspects of this technology, particularly the use of e-mail "bugs," may violate federal or state law prohibiting unauthorized interception of e-mail content. S*ee, e.g.,* The Electronic Communications Privacy Act, 18 U.S.C. §§2510 et. seq. In that event, such conduct would, of course, be unethical per se. DR 7-102(A)(8) ("In the representation of a client, a lawyer shall not . . . [k]nowingly engage in other illegal conduct or conduct contrary to a Disciplinary Rule").

Finally, the inquiry that has prompted this opinion underscores the need for all lawyers to exercise care in using Internet based e-mail. Accordingly, we reiterate the admonition we offered in

N.Y. State 709 (1998) that "lawyers must always act reasonably in choosing e-mail for confidential communications, as with any other means of communication." [39]

CONCLUSION:

A lawyer may not make use of computer software applications to surreptitiously "get behind" visible documents or to trace e-mail.

(25-01)

39 As noted in N.Y. State 709 (1998), "in circumstances in which a lawyer is on notice for a specific reason that a particular e-mail transmission is at heightened risk of interception, or where the confidential information at issue is of such an extraordinarily sensitive nature that it is reasonable to use only a means of communication that is completely within the lawyer's control, the lawyer must select a more secure means of communication than unencrypted Internet e-mail."

TOPIC: Application of disciplinary authority and choice of law rules.

DIGEST: Where conduct of a lawyer licensed in New York clearly has its predominant effect in another jurisdiction in which the lawyer is licensed to practice, the ethics rules of that jurisdiction apply to the conduct.

CODE: DR 1-105

QUESTION:

What ethics rules apply to the conduct of an attorney admitted both in New York and another jurisdiction when the conduct in question takes place in the other jurisdiction?

OPINION:

The inquirer is an attorney practicing in Chicago who represents individuals in immigration matters and has inquired about a possible conflict of interest involving a client and a former client. The attorney is admitted to practice in both New York and Illinois.

DR 1-105, which was added to the Code of Professional Responsibility in 1999, provides "choice of law" rules to be applied in the exercise of disciplinary authority in New York[40].[1] Paragraph A of this rule establishes the jurisdiction of the New York disciplinary authorities over New York admitted attorneys. Paragraph B deals with choice of law in the exercise of New York's disciplinary authority. Under DR 1-105(A), a lawyer licensed in New York is subject to the disciplinary authority of New York regardless of where the lawyer's conduct occurs. DR 1-105(B) provides that in the exercise of New York's disciplinary authority, the applicable rules are not necessarily those of New York but may in certain circumstances be the rules of professional conduct of another jurisdiction.

DR 1-105(B)(1) addresses conduct in another jurisdiction in connection with a proceeding before a court before which a lawyer has been admitted to practice, either generally or for a special purpose. In that situation, the rules of the jurisdiction in which the court sits apply.

DR 1-105(B)(2) provides:

> a. If the lawyer is licensed to practice only in this state [New York], the rules to be applied shall be the rules of this state, and
> b. If the lawyer is licensed to practice in this state and another jurisdiction, the rules to be applied shall be the rules of the admitting jurisdiction in which the lawyer principally practices; provided, however, that if the particular conduct clearly has its predominant effect in another jurisdiction in which the lawyer is licensed to practice, the rules of that jurisdiction shall be applied to that conduct.

40 DR 1-105 is based on ABA Model Rule 8.5.

Because the conduct in the inquiry does not involve court proceedings, DR 1-105(B)(1) is not applicable. Rather, the first clause of DR 1-105(B)(2)(b) applies to this inquiry. Because the attorney is admitted to practice in New York and Illinois, and the jurisdiction in which the attorney principally practices is Illinois, the ethics rules of Illinois are applicable to the inquirer's question. Furthermore, even if the inquirer principally practiced in New York, the particular conduct in the inquiry has its predominant effect in Illinois. In that situation as well, the ethics rules of Illinois are applicable. Cf. N.Y. City 1999-7 (New York ethics rules apply although clients resided in New Jersey and INS petitions were filed in New Jersey because the lawyer's office was in New York and all legal services were performed in New York).

CONCLUSION:

If, in work unrelated to court proceedings, a lawyer is admitted in New York and is admitted and practices principally in another jurisdiction, that jurisdiction's ethics rules apply. However, where particular conduct clearly has its predominant effect in another jurisdiction (such as New York) where the lawyer is licensed to practice, the rules of that jurisdiction will apply.

(Revised 5/6/02)

TOPIC: Competence; excessive case load

DIGEST: An attorney representing a government agency may not undertake more matters than the attorney can competently handle, but the attorney may accept his or her superior's reasonable resolution of an arguable question of professional duty.

CODE: DR 1-104(F), 2-110(B)(2), 4-101, 6-101(A), 6-102(A), 7-101(A)(2)-(3); EC 7-7, 7-8, 7-13, 7-14.

FACTS:

A lawyer is employed as a staff attorney by a government department of social services ("Department") to represent the Department in various matters. These include representing the Department in child welfare, paternity and support proceedings and other proceedings in Family Court, representing the Department in administrative proceedings and state court proceedings, providing legal opinions to the Commissioner of the Department, and providing legal advice to the Department regarding the interpretation of and compliance with laws and regulations relating to the Department's work.

The office in which the lawyer works has a large case load in relation to the number of staff attorneys. The case load cannot be significantly reduced by the Department, because the Department is required by law to participate in certain legal proceedings. For example, the Federal Adoption and Safe Families Act of 1997, Pub. L. 105-89 (codified in various sections of 42 U.S.C.) requires states to initiate or join proceedings to terminate parental rights of children under ten years of age who have spent 18 of the prior 24 months in State foster care; further, after 12 months in foster care, a child is entitled to a disposition or "permanency" hearing to determine the child's future status, including whether the child should be returned to the parent, continued in foster care, or placed for adoption. Despite the Department's heavy case load, the Department has been unable to obtain approval to hire additional staff attorneys. The staff attorney believes that more matters are being assigned than can be competently handled by any given attorney.

QUESTION:

May a lawyer for a government social services agency accept more matters than the lawyer believes that he or she may competently handle?

OPINION:

The question whether a government lawyer may accept more matters than the lawyer can competently handle is governed by several principles applicable to lawyers generally. To begin with, once a lawyer undertakes to represent a client in a particular matter, the lawyer must conduct the representation competently. The duty of competence is derived from agency law and is expressed in DR 6-101(A)(2) and (3), which provides that a lawyer shall not "[h]andle a legal matter without preparation adequate in the circumstances" or "[n]eglect a legal matter entrusted to the lawyer." Accord American Law Institute, RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF THE LAW GOVERNING LAWYERS ("RESTATEMENT") (2000) § 16 (1), (2) (in matters within the scope of a lawyer's representation of a client, the lawyer must "proceed in a manner reasonably calculated to advance [the] client's lawful objectives, as defined by the client after consultation," and "act with reasonable competence and diligence"). Whether particular conduct would entail neglect or inadequate preparation or would otherwise involve incompetent representation depends, of course, on the nature and scope of the particular representation.

Second, a lawyer must decline to represent a client in a particular matter if the lawyer is incapable of providing competent representation. See DR 6-101(A)(1) (a lawyer shall not "[h]andle a legal matter which the lawyer knows or should know that he or she is not competent to handle, without associating with a lawyer who is competent to handle it"). If it becomes apparent after undertaking a representation that the lawyer is unable to render competent representation consistent with DR 6-101(A), and the lawyer is unable to become competent by associating with another lawyer or by other means, the lawyer must seek to withdraw from the representation. See DR 2-110(B)(2) (lawyer must seek to withdraw from employment (after first obtaining court's permission where required) if the "lawyer knows or it is obvious that continued employment will result in violation of a Disciplinary Rule"); DR 7-101(A)(2) ("A lawyer shall not intentionally . . . [f]ail to carry out a contract of employment entered into with a client for professional services, but the lawyer may withdraw as permitted under DR 2-110 . . .").

Third, implicit in these obligations is a lawyer's duty to avoid accepting more matters than the lawyer can competently handle, and a duty to reduce one's workload if it has become unmanageable. See ABA 399 (1996) (legal services lawyers will be required "to withdraw from some matters if funding and staff reductions greatly increase these lawyers' workloads, since maintaining an unmanageable case load violates the lawyer' s duty . . . to provide competent representation"); ABA 347 (1981) ("only those matters that can be handled consistently with each lawyer 's duty of competent, nonneglectful representation should be continued. When faced with a work load that makes it impossible for the remaining lawyers to represent existing clients competently, Legal Services Lawyers should withdraw from a sufficient number of matters to permit proper handling of the remaining matters"); Mich. Op. RI-252 (1996) (disciplinary rules "require lawyers to monitor their workloads and decline new clients if taking them on would create overloads that make competent representation impossible"); Wis. Op. E-84-11 (1984) (an assistant public defender must decline new legal matters and, if necessary, withdraw from a sufficient number of cases to ensure adequate representation in the remaining matters, and a lawyer may not accept an overly burdensome caseload if it interferes with his duty to render competent legal services to his clients); Charles W. Wolfram, MODERN LEGAL ETHICS 187 (1986)[1]. [1]

1 Thus, the lawyer may not justify neglecting a matter, preparing inadequately, or otherwise performing incompetently on the ground that the lawyer had too many matters to handle. Although DR 6-101(A)(2) provides that the lawyer must undertake preparation that is "adequate in the circumstances," this refers to the circumstances of the particular representation. The relevant "circumstances" would not include the excessiveness of the lawyer's work load.

Fourth, when it is clear that the lawyer will be compelled to neglect matters or to prepare inadequately in violation of DR 6-101(A), a subordinate lawyer may not comply with a supervising lawyer's instruction to undertake particular matters. In general, the subordinate lawyer may "act[] in accordance with a supervisory lawyer's reasonable resolution of an arguable question of professional duty," DR 1-104(F) (emphasis added), at least with respect to the subordinate lawyer's obligations under the disciplinary rules. Therefore, if the question of the lawyer's competence is uncertain, the subordinate lawyer may accept the supervising attorney's reasonable resolution of that question. However, a subordinate lawyer has an independent obligation to determine whether particular conduct comports with the duty of competence under DR 6-101(A) and, thus, whether the lawyer is competent to handle the cases the lawyer has been assigned.

Finally, the duty to represent a client competently cannot be avoided by obtaining the client's consent to provide incompetent representation. The lawyer and client may agree on how to define or limit the scope of the lawyer's representation (that is, they may limit the objectives of the representation, the number or type of matters that will be undertaken, or the particular proceedings in which the lawyer will render assistance). See, e.g., N.Y. State 713 (1999); N.Y. State 604 (1989); see also EC 7-8 ("the decision whether to forego legally available objectives or methods because of non-legal factors is ultimately for the client and not for the lawyer"). However, they may not limit the scope of the representation in a manner that, under the circumstances, will compel the lawyer to neglect the matter, prepare inadequately, or otherwise represent the client incompetently. See, e.g., Model Rules of Professional Conduct Rule 1.2, Comment ("An agreement concerning the scope of representation must accord with the Rules of Professional Conduct and other law. Thus, the client may not be asked to agree to representation so limited in scope as to violate Rule 1.1 [which requires a lawyer to provide competent representation to a client] . . ."); N.Y. State 664 (1994) (lawyer may give legal advice over telephone only if, inter alia, "the limited representation [does] not materially impair the client's rights"). Likewise, although lawyers must comply with certain directions given by the client, see, e.g., ECs 7-7, 7-8, this does not include an obligation to comply with a direction to neglect a matter, to handle a matter without adequate preparation, or otherwise to represent the client incompetently. Cf. DR 6-102(A) (a lawyer may not "limit prospectively the lawyer's individual liability to a client for malpractice").

These principles fully apply to lawyers employed by the government to represent government agencies. Nothing in the disciplinary rules suggests that the duty of competence is inapplicable to lawyers who are employed by a client as distinguished from those who are retained by a client[2].[2] Nor is the duty inapplicable to lawyers who represent the government as distinguished from those who represent private parties. On the contrary, if a government lawyer were to neglect matters or to prepare inadequately, the lawyer might violate not only the duty of competence, but also the duty "to seek justice and to develop a full and fair record." EC 7-14; see generally N.Y. State 728 (2000); Steven K. Berenson, Public Lawyers, Private Values: Can, Should, and Will Government Lawyers Serve the Public Interest, 41 B.C.L. REV. 789 (2000); Bruce A. Green, Must Government Lawyers "Seek Justice" in Civil Litigation?, 9 WIDENER J. OF PUBLIC LAW 235 (2000).

2 Although DR 6-101(A)(3) provides that a lawyer shall not "[n]eglect a legal matter entrusted to the lawyer," this does not impose a disciplinary obligation on an employed lawyer to agree to handle every matter that the employer seeks to entrust to the lawyer. Obviously, the rule was not meant to impose such an obligation, since, if it did, the employed lawyer would be obligated to undertake representations even when doing so would result in a disciplinary rule violation.

Accordingly, a government attorney representing a department of social services in judicial or administrative proceedings may not neglect a matter or prepare inadequately. The attorney may not comply with the direction of an agency official to "just show up" or "just do the best you can" without preparation, if the result will be to represent the department incompetently. On the contrary, the staff attorney, as a government official and lawyer for the government, has an independent professional obligation to carry out the department's legal responsibilities in judicial and administrative proceedings in which the staff attorney represents the department, and cannot comply with instructions that would require the lawyer to act antithetically to the law and to the general ethical responsibility to "seek justice." Nor may the staff attorney accept so many matters that the attorney would have no choice but to handle some neglectfully or incompetently. In making the judgment whether handling a matter in a particular way would be incompetent, or whether a case load has become unmanageable, a staff attorney may give weight to a supervising lawyer's reasonable resolution of these questions where they are in doubt, but may not defer where the question is unarguable or the supervising attorney's resolution of it is unreasonable.

Although a staff attorney who is asked to take on an overwhelming number of matters may not accept so many that the lawyer will be unable to handle them all competently, other alternatives are not foreclosed by the disciplinary rules. The staff attorney must consult with the client (through a supervising lawyer or officials in the agency) to attempt to resolve concerns about the excessiveness of the caseload. Indeed, in determining how to proceed in the face of an excessive caseload the staff attorney must, in the first instance, seek direction from the client. Cf. DR 7-101(a)(3) (lawyer may not prejudice or damage the client during the course of the professional relationship). The staff attorney should seek the supervising attorney's permission for the staff attorney to reassign matters or withdraw from matters in which the Department does not require legal representation, so that the staff attorney has time to handle essential matters. The staff attorney may assist the department in seeking court appointments of lawyers from the private bar to handle some of the department's cases. If the client refuses to exercise its authority to decide which of the matters should be reassigned or withdrawn from, the lawyer may resign or decline to handle cases that cannot be handled competently and then deal with whatever employment consequences may follow[3]. [3]

CONCLUSION:

An attorney who represents a government agency may not undertake more matters than the attorney can competently handle.

(18-01)

3 Whether a staff attorney may be discharged for declining to accept matters that the staff attorney cannot competently handle is a question of employment law that is beyond this Committee's jurisdiction. Cf. Wisconsin E-91-3 (committee declined to answer question whether supervising attorney in public defender's office may sanction staff attorney who declined new matters because of an excessive case load, since the "committee cannot address issues of employment relations").

TOPICS: Ancillary business organizations; conflict of interest

DIGEST: In certain circumstances, a lawyer owning or operating an ancillary business continues to be barred after the promulgation of DR 1-106 from providing legal and nonlegal services in the same transaction even with the consent of the client.

CODE: DR 1106; DR 1107; DR 5101(A); EC 112.

QUESTION:

New York recently adopted a new disciplinary rule, DR 1-106, addressing the responsibilities of lawyers or law firms providing nonlegal services to clients or other persons. The rule provides, among other things, that in certain circumstances the law firm or lawyer may not be subject to the disciplinary rules of the Code with respect to the provision of nonlegal services. This Committee has previously held that in some transactions – notably real estate transactions – a lawyer who also operates certain ancillary businesses may not provide both legal and nonlegal services in the same transaction, even with the informed consent of the client. The question considered in this opinion is the extent to which those earlier opinions, and the disciplinary rules on which they were based, apply after the promulgation of the new rule.

OPINION:

On July 23, 2001, the Appellate Divisions adopted new rules on multidisciplinary practice, effective November 1, 2001. One of those rules, DR 1106 (22 NYCRR §1200.5b), addresses the responsibilities of lawyers or law firms providing nonlegal services to clients or other persons, including lawyers or law firms that own or control an entity providing nonlegal services to clients of the lawyer or law firm, or themselves operate a business providing nonlegal services that are distinct from the legal services they provide. That rule provides, in pertinent part, that in such circumstances the lawyer or law firm is subject to the disciplinary rules with respect to the nonlegal services if the person receiving the services could reasonably believe that the nonlegal services are the subject of an attorney-client relationship. DR 1106(A)(3). The rule goes on to state that > it will be presumed that the person receiving nonlegal services believes the services to be the subject of an attorney-client relationship unless the lawyer or law firm has advised the person receiving the services in writing that the services are not legal services and that the protection of an attorney-client relationship does not exist with respect to the nonlegal services, or if the interest of the lawyer or law firm in the entity providing nonlegal services is de minimis.

DR 1-106(A)(4). In short, the rule suggests that the disciplinary rules, or at least certain of them, presumptively will not apply to the lawyer's rendition of nonlegal services if they are distinct from the legal services rendered and if the client is informed in writing that the protections of the attorney-client relationship do not apply.

In a number of opinions that this committee has issued over the years, we have opined that in certain circumstances a lawyer also engaged in a nonlegal business cannot provide both legal and nonlegal services in the same transaction even with the consent of the client. Brokerage businesses are a salient example. We held in N.Y. State 208 (1971), N.Y. State 291 (1973), N.Y. State 340 (1974), and N.Y. State 493 (1978), that a lawyer could not act as a lawyer in the same transaction in which the lawyer or his or her spouse acted as a real estate broker "because of the possible conflict between his client's and his own personal interest." N.Y. State 208 (1971). Accord N.Y. County 685 (1991); see also N.Y. State 694 (1997) (impermissible to participate in broker-run home buyer's program because of resulting strong interest in broker's success). The rationale is that the broker's interest in closing the transaction interferes with the lawyer's ability to render independent advice with respect to the transaction. We have reached similar conclusions with respect to insurance brokers and securities brokers. N.Y. State 536 (1981); N.Y. State 619 (1991). But see N.Y. State 687 (1997) (lawyer-broker can sell insurance to a client where advice about the purchase of insurance products is "merely tangential" to the legal representation); N.Y. State 711 (1998) (same). See also N.Y. State 595 (1988), N.Y. State 621 (1991), N.Y. State 738 (2001) (dual role of lawyer for real estate client and abstract title examiner impermissible because of possible need to negotiate exceptions to title).

These decisions, and others like them, were based largely on DR 5101(A), which currently provides that a lawyer is barred from accepting or continuing employment if the exercise of professional judgment on behalf of a client > will be or reasonably may be affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property, or personal interests, unless a disinterested lawyer would believe that the representation of the client will not be adversely affected thereby and the client consents to the representation after full disclosure of the implications of the lawyer's interest.

See, e.g., N.Y. State 711 (1998).

The question is whether the application of this conflict rule to the dual roles discussed in our earlier opinions survives the promulgation of DR 1106. We conclude that it does.

Compliance with DR 1106(A)(4) does not mean that no rules apply to the relationship between a lawyer and an affiliated business. See EC 112 ("Although a lawyer may be exempt from the application of Disciplinary Rules with respect to nonlegal services on the face of DR 1106(A), the scope of the exemption is not absolute"). DR 1-106 only relieves the lawyer or law firm from the application of the disciplinary rules to nonlegal services. The application of DR 5-101(A) that resulted in the prohibitions on dual roles that are discussed above (and others like them) resulted from the application of that rule to the provision of legal services. In some circumstances, that rule will bar a lawyer from offering nonlegal services because the nonlegal business activity would create a conflict with the representation of the client. In the case of the brokerage businesses noted above, the existence of the personal interest created by the prospect of earning fees from the nonlegal business was held to affect the exercise of independent legal judgment. It was the effect on the exercise of legal judgment that was the concern, just as with any other personal conflict created by the lawyer's own financial, business or personal interests under DR 5-101(A). That interest could be created by activities or relationships totally unrelated to any business services provided to the client – such as a fervent political belief or personal relationship with a lawyer representing the adversary. See, e.g., Restatement (Third) of the Law Governing Lawyers § 125 comment c (2000). Thus, the promulgation of DR

1-106 does not alter the application of DR 5-101(A) just because the personal interest that is at issue is the lawyer's participation in a nonlegal business offering services to the client. See also EC 1-14 (contractual relationship with nonlegal professional firm under DR 1-107 "might, in certain circumstances, adversely affect the independent professional judgment of the law firm creating a conflict of interest" under DR 5-101[A]).

CONCLUSION:

The prohibitions on acting as a broker and a lawyer in the same transaction and other similar bars on dual roles for lawyers owning or operating ancillary businesses continue to apply after the promulgation of DR 1-106.

TOPIC: Ancillary business organizations; mortgage brokerage; title abstract company; conflict of interest

DIGEST: Where a client is represented by a lawyer and uses an ancillary business owned by the lawyer, the rules applicable to personal conflicts of interest and transactions between clients and lawyers continue to apply after promulgation of DR 1-106. Under those rules, a lawyer owning mortgage brokerage and title abstract businesses may not, even with informed consent, represent buyer or seller and act as mortgage broker in the same transaction or act as title abstract company with respect to non-ministerial tasks, but may, where the client consents after full disclosure, act as abstract company with respect to purely ministerial abstract work. The lawyer may, with informed consent, represent the lender in the same transaction in which the lawyer's company acts as mortgage broker, but may not represent the lender in transactions in which the lawyer's title abstract company acts in other than a ministerial capacity. The lawyer may in certain circumstances, with informed consent, represent both the buyer's lender and the seller in the same transaction or, where not required to negotiate terms, the buyer's lender and the buyer in the same transaction.

QUESTIONS:

A lawyer is the sole shareholder of a licensed New York mortgage brokerage corporation and a separate title abstract company. Where the attorney informs the client of the attorney's other business relationships and discloses same to the client in a Statement of Client's Rights in Cooperative Business Arrangements, and where the client gives informed written consent, may the attorney and/or the attorney's companies:

1. Represent the selling client in a real estate transaction and (a) broker the mortgage for the buyer, (b) act as the lender's attorney at closing, and (c) act as the abstract company for the transaction?

2. Represent the buying client in a real estate transaction and (a) broker the mortgage for the buyer, (b) act as the lender's attorney at closing, and (c) act as the abstract company for the transaction?

OPINION:

On July 23, 2001, the Appellate Divisions adopted new rules on multidisciplinary practice, effective November 1, 2001. One of those rules, DR 1106 (22 NYCRR §1200.5b), addresses the responsibilities of lawyers or law firms providing nonlegal services to clients or other persons, including lawyers or law firms that own or control or are otherwise affiliated with an entity providing nonlegal services to clients of the lawyer or law firm. That rule provides, in pertinent part, that where an entity controlled by a lawyer or law firm provides nonlegal services to a person, the lawyer or law firm is subject to the disciplinary rules with respect to the nonlegal services if the person receiving the services could reasonably believe that the nonlegal services are the subject of an attorney-client relationship. DR 1106(A)(3). The rule goes on to state that > it will be presumed that the person receiving nonlegal services believes the services to be the subject of an attorney-client relationship unless the lawyer or law firm has advised the person receiving the services in writing that the services are not legal services and that the protection of an attorney-client relationship does not exist with respect to the nonlegal services, or if the interest of the lawyer or law firm in the entity providing nonlegal services is de minimis.

In opinions issued prior to the new rules, this Committee held that in certain circumstances a lawyer also engaged in a nonlegal business could not provide both legal and nonlegal services in the same transaction even with the consent of the client. In particular, with respect to brokers, we held in N.Y. State 208 (1971), N.Y. State 291 (1973), N.Y. State 340 (1974), and N.Y. State 493 (1978), that a lawyer could not act as a lawyer in the same transaction in which the lawyer or his or her spouse acted as a real estate broker "because of the possible conflict between his client's and his own personal interest." N.Y. State 208 (1971). Accord N.Y. County 685 (1991); see also N.Y. State 694 (1997) (impermissible to participate in broker-run home buyer's program because of resulting strong interest in broker's success). We do not appear to have addressed mortgage brokers, but have reached similar conclusions with respect to insurance brokers and securities brokers. N.Y. State 536 (1981); N.Y. State 619 (1991). We have also suggested, though, that a lawyer-broker can sell insurance to a client where advice about the purchase of insurance products is "merely tangential" to the legal representation. N.Y. State 687 (1997); N.Y. State 711 (1998).

With respect to abstract title companies, in N.Y. State 595 (1988), N.Y. State 621 (1991), and N.Y. State 738 (2001), we held that a lawyer could, with consent after disclosure, refer real estate clients to a title abstract company in which the lawyer or his or her spouse had an ownership interest "for purely ministerial abstract work," but not where the abstract company provided the additional service of preparing a title report or serving as an agent for the title underwriter. The central rationale was that if the abstract company prepared a report showing exceptions in title and recommending whether a title insurance policy should be issued, the law firm for the party would be required "to negotiate these issues . . . with itself." N.Y. State 738 (2001). See also N.Y. State 731 (2000) (lawyer cannot pay employees to refer clients to lawyer-owned title company for non-ministerial tasks).

In N.Y. State 752 (2002), we concluded that these decisions, and similar opinions limiting or barring lawyers from performing dual roles, survive the promulgation of DR 1-106. This is because the decisions were based on the application of DR 5-101(A) to the legal services, not the nonlegal services. That rule bars a lawyer from accepting legal employment if the exercise of professional judgment might be affected by the lawyer's own "financial, business, property or personal interests." The pursuit of the nonlegal business activities in the same transaction in which the lawyer was representing a client created an irreconcilable conflict for the lawyer.

We turn now to the particular dual employments suggested by the inquirer.

Representing Buyer or Seller and Acting as Lender's Attorney.

This part of the inquiry does not involve ancillary businesses at all. The inquirer proposes to represent as a lawyer, in the first question, both the selling client and the lender and, in the second, both the buying client and the lender. These questions are governed by DR 5105, which regulates conflicts of interest in simultaneous representations.

Taking the second question first, the proposal to represent both the buying client and the lender in the same transaction creates the potential for a clear conflict. The role of the lender's attorney can be, in part, to protect the interests of the bank in negotiating the loan agreement with the borrower and obtaining the necessary security on the borrower's property. The role of the buyer's attorney can be, in part, to protect the borrower's interests in those same matters. In situations in which the lawyer for the buyer could be called upon to negotiate with the lawyer for the lender, it would not be possible for one lawyer to play both roles, even with consent, because that would put the lawyer in the position of negotiating with him or herself. The lawyer could not zealously represent both parties. See DR 5105(C); N.Y. City 2001-2 ("Situations in which a lawyer or members of a single law firm would be required to negotiate directly with herself or each other on behalf of multiple clients in a transaction . . . will rarely be consentable").

This committee has recognized, however, that in some circumstances there is no negotiation or assertion of rights between the lender and buyer in which a lawyer has any role. As long as full disclosure of the risks of dual representation has been made and knowing consent obtained, we have held such dual representation can be permissible. N.Y. State 8 (1965); N.Y. State 199 (1971); N.Y. State 438 (1976); N.Y. State 694 (1997); see also ABA Inf. 643 (1963) (same); ABA Inf. 837 (1965) (same). But see Nassau County 98-10 (lawyer may not represent buyer and lender in same residential purchase and mortgage transaction).

This committee has likewise recognized that representation of a seller and a lender, which commonly do not directly negotiate with each other at all, can be permissible with consent after disclosure. N.Y. State 611 (1990). Even here, we have cautioned that there may be circumstances when the dual representation would be barred:

> If, for example, issues arise concerning the acceptability of title, or environmental conditions, or some other condition of closing, the seller may desire to close while the lender may decide it has no obligation to make the loan. . . . Where in a particular matter it is not unlikely that such differing interests may arise, the multiple representation should be declined.
> Id.

Representing Buyer, Seller or Lender and Acting as Mortgage Broker.

The inquirer also asks whether the brokerage company can act as the buyer's mortgage broker in the same transaction in which the inquirer represents as counsel either the seller or the buyer, and the lender. As noted, this committee has held in a number of opinions that a lawyer cannot act as a real estate broker and as counsel to a party in the same transaction. N.Y. State 208, 291, 340, 493. The rationale for these opinions is that a lawyer should not have a personal stake in the advice rendered, and a broker who is paid only if the transaction closes cannot be fully independent in advising the client as a lawyer.

With respect to the buyer or seller, we see nothing in the nature of the mortgage brokerage business that calls for a different result. The inquirer advises that a mortgage broker is paid a percentage of the money borrowed and only when the loan closes. While the amount of the fee varies widely, the gross mortgage broker fee (before subtraction of the individual salesperson's fee) almost always exceeds the legal fee a lawyer receives for representing a buyer or seller in a typical, uncomplicated purchase or sale in the inquirer's area. Under these circumstances, the rationale of our prior opinions with respect to real estate brokers applies with full force. See also Nassau County 89-33 ("By acting as an associate of the mortgage broker for a commission, the attorney would then have a divided loyalty between the obligations to his client and the desire to see the transaction close."); Nassau County 41/87 (similar); N.C. 248 (1997) (attorney may not "certify title or act as settlement agent because [attorney's] personal interest in seeing that [mortgage brokerage corporation] receives its fee or commission for placing the loan could conflict with the client-borrower's desire to close only when it is in his or her best interest to do so"). But see S.C. 9604 (permitting dual role, but cautioning, "An attorney must determine that his conflicting role as a mortgage broker will not affect the attorney's ability to judge independently and render candid advice").

The opinions in which we have suggested that a lawyer-broker might sell insurance to a client if the purchase was "merely tangential" to the advice are different, for there the lawyer was not engaged for estate planning or for similar advice that could be influenced by a desire to ensure that the insurance purchase would close. As we said in N.Y. State 711, "[I]f there is a reasonable probability (viewed objectively) that the lawyer's professional judgment will be adversely affected by the lawyer's business interests, then the lawyer must not offer to sell insurance to client." In the case of the mortgage broker, whose interest is in seeing the transaction close, there is such a reasonable probability.

Our opinions do not address at any length whether the prohibition on brokers acting as lawyers extends to lawyers for lenders.[4] Whatever may be the situation with real estate brokers, the lender is in quite a different position in relation to the mortgage broker than the buyer or seller. The mortgage broker is frequently simply a distribution channel for the lender, who sets the terms of the products that will be offered and pays the mortgage broker's compensation. The lender is typically a sophisticated commercial entity. If it is not happy with the relative incentives provided by the amounts it pays for brokerage and legal services, it can decline to consent to the dual representation. If it wishes to have the greater set of "checks and balances" provided by separating the mortgage broker and legal functions, it can do so. Further, the lender will frequently have an ongoing relationship with the mortgage broker/lawyer, thus tempering any impulse by the broker/lawyer to "close at any cost." Finally, there is rarely substantial negotiation of the terms of a residential mortgage, and the lawyer's range of discretion is correspondingly narrower, so any less-than-vigorous representation of the lender will be easier to detect. In short, we do not believe that the dual status of mortgage broker and lender's attorney creates "'such delicate conflicting relationships and inescapable divided loyalties that the likelihood of improper conduct or motivation, without any showing of harm and regardless of disclosure and consent, may give rise to professional misconduct."' N.Y. State 516 (1980) (quoting Matter of Kelly, 23 N.Y.2d 368, 378, 296 N.Y.S.2d 937, 945-46 [1968]). With full disclosure and consent, we conclude there are transactions in which a lawyer may act as counsel to an institutional lender and as a mortgage broker for that lender.

4 N.Y. State 694 (1997) noted in passing that a lawyer could not participate in a real estate broker's program to provide a single, lower-cost attorney to represent the lender and the buyer: "We believe the personal financial incentive for the attorney to use his or her influence over the Purchaser to secure an enforceable contract of sale and to close the transaction is sufficiently great that it is not at all obvious that the Attorney can adequately represent the interests of the Purchaser and Lender as well." (Emphasis added.)

We are aware that in some circumstances mortgage brokers receive cash compensation from the buyer or undertake, or otherwise have, duties to the buyer to find the best possible mortgage for the buyer. It is possible that in such circumstances the broker's duties to the buyer would raise an insurmountable conflict for the lender's lawyer; however, we do not believe that should call for a per se rule. If, for example, the lender's lawyer was retained only after the loan had been placed with a particular lender, the mortgage broker's duties to the buyer may have been discharged before the lawyer's duties to the lender begin. In addition, we do not deal here with any disclosure obligations the mortgage broker may have to the buyer, as that is not a question of legal ethics.

Representing Buyer, Seller or Lender and Acting as Abstract Company.

As noted, in N.Y. State 595, 621 and 738 we found that a lawyer could not refer real estate clients to a title abstract company in which the lawyer had an ownership interest and that would be hired to provide insurance or perform other than ministerial tasks. That conclusion was based on DR 5101(A). See, e.g., N.Y. State 738 (2001). As set forth above, those rules continue to apply after the promulgation of DR 1106. Our opinion in N.Y. State 595 expressly extended this prohibition to counsel for the lender. The lender's interests in marketable, insured title at the lowest price are little different from the buyer's.

The inquirer reports that in the inquirer's geographic region, abstract companies "do the research, work the file and present the package to the Title Insurance Companies who provide the Title Insurance to the buyer." This appears to go beyond the purely ministerial abstract searching contemplated by our earlier opinions. To the extent that the abstract company examines the title and makes recommendations on insurability or exceptions, it would appear to have an irreconcilable conflict with its attorney-owner's duty to provide independent advice and negotiate title problems, if necessary.

We note one further matter. The inquirer intends to provide clients with a "Statement of Client's Rights in Cooperative Business Arrangements," in order to inform the clients that the services performed by the inquirer through the title abstract company are not legal services and that the protection of an attorney-client relationship does not exist with respect to the nonlegal services. The Statement of Client's Rights in Cooperative Business Arrangements is a statement prescribed by 22 NYCRR §1205.4 for use in alerting clients to the existence of contractual relationships between lawyers and nonlegal professionals commonly involving the reciprocal referral of clients and, to a certain extent, the sharing of premises, overhead and professional fees. See DR 1107; EC 114. It is not clear that this Statement is appropriate in these circumstances. The inquirer does not refer to any agreements or understandings for the reciprocal referral of clients between the law firm and the ancillary businesses, which is the focus of the Statement; the Statement does not disclose the fact that the lawyer owns the mortgage brokerage and abstract title companies, which is highly material; and the Statement does not expressly state that the protections of the attorney-client relationship do not exist with regard to the nonlegal services, as required by DR 1106(A)(4). We advise the inquirer to use in place of the Statement of Client's Rights in Cooperative Business Arrangements, or to supplement it with, a statement more tailored to the requirements of DR 1106(A)(4) and DR 5-101(A).

CONCLUSION:

A lawyer who owns a title abstract company and a mortgage brokerage is barred from acting as a lawyer in a transaction in which one or both of those companies is also acting in a variety of situations in which the lawyer's personal interest in a fee (or dividend) from the ancillary businesses compromises the independence of the lawyer's legal advice. Our conclusions on this are summarized in the following chart, in which "Y" means that the lawyer can act in the dual capacity in certain circumstances, with informed consent and under the conditions set forth above and in our prior opinions, and "N" means the lawyer cannot act in the dual capacity at all:

CAN LAWYER ACT IN DUAL ROLE WITH INFORMED CONSENT?
	Buyer's Lawyer	Seller's Lawyer	Lender's Lawyer
Mortgage Brokerage	N	N	Y
Title Abstract Co. providing insurance or making insurance recommendation	N	N	N
Title Abstract Co. performing only "ministerial tasks"	Y	Y	Y

OPINION 754 (02/25/2002)

TOPIC: Expenses of litigation; interest charged to lawyer passed on to clients.

DIGEST: Plaintiff's counsel in contingent matter may, under certain conditions, pass on to client as costs the interest charged to lawyer on borrowings made to fund litigation expenses.

CODE: DR 2-106(D); DR 5-103(B)(1); EC 5-8.

QUESTION:

May a lawyer borrowing funds to advance expenses in contingent fee litigation pass on to the client the interest charged on such borrowings?

OPINION:

Although a lawyer may not "advance or guarantee financial assistance to the client" in connection with contemplated or pending litigation, A lawyer may advance or guarantee the expenses of litigation, including court costs, expenses of investigation, expenses of medical examination, and costs of obtaining and presenting evidence, provided the client remains ultimately liable for such expenses. DR 5-103(B)(1). See also EC 5-8.

Whether a lawyer who borrows funds in order to advance the expenses of litigation may charge the client the interest incurred by the lawyer on such borrowings is an issue not previously considered by this Committee. In N.Y. State 666 (1994), we held that a lawyer could refer a client to a lender who would provide economic support to the client during the pendency of the case, provided the lawyer had no interest in the lender, received no payment for the referral, and did not compromise client confidentiality in making the referral. In N.Y. State 399 (1975), the Committee held that a lawyer may ethically charge interest on a delinquent account provided the client was given adequate advance notice of and consented to the arrangement, the interest rate and the time period after which interest is charged are reasonable, and the total charges are not excessive. More recently, we considered whether interest could be charged to the client on disbursements paid by the lawyer but not yet repaid by the client. In N.Y. State 729 (2000), we held that it is not unethical for a lawyer to charge interest on unpaid disbursements in a contingent fee matter, provided that

> (1) the client is clearly advised that an interest charge will be imposed on disbursements that are not paid within a stated period of time and that the client consents to the arrangement before it goes into effect, (2) the client is billed for the disbursements promptly after they have been incurred so the client may decide whether to pay the disbursements or incur the interest charge, (3) the period of time between the bill and the imposition of the interest charge is reasonable, (4) the disbursement itself is appropriate . . . and (5) the interest rate is reasonable.[5]

5 The Committee believes that to satisfy the requirement regarding the reasonableness of the interest rate, the borrowing lawyer must investigate alternative borrowing opportunities.

The opinion also noted in passing that it did not seem economically significant whether the lawyer actually borrowed funds to pay the disbursement or used funds already on hand. In either event the lawyer "has incurred a cost and seeks to pass it on to the client." Id (citing N.Y. City 1997-1). That holding is dispositive here.

Thus, if the five conditions described in N.Y. State 729 are met and the lawyer receives no other benefit from the lender than the loan itself, the lawyer ethically may borrow to finance disbursements and pass on the interest incurred to the client. As noted in N.Y. State 666, the lawyer may not compromise client confidentiality in connection with the financing arrangement. Further, in a contingent fee matter the interest charge arrangement must be set forth in the writing required by DR 2-106(D). Finally, whether and how such an arrangement comports with the court rules governing fee calculations in many contingent fee cases (see 22 NYCRR §§603.7([e]; 691.20[a]-[c]; 806.13[b] and 1022.31[b]) is a question of law beyond this Committee's jurisdiction.

CONCLUSION:

Subject to the conditions described – including that the client remains ultimately liable for the expenses paid under DR 5-103(B)(1); that the lawyer has no interest in the lender; that client confidences and secrets are not compromised; that the terms of the borrowing are on adequate advance notice to the client; that the time periods after which interest is charged the client and the interest rate are reasonable; that the client consents in advance; that the client may avoid the interest charge by paying the disbursements; and that the disbursements are themselves appropriate – a lawyer may borrow to finance litigation expenses in a contingent fee matter and pass on to the client the interest costs incurred in connection with such borrowings.

TOPICS: Ancillary business organizations; transactions between lawyer and client; solicitation

DIGEST: The provisions of DR 5104(A), relating to business transactions between a lawyer and client, should not apply to a lawyer's recommendation that the client employ a distinct lawyer-owned ancillary business, where the lawyer takes steps to ensure that the client understands that the protections of the attorney-client relationship do not apply to the non-legal services, as provided for in DR 1106(A). The rules on solicitation do not prevent the lawyer-owned ancillary business from referring existing customers to the lawyer for legal services, including by in-person or telephone contact, but no referral fee may be paid therefor.

QUESTIONS:

A lawyer is the sole shareholder of a company providing non-legal services to clients or other persons. Where the company provides services to clients of the lawyer, and the lawyer informs the clients in writing in accordance with DR 1-106(A)(4) that the services provided by that business are not legal services and that the protection of the attorney-client relationship does not exist with respect to the non-legal services:

1. To what extent do the disclosure rules and substantive restrictions of DR 5-104(A), relating to business transactions between a lawyer and a client, apply to the non-legal services or to the lawyer's recommendation that the clients employ the non-legal business?

2. To what extent can the lawyer permit the non-legal business to recommend employment of the lawyer by in-person or telephone contact without violating DR 2-103(A)?

OPINION:

On July 23, 2001, the Appellate Divisions adopted new rules on multidisciplinary practice, effective November 1, 2001. One of those rules, DR 1106 (22 NYCRR §1200.5b), addresses the responsibilities of lawyers or law firms providing non-legal services to clients or other persons that are "distinct" from legal services being provided to that person, or are provided through a separate entity. The rule provides, in effect, that the disciplinary rules of the Code of Professional Responsibility will not apply to the non-legal services if the lawyer ensures that the client understands that the non-legal services are not the subject of an attorney-client relationship. The rule provides a procedure for the lawyer to give the client written notice to that effect, which serves to obviate a presumption that would otherwise arise that the client believes the services are the subject of an attorney-client relationship.[6]

In N.Y. State 752 (2002), we considered one aspect of the effect of DR 1106 in situations in which a company owned or controlled by a lawyer wishes to provide non-legal services to persons who are also clients of the lawyer. We concluded that compliance with the written notice provisions of DR 1-106(A)(4) does not provide a "safe harbor" from all disciplinary rules that could limit the non-legal service provider's ability to provide services to the lawyer's clients. In particular, we concluded that the lawyer's financial interest in certain non-legal businesses – such as brokerages – could make it impossible under the rule governing personal conflicts of interest, DR 5101(A), for the lawyer to render unconflicted professional services in matters where the non-legal business is involved.

We address in this opinion the rules governing mutual referral of business between lawyers and affiliated non-legal service providers in situations where the conflict rules permit the firms to act. In particular, we consider the extent to which the rules on business transactions between lawyers and clients and the rules on in-person solicitation apply to reciprocal referral arrangements between lawyers and ancillary businesses if the notice provisions of DR 1-106 are complied with.[7] The businesses

6 DR 1-106 provides:

> A. With respect to lawyers or law firms providing non-legal services to clients or other persons:
> 1.A lawyer or law firm that provides non-legal services to a person that are not distinct from legal services being provided to that person by the lawyer or law firm is subject to these Disciplinary Rules with respect to the provision of both legal and non-legal services.
> 2.A lawyer or law firm that provides non-legal services to a person that are distinct from legal services being provided to that person by the lawyer or law firm is subject to these Disciplinary Rules with respect to the non-legal services if the person receiving the services could reasonably believe that the non-legal services are the subject of an attorney-client relationship.
> 3.A lawyer or law firm that is an owner, controlling party or agent of, or that is otherwise affiliated with, an entity that the lawyer or law firm knows to be providing non-legal services to a person is subject to these Disciplinary Rules with respect to the non-legal services if the person receiving the services could reasonably believe that the non-legal services are the subject of an attorney-client relationship.
> 4.For purposes of DR 1-106(A)(2) and DR 1-106(A)(3), it will be presumed that the person receiving non-legal services believes the services to be the subject of an attorney-client relationship unless the lawyer or law firm has advised the person receiving the services in writing that the services are not legal services and that the protection of an attorney-client relationship does not exist with respect to the non-legal services, or if the interest of the lawyer or law firm in the entity providing non-legal services is de minimis.
> B. Notwithstanding the provisions of DR 1-106(A), a lawyer or law firm that is an owner, controlling party, agent, or is otherwise affiliated with an entity that the lawyer or law firm knows is providing non-legal services to a person shall not permit any non-lawyer providing such services or affiliated with that entity to direct or regulate the professional judgment of the lawyer or law firm in rendering legal services to any person, or to cause the lawyer or law firm to compromise its duty under DR 4-101(B) and (D) with respect to the confidences and secrets of a client receiving legal services.
> C. For purposes of DR 1-106, 'non-legal services' shall mean those services that lawyers may lawfully provide and that are not prohibited as an unauthorized practice of law when provided by a non-lawyer.

7 Similar questions, particularly with respect to solicitation, arise under DR 1-107 involving reciprocal referral arrangements between law firms and non-legal professional service firms that are not commonly controlled. That disciplinary rule, which was promulgated at the same time as DR 1-106, must be taken into account in considering these questions, but our primary focus in this opinion is referrals between affiliated legal and non-legal businesses under DR 1106.

as to which this inquiry has arisen are various, including lawyer-owned companies that provide fiduciary, mortgage brokerage and abstract title services for title insurance companies.[8]

Referrals by the lawyer to the non-legal business. We begin with the question of referrals by the lawyer to the non-legal business. While a referral can arise independent of any legal services being provided, it will most commonly occur where the lawyer is engaged to give legal advice on a matter and desires to refer the client to a related non-legal service provider in connection with that matter.

As we found in N.Y. State 752, there is little question that DR 5101(A) applies to the referral. That rule provides for a waiver, with informed consent, of the conflict created by the lawyer's interest in the business to which the lawyer is referring the client. We have issued extensive opinions governing the disclosure necessary when a lawyer recommends employment of a business in which the lawyer has a financial interest. See, e.g., N.Y. State 595 (1988) (abstract title company: "a lawyer has a duty to make . . . alternative[] [services] known to the client to the extent they exist" and must disclose "the nature of the abstract company's fee structure and the law firm's proprietary interest in the abstract company"). These rules are not the application of the disciplinary rules to the non-legal business, but rather interpret the kind of disclosure and consent required when a lawyer, exercising his or her professional judgment, considers recommending the employment of a service company that happens to be owned (in whole or in part) by the lawyer.

DR 5-104(A) is a more specific conflicts rule that addresses business transactions between lawyers and clients and provides specific disclosure requirements and substantive fairness limitations applicable to such transactions. The rule states:

> A lawyer shall not enter into a business transaction with a client if they have differing interests therein and if the client expects the lawyer to exercise professional judgment therein for the protection of the client, unless:
> (1) The transaction and terms on which the lawyer acquires the interest are fair and reasonable to the client and are fully disclosed and transmitted in writing to the client in a manner that can be reasonably understood by the client;
> (2) The lawyer advises the client to seek the advice of independent counsel in the transaction; and
> (3) The client consents in writing after full disclosure, to the terms of the transaction and to the lawyer's inherent conflict of interest in the transaction.[9]

8 The question arises in numerous other contexts as well. The Special Committee that proposed DR 1-106 noted a wide range of non-legal businesses that are conducted by law firms or by entities owned by law firms. Among them were: lobbying, economic or scientific expertise, appraisal services, accounting, financial planning, real estate and insurance brokerages, title insurance, various consulting businesses (management, human resources, environmental, etc.), and private investigation. Report of the NYSBA Special Committee on the Law Governing Firm Structure and Operation, Preserving the Core Values of the American Legal Profession: The Place of Multidisciplinary Practice in the Law Governing Lawyers 98-103 (2000) [hereinafter, the "MacCrate Report"].

9 Prior to 1999, this provision required only that the lawyer obtain informed consent to the business transaction, and did not have the requirements of independent counsel, written terms, and substantive fairness and reasonableness. It thus essentially duplicated the protections offered by the personal conflicts rule in DR 5-101(A).

We address the application of this rule in two parts: first, whether it applies to the rendition of the non-legal services as such, where they are rendered to a lawyer's client by a business owned or controlled by the lawyer; and second, even if the rule does not apply to those services, whether the lawyer must nevertheless comply with the requirements of the rule in referring the client to the non-legal business.

A central limitation of DR 5-104(A) is that it applies only to transactions if "the client expects the lawyer to exercise professional judgment therein for the protection of the client." This provision is closely parallel to the operative language of DR 1-106, which is that the disciplinary rules apply to non-legal services rendered by a distinct, lawyer-owned business "if the person receiving the services could reasonably believe that the non-legal services are the subject of an attorney-client relationship." DR 1-106(A)(2), 1-106(A)(3). That is, if the person receiving the services could not reasonably believe that the non-legal services are the subject of an attorney-client relationship, it would seem that that person should not expect the lawyer to exercise professional judgment for the protection of the client with respect to those services.

DR 1-106 provides some instruction on how to ensure that the client does not reasonably believe that the non-legal services are the subject of an attorney-client relationship. First, the rule permits that conclusion only where the non-legal services are distinct from legal services provided to the client, or are offered through a separate entity. Second, while a client will ordinarily be presumed to believe that the non-legal services are the subject of an attorney-client relationship, that presumption will not apply if the lawyer advises the client in writing "that the services are not legal services and that the protection of an attorney-client relationship does not exist with respect to the non-legal services." We conclude that if a lawyer satisfies the requirements of DR 1-106, so that the client does not reasonably believe that the protections of the attorney-client relationship apply to the delivery of non-legal services, those non-legal services will not constitute a business transaction in which the client expects the lawyer to be exercising professional judgment for the protection of the client within the meaning of DR 5-104(A).

We recognize that there is authority that the mere statement by the lawyer, "I am not representing you in this matter," may not be sufficient to cause a client to understand that the lawyer will not be exercising professional judgment for the benefit of the client, because in the context of a long-term attorney-client relationship the "full legal import [of that statement] will escape most laymen." In re Neville, 708 P.2d 1297, 1303 (Ariz. 1985). We are not suggesting by this opinion that the mere statement, even in writing, to that effect is an automatic safe harbor, and DR 1-106 does not say so. The writing serves to reverse the presumption against the lawyer that would otherwise exist. It is possible that in certain circumstances, such as where the client is unsophisticated and has had a long relationship with the lawyer and where, despite the existence of a separate entity, the non-legal services are not completely separated from the rendition of legal services, the writing would be insufficient to disabuse the client of a reasonable belief that the lawyer would be acting to protect the client. We conclude only that satisfaction of the test in DR 1-106(A)(2) or (A)(3) will also satisfy the threshold test of DR 5-104(A) – that is, that if a client has a reasonable belief that non-legal services are not the subject of an attorney-client relationship, then in the ordinary case, the client will not expect that professional judgment will be exercised in the delivery of the non-legal services for the protection of the client. See N.Y. State 687 (1997) (DR 5104[A] does not apply to non-estate-planning lawyer selling insurance to clients where lawyer "take[s] care to clarify" that he or she is acting as broker and not lawyer and "the client should not expect the lawyer to exercise professional judgment for the client's protection").

Turning now to the second part of the question, where the lawyer-client relationship predates use of the non-legal service, what of the initial recommendation that the client use the services of the lawyer's company?

There is support for applying DR 5-104(A) to that recommendation in a comment to Model Rule 5.7, which was one of the provisions from which DR 1-106 was derived. See MacCrate Report at 326-36.[10] The Model Rule comment states that Rule 5.7 applies to a recommendation by a lawyer that a client use an ancillary business controlled by the lawyer:

> When a client-lawyer relationship exists with a person who is referred by a lawyer to a separate law-related service entity controlled by the lawyer, individually or with others, the lawyer must comply with Rule 1.8(a) [which addresses business transactions between lawyers and clients].[11]

There are, however, textual and practical difficulties with applying DR 5-104(A) to a referral to a business that is otherwise exempt from the disciplinary rules. First, such an interpretation requires that the recommendation alone be deemed to be a "business transaction" between lawyer and client.[12] That is a strained reading of that term: the recommendation as such is advice; the relevant "business transaction" is the contemplated transaction with the non-legal business, which under this hypothesis is supposed to be exempt from the application of the rules. Further, if DR 5-104(A) applies to the recommendation, the "transaction and terms" – presumably the terms of the contemplated business

10 Model Rule 5.7 provides:

> (a) A lawyer shall be subject to the Rules of Professional Conduct with respect to the provision of law-related services, as defined in paragraph (b), if the law-related services are provided:
> (1) by the lawyer in circumstances that are not distinct from the lawyer's provision of legal services to clients; or
> (2) by a separate entity controlled by the lawyer individually or with others if the lawyer fails to take reasonable measures to assure that a person obtaining the law-related services knows that the services of the separate entity are not legal services and that the protections of the client-lawyer relationship do not exist.
> (b) The term 'law-related services' denotes services that might reasonably be performed in conjunction with and in substance are related to the provision of legal services, and that are not prohibited as unauthorized practice of law when provided by a non-lawyer.

11 Ethical opinions under the Rules similarly conclude that a law firm must comply with Rule 1.8(a), or similar provisions, when it refers clients to a lawyer-controlled service provider, although none of the states in question appear to have adopted any provision like DR 1-106 or Model Rule 5.7. See N.J. 657 (1992) (lawyer may refer clients to medical-legal consulting business and divorce mediation service owned by lawyer if lawyer complies with Rule 1.8(a), advises client that alternatives exist, and recommends independent counsel); S.C. 93-05 (law firm that provides legal services to retirement plans may own interest in, and refer clients to, ancillary business that provides other services to them if, inter alia, law firm complies with Rule 1.8); Calif. 1995-141 (terms under which lawyer refers client to ancillary business must be fair, reasonable, and fully disclosed in writing); Ill. 97-7 (1998) (lawyers may form company to provide legal notices in local newspapers for clients as long as they comply with simpler version of Rule 1.8). See also Mich. RI135 (1992) (lawyer/insurance agent recommendation with respect to insurance needed must comply with Rule 1.8(a)); Utah 146A (1995) (lawyer employed as insurance agent (not through separate entity) may sell insurance products to existing legal clients after complying with Rule 1.8(a)). See also Restatement (Third) of the Law Governing Lawyers § 126 comment c (2000) ("[W]here a lawyer engages in the sale of goods or services ancillary to the practice of law, for example, the sale of title insurance, the requirements of this Section [the business-transaction section] do apply.").

12 Model Rule 1.8 uses the term "business or financial transaction," which is no different for these purposes.

transaction – must be disclosed in writing and are subject to scrutiny for fairness and reasonableness. This means, first, a significant intrusion into the conduct of the supposedly exempt ancillary business; second, the lawyer-recommended client would be treated differently and have advantages not necessarily provided to other customers of the business; and third, it would be necessary in businesses involving on-going relationships to identify a point in time when the terms would no longer be subject to that scrutiny (for example, would later changes in the terms of an architect or engineer's retention for a major project be subject to fairness-and-reasonableness review under the lawyer's code and, if so, when would that end?).

Whether or not we would reach the same conclusion under the Model Rules, we conclude that a different result is called for under DR 1-106 and DR 1-107. Although the substance of other of the Model Rule comments was incorporated into the ECs that were prepared at the same time as the new rules, compare, e.g., Model Rule 5.7 comments 1-3, 5 with EC 1-9, 1-10, 1-11, 1-12, the comment quoted above was not included. Moreover, in addition to the textual and practical difficulties already noted, applying DR 5-104(A) to the referral of a client to a lawyer-owned non-legal business would create anomalies with more-or-less equivalent relationships where those protections would not apply. In particular, DR 1-107 provides for contractual relationships between law firms and non-legal professional service firms for the purpose of offering legal and non-legal services "on a systematic and continuing basis." The relationships may provide for reciprocal referrals as well as "the sharing of premises, general overhead, or administrative costs and services on an arm's length basis." EC 114. Where the non-legal professional firms are not owned or controlled by the law firm, there is no basis to apply DR 5-104(A) to such referrals, because that rule only applies to business transactions with the lawyer. It is difficult to see why there is a greater danger of overreaching when the referral is to a lawyer-owned business than when it is to an unaffiliated business subject to a close, ongoing referral relationship with the lawyer.

In addition, the somewhat rigid protections of DR 5-104(A) have little place in the kind of ongoing referral arrangements contemplated by DR 1-107 and, as a practical matter, by commonly owned businesses under DR 1-106. Under the new rules, these businesses can now advertise the availability of the two or more services "under one roof." DR 2-101(C)(3); DR 2-102(A)(3). It would be artificial in such circumstances to urge the customer to obtain "independent counsel" before using the services that were jointly advertised and are routinely provided, often at standard, published rates.

In short, we conclude that the protections established by DR 5-101(A), requiring the disclosures noted above, and by DR 1-106(A)(2) and (3), requiring that the lawyer ensure that the client understands that the protections of the attorney-client relationship do not apply to the ancillary business, are sufficient protection when a lawyer refers a client to an ancillary business owned or controlled by the lawyer. The referral is not a "business transaction," it is merely advice, and ensuring the integrity of legal advice is the core concern of DR 5-101(A).

We are confident that those provisions are sufficient to allow disciplinary authorities to prevent a lawyer from taking advantage of the attorney-client relationship in making the referral. First, where a client referred by the lawyer enters into an unfair or unreasonable relationship with a lawyer-owned ancillary business, it is likely that a strong presumption will arise that there was insufficient disclosure of the terms and available alternatives, as required by DR 5-101(A). Further, whether or not the specific obligations of DR 5104(A) apply, the courts and disciplinary authorities have long asserted a common law right to ensure that lawyers do not take advantage of their clients in any circumstances.[13] We conclude only that no independent ethical violation should arise from failure to observe the protocols of DR 5104(A) in these circumstances.

Referrals by the non-legal business to the lawyer. Where the client's relationship with the non-legal business precedes the retention of counsel, under what circumstances may the non-legal business recommend the employment of the lawyer? This is the reverse of the situation considered above in which the lawyer recommends the ancillary business to an existing client. The new rules on multi-disciplinary practice expressly address certain aspects of the problem. As noted above, they permit the lawyer to advertise the fact of the affiliation with the ancillary business and the nature and fees of those businesses. DR 2101(C)(3), 2102(A), (B). The rules also contemplate ongoing referral arrangements between legal and non-legal businesses, although the lawyer is barred from providing a fee to the ancillary company for providing the referral. See DR 1107(A)(2), (B); DR 2103(B).

The Special Committee that drafted the new rules recognized that these provisions would be a change from existing law:

> [E]thics committee opinions in New York and other jurisdictions have expressed the concern that lawyers should not use nonlegal business operations as a "feeder" to supply them with legal business leads, and have gone so far as to prohibit lawyers from advertising the fact that they provide such services. In our view, such precautions are unnecessary and contrary to the public interest in receiving accurate and relevant information relating to the abilities, qualifications and services offered by lawyers. Any lingering concern that the public will be harmed by permitting lawyers to inform the public that they also offer nonlegal services would be allayed through the adoption of proposed DR 1106 and its accompanying Ethical Considerations. [14]

What of in-person solicitation? DR 2103(A) by its terms bars a lawyer from soliciting professional employment from a prospective client "by in-person or telephone contact, except that a lawyer may solicit professional employment from a close friend, relative, former client or current client." This rule was not changed when DR 1106 was adopted, but we conclude that it does not prevent a lawyer's affiliated business from referring a customer to the lawyer by in-person or telephone contact. Any other result would mean that the lawyer could orally refer clients to a distinct business but the business controlled by the lawyer could refer customers back to the lawyer only in writing. That would be anomalous, particularly in the context of the close relationships contemplated by the new

13 Under the old version of DR 5-104(A), which included only the informed consent provisions of DR 5-101(A), courts and disciplinary authorities imposed an obligation, based on common-law fiduciary principles, that the lawyer who engaged in business with a client show that the lawyer "took no advantage of the client-lawyer relationship." Charles W. Wolfram, Modern Legal Ethics 481 (2d ed. 1986). See also In re Wong, 275 A.D.2d 1, 5, 710 N.Y.S.2d 57, 60 (1st Dep't 2000) (noting courts' "inherent power" to regulate conduct and disciplining of attorneys); NYSBA Lawyer's Code of Professional Responsibility, Preliminary Statement:

> No codification of principles can expressly cover all situations that may arise. Accordingly, conduct that does not appear to violate the express terms of any Disciplinary Rule nevertheless may be found by an enforcing agency to be the subject of discipline on the basis of a general principle illustrated by a Disciplinary Rule or on the basis of an accepted common law principle applicable to lawyers.

14 MacCrate Report at 339-40. The opinions referred to appear to include N.Y. State 709 (1998), N.Y. State 636 (1992), N.Y. State 536 (1981), and N.Y. County 693 (1992). See MacCrate Report at 333 n.23. These opinions were issued under the old version of DR 2103, which did not have the specific prohibitions of in-person or telephone solicitation that were added in 1999, and the opinions consequently did not address the specific question relating to such solicitation discussed below.

rules. It would mean that the employees of the business (including possibly the lawyer him- or herself) could not mention the offering of legal services by the affiliated law firm even though the sign out front and the business cards and announcements on the desk did so. See DR 2-101(C)(3); DR 2-102(A). Further, were DR 2103 to require the lawyer-owned business to use only written referrals, we would probably require the same of unaffiliated professional service firms that have a contractual relationship with the lawyer under DR 1107 – see DR 1102(A)(2) ("A lawyer or law firm shall not . . . [c]ircumvent a Disciplinary Rule through actions of another") – but this would, we think, clearly go too far in regulating how an unaffiliated service firm conducts its business.

This interpretation applies only to referrals made in the context of the operation of the ancillary business and does not give a lawyer affiliated with an ancillary business free rein to approach customers or former customers of the ancillary business in person or by telephone contact to suggest retention of the lawyer. We are not suggesting, in other words, that the lawyer may make the contacts suggested because the affiliated businesses' customers are "close friend[s], . . . former client[s] or current client[s]" within the meaning of DR 2-103(A), a question we do not address in this opinion.[15]

We recognize that two opinions from Pennsylvania after the adoption of that state's version of Rule 5.7, on which DR 1-106 was modeled,[16] conclude that in-person solicitation of the clients of an ancillary business would be barred by Rule 7.3 (the analogue to DR 2-103[A]). Penn. Inf. Op. 98-20; Phila. 97-11. Pennsylvania does not appear to have adopted, however, provisions recognizing ongoing reciprocal referral arrangements like DR 1-107 and EC 1-14, or the broad permission to engage in joint advertising in DR 2-101(C) and DR 2-102(A) that was adopted at the same time. As noted, the Special Committee that drafted the new rules in New York went beyond the provisions in Pennsylvania in part to do away with "precautions" designed to prevent the use of non-legal business operations as a "feeder" to supply legal business leads. MacCrate Report at 339. Cf. Penn. Inf. Op. 93-114 (1994) ("there are a number of ethics opinions . . . that state that a lawyer may not use a nonlegal business as a 'feeder' for the lawyer's legal business").

CONCLUSION:

A lawyer owning or operating a separately incorporated or distinct non-legal business who adequately informs the client that the non-legal business is not subject to the protections of the attorney-client relationship under DR 1-106(A)(2) and (3) may refer clients to the non-legal business without complying with the specific terms of DR 5-104(A). Under DR 5-101(A), however, the lawyer must ensure that the client is fully informed of the lawyer's interest in the non-legal business and of the availability of alternatives. There is no bar on the ancillary business or the lawyer advertising the availability of the dual roles or referring existing customers or clients to the other by in-person or telephone contact, but no referral fee may be paid for that referral.

15 Virtually every ethics opinion to have considered the analogous provision of the Model Rules, Rule 7.3, has concluded that a lawyer and client must have a "prior professional relationship" – the language of the Rule – in the lawyer's capacity as a lawyer, and not through some ancillary business. Penn. Inf. Op. 98-20; Phila. 97-11; S.C. 96-04; Calif. 1995-141; Utah 146A (1995); Penn. Inf. Op. 93-114; S.C. 93-05; Mich. RI-135 (1992). But see N.C. 2000-9 ("If a prior professional relationship was established with a client of the accounting firm, Attorney may call or visit that person to solicit legal business.").

TOPIC: Advertisement of Legal Services; Street Address; Web Site or E-mail Address

DIGEST: Legal services advertisement may not list Web site or e-mail address as sole address, but must also include street address of lawyer's office.

CODE: DR 1-102(A)(4), 2-101(A), 2-101(D), 2-101(K); EC 2-10.

QUESTION:

Must every advertisement of legal services include the street address of the lawyer or firm whose services are being offered or is it sufficient for the advertisement to include only a website or e-mail address?

OPINION:

DR 2-101(K) requires that "all advertisements of legal services shall include the name, office address and telephone number of the attorney or law firm whose services are being offered." With the proliferation of the Internet, the World Wide Web and the use of electronic mail, the question arises whether an attorney may satisfy this mandate by use of a website address or e-mail address without the attorney's street address.

In N.Y. State 709 (1998) the Committee considered the use of the Internet to advertise and conduct a law practice. In the section of that opinion on advertising on the Internet, we observed both that "the Code's advertising rules are intended to protect the public from false and misleading advertisements" and also that "there is no ethical distinction to be drawn among different forms of advertising directed to a general population."

While we have found no explicit definition of the words "office address" as used in DR 2-101(K), we believe the use of a web site or e-mail address as the sole identifier of a firm's office address does not satisfy the requirement of DR 2-101(K). See DR 1-102(A)(4), DR 2-101(A) and DR 2-101(D). Prior to the advent of the Internet, the accepted meaning of the words "office address" was a physical, street address at which the principal office of the firm or lawyer offering legal services is located and to which mail, express deliveries and other communications can be addressed. The dictionary definition is instructive: "[a] place where business is conducted or services are performed ." Black's Law Dictionary 1112 (7th Ed. 1999).

That definition, with its emphasis on a physical place, served – and serves – several useful purposes. Consistent with the goal embodied in EC 2-10, the provision of a street address in advertising of a lawyer's or law firm's services should facilitate a prospective client's ability to make an intelligent selection of a lawyer. The absence of a street address in a widely disseminated advertisement could be misleading by suggesting a physical proximity to the recipient that does not in fact exist and by suggesting the ability to serve in jurisdictions in which the advertising firm or lawyer is not qualified to practice. See DR 2-101(A), DR 2-101(D).

The requirement of a street address in lawyer advertising also serves the same purposes as Judiciary Law §470, which requires non-resident New York attorneys to maintain an "office for the transaction of law business . . . within the state." The basic purpose of that requirement is to ensure that attorneys practicing in this state are amenable to contact by their clients, adversaries and other interested parties. See Lichtenstein v. Emerson, 171 Misc. 2d 933, 656 N.Y.S.2d 180 (Sup. Ct. 1997), aff'd 251 A.D.2d 64, 674 N.Y.S.2d 298 (1st Dep't 1998); White River Paper Co. v. Ashmont Tissue, Inc., 110 Misc. 2d 373, 441 N.Y.S.2d 960 (Sup. Ct. 1981). Similarly, the requirement that an advertisement include the street address of the advertising attorney facilitates the ability of a client or prospective client to find the attorney and meet with the attorney at a known physical location. The indication of a physical address also facilitates the personal service or delivery of legal papers and other correspondence where that mode of delivery is elected.

Nothing in the advent of the Internet and the World Wide Web leads us to believe that there has been any change in that accepted definition of "office address" or in the salutary purposes it advances. See N.Y. State 709, supra, and opinions cited therein.

Thus we believe that the inclusion of a web site or e-mail address as the sole address in an advertisement of legal services does not satisfy the requirement of DR 2-101(K) and we conclude that every such advertisement must include, inter alia, the street address of the office of the advertising lawyer or law firm.

CONCLUSION:

Advertising for legal services may not list a website or email address as the sole address, but must also include the street address of the lawyer's office.

OPINION 757 (07/16/2002)

TOPIC: Certification as specialist; advertising

DIGEST: Professional announcements of certification as a specialist that are distributed to members of the bar or mailed to present and former clients are "public" communications within the meaning of DR 2-105 and thus should include the disclaimer set forth in DR 2-105(C).

CODE: DR 2-101(A); 2-102(A)(2); 2-105(A); 2-105(C).

QUESTION:

Must an announcement that a lawyer has been certified in a particular field of law by an organization accredited by the American Bar Association contain the disclaimer set forth in DR 2105(C) if it is (a) mailed to members of the local bar association, (b) reprinted in the local bar association newsletter distributed to its members, and/or (c) mailed to present and former clients?

OPINION:

The inquirer has recently been certified as an "elder law attorney" by the National Elder Law Foundation, a private organization approved for that purpose by the American Bar Association. The inquirer wishes to send an announcement to members of the local county bar associations and to have the announcement reprinted in the local bar association newsletter, which is distributed to its members monthly. The announcement would state that the inquirer has "been certified as an Elder Law Attorney by the National Elder Law Foundation as accredited by the American Bar Association." The announcement would further state that the inquirer's practice would continue to be concentrated in certain areas.

The inquirer asks whether the disclaimer required by DR 2105(C)(2) needs to be included when the announcement is not being disseminated to the general public but only to attorneys who are members of the county bar associations. The inquirer also asks whether it is permissible to send the announcement to existing and former clients.

DR 2105 prohibits a lawyer from "publicly" identifying himself or herself as a "specialist" in an area of law unless he or she has been certified by certain approved organizations. If the lawyer so states, the lawyer must include a disclosure or disclaimer that (1) the certifying organization is not a government entity, (2) certification is not a requirement to practice law, and (3) certification does not necessarily imply greater competence than other attorneys experienced in the field of law. The rule states, in relevant part:

> A lawyer or law firm may publicly identify one or more areas of law in which the lawyer or law firm practices, or may state that the practice of the lawyer or law firm is limited to one or more areas of law, provided the lawyer or law firm shall not state that the lawyer or law firm is a specialist or specializes in a particular field of law, except as provided in DR 2-105 [1200.10] (B) or (C).

A lawyer may state that the lawyer has been recognized or certified as a specialist only as follows:

> 1. A lawyer who is certified as a specialist in a particular area of law or law practice by a private organization approved for that purpose by the American Bar Association may state the fact of certification if, in conjunction therewith, the certifying organization is identified and the following statement is prominently made: "The [name of the private certifying organization] is not affiliated with any governmental authority. Certification is not a requirement for the practice of law in the State of New York and does not necessarily indicate greater competence than other attorneys experienced in this field of law."

This rule, promulgated in 1999, reflects the holding in Peel v. Attorney Registration and Disciplinary Commission of Illinois, 496 U.S. 91 (1990), which recognized a lawyer's First Amendment right to state on letterhead "certified civil trial specialist by the National Board of Trial Advocacy." Justice Marshall's concurring opinion (there was no majority opinion) found the statement not actually misleading, but potentially so, and said that a state could require that such statements be accompanied by disclaimers or disclosure "in order to prevent that claim [of certification] from being misleading." 496 U.S. at 117.

The first question is whether the proposed announcement constitutes a statement that the inquirer is a "specialist or specializes in a particular field of law" within the meaning of DR 2105. The proposed announcement does not use the word "specialist" or "specializes" but rather the term "certified as an Elder Law Attorney." In N.Y. State 722 (1999) we applied DR 2105 to a proposed letterhead notation that would say "certified by AICP [American Institute of Certified Planners]," and noted that if membership in a professional organization "implies certification in a legal field, the reference must comply with DR 2-105(C)." We think it plain from the express references in DR 2-105(C) to certification by precisely the sort of organization involved here that the reference to certification proposed would be covered by the rule regardless of whether the term "specialist" is used.

The next question is whether the announcement constitutes the "public" identification of an area of specialization within the meaning of DR 2-105(A). There is no question that announcements sent to newspapers in any form – announcement cards, press releases, ghost-written articles – will require a disclaimer. We conclude that distributing a professional announcement to a number of people large enough to justify a mass mailing or printing in a newsletter is also "public" for these purposes. We believe this is a natural reading of the term and accords with other provisions of the Code as well as with the evident purpose of the disclaimer.

The term "public" appears not only in DR 2105(A) but also in the Code's general prohibition on false, deceptive or misleading "public communication[s]," DR 2101(A). We have given this term a broad interpretation consistent with its purpose of regulating all forms of advertising and publicity. Thus, we have held letterhead and business cards to be forms of public communication subject to DR 2101(A). N.Y. State 704 (1997); N.Y. State 557 (1984). Since the specific limitations on use of the term "specialist" in DR 2-105 are essentially an application of the general proscription in DR 2101(A), it makes sense to read the term "public" in the two provisions in the same way. We also note that DR 2-102(A)(2) specifically provides that a "professional announcement card" must comply with DR 2-105 if it addresses the nature of the lawyer's practice. That is not dispositive – because the two provisions can be read to require compliance with DR 2105 only when the professional announcements are distributed "publicly" but it tends to support a view that professional announcements should be viewed as a form of publicity subject to these regulations.

Moreover, the intent of the disclaimer is clearly to ensure that lay readers and potential clients are not misled as to what certification as a "specialist" means. From the point of view of the provision's purpose, therefore, a mailing to current and former clients should include the disclaimer. Further, with almost any mass mailing, and still more with a newsletter announcement, the sender has little idea where the announcements are going to end up. Since sending the announcement to other lawyers is intended in part to encourage lawyers to recommend the specialist to their clients, it is reasonable to suppose that copies of the announcement or newsletter item might well be given to the potential clients.

We are aware that two other ethics opinions have reached the opposite conclusion in somewhat similar circumstances. In Inf. Op. No. 970024, the Missouri Chief Disciplinary Counsel concluded that a similar disclaimer in Missouri's Rule 7.4 did not need to be included in an announcement of certification sent to bar association publications but did need to be included in a press release as well as on business cards and letterhead.[17] Tenn. 2001F144(b) concludes that a prescribed disclosure regarding the nature of certain certifications should be included in Martindale-Hubbell or other directories or websites "available to the general public" but suggests that the disclosure is not necessary in directories "intended for the use of lawyers and not actively marketed to the lay public."[18] But see Iowa No. 9039 (1991) (requiring that disclaimer accompany certification statement "whether on a professional card or by any other means or medium of communication," but not addressing bar publications). The rules in each of these states are not the same as the rules here, however. Taking the New York Code provisions as a whole, and the historically broad interpretation of "public," we do not find a basis in the Code for an exemption for certain mass mailings or publications. [19]

CONCLUSION:

A professional announcement card stating a lawyer's certification as a specialist that is mailed to members of the local bar association, reprinted in a newsletter distributed to those members, and mailed to the lawyer's present and former clients should contain the disclaimer set forth in DR 2105(C). (13-01)

17 Missouri's rule refers to "communication[s]" generally and does not contain the qualifier "public" that is in DR 5-105(A). The disclaimer required in Missouri is "that neither the Supreme Court of Missouri nor the Missouri Bar reviews or approves certifying organizations or specialist designations." Mo. Rule of Conduct 7.4.

18 The Tennessee rule requires a lawyer who "publishes or broadcasts a communication with regard to any area of law in which the lawyer practices" to state whether certification by the Tennessee Commission on Continuing Legal Education is available in the area of practice and whether the lawyer has been so certified. Tenn. Sup. Ct. Rule 8.

19 One commentator has suggested that identification as a "specialist," which would be prohibited by DR 2105(A) if made "publicly," is common in legal publications, although the commentator concludes that this practice finds no support in the Code:

> "[L]awyers may apparently hold themselves out as 'specialists' or 'experts' in particular fields of law when advertising to the legal profession as opposed to the general public. Perhaps this is not considered 'publicly' identifying an area of practice. Accordingly, the New York Law Journal and many other legal publications regularly contain advertisements in which lawyers offer their services as 'counsel to the profession' with a 'specialty' in one or more fields of law. The text of DR 2-105(A) does not reflect this exception, and any claim that a lawyer is 'certified as a specialist' must still comply with DR 5-105(C), but the disciplinary authorities appear untroubled by claims of specialization in periodicals aimed mainly at other lawyers."

TOPIC: Retention of Original Trust Account Documents

MODIFIES: N.Y. State 680 (1996)

DIGEST: Trust account documents required to be retained in original form should be retained as paper copies where available to lawyer in the ordinary course of business; otherwise, these documents may be retained in electronic form.

CODE: DR 9-102(D)

QUESTION:

May the items listed in DR 9-102(D)(8) – "checkbooks and check stubs, bank statements, pre-numbered canceled checks and duplicate deposit slips" – be retained by the attorney in electronic form (rather than in the form of paper copies) for the designated seven-year period?

OPINION:

N.Y. State 680 (1996) makes clear that the items referred to in DR 9-102(D)(8) must be retained in their original form; the items listed are "checkbooks and check stubs, bank statements, pre-numbered canceled checks and duplicate deposit slips." Opinion 680, which was issued in 1996, assumes that the original form of the enumerated records will be paper hard copies and that the attorney will be in possession of the cancelled checks and deposit slips. Under modern bookkeeping and banking practices, neither of those assumptions is necessarily correct. The checkbook and bank statement may exist as electronic documents in the first instance; paper checks may be replaced by electronic transfers; even if paper checks are used, they may not be returned to the lawyer by the drawee bank after payment – instead, the bank may provide the lawyer with images of the checks or with a mere descriptive listing of checks paid.

In these circumstances, we interpret DR 9-102(D)(8) to require the lawyer to retain the listed items in their original form, be it paper or electronic. If these items are returned to the lawyer in paper form by the lawyer's bank in the ordinary course of business, the lawyer should retain them in that form. However, the lawyer is not required to undertake extraordinary effort or incur extra expense to obtain these items in paper form.

CONCLUSION:

The items listed in DR 9-102(D)(8) – "checkbooks and check stubs, bank statements, pre-numbered canceled checks and duplicate deposit slips" – should be retained by the attorney in their original form. Where these items are returned to the lawyer in paper form by the lawyer's bank in the ordinary course of business, the lawyer should retain them in that form. However, the lawyer is not required to undertake extraordinary effort or incur extra expense to obtain these items in paper form.

TOPIC: Deposits into special accounts

DIGEST: Lawyer may use ATM for making deposits into special account.

CODE: DR 9-102

QUESTION:

May an attorney use an automated teller machine ("ATM") for the purpose of making deposits into a special account required by DR 9-102(B)?

OPINION:

DR 9-102 contains several provisions regarding the safekeeping of client property, including the rules on maintenance of client trust accounts and the maintenance of required bookkeeping records. The many demands of DR 9-102 are designed to safeguard clients' funds from loss and to avoid the appearance of impropriety by the lawyer. The rules also assist the lawyer in providing an audit trail to the client documenting the history and status of the funds entrusted to the attorney's care. A discussion of the aspects of DR 9-102 that are relevant to this inquiry follows.

A lawyer possessing funds belonging to another person incident to the practice of law must maintain them "in a banking institution within the State of New York which agrees to provide dishonored check reports" in accordance with rules of the Appellate Division. DR 9-102(B). The funds must be maintained in a "special account" separate from any business or personal accounts of the lawyer or the lawyer's firm. Id. The lawyer must identify the special account as an "Attorney Special Account," "Attorney Trust Account," or "Attorney Escrow Account," and must obtain checks and deposit slips bearing such title. DR 9-102(B)(2).

DR 9-102 also imposes rigorous record keeping requirements. DR 9-102(C)(3) requires the lawyer to maintain complete records of all funds of a client or third person coming into her possession and to render accounts to the client or third person regarding same. DR 9-102(D)(1) requires a lawyer to maintain the records of all deposits in trust accounts and "any other bank account which concerns or affects the lawyer's practice of law." See N.Y. State 680 (1996). The record must "specifically identify the date, source and description of each item deposited." DR 9-102(D)(1). The lawyer must also maintain a record for all special accounts showing, among other things, the source of all funds deposited in such accounts. The lawyer must also retain a copy of all "duplicate deposit slips with respect to the special accounts specified in DR 9-102(B)." DR 9-102(D)(8). The latter three requirements, imposed by DR 9-102(D), provide that the lawyer must maintain the records for seven years after the events they record. All of the financial records required by DR 9-102 must be made available for inspection on demand at the firm's principal New York State office. DR 9-102(I); see also 22 NYCRR § 603.15 (1st Dep't), 22 NYCRR § 691.12 (2d Dep't) (establishing procedures for random review of bookkeeping records). DR 9-102(J) emphasizes that a lawyer who fails to retain the records required by DR 9-102, or who fails to produce the records, "shall be deemed in violation of these Rules and shall be subject to disciplinary proceedings."

In N.Y. State 680 (1996), we concluded that, for purposes of complying with the mandatory record-retention provisions of the Code, some records may be maintained in the form of computer images, while other records must be maintained in their original, hard-copy form. In that regard, we concluded that duplicate deposit slips must be maintained in paper form for the seven-year period. In addition, all of the other records noted in the previous paragraph must be maintained in their original form. See also N.Y. State 758 (2002).

We believe that it is permissible for an attorney to use an ATM for the purpose of making deposits into a special account, provided the above requirements are satisfied. Therefore, in making the deposit, the attorney must use a deposit slip bearing the title of the special account and must maintain a copy of a duplicate deposit slip recording such transaction for seven years. The record provided by the ATM must also show the amount, account, date, time and place of the transaction so the attorney will have sufficient proof of the deposit prior to receiving official verification from the bank. This record must be maintained with the duplicate deposit slip. The attorney must also verify that the deposit is accurately recorded in the subsequent bank statement.

The attorney must also maintain an independent record of the deposit that includes the "date, source and description of each item deposited." DR 9-102(D)(1).

Although we could find no case in New York addressing a lawyer's use of an ATM in conjunction with a special account, authorities in other jurisdictions have condoned its use if accompanied by careful oversight and review of the transaction. See Matter of Heiner, 1 Cal. State Bar Ct. Rptr. 301, 316-317 (Cal. Bar Ct. 1990); see also Vapneck, Tuft, Peck and Weiner, California Practice Guide, Professional Responsibility, p. 9:246-247 (2001) (use of ATM card for deposits only does not pose real danger to client trust funds, provided lawyer can document amount deposited on behalf of each client); Vecchione, Working with Client's Trust Accounts, www.state.ma.us/obcbbo/ctatips.htm (use of ATM for deposits is permitted, but ATM should never be used for withdrawals).

While we believe that a lawyer depositing funds in a special account via an ATM can comply with the requirements of DR 9-102, a lawyer may not use an ATM for withdrawals from a special account. Doing so would, in effect, violate the dictates of DR 9-102(E), which provides that "[a]ll special account withdrawals shall be made only to a named payee and not to cash."

CONCLUSION:

An attorney may use an ATM for the purpose of making deposits into a special account if the attorney carefully reviews the transaction and otherwise complies with the requirements of DR 9-102.

TOPIC: Retainer agreement – power of attorney; Lawyer settling matter under power of attorney; Lawyer endorsing settlement check on behalf of client under power of attorney

DIGEST: A lawyer may obtain or use a revocable power of attorney, either in a stand-alone document or as part of the lawyer's retainer agreement, that authorizes the lawyer to settle a case and to endorse the client's name to the settlement check, provided that the lawyer makes full disclosure as to the effect of such power of attorney and provided that (i) the lawyer may only settle a case on terms indicated in advance by the client or if the settlement is submitted to the client for approval, and (ii) a lawyer who endorses a settlement check on behalf of the client must promptly comply with the notice, record keeping and disbursement requirements of DR 9-102.

CODE: DR 1-102(A)(1), (4), (5), (6); DR 9-102(B)(4), (C), (C)(1), (D); EC 7-7.

QUESTION:

May a lawyer's retainer agreement contain a power of attorney authorizing the lawyer to sign a general release and stipulation of discontinuance for the client upon settling the case, or to endorse a settlement check on behalf of the client? May an attorney use a power of attorney executed separately by the client in favor of the lawyer to sign a settlement agreement or to endorse a settlement check made out jointly to the lawyer and the client or solely to the client?

OPINION:

The Code of Professional Responsibility ("Code") does not expressly prohibit a lawyer from obtaining or using a power of attorney from the client authorizing the lawyer to perform a variety of acts on behalf of the client. Indeed, the relationship between attorney and client is generally considered to be an agency relationship in which the client gives the lawyer authority to act on his or her behalf in connection with the representation. Moreover, there are good reasons why a client might wish to give a general or specific power of attorney to the lawyer. See, e.g., N.Y. State 746 (2001) (lawyer with a durable power-of-attorney should not petition for the appointment of a guardian without the client's consent if the client becomes incompetent unless there is no practical alternative, through the use of the power of attorney or otherwise, to protect the client's best interests). However, without the client's informed consent the lawyer should never use a stand-alone power of attorney or a power of attorney contained in a retainer agreement to exercise rights or prerogatives reserved to the client under the Code or substantive law.

Authority to Agree to Settlement

Even without a power of attorney, a lawyer is authorized to make many decisions on behalf of the client. For example, the lawyer generally is entitled to make decisions in certain areas of legal representation not affecting the merits of the cause or substantially prejudicing the right of the client. EC 7-7. In civil cases, however, it is for the client to decide whether to accept a settlement offer. EC 7-7; American Law Institute, Restatement (Third) of the Law Governing Lawyers (hereinafter, "Restatement"), § 22, comment d (A lawyer may not make a settlement without the client's authorization. A lawyer who does so may be liable to the client or the opposing party and is subject to discipline.) Nevertheless, a client may authorize the lawyer to negotiate a settlement that is subject to the client's approval or to settle a matter on terms indicated by the client. Restatement, § 22, Comment c. A retainer agreement is generally signed before the commencement of the representation or within a reasonable time thereafter, before the lawyer has had an opportunity to ascertain the facts of the case and the willingness of the parties to settle. See, e.g., 22 NYCRR Part 1215 (Joint Order of Appellate Divisions establishing requirement to provide written letter of engagement or obtain retainer agreement). Consequently, it is unlikely that at the time of entering into the retainer agreement the lawyer would have been able to make the disclosures necessary to validate using the settlement authority. Therefore, if the lawyer obtains a general power of attorney in advance of the settlement, the lawyer should not use the power to settle the matter without obtaining more explicit instructions from the client after the lawyer and the client have discussed the merits of the case, the client's willingness to settle and the settlement terms that are acceptable to the client.

Court rules may require a lawyer to appear at a settlement conference with the authority to settle a matter. See, e.g., 22 NYCRR 202.19(b)(3) (Uniform Rules - Trial Courts; compliance conference to explore potential settlement); NYCRR 202.16(f)(2)(iii) and (3) (matrimonial matters); 22 NYCRR 600.17(e)(1st Dep't), 22 NYCRR 670.4(a)(2d Dep't) and 22 NYCRR 800.24-b (3d Dept) (all civil matters); Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 16(a) ("At least one of the attorneys for each party participating in any conference before trial shall have authority to enter into stipulations and to make admissions regarding all matters that the participants may reasonably anticipate may be discussed. If appropriate, the court may require that a party or its representative be present or reasonably available by telephone in order to consider possible settlement of the dispute.") While the lawyer may comply with such rules by appearing with the client, the lawyer may also comply by obtaining express settlement authorization from the client. We see nothing unethical about the lawyer obtaining such authorization in advance. We believe, however, that it would be inconsistent with the Code for the lawyer to use such settlement authorization without obtaining explicit instructions from the client after the lawyer and the client have discussed the merits of the case, the client's willingness to settle and the settlement terms that are acceptable to the client.

Any power of attorney granted to the lawyer for settlement purposes, whether general or specific, must be revocable. See Hayes v. Eagle-Picher Indus., Inc. 513 F.2d 892 (10th Cir. 1975); cf. Model Rule 1.2, comment 5:

> An agreement concerning the scope of representation must accord with the Rules of Professional Conduct and other law. Thus, the client may not be asked . . . to surrender the right . . . to settle litigation that the lawyer might wish to continue.

See also Restatement, § 22(3) ("Regardless of any contrary contract with a lawyer, a client may revoke a lawyer's authority to make the decisions described in Subsection (1) [including whether and on what terms to settle a claim]"); Restatement, § 22, comment d (A lawyer may not enter into an irrevocable contract that the lawyer will decide on the terms of settlement. A contract that the lawyer as well as the client must approve any settlement is also invalid.)

Settlement Checks

It is not per se unethical for a lawyer to obtain a power of attorney that would authorize the lawyer to sign a settlement check on behalf of a client. Indeed, it will usually be convenient in contingent fee matters for the proceeds of a settlement check to be deposited into the lawyer's trust account for further disposition and accounting. See, e.g., Rohrbacher v. Bancohio Nat'l Bank, 171 A.D. 2d 533, 567 N.Y.S.2d 431 (1st Dep't 1991) (retainer agreement stated "We hereby authorize you to endorse my name on any check or draft obtained herein, if said check or draft is deposited to your escrow-trust account pending distribution of the proceeds pursuant to the terms of this retainer").

Nevertheless, neither a general power of attorney in favor of the lawyer nor a specific power of attorney authorizing the lawyer to sign settlement checks on behalf of the client would override the provisions of the Code that apply to client money in the possession of the lawyer. In particular, DR 9-102(B)(4) provides that all funds belonging in part to the client – which would include the proceeds of a settlement or judgment where the lawyer claims part of the proceeds as a fee or for reimbursement of expenses – must be deposited in the lawyer's attorney trust account, and the lawyer may not withdraw the part that the lawyer claims to the extent that the client disputes the lawyer's entitlement thereto:

> Funds belonging in part to a client or third person and in part presently or potentially to the lawyer or law firm shall be kept in such special account or accounts [the attorney trust account], but the portion belonging to the lawyer or law firm may be withdrawn when due unless the right of the lawyer or law firm to receive it is disputed by the client or third person, in which event the disputed portion shall not be withdrawn until the dispute is finally resolved.

Moreover, under DR 9-102(C) the lawyer must promptly notify the client of the receipt of funds in which the client has an interest and, under DR 9-102(D), the lawyer must properly account for all such funds.

We note that the Appellate Division, Second Department has upheld a disciplinary action against an attorney for using an irrevocable power of attorney in a personal injury action to authorize him to endorse a settlement check. In re Stanley S. Hansen, 108 A.D.2d 206, 488 N.Y.S.2d 742 (2d Dep't 1985). The respondent in that case had received a letter of admonition that the routine inclusion of an unconditional power of attorney in his retainer agreements in no-fault collection cases "represented over-reaching and created a dangerous possibility of abuse." We do not read this case as prohibiting any use of a power of attorney to authorize a lawyer to endorse the client's name on a settlement check. Rather, we believe the court was objecting to the irrevocable nature of the power of attorney used by the respondent:

> Notwithstanding the fact that he may (as the Special Referee found) have intended to delete the word "irrevocably" therefrom, there is nothing in the record which would even tend to support his decision to procure an unconditional power of attorney from the client in the first instance.

We are not aware of any cases in New York holding that a revocable power of attorney authorizing a lawyer to sign a settlement check would be per se unethical.

We note that it is a common practice in certain lawsuits – for example, where the defendant's potential liability is the subject of an insurance policy – for the check paying a judgment or settlement to be made out to both the plaintiff and his or her lawyer. This is particularly true in personal injury actions, where plaintiff's counsel may be charging a contingent fee and may have a lien on the proceeds. As the Second Circuit Court of Appeals noted in Hafter v. Farkas, 498 F.2d 587 (2d Cir. 1974), drawing a settlement check in the names of both the plaintiff and his or her attorney is a way for the debtor to ensure that both the creditor and his or her lawyer are made aware of the satisfaction. Id. at 590.

The regulations of the New York State Insurance Department do not mandate that settlement checks be made out to both the plaintiff and his or her attorney. However, Regulation 64 of the Insurance Department provides that, when an insurer is paying $5,000 or more in settlement of a third-party liability claim to a natural person, it must mail written notice to the claimant at the same time payment is made to the claimant's attorney or other representative. 11 NYCRR §216.9(a). According to an interpretation issued by the office of the General Counsel of the Insurance Department, this provision, which was adopted in 1988, was added to the Insurance Department's Rules at the request of the Clients' Security Fund (now the Lawyers' Fund for Client Protection), which saw it as a necessary response to documented instances of theft where an attorney would forge a client's endorsement on a check and pocket the proceeds. See N.Y. Department of Insurance, NY General Counsel Opinion 4-1-2002, available on the Insurance Department's website at http://www.ins.state.ny.us/rg204011.htm (last visited January 8, 2003). Thus, the regulations of the Insurance Department are consistent with DR 9-102. We do not believe that the existence of the Insurance Department regulation obviates the need for the lawyer to give the notice required by DR 9-102(C).

For all these reasons, we believe that it is not per se unethical for an attorney to seek such a power of attorney. If the lawyer uses this authority promptly to cash the check and to deposit the proceeds in the lawyer's trust account, and (i) promptly notifies the client of the receipt of the funds in accordance with DR 9-102(C)(1), (ii) maintains complete records of such funds in accordance with DR 9-102(D), including the deposit and disbursement thereof, and (iii) promptly pays to the client as requested any funds the client is entitled to receive, then no violation of the Code would have occurred. See also Wolfram, Modern Legal Ethics, Section 4.8, footnote 21 (The need to renegotiate the instrument promptly in order to protect against non-payment argues for obtaining the client's signed permission to sign the client's name to the check as designated endorsee.)

Prompt deposit of the endorsed check into a trust account fully complies with the safekeeping requirements of DR 9-102. If, on the other hand, the lawyer uses the power of attorney to endorse the client's name on the check and does not promptly notify the client and otherwise comply with DR 9-102, then the lawyer will have violated not only DR 9-102, but also DR 1-102(A)(1) (lawyer shall not violate a disciplinary rule), DR 1-102(A)(4) (lawyer shall not engage in conduct involving deceit), DR 1-102(A)(5) (conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice), and DR 1-102(A)(7)(conduct that adversely reflects on fitness to practice law). The lawyer will therefore be subject to discipline and possibly a law suit for conversion of the client's funds. See, e.g., In re Theodore L. Malatesta, 124 A.D.2d 62, 511 N.Y.S.2d 246 (1st Dep't 1987). Malatesta involved an attorney who converted the proceeds of a settlement check by signing a settlement check made out to the attorney and client. The lawyer argued that he was authorized to do so based on a handwritten notation on the retainer agreement which stated "[subject to] full authority to settle, sign release and endorse check." Although the court found that the client had not added the language to the retainer agreement, it concluded that, even if the language had been agreed to by the client, it did not excuse the lawyer's conversion of the funds.

CONCLUSION:

A lawyer may obtain and use a revocable power of attorney, either in a stand-alone document or as part of the lawyer's retainer agreement, that authorizes the lawyer to settle a case and to endorse the client's name to the settlement check, provided that the lawyer makes full disclosure as to the effect of such power of attorney and provided that (i) the lawyer may only settle a case on terms indicated in advance by the client or if the settlement is submitted to the client for approval, and (ii) a lawyer who endorses a settlement check on behalf of the client must promptly comply with the notice, record keeping and disbursement requirements of DR 9-102.

TOPIC: Conflicts of Interest; Husband and Wife; Joint Representation

DIGEST: A lawyer who accepts employment on behalf of a husband to represent him in obtaining permanent residency status for his wife may not concurrently or thereafter represent the wife in seeking residency based on the alleged abuse of the husband; lawyer could pursue wife's residency petition if engagement is structured as a representation of the wife only or as a joint representation with a prospective conflict waiver.

CODE: DR 4-101(A), (B), DR 5-105(A), (C), (D), DR 5-107(A), (B), DR 5-108(A); DR 7-101(A).

QUESTION:

(1) Where a lawyer represents or previously represented an individual in applying for legal permanent resident status for his wife, which has not been granted, is it ethically permissible to represent the wife in obtaining such status based on the current or former client's alleged spousal abuse?

(2) Can a lawyer ethically represent the husband and wife jointly or the wife alone in obtaining legal permanent resident status for the wife where her spouse must file the petition?

FACTS:

The inquirer is an attorney at a firm handling immigration matters for indigent individuals. Often the firm represents the husband, who is married to a non-citizen, in filing an I-130 petition to obtain legal residence (LPR status) for his wife.[1] The Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) takes approximately seven to ten years to process such petitions. Once the petition is granted, the non-citizen spouse files an I-485 petition. There is often a long delay after the I-130 petition has been granted before the I-485 petition can be filed. After an I-130 petition has been granted, the law firm generally writes to the client "closing out the case" and giving him information on how to follow the case. At some point during this sequence, the wife of the petitioner approaches the lawyer and informs the lawyer that the husband has abused her. Such abuse can serve as the basis for the wife to file a "self-petition" (an I-360) to obtain LPR status, which does not require participation by the husband.

An I-360 self-petition is considered confidential except for law enforcement purposes. If the husband is a non-citizen, i.e. in LPR status, a domestic violence offense can be a deportable offense.

ANALYSIS:

Question 1

It is unclear whether the current and former representations were joint representations or representations of the husband only. In some cases, the firm had discussions with both spouses but in many cases there was no contact with the wife. Nevertheless, the lawyer's ability to represent the wife of a current or former client does not turn on whether it was a joint representation.

1 For purposes of this opinion, we will refer to the original client as the husband.

The conflicts rules of the New York Code of Professional Responsibility (the "Code") vary depending on whether a person for whom a lawyer provided legal representation is a current client or a former client.

With respect to current clients, DR 5-105(A) provides:

> A lawyer shall decline proffered employment if the exercise of independent professional judgment in behalf of a client will be or is likely to be adversely affected by the acceptance of the proffered employment, or if it would be likely to involve the lawyer in representing differing interests, except to the extent provided in DR 5-105(C).

"Differing interests" is defined in the definitions section of the Code:

> "Differing interests" include every interest that will adversely affect either the judgment or the loyalty of a lawyer to a client, whether it be a conflicting, inconsistent, diverse, or other interest. As noted in the Restatement of the Law Governing Lawyers, unless all affected clients consent, a lawyer may not represent two or more clients in a matter if there is a substantial risk that the lawyer's representation of one or more of the clients would be materially and adversely affected by the lawyer's duties to another client in the matter. Restatement (Third) of the Law Governing Lawyers §§ 128, 130 (2000).

Because the interests of the husband and wife are now clearly differing, the Committee does not believe that the inquirer can continue with the representation of either spouse or take on the wife as a new client. The allegations that the wife will be required to make in the self-petition regarding the other spouse's conduct would be prejudicial to the husband's interests. For example, the information could be used by the INS for law enforcement purposes, including criminal prosecution or deportation.

In a joint representation all confidences and secrets are deemed to be shared absent agreement of the co-clients to the contrary. Thus, the lawyer would be obliged to share with both clients any information received from either client that is relevant to the subject matter of the joint representation. If a lawyer receives from one of the co-clients relevant information that the lawyer is unable to share, the joint representation must be terminated and the lawyer must withdraw from the representation of both clients. It is not sufficient for the attorney to end his or her representation of one client after a conflict has developed. Anything less than complete withdrawal from the matter would result in a violation of an attorney's fiduciary obligation to preserve the client's confidences and pursue the client's interests vigorously. See In re H. Children, 160 Misc.2d 298, 608 N.Y.S.2d 784 (1994).

The result is the same if only the husband is the current client of the lawyer. The interests of the two clients would clearly be differing within the meaning of the Code. Further, DR 7-102(A)(3) prohibits a lawyer from prejudicing or damaging the client during the course of the professional relationship, an inevitable consequence of the acceptance of the representation of the wife. Additionally, the allegation of spousal abuse is clearly relevant to both representations, yet the lawyer would not be permitted to disclose this information to the husband because it is protected as a confidence or secret of the wife under DR 4-101(A) and (B).

DR 5-105(C) permits a lawyer to represent multiple clients with differing interests "if a disinterested lawyer would believe that the lawyer can competently represent the interest of each and if each consents to the representation after full disclosure of the implications of the simultaneous representation and the advantages and risks involved." This is not a practical solution in this situation. It would be impossible to obtain the husband's informed consent to representation of the wife without explaining the nature of the representation. That would require the lawyer to reveal that the wife has informed the lawyer of the alleged abuse, putting the wife in potential danger. The wife should not be asked to consent under DR 4-101(C)(1) to the disclosure of this confidential information, thus making it impossible to obtain the husband's informed consent.

After the I-130 petition has been granted, the law firm closes the case and treats the husband as a former client. With respect to former clients, DR 5-108 provides > . . . [A] lawyer who has represented a client in a matter shall not, without the consent of the former client after full disclosure:

> 1. Thereafter represent another person in the same or a substantially related matter in which that person's interests are materially adverse to the interests of the former client.

For reasons similar to those applicable to current clients, however, the lawyer could not represent the wife in filing a self-petition even where the husband is a former client. First, under DR 5-108, the filing of an I-130 petition for the husband on behalf of the wife and the filing of a self-petition by the wife are substantially related matters.[2] The goal of both representations (and both petitions) is to obtain LPR status for the wife. Although different facts must be stated in the I-360 petition (i.e. the abuse), one of the central issues in both petitions is the validity of the marriage. In this respect the wife's interests are materially adverse to the interests of the former client. Thus, the attorney could not ethically undertake representation of the wife with respect to a self-petition because her interests in that petition are materially adverse to those of her husband, the former client.

DR 5-108(A) provides that the lawyer can represent a new client in the same or a substantially related matter where the new client's interests are materially adverse to the interests of the former client provided there is consent of the former client "after full disclosure." For the same reasons stated above with respect to a simultaneous adverse representation, we do not believe that the circumstances here would permit the lawyer to obtain the husband's consent.

Because the lawyer could not represent the wife where the husband is a current or former client, all other lawyers at the firm are similarly disqualified. DR 5-105(D).

2 See N.Y. State 723 (1999), which contains an extensive discussion of what constitutes a "substantially related matter." As that opinion notes, factors that would tend to show that the matters were substantially related would include an identity of issues in the two matters or a significant overlap of the contested facts. The most important factor, however, is whether the moving lawyer could have obtained confidences and secrets in the former representation that could be used against the former client in the current representation.

Question 2

The inquirer asks whether the potential conflict may be avoided by structuring the engagement as a representation of the wife only or as a joint representation.

Wife as Client

It is the Committee's opinion that the law firm could structure the relationship so that the wife is considered the sole client from the outset.

An attorney-client relationship generally is entered into when a person contracts with a lawyer for legal services. A contract for legal services need not be explicit; if an attorney leads an individual to reasonably believe that a lawyer-client relationship exists, then such a relationship indeed exists. Restatement (Third) of The Law Governing Lawyers §14 (2000). In ambiguous relationships, the burden is on the lawyer to "clearly and affirmatively negative the existence of a client-lawyer relationship." Geoffrey C. Hazard, Jr. & W. William Hodes, The Law of Lawyering § 2.5 (3d ed. 2001). When an individual contacts a lawyer to provide services for the spouse's benefit, the determination of whether that person is a client depends on the reasonable expectations and understandings of the layperson. The wife may be the sole client so long as the lawyer explains to both the husband and the wife that the wife is the sole client and his loyalties are to the wife alone. In addition the lawyer should explain to the husband that the communications from the husband to the lawyer, if any, would not be confidential and may be communicated to the wife but communications from the wife to the lawyer will be held in confidence and will not be communicated to the husband.

The ability of the lawyer to represent only the wife is not affected by the fact that it is her husband who is the petitioner for LPR status for his wife. It is the wife whose residency status is at stake, and who is the real party in interest. It is often the case that a lawyer will need the assistance of a third-party, non-client to carry out the objectives of the representation. For example, where a client requires the signature of a guarantor, whether on a lease on in connection with an extension of credit, the guarantor does not become a client by virtue of signing the contract. Furthermore, the fact that the non-client spouse could thwart the objective of the representation—LPR status for the wife—by refusing to sponsor the wife does not alter our conclusion. Similar consequences occur whenever action by a third party on behalf of the client is necessary to effectuate the client's legal objectives.

The fact that the husband pays the fee for filing the petition with the INS does not undermine the attorney-client relationship with the wife. Fees and expenses (including legal fees) are often paid by third parties such as a parent, a borrower or a purchaser. The Code prohibits a lawyer, however, from allowing a third person that pays the lawyer's fee from interfering with both the lawyer's exercise of independent professional judgment on behalf of the client and the lawyer's duty to maintain the confidences and secrets of the client. DR 5-107(B).[3] It also provides that a lawyer may accept compensation for legal services from someone other than the client only with the consent of the client after full disclosure. DR 5-107(A); s*ee* N.Y. State 721 (1999) (full disclosure of all material facts and circumstances required).

3 See also EC 5-1 ("The professional judgment of a lawyer should be exercised, within the bounds of the law, solely for the benefit of the client and free of compromising influences and loyalties. . . .[T]he desires of a third person should [not] be permitted to dilute the lawyer's loyalty to the client.")

In sum, it is ethically permissible for the lawyer to structure the relationship so that the wife is the sole client with respect to the INS petition for legal permanent residence status. Where the lawyer is approached initially by the husband/petitioning spouse, the lawyer must make clear that the wife, and not the husband, is the client.

Joint Representation

As noted above, an attorney generally will be required to withdraw from representation of both parties when a conflict develops between jointly represented clients. In addition, the attorney must share all material information relating to the representation with the co-clients.

On establishing the attorney-client relationship, the co-clients may consent to an alternative arrangement. The co-clients may specifically agree that the lawyer will not share confidential information if requested by the client providing the information. See Restatement (Third) of the Law Governing Lawyers § 75, cmt. D (2000)("Co-clients may agree that the lawyer will not disclose certain confidential communications of one co-client to other co-clients.") For example, if the lawyer initially obtained such an agreement, the lawyer would not be obliged to share with the husband the wife's statement to the lawyer that her husband was abusing her. The clients could also agree that in the event of a conflict, the lawyer will continue to represent only one of the jointly represented clients, such as the wife. Id. § 122, illus. 8.

A client's consent to future conflicts is "subject to special scrutiny." Id. § 122, cmt.d. The clients' advance consent must be to a conflict that is consentable and the consent must be informed. The future conflict must be described "with sufficient clarity so the client's consent can reasonably be viewed as having been fully informed when it was given." ABA Formal Op. 372 (1993). A prospective waiver of a future conflict is more likely to be effective where the attorney has identified the potentially adverse party and the nature of the conflict. Id. In the circumstances under consideration here, the attorney knows, based on past practice, that a conflict is most likely to arise when the wife informs the attorney confidentially that her husband has abused her. Thus, it is unlikely that the advance waiver permitting the attorney to terminate the representation of the husband and continue representation of the wife would be effective unless the husband understood that a possible future conflict would include an allegation of abuse that would support a self-petition by the wife.

CONCLUSION:

A lawyer who has undertaken to represent a husband in obtaining legal permanent residency status for his wife may not thereafter represent the wife in seeking residency status based on alleged spousal abuse. This disabling conflict could be avoided by structuring the engagement as a representation of the wife only, notwithstanding that the husband is the petitioner and may pay for the legal services. Alternatively, the lawyer could represent the wife in seeking permanent residency based on the alleged abuse of her husband if the original engagement was structured as a joint representation with the parties' agreement that not all information acquired during the course of the representation would be shared with both co-clients, and if the parties provided a prospective conflict waiver that contemplated the situation presented and permitted the lawyer to withdraw from the representation of the husband and to continue to represent the wife.

TOPIC: Supervision by New York lawyers and law firms of lawyers licensed in foreign countries

DIGEST: Law firm with New York office and at least one affiliated New York lawyer is subject to certain New York disciplinary rules; obligation of New York law firm and of supervisory lawyers to ensure compliance with the New York Code extends only to lawyers subject to the New York Code; New York law firm has broad supervisory responsibilities with respect to affiliated lawyers licensed in foreign countries, and must ensure that compliance by such lawyers with foreign law and ethical standards does not compromise the firm's adherence to the New York Code.

QUESTION:

To what extent must a New York attorney or the attorney's law firm supervise associates, partners and non-lawyers who are admitted to practice in foreign jurisdictions but not in New York?

FACTS:

The inquirer is a lawyer admitted to practice in New York and practices in a law firm that has as partners and associates lawyers licensed in a foreign country who are not admitted in New York or any other state.[4] The firm has an office in New York (where the inquirer works) as well as in the foreign country.

OPINION:

DR 1-104 of the Lawyer's Code of Professional Responsibility (the "New York Code") imposes certain supervisory responsibilities on law firms and lawyers:

> A. A law firm shall make reasonable efforts to ensure that all lawyers in the firm conform to the disciplinary rules.
> B. A lawyer with management responsibility in the law firm or direct supervisory authority over another lawyer shall make reasonable efforts to ensure that the other lawyer conforms to the disciplinary rules.

4 We assume for purposes of this inquiry that the inquirer may ethically form a partnership with the lawyers involved. See N.Y. State 658 (1994), in which we opined that whether a New York lawyer could affiliate with an attorney or firm from another country was dependent upon the educational requirements and ethical standards for the attorneys licensed in foreign countries. We assume that the New York lawyer here has made an independent inquiry to ensure that there are not substantial differences in the educational requirements or ethical standards applicable to the foreign attorneys that would make it impossible for the inquirer to uphold his or her ethical obligations. N.Y. State 658, at 3.

> C. A law firm shall adequately supervise, as appropriate, the work of partners, associates and non-lawyers who work at the firm. The degree of supervision required is that which is reasonable under the circumstances, taking into account factors such as the experience of the person whose work is being supervised, the amount of work involved in a particular matter, and the likelihood that ethical problems might arise in the course of working on the matter.

DR 1-104 provides ethical rules both for the law firm (DR 1-104[A] and [C]) and for individual lawyers (DR 1-104[B]). We first discuss the firms to which DR 1-104(A) and (C) apply. We then discuss DR 1-104(A) and (B), which impose supervisory responsibility with respect to compliance with disciplinary rules, and finally the more general supervisory responsibility imposed by DR 1-104(C).

Law Firms Subject to Disciplinary Rules[5]

A limited number of disciplinary rules in the New York Code apply to law firms rather than, or in addition to, individual lawyers.[6] See DR 1-102, 1-104, 1-106, 1-107, 2-101(E), (G), (L), 2-102(A), 2-105(A), 2-111, 3-102(A), 5-102(B), 5-105(E), 5-108(C), 9-102(B)(2). Our initial task is determining which firms are subject to these provisions of the New York Code.

The New York Code specifically addresses which lawyers are subject to the disciplinary authority of New York. See DR 1-105 ("A lawyer admitted to practice in this state is subject to the disciplinary authority of this state, regardless of where the lawyer's conduct occurs."). It does not, however, provide a similar rule for "law firms." Although the First Department has adopted such a rule, none of the other Departments in the State has done so.[7] In the absence of a clear rule, the reach of the New York Code as it applies to law firms is uncertain. At a minimum, however, the Disciplinary Rules that are specifically applicable to law firms under the New York Code apply to firms with a New York

5 The Definitions section of the New York Code provides:

> "Law firm" includes, but is not limited to, a professional legal corporation, a limited liability company or partnership engaged in the practice of law, the legal department of a corporation or other organization and a qualified legal assistance organization.

Our discussion of DR 1-104 is applicable to all of these entities.

6 We note that although state law generally treats a partnership as an aggregate of its partners, the New York Code in some cases treats the partnership as an entity and imposes certain obligations on the firm. This requires the firm, through its governance structure, to take steps to satisfy its entity obligations.

7 22 NYCRR 603.1(b), 603.2(b) provide that any law firm (as defined in the New York Code) that has as a member, employs, or otherwise retains an attorney or legal consultant who is subject to the New York Code can be disciplined for professional misconduct under the New York Code. 22 NYCRR 603.1(a) provides that "all attorneys who are admitted to practice, reside in, commit acts in or who have offices in this judicial department, or who are admitted to practice by a court of another jurisdiction and who practice within this department [in certain situations]" as well as those admitted pro hac vice are subject to the New York Code.

Read literally the First Department's rule is extraordinarily broad. It would apply the New York Code to any firm that has a partner or associate who resides in New York or who is admitted to practice in New York. For example, the First Department apparently would apply the New York Code to a Connecticut law firm that has a single partner who lives in Westchester County but who is admitted to practice and practices only in Connecticut. It also apparently would apply the New York Code to an Idaho firm that employs an associate who is admitted in both New York and Idaho, but practices only in Idaho. We question whether the court intended to extend the reach of the New York Code in these circumstances.

office and at least one New York lawyer affiliated with the firm in that office.[8] For purposes of this opinion we refer to such a firm as a "New York firm"; it follows that DR 1-104 applies to a New York firm.

Responsibility With Respect to New York Disciplinary Rules

DR 1-104(A) requires a New York firm to "make reasonable efforts to ensure that all lawyers in the firm conform to the disciplinary rules." (Emphasis added). Read literally, this might imply that partners and associates of a New York firm who are licensed in a foreign country but not admitted in New York must conform to the New York Code. We believe that this broad reading is unintended. We conclude that DR 1-104(A) requires a New York firm to make reasonable efforts to ensure that lawyers subject to the New York Code who are affiliated with the firm comply with the New York Code.[9]

The New York Code contemplates that New York lawyers will enter into partnerships with lawyers admitted in other jurisdictions, see, e.g., DR 2-102(D), and it is common knowledge that the ethics and disciplinary rules of various jurisdictions differ in material ways. Furthermore, this Committee has opined that partnerships of New York lawyers and lawyers licensed in a foreign country are ethical in circumstances where professional standards of conduct applicable to the foreign lawyers are compatible with the New York Code.[10] Thus, it is clear that New York lawyers may enter into partnerships with lawyers who are bound by ethics rules other than the New York Code.

In addition, the rules of the four Departments, which subject lawyers to the Code of Professional Responsibility, vary somewhat, but generally provide that the New York rules with respect to professional misconduct apply to attorneys who are admitted to practice, reside in, commit acts in, or have offices in New York. 22 NYCRR 603.1, 691.1, 806.1, 1022. Thus, a lawyer licensed in a foreign country who has no relationship to New York is not subject to the New York Code under the Appellate Division rules.

A New York law firm must make reasonable efforts to ensure that any lawyer in the firm who is subject to the New York Code complies with its disciplinary rules. DR 1-104(A) does not impose

8 We note that two court rules use the existence of a New York office as a determinant. Part 137, the rule implementing a comprehensive fee dispute resolution program, states that the rule does not apply to "disputes where the attorney is admitted to practice in another jurisdiction and maintains no office in New York, or where no material portion of the services was performed in New York." 22 NYCRR Part 137.1(b)(7). The written letter of engagement rule, Part 1215, contains an identical exception. See 22 NYCRR Part 1215.2(4).

9 EC 1-8 contains a similar rule, but capitalizes the term "Disciplinary Rules," providing support for the view that DR 1-104(A) is referring only to the disciplinary rules found in the New York Code.

10 In opining that it would be ethical for a New York lawyer to enter into a partnership with a British lawyer, we commented on the "essential compatibility of our standards of professional conduct and discipline." N.Y. State 542 (1982). Similarly, in finding it would be ethical for a New York lawyer to enter into a partnership with a Japanese bengoshi, we noted that "the standard of professional conduct and discipline in Japan appears to be sufficiently similar in relevant aspects." N.Y. 646, at 3. In neither situation did we require an identity of ethical and disciplinary rules, which is not likely to be the case. See also ABA 423 (2001) ("The law and ethical standards applicable to the legal profession in foreign countries will differ from some of the law and ethical standards that apply to U.S. lawyers."); Detlev F. Vagts, Professional Responsibility in Transborder Practice: Conflict and Resolution, 13 Georgetown J. Legal Ethics 677 (2000) (outlining some differences between ethical rules in EU countries and the United States).

an obligation on a New York law firm to ensure compliance with the Disciplinary Rules by affiliated lawyers licensed in foreign countries who are not subject to the New York Code.[11]

We note that the more general supervisory responsibility imposed by DR 1-104(C) – which specifically embraces "non-lawyers who work at the firm" – may in some circumstances require a New York firm to supervise lawyers licensed in foreign countries to ensure that their conduct does not limit the ability of the firm and its New York lawyers to comply with the New York Code. This responsibility is discussed in the next section.

DR 1-104(B) imposes similar obligations on a lawyer with management responsibility in the law firm or direct supervisory authority over another lawyer. Thus, these individuals have responsibilities to the same extent the law firm has a responsibility under DR 1-104(A) to ensure that lawyers in the firm subject to the New York Code abide by the New York disciplinary rules.[12]

Both DR 1-104(A) and (B) provide that the law firm and lawyers with management or supervisory responsibility in the law firm must make "reasonable efforts" to ensure that other lawyers in the firm conform to the disciplinary rules. While what constitutes "reasonable efforts" will vary from firm to firm, some general standards are applicable. First, the firm should adopt procedures to deal with ethical questions and problems. EC 1-8 suggests that these measures may include "informal supervision and occasional admonition, a procedure whereby junior lawyers can make confidential referral of ethical problems directly to a designated senior lawyer or special committee, and continuing legal education in professional ethics." What constitutes reasonable efforts will depend, in part, on the size of the firm and its structure. Informal supervision may be sufficient in a small one-office firm, but detailed written policies and procedures may be necessary in a multi-office firm. See ABA Model Rule 5.1, cmt. [2]. The locus for confidential referral of ethical questions confronting a New York lawyer should be another New York lawyer. Other ways in which a firm may carry out its responsibilities include adopting internal standards of conduct or an ethics manual, seeking opinions of bar ethics committees, or consulting outside experts. See generally New York Code of Professional Responsibility: Opinions, Commentary & Caselaw bk. xi at 20-22 (Mary C. Daly ed. 2002); Roy D. Simon, Jr., Simon's New York Code of Professional Responsibility Annotated 50-52 (2003).

Second, in addition to having procedures in place to respond to ethical inquiries or lapses, the firm has an obligation to respond to any ethical issue that comes to its attention. Third, while the firm does not need to monitor every aspect of every representation undertaken by one of its lawyers, it does have a duty to make inquiries where it has reason to believe there is a likelihood that there may be ethical problems.

11 Under the ABA Model Rules, "[a] partner in a law firm shall make reasonable efforts to ensure that the firm has in effect measures giving reasonable assurance that all lawyers in the firm conform to the Rules of Professional Conduct." Model Rule 5.1(a). The ABA Standing Committee on Ethics and Professional Responsibility interpreted this to mean the Model Rules if they are in effect in a jurisdiction and, if not, other ethical and disciplinary rules applicable in the United States or foreign jurisdiction. See ABA 423 (2001). The ABA Committee did not address the choice of law question as to which ethical rules apply to lawyers engaged in a multinational legal practice.

12 DR 1-104(B) does not apply to managing or supervisory lawyers who are not subject to the New York Code. So, for example, a British lawyer who directly supervises a New York lawyer in a London office has no responsibility to ensure that the New York lawyer complies with the New York Code.

General Supervisory Responsibilities

DR 1-104(C) requires a law firm adequately to supervise, as appropriate, the work of partners, associates, and non-lawyers who work at the firm. This provision imposes obligations on the New York firm with respect to affiliated lawyers licensed only in foreign countries who are, for this purpose, "non-lawyers."

In general, DR 1-104(C) requires a New York law firm to have systems in place to ensure that the firm's practice will be conducted in a professional and ethical manner. For example, the law firm has an obligation (i) to have a policy and system for detecting conflicts of interest, DR 5-105(E); (ii) to provide accurate bills to clients, EC 2-19; see DR 2-106(A); (iii) to retain appropriate records, DR 9-102(D); (iv) to provide retainer agreements where necessary, DR 2-106(C)(2); and (v) to segregate client funds, DR 9-102(B). The law firm must take reasonable measures to assure that its lawyers and non-lawyers are familiar with these procedures and comply with them. It is not sufficient for the firm simply to assume that its lawyers and non-lawyers will comply. Cf. Dresser Industries v. Digges, 1989 WL 139234 (D. Md. 1989) (finding nonparticipating partners liable for misconduct of a partner based in part on the firm's failure to have a system in place to assure compliance with disciplinary rules); Restatement (3d) of The Law Governing Lawyers § 11(1) (partners can be disciplined for failing to "make reasonable efforts to ensure that the firm has in effect measures giving reasonable assurance that all lawyers in the firm conform to applicable code requirements"). The firm's responsibility for developing and implementing systems to ensure professional and ethical practice may be delegated to a management committee or similar group. See id. § 11, cmt. d.

Furthermore, DR 4-101(B) imposes on lawyers the obligation to preserve the confidences and secrets of a client. DR 4-101(D) requires that a lawyer "exercise reasonable care to prevent his or her employees, associates, and others whose services are utilized by the lawyer from disclosing or using confidences or secrets of a client . . . ." See also EC 4-5. The firm must acquire, store, retrieve, and transmit client confidential information "under systems and controls that are reasonably designed and managed to maintain confidentiality." Restatement (3d) of The Law Governing Lawyers § 60, cmt. d. The firm must take steps to ensure that all persons affiliated with the firm understand the sanctity of this provision. Non-lawyers and lawyers licensed in foreign countries whose confidentiality rules may differ need to be sensitized to the obligation not to disclose or use a client confidence or secret. See generally James Altman, "An Associate's Duty to Supervise Non-Lawyers," N.Y.L.J., Oct. 11, 2002, at 28.

In addition, Canon 6 provides that a lawyer should represent a client competently. DR 6-101 specifically provides that: "A lawyer shall not handle a legal matter which the lawyer knows or should know that he or she is not competent to handle, without associating with a lawyer who is competent to handle it." The presence of another lawyer in the firm competent to handle the matter does not absolve the first lawyer of the obligation under DR 6-101 unless he or she actually consults with the second lawyer. Therefore, a New York firm should assure itself that all lawyers (including lawyers licensed only in foreign countries) working in the New York office are competent to handle matters undertaken by them, and if not, to have in place a procedure for consultation with a lawyer who has competence in the area. As DR 1-104(C) suggests, the degree of supervision will vary with the circumstances, taking into account "the experience of the person whose work is being supervised, the amount of work involved in a particular matter, and the likelihood that ethical problems might arise in the course of working on the matter."

The supervision mandated by DR 1-104(C) requires reasonable efforts to ensure that adherence to the disciplinary rules of a foreign country by a lawyer licensed in a foreign country does not expose the New York firm or its New York lawyers to the possibility of violating the New York Code. In N.Y. State 646, which permitted New York lawyers generally to enter into partnerships with lawyers licensed in foreign countries, we required that the partnership "not compromise the New York lawyer's ability to uphold ethical standards." Specifically, "the New York lawyer who enters into a partnership with lawyers licensed in . . . [a] foreign country has an obligation to ensure that participation in the law partnership does not compromise the lawyer's ability to abide by the ethical standards of this State, including the standards governing attorney-client confidentiality." Id. at 3-4; see also D.C. Op. 278 (1998) (same). Furthermore, a New York lawyer is responsible for a violation of the New York Code by a lawyer or non-lawyer employed, retained, or associated with the New York lawyer where the New York lawyer (1) orders, directs or ratifies the conduct or (2) is a partner or has supervisory responsibility for the person who engaged in the conduct and knows of such conduct or in the exercise of management or supervisory responsibility should have known of such conduct so that remedial action should have been taken. DR 1-104(D).

For example, while there might be no per se prohibition against a New York lawyer entering into a partnership with lawyers from Country X where the ethical and disciplinary rules of both jurisdictions are similar, the New York lawyer could not enter into the partnership if one of the Country X partners was not a lawyer. Although such a partnership might be permitted in Country X, the New York lawyer could not enter into the partnership because it would compromise the lawyer's ability to abide by the New York ethical rules. See DR 3-103 (lawyer cannot form a partnership with a non-lawyer if the partnership practices law); see also ABA 423, supra.

Even where forming a partnership with lawyers licensed in foreign countries is ethically permissible, in carrying out its supervisory obligations under DR 1-104(C) the law firm may need to take steps to ensure that particular actions of the foreign lawyers do not compromise the New York lawyer's ethical responsibilities. Cf. EC 1-8 ("A law firm should adopt measures giving reasonable assurance that all lawyers in the firm conform to the Disciplinary Rules and that the conduct of non-lawyers employed by the firm is compatible with the professional obligations of the lawyers in the firm.") Suppose, for example, that the ethical rules of Country X generally comport with the New York confidentiality rules but require a lawyer to reveal a client's past fraud. Because a New York attorney is prohibited from revealing a client confidence or secret in that situation (DR 7-102[B][1]; DR 4-101), the firm must take reasonable steps to ensure compliance with the New York Code (for example, by ensuring that such confidential information is unavailable to the lawyer licensed in Country X).[13] To ensure that adherence to the disciplinary rules of a foreign country by a foreign lawyer does not expose the New York firm or its New York lawyers to a violation of the New York Code, supervision of the lawyer licensed in the foreign country by the firm should be by a lawyer (or lawyers) familiar with the New York Code.

The New York firm may also have affirmative duties with respect to a client whose matter will be handled in a foreign jurisdiction with differing ethical rules. For example, the firm must explain to 13 If this is impossible because of the size or the nature of the firm, the partnership itself may be unethical.

the client the extent to which the confidentiality rules in the foreign jurisdiction provide less protection than they do in New York.

CONCLUSION:

New York lawyers with management or supervisory authority in law firms with New York offices, as well as the firms themselves, are required to make reasonable efforts to ensure that lawyers subject to the New York Code who are affiliated with the firm in such offices comply with the New York Code. A New York firm has broad supervisory responsibility under DR 1-104(C) with respect to non-lawyers and lawyers licensed in foreign countries in the New York office, and must ensure that compliance by foreign lawyers with the ethical rules of a foreign jurisdiction does not compromise the firm's adherence to the New York Code.

TOPIC: Third-party payments by credit card; fees deducted from such payments before remittance to client.

MODIFIES: N.Y. State 117 (1969), N.Y. State 362 (1974)

DIGEST: Not improper for lawyer to accept collection payments from debtors by credit card on behalf of creditor-client where funds are placed in trust account and proper safeguards employed, and all requirements regarding contingent or fixed fee forms of engagement are met.

Legal fees may be deducted from such payments before remittance to client if not excessive or in dispute; if disputed, lawyer may not withdraw disputed fees, must forward payment to client to the extent not in dispute and must attempt to resolve dispute. If applicable, the lawyer must submit matter to fee dispute resolution program.

CODE: DR 2-106(A); 2-106(B); 2-106(C) (2)(b); 2-106(D); 2-106(E); 4-101; 9-102(A); 9-102(B)(4).

EC 2-17; 2-19; 2-20; 2-21; 2-23; 9-5.

QUESTION:

May an attorney whose practice includes debt collection matters (1) accept payment by credit card on behalf of a client from the client's debtors; (2) transfer the payment collected into an IOLA[14] or other trust account to be held until a netted payment is remitted to the client; (3) deduct from the trust account an agreed upon sum as the attorney's legal fee, together with all related disbursements except for credit card service fees; (4) remit the netted payment to the client; and (5) pay all applicable credit card service fees from the attorney's own operating account?

OPINION:

A law firm's practice, in large part, includes the representation of one or more creditors in connection with debt collection matters. The Committee is advised that, customarily in this type of practice, an attorney who has successfully collected unpaid sums from a debtor retains approximately 25% of funds collected as a legal fee and remits the remaining 75% to the creditor-client. For purposes of this opinion, the Committee assumes that all fees to be paid to the law firm will not be "excessive" under the factors set forth in DR 2-106(A) of the Code.

The law firm proposes to initiate a payment program whereby debtors of creditor-clients could pay their overdue accounts, or the judgments the firm has obtained against them, by credit card. The debtor would authorize payment either telephonically or by in-person execution of the law firm's credit card debit form. The debtor is to receive full credit for any payment charged, and the client will ultimately receive all monies collected, less only the firm's agreed upon legal fee and the disbursements which are to be deducted prior to remittance.

By undertaking such a program, the firm will be acting in much the same manner as a "merchant" in a retail establishment. When dealing with a retail merchant, a merchant credit card bank charges "points" against any credit card payment that the merchant has received for the sale made. The firm advises that the bank charge is approximately 2% of each dollar of payment received. "Discounts" may be offered to a merchant based on the amount of credit card charges.

In N.Y. State 362 (1974) and N.Y. State 117 (1969), as well as N.Y. State 399 (1975), this Committee answered in the affirmative the question of whether a lawyer could participate in a bank charge card system where the agreement with the bank permits the lawyer's clients to pay for legal services by credit card. Certain minimal safeguards, however, were to be incorporated into any such plan. A*ccord,* Utah State Bar Op. 97-06[15]; So. Carolina Bar Ethics Advisory Opinion 98-08[16]; Colo. Bar Ass'n Opinion 97/98-01.[17]

Preliminarily, the Committee observes that when N.Y. State 117 and N.Y. State 362 were written, the use of credit cards was not as common as it is today and the payment of legal fees by credit card was a novelty. With over thirty years of credit card history to look back upon and little abuse of the arrangement by lawyers or banks, the Committee has reconsidered the safeguards listed in its earlier opinions. In so doing, the Committee concludes that it is no longer necessary to require that the agreement between the lawyer and the bank provide that, in any possible suit against the client, the bank waive all defenses which a holder in due course might have. The Committee also observes that the prohibition against any display of a decal in the lawyer's office has been superseded by substantive law[18] This Committee does not pass upon issues of law, but restricts its opinions solely to ethical issues arising under the Code. Therefore, to the extent herein provided, the requirements of N.Y. State 117 and N.Y. State 362 are modified.

In the present inquiry, and unlike the situations posed in our prior opinions, the monies to be received by the lawyer from credit card payments are from third persons, not clients directly, and are primarily the property of the creditor-client. The payments only partially comprise the lawyer's legal fee. For this reason, the funds must be placed in the lawyer's trust account (or an IOLA account, if the amount of funds received from each transaction is small and/or is to be held for a short period of time). See generally DR 9-102, EC 9-5; see also N.Y. Jud. Law § 497.

15 The attorney may, among other things, (a) accept cash or a check from a client to be held against unearned fees or costs when the attorney knows that the client obtained funds through use of a credit card; (b) enter into a retainer agreement with a client under which the client gives the attorney a credit card number and authorizes charging the client's credit card when fees are earned and costs incurred; and (c) place a notice on bills to clients that credit card payment is accepted. The opinion also noted that by accepting credit card payments, the attorney has no obligation to enter into a bank-charge credit card arrangement.

16 Client's credit card may be charged for fees so long as the attorney notifies the client before charges are billed to the credit card and offers the client an opportunity to question errors.

17 Credit card payments may be accepted under certain circumstances so long as the arrangement is fair and reasonable, confidentiality is assured, and the attorney's independence is not compromised.

18 In Bates v. State Bar of Arizona, 433 U.S. 350 (1977), the United States Supreme Court held that lawyers had a First Amendment right to truthfully advertise prices for routine legal services. At the time that N.Y. State 117 and N.Y. State 362 were issued, New York and other states did not permit advertising of any kind. Bates and its progeny are controlling on this issue. DR 2-101(A) of the Code now requires that "A lawyer . . . shall not use or disseminate or participate in the preparation or dissemination of any public communication or communication to a prospective client containing statements or claims that are false, deceptive or misleading."

DR 9-102(A) provides that:

> A lawyer in possession of any funds or other property belonging to another person, where such possession is incident to his or her practice of law, is a fiduciary, and must not misappropriate such funds or property or commingle such funds or property with his or her own.

See also DR 9-102(B) which requires, in part, that funds belonging to other persons also be kept in separate accounts, properly identified.

After deposit of the payment in the trust account, the law firm then proposes to deduct its fees and disbursements before remitting the netted sum to the client. DR 9-102(B)(4) provides that:

> Funds belonging in part to a client or third person and in part presently or potentially to the lawyer or law firm shall be kept in such special account or accounts, but the portion belonging to the lawyer or law firm may be withdrawn when due unless the right of the lawyer or law firm to receive it is disputed by the client or third person, in which event the disputed portion shall not be withdrawn until the dispute is finally resolved.

A written agreement with the client will help to minimize the chance of any dispute arising over fees. See EC 2-19 and EC 2-23. In circumstances where, as here, the law firm plans to deduct its fee before remitting payment to the client, it is particularly important that there be no misunderstanding regarding legal fees.

If the firm's fee is solely dependent on the collection of funds from debtors, the fee arrangement is contingent and a written agreement is not only advisable, but required. DR 2-106(D) provides that:

> Promptly after a lawyer has been employed in a contingent fee matter, the lawyer shall provide the client with a writing stating the method by which the fee is to be determined, including the percentage or percentages that shall accrue to the lawyer in the event of a settlement, trial or appeal, litigation or other expenses to be deducted from the recovery and whether such expenses are to be deducted before or, if not prohibited by statute or court rule, after the contingent fee is calculated. Upon conclusion of a contingent fee matter, the lawyer shall provide the client with a written statement stating the outcome of the matter, and if there is a recovery, showing the remittance to the client and the method of determination.

See also EC 2-20.

Whether fees are contingent or fixed, the firm will be required (subject to narrow exceptions[19]) to provide each client for which it commences a new matter with a written letter of engagement (22 N.Y.C.R.R. § 1215.1, effective March 4, 2002, and DR 2-106(C)(2)(b)) providing an explanation of the scope of legal services to be provided, the fees to be charged and the firm's billing practices, and, if applicable, providing notice of the client's right to arbitration. 22 N.Y.C.R.R. Part 137 ("Fee Dispute Resolution Program") and DR 2-106(E). See also EC 2-19 and EC 2-23.

19 Exceptions are: "(1) representation of a client where the fee to be charged is expected to be less than $3000, (2) representation where the attorney's services are of the same general kind as previously rendered to and paid for by the client, or (3) representation in domestic relations matters subject to Part 1400 of the Joint Rules of the Appellate Division (22 NYCRR) or (4) representation where the attorney is admitted to practice in another jurisdiction and maintains no office in the State of New York, or where no material portion of the services are to be rendered in New York." 22 N.Y.C.R.R., Part 1215 § 1215.2, effective March 4, 2002.

In the event a good faith dispute over fees arises with the client,[20] fees for services may not be withdrawn by the firm from the trust account until the dispute is finally resolved. Except for the amount in dispute, the balance of the funds should be remitted promptly to the client. If the dispute cannot be amicably resolved by the lawyer and client, the law firm must comply, if applicable, with requirements of the fee dispute resolution program recently promulgated as Part 137 of the Rules of the Chief Administrator of the Courts,[21] or promptly take other steps to "resolve amicably any differences on the subject." EC 2-23.

With regard to charges by the merchant credit card bank incurred in consequence of the firm's credit card program, such charges may be deducted from the sum remitted to the client if this arrangement is part of the understanding with the client;[22] otherwise these charges should be deducted from the firm's fees or paid by the firm from its operating account and not passed on to the client.

CONCLUSION:

A law firm whose practice includes debt collection matters (1) may accept payment by credit card on behalf of a client from a client's debtors; (2) should transfer any payments collected by the law firm into an IOLA or other trust account where the payment is to be held until the netted amount can be remitted to the client; (3) may deduct from the trust account an agreed upon sum as the law firm's legal fee, together with all disbursements, so long as the fee is not excessive or in dispute; (4) may not withdraw any amount on account of fees that are disputed, and must promptly forward to the client the balance owing to the client; (5) may deduct the costs and expenses associated with the credit card service from the payment to be forwarded if agreed to by the client; otherwise, the lawyer should pay such expenses out of the firm's fees or its operating account; and (6) should promptly remit the netted payment to the client.

Depending on the nature of the fee arrangement with the client, the law firm should also comply with all requirements of DR 2-106(E) if the fee is contingent, or, alternatively, comply, if applicable, with 22 N.Y.C.R.R. § 1215.1. In the event of any dispute regarding the fee, the law firm should attempt to resolve all disputes amicably and promptly and, if applicable, should comply with the fee dispute resolution program set forth in 22 N.Y.C.R.R., Part 137.

20 It is assumed that there is little likelihood of a dispute arising between the lawyer and the debtor because payments will only be received by the firm if the collection matter has been resolved and the debtor agrees or wishes to pay the collection amount by credit card.

TOPIC: Escrow funds; fee agreements; conflicts of interest; Interest on Lawyer Account (IOLA)

DIGEST: Lawyer may only accept IOLA account earnings credit with consent of client after full disclosure

CODE: DR 2-106(A), 5-101(A), 5-107(A)(2), 7-101(A)(3), 9-102(A); EC 2-21

QUESTION:

May an attorney accept an earnings credit against bank charges based upon balances held in the attorney's IOLA account?

OPINION:

A bank is developing a package of banking products designed specifically for attorneys that will include an "earnings credit" based on balances held in an attorney's operating accounts. Subject to this committee's approval, the earnings credit will also be given with respect to balances maintained in an attorney's IOLA account, but not with respect to non-IOLA attorney trust accounts. The earnings credit would only be applied to reduce or eliminate monthly bank fees otherwise chargeable to the attorney, and would not result in a cash payment or bank credit over and above the monthly bank fees. Because the bank would, in addition, waive the monthly maintenance fee associated with the IOLA account, the IOLA Fund would receive more money from IOLA accounts maintained by attorneys who have accepted the earnings credits than from other IOLA accounts.

IOLA accounts are unsegregated interest-bearing transaction accounts with check writing privileges. The interest on IOLA accounts is used to help finance legal services for the poor. The current IOLA interest rate paid by the bank state wide is .35 percent per annum. Pursuant to New York Judiciary Law §497(4)(c)(i) and (ii), "qualified funds" that are not deposited in an unsegregated IOLA account must be deposited in a segregated interest-bearing attorney trust account for the client's benefit, or in an unsegregated interest-bearing attorney trust account provided the bank or the depositing lawyer can separately compute and pay to each client the interest earned by such client's funds.

"Qualified funds" are defined by Judiciary Law §497(2) as:

> moneys received by an attorney in a fiduciary capacity from a client or beneficial owner and which, in the judgment of the attorney, are too small in amount or are reasonably expected to be held for too short a time to generate sufficient interest income to justify the expense of administering a segregated account for the benefit of the client or beneficial owner. In determining whether funds are qualified for deposit in an IOLA account, an attorney may use as a guide the regulation adopted by the board of trustees of the IOLA fund pursuant to subdivision four of section ninety-seven-v of the state finance law.

The qualified funds determination "guideline" authorized by § 497(2) is found at 21 NYCRR §7000.10, and provides that where the deposit is not expected to "generate at least $150 in interest or such larger sum as the attorney or law firm in the exercise of his professional judgment deems may be equivalent to the cost of administering a separate account," the attorney "may choose to place these funds in a pooled IOLA account." The guideline thus reaffirms, in the context of a $150 "safe harbor," the broad IOLA deposit standard of New York Judiciary Law §497(4)(b), which states:

> The decision as to whether funds are nominal in amount or expected to be held for a short period of time rests exclusively in the sound judgment of the lawyer or law firm. Ordinarily, in determining the type of account into which to deposit particular funds held for a client, a lawyer shall take into consideration the following factors:
> (i) the amount of interest the funds would earn during the period they are expected to be deposited;
> (ii) the cost of establishing and administering the account, including the cost of the lawyer or law firm's services;
> (iii) the capability of the banking institution, through subaccounting, to calculate and pay interest earned by each client's funds, net of any transaction costs, to the individual client.

Judiciary Law §497 also limits a lawyer's exposure to damages or professional misconduct charges arising out of his or her decision to deposit client funds into an IOLA account to "bad faith" claims. Subdivision (5) of the statute states: "No attorney or law firm shall be liable in damages nor held to answer for a charge of professional misconduct because of a deposit of moneys to an IOLA account pursuant to a judgment in good faith that such moneys were qualified funds."

Most segregated interest-bearing attorney trust accounts maintained by the bank are savings accounts. When funds from the attorney trust account need to be disbursed, a transfer is made to the IOLA account from which checks are then drawn. In the metropolitan region, the interest paid by the bank on such savings accounts is currently .65 percent interest per annum. The upstate interest rate is currently .50 percent per annum.

The earnings credit factor to be employed by the bank is progressive. In the metropolitan region, if the aggregate amount of the qualifying account balances, including an IOLA account, were $5,000 or less, there would be no earnings credit. If the amount were between $5,000 and $50,000, there would be a credit of .9 percent annually. For aggregate balances above $50,000, the credit would be 1.0 percent annually. The regime would be the same upstate, except $2,500, not $5,000, would represent the breakpoint between an earnings credit of zero and an earnings credit of .9 percent.

There are a number of ethical concerns which touch upon the question presented, some of which have been brought to our attention by the inquirer. Each concern arises from the same basic dynamic – namely, the statute and regulations governing IOLA accounts give an attorney considerable discretion in determining whether to deposit client funds into an account that pays interest to the client or into an account that pays interest to the IOLA Fund, and where the anticipated interest would be less than $150, such discretion is arguably beyond all review. Whether or not the IOLA Fund benefits from the bank's proposed special program for attorneys, both the bank and the attorney would benefit whenever an attorney exercised his or her discretion in favor of a deposit into an IOLA account. The bank would benefit from paying a lower interest rate and, more importantly, the lawyer would benefit from paying lower monthly bank charges.

Notwithstanding, this arrangement would not, in our opinion, run afoul of the prohibition against charging or collecting "an illegal or excessive fee" set forth in DR 2-106(A), as the earnings credit is not a client generated "fee." Similarly, the bar of DR 9-102(A) against misappropriation of client "funds" or client "property" does not apply, as the proposed earnings credit is neither. In this respect, our prior opinions in N.Y. State 532 (1981) (a lawyer may not seek or accept interest earned on funds held in an escrow account as compensation for serving as an escrow agent), N.Y. State 582 (1987) (a lawyer may not retain interest earned on a settlement check deposited into an escrow account from the date of deposit until the date of check clearance), and N.Y. State 570 (1985) (a lawyer may not retain interest earned on an advance fee where the lawyer and client have agreed to treat the advance fee as client property), which the inquirer seeks to distinguish, are largely irrelevant.

Nor do we believe it is necessary to decide whether the determination to deposit client funds in an unsegregated IOLA account or in a segregated attorney trust account (i) is or is not "the exercise of professional judgment" within the meaning of DR 5-101(A), thereby implicating a potential financial conflict of interest, or (ii) might "prejudice or damage the client" within the meaning of DR 7-101(A)(3).

Rather, the disposition of this inquiry is clearly governed by DR 5-107(A)(2) and EC 2-21. DR 5-107(A)(2) provides: "Except with the consent of the client after full disclosure a lawyer shall not: Accept from one other than the client anything of value related to his or her representation of or employment by the client." EC 2-21 provides: "A lawyer shall not accept compensation or anything of value incident to the lawyer's employment or services from one other than the client without the knowledge and consent of the client after full disclosure."

In N.Y. State 320 (1973), we opined that, absent disclosure and client consent, an attorney could not retain the discount received from title companies without crediting his or her client the amount of the discount. In N.Y. State 461 (1977), we opined that the acceptance of a portion of the commission obtained by a fire adjuster in connection with the loss sustained by the lawyer's client would not be unethical "provided the client, with full knowledge of the facts, has consented to the arrangement and all proceeds secured therefrom by the lawyer are credited or otherwise disbursed to the client." In N.Y. State 576 (1986) (which opinion amplified N.Y. State 351 [1974]), we opined that absent express consent to the contrary, a real estate attorney also acting as title insurance agent must reduce the client's legal fee by the amount of remuneration from such title company. In N.Y State 667 (1994), we reached the same conclusion with regard to requiring disclosure and client consent before an attorney could accept a referral fee from a mortgage broker; however, we there stated that the attorney was not required to remit the referral fee to the client if the client consented to its retention by the attorney. Each of these opinions rested upon the authority of DR 5-107(A)(2), and two of them (N.Y. State 461 and 667) cited EC 2-21.

As the trust funds to be deposited by the attorney into an attorney trust account (IOLA or non-IOLA) will only come into the attorney's hands as a consequence of the representation of a client, and as the proposed earnings credit would reduce or eliminate monthly bank charges that would otherwise be debited from the attorney's accounts, there is clearly something "of value" that is being offered to the attorney by "one other than the client" which is "related to his or her representation of or employment by the client." That the earnings credit will not influence his or her conduct with regard to the negotiation of a transaction or the prosecution or defense of a claim for which the lawyer was retained does not, in our view, take the matter outside the sweeping purview of DR 5-107(A)(2). For example, if an attorney maintains an average monthly IOLA balance in excess of $50,000, the bank will credit him or her at least $500 in reduction of bank fees for the year, not an insignificant or de minimus sum. Such an earnings credit may well influence the attorney's decision as to where client trust funds should be deposited, and that decision would have a direct and adverse financial impact upon the client if an IOLA account is chosen.

We do not, however, see the proposed earnings credit on IOLA accounts as presenting "so great a danger of unfairness, deception, overreaching and conflict of interest, or the appearance thereof" as to warrant a per se prohibition. Compare N.Y. State 532 (1981) ("While we interpret the Code as requiring a per se prohibition against retaining interest earned on escrowed funds in the circumstances stated [lawyer representing client and also serving as escrow agent in real estate transaction], we recognize a possible distinction where interest is paid on a special account in which a lawyer deposits [certain] non-escrow client funds . . ."). Therefore, as contemplated by DR 5-107(A), provided the client has consented to the arrangement after full disclosure, an attorney may accept an earnings credit against bank charges based upon balances held in the attorney's IOLA account.

CONCLUSION:

An attorney may only accept an earnings credit against bank charges based upon balances held in the attorney's IOLA account with the consent of the client after full disclosure.

TOPIC: Reciprocal referral arrangements with nonlegal professionals.

DIGEST: A lawyer or law firm may enter into a nonexclusive reciprocal referral agreement with a securities broker or insurance agent, with appropriate disclosure of the relationship.

CODE: DR 1-106; DR 1-107; DR 1-107(A), (B), (C), (D); DR 2-103(B)(1); DR 5-101(A); EC 1-14; EC 1-16.

QUESTIONS:

1. Under the amendments to the New York Code of Professional Responsibility (the "Code") effective November 1, 2001, may a lawyer enter into and maintain a contractual relationship with an insurance or securities agent/broker which involves the law firm and the insurance/securities agent/broker referring clients to each other?

2. If this were merely a reciprocal referral agreement rather than a contractual relationship would the answer be any different?

OPINION:

On July 23, 2001, the Appellate Divisions adopted new rules on multidisciplinary practice, effective November 1, 2001. The amendment added two new rules to the Code, DR 1-106 and DR 1-107, and made conforming changes to a number of other rules. In general terms, DR 1-106 addresses the provision of legal and nonlegal services by lawyers or law firms themselves (or by entities owned, controlled or affiliated with lawyers or law firms); DR 1-107 addresses contractual arrangements between lawyers or law firms on the one hand and separate entities providing nonlegal services. We first addressed DR 1-106 in our Opinions 752, 753 and 755. This opinion is our first to deal at length with DR 1-107.[23]

The questions addressed by this opinion concern two provisions of DR 1107: the provision in DR 1107(A) that permits a lawyer to enter into and maintain "a contractual relationship with a nonlegal professional or nonlegal professional service firm for the purpose of offering to the public, on a systematic and continuing basis, legal services . . . as well as other nonlegal professional services"; and an exception in DR 1107(C) for "relationships consisting solely of nonexclusive reciprocal referral agreements or understandings" between a lawyer and nonlegal professional, or their firms. These questions focus on the difference between a "contractual relationship" calling for reciprocal referrals and an "agreement or understanding" calling for the same. While the difference in terminology is important, the essence of the distinction in the rule is in the extent of interconnection provided for by the contract, agreement or understanding.

Contracts under DR 1107(A) can include reciprocal referral arrangements, EC 1-16 ("The contractual relationship permitted by DR 1-107 may provide for the reciprocal referral of clients by and between the lawyer or law firm and the nonlegal professional or nonlegal professional service firm."), as well as sharing of costs, (DR 1107[D]), joint advertising (DR 2101[C][3]), and joint premises (EC 114). The relationship may not, however, include the sharing of fees. DR 1-107(A)(2).

A lawyer who wishes to enter into a DR 1107(A) contract with a nonlegal professional may do so only in accordance with the rule. Among other things, the rule requires the lawyer to make certain specified disclosures to clients (including a prescribed "Statement of Client's Rights in Cooperative Business Arrangements") and limits the professions with which lawyers can so contract to those professions on a list designated by the Appellate Divisions. The rule also sets forth in DR 1-107(B) the requirements for a profession to be included on the Appellate Division list (i.e., Bachelor's degree, licensing, and a comparable ethical code). As of now the list includes only (1) architects, (2) certified public accountants, (3) professional engineers, (4) land surveyors, and (5) certified social workers.

By the terms of DR 1107(C), if an agreement with a nonlegal professional is limited to reciprocal referrals – and does not include, for example, joint advertising, sharing of premises and expenses, and the like – DR 1-107(A) "shall not apply." The implication of DR 1-107(C) is that "relationships consisting solely of non-exclusive reciprocal referral agreements or understandings" between lawyers and nonlegal professionals are carved out of the regulation of DR 1-107 entirely and are left to other rules. [24] The other relevant rule is DR 2-103(B), which provides, in relevant part:

> A lawyer shall not compensate or give anything of value to a person or organization to recommend or obtain employment by a client, or as a reward for having made a recommendation resulting in employment by a client, except that:
> (1) A lawyer or law firm may refer clients to a nonlegal professional or nonlegal professional service firm pursuant to a contractual relationship with such nonlegal professional or nonlegal professional service firm to provide legal and other professional services on a systematic and continuing basis as permitted by DR 1-107, provided however that such referral shall not otherwise include any monetary or other tangible consideration or reward for such, or the sharing of legal fees; . . . .

This Committee has not squarely addressed whether a non-exclusive reciprocal referral relationship between a lawyer and a non-lawyer constitutes the prohibited "compensat[ion]" or "giv[ing] of value" to the non-lawyer to recommend employment. Our prior opinions that have considered the question have involved situations in which there was a payment to the referring non-lawyer or a sponsoring organization as well as an understanding of a reciprocal referral. N.Y. State 741 (2001) ("Because the attorney is required to pay substantial dues to the organization in exchange for membership that entitles the attorney to referrals from other members and is required to make referrals to those members, the attorney would be transferring something 'of value' to obtain referrals, which is prohibited by DR 2-103[B]"); N.Y. State 566 (1984) (lawyer may not pay a real estate brokerage firm to endorse or recommend the lawyer).

24 The Appellate Divisions specifically amended DR 1-107(C) after its initial adoption to change the reference in the rule from DR 1-107(A)(1) to DR 1-107(A). Joint Order of the Appellate Divisions, New York Law Journal at 11 (December 26, 2001). This brought the rule into line with the language that had been proposed by a New York State Bar Association Special Committee on multidisciplinary practice that had proposed DR 1106 and DR 1107. See Report of the New York State Bar Association Special Committee on the Law Governing Firm Structure and Operation*, Preserving the Core Values of the American Legal Profession: The Place of Multidisciplinary Practice in the Law Governing Lawyers* 353 (2000)(the "MacCrate Report").

Prior to the adoption of DR 1-107 and to the 2001 amendments to DR 2-103, the Nassau County Bar Association ethics committee opined that mutual referral arrangements were prohibited. Nassau County 97-8 ("While a mutual referral arrangement may not be as obvious a form of compensation as a referral fee, it is 'of value', and a lawyer may not enter into such an agreement in order to obtain referrals.").[25] The conclusion that even a nonexclusive undertaking to make referrals constitutes the giving of "value" is consistent with the language of DR 2-103(B)(1) viewed in isolation, but it leads to anomalies in light of DR 1-107. In particular, while DR 2103(B) provides that reciprocal referral agreements are permissible, it limits the scope of that permission to those agreements permitted by DR 1107, and DR 1107 expressly exempts from its scope certain such agreements that, as discussed below, raise the least concerns. Thus, reading DR 2103(B)(1) to bar "naked" reciprocal referral arrangements would mean that a nonexclusive agreement with an accountant to provide mutual referrals (on a systematic and continuing basis) would be barred as the giving of value, but if the arrangement included some other element – such as shared expenses or joint advertising – it would be permitted.

Nothing in the language or background of DR 1-107 suggests such a result. The language of DR 1-107(C) – that DR 1-107(A) shall not apply to relationships consisting "solely" of nonexclusive referral agreements – suggests that the assumption was that such relationships would be permitted but for the restrictions in DR 1107(A). In addition, the careful distinction between the language of DR 1107(A) permitting "contractual relationships" and the language of DR 1107(C) exempting "agreements or understandings" suggests that the drafters contemplated that the "agreements or understandings" were at best of limited value. Indeed, as discussed further below, any such undertaking to provide referrals must be non-exclusive and qualified by the lawyer's duty to exercise independent professional judgment in making the referral.

Moreover, the New York State Bar Association special committee report that recommended the adoption of DR 1-107 found that nonexclusive reciprocal referral arrangements were not in themselves particularly dangerous, although it said that "some might argue" that they were barred by "the letter of the ethical prohibitions":

> What the interprofessional alliance represents is the contractual formalization of a reciprocal relationship wherein two businesses mutually agree that they can serve their clients, and benefit themselves, by focusing their referrals on each other to the extent consistent with their professional obligations to their respective clients. A byproduct, but not an insignificant one for purposes of this discussion, is that the allies generally make efforts to cooperate in rendering their respective services to the mutual clients. While some might argue that such arrangements fall within the letter of the ethical prohibitions, they are not pernicious in nature because of the responsibility of each of the allies to utilize its best judgment for its clients in selecting the most appropriate "referee." This is not to say that a rigidly structured agreement could not be viewed as violative of the restrictions on compensating nonlawyers for client referrals. Provisions such as minimum guarantees and exclusive dealing arrangements would > transform a symbiotic business relationship into a creature that could have a direct negative impact on clients.

25 The Nassau County ethics opinion also noted that the arrangement was barred by DR 2-103(C), which at that time barred lawyers from requesting a person or organization to recommend or promote the use of the lawyer's services other than by permissible advertising or approved lawyer referral services. Those restrictions were deleted in 1999 along with certain other restrictions on advertising and solicitation.

MacCrate Report at 347-48 (emphasis added).[26] The elaborate safeguards that the special committee recommended, including the development of a list of permitted professions, were aimed not at the referral arrangements as such, but at the aspects of DR1107 contractual relationships that go beyond nonexclusive reciprocal referral agreements. Thus, it compared the "alliances" of concern to law partnerships between U.S. and foreign lawyers, id. at 351 & n.65, and expressed concern that such alliances "could dilute the lawyers' duties to clients," id. at 351, a concern that is very attenuated in the case of relationships consisting only of non-exclusive mutual referrals.[27]

The low level of ethical concern raised by nonexclusive referral arrangements is further seen in the August 2002 amendments to the ABA Model Rules that were designed to track in significant measure the provisions of DR 1-107. The amended Rule provisions expressly contemplate nonexclusive mutual referral arrangements with other professionals. Model Rule 7.2(b)(4) provides:

> A lawyer shall not give anything of value to a person for recommending the lawyer's services except that a lawyer may . . .
> > (4) refer clients to another lawyer or a nonlawyer professional pursuant to an agreement not otherwise prohibited under these Rules that provides for the other person to refer clients or customers to the lawyer, if
> > > (i) the reciprocal referral agreement is not exclusive, and
> > > (ii) the client is informed of the existence and nature of the agreement.

In short, prohibiting nonexclusive reciprocal referral arrangements – relationships, in the words of the Special Committee, "wherein two businesses mutually agree that they can serve their clients, and benefit themselves, by focusing their referrals on each other to the extent consistent with their professional obligations to their respective clients" – would clearly not be consistent with the provisions of DR 1-107, at least with respect to the professions dealt with in that rule (to date, architects, accountants, engineers, land surveyors and certified social workers).

Securities brokers and insurance agents are not on that list. There is, however, no textual basis for restricting nonexclusive reciprocal referral arrangements to the listed professions. To the contrary, DR 1-107(C) expressly exempts such arrangements from the requirements of DR 1-107(A), including 26 See also N.Y. State 755 at 9 (2002) (noting that the special committee similarly saw little reason to be concerned about lawyers using their lawyer-owned nonlegal businesses as "feeders" to supply them with legal business leads) (quoting MacCrate Report, supra, at 339-40).

27 The special committee at one point quotes a comment in the Restatement of the Law Governing Lawyers that arrangements whereby lawyers pay nonlawyers for referrals "would give the non-lawyer referring person the power and an incentive to influence the lawyer's representation by an explicit or implicit threat to refer no additional clients or by appealing to the lawyer's sense of gratitude for the referral already made." Restatement of the Law Governing Lawyers § 10 cmt. d (2000) (quoted in MacCrate Report, supra, at 344). This risk could apply to "payments" in the form of a reciprocal referral understanding, although the real issue is not the lawyer's undertaking to focus referrals on the nonlawyer, but the mere fact of the nonlawyer's stream of referrals. The Code directly addresses the latter risk by prohibiting a lawyer from allowing a third party who recommends the lawyer to direct or regulate the lawyer's professional judgment. DR 5107(B).

the limiting reference to the Appellate Division list of professions. In addition, as noted, in recommending the list mechanism, the special committee focused on far more involved interrelationships than "naked" mutual referral arrangements.

We likewise see little policy basis for limiting a lawyer's mutual referral of business to architects, engineers, accountants, land surveyors and certified social workers. Persons seeking legal help commonly need assistance from a far broader set of service providers in resolving their problem: estate planning clients frequently need insurance and investment advice; real estate clients often need real estate and mortgage brokers and title services. If lawyers at least in some circumstances may refer clients to entities providing these services that are affiliated with the lawyer, and vice versa, as we opined in N.Y. State 753, it is difficult to see why other lawyers cannot likewise choose a reputable provider with which they can exchange referrals. This is not the joint provision of services under common advertising or a common roof, which implicates the concerns of confidentiality, improper influence and conflicts that motivated the restrictions in DR 1-107(A) and (B).

Based on these considerations, we conclude that a nonexclusive mutual referral arrangement between a lawyer and an insurance agent or securities broker is permitted by DR 1-107(C) and DR 2-103(B)(1). We note that securities brokers and insurance agents both are educated service providers; are commonly involved in legal matters and lawyers have long experience working with them; and are referred to in the special committee report that led to the adoption of the rule.[28] The relationship cannot, however, go beyond a relatively loose reciprocal referral arrangement to include joint advertising or sharing of expenses, for these closer relationships are reserved to professions on the Appellate Division list.

It is important to emphasize that whether or not accompanied by other features, any reciprocal referral understanding, agreement or contract between a lawyer and nonlegal professional must be nonexclusive. That is, a lawyer can never agree to refer all clients, or a specified quota, to the insurance or securities brokerage entity, because the lawyer must continue to exercise professional judgment on behalf of the client in making the referral. EC 1-16 states:

> The contractual relationship permitted under DR 1-107 may provide for the reciprocal referral of clients by and between the lawyer or law firm and the nonlegal professional service firm. When in the context of such a contractual relationship a lawyer or law firm refers a client to the nonlegal professional or nonlegal professional service firm, the lawyer or law firm shall observe the ethical standards of the legal profession in verifying the competence of the nonlegal professional or nonlegal professional services firm to handle the relevant affairs and interests of the client. Referrals should only be made when requested by the client or deemed to be reasonably necessary to serve the client. Thus, even if otherwise permitted by DR 1-107, a contractual relationship may not require referrals on an exclusive basis.

28 The special committee report refers to a wide range of professionals with whom lawyers have long cooperated on a routine basis via "referrals and working relationships [as] part of everyday professional life," including "accountants, financial advisors, investment bankers, engineers, brokers, social workers, and others." MacCrate Report, supra, at 98 (emphasis added).

In addition, although the specified disclosures set forth in DR 1-107(A)(3) are not required with respect to relationships consisting only of reciprocal referral arrangements,[29] a reciprocal referral arrangement would generally constitute a conflict of interest under DR 5-101(A) such that the relationship would need to be disclosed and consent obtained before the lawyer made the referral. As the special committee report stated:

> Even under current ethical principles, depending upon the economic importance of the relationship to the lawyer, the lawyer must disclose the existence and nature of the interprofessional contractual relationship to clients so that they can make an informed judgment regarding the services of both the nonlegal ally and the lawyer. This is because, as the Restatement notes, the desire of the lawyer to perpetuate the stream of referrals from the ally, if sufficiently significant to the lawyer, may constitute a business or personal interest that could conflict impermissibly with the lawyer's duty to exercise independent professional judgment on the client's behalf. Clearly, a law firm that subsists on referrals from a particular nonlawyer consulting firm, the loss of which would be harmful to the lawyers in the firm, has a strong interest in reciprocation that could tend to convert what would otherwise be a presumption in favor of cross-referrals to the consultants into a mandatory or automatic practice that disregards the particular needs of the client. Informed client consent to such conflict of interest would be essential.

MacCrate Report at 348 (footnotes omitted) (emphasis added). See also EC 114 (even contractual relationships permitted by DR 1107 could create a conflict of interest if "the law firm's interest in maintaining an advantageous relationship with the nonlegal professional service firm might . . . adversely affect the independent professional judgment of the law firm").

The nature of the disclosure required by DR 5101(A) will depend on such factors as the terms or nature of the reciprocal referral arrangement; the extent of the lawyer's experience or acquaintance with the work of the nonlegal professional; the amount of the lawyer's business that is currently or expected to be derived from the nonlegal professional's referrals; and any other factor that might reasonably be considered by a disinterested lawyer to affect the lawyer's professional judgment in making the referral. A prudent lawyer will ordinarily disclose to the client any such reciprocal referral arrangement or understanding with a nonlawyer professional to whom a referral is made. In some circumstances, the disclosure might go no further than a statement that "I have worked with X for years and X and I have an arrangement to refer clients to each other when it is appropriate." In other cases the disclosure might need to be more elaborate to satisfy the requirement under DR 5-101(A) that client consent be obtained only after "full disclosure of the implications of the lawyer's interest."

CONCLUSION:

A lawyer or law firm may enter into a non-exclusive reciprocal referral agreement or understanding with a securities broker or insurance agent and, with appropriate disclosure and client consent under DR 5101(A), can refer clients to the securities broker or insurance agent.

29 As noted above, in an amendment to the original rule, the Appellate Divisions changed DR 1107(C)'s reference to the section that does not apply from DR 1-107(A)(1) to DR 1-107(A).

APPENDIX:

DR 1-107 Contractual Relationships between Lawyers and Nonlegal Professionals

A. The practice of law has an essential tradition of complete independence and uncompromised loyalty to those it services. Recognizing this tradition, clients of lawyers practicing in New York State are guaranteed "independent professional judgment and undivided loyalty uncompromised by conflicts of interest."[30] Indeed, these guarantees represent the very foundation of the profession and allow and foster its continued role as a protector of the system of law. Therefore, a lawyer must remain completely responsible for his or her own independent professional judgment, maintain the confidences and secrets of clients, preserve funds of clients and third parties in his or her control, and otherwise comply with the legal and ethical principles governing lawyers in New York State.

Multi-disciplinary practice between lawyers and nonlawyers is incompatible with the core values of the legal profession and, therefore, a strict division between services provided by lawyers and those provided by nonlawyers is essential to protect those values. However, a lawyer or law firm may enter into and maintain a contractual relationship with a nonlegal professional or nonlegal professional service firm for the purpose of offering to the pubic, on a systematic and continuing basis, legal services performed by the lawyer or law firm, as well as other nonlegal professional services, notwithstanding the provisions of DR 5101(A), provided that:

1. The profession of the nonlegal professional or nonlegal professional service firm is included in a list jointly established and maintained by the Appellate Divisions pursuant to section 1205.3 of the Joint Appellate Division Rules;

2. The lawyer or law firm neither grants to the nonlegal professional or nonlegal professional service firm, nor permits such person or firm to obtain, hold or exercise, directly or indirectly, any ownership or investment interest in, or managerial or supervisory right, power or position in connection with the practice of law by the lawyer or law firm nor, as provided in DR 2-103(B)(1), shares legal fees with a nonlawyer or receives or gives any monetary or other tangible benefit for giving or receiving a referral; and

3. The fact that the contractual relationship exists is disclosed by the lawyer or law firm to any client of the lawyer or law firm before the client is referred to the nonlegal professional service firm, or to any client of the nonlegal professional service firm before that client receives legal services from the lawyer or law firm; and the client has given informed written consent and has been provided with a copy of the "Statement of Client's Rights In Cooperative Business Arrangements" pursuant to section 1205.4 of the Joint Appellate Division Rules.

B. For purposes of DR 1-107(A):

30 "Statement of Client's Rights," 22 NYCRR Part 1210.

1. Each profession on the list maintained pursuant to a joint rule of the Appellate Divisions shall have been designated sua sponte, or approved by the Appellate Divisions upon application of a member of a nonlegal profession or nonlegal professional service firm, upon a determination that the profession is composed of individuals who, with respect to their profession:

    a. have been awarded a Bachelor's Degree or its equivalent from an accredited college or university, or have attained an equivalent combination of educational credit from such a college or university and work experience;

    b. are licensed to practice the profession by an agency of the State of New York or the United States Government; and

    c. are required under penalty of suspension or revocation of license to adhere to a code of ethical conduct that is reasonably comparable to that of the legal profession.

2, The term "ownership or investment interest" shall mean any such interest in any form of debt or equity, and shall include any interest commonly considered to be an interest accruing to or enjoyed by an owner or investor.

C. DR 1-107(A) shall not apply to relationships consisting solely of non-exclusive reciprocal referral agreements or understandings between a lawyer or law firm and a nonlegal professional or nonlegal professional service firm.

D. Notwithstanding DR 3-102(A), a lawyer or law firm may allocate costs and expenses with a nonlegal professional or nonlegal professional service firm pursuant to a contractual relationship permitted by DR 1-107(A), provided the allocation reasonably reflects the costs and expenses incurred or expected to be incurred by each.

TOPIC: Disposition of files of former client

OVERRULES: N.Y. State 398 (1975)

DIGEST: Former client and/or successor counsel is presumptively entitled to access all attorney files.

CODE: DR 2-106(A); DR 9-102(C)

QUESTION:

What is a lawyer's obligation to a former client who requests the files that were generated in the course of the prior representation?

OPINION:

DR 9-102(C) provides:

A lawyer shall:

> (4) Promptly pay or deliver to the client . . . as requested by the client . . . the funds, securities, or other properties in the possession of the lawyer which the client . . . is entitled to receive.

The question of which "funds, securities, or other properties in the possession of the lawyer" the client (or successor counsel) is entitled to receive is generally a question of law, not ethics. See N.Y. State 623 (1991) ("Which documents may be deemed to belong to the lawyer is not always easy to ascertain; in certain instances, the lawyer's ownership of such documents may be a complex issue of both law and fact."); Nassau Bar Op. 94-19 (funds in IOLA account); Nassau Bar Op. 96-13 (funds in escrow account). The duty to deliver "to the client all papers and property to which the client is entitled" is also a requirement of withdrawal from employment. See DR 2-110(A)(2).

Accordingly, the Bar's attention is directed to Sage Realty Corp. v. Proskauer Rose Goetz & Mendelsohn, 91 N.Y.2d 30 (1997), in which the Court of Appeals abandoned the distinction "between documents representing the 'end product' of an attorney's services, which belong to the client, and the attorney's 'work product' leading to the creation of those end product documents, which remains the property of the attorney," opting instead for the "majority" view wherein, "upon termination of the attorney-client relationship, where no claim for unpaid legal fees is outstanding,"[31] the client is "presumptively accord[ed] . . . full access to the attorney's file on a represented matter with narrow exceptions." 91 N.Y.2d at 34 (citations omitted). The Court cited the final draft[32] of the American Law Institute Restatement (Third) of the Law Governing Lawyers § 58 (proposed final draft No. 1, 1996), as follows:

31 See Lai Ling Cheng v. Modansky Leasing Co., 71 N.Y.2d 454, 458 (1989) (court recognized that discharged lawyer possessed a common-law retaining lien on client's file in his possession securing his right "under New York law to the reasonable value of the services he performed") (citation omitted).

> The draft Restatement provides that a former client is to be accorded access to "inspect and copy any documents possessed by the lawyer relating to the representation, unless substantial grounds exist to refuse" (id., § 58[2]) [emphasis supplied]. Even without a request, an attorney is obligated to deliver to the client, not later than promptly after representation ends, "such originals and copies of other documents possessed by the lawyer relating to the representation as the . . . [former] client reasonably needs" (id., § 58[3], comment d).
> 91 N.Y.2d at 35.

The Committee recognizes that, consistent with the now rejected "minority view," N.Y. State 398 (1975) suggested that "the client is not entitled to require delivery of the firm's work product" unless, in the context of the particular circumstances, the "firm's duty" to the former client or the "professional courtesy" to be accorded to successor counsel, "are necessary" to guard the client's interest" (citations omitted). To the extent that N.Y. State 398 thus reflects a presumption of non-accessibility that a former client must overcome with respect to a certain class of documents, that view has been plainly rejected by the Court of Appeals in Sage Realty and is no longer valid. See also Gamiel v. Sullivan & Liapakis, P.C., 289 A.D.2d 88 (2001); Getman v. Petro & Ingalsbe, 266 A.D.2d 688 (1999).

With regard to who bears the cost of file assembly and delivery, we also note the Court of Appeals statement in Sage Realty that "as a general proposition, unless a law firm has already been paid for assemblage and delivery of documents to the client, performing that function is properly chargeable to the client under customary fee schedules of the firm, or pursuant to the terms of any governing retainer agreement." 91 N.Y.2d at 38. Of course, the fee for such services may not be excessive. DR 2-106(A). See also Deane v. Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom, N.Y.L.J., Aug. 17, 1998 (Sup. Ct. N.Y. County).

CONCLUSION:

As a matter of ethics, upon request by a former client, a lawyer must promptly turn over or provide access to the files which the former client is entitled to possess. As a matter of New York law, a former client is entitled to any document related to the representation unless substantial grounds exist to refuse access. The lawyer may charge such former client reasonable fees for assembling and delivering such files, as reflected by customary fee schedules or any governing retainer agreement.

> (3) Unless a client or former client consents to nondelivery or substantial grounds exist for refusing to make delivery, a lawyer must deliver to the client or former client, at an appropriate time and in any event promptly after the representation ends, such originals and copies of other documents possessed by the lawyer relating to the representation as the client or former client reasonably needs.

TOPIC: Part-time public official or employee; Conflicts of interest; Advertising

DIGEST: Certified impartial hearing officer may not represent clients in hearings in same school district or if other conflict of interest exists; may include certification in advertising.

CODE: DR 1-102(A)(5), 2-101(A), 5-101(A), 8-101(A)(2), 9-101(B)(1), (3)(a), (C), EC 8-8, 9-1, 9-2, 9-4, 9-6, Canon 9

CJC: N.Y. Comp. R. & Regs. tit. 22, §100.6(B)(2), (C).

QUESTION:

A lawyer is certified by the New York State Commissioner of Education as an impartial hearing officer ("IHO") to hear disputes between school districts and parents of students with disabilities regarding the identification, evaluation and educational placement of such students.

1. May the lawyer, in addition to acting as an IHO, also in private practice represent parents in such hearings?

2. May a lawyer so certified refer to the certification in advertising?

OPINION:

Background

The inquirer practices primarily in the area of special education law, representing parents of students with disabilities. When those parents disagree with a determination made by a school district regarding the education of their child, they are entitled to a hearing before an IHO. To be eligible to serve as an IHO, a person must (1) be a New York lawyer in good standing with a minimum of two years practice and/or experience in the areas of education, special education, disability or civil rights, or have been certified as an IHO on or prior to September 1, 2001; (2) have access to the support and equipment necessary to perform the duties of an IHO; (3) be independent, not be an officer, employee or agent of the school district or of the board of cooperative educational services of which such school district is a component or an employee of the State Education Department, not have a personal or professional interest in conflict with his or her objective in the hearing, and not have participated in the formulation of the recommendation to be reviewed; and (4) be certified by the Commissioner of Education as an IHO. To be certified as an IHO, the individual must (1) successfully complete a training program conducted by the Department of Education, (2) attend periodic update programs, and (3) annually submit a certification that the IHO meets the foregoing eligibility requirements. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 8, §200.1(x).

Each school district is required to maintain a list setting forth the name of each IHO certified by the Commissioner of Education who is available to serve in the district. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 8, §200.1(e). The list is prepared by the New York State Department of Education for each county so that individual school districts do not have the discretion to add or subtract names from the list. An individual IHO may request that his or her name be removed from the list for a particular school district. Appointment of IHOs by a school district may only be made from that district's list and the appointments are made on a rotating basis by alphabetical order. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 8, §200.1(e)(ii). If a particular IHO declines appointment or fails to respond to a request to serve within 24 hours or is unreachable after reasonable efforts, the next IHO on the list will be offered the appointment. N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 8, §200.1(e)(ii).

Question One: May a lawyer certified as an IHO also represent parents of students with disabilities in private practice?

The inquirer is considering applying to the New York State Commissioner of Education to be certified as an IHO, but desires to maintain a current practice of representing parents of students with disabilities. Although we see no need for a per se prohibition against a lawyer who acts as an IHO from also representing parents of disabled students before individual school districts, there are instances in which the inquirer would be precluded from representing parents of a disabled child in a particular matter or acting as an IHO.

Representing parents in a school district which includes the lawyer on its list of certified IHOs.

DR 1-102(A)(5) provides that a lawyer shall not engage in conduct that is prejudicial to the administration of justice. Canon 9 exhorts a lawyer to avoid even the appearance of impropriety. EC 8-8 states: "A lawyer who is a public officer . . . should not engage in activities in which the lawyer's personal or professional interests are or foreseeably may be in conflict with the lawyer's official duties." EC 9-1 provides: "Continuation of the American concept that we are to be governed by rules of law requires that the people have faith that justice can be obtained through our legal system. A lawyer should promote public confidence in our system and in the legal profession." See also EC 9-2 (improper conduct by lawyers erodes public confidence in the law); EC 9-4 (public confidence in legal system undermined by lawyer stating he or she can circumvent procedures designed to accomplish impartiality); EC 9-6 (every lawyer has a duty to uphold the integrity of the profession).

For the same lawyer to one day be an adjudicator and the next day be an advocate in the same school district presents an appearance of impropriety and is prejudicial to the administration of justice. The lawyer acting as an IHO is a part-time public official. If the lawyer could simultaneously represent clients in the same school district, positions the lawyer advocates for those clients could easily influence decisions made in the school district as an IHO, thereby bringing the lawyer's professional interests in conflict with the lawyer's official duties. The lawyer acting as both an adjudicator and an advocate in the same school district certainly would diminish the faith of the public that justice could be obtained in that school district and would not promote public confidence in either our system of justice or the legal profession. Consequently, if a lawyer who is on the list of IHOs for a particular county desires to represent clients in a school district within that county, he should arrange to have his or her name removed from the list for that school district.[33]

Related Proceedings

DR 9-101(B)(1) provides that a lawyer may not represent a private client in connection with a matter in which the lawyer participated personally and substantially as a public officer or employee. Similarly, DR 9-101(B)(3)(a) states that a lawyer serving as a public officer or employee shall not participate in a matter in which the lawyer participated personally and substantially while in private practice. Consequently, a lawyer could not represent the parents of a child if the lawyer previously was an IHO in a matter in another school district concerning the same child and disability. Similarly, a lawyer could not act as an IHO in the matter if in another school district the lawyer previously represented the parents of the child regarding his or her disability.

Matters involving other certified IHOs.

If a lawyer continues to represent parents of disabled students after being designated an IHO, there will be times when the lawyer will be representing those parents before other certified IHOs. There will also be matters in which a lawyer is acting as an IHO when other lawyers who are designated as IHOs may be representing private clients before the lawyer. We do not believe it is necessary for a lawyer to decline to represent a client in a particular matter merely because the IHO assigned to that matter may have appeared before the lawyer in a prior matter which is now concluded or may in the future appear before the lawyer. Similarly, we do not believe it necessary that a lawyer serving as an IHO recuse himself or herself in a matter merely because the lawyer appearing on behalf of the parents may in the past have served or may in the future serve as the IHO in a matter in which the first lawyer appeared or may appear as the lawyer.

However, it would be impermissible for one lawyer to be hearing a matter as the IHO when another lawyer in the matter is acting as an IHO in a matter in which the first lawyer is appearing on behalf of a party. It similarly would be impermissible for a lawyer to be representing parents in a hearing if the IHO is appearing before the lawyer in another matter in which the lawyer is the IHO. DR 5-101(A) provides that, as a general matter, a lawyer shall not accept or continue employment if the exercise of the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will be or reasonably may be affected by the lawyer's own business or personal interests. DR 8-101(A)(2) states that a lawyer holding public office shall not use the public position to influence or attempt to influence a tribunal to act in favor of a client and Canon 9 states that a lawyer should avoid even the appearance of professional 33 The Code of Judicial Conduct prohibits a part-time judge from practicing law in the court on which he or she serves, N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 22, §100.6(B)(2). However, the Code of Judicial Conduct does not apply "to administrative law judges unless adopted by the rules of the employing agency", N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 22, §100.6(C) (emphasis added). It is uncertain (1) if the term "administrative law judge" as used in the Code of Judicial Conduct encompasses IHOs certified by the Commissioner of Education, and (2) whether the Department of Education or the school district is the "employing agency" of IHOs. In any event, we are unaware of either the Department of Education or any school district having adopted the Code of Judicial Conduct. If the Code of Judicial Conduct is applicable, we believe that the group of all individuals certified by the Commissioner of Education to be IHOs does not constitute a "court" thereunder but that the group of IHOs designated on a list maintained by a particular school district does constitute a "court." See N.Y. State 543 (1982) (neither attorney who serves as hearing officer in proceedings to review small claims real property tax assessments nor the attorney's firm may represent private clients in such proceedings in the same jurisdiction); N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 22, §122.10(c), (d). Consequently, we would reach the same result under the Code of Judicial Conduct as we do under the Code of Professional Responsibility.

impropriety. Even though both lawyers may be of the highest integrity, the appearance of each acting as a judge while the other is acting as a lawyer in concurrent matters is too unseemly.

In such cases, it would be best for the IHO in the matter arising second to decline the matter so the private client need not find new counsel for the hearing.

Question Two: May a lawyer utilize the IHO certification in advertising?

It would not be improper for a lawyer to advertise certification as an IHO provided that the advertising is not false, deceptive or misleading. See DR 2-101(A).

DR 9-101(C) prohibits a lawyer from stating or implying that the lawyer is able to influence improperly or upon irrelevant grounds any tribunal or public official. Consequently, it would be improper for the lawyer to imply to any private client, whether through advertising or otherwise, that the lawyer's designation as an IHO would enable the lawyer in any way to influence a school district or another IHO.

CONCLUSION:

1. A lawyer certified as an IHO by the New York State Commissioner of Education to hear disputes between school districts and parents of students with disabilities regarding the identification, evaluation, or educational placement of students with disabilities may also in private practice represent the parents of students with disabilities in such hearings, but not (a) in any school district in which the lawyer acts as an IHO, (b) if the lawyer previously acted as an IHO in another school district concerning the same child and disability, or (c) in any matter in which the IHO is concurrently appearing as a lawyer in a matter in which the inquiring lawyer is acting as the IHO.

2. A lawyer may use in advertising the fact that the lawyer has been certified as an IHO.

TOPIC: Definition of "communication" with represented parties; knowledge of adverse party's representation by counsel; statement of client position as legal advice.

DIGEST: A lawyer representing a government agency in a civil matter may be present and counsel the lawyer's own client at a meeting with a person known to be represented in that matter without opposing counsel's consent, provided that the lawyer gives reasonable advance notice to opposing counsel of the lawyer's intention to attend and does not communicate with the opposing party. If a lawyer has a reasonable basis to believe that a person may be represented by counsel in a matter, the lawyer has a duty to inquire further. If a lawyer does not know that a person is represented by counsel in connection with a matter, and participates in a communication with such an unrepresented party, a lawyer's statement of a client's legal position in the matter does not constitute impermissible legal advice to an unrepresented person.

CODE: EC 7-18; DR 1-105(A), (B); DR 7-104(A), (B).

QUESTIONS:

1. May a lawyer representing a government agency attend meetings with non-lawyer representatives of a counter-party to a government contract he or she "knows" to be represented by counsel?

2. May the government lawyer who attends such a meeting advise the client representative during the meeting without consent of opposing counsel?

3. Without consent of opposing counsel, must the lawyer who attends the meeting remain silent during the course of the meeting or may the lawyer at least communicate the government's agency's legal position concerning the matter?

4. When a government lawyer attends such a meeting or receives inquiries from counter-parties regarding agency filing requirements, how does the lawyer determine whether he or she "knows" the counter-party is represented for purposes of DR 7-104?

5. If the government lawyer has determined that he or she does not "know" that the counter-party is represented in connection with the subject of a civil matter, does the lawyer's (a) statement to counter-parties of the government's legal position and/or (b) response to inquiries from counter-parties regarding agency filing requirements constitute impermissible legal advice to an unrepresented party?

OPINION:

Background

A lawyer is employed by a government agency to advise the agency on, among other things, its dealings with government contractors. This employment gives rise to two common circumstances in which the lawyer is asked to have direct contact with non-lawyer representatives of government contractors that employ lawyers in the ordinary course of conducting their business.

In the first of these circumstances, the government agency asks the lawyer to accompany the agency's contracting officers to meetings with representatives of government contractors. These counter-party representatives have the ability to bind their principal or to make statements that may properly be imputed to the principal. The meetings usually involve the exchange of information, rather than negotiation of the contracts, but the encounters may also concern resolution of contractual issues on which the parties disagree and discussion of contractual disputes in which the potential for litigation inheres. Normally, if counsel represents the government contractor in connection with the contractual issue, the contractor's counsel attends the meeting. On other occasions, however, the government contractor, though known to employ counsel, does not bring counsel to the meeting unless the prospect of litigation is likely. The government agency invites its own counsel to these meetings to facilitate the lawyer's advice to the agency (by enabling the lawyer to fully understand the contractor's issues) and/or to have the lawyer set forth the agency's legal position on the matter to the government contractor.

In the second recurring circumstance, the government lawyer receives questions from non-lawyer representatives of government contractors concerning the government agency's requirements for taking certain actions under the contracts, most typically about the kind of documentation the contractor must file with the agency to provide a legal basis for the agency's decision to approve or disapprove the proposed action. Ordinarily, the answers to these questions are clear – that is, the agency's legal position leaves no room for dispute about whether a document must be filed and what the document must say. A failure to file the documentation is certain to produce an unfavorable decision from the agency and there is no assurance that the agency will reach a favorable decision even if the contractor timely and properly completes and files the required documentation.

Committee's Scope of Analysis

This Committee's jurisdiction is limited solely to interpretation of the New York Code of Professional Responsibility and does not extend to resolving questions of law. See, e.g., N.Y. State 739 (2001). This inquiry may implicate various questions of state and federal law, including the laws and regulations of the agency in which a government lawyer serves, on which we offer no view. In addition, in the context of a federal government agency in which a lawyer may be rendering services beyond or outside the boundaries of this State, then the choice-of-law provisions of DR 1-105 may apply. In the event that a lawyer is licensed to practice solely in New York, then the New York Code of Professional Responsibility governs the lawyer's actions, DR 1-105(A), except in the context of the lawyer's conduct in proceedings before a court to which the lawyer is admitted, in which event the rules of the jurisdiction in which the court sits apply unless the court's rules otherwise provide, DR 1-105(B)(1). When a lawyer is admitted in more than one jurisdiction, DR 1-105(B) applies the ethical precepts of the jurisdiction in which the lawyer principally practices unless the predominant effect of the particular conduct at issue occurs in another jurisdiction in which the lawyer is licensed. DR 1-105(B)(2)(b). See N.Y. State 750 (2001) (when a lawyer is licensed in both New York and Illinois and principally practices in the latter, the ethical rules of Illinois apply, particularly when the conduct in issue occurred in Illinois). For purposes of this opinion, we assume that the New York Code of Professional Responsibility governs the conduct in question.

DR 7-104 of the Code prescribes the government lawyer's obligations in these circumstances. The rule says:

A. During the course of the representation of a client a lawyer shall not:

1. Communicate or cause another to communicate on the subject of the representation with a party the lawyer knows to be represented by a lawyer in that matter unless the lawyer has the prior consent of the lawyer representing such other party or is authorized by law to do so.

2. Give advice to a party who is not represented by a lawyer, other than the advice to secure counsel, if the interests of such party are or have a reasonable possibility of being in conflict with the interests of the lawyer's client.

B. Notwithstanding the prohibitions of DR 7-104(A), and unless prohibited by law, a lawyer may cause a client to communicate with a represented party, if that party is legally competent, and counsel the client with respect to those communications, provided the lawyer gives reasonable advance notice to the represented party's counsel that such communications will be taking place.

We may quickly pass on certain issues that DR 7-104(A)(1) raises in this situation. No question exists that, when a government lawyer is acting for an agency in attending meetings with or responding to inquiries by government contractors, the lawyer is doing so in the "course of the representation of a client." In circumstances involving a purely commercial transaction, DR 7-104(A)(1)'s use of the word "party" means any "person," including a party to a contract or other transaction, whether or not litigation looms. N.Y. State 735 (2001). If the agents of the counter-party at the meeting may speak for and bind their principal, the decision of the New York Court of Appeals in Niesig v. Team I, 558 N.E.2d 1030, 1035 (N.Y. 1990), instructs that such representatives are the principal and hence represented parties within the meaning of DR 7-104(A)(1). N.Y. State 652 (1993). As noted, whether a lawyer is "authorized by law" to communicate with a person the lawyer knows to be represented by counsel is not for us to decide. Subject to any such law, DR 7-104(A)(1) applies to government lawyers in a civil context because "a governmental unit has the same rights and responsibilities in a controversy as any other corporation or individual." N.Y. State 404 (1975) (quoting N.Y. State 160 [1970]); see N.Y. State 728 (2000).

Question One: May a lawyer representing a government agency attend meetings with non-lawyer representatives of a counter-party to a government contract he or she "knows" to be represented by counsel?

The question whether a lawyer's silent attendance at a conference between principals constitutes an improper "communication" under DR 7-104(A)(1) is an issue of first impression for this Committee, and our research has been unsuccessful in discovering other opinions, judicial or otherwise, directly addressing the question.

The Code does not define the word "communicate," but the plain and ordinary meanings of the word – to "impart," "convey," "inform," "transmit," or "make known," Webster's Third New International Dictionary (Unabridged) 460 (1993); see Black's Law Dictionary 253 (5th ed. 1979) – all presuppose some form of transmission of information. Accordingly, we believe that DR 7-04(A)(1) is intended to proscribe only those circumstances in which the lawyer transmits information – whether it be the government's legal position or negotiation of contractual points – to a person the lawyer knows to be represented by counsel.

Here, the avowed intent of the lawyer's silent attendance at meetings with contractors is to facilitate the lawyer's advice to the government agency about the matter. Such a circumstance falls within the parameters of DR 7-104(B), which regulates a lawyer's conduct in connection with communications between principals in a transaction. The Rule permits a lawyer to cause and counsel a client to engage in such discussions with a represented party, provided the lawyer gives opposing counsel reasonable advance notice. The object of this advance notice provision is to assure the represented party's lawyer the "opportunity to advise his or her own client with respect to the client-to-client communications before they take place." EC 7-18. Because client-to-client communication lacks a key element of DR 7-104(A)(1)'s concern – namely, that lawyers generally are in a better position, by education and training, to overwhelm a non-lawyer and exploit legal knowledge in the course of communicating directly with the non-lawyer – DR 7-104(B)'s requirement of reasonable advance notice is best seen as a guarantee of fairness in the course of dealings between parties represented by counsel. The Rule also prevents opposing counsel from exercising a veto over one party's decision to confer with counsel in connection with a principal-to-principal communication.

Thus, in our view, a lawyer may silently attend a meeting between principals provided the lawyer gives reasonable advance notice to opposing counsel of the lawyer's intention to attend the meeting.

Question Two: May the government lawyer who attends a meeting of principals advise the client representative during the meeting without consent of opposing counsel?

Having given reasonable advance notice of the lawyer's intention to attend the meeting, the government lawyer may provide advice to the government contracting officers before and during the meeting. We caution, however, that the government lawyer may not directly address or otherwise communicate with the opposing party during the meeting, and thus, in giving advice to the lawyer's own client during the meeting, the lawyer must do so at times and places and in a manner that does not amount to a communication by the lawyer to the opposing party. Whether avoidance of such improper communications requires that the lawyer's advice to the government clients during the meeting be given during breaks or otherwise outside the view and hearing of the opposing party will depend on the circumstances, the possibilities of which are too numerous to permit any meaningful fixed rule.

Question Three: Must the lawyer who attends a meeting of principals without opposing counsel's consent remain silent during the course of the meeting or may the lawyer at least communicate the government's agency's legal position concerning the matter?

We have no doubt that a statement of a client's legal position, without more, is within the common and ordinary meaning of the word "communicate" used in DR 7-104(A)(1). "The purpose of this well-established and respected rule is to preserve the proper functioning of the attorney-client relationship and to shield the adverse party from improper approaches." N.Y. State 607 (1990) (citing ABA 108 ([934]). Current authorities agree "that the rule is designed to prevent opposing counsel from impeding an attorney's performance and that the scope of the rule therefore extends even to well-intentioned approaches." American Bar Foundation, Annotated Code of Professional Responsi- bility, Comment, 332 (1979). Although the Rule may have its greatest impact in protecting against intrusive inquiries into the facts underlying a particular matter, its purpose is not confined to such protection. Even were the Rule limited to a discourse on facts, an interpretation we do not accept, a statement of legal position inescapably entails assumptions of fact. Hence, a lawyer's statement of a client's legal position in a matter, no matter how qualified, is a "communication" that DR 7-104(A)(1) proscribes if the other elements of the Rule are present.

Question Four: When a government lawyer attends a meeting of principals or receives inquiries from counter-parties regarding agency filing requirements, how does the lawyer determine whether he or she "knows" the counter-party is represented for purposes of DR 7-104?

DR 7-104(A)(1) applies only if the lawyer "knows" that the party is "represented by a lawyer in that matter." See N.Y. State 607 (1990). If a government lawyer knows that a party is represented by counsel in a civil matter, then the lawyer may not communicate with the party on the subject of that matter without such counsel's consent. Wisconsin Opinion 91-6. See N.Y. State 728 (2000). The mere fact that a lawyer knows that a corporation has an in-house legal staff, however, does not necessarily mean that a lawyer "knows" that a member of that staff is representing the corporation in that particular matter. Cf. N.Y. State 652 (1993) (that a government lawyer may represent an agency in connection with an enforcement proceeding or a permit application does not necessarily mean that the lawyer represents the agency in connection with the promulgation of rules that could potentially affect the outcome of the enforcement proceeding or permit process); Schmidt v. State, 722 N.Y.S.2d 623, 625 (N.Y. App. Div. 2000) ("[T]he State of New York is always represented by counsel," but this fact does not end the inquiry on whether counsel represents the State on the particular matter in issue).

We have previously opined that when a lawyer has a reasonable basis to believe that a party may be represented by counsel, then the lawyer has a duty of inquiry to ascertain whether that party is in fact represented by counsel in connection with a particular matter. N.Y. State 735 (2001); N.Y. State 728 (2000); N.Y. State 663 (1994). The necessary extent of such an inquiry will depend on the circumstances of a particular matter.

Owing to the diversity of facts in which the issue may arise, it is sufficient to say that DR 7-104(A)(1) requires, at a minimum, that, when a government lawyer has a reasonable basis to believe that a government contractor may be represented by counsel in connection with the subject of the meeting, then the government lawyer must make inquiry of the government contractor about whether a lawyer represents the contractor in the matter. Likewise, in the case of counter-party inquiries regarding agency filing requirements, prudence suggests that if the government lawyer has a reasonable basis to believe that counsel represents the government contractor in connection with the matter, then the lawyer must make inquiry about whether the contractor is indeed represented in such matter.

Question Five: Once a government lawyer has determined that he or she does not "know" the counter-party is represented in connection with the subject of a civil matter, does the lawyer's (a) statement of the government's legal position and/or (b) response to inquiries from counter-parties regarding agency filing requirements constitute impermissible legal advice to an unrepresented party?

The question whether a lawyer may state his or her agency's legal position in a meeting with unrepresented contractors or respond to their questions concerning the agency's filing requirements is governed by DR 7-104(A)(2)'s proscription against rendering legal advice (other than the advice to secure counsel) to parties not represented by counsel. That rule is intended to protect parties lacking counsel from receiving legal advice from a lawyer whose client's interests are or may be adverse to those of the unrepresented party. See N.Y. State 728 (2000); N.Y. State 650 (1993); N.Y. State 358 (1974); W.T. Grant Co. v. Haines, 531 F.2d 671, 676 (2d Cir. 1976); Croce v. Kurnit, 565 F. Supp. 884, 889-91 (S.D.N.Y. 1982).

Although the interests of the contractor are or have a reasonable possibility of being in conflict with the interests of the government agency within the meaning of DR 7-104(A)(2), we do not think the government lawyer's statements constitute impermissible legal advice to an unrepresented third party. Rather, the government attorney is stating the client agency's legal position to a third party. Such is especially apparent in the context of the meetings[34] with contractors, in which the lawyer's position as agency counsel is obvious.

This reasoning also applies to communications with government contractors concerning filing requirements in connection with applications for an agency's approval to take actions under the contracts. We are sensitive to the fact that such filings are often the responsibility of a contractor's non-legal personnel, and that DR 7-104(A)(1) need not be an impediment to the smooth operation of government in its dealings with contractors. If the government agency has appointed a lawyer as the person to describe its filing requirements (which presumably are non-negotiable) to government contractors, we do not think that the Rule requires contractors to use a lawyer in order to learn the government's requirements.[35]

CONCLUSION:

If a lawyer for a government agency knows that another lawyer represents the counter-party to a government contract in connection with that contract, then the government lawyer may attend meetings with non-lawyer representatives of the counter-party, provided reasonable advance notice is given to opposing counsel. Without consent of opposing counsel, the government lawyer may advise the lawyer's own client during the meeting, but may not communicate the government's position on the matter or otherwise negotiate with the counter-party.

When a government lawyer attends a meeting among principals or receives inquiries from counter-parties regarding agency filing requirements, in order to determine whether he or she "knows" that the counter-party is represented for purposes of DR 7-104 he or she must take account of all the relevant circumstances, including the parties' prior course of dealing. If a reasonable basis exists for believing that counsel represents a party on that matter, then the lawyer should make inquiry about whether the counter-party is indeed represented.

Once a lawyer has determined that he or she "knows" that a person is not represented by counsel in connection with a civil matter, and participates in a communication with such an unrepresented party, neither a lawyer's (a) statement to a counter-party of a client's legal position in the matter, nor (b) response to inquiries from such party regarding agency filing requirements, constitutes impermissible legal advice to an unrepresented person. However, should either type of communication involve something beyond ministerial matters, prudence suggests that the lawyer should remind the inquirer that the lawyer represents the government and that the contractor may wish to retain its own counsel in order to be advised on the issue.

34 We note in passing that a government lawyer's mere attendance at public speeches, continuing legal education programs and other public events at which a counter-party may be present without counsel does not give rise to the type of "communication" contemplated by DR 7-104.

35 Obviously the extent of permissible communications may be limited by considerations other than DR 7-104, e.g., "if it is known or learned that [the contractor's representatives] possess[] information that is protected by the corporation's attorney-client privilege or as attorney work product," N.Y. State 735 (2001), which a lawyer may not knowingly elicit, N.Y. State 700 (1998).

TOPIC: Representing client in transaction with entity proposing to lend against litigation proceeds

DIGEST: If proposed transaction with litigation financing company is legal, attorney may represent client in negotiating and carrying it out and may charge client an additional fee for this service.

CODE: EC 1-5; EC 5-1; EC 7-8. DR 1-102(A)(3); DR 1-106; DR 1-106(A)(3); DR 2-106(A), (B); DR 4-101(B), (C)(1); DR 5-101; DR 5-101(A); DR 5-103(B); DR 5-104(A); DR 5-107(A)(2); DR 7-102(A)(7), (8); DR 9-102(C).

QUESTION:

May an attorney who represents a client in a personal injury matter on a contingency basis also represent the client in a transaction with a litigation financing company that advances the client cash in return for a portion of any eventual settlement or judgment received by the client? If so, may the attorney charge the client a fee for this separate representation in addition to the contingent fee already agreed for the underlying representation?

OPINION:

Representation in the Financing Transaction

According to a recent column in the ABA Journal:

> The past several years have seen a dramatic increase in companies . . . that extend funding to plaintiffs . . . during the course of litigation. . . . What they offer is 'non-recourse' funding, meaning that if the case loses at trial or is overturned on appeal, the client is not obligated to reimburse the funder: The loan usually is at a very high rate of interest. Some companies collect a flat sum; others receive a percentage of any final award or settlement.

Eileen Libby, Whose Lawsuit Is It?: Ethics Opinions Express Mixed Attitudes About Litigation Funding Arrangements, 89 A.B.A. J. 36 (May 2003). In N.Y. State 666 (1994), we considered the question whether a lawyer could properly refer a client to such a company. Analyzing the question under DR 5-103(B), we concluded that since the lawyer would not be paying or advancing the funds, the mere referral would not violate that section of the Code. We warned of the dangers of compromising confidentiality in disclosing information to the lender and pointed out that the lawyer could not own an interest in the lending institution nor receive any fee or other compensation for the referral. Although we did not opine on the legality of the proposed transaction, we stated that if it was illegal it would be unethical for the lawyer to make the referral.

In response to the continued increase in such lawsuit financings and the de novo nature of the question at hand, this Committee hereby revisits the subject of litigation financing transactions. We start by pointing out that whether such a transaction is legal requires an analysis of various court rules, statutes and cases. In this connection we call the bar's attention to New York's longstanding rules prohibiting "maintenance," see, e.g., N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 22, §603.18 (2003); N.Y.

Judiciary Law §§488, 489 (Consol. 2003) (prohibiting the buying of claims by attorneys and corporations for the purpose of bringing an action thereon)[36]; N.Y. Gen. Oblig. Law § 13-101(1) (Consol. 2003) (prohibiting the transfer of a claim for damages for personal injury); N.Y. Gen. Oblig. Law § 13-103 (Consol. 2003) (permitting transfer of a judgment for a sum of money); and to New York cases distinguishing between a prohibited transfer of a claim and an assignment of its proceeds, see Grossman v. Schlosser, 19 A.D.2d 893 (1963); Neilson Realty Corp. v. Motor Vehicle Accident Indemnification Corp., 47 Misc. 2d 260 (N.Y. Sup. Ct. Spec. Term. 1965). We also note the recent decision of the Ohio Supreme Court holding that such arrangements constitute champerty and maintenance and thus are void and unenforceable against the borrower under Ohio law. Rancman v. Interim Settlement Funding Corp., 789 N.E.2d 217 (Ohio 2003).

As we stated in N.Y. State 666 (1994), we do not opine on the legality of the proposed financing transaction. If what is proposed is illegal, then it would be unethical for an attorney to recommend the action or assist the client in carrying it out. DR 1-102(A)(3) (lawyer shall not engage in illegal conduct that "adversely reflects on the lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness as a lawyer"); DR 7-102(A)(7) and (8) (lawyer representing client shall not "counsel or assist the client in conduct that the lawyer knows to be illegal or fraudulent" or "knowingly engage in . . . illegal conduct"); EC 1-5 ("[E]ven minor violations of law by a lawyer tend to lessen public confidence in the legal profession."); N.Y. State 479 (1978) (illegal conduct is "of course" unethical "with rare exceptions of inadvertent violations involving no moral turpitude"). On the other hand, if the transaction is legal, an attorney may properly assist the client in carrying it out, subject to several caveats.

As we pointed out in N.Y. State 666 (1994), the lawyer cannot own any interest in the financing institution; any such interest would be prohibited by the Code. See DR 1-106(A)(3) (lawyer-owner of entity providing non-legal services is subject to the Code if client could reasonably believe such services are part of the attorney-client relationship); DR 5-101(A) (lawyer's financial interests must not interfere with representation); DR 5-104(A) (requirements for lawyer entering into business transaction with client); s*ee also* N.Y. State 752 (2002) (upholding past opinions barring a lawyer's provision of certain legal and nonlegal services in same transaction, even with consent of client). The lawyer cannot receive any compensation from the financial institution because DR 5-107(A)(2) states that without informed client consent, a lawyer cannot be paid "anything of value related to his or her representation of . . . the client" from "one other than the client". Furthermore, the lawyer may not permit the financing institution to in any way affect the exercise of the lawyer's independent professional judgment on behalf of the client. EC 5-1. See also Florida Opinion 00-3 (2002).

Depending on the circumstances the lawyer could have a personal interest in respect of the financing transaction that reasonably could affect the exercise of the lawyer's independent professional judgment on behalf of the client and give rise to a conflict of interest under DR 5-101. For example, the lawyer may be disposed to propose the financing transaction to assure that advances of litigation expenses made on behalf of an impecunious client will be repaid. Or the lawyer may wish to tout the ability to refer clients to the financing institution as a means of attracting clients. On the flip side, the lawyer may view such a transaction as potentially disadvantageous to the lawyer's own interests, resulting in the opposite influence on the exercise of the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client. For example, the transaction may impose duties on the lawyer under DR 9-102(C), see N.Y. State 717 (1999) (plaintiff's attorney should pay holder of lien from settlement proceeds unless client disputes amount or validity of lien), with the possibility of liability if the lawyer pays out money in disregard of the financing institution's right to a portion of the funds received, see Leon v. Martinez, 84 N.Y.2d 83 (1994). Or the transaction might be viewed by the lawyer as likely to reduce the client's incentive to cooperate or settle the case, see Florida Opinion 00-3 (2002). If any of these or similar circumstances exist, the lawyer should not undertake the representation in the financing transaction without satisfying the requirements of disclosure and consent set out in DR 5-101(A).

Because the financing institution will likely insist on receiving considerable information about the underlying claim in order to evaluate whether and on what terms to enter into the transaction, the lawyer must be careful not to compromise confidentiality in disclosing information to the financing institution without the informed consent of the client. See DR 4-101(B), (C)(1). The lawyer should advise the client that disclosures of confidential information to the financing institution might compromise the attorney-client privilege, see generally Paul R. Rice, Attorney-Client Privilege in the United States, § 9 (2d ed. 1999), and might therefore cause the information to be available to an adverse party in discovery.

In representing the client in connection with the proposed transaction,[37] the attorney should determine whether he or she may have additional professional obligations stemming from the expansion in the scope of the representation. As a preliminary matter, the attorney should determine whether a new or updated letter of engagement may be required under N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 22, §1215.1-.2 (2003) when the lawyer undertakes a new matter for which the fee is expected to be $3000 or more. In addition, EC 7-8 provides in pertinent part that:

> A lawyer should exert best efforts to ensure that decisions of the client are made only after the client has been informed of relevant considerations. A lawyer ought to initiate this decision-making process if the client does not do so. Advice of a lawyer to the client need not be confined to purely legal considerations. A lawyer should advise the client of the possible effect of each legal alternative. A lawyer should bring to bear upon this decision-making process the fullness of his or her experience as well as the lawyer's objective viewpoint.

The lawyer should consider that an unsophisticated client may reasonably assume that by facilitating the transaction, the lawyer is also endorsing the entering into of the proposed transaction and/or the terms thereof. To address this possibility, the lawyer must either disclaim such responsibility, see N.Y. City 2001-03 ("[T]he scope of a lawyer's representation of a client may be limited in order to avoid a conflict"), or advise the client of the costs and benefits of the proposed transaction, as well as possible alternative courses of action. We note that such arrangements may carry extremely high rates of interest. See Rancman v. Interim Settlement Funding Corp., 789 N.E.2d 217 (Ohio 2003)

37 Throughout this Opinion, we are assuming that an existing client in a personal injury matter is seeking representation in connection with a potential financing of litigation claims. Many of the concerns we express herein would be inapplicable if the client had already entered into a final agreement with the financing institution and the attorney was merely being asked to assist in carrying out its terms.

(financing transaction had return exceeding 180 percent per year). Plainly, such lenders might be in a position to take unfair advantage of a client in dire need of cash. We also note that The Florida Bar has gone so far as to discourage the use of such advance funding companies, pointing out that they may create a disincentive for the client to cooperate in the prosecution or settlement of the case and that the harsh terms of the arrangements would rarely be in the client's best interests. See Florida Opinion 00-3 (2002).

Charging the Client an Additional Fee for Assisting in the Financing Transaction

In addressing this question, we assume that the original contingent fee agreement with the client only contemplated representation in the underlying personal injury matter and did not anticipate or include the proposed transaction with the financing company. In that circumstance, the attorney's work in connection with this transaction would be a new and different matter for which the attorney may appropriately charge a separate fee. Under DR 2-106(A) that fee must not be "excessive"; DR 2-106(B) lists a number of factors to be considered in determining whether a fee is excessive. Furthermore, in calculating the legal fees for this representation, the attorney must avoid any violation of the Appellate Division Rules regarding maximum fees in personal injury cases. See, e.g., N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 22, §603.7(e) (2003). Whether the money received from the financing institution would constitute a "sum recovered" under those rules is a question of law on which we do not opine. In any event, the attorney must ensure that the total fee does not violate any of the Rules of the Appellate Division by exceeding the maximum amounts specified therein.

CONCLUSION:

Subject to the caveats expressed herein, an attorney who represents a client in a personal injury matter may undertake to represent the client in a transaction with a litigation financing company that advances the client cash in return for a portion of any eventual settlement or judgment received by the client. The attorney may charge the client a fee for such representation in addition to the contingent fee agreed to for the underlying representation.

TOPIC: Plea bargains; donations as part of agreed sentence

DIGEST: If probable cause supports a charge, and if all terms of the sentence are legal, a prosecutor may agree to a plea bargain in which the defendant is required to make a donation: (1) to the statutory program known as STOP-DWI, as long as the district attorney is not also "coordinator" of the county's STOP-DWI program; or (2) to a not-for-profit organization, as long as the prosecutors handling or supervising the case do not have a "personal interest" in the organization that reasonably may affect their judgment; they do not know that any lawyer in the district attorney's office has such an interest; and the donation to the organization does not create an appearance of impropriety. A prosecutor may agree that such donations may be made before the plea is entered, and in exchange for a dismissal of, or an agreement not to bring, charges. Under no circumstances may a prosecutor conceal the terms of the plea bargain from the sentencing court.

EC 1-5; EC 5-1; EC 7-13

QUESTIONS:

This opinion discusses plea bargains in which a criminal defendant agrees, as part of the sentence, to make a financial donation that is not expressly authorized by statute. The five specific questions considered are as follows:

(1) As part of a plea bargain in which a defendant charged with driving while intoxicated or driving while ability impaired (either charge hereafter "DWI") will plead guilty to a lesser charge, may a prosecutor agree that the negotiated sentence will include a donation by the defendant to the county's STOP-DWI program? [38] Would the answer be different if the district attorney were the coordinator of the county's STOP-DWI program?

(2) More generally, as part of a plea bargain, may a prosecutor agree that the negotiated sentence will include a donation by the defendant to a not-for-profit organization? If so, must the organization be without "ties" to the district attorney's office?

(3) May a prosecutor agree not to bring charges, or to dismiss charges, against a person on condition that the person make a donation to a not-for-profit organization?

(4) As part of a plea bargain that includes a donation by the defendant to a not-for-profit organization, may a prosecutor require that the donation be made before the plea is entered to ensure that the defendant will live up to that part of the bargain?

38 N. Y. Veh. & Traf. Law §1197 authorizes each county to establish and operate a STOP-DWI program, as further described below.

(5) As part of a plea bargain that includes a donation by the defendant to a not-for-profit organization, may a prosecutor agree that the terms of the agreement concerning the donation will not be disclosed to the sentencing judge?

OPINION:

Introduction

All plea bargaining is subject to ethical constraints. Under DR 7-103(A), "A public prosecutor . . . shall not institute or cause to be instituted criminal charges when he or she knows or it is obvious that the charges are not supported by probable cause." Under EC 7-13, "The responsibility of a public prosecutor . . . is to seek justice, not merely to convict." A prosecutor, therefore, should not seek a plea to reduced charges unless there is probable cause to believe that the defendant has committed an offense. If there is no such probable cause, the proper disposition is a dismissal. See Cowles v. Brownell, 73 N.Y.2d 382, 387 (1989) (if defendant is innocent or the case is unprovable, prosecutor is under an ethical obligation to drop the charges without exacting any price for doing so).

This Committee does not opine on questions of law and, therefore, expresses no opinion on whether the possible plea bargains discussed herein are legally permissible.[39] It is the prosecutor's responsibility to determine whether the proposed dispositions are legal in each case. If a disposition would be illegal, it would also be unethical. See DR 1-102(A)(3) (lawyer shall not engage in illegal conduct that "adversely reflects on the lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness as a lawyer"); DR 7-102(A)(7) and (8) (lawyer representing client shall not "counsel or assist the client in conduct that the lawyer knows to be illegal or fraudulent" or "knowingly engage in . . . illegal conduct"); EC 1-5 ("[E]ven minor violations of law by a lawyer tend to lessen public confidence in the legal profession."); N.Y. State 479 (1978) (illegal conduct is "of course" unethical "with rare exceptions of inadvertent violations involving no moral turpitude").

First question: plea bargain requiring a donation to STOP-DWI

STOP-DWI is a statutory program, which a county may elect to establish pursuant to N.Y. Veh. & Traf. Law §1197 ("Section 1197"). The county designates the "coordinator" of the program and may fix his or her salary and expenses. Section 1197 further provides that if a county has estab-

39 The New York Penal Law, Vehicle and Traffic Law and Civil Practice Law and Rules authorize a variety of monetary penalties and forfeitures upon conviction of an offense. We do not find a reported New York judicial decision on the question of whether a sentence for an offense may include a non-statutory payment in lieu of an authorized monetary penalty. It is clear that a sentence of incarceration that exceeds an authorized term is illegal, even if part of a plea bargain. See, e.g., People v. Cameron, 83 N.Y.2d 838 (1994); Kisloff ex rel. Wilson v. Covington, 73 N.Y.2d 445 (1989). It is unclear whether a waiver of appeal that explicitly waives the illegality of a sentence is enforceable. See People v. Muniz, 91 N.Y.2d 570 (1998). A sentence promise may be conditioned upon the defendant's prior fulfillment of various obligations that are not expressly authorized by statute. See, e.g., People v. Avery, 85 N.Y.2d 503 (1995) (completion of drug rehabilitation program); People v. Fiumefreddo, 82 N.Y.2d 536 (1993) (linking of codefendants' pleas); People v. Anonymous, 758 N.Y.S.2d 806 (N.Y. App. Div. 2003) (cooperation agreement); People v. Anonymous, 757 N.Y.S.2d 847 (N.Y. App. Div. 2003) (same); People v. Lopez, 290 A.D.2d 323 (2003) (same).

lished a STOP-DWI program, fines and forfeitures collected within that county for certain driving-related offenses must be deposited in a STOP-DWI account controlled by the chief fiscal officer of the county. [40]

The first question posits a plea bargain in which the defendant pleads guilty to a charge reduced from DWI, and in which the reduced charge is not within Section 1197's list of charges whose monetary penalties are paid over to STOP-DWI. May a prosecutor agree that the negotiated sentence on the reduced charge will include a donation by the defendant to the county's STOP-DWI program?

We see no ethical objection to a plea bargain in which, as part of a sentence to a lesser charge, the defendant agrees to make a payment that would have been authorized by law as a penalty for the original charge, as long as the payment is a legally permissible term of the sentence to the lesser charge and the original charge was supported by probable cause.

We believe the answer to the question would be different, however, if the district attorney were also the coordinator of the county's STOP-DWI program. In that situation, the district attorney's dual role would create both a conflict of interest and the appearance that he or she may not be exercising prosecutorial authority in a disinterested manner.

Under Section 1197 the STOP-DWI coordinator is appointed by an officer of the county, is paid salary and expenses fixed by the county, and serves at the pleasure of the appointing body or officer. Among the duties of the coordinator are organizing the STOP-DWI program and making recommendations to the county for the program's funding. The STOP-DWI coordinator is directed by the statute to "coordinate the efforts of interested parties and agencies engaged in alcohol traffic safety, law enforcement, adjudication, rehabilitation and preventive education."

As a practical matter these provisions mean that a STOP-DWI coordinator must create and implement a plan that involves, among others, the local police, the prosecutors, and the courts, and must recommend the budget therefor. The money that funds STOP-DWI, as mentioned above, comes at least in part from monetary penalties levied in DWI cases prosecuted by the county's district attorney.

Prosecutors have a duty to "seek justice." EC 7-13. "This role imposes a responsibility on prosecutors not only to ensure the fairness of the process by which a criminal conviction is attained, but also to avoid the public perception that criminal proceedings are unfair." N. Y. State 683 (1996). "When it is possible to do so . . . prosecutors, like judges, must take reasonable steps to avoid professional and personal activities that will interfere with their ability to serve in a disinterested fashion." Id.

40 Paragraph (1)(a) of Section 1197 mandates that fines, forfeitures and other penalties imposed for aggravated driving without a license pursuant to N.Y. Veh. & Traf. Law §§511(3)(a)(i) and 511(2)(a)(ii) and (iii); driving while intoxicated and driving while ability impaired pursuant to N.Y. Veh. & Traf. Law §§1192, 1192-a, 1193 and 1194-a; and vehicular assault and vehicular manslaughter pursuant to N.Y. Penal Law §§120.03, 120.04, 125.12 and 125.13 be paid over to STOP-DWI. Section 1197 does not require that fines levied pursuant to other traffic offenses, such as driving without a license or in violation of a license restriction pursuant to N. Y. Veh. & Traf. Law §509, be paid over to STOP-DWI.

DR 5-101(A) states that a lawyer "shall not accept or continue employment if the exercise of professional judgment on behalf of the client will be or reasonably may be affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property, or personal interests . . . ." DR 5-105(B) states that a lawyer shall withdraw from representation of multiple clients if the exercise of independent professional judgment in behalf of a client will be or is likely to be affected by the lawyer's continued representation of the other client, or if it would be likely to involve the lawyer in representing differing interests. [41] Section 3-1.3(a) of the ABA's Criminal Justice Standards (1992) states that a "prosecutor should avoid a conflict of interest with respect to his or her official duties." Section 7.1 of the National District Attorneys Association's National Prosecution Standards (1991) states that a "prosecutor should avoid interests and activities which are likely to appear to, or in fact do, conflict with the duties and responsibilities of the prosecutor's office."

If a district attorney were to maintain a dual role as the county's public prosecutor and as the county's STOP-DWI coordinator she would contravene these principles. As district attorney he or she has authority to seek monetary penalties as part of sentences, including plea bargains; as STOP-DWI coordinator his or her program and budget roles give him or her a say in the way the resulting funds are spent. This particular arrangement, in which the district attorney holds a second public office, confers authority that a disinterested prosecutor should not have.

In general, there is no ethical principle barring a district attorney from carrying out his or her legally mandated duties on the ground that a benefit to the office may thereby result. Indeed, it is necessary that a district attorney carry out these duties, as she is the official who is authorized to act.[42] For example, a district attorney may pursue a forfeiture action pursuant to CPLR article 13A, which specifically authorizes, under defined circumstances, the district attorney's retention of forfeited vehicles and the reimbursement of the district attorney's expenses, including a proportion of attorney and other salaries. N.Y. CPLR § 1349 (Consol. 2003).

It is not necessary, on the other hand, for the district attorney to hold two offices. If the power of the second office, in this case the office of STOP-DWI coordinator, allows the district attorney to exercise authority over funds collected in criminal proceedings to benefit the first office, there is both a conflict of interest and the appearance that the exercise of authority as prosecutor may not be disinterested. The conflict is that the same person serves two masters: as prosecutor the district attorney's mandate is to "do justice" in each case, but as coordinator of STOP-DWI he or she serves the financial and other needs of the STOP-DWI program. The appearance problem is that the prosecutor's ability to make STOP-DWI budget recommendations to benefit his or her own office may appear to be an incentive to take dispositions that will pay for those budget allocations. Alternatively, STOP-DWI budget recommendations that benefit the police or court personnel could be perceived as a means of 41 Under DR 5-101(A) and DR 5-105(C) the lawyer with the conflict may determine that "a disinterested lawyer would believe" the representation would not be adversely affected and, if so, may proceed with the representation upon obtaining the client's informed consent to the conflict. Even if the conflict in the present inquiry were "consentable" under these rules, it is not clear from whom the prosecutor could obtain consent. When a government or government agency is a client it may consent to a conflict. N. Y. State 629 (1992). However, the district attorney under the circumstances presented here is not the client and cannot waive his or her own conflict.

42 This is analogous to the rule of necessity that allows an elected district attorney to campaign for himself or herself, even though not allowed to engage in active campaigning for others. N. Y. State 675 (1995).

gaining favor with branches of government from whom the district attorney should remain independent.[43]

Therefore, we believe that a district attorney cannot serve as coordinator of STOP-DWI. Our conclusion applies to any criminal proceeding prosecuted by a district attorney's office in which one of the possible outcomes is a payment to STOP-DWI. The district attorney's dual role is problematic in all such situations. Conversely, if there were no dual role, it would be ethically permissible for a district attorney's office to include in a plea agreement (or to request after conviction at trial) a monetary penalty resulting in a payment to STOP-DWI. This would continue to be permissible even if the county used STOP-DWI funds for the district attorney's office or other law enforcement purposes.

Second question: plea bargain requiring donation to not-for-profit organization

Is it ethical for a prosecutor to agree in a plea bargain that the defendant will make a donation to a not-for-profit organization as part of the negotiated sentence? If so, must the organization be without "ties" to the district attorney's office?[44]

If the proposed donation would be a legally permissible component of the sentence, it would be ethically permissible as long as the prosecutors handling or supervising the case do not have a "personal interest" in the organization that reasonably may affect their judgment; they do not know that any lawyer in the district attorney's office has such an interest; and the use of the organization does not create an appearance of impropriety.

DR 5-101(A) states that a lawyer "shall not accept or continue employment if the exercise of professional judgment on behalf of the client will be or reasonably may be affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property, or personal interests . . . ." Under EC 5-1, "The professional judgment of a lawyer should be exercised . . . free of compromising influences and loyalties." Section 3-1.3(f) of the ABA's Criminal Justice Standards (1992) provides, "A prosecutor should not permit his or her professional judgment or obligations to be affected by his or her own political, financial, business, property, or personal interests." Section 7.3(d) of the National District Attorneys Association's National Prosecution Standards (1991) provides, "The prosecutor should avoid any private interests, financial or otherwise, which may affect his professional judgment in the exercise of the duties and responsibilities of the prosecutor's office."

43 On the other hand, a district attorney, as an elected government official, is certainly not precluded from making recommendations to local or state or federal government concerning law enforcement expenditures. In our opinion there is a difference between an elected prosecutor who makes such recommendations as part of the well-accepted political tug of war over budgets and a prosecutor who holds two government offices, each of which can be used to benefit the other.

44 As there does not appear to be any provision in New York law authorizing a sentence that includes such a donation we emphasize again that it is up to the district attorney to determine whether the inclusion of such a donation in a sentence is legal (see footnote 39). Moreover, the legality of a contribution to a not-for-profit organization as part of a sentence may depend on, among other things, considerations arising under the First Amendment. For example, requiring a contribution to a religious organization may well make the plea agreement illegal. See Jane Doe v. D'Amelia, 81 F.3d 1204 (2d Cir. 1996), in which the Second Circuit held that a plea agreement requiring the defendant to make a sworn statement in church as a condition of a dismissal of charges subjected the prosecutor to suit under 42 U.S.C. §1983 for violating the defendant's First Amendment rights. A contribution to an organization advocating a political position would be out of bounds as well. See N.Y. State 675 (1995) ("In a number of opinions, this Committee has expressed the view that 'there is a basic incompatibility between the duties of a public prosecutor and partisan policics.'") (quoting N.Y. State 513 [1979]).

A "personal interest" or "private interest" in this context is not limited to an interest that produces financial benefits. The not-for-profit organization in the question under consideration might be one to which the prosecutor devotes significant time or contributes significant sums of money. The prosecutor's spouse or other close relative might be an officer or director of the organization. Such a situation might bring the organization within the prosecutor's "personal interests," even if a contribution to it pursuant to a plea bargain would not be of financial benefit to her. See Roy D. Simon, Jr., Simon's New York Code of Professional Responsibility Annotated 454-56 (Thomason/West 2003).

If a prosecutor has a personal interest in the organization to which a donation will be made pursuant to a plea bargain, DR 5-101(A) directs the prosecutor to determine whether his or her exercise of professional judgment would likely be affected thereby. Not all personal interests in not-for-profit organizations are likely to affect professional judgment. Small contributions of time or money to an organization might not, without more, be sufficiently important personal interests to affect a prosecutor's judgment. Even somewhat larger contributions of time or money might not by themselves be likely to affect professional judgment if made to organizations that are so broadly based as to be "generic," such as the United Way or the Red Cross. Whether a prosecutor's involvement with an organization is likely to affect his or her judgment will depend on the nature, size and scope of the prosecutor's involvement as well as the nature, size and scope of the organization. See id. at 454-56. If the prosecutor directly handling the case does have a personal interest in the not-for-profit-organization that likely would affect his or her professional judgment, then a contribution to that organization should not be part of the plea bargain.[45]

If there are other lawyers in the prosecutor's office with a personal interest in the not-for-profit organization, should those interests likewise require that the organization in question be left out of the proposed plea bargain? Certainly if there is another lawyer in the office, such as a supervisor, whose professional judgment is brought to bear on the proposed plea bargain, and who has a personal interest in the organization sufficient to affect that judgment, then the organization should be left out of the plea bargain.

Should the organization be excluded from the plea bargain if there is another lawyer in the office with a personal interest in the organization but who is not involved in the case? DR 5-105(D) disqualifies any lawyer in a firm from "knowingly" accepting or continuing a matter if any other lawyer in the firm would be disqualified under DR 5-101(A). This rule of imputed disqualification is not applicable to a prosecutor's office under all circumstances. The New York Court of Appeals has held that imputed disqualification will not be applied to a district attorney's office unless necessary to protect a defendant from "actual prejudice arising from a demonstrated conflict of interest or a substantial risk of an abuse of confidence." People v. English, 88 N.Y.2d 30, 33-34 (1996) (quoting Matter of Schumer v. Holtzman, 60 N.Y.2d 46, 55 [1983]). In English the Court held that the absence of contact or opportunity for contact between the conflicted attorney and the prosecutors handling the defendant's case in a "'huge' metropolitan" district attorney's office militated against imputed disqualification. See also Matter of Morgenthau v. Crane, 113 A.D.2d 20 (1985) (large metropolitan district attorney's office held not disqualified even though an assistant district attorney, who had been screened from case, was first cousin of defendant). Therefore, as a general matter, whether the attorneys in a district attorney's office should be disqualified by imputation under DR 5-105(D) turns on whether the standard set forth in English has been met under the circumstances of the case.

45 As discussed above in footnote 41, although DR 5-101(A) provides for a client's informed consent to a conflict, we do not believe such consent to be available under the circumstances presented.

In the question under consideration, as mentioned above, any impermissible conflict may be cured by leaving the proposed organization out of the plea bargain. The disqualification of attorneys or of an entire prosecutor's office is not necessary. For that reason, and despite English, our opinion is that the organization should be left out of the plea bargain if the prosecutors handling or supervising the plea know that another attorney within the district attorney's office would be disqualified under DR 5-101(A) from using that organization in a plea bargain.

If the prosecutor does not know of another lawyer in the office who has a "personal interest" in the not-for-profit organization sufficient to trigger DR 5-101(A), must he or she nevertheless investigate whether there is such a lawyer? Neither DR 5-101(A) nor DR 5-105(D) by its terms so requires.[46] However, one may envision a situation in which another lawyer's connection to an organization, though not known to the prosecutors handling the plea, would make it unseemly for the organization to be included in the plea. For example, it may be that the district attorney is the chair and chief fund raiser for the organization contemplated for the plea. Using the organization as the recipient of the donation called for in the plea bargain would certainly create an appearance of impropriety.

Although the concept of appearance of impropriety lacks precise boundaries, it is our opinion that at a minimum the district attorney must be free of a significant "personal interest" in the situation posed. Therefore, the prosecutors handling the case must at a minimum determine whether the district attorney has a "personal interest" in an organization sufficient to create an appearance of impropriety if the organization were to be the recipient of a donation as part of a plea bargain. As discussed above, the nature, size and scope of both the organization and the district attorney's involvement must be considered.

Whether checking is required with respect to other attorneys in the district attorney's office in order to prevent an appearance of impropriety will depend on all the facts and circumstances. Factors to be considered are the size of the office; whether there are other high officials in the office whose personal interests would create an appearance of impropriety; and whether there are lawyers within the office whose involvement with an organization are so well known that use of the organization would create an appearance of impropriety. As a general matter, inquiry should be made of those lawyers personally and substantially involved in the case.

Third question: nonprosecution or dismissal in exchange for donation

Is it ethical for a district attorney to make an agreement not to bring charges, or to dismiss pending charges, against a person on condition that the person make a donation to a not-for-profit organization?

Such an agreement is clearly not ethical unless there is probable cause that the person committed an offense. If probable cause is lacking the proper disposition is either a dismissal or a decision not to bring charges in the first place, and no concessions may be extracted in exchange therefor. Cowles v. Brownell, 73 N.Y.2d at 387; DR 7-103(A).

46 DR 5-105(E) requires that law firms have a system for recording and checking "engagements" in order to avoid conflicts. Whether such a system may have relevance to a district attorney's office for other situations we do not decide. We believe that it should not be applied by analogy to the question under consideration.

As always, the question of whether the agreement is legal must be decided by the district attorney. Furthermore, as discussed above, the lawyers in the district attorney's office should be without known "personal interests" in the organization.

Section 3-3.8(a) of the ABA's Criminal Justice Standards (1992) provides in part, "The prosecutor should consider in appropriate cases the availability of noncriminal disposition, formal or informal, in deciding whether to press criminal charges which would otherwise be supported by probable cause . . . ." We do not find anything in the New York Code of Professional Responsibility that contradicts this guideline, although it does not indicate just what may be required of the defendant in exchange for nonprosecution. [47] We conclude that if, as discussed at length above, a donation may ethically be required in exchange for a reduction of charges, the same donation may ethically be required in exchange for a dismissal of, or an agreement not to bring, those charges.[48] We perceive no ethical principle that a guilty plea to some offense is a required condition to the resolution of a potential criminal action.

Fourth question: requiring that the donation be made before the plea

In a plea bargain requiring a defendant to make a donation to a not-for-profit organization, is it ethical to require that the donation be made before the plea is entered, to ensure that the defendant will live up to that part of the bargain? We do not see such prepayment raising any ethical issues other than those discussed above. See People v Avery, 85 N.Y.2d 503 (1995) (permitting deferral of sentence until after defendant completes drug rehabilitation program).

Fifth question: nondisclosure of the donation to the sentencing judge

May the district attorney agree that the terms of the plea bargain concerning the donation to the not-for-profit organization will not be disclosed to the sentencing judge?

It is unethical to conceal a material term of a criminal disposition from the court that will ultimately rule on and embody in a judgment the disposition proposed. DR 1-102(A)(4) provides that a lawyer shall not "engage in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit, or misrepresentation." DR 7-102(A)(3) provides that a lawyer shall not "conceal or knowingly fail to disclose that which a lawyer is required by law to reveal." See Morrissey v. Virginia State Bar, 448 S.E.2d 615 (Va. 1994) (prosecutor's concealment of, among other things, material term of plea – a $25,000 charitable contribution – from trial court held violation of Virginia's DR 1-102[A][4]).

47 The potential boundaries of the reciprocal agreement are not unlimited. See Cowles v. Brownell, 73 N.Y.2d 382 (1989) (disapproving agreement dismissing criminal charges in exchange for defendant's agreement not to bring lawsuit against municipality in which defendant was arrested); cf. Town of Newton v. Rumery, 480 U.S. 386 (1987) (permitting a similar agreement under circumstances there presented).

48 There is a material difference in New York procedure between a dismissal of charges and a decision not to bring charges. A dismissal must be made on motion and determined by the court, and therefore the terms of and reasons for the dismissal are reviewed by a judge. On the other hand, a prosecutor's decision not to bring charges is not subject to judicial review or approval. If the nonprosecution agreement under consideration is an agreement not to bring charges, the prosecutor may arguably have an added ethical burden of appearing to be fair, as no court oversight is involved.

In the context of the issues discussed in this opinion it seems clear that the donation is a material term of the proposed plea bargains – if for no other reason than that there is always a question as to whether such a term is legal. The determination of that question may well vary from case to case, depending on the specific facts of the proposed donation. Certainly the court must have the opportunity to review the terms of the plea bargain, including the proposed donation. Every New York court is charged with the responsibility of determining the appropriateness of every sentence it imposes, even if the sentence is embodied in a plea bargain. See People v. Farrar, 52 N.Y.2d 302 (1981).

CONCLUSION:

If probable cause supports a charge, and if all terms of the sentence are legal, a district attorney may agree to a plea bargain in which the defendant is required to make a donation: (1) to the statutory program known as STOP-DWI, as long as the district attorney is not also "coordinator" of the county's STOP-DWI program; or (2) to a not-for-profit organization, as long as the prosecutors handling or supervising the case do not have a "personal interest" in the organization that reasonably may affect their judgment; they do not know that any lawyer in the district attorney's office has such an interest; and the donation to the organization does not create an appearance of impropriety. A prosecutor may agree that such donations may be made before the plea is entered, and in exchange for a dismissal of, or an agreement not to bring, charges. Under no circumstances may a prosecutor conceal the terms of the plea bargain from the sentencing court.

OPINION 771 (11/14/2003)

TOPIC: Website advertising, client testimonials and reports of past results.

MODIFIES: N.Y. State 614 (1990), N.Y. State 539 (1982)

DIGEST: A website advertisement that uses client testimonials or reports of past results is prohibited under DR 2-101(A) if the advertisement creates unjustified expectations, contains insufficient information, or is otherwise false, deceptive or misleading. If the client testimonials or reports of past results are not false, deceptive or misleading, a lawyer need not post a disclaimer that past results do not guarantee similar outcomes in future cases. If the advertisement is false or deceptive, a disclaimer cannot cure the false or deceptive nature of the advertisement. If client testimonials or reports of past results are misleading, an appropriate disclaimer may be sufficient to correct the misleading nature of the advertisement if the disclaimer is prominently placed in the website such that a lawyer reasonably would expect that any prospective client who reads the advertisement will read the disclaimer.

CODE: DR 2-101, 2-101(A), (B), (F), 2-102, 2-102(D); EC 2-10.

QUESTION:

If a law firm's website includes client testimonials and claims of past results as part of its advertising, must the website include a disclaimer that past results do not guarantee similar outcomes in future cases to satisfy the firm's obligations under DR 2-101(A)?

OPINION:

The Lawyer's Code of Professional Responsibility (the "Code") permits advertising and other publicity by lawyers provided that it is not false, deceptive or misleading. DR 2-101(A).[49] See also DR 2-102 (ethical requirements regarding professional cards, announcements, letterhead, trade names, etc.); EC 2-10 (in lawyer advertising, "special care should be taken to avoid the use of any statement or claim which is false, misleading, deceptive or unfair"); Bates v. State Bar of Arizona, 433 U.S. 350, 383 (1977) ("Advertising that is false, deceptive, or misleading of course is subject to restraint."); In re Von Wiegen, 63 N.Y.2d 163 (1984) (prohibition against direct mail advertising was an unconstitutional, content-based restriction because a less-restrictive alternative was available to prevent deception), cert. denied sub nom. Comm. on Prof'l Standards v. Von Wiegen, 472 U.S. 1007 (1985). In N.Y. State 709 (1998), this Committee concluded that Internet website advertising is permissible as long as it is not false, deceptive or misleading and otherwise complies with the advertising

49 DR 2-101(A) provides that "A lawyer . . . shall not use or disseminate . . . any public communication or communication to a prospective client containing statements or claims that are false, deceptive or misleading."

rules set forth in the Code. See also Model Rules of Prof'l Conduct R. 7.2 cmt. 3 (2004) ("electronic media, such as the Internet, can be an important source of information about legal services").[50]

The Code does not prohibit the use of client testimonials or reports of past results in advertisements. We observed previously that client testimonials have the potential to mislead an "unsophisticated potential client," but declined to adopt a per se rule prohibiting the use of client testimonials in advertising. N.Y. State 614 (1990). Instead, we held improper "those client endorsements describing prior results that are . . . statements of 'overblown assurances of client satisfaction,' statements that create unjustified expectations or 'false hopes' or statements that fail to contain sufficient information, thus rendering the statement false, deceptive or misleading." Id. Therefore, the use of client testimonials or reports of past results in website advertising will not violate DR 2-101(A) unless the testimonials or reports create unjustified expectations or contain insufficient information such that the advertisement is rendered false, deceptive or misleading.

In addition, the Code does not require that client testimonials or reports of past results in advertisements of legal services be accompanied by a disclaimer of any kind, including one that informs the reader that past results do not guarantee similar outcomes in future cases. In N.Y. State 614, however, this Committee opined that to avoid the unjustified expectations that may be created by such advertising, the advertisement should contain a disclaimer that a client endorsement or other report of prior results does not guarantee or predict a similar outcome with respect to any future matter. To support this conclusion, we referred to N.Y. State 539, in which we held that the intended impression conveyed by reports of past results is "so unverifiable" as to violate former DR 2-101(B), which prohibited advertising claims that "cannot be measured or verified." See N.Y. State 539 (1982). DR 2-101(B) has been repealed. Accordingly, to determine whether a disclaimer is necessary in any advertisement that includes client testimonials or reports of past results, the lawyer must determine whether, without a disclaimer, the testimonials or past results render the advertisement false, deceptive or misleading in violation of DR 2-101(A).

A lawyer must review any proposed advertising that will include client testimonials or reports of past performance and decide, in each instance, whether the testimonial or report is likely to mislead the reader. We believe that in some cases, client testimonials and reports of past results in website advertising by their very nature may mislead prospective clients. For example, advertisements that do not distinguish among the facts and law specific to each case have the potential to mislead the public. EC 2-10 provides the following guidance:

> Although communications involving puffery and claims that cannot be measured or verified are not specifically referred to in DR 2-101, such communications would be prohibited to the extent that they are false, deceptive or misleading. Special care should be taken to avoid the use of any statement or claim which is false, misleading, 50 N.Y. State 709 also identified several considerations relating to Internet advertising. For example, we noted that a lawyer should retain a copy of the website advertisement for at least a year after its last posting. N.Y. State 709 (1998) (citing DR 2-101[F]). We also noted that "[t]here is no ethical prohibition in the Code against advertising to solicit clients who reside outside the state of New York with respect to matters as to which the lawyer may competently and lawfully practice," but advised that website advertisements name the jurisdictions in which the lawyer is licensed to practice. Id.; see also DR 2-102 (D). New York lawyers should also be aware that lawyer advertising laws and rules in other jurisdictions may regulate the content of any website advertising in those jurisdictions.

deceptive or unfair, or which is violative of any statute or rule of court, in disclosing information, by advertisements or otherwise, relating to [the lawyer or law firm].

Indeed, it is possible that the mere volume of information presented in website advertising – which may consist of several pages of information and links to other websites – will increase the chance that the reader will form an unjustified expectation regarding the legal services being advertised.[51]

If the client testimonials or reports of past results in a website advertisement are misleading in the ways described above (but not false or deceptive), cautionary language warning that prior results do not guarantee or predict a similar outcome in future matters may be sufficient to bring the advertisement into compliance with DR 2-101(A).[52] Moreover, compliance with DR 2-101(A) may require additional cautionary language if the testimonial or report is misleading for reasons beyond the mere report of a positive outcome. The disclaimer must be placed in a reasonably prominent location in the website so that the reader is likely to read the disclaimer in connection with his or her review of the testimonial or report of past results. To assess the sufficiency of the placement of a disclaimer, the lawyer should consider the size of the text and the proximity of the disclaimer to the client testimonial or report of past results. If the disclaimer is in a link, the lawyer should also consider the size and placement of the text signaling the reader to access the link and whether this signal sufficiently informs the reader that reviewing the linked disclaimer is material to any assessment of the information conveyed in the advertisement.

We recognize that website advertising is a dynamic and evolving medium, and that there will be an ever-increasing number of ways to post or position a disclaimer. If a lawyer chooses to post one or more disclaimers to cure otherwise misleading client testimonials or reports of past results, the lawyer should be mindful of changes in technology to ensure that the disclaimer remains posted in a manner that increases the likelihood that it is read in conjunction with the otherwise misleading information.

It goes without saying that if an advertisement is false or deceptive – as opposed to misleading because of the unjustified expectations created – no disclaimer, regardless of its content, will cure the ethical violation. Such an advertisement may not be used without violating DR 2-101(A).

CONCLUSION:

A website advertisement that uses client testimonials or reports of past results is prohibited under DR 2-101(A) if the use of the testimonials or report of past results creates unjustified expectations or is otherwise false, deceptive or misleading. The extent to which any use of testimonials or reports of past results is misleading, if at all, must be assessed on a case-by-case basis. If client testimonials and reports of past results in a website advertisement are misleading, a disclaimer may cure the otherwise misleading information conveyed if the disclaimer is sufficiently tailored to address the information that is misleading, and if the disclaimer's placement in the website is such that it is reasonable for the lawyer to expect that anyone who reads the testimonials and reports of past results will read the disclaimer. If an advertisement is false or deceptive, as opposed to being misleading because of the unjustified expectations conveyed, no disclaimer can cure it. To the extent that the conclusions reached in N.Y. State 614 (1990) and N.Y. State 539 (1982) were premised on DR 2-101(B), those opinions are modified consistent with the discussion herein.

TOPIC: Threatening and presenting criminal, administrative and disciplinary charges to obtain an advantage in a civil matter.

DIGEST: DR 7-105(A) prohibits the presentation and threatened presentation of criminal charges when the purpose is to effect a resolution of a civil dispute; the disciplinary rule does not embrace administrative or disciplinary charges that may be threatened or presented in connection with a civil dispute, regardless of purpose.

CODE: DR 1-102(A)(4), 1-102, 1-102(A) (3), (4), 4-101(A), 4-101(B)(1), 7-101(A)(1),(2),(5), 7-105(A); EC 7-7, 7-15, 7-21.

QUESTION:

May a lawyer representing a client seeking the return of funds alleged to have been wrongfully taken by a stockbroker ("Broker"): (a) make a demand or file a lawsuit on behalf of the client for the return of such funds and thereafter file a complaint against the Broker with either a prosecuting authority ("Prosecutor") or a self-regulatory body having jurisdiction over the Broker, such as the New York Stock Exchange ("NYSE"); or (b) send a demand letter on behalf of the client either (i) stating the client's intention to file a complaint with a Prosecutor about the Broker's conduct unless the funds are returned within a specified period of time, or (ii) pointing out the criminal nature of the allegedly wrongful conduct and requesting an explanation of the Broker's actions?

OPINION:

When a client invests funds with a Broker who is an associated member of a self-regulatory body, such as the NYSE or the National Association of Securities Dealers, and the Broker then wrongfully takes a portion of those funds for his or her own benefit, the Broker's conduct can have a variety of legal consequences. Viewed as a conversion of the client's funds, the taking may become the subject of a civil liability claim asserted by the client, perhaps leading to the filing of a lawsuit or arbitration. Viewed as a theft, the taking may become the subject of a criminal complaint filed by the client with a Prosecutor, perhaps leading to a criminal prosecution. Viewed as a violation of the rules of the NYSE or any other self-regulatory body of which the Broker is associated, the taking may become the subject of a professional disciplinary proceeding to revoke the Broker's license to practice.

Consequently, when a client believes that a Broker has wrongfully taken funds, the lawyer is faced with various choices about how best to represent and promote the client's interests. Of course, it is the client who decides the objectives of the representation. See DR 7-101(A)(1); EC 7-7. If the client's primary objective is to obtain the return of such funds, the lawyer is likely to suggest first writing a letter to the Broker demanding the return of the funds. If the Broker does not return the funds within the specified time period, the client often will authorize the filing of a lawsuit or arbitration proceeding against the Broker for conversion. But if the client asks about alternative or additional ways of proceeding, a question of legal ethics is likely to arise: may the lawyer file or threaten to file a complaint or charge regarding the Broker's alleged wrongful conduct with either a Prosecutor or the NYSE?[53]

I. The Filing of a Complaint With a Prosecutor or the NYSE

A. The General Ethical Rules Regarding the Filing of any Complaint

In deciding whether to file any complaint against the Broker – whether a lawsuit or an arbitration or a letter of complaint with either a Prosecutor or the NYSE – there are a number of applicable disciplinary rules. DR 7-102(A)(2) prohibits a lawyer from "knowingly advanc[ing] a claim . . . that is unwarranted under existing law, except that a lawyer may advance such claim . . . if it can be supported by good faith argument for an extension, modification, or reversal of existing law." DR 7-102(A)(l) prohibits a lawyer from "fil[ing] a suit, assert[ing] a position . . . or tak[ing] other action on behalf of the client when the lawyer knows or when it is obvious that such action would serve merely to harass or maliciously injure another." Thus, before filing any complaint against the Broker, the lawyer must determine that the client's claim is warranted in law and in fact and that the complaint is not being made merely to harass or injure the Broker.

Two other disciplinary rules are relevant in preparing such a complaint. DR 1-102(A)(4) prohibits a lawyer from "engag[ing] in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation." DR 7-102(A)(5) states that in representing a client, "a lawyer shall not knowingly make a false statement of law or fact." Together, these two disciplinary rules impose additional ethical limits on what can be said in any such complaint.

Another disciplinary rule that deals specifically with the interplay of the system of civil liability and the criminal justice system, DR 7-105(A), states "A lawyer shall not present, participate in presenting, or threaten to present criminal charges solely to obtain an advantage in a civil matter."

EC 7-21 explains the purposes underlying DR 7-105(A):

> The civil adjudicative process is primarily designed for the settlement of disputes between parties, while the criminal process is designed for the protection of society as a whole. Threatening to use, or using, the criminal process to coerce the adjustment of private civil claims or controversies is a subversion of that process; further, the person against whom the criminal process is so misused may be deterred from asserting legal rights and thus the usefulness of the civil process in settling private disputes is impaired. As in all cases of abuse of judicial process, the improper use of criminal process tends to diminish public confidence in our legal system.

Thus, DR 7-105(A) is intended to preserve the integrity of both the system of civil liability and the criminal justice system by making sure that a lawyer's actual or threatened invocation of the criminal justice system is not motivated solely by the effect such invocation is likely to have on a client's interests in a civil matter. When, however, a lawyer's motive to prosecute is genuine – that is, actuated by a sincere interest in and respect for the purposes of the criminal justice system – DR 7-105(A) would be inapplicable, even if such prosecution resulted in a benefit to a client's interest in a civil matter.

53 In focusing this opinion on questions regarding the lawyer's actual or threatened filing of a complaint on behalf of a client, we choose not to opine on any related questions regarding whether it would be permissible for a non-lawyer client, who is not bound by the constraints of the New York State Lawyer's Code of Professional Responsibility (the "Code"), to file such a complaint on his or her own behalf. In this opinion, we are concerned only with the lawyer's professional responsibilities regarding the lawyer's own conduct.

Does DR 7-105(A) apply to the lawyer's filing of a complaint about the Broker's conduct with either a Prosecutor or the NYSE?[54]

B. Filing a Complaint With a Prosecutor

Whether the lawyer's filing of a complaint about the Broker's conduct with a Prosecutor violates DR 7-105(A) depends, in part, upon the meaning of the phrase "present criminal charges." If that phrase refers only to a Prosecutor's actions, then a lawyer's filing of a complaint would not qualify as either presentation of such charges, or participation in such presentation.

We have been unable to find any ethics opinions or court decisions interpreting DR 7-105(A) that address the definition of "present criminal charges." Perhaps this phrase was intended as a term of art, referring to the Fifth Amendment's requirement of a grand jury presentment or indictment for capital and infamous crimes. See 1 Charles Alan Wright, Federal Practice and Procedure § 110, at 459 (3d ed. 1999) ("The Constitution speaks also of a 'presentment' but this is a term with a distinct historical meaning now not well understood. Historically presentment was the process by which a grand jury initiated an independent investigation and asked that a charge be drawn to cover the facts should they constitute a crime."). Likewise, some criminal cases from the 1940s and 1950s refer to a prosecutor's presentation of criminal charges to the grand jury. See, e.g., Clay v. Wickins, 101 Misc. 75 (Sup. Ct. Spec. T. Monroe County 1957).

Despite this historical context, the fact remains that numerous ethics opinions and court decisions concerning DR 7-105(A) assume that a lawyer's conduct in reporting allegedly criminal conduct to a prosecutor, with the express or implied request that the prosecutor file criminal charges, is within the scope of DR 7-105(A). See, e.g., Office of Disciplinary Counsel v. King, 617 N.E.2d 676 (Ohio 1993); People v. Farrant, 852 P.2d 452 (Colo. 1993); Crane v. State Bar, 635 P.2d 163 (Cal. 1981); Virginia Opinion 1755 (2001); Nassau County 93-13; Nassau County 82-3.[55]

Based upon this authority, we too conclude that the filing of a complaint based on the Broker's conduct lies within the scope of DR 7-105(A). To fall within the scope of DR 7-105(A), such a complaint need only report the Broker's conduct to a Prosecutor; it need not expressly request that criminal charges be filed against the Broker, because such a request is implicit in the act of filing such a report with a Prosecutor.

54 We assume throughout this opinion that the lawyer's client has consented to the lawyer filing or threatening to file a complaint about the Broker's conduct. Such consent would be necessary under the Code if the disclosure of the Broker's conduct would be embarrassing or detrimental to the client or the client expressly asked the lawyer not to disclose the Broker's conduct, because the lawyer is prohibited from revealing to third parties the client's "secrets," see DR 4-101(B)(1), and, by definition, the Broker's conduct would be a "secret" under DR 4-101(A).

55 These ethics opinions and court decisions contain no discussion and, therefore, provide no guidance as to whether the filing of such a complaint is construed as the presentation of criminal charges or participation in the presentation of criminal charges.

DR 7-105(A) does not proscribe the filing of a complaint about the Broker's conduct with a Prosecutor unless the purpose of such a filing is "solely to obtain an advantage in a civil matter." The "solely" requirement makes the propriety of filing such a complaint contingent upon the client's intent. See §II (B) below. As long as one purpose of the client in filing such a complaint with a Prosecutor is to have the Broker prosecuted, convicted, or punished, then such a complaint would not offend the letter or spirit of DR 7-105(A). Thus, we conclude that as long as the client's motivation includes that purpose, DR 7-105(A) would not be violated even if the filing of such a complaint resulted in the Broker returning the client's funds and even if the client also intended that result, because the lawyer would not have filed such a complaint "solely" to obtain the return of the client's funds.

C. Filing a Complaint With the NYSE

In considering whether the lawyer's filing of a complaint against the Broker with the NYSE violates DR 7-105(A), we observe that the language of DR 7-105(A) refers only to "criminal charges" as opposed to allegations regarding the violation of administrative or disciplinary rules, regulations, policies, or practices, such as those of the NYSE. In this respect, DR 7-105(A) differs from similar rules in other jurisdictions, such as the District of Columbia and Maine, where the language of the analogous disciplinary rule expressly refers to "administrative or disciplinary charges" in addition to criminal charges, see Maine Bar Rule 3.6(c), or just "disciplinary charges," see, e.g., District of Columbia Rule 8.4(g); Virginia Rule 3.4(h). See also Crane v. State Bar, 635 P.2d 163 (Cal. 1981) (concerning §7-104 of the California Rules of Professional Conduct then in effect, which prohibited an attorney "from present[ing] criminal, administrative, or disciplinary charges to obtain an advantage in a civil action").

Thus, we conclude that the threatened or actual filing of complaints with, or the participation in proceedings of, administrative agencies or disciplinary authorities lies outside the scope of DR 7-105(A). We recognize that there exist ethics opinions in this and other jurisdictions in which the threatened filing of a complaint with an administrative agency or disciplinary authority has been held to violate DR 7-105(A) or its analogue. See, e.g., Nassau County 98-12; Illinois Opinion 87-7; Maryland Opinion 86-14. These decisions rely at least in part on the similar purposes of the criminal justice system and the administrative law system – to protect society as a whole. However, we reject that general analogy in light of the specific language of DR 7-105(A), which concerns only "criminal charges."[56] In our view, DR 7-105(A) is limited in scope to actions related to "criminal charges." We assume the term "criminal charges" has its ordinary meaning in New York State substantive law. Cf. District of Columbia Opinion 263 (1996) (finding that a criminal contempt proceeding growing out of a failure to abide by a Civil Protective Order in a domestic relations matter does not involve "criminal charges" under the substantive law of the District of Columbia).

56 We also reject the specific analysis underlying Nassau County 98-12 (1998). In that opinion, the Committee concluded that DR 7-105(A) prohibits an attorney from threatening to file a report with disciplinary authorities against another attorney. Citing People v. Harper, 75 N.Y.2d 313 (1990), the Committee stated: "Threatening to file a grievance has been construed to constitute the same violation as to threaten to file criminal charges." But Harper did not find that DR 7-105(A) covered threats of filing or the actual presentation of disciplinary charges. Harper was an appeal from a jury verdict that a witness had received a bribe. The Harper Court referred to DR 7-105 solely with reference to the People's argument that "it is improper to use the threat of criminal prosecution as a means of extracting money in a civil suit." 75 N.Y.2d at 318. The Harper Court rendered no opinion about the actual or threatened reporting of disciplinary violations by lawyers.

II. Sending a Demand Letter

DR 7-105(A) not only prohibits a lawyer from presenting or participating in the presentation of criminal charges, but also prohibits a lawyer from threatening to do so. Thus, even if a lawyer were to send a letter to the Broker expressing a conditional intent to file a complaint, or even if a lawyer were to send a letter arguing that the Broker's conduct violates the criminal law and asks for an explanation or justification of the Broker's conduct, the lawyer could arguably be in violation of DR 7-105(A) if (i) such communications "threaten to present criminal charges,"[57] and (ii) do so "solely to obtain an advantage in a civil matter."

A. Threats

Some letters contain unambiguous threats to present criminal charges. In In re Hyman, 226 App. Div. 468 (1929), the First Department censured a lawyer who wrote a letter to the driver of an automobile that hurt his client, Miss Horn, stating:

> Unless you show some substantial evidence of your willingness to compensate Miss Horn [the attorney's client] for her injuries, I shall have no alternative but to immediately criminally prosecute you for assault against my client. In addition to that I shall institute civil action for the amount of the damages which Miss Horn has suffered.

226 App. Div. at 469. Four years after In re Hyman, the First Department censured another lawyer who sent a letter stating that unless money was paid immediately he "would present the matter to the district attorney upon a charge of larceny and embezzlement." In re Beachboard, 263 N.Y.S. 492 (N.Y. App. Div. 1933).[58] More recently, the Third Department censured a lawyer for sending a letter to a workman which stated that unless the workman returned a sum of money to his client the lawyer would "have a warrant issued for [the workman's] arrest;" "you will return the money or go to jail." In re Glavin, 107 A.D.2d 1006- 1007 (1985).

In each of these cases, the letter refers to future criminal prosecution, but provides the recipient with the opportunity to avoid such prosecution by taking certain remedial action. The recipient is given a choice: either act to remedy the alleged civil wrong or face a criminal prosecution. The fear of criminal prosecution provides the leverage by which the lawyer hopes to coerce the recipient's decision.[59]

57 Because, for the reasons stated above, the filing of a complaint against the Broker with an administrative or disciplinary authority, such as the NYSE, is not within the scope of DR 7-105(A), the lawyer's threatening to file such a complaint would not violate DR 7-105(A), even if such a threat were intended by the lawyer solely to obtain the return of the client's funds.

58 This short decision does not make it clear whether the respondent lawyer was acting on behalf of a client or for himself in sending the threatening letter. In our view, however, that does not matter. We agree with the numerous decisions in other jurisdictions holding DR 7-105(A) or its counterparts applicable where the respondent lawyer is acting on his or her own behalf. See, e.g., Somers v. Statewide Grievance Committee, 715 A.2d 712, 718-19 & n.19 (Conn. 1998); In re Yarborough, 488 S.E.2d 871, 874 (S.C. 1997); In re Strutz, 652 N.E.2d 41, 48 (Ind. 1995); People v. Farrant, 852 P.2d 452, 454 (Colo. 1993).

59 As stated below, in some circumstances such a threat in itself may violate New York's Penal Law because it constitutes criminal coercion or extortion. See § II(C) below. In those circumstances, the threat not only violates DR 7-105(A); it also violates DR 1-102(A)(3)'s prohibition against "engag[ing] in illegal conduct that adversely reflects on the lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness as a lawyer."

Based on these cases, we conclude that a lawyer would violate DR 7-105(A) by sending a letter to a Broker stating the client's intention (conditional or otherwise) to file a complaint with a Prosecutor relating to the Broker's conduct, assuming that the sole purpose of the letter were to obtain the return of the Funds. In reaching this conclusion, we consider it immaterial under DR 7-105(A) whether the Broker actually owed the client the requested funds or whether the client had good grounds for believing the funds were owed. As stated below, DR 7-105(A) prohibits a letter that threatens to file a complaint with a Prosecutor solely to obtain a civil advantage, regardless of whether the threat is extortionate or justifiable. See § II(C) below.

Other letters are more ambiguous in their intention to present criminal charges. Ethics opinions and courts in other jurisdictions are split on whether such ambiguous communications constitute a threat to present criminal charges. Some ethics opinions and court decisions interpret the mere allusion to a criminal prosecution or criminal penalties or even the use of criminal law labels to describe the opposing party's conduct in a letter as a veiled threat to present criminal charges to a prosecutor. See, e.g., In re Vollintine, 673 P.2d 755 (Alaska 1983); Virginia Opinion 1755 (2001). Cf. District of Columbia Opinion 220 (1991) (finding no relevant distinction "between threats and hints of threats" to file disciplinary charges encompassed within D.C. Rule 8.4[g]). See generally Charles W. Wolfram, Modern Legal Ethics § 13.5.5, at 717 (1986). Other authorities have held that the mere mention of criminal penalties or the violation of criminal laws does not necessarily show the specific intent to threaten. See, e.g., In re McCurdy, 681 P.2d 131, 132 (Or. 1984).

In our view, there is no universal standard to determine whether a letter "threaten[s] to present criminal charges." Such a determination requires the examination of both the content and context of the letter. In our view, a letter containing an accusation of criminal wrongdoing likely constitutes a threat, especially when coupled with a demand that the accused wrongdoer remedy the civil wrong. Whether the accusation is general (simply stating that the Broker's conduct violates the criminal law) or specific (stating that the Broker's conduct violates particular provisions of the criminal law), such an accusation serves the undeniable purpose of coercing the accused wrongdoer. We point out, moreover, that a lawyer who sends a letter containing such a communication is exposed to professional discipline based upon the disciplinary authorities' interpretation of the lawyer's intent in sending the letter or statement.

B. The "Solely" Requirement

DR 7-105(A) does not prohibit all threats to present criminal charges; it prohibits only those that are made "solely to obtain an advantage in a civil matter." For that reason, ethics opinions and court decisions in other jurisdictions have found no violation of DR 7-105(A) or its counterparts when the threat of presenting criminal charges is intended for a purpose other than obtaining an advantage in a civil matter.

Consider, for example, the letter sent by the lawyer in Decato's Case, 379 A.2d 825 (N.H. 1977):

> In New Hampshire, it is a crime to obtain services by means of deception in order to avoid the due payment therefore (sic). Without any proof on your part, you have chosen to stop payment on a check after it was made for the payment of services. Unless you communicate directly with me and give me some proof that the damages sustained > to your son's International Harvester were the result of the failure of Decato Motor Sales, Inc., I shall consider filing a criminal complaint with the Lebanon District Court against your son for theft of services.

379 A.2d at 826. The New Hampshire Supreme Court imposed no discipline based on that letter, holding that the purpose of the lawyer's letter was not to gain leverage in a civil action by the threat of filing criminal charges, because Decato made no demand or request for payment from the letter's recipient – he only asked for information about the recipient's legal position.

Similarly, ethics committees in several other jurisdictions have opined that a letter referring to the criminal sanctions imposed for stopping payment on a check was not sent solely for the purpose of gaining an advantage in a civil matter. See, e.g., Florida Opinion 85-3; Georgia Opinion 26 (1980); Utah Opinion 71 (1979). These opinions rested on the fact that state law imposes a requirement of such notification before bringing a civil action. But see New Mexico Opinion 1987-5 ("threats or references to criminal sanctions in demand letters for payment of supplies or recovery of worthless checks would have been improper under former Rule 7-105[A]").

Thus, if the lawyer sent a letter to the Broker stating that the Broker's conduct appeared to violate certain criminal statutes or appeared to carry certain criminal penalties and requesting an explanation or justification of the Broker's conduct, such a letter would not violate DR 7-105(A) if the lawyer intended merely to determine whether the Broker's conduct was actionable, either civilly or criminally, because it was not "solely to obtain an advantage." We acknowledge that basing our conclusion on the lawyer's intent in sending the letter renders the ethical assessment of the lawyer's conduct very fact-specific. However, we think there is no alternative if the "solely" requirement of DR 7-105(A) is to be taken seriously. See Connecticut Informal Opinion 98-19 ("Such an examination [of a lawyer's motivation] is very fact specific"); Florida Opinion 89-3 ("The motivation and intent of the attorney involved obviously will be a major factor in determining whether his or her actions are ethically improper. The Committee believes that such determinations necessarily must be made on a case-by-case basis").

We point out, however, that when a lawyer threatens criminal charges unless the recipient takes specified action, the threat is likely to have one clear purpose – the doing of that specified act. Thus, when a lawyer threatens to present criminal charges unless an action is taken which remedies a civil wrong, a presumption is likely to arise that DR 7-105(A) has been violated.[60]

60 The Model Rules have no analogue to DR 7-105(A). The drafters of the Model Rules apparently believed that to the extent DR 7-105(A) serves legitimate purposes, the conduct it proscribes is prohibited by other ethical rules, such as Model Rule 8.4 (which is analogous to DR 1-102), Model Rule 4.1 (which is analogous to DR 1-102[A][4] and DR 7-102[A][5]), Model Rule 4.4 (which is analogous to DR 7-102(A)(1)), and Model Rule 3.1 (which is analogous to DR 7-102[A][2]). See ABA 92-363. To the extent that DR 7-105(A) prohibits conduct other than that prohibited by those Rules – such as the actual or threatened presentation of criminal charges in a civil matter to gain relief for a client when the criminal charges are related to the civil matter, the lawyer has a well-founded belief that both the civil claim and the criminal charges are warranted by the facts and the law, and the lawyer does not attempt to exert or suggest improper influence over the criminal process, see ABA 92-363, – the drafters of the Model Rules appear to have believed that DR 7-105(A) was overbroad because it "excessively restrict[ed] a lawyer from carrying out his or her responsibility to 'zealously' assert the client's position under the adversary system." Id. See also Geoffrey C. Hazard, Jr. & W. William Hodes, 2 The Law of Lawyering, § 40.4, at 40-7 (3d ed. 2000) ("rules like DR 7-105[A] . . . are overbroad because they prohibit legitimate pressure tactics and negotiation strategies") (emphasis in original).

C. DR 7-105(A)'s Relation to Illegal Conduct

Under New York law, proof of a threat to present criminal charges unless a certain specified action is performed constitutes a prima facie case of criminal coercion in the second degree, see N.Y. Penal Law § 135.60(4) (Consol. 2003), and, if property is obtained, makes out a prima facie case of extortion, see N.Y. Penal Law §155.05(2)(e)(iv) (Consol. 2003). However, New York law provides that such conduct is not unlawful if the person making such a threat "reasonably believed the threatened [criminal] charges to be true and that his sole purpose [in sending the letter] was to compel or induce the [recipient] to take reasonable action to make good the wrong which was the subject of the threatened charge." N.Y. Penal Law § 135.75 (Consol. 2003) (affirmative defense to criminal coercion). Accord N.Y. Penal Law § 155.15(2) (Consol. 2003) (affirmative defense to extortion).

Thus, if the lawyer sending a threatening letter to the Broker reasonably believes that the threatened criminal charges are true and the letter only demands that the Broker take an action that is reasonably calculated to remedy the wrongful taking, such a letter would not be unlawful. However, DR 7-105(A) still would apply, because it is immaterial to the literal language of DR 7-105(A) and its purpose whether the threatened criminal charges are true or whether the action demanded is reasonably related to rectification of the allegedly criminal conduct.

CONCLUSION:

For the reasons stated above, the lawyer would not violate DR 7-105(A) by the actual or threatened filing of a complaint against the Broker with the NYSE. The filing of a complaint about the Broker's conduct with a Prosecutor would not violate DR 7-105(A) unless the lawyer's sole purpose in filing such a complaint was to obtain the return of the client's funds in dispute. A letter from the lawyer that threatened the filing of such a complaint unless the Broker returned the funds to the client would violate DR 7-105(A). Under the circumstances described above, a letter from the lawyer that threatened the filing of such a complaint unless the Broker provided information about his or her conduct would not violate DR 7-105(A) because obtaining an advantage in a civil matter would not be the sole purpose of such a threat.

CLARIFIES: N.Y. State 655 (1993)

TOPIC: Lawyer-member of municipal board; conflict of interest; appearance of impropriety; imputation of disqualification in "of counsel" relationship.

DIGEST: A lawyer who serves on a municipal board is prohibited from appearing before that board on behalf of a private client. Lawyers who are "of counsel" to a law firm are "associated" with the law firm for purposes of DR 5 105(D), and so the firm is likewise disqualified from appearing before the board unless the client gives informed consent. Whether the firm is disqualified by other rules depends on the facts and circumstances, but if not and if the firm does appear, the lawyer-member must recuse him or herself.

CODE: DR 1-102(A)(2),(5); 2-102(A)(4); 5-101(A); 5-105(A),(B),(D); 5-108 (A),(B); 8-101(A)(2); 9-101(B), (C); Canon 9; EC 8-8.

CJC: Canon 2

QUESTION:

1. Is a lawyer who serves on a municipal board prohibited from appearing before that board?

2. If so, is a law firm with which that lawyer has an "of counsel" relationship also disqualified from appearing before that board?

3. If so, does the lawyer's recusal from the board's deliberations on matters involving the firm avoid disqualification?

OPINION:

Question #1: Is a lawyer who serves on a municipal board prohibited from appearing before that board?

In a line of opinions dating back at least to 1970, this Committee has held that an attorney who is a public officer may not represent private clients before the body on which he or she serves. Indeed, most of our opinions have addressed the circumstances in which that prohibition would extend to appearance before bodies, or adverse to entities, other than the one on which the lawyer serves but over which the lawyer-member has some measure of control as a public officer.[1] We have repeatedly noted two rationales for these prohibitions:

> Rules disqualifying lawyers who are part-time public officials from accepting private clients in certain situations are designed to serve two basic purposes. Primarily the disqualification rules serve to prevent private clients from retaining a part-time public official in the hope of gaining some improper advantage by reason of his lawyer's public office. In addition the rules are designed to prevent public suspicion that the client may be gaining some improper advantage by retaining the public official.

N.Y. State 431 (1976), quoted in N.Y. State 435 (1976), 510 (1979), 692 (1997), 702 (1998). The Committee has also opined that at least in some circumstances these ethical concerns would not be cured by recusal from all votes relating to the private representation. N.Y. State 702 (1998) (lawyer-legislator could not appear adverse to district attorney). In so finding, we cited the following sources in the Code: DR 1-102(A)(5) (barring conduct "prejudicial to the administration of justice"), EC 8-8 ("A lawyer who is a public officer, whether full or part-time, should not engage in activities in which the lawyer's personal or professional interests are or foreseeably may be in conflict with the lawyer's official duties."), DR 8-101(A)(2) (lawyer in public office shall not "[u]se the public position to influence, or attempt to influence, a tribunal to act in favor of the lawyer or of a client"), and Canon 9 ("A Lawyer Should Avoid Even the Appearance of Professional Impropriety").

In addition to enforcing the bar on improper influence and the appearance of impropriety, the Committee has noted that "[t]here may also be special circumstances in which a conflict could arise between the lawyer-legislator's duties or political objectives in the lawyer's role as legislator, and the lawyer's professional obligations to a client. In such circumstances, the lawyer-legislator must apply the principles of DR 5-101(A)," which deals with conflicts of interest affecting the lawyer's exercise of professional judgment on behalf of clients. N.Y. State 692. We noted that where this concern operates, the private client may be able to give effective consent. Id.

1 See, e.g., N.Y. State 702 (1998) (lawyer-legislator cannot practice criminal law where legislature has authority over district attorney budget; recusal from voting on budget does not cure conflict); N.Y. State 692 (1997) (part-time legislator cannot represent criminal defendants if legislature has budgetary authority over opposing prosecutor or police); N.Y. State 510 (1979) (part-time deputy town supervisor may not represent private clients in tax certiorari or other proceedings involving town); N.Y. State 435 (1976) (county legislator may not represent client seeking permit from county health department but may represent clients before municipal bodies and county courts or in ministerial processes in county clerk's office); N.Y. State 431 (1976) (county legislator with "line item" control over salaries of district attorney's office may not represent criminal defendants), overruled by N.Y. State 692; N.Y. State 424 (1975) (part-time county legislator should not represent criminal defendants where district attorney's funding is from legislature of which lawyer is member); N.Y. State 364 (1974) (member of school board should not represent property owner seeking reassessment); N.Y. State 209 (1971) (attorney who is city council member may not act as attorney for school district dependent on city services). See also N.Y. State 484 (1978) (member of zoning board of appeals may practice before other agencies of town in matters unrelated to zoning); Kings Point Gate, LLC v. Aroche, 192 Misc. 2d 45 (Nassau Cty. Dist. Ct. 2002) (citing various of these opinions in refusing to disqualify counsel who was town council member in county in which action was pending); Nassau County 93-20 (city council member may not appear before judge or opposite city attorney appointed by council, or where council member may need to cross-examine city official).

Question #2: Is the law firm with which that lawyer has an "of counsel" relationship also disqualified from appearing before that board?

The question presented here is whether the prohibitions on a lawyer appearing before the body of which he or she is a member extend to a law firm with which the lawyer has an of counsel relationship.

DR 5-105(D) provides that all lawyers "associated in a law firm" are disqualified from accepting or undertaking an engagement if any one of them practicing alone would be disqualified under certain enumerated rules: DR 5-101(A), DR 5-105(A) or (B) and DR 5-108 (A) or (B), all concerning conflicts of interest affecting the exercise of professional judgment on behalf of a client or duties of confidentiality to present or former clients, and DR 9-101(B), concerning conflicts arising out of public employment, an issue not applicable here.[2] In order to determine whether the disqualification of the lawyer-public officer from appearing before the body on which he or she serves is imputed to the partners and associates of his or her "of counsel" firm under DR 5-105(D), we must determine the following: (1) whether the disqualification arises out of any of the enumerated rules, and (2) whether an of counsel lawyer is "associated in a law firm" with partners and associates of the firm for purposes of DR 5-105(D).

As noted above, the general ban on a lawyer-public officer appearing before the body on which he or she serves, or before or adverse to entities over which the public officer has some control, arises out of rules relating to the appearance of impropriety, improper influence and conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice. Those rules are not subject to automatic imputation under DR 5105(D). But the bar that we have said may arise in "special circumstances" (where the public officer's duties might conflict with the lawyer's duties to a client) arises out of DR 5101(A), which is subject to automatic imputation under DR 5105(D).[3] We turn, therefore, to whether a lawyer-public officer is "associated" with a firm to which he or she is of counsel within the meaning of DR 5-105(D).

2 DR 9-101(B) addresses situations in which the lawyer-public employee had or has personal involvement in the matter or representation at issue, which we assume is not the case here. DR 9-101(B) provides:

> Except as law may otherwise expressly permit: (1) A lawyer shall not represent a private client in connection with a matter in which the lawyer participated personally and substantially as a public officer or employee, and no lawyer in a firm with which that lawyer is associated may knowingly undertake or continue representation in such a matter unless: a. The disqualified lawyer is effectively screened from any participation, direct or indirect, including discussion, in the matter and is apportioned no part of the fee therefrom; and b. There are no other circumstances in the particular representation that create an appearance of impropriety. (2) A lawyer having information that the lawyer knows is confidential government information about a person, acquired when the lawyer was a public officer or employee, may not represent a private client whose interests are adverse to that person in a matter in which the information could be used to the material disadvantage of that person. A firm with which that lawyer is associated may knowingly undertake or continue representation in the matter only if the disqualified lawyer is effectively screened from any participation, direct or indirect, including discussion, in the matter and is apportioned no part of the fee therefrom. (3) A lawyer serving as a public officer or employee shall not: a. Participate in a matter in which the lawyer participated personally and substantially while in private practice or non-governmental employment, unless under applicable law no one is, or by lawful delegation may be, authorized to act in the lawyer's stead in the matter; or b. Negotiate for private employment with any person who is involved as a party or as attorney for a party in a matter in which the lawyer is participating personally and substantially.

DR 2-102(A)(4) provides that "A lawyer or law firm may be designated 'Of Counsel' on a letterhead if there is a continuing relationship with a lawyer or law firm, other than as a partner or associate." We have interpreted the "of counsel" relationship to mean that the of counsel lawyer is "available to the firm for consultation and advice on a regular and continuing basis." N.Y. State 262 (1972). The ABA Ethics Committee has characterized the "of counsel" relationship as "close, regular [and] personal." ABA 90-357 (citing and withdrawing ABA 330 [1972]). The ethics committee of the Association of the Bar of the City of New York has taken a similar view. See N.Y. City 1996-8; N.Y. City 1995-8; N.Y. City 81-3 (1982).

Both the ABA and the Association of the Bar of the City of New York have concluded that a lawyer who is "of counsel" to a law firm is "associated" with that firm for purposes of imputation of conflicts of interest. See ABA 90-357; N.Y. City 19958 ("attorneys will need to keep in mind that for purposes of analyzing conflicts of interest, 'of counsel' relationships are treated as if the 'counsel' and the firm are one unit"). See also Nemet v. Nemet, 112 A.D.2d 359 (of counsel relationship leads to imputed disqualification), appeal dismissed, 66 N.Y.2d 602 (1985); N.Y. City 2000-4. The same position has been adopted by the Restatement of the Law Governing Lawyers, which states:

> A lawyer who is of counsel to a firm often has more limited access to confidential client information than firm partners and associates and usually a smaller financial stake in the firm. Nonetheless, the incentive to misuse confidential information, the difficulty of determining when it has been misused, the ostensible professional relationship, as well as the administrative ease of a definite rule, justify extending imputation to lawyers having an of-counsel status.

Restatement (Third), The Law Governing Lawyers, § 123 cmt. c(ii) (1998).

We agree with the aforementioned authorities and conclude that if a lawyer acting alone would be disqualified from a particular representation based on any of the rules enumerated in DR 5-105(D), then that disqualification is imputed to a law firm with which that lawyer has an "of counsel" relationship.

Therefore, if a lawyer-public officer is barred from undertaking a client engagement because his or her exercise of professional judgment on behalf of the client would be or reasonably might be affected by the lawyer-public officer's political or fiduciary duties to the municipal board, the law firm would likewise be barred. Thus, for example, if a prospective client sought to hire a partner of the firm to argue against a bill that the lawyer-public officer had offered, the partner could not do so, at least not without the informed waiver of the prospective client.

3 In one opinion, this Committee has suggested that a member of a board of zoning appeals exercises professional judgment on behalf of a client within the meaning of DR 5-101(A) in the member's zoning appeals votes. N.Y. State 655 (1993) ("we perceive no obvious danger that the exercise of professional judgment by a lawyer-member of a board of zoning appeals on behalf of a private client or with respect to the lawyer's zoning board judgments 'will be or reasonably may be affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or personal interests'" when the lawyer represents personal injury clients against town) (emphasis added, footnote omitted). To the extent this remark may be read to suggest that DR 5-101(A) addresses a lawyer-member's votes on the board of zoning appeals, we believe it was misplaced. DR 5101(A) applies only to conflicts affecting "the exercise of professional judgment on behalf of [a] client," not to conflicts affecting other roles a lawyer may assume. Thus, DR 5-101(A) does not serve to protect the board or the town from votes by a member who has a private client with a matter before the board; it serves to protect only the private client from conflicts and thus, in certain circumstances, can be waived by the client, as stated in N.Y. State 692.

Question #3: Does the lawyer's recusal from the board's deliberations on matters involving the firm avoid disqualification?

DR 5-105(D) is not the only potential limitation on the law firm's practice before the municipal board. In N.Y. State 632 (1992), we addressed whether the partners and associates of a part-time judge were prohibited from appearing before the municipal zoning board of appeals or planning board. After concluding that the judge would be so barred, this Committee held that whether the partners and associates of the judge could practice before those boards "depends on the particular facts and circumstances":

> None of the Code provisions identified in DR 5-105(D) applies here, where the disqualification of the judge rests on [Code of Judicial Conduct] Canon 2 [mandating avoidance of the appearance of impropriety] and DR 8-101(A)(2). Thus, whether the partners and associates of the part-time judge may practice before the boards of the same municipality depends on the particular facts and circumstances. Clearly the partners and associates of a part-time judge may not represent or imply that hiring the firm will result in using the influence of the judge in zoning and planning matters. See DR 9-101(C). The judge may not circumvent the force of CJC's Canon 2 by sending a partner or associate to represent the judge's clients before these boards. See DR 1-102(A)(2); DR 8-101(A)(2) and Canon 9. On the other hand, vicarious disqualification should not be imposed if the judge's partners and associates have an ongoing independent practice before these boards, the judge is screened from any involvement, and their practice is conducted without using or even appearing to use the name and influence of the judge.

A similar examination of the facts and circumstances is required to determine whether a partner or associate of a firm can appear before a municipal board of which an of counsel lawyer of the firm is a member.

If the firm appears, the lawyer-member must recuse him- or herself. We have said, "A lawyer holding public office has a duty to abstain from voting or otherwise participating in a matter in which his firm was involved at a time when he was a member of the firm, irrespective of whether the client had been represented by him or by one of his partners or associates." N.Y. State 145 (1970). We think the same precept applies to lawyer-public officer who are of counsel to the firm. Indeed, it is likely that the codes of ethics of many if not most boards would require recusal in such circumstances. Cf., e.g., In the Matter of Nicholas Quennell, N.Y.C. Conflict of Interest Board Case No. 97-60 (Art Commission member fined for failure to recuse himself from vote on matter involving his architectural firm).

Many codes of ethics of municipal boards likewise address whether others affiliated with a board member can appear before the board even if the member is recused. See, e.g., N.Y.C. Conflict of Interest Board Advisory Op. 96-04 (law firm of which community board member is a partner may not appear before board even if member is recused); N.Y.S. Ethics Comm'n Advisory Op. 99-12 (restrictions on practice of a member of a state commission who is of counsel to a firm do not apply to firm as long as the of counsel lawyer does not share in the relevant net revenues). If so, those codes should govern, since any recusal rules are designed to protect the processes of the board, rather than the representation of a client, which is the primary concern of the Code. [4] If the ethics codes of the board do not directly address the question, the law firm may still have a duty under the Code to decline the representation in order to avoid an appearance of impropriety and any suggestion that the client is getting special access to the remaining members of the board. Whether this duty arises will depend on a number of factors, such as the size of the firm and of the board, how long the of counsel lawyer-public officer has practiced with the firm, the extent to which the of counsel lawyer is publicly identified with the firm, and other factors. Cf. N.Y. State 513 (1979) (appearance of impropriety bars partner of the chair of the local political committee from serving as city attorney).

CONCLUSION:

A lawyer who serves on a municipal board is prohibited from appearing before that board. Whether a law firm to which the lawyer is of counsel is barred depends on the facts and circumstances. First, any conflicts that could affect the lawyer's ability to represent the client under DR 5-101(A) are imputed to all lawyers in the firm, but the private client may be able to waive the conflict after adequate disclosure. Second, the lawyer-public officer would need to be recused from any matters in which the law firm appears before the board. Third, even with recusal, the law firm may be barred from appearing before the board if, under the circumstances, the law firm's appearing would give rise to a suggestion of special access to the board or other appearance of impropriety.

4 The New York State Ethics Commission has similarly observed that where its rules permit a former state employee to undertake a matter that might otherwise be prohibited by DR 9-101(B), the state ethics rules will govern because DR 9-101(B) contains an exception "as law may otherwise expressly permit." N.Y.S. Ethics Comm'n Advisory Op. 90-14.

TOPIC: Law firm's supervisory responsibilities upon hiring a secretary, paralegal or other nonlawyer who has previously worked at another law firm.

DIGEST: When a law firm hires a secretary, paralegal, or other nonlawyer who has previously worked at another law firm, the law firm must adequately supervise the conduct of the nonlawyer. Supervisory measures may include i) instructing the nonlawyer not to disclose protected information acquired at the former law firm and ii) instructing lawyers not to exploit such information if proffered. In some circumstances, it is advisable that the law firm inquire whether the nonlawyer acquired confidential information from the former law firm about a current representation of the new firm or conduct a more comprehensive conflict check based on the nonlawyer's prior work. The results of such an inquiry will help determine whether the new firm should take further steps, such as seeking the opposing party's consent and/or screening the nonlawyer.

CODE: DR 1-104(A)-(D),DR 4-101(B),(C), (D), DR 5-105(E) EC 4-2, EC 7-10

QUESTION:

Law firms often hire secretaries, paralegals, or other nonlawyers who have worked at other law firms. What are a law firm's supervisory responsibilities upon hiring a nonlawyer who has worked at other law firms? In particular, must the law firm check for conflicts of interest?

OPINION:

I. A Law Firm's Supervisory Duties Over Nonlawyers Generally

DR 1-104(C) of the New York Code of Professional Responsibility provides that:

> A law firm shall adequately supervise, as appropriate, the work of partners, associates and non-lawyers who work at the firm. The degree of supervision required is that which is reasonable under the circumstances, taking into account factors such as the experience of the person whose work is being supervised, the amount of work involved in a particular matter, and the likelihood that ethical problems might arise in the course of working on the matter. (Emphasis added).

The requirement to supervise nonlawyers is intended to avoid conduct that would violate the Disciplinary Rules if engaged in by a lawyer. This objective is reinforced by DR 1-104(D), which provides that:

> A lawyer shall be responsible for a violation of the Disciplinary Rules by another lawyer or for conduct of a non-lawyer employed or retained by or associated with the lawyer that would be a violation of the Disciplinary Rules if engaged in by a lawyer if:
> > 1. The lawyer orders, or directs the specific conduct, or, with knowledge of the specific conduct, ratifies it; or

> 2. The lawyer is a partner in the law firm in which the other lawyer practices or the non-lawyer is employed, or has supervisory authority over the other lawyer or the non-lawyer, and knows of such conduct, or in the exercise of reasonable management or supervisory authority should have known of the conduct so that reasonable remedial action could be or could have been taken at a time when its consequences could be or could have been avoided or mitigated. (Emphasis added).

In short, a law firm must supervise nonlawyers as if they were governed by the Disciplinary Rules. Also relevant are DR 1-104(A) and (B), which also impose supervisory duties on law firms. They provide as follows:

> A. A law firm shall make reasonable efforts to ensure that all lawyers in the firm conform to the disciplinary rules.
> B. A lawyer with management responsibility in the law firm or direct supervisory authority over another lawyer shall make reasonable efforts to ensure that the other lawyer conforms to the disciplinary rules.

One other relevant Disciplinary Rule, DR 4-101(D), provides that:

> A lawyer shall exercise reasonable care to prevent his or her employees, associates, and others whose services are utilized by the lawyer from disclosing or using confidences or secrets of a client, except that a lawyer may reveal the information allowed by DR 4-101(C) through an employee.

The term "employees" in DR 4-101(D) refers by implication to nonlawyers. Thus, the Code of Professional Responsibility requires lawyers to take reasonable care to ensure that nonlawyers abide by DR 4-101 as if they were lawyers.

II. Supervision of Lateral Nonlawyers

A. Instruction

When a law firm hires a nonlawyer who has previously worked at another law firm, it is advisable that the law firm remind the nonlawyer to protect the confidentiality of information with respect to clients of the other firm. As expressed in EC 4-2, a lawyer is obligated "to exercise care in selecting and training employees so that the sanctity of all confidences and secrets of clients may be preserved." In N.Y. State 422 (1975), we were asked whether an attorney could hire a secretary who recently left a law firm that the hiring attorney is currently opposing. We opined that "the attorney may employ the terminating secretary who has confidential information as to pending adversarial matters, provided he cautions the secretary not to divulge any confidential information and will not permit the secretary to do so." N.Y. State 422. Therefore, we believe that a lawyer should ensure that nonlawyers under the lawyer's supervision are trained to protect the confidences and secrets learned at another law firm where the nonlawyer previously worked. Training might include instructing the nonlawyer not to accept any work assignment involving a matter on which the nonlawyer worked at the former firm.

As an additional element of its general supervisory duties under DR 1-104(A), it is advisable that a law firm instruct its lawyers not to solicit or listen to confidential information if the nonlawyer fails to comply with this instruction, and to alert the other firm lawyers involved with the matter. As we concluded in N.Y. State 700 (1998): "A lawyer who receives an unsolicited and unauthorized communication from a former employee of an adversary's law firm may not seek information from that person if the communication would exploit the adversary's confidences or secrets."

B. Checking for conflicts of interest

DR 5-105(E) requires law firms to keep contemporaneous records of prior engagements and to have "a policy implementing a system by which proposed engagements are checked against current and previous engagements." In N.Y. State 720 (1999), we said that the intent of this provision could be effected only "if a firm adds to its system information about the representations of lawyers who join the firm." We do not believe the same principle applies when nonlawyers join a law firm. A nonlawyer does not have former clients and does not "represent" clients at the new firm. Thus, DR 5-105(E) does not require law firms to search for conflicts that may be created when nonlawyers join the firm laterally.

Nevertheless, because DR 1-104(C) requires a law firm to "adequately supervise, as appropriate, the work of . . . nonlawyers who work at the firm," there are circumstances in which it is advisable for a law firm to check for conflicts when hiring a nonlawyer. For example, where a litigation paralegal is being hired by a small firm and worked for a sole practitioner who is now opposing counsel in litigation that was pending while the paralegal worked at the former firm, the risk that the paralegal acquired the opposing party's confidences and secrets is high and the law firm should check for conflicts. In such a case, the law firm should ask the paralegal about his or her role in the matter in question and whether he or she did in fact acquire confidences and secrets.[5]

On the other hand, when a personal injury firm hires a paralegal to perform work that is entirely unrelated to the real estate matters the paralegal worked on at the former employer's firm, we do not think a formal conflict check is necessary.

C. When the nonlawyer possesses confidential information from the former law firm

1. Duty not to exploit the confidential information

If a formal or informal conflict check reveals that a nonlawyer did acquire confidential information about an opposing party at the former job, the law firm must not exploit that information. In N.Y. State 700 (1998), this Committee opined that a lawyer could not take advantage of an offer by an opposing law firm's former nonlawyer employee to provide harmful information about the opposing party: "Just as a lawyer should never initiate contact with a former employee of an adversary's law firm for the purpose of obtaining confidential information of the adversary, neither may a lawyer take advantage of a former employee's willingness to violate the duty of confidentiality to the former employer's client." The Committee held that a lawyer has a duty to "refrain from encouraging a breach of client confidentiality by opposing counsel's staff."

5 Cf. Glover Bottled Gas Corp. v. Circle M. Beverage Barn, Inc., 129 A.D.2d 678 (1987), in which a Suffolk County law firm hired a paralegal who had previously worked for opposing counsel and "had worked on the litigation pending between the parties and had interviewed the plaintiff's manager concerning the facts of this case." The plaintiff moved to disqualify. The Supreme Court denied the motion, saying that the Code of Professional Responsibility does not apply to nonlawyers, but the Second Department reversed. The Second Department agreed that the Code of Professional Responsibility does not apply to nonlawyers, but noted that "it does place a burden on attorneys to insure that their employees conduct themselves in accordance with the [C]ode."

EC 7-10 states that "The duty of a lawyer to represent the client with zeal does not militate against the concurrent obligations to treat with consideration all persons involved in the legal process and to avoid the infliction of needless harm." For example, the District Court of Connecticut and the American Bar Association's Ethics Committee have both held that an attorney may not ask an opposing party's former employees for privileged communications.[6] Dubois v. Gradco Sys., Inc., 136 F.R.D. 341, 347 (D. Conn. 1991) ("plaintiff's counsel must take care not to seek to induce or listen to disclosures by the former employees of any privileged attorney-client communications to which the employee was privy"); ABA 91-359 ("the potentially-communicating adversary attorney must be careful not to seek to induce the former employee to violate the privilege attaching to attorney-client communications").

2. Duty to ensure the confidential information remains protected

Under DR 1-104(C), when a law firm is determining the degree of supervision required, an important factor is "the likelihood that ethical problems might arise in the course of working on the matter." The greater the responsibilities of the prospective nonlawyer employee in a matter while at an opposing law firm, the more likely it is that ethics problems will arise in the matter at the new firm, and the greater the degree of supervision that will be merited.

If, for example, at a former employer a secretary occasionally typed letters or took phone messages relating to a current matter of the new firm but does not recall any confidential information about it, a simple warning to the nonlawyer not to disclose any confidences and secrets acquired at the former firm would constitute adequate supervision. If, however, the secretary had played more than a ministerial role in the matter at the former firm and recalls confidential information, screening of the nonlawyer may be required to prevent the misuse of confidential information.[7]

Occasionally, however, a law firm will conclude that screening the nonlawyer will not adequately protect an opposing party's confidences and secrets. For example, if the nonlawyer had substantial exposure to relevant confidential information at the old firm and will now be working closely with the lawyers who are handling the opposite side of the same matter, or where the structure and practices of the firm make it difficult to isolate a nonlawyer from confidential conversations or documents pertaining to a given matter, a law firm may be obliged to adopt measures more radical than screening. Those measures may include the following:

6 Although the district court and ABA were applying Model Rule 4.4(a), which has not been adopted in New York, Model Rule 4.4(a) is analogous to EC 7-10, providing that: "In representing a client, a lawyer shall not use means that have no substantial purpose other than to embarrass, delay, or burden a third person, or use methods of obtaining evidence that violate the legal rights of such person."

7 This situation was recently addressed in Mulhern v. Calder, 196 Misc. 2d 818 (Sup. Ct. Alb. Co. 2003), where the court refused to disqualify a law firm that had hired a secretary who had previously been a secretary/paralegal for opposing counsel and had assisted opposing counsel on the case in question. The court said that a hiring firm "can avoid disqualification by taking steps to ensure that non-lawyer employees with confidential information are kept from divulging or using confidences obtained at the prior firm." The court said that the law firm's timely construction of a screen around the secretary/paralegal was sufficient to protect the firm from disqualification.

(a) Obtaining consent from the opposing law firm's client;

(b) Terminating the nonlawyer, see Riddell Sports, Inc. v. Brooks, 1994 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 2290 (S.D.N.Y. 1994) (Leisure, J.) (denying a motion to disqualify where a large firm had terminated a paralegal upon learning that the paralegal had worked on a case still pending between the firms, even though the paralegal had no role in that case at the firm); or

(c) Withdrawing from the matter in question. Cf. Glover Bottled Gas Corp. v. Circle M. Beverage Barn, Inc., 129 A.D.2d 678 (1987) (disqualifying law firm that hired paralegal who had previously worked for opposing counsel and "had worked on the litigation pending between the parties and had interviewed the plaintiff's manager concerning the facts of this case").

CONCLUSION:

When a New York law firm hires a nonlawyer who has previously worked at another law firm, the hiring firm must, as part of its supervisory responsibilities under DR 1-104(C) and DR 4-101(D), exercise adequate supervision to ensure that the nonlawyer does not reveal any confidences or secrets that the nonlawyer acquired while working at the other law firm. A law firm should (i) instruct all newly hired nonlawyers not to divulge any such information and (ii) instruct lawyers not to exploit such information if proffered. The hiring law firm need not always check for conflicts, but should do so in circumstances where the nonlawyer may be expected to have acquired confidences or secrets of an opposing party. If a law firm learns that a nonlawyer did acquire information protected by DR 4-101(B) that is material to a matter in which the adversary is represented by the nonlawyer's former employer, the law firm should adopt appropriate measures to guard against improper disclosure of protected information.

TOPIC: Incapacitated client; safeguarding wills; client property

DIGEST: When a possibly incapacitated former client asks a lawyer to return the client's original will, the lawyer may communicate with the former client and others to ascertain the former client's condition and wishes.

CODE: DR 2-103; DR 7-104(A)(1); DR 9-102(C)(4); EC 7-11; EC 7-12

QUESTION:

When a possibly incapacitated former client requests the return of the client's original will, may the lawyer who has been holding the will for safekeeping communicate with the former client and others to ascertain whether the client is in fact incapacitated or under undue influence, insofar as necessary to determine how to respond to the client's direction?

FACTS:

A lawyer drafted a will for an elderly client and maintained the original will for safekeeping. Some time later, the former client signed a letter, evidently prepared by someone else, requesting the return of the original will. The lawyer has reason to believe that the former client is not competent and may be acting under the influence of a family member who would benefit if the will is destroyed and the former client's estate passes through intestacy.

OPINION:

If a lawyer is safeguarding a former client's will, the lawyer ordinarily must return the will to the former client upon the client's request. See, e.g., N.Y. State 724 (1999) ("When the lawyer does agree to retain the client's original will, the lawyer . . . must keep custody of it until the client requests it or the lawyer is legally obligated to produce it"); DR 9-102(C)(4) (requiring a lawyer to "deliver to the client or third person as requested by the client or third person the . . . properties in the possession of the lawyer which the client or third person is entitled to receive"). The question in the inquirer's case, however, is how to proceed when the lawyer is genuinely uncertain whether the former client is competent to request the return of the will or the lawyer has legitimate cause for concern that the former client is under undue influence. In N.Y. State 746 (2001), we discussed some of the complexities of representing a client with diminished capacity and the "additional responsibilities" doing so places on a lawyer. See also EC 7-11 ("responsibilities of a lawyer may vary according to the intelligence, experience, mental condition or age of a client"); EC 7-12 ("Any mental or physical condition that renders a client incapable of making a considered judgment on his or her own behalf casts additional responsibilities upon the lawyer"). Similar complexities may be raised with respect to responding to the request of an incapacitated former client.

No disciplinary provision would bar the lawyer from contacting the former client directly in order to ascertain his or her genuine wishes regarding the disposition of the original will or to make a judgment about competence. DR 7-104(A)(1), which regulates communications with represented parties, is not applicable. That rule generally forbids a lawyer from communicating with a represented party in the course of representing another client. Under the facts cited above, a lawyer's communications with a former client whose will the lawyer is safeguarding would clearly not occur during the course of the representation of another client. Nor does DR 2-103, which regulates solicitation of prospective clients, have any relevance, since the lawyer would not be soliciting professional employment and, in any event, the rule generally does not apply to a lawyer's communications with clients or former clients. If, after conducting whatever inquiry the lawyer deems appropriate, the lawyer still believes the former client is or may be incompetent, the lawyer may seek judicial guidance on how to proceed.

In general, when a lawyer is uncertain about what to do with property that he or she holds for safekeeping, the lawyer may seek judicial guidance. See, e.g., N.Y. 746 (2001) (circumstances under which a lawyer may petition for appointment of guardian for client without client's consent); N.Y. State 717 (1999) (attorney obligated to pay holders of valid liens from settlement proceeds should consider several options for locating the successor of a lienor that is no longer in business, such as applying to the Supreme Court for an order); N.Y. State 710 (1998) (if escrow agreement is silent with respect to dispute resolution procedures, lawyer acting as escrow agent over funds subject of dispute might consider commencing a stakeholder's action and depositing the funds with a court).

CONCLUSION:

When a possibly incapacitated former client asks a lawyer to return the former client's original will, the lawyer may communicate with the former client and others to ascertain the former client's condition and wishes.

OPINION 776 (05/13/2004)

TOPIC: Former prosecutor; conflict of interest

DIGEST: It is a per se prohibited conflict of interest for a former prosecutor to defend an accused if the lawyer participated personally and substantially in prosecuting the defendant on the same charges while serving as a prosecutor.

CODE: DR 4-101; DR 5-101; DR 5-105; DR 9-101(B)(1); Canon 7

QUESTION:

May a former prosecutor ethically serve as defense counsel for an accused if the lawyer participated personally and substantially in prosecuting the defendant on the same charges while serving as a prosecutor?

OPINION:

Analysis Under the Code of Professional Responsibility

The Code provision most applicable to the conduct in question, Disciplinary Rule 9101(B)(1) of the Lawyer's Code of Professional Responsibility (the "Code"), states that a lawyer "shall not represent a private client in connection with a matter in which the lawyer participated personally and substantially as a public officer or employee" and, unlike DR 5-101 or DR 5-105, does not allow for waiver of the conflict by informed consent. It would therefore be a per se prohibited conflict of interest for the lawyer in question, as a former public officer, to defend the same defendant on the same charges.[8]

Moreover, as we stated in N.Y. State 748 (2001), a former prosecutor has a duty to protect confidences and secrets learned as a result of the former employment. The former prosecutor is prohibited from representing a criminal defendant where to do so would violate either the duty under DR 4-101 to protect the confidences and secrets of a former client (the People) or the duty under Canon 7 of the Code to represent the new client (the defendant) zealously, which would require the use of such confidences and secrets for the benefit of the new client.

Application of the Code of Professional Responsibility by the Courts

While the Disciplinary Rules in the Code "state the minimum level of conduct below which no lawyer can fall without being subject to disciplinary action," the "Code makes no attempt to prescribe either disciplinary procedures or penalties for violation of a Disciplinary Rule, nor does it undertake to define standards for civil liability of lawyers for professional conduct." Preliminary 8 We note, without any determination as to applicability, that an attorney "who, having himself prosecuted or in any manner aided or promoted any action [or] proceeding in any court, as district attorney or other public prosecutor, afterwards directly or indirectly advises in relation to, or takes any part in, the defense thereof, as attorney or otherwise . . . is guilty of a misdemeanor." N.Y. Jud. Law §493 (Consol. 2004).

Statement. Although the state[9] and federal courts[10] in New York look to the Code for guidance on issues of attorney conduct, a violation of the Code does not automatically lead to disqualification or other civil or criminal sanctions. See, e.g., People v. Abar, 99 N.Y.2d 406 (2003); People v. Smart, 96 N.Y.2d 793 (2001); People v. Longtin, 92 N.Y.2d 640 (1998); GD Searle & Co., Inc. v. Pennie & Edmonds LLP, N.Y.L.J., Jan. 26, 2004, at 18 (N.Y. Sup. Ct.); Gidatex, S.r.L. v. Campaniello Imports, Ltd., 82 F. Supp. 2d 119 (S.D.N.Y. 1999). Indeed, this Committee frequently has noted that conduct that is legal may nevertheless be unethical. See N.Y. State 714 (1999); N.Y. State 572 (1985) ("[W]e believe it is appropriate . . . to consider whether there is anything in the [Code] that prohibits the proposed contingent fee arrangement, assuming arguendo that this type of agreement is otherwise valid").

The very existence of the Lawyer's Code of Professional Responsibility implies that lawyers are subject to a standard of conduct higher than what is merely "legal." It follows that conduct that escapes sanction in court may still be subject to professional discipline. See Jonathan J. Lerner, Honoring Choice by Consenting Adults: Prospective Conflict Waivers as a Mature Solution to Ethical Gamesmanship – a Response to Mr. Fox, 29 Hofstra L. Rev. 971, 984 (2001) ("[A] rule that eliminates disqualification as a sanction is vastly different from giving ethical approval to the underlying conduct and does not obviate the ethical breach in representing one current client against another.")

The case law is to the same effect. For example, in People v. Abar, 99 N.Y.2d 406 (2003), a defendant sought to set aside his conviction, claiming that he had been denied effective assistance of counsel because his lawyer, the St. Lawrence County Public Defender, had prosecuted him on several of the charges involved in the plea bargain during her prior employment as an assistant district attorney in St. Lawrence County. The New York Court of Appeals refused to set aside the conviction holding that, even if a conflict of interest existed, the conflict "did not operate on the conduct of the defense." Id. at 408. See also People v. Smart, 96 N.Y.2d 793 794 (2001) ("Under these circumstances, we see no basis to conclude that any potential conflict of interest 'operated on' the defense"); People v. Longtin, 92 N.Y.2d 640, 642 (1998) ("To prevail, defendant must demonstrate that 'the conduct of his defense was in fact affected by the operation of the conflict of interest,' or that the conflict 'operated on' counsel's representation"). Significantly, the Court of Appeals in Abar acknowledged that "[New York's] disciplinary rules as well as the American Bar Association standards cited by the dissent wisely caution against such potential conflicts." People v. Abar, supra, at 408.

In another example, a New York Supreme Court recently declined to grant summary judgment in an action alleging a law firm's breach of fiduciary duties and breach of DR 5-105, notwithstanding that the court did find "a violation of DR [5-]105 has occurred and by a copy of [its] order will report its findings to the Disciplinary Committee." GD Searle & Co., Inc. v. Pennie & Edmonds LLP, N.Y.L.J., Jan. 26, 2004, at 18 (N.Y. Sup. Ct.) (order denying summary judgment).

The Court in GD Searle also observed that "there is no private right of action to enforce the disciplinary rules." Id. at 1. Utilizing similar reasoning, the United States district court in Gidatex, 9 See, e.g., GD Searle & Co., Inc. v. Pennie & Edmonds LLP, N.Y.L.J., Jan. 26, 2004, at 18 (N.Y. Sup. Ct.) ("[A] violation of the disciplinary rules may constitute evidence of malpractice").

10 See, e.g., S.D.N.Y & E.D.N.Y. Local Civ. R. 1.5(b)(5) (violation of New York Code of Professional Responsibility is one ground for discipline or other relief).

S.r.L. v. Campaniello Imports, Ltd., 82 F. Supp. 2d 119 (S.D.N.Y. 1999) refused to exclude evidence that had been obtained in violation of disciplinary rules:

> The Second Circuit Court of Appeals has ruled that a court is not obligated to exclude evidence even if it finds that counsel obtained the evidence by violating ethical rules. . . . Likewise, New York State Courts will admit evidence procured by unethical or unlawful means in violation of the [Code].
> Id. at 126 (citation omitted).

Although courts may be reluctant to enforce the disciplinary rules in the litigation context absent a showing of actual trial taint, the Code of Professional Responsibility remains the primary authority defining ethical conduct for New York lawyers.

CONCLUSION:

A former prosecutor may not ethically serve as defense counsel for an accused if the lawyer participated personally and substantially in prosecuting the defendant on the same charges while serving as a prosecutor.

OPINION 777 (08/30/2004)

TOPIC: Acquiring interest in subject matter of litigation, conflict of interest, lawyer testifying

DIGEST: A lawyer may represent a client in litigation notwithstanding that the lawyer owns a preexisting interest in the subject matter of the litigation, if the lawyer's interests and the client's interests in the outcome of the litigation are not in conflict and the lawyer will not be called as a witness.

CODE: DR 5-101, DR 5-102(A), (B), DR 5-103(A), EC 5-3, EC 5-7.

QUESTION:

May a lawyer who owns an interest in land that is the subject of an annexation dispute between two neighboring towns represent one of the towns in the dispute?

FACTS:

The inquirer is a lawyer who owns an interest in land located in the Town of A. The lawyer filed a petition with the Town of A and with the neighboring Town of B to annex a portion of the property into the Town of B. The A Town Board opposed the annexation; the B Town Board supported it. Inquirer asks whether it is permissible to represent the Town of B pro bono in litigation between the two towns over the issue.

OPINION:

The inquiry raises issues under three disciplinary rules: DR 5-101, relating to conflicts between a client's interests and a lawyer's personal interests; DR 5-103(A), barring a lawyer from acquiring an interest in the subject matter of litigation; and DR 5102, relating to lawyers acting as witnesses in matters in which they act as counsel.

Personal conflicts. DR 5-101 provides that:

> A lawyer shall not accept or continue employment if the exercise of professional judgment on behalf of the client will be or reasonably may be affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property, or personal interests, unless a disinterested lawyer would believe that the representation of the client will not be adversely affected thereby and the client consents to the representation after full disclosure of the implications of the lawyer's interest.

The inquirer believes that the inquirer has a unity of interest with the Town of B in the outcome of the litigation, as both the inquirer and the Town wish to annex the land to the Town of B. The inquirer would proceed only after full disclosure of the interest to the Town B Board.

If the interests of the lawyer and the Town of B are fully aligned, then it is likely that a disinterested lawyer would conclude that the inquirer's representation of the client would not be adversely affected by the inquirer's interest in the land, so that Town B may validly consent to the representation after full disclosure. This determination depends on all the facts and circumstances, however. For example, the inquirer should consider whether the inquirer's interests and the Town's may diverge at some time in the future. "Even if the property interests of a lawyer do not presently interfere with the exercise of independent judgment, but the likelihood of interference can be reasonably foreseen by the lawyer, the lawyer should explain the situation to the client and should decline employment or withdraw unless after full disclosure the client consents, preferably in writing, to the continuance of the relationship." EC 5-3. The inquirer also should consider whether the Town can validly consent to waive the conflict under the standards set forth in N.Y. State 629 (1992).

Proprietary interest in subject matter of litigation. DR 5-103(A) provides that:

> A lawyer shall not acquire a proprietary interest in the cause of action or subject matter of litigation he or she is conducting for a client, except that the lawyer may:
> 1. Acquire a lien granted by law to secure the lawyer's fee or expenses.
> 2. Except as provided in section DR 2-106(C)(2) or (3), contract with a client for a reasonable contingent fee in a civil case.

DR 5-103(A) does not prevent the inquirer from representing the Town of B, notwithstanding the ownership of an interest in the land that is the subject matter of the litigation, because the Code only prohibits the acquisition of an interest in the subject matter of litigation, not the preexisting possession of such an interest.

Other ethics committees have likewise reached the conclusion that DR 5-103(A), or the similar ABA Model Rule 1.8(i), do not prevent a lawyer with a preexisting interest in the subject matter of a litigation from representing a client whose interests are aligned with the lawyer's in that litigation. See, e.g., Maine Opinion 92 (1988) (the rule "does not extend so broadly as to prohibit a lawyer who has an interest in his client from representing the client in litigation provided the lawyer's interest was acquired for reasons independent of and apart from any consideration of litigation which might thereafter be contemplated"); Alabama Opinion 85-23 (attorney who is one of the heirs may represent self and other heirs in filing a petition for division and sale); Alabama Opinion 84-159 (lawyer who is member of property owner's association may represent other property owners in seeking to prevent liens on their property); see also In re Capobianco v. Halebass Realty, Inc., 72 A.D.2d 804 (2d Dep't 1979) (action to foreclose on mortgage not champertous "if the attorney had a legitimate business interest in acquiring the assignment, e.g., as an incidental part of a commercial transaction"); Zylstra v. Safeway Stores, Inc., 578 F.2d 102, 105 (5th Cir. 1978) ("Ordinarily there would be no objection to an attorney representing his wife in litigation").[11]

This does not mean that a lawyer with a preexisting interest in the subject matter of the litigation may represent a party to the litigation without any restrictions. Such an interest will generally give rise to a conflict or potential conflict under DR 5-101. See also EC 57 ("The possibility of an adverse effect upon the exercise of free judgment by the lawyer on behalf of the client during litigation generally makes it undesirable for the lawyer to acquire a proprietary interest in the cause of the client or otherwise to become financially interested in the outcome of the litigation"). As indicated by the facts here, however, the conflict under DR 5-101 will often be waivable. Without deciding the issue, we observe that DR 5-103(A) appears to bar acquisition of an interest in the subject matter of the litigation regardless of whether the client is willing to consent. One explanation for this treatment is that the roots of DR 5-103(A) lie in the prohibitions on maintenance and champerty. See, e.g., ABA 00-416 ("Rule 1.8(j) [now 1.8(i) which is virtually identical to DR 5103(A)] is rooted in the common law doctrines of maintenance and champerty. The present Rule is intended to prevent conflicts of interest that might interfere with the lawyer's exercise of independent professional judgment on the client's behalf").

11 See also Peggy Walz, Inc. v. Liz Wain, Inc., No. 94 Civ. 1579, 1996 WL 88556, at *3 (S.D.N.Y. 1996) (disqualifying plaintiffs counsel, citing DR 5-103(A), where the lawyer had formed the plaintiff corporation with a client after the dispute had arisen). But see Bachman v. Pertschuk, 437 F. Supp. 973, 976-77 (D.D.C. 1977) (federal employee cannot represent a class of federal employees against employer-agency, citing, inter alia, DR 5-103).

Lawyer as witness. DR 5-102(A) provides that, with certain exceptions:

> A lawyer shall not act, or accept employment that contemplates the lawyer's acting, as an advocate on issues of fact before any tribunal if the lawyer knows or it is obvious that the lawyer ought to be called as a witness on a significant issue on behalf of the client . . . .[12]

DR 5-102(B) also bars a lawyer from accepting employment in contemplated or pending litigation if the lawyer or a lawyer in his or her firm "may be called as a witness on a significant issue other than on behalf of the client, and it is apparent that the testimony would or might be prejudicial to the client."

Thus, the inquirer may be barred from accepting employment on behalf of the Town of B if the lawyer "ought to be" called as a witness on the client's behalf (and no exception applies) or if the inquirer might be called as a witness adverse to the client. See also ABA Inf. Op. 899 (1965) (where an attorney both appears pro se and represents others in a legal proceeding, "there is . . . the possibility he might become a witness in the proceedings in which case he should not act as an attorney except in rare and unusual circumstances"); Walz, 1996 WL 88556, at *3-4 (disqualification would not be appropriate under DR 5102 where other witnesses could testify about the same facts).

CONCLUSION:

The inquirer may represent the Town of B in the dispute with the Town of A, notwithstanding the preexisting ownership interest in the subject matter of the litigation, where the inquirer's interests are aligned with the Town of B's interests and informed consent has been obtained from the Town of B, unless the inquirer ought to be, or in certain circumstances may be, called as a witness on a significant issue.

(12-04)

12 The exceptions are:

1. If the testimony will relate solely to an uncontested issue.
2. If the testimony will relate solely to a matter of formality and there is no reason to believe that substantial evidence will be offered in opposition to the testimony.
3. If the testimony will relate solely to the nature and value of legal services rendered in the case by the lawyer or the lawyer's firm to the client.
4. As to any matter, if disqualification as an advocate would work a substantial hardship on the client because of the distinctive value of the lawyer as counsel in the particular case.

OPINION 778 (08/30/2004)

TOPIC: Conflicts of interest; representing multiple defendants.

OVERRULES (IN PART): N.Y. State 555 (1984)

DIGEST: Lawyer engaged by insurance company may not represent two defendants, one of whom has a potential indemnification claim against the other, unless a disinterested lawyer would believe the lawyer can competently represent the interests of each, the one defendant waives the right to assert indemnification as cross-claim, and both defendants otherwise consent after full disclosure.

CODE: DR 5-105(A), (B), (C); DR 5-108 (A); EC 5-15, 5-16, 5-17

QUESTION:

May a lawyer engaged by an insurance carrier represent two co-defendants who are named insureds when the amount of the plaintiff's claim exceeds the policy limits and one co-defendant has an indemnification claim against the other?

OPINION:

The owner of a building hired a general contractor who agreed to procure a liability insurance policy naming both the general contractor and the owner as insured, and also agreed to defend and indemnify the owner with regard to any claims arising from the construction. A subcontractor's employee was injured and sued both the contractor and the owner for an amount in excess of the policy limits. The insurance carrier seeks to engage one lawyer to defend both the general contractor and the owner.

Under DR 5-105(A) and (B) of the Code of Professional Responsibility (the "Code"), a lawyer must decline to represent multiple clients if the exercise of independent professional judgment on behalf of one client will be or is likely to be adversely affected by the lawyer's representation of the other client, or if it would be likely to involve the lawyer in representing differing interests. DR 5-105(C) nevertheless permits a lawyer to represent multiple clients if a disinterested lawyer would believe that the lawyer can competently represent the interest of each and if each consents to the representation after full disclosure of the implications of the simultaneous representation and the advantages and risks involved. See EC 5-15, 5-16, 5-17.

Under the Code, the "differing interests" include "every interest that will adversely affect either the judgment or the loyalty of a lawyer to a client, whether it be conflicting, inconsistent, diverse or other interest." Code Definitions. In the facts at issue, differing interests arise from the owner's contractual rights to indemnification from the contractor with respect to the amount of the claim exceeding the policy limits.[13]

13 If the claim did not exceed the policy limits, the indemnification right becomes irrelevant if the carrier is not disclaiming liability as to any claim against the owner.

Consequently, the lawyer must first determine if a disinterested lawyer would believe that the lawyer can competently represent the interest of both the owner and the contractor. For example, a disinterested lawyer may determine that he or she could not competently represent the interests of both if the lawyer believes that the owner should assert the indemnification rights as a cross-claim or if the complaint alleges an independent claim of negligence against the owner so that the trial will necessarily involve determining the apportionment of liability between the two defendants.[14] Assuming that a disinterested lawyer would believe that the lawyer can competently represent the interest of both the owner and the contractor, the lawyer may do so only if each consents to the representation after full disclosure of the implications of the joint representation and the advantages and risks involved.

Such disclosure should explain the potential advantage to both clients of presenting a unified defense to the plaintiff employee's action and the offsetting disadvantage to the owner of the owner's consequent inability to assert indemnification rights as a cross-claim in the same action. Although the owner could defer asserting the indemnification claim until such time (if ever) as the plaintiff obtains a judgment, the owner would face the risks of (1) necessary witnesses becoming unavailable, (2) a judgment being enforced by the plaintiff against the owner before the indemnification claim has been fully litigated, and (3) the possibility of the general contractor becoming judgment proof. On one hand, both parties would likewise endure the expense and inconvenience of two trials rather than one.[15] On the other hand, if the original litigation were to result in a verdict or settlement for less than the policy limit, joint representation would have, in retrospect, greatly simplified the litigation with no risk to the owner.

In seeking consent to a joint representation the lawyer should explain to both clients any other potential consequences, including (1) the lawyer's obligation, absent each client's agreement to other arrangements, to disclose to one client any confidences and secrets communicated to the lawyer by the other client, N.Y. State 761 (2003),[16] (2) circumstances which may require the lawyer to withdraw from the representation entirely or, with appropriate consent, to continue to represent only one of the clients, N.Y. State 674 (1995), and (3) possible consequences at trial, such as the number of peremptory challenges granted to the defendants.

14 If the trial will necessarily involve an apportionment of liability between two defendants, a subsequent action by one seeking indemnification from the other may be precluded by the doctrine of collateral estoppel. Schwartz v. Public Adm'r of County of Bronx, 24 N.Y.2d 65 (1969).

15 Issues regarding the obligation of the carrier to provide a defense to its insured, the extent to which that obligation may include bringing or defending a cross-claim for an excess amount, and how the responsibility to pay lawyer fees should be divided between the insured and the carrier with respect to the cross-claim are considerations which may be relevant in the insured's determination as to consenting to the joint representation, but are matters of law and of contract on which this Committee does not opine. However, we note that New York courts have generally held that an insured defendant is entitled to defense by a lawyer of his or her own choosing at the insurer's expense when the insurer's interest in defending the lawsuit is in conflict with the defendant's interest. See, e.g., Public Service Mut. Ins. Co. v. Goldfarb, 53 N.Y.2d 392 (1981); Bryan v. State-Wide Ins. Co., 144 A.D.2d 325 (1988); cf. Nat. City Bank v. N.Y. Cent. Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 6 A.D.3d 1116 (2004)(if carrier provided defense, hiring separate counsel to pursue cross-claims was responsibility of insured); Goldberg v. American Home Assurance Co., 80 A.D.2d 409 (1981)(no conflict so no entitlement to separate counsel). Regardless of the extent to which lawyer fees may be paid by the carrier, the insured is the client of the lawyer engaged by the carrier, and the lawyer is obligated to represent the insured with undivided fidelity. N.Y. State 73 (1967).

16 To the extent that N.Y. State 555 (1984) suggests that full disclosure to both clients is not required even absent an agreement to that effect "where disclosure to the other joint client would obviously be detrimental to the communicating client," it is overruled.

Because the claim here exceeds the policy limits, both defendants should be advised of their right to have separate counsel with respect to the excess claim. The lawyer contacted by the insurance company may find it advisable to recommend to the owner that he or she seek separate counsel to advise both as to the excess claim and as to the advisability of asserting a cross-claim in the present litigation.

If the owner ultimately determines that the advantages of a unified defense outweigh the disadvantages of deferring the indemnification claim, and the parties otherwise consent, the lawyer may represent both parties. In that event, the lawyer would be precluded from representing either party in a subsequent action to enforce the indemnification rights without obtaining the separate consent of the other client after full disclosure. DR 5-108(A).

The conclusion of this opinion is in harmony with prior opinions of this Committee. N.Y. State 560 (1984) involved two defendants in a medical malpractice action, one of whom as a passive tortfeasor had a potential claim against the other as an active tortfeasor. Because one of the defendants did not consent to a joint representation, the Committee concluded that the lawyer could not represent them both. In N.Y. State 191 (1971) the issue was whether a lawyer could represent both the driver of one car and his adult daughter-passenger against the driver of the other car if the daughter, fully informed, chose to waive any cause of action against her father. Because that opinion involved plaintiffs and did not involve the possibility of a subsequent indemnification action, the opinion discussed only a cross-claim and joint representation and concluded that the lawyer could not represent both the father and the daughter unless the daughter confirmed that in no event would she want to sue her father, no matter how good a cause of action she might have against him. See also N.Y. State 349 (1974)(absent special circumstances, lawyer may not represent driver-husband and wife-passenger as plaintiffs if defendant may assert proportionate liability against one plaintiff to reduce damages sought by the other plaintiff).

On the facts of this opinion, it does not appear that it is necessary for the owner to waive any indemnification cause of action against the builder as long as the owner agrees not to assert that cause of action as a cross-claim and otherwise consents.

CONCLUSION:

A lawyer engaged by an insurance company to represent two defendants, one of whom has a potential indemnification claim against the other, may not do so unless the lawyer determines a disinterested lawyer would believe the lawyer can competently represent the interests of each defendant, the defendant with the indemnification claim waives the right to assert it as a cross-claim, and both defendants otherwise consent after full disclosure.

OPINION 779 (11/05/2004)

TOPIC: Paying a National Marketing Organization for Referrals

DIGEST: Improper for an attorney to pay money to a marketing organization in return for that organization providing the attorney with "leads" to potential clients.

CODE: DR 2-103(B)

QUESTION:

May an attorney pay a marketing organization a fee in return for being furnished with a bundle of pre-screened client "leads," consisting of potential clients who may need representation in connection with their Federal income taxes?

BACKGROUND:

A marketing organization ("Marketer") advertises nationally, seeking customers to whom Marketer can provide certain federal income tax reduction services. Marketer obtains intake data from interested customers and screens the file to see if the customer is likely to qualify for various sorts of relief from the Internal Revenue Service. Marketer offers New York attorneys the opportunity to purchase bundles of 20 pre-screened customer "leads" in return for the attorney paying Marketer a one-time sign-up fee of $500 and a fee of $1400 for each bundle of 20 "leads." After an attorney buys a bundle of "leads," Marketer will seek to have the customer sign a Power of Attorney Form and a copy of the attorney's retainer agreement and will collect and transmit to the attorney the suggested partial fee of $1000 obtained from the customer. If the customer decides not to go forward, Marketer makes no refund of the $1400 fee paid by the attorney for the bundle of "leads." Attorneys may purchase as many bundles of "leads" as they wish. The attorney then represents the customer in dealings with the Internal Revenue Service and collects the balance of the agreed upon fee. May an attorney ethically participate in the proposed arrangement?

OPINION:

We note initially that the services in question may be performed by non-attorney CPAs and enrolled agents without those persons being considered to be engaged in the unauthorized practice of law. This Committee has recognized that there are a number of services that can be performed appropriately by both lawyers and non-lawyers, such as tax return preparation, N.Y. State 557 (1984), financial planning, N.Y. State 633 (1992) and legal research done for lawyers, N.Y. State 721 (1999) (outside research service required by an insurance company may be staffed by lawyers or non-lawyer personnel), but we have also consistently held that "when such services are performed by a lawyer who holds himself out as a lawyer, they constitute the practice of law and the lawyer, in performing them, is governed by the Code." N.Y. State 662 (1994) (quoting N.Y. State 557 [1984]). See also N.Y. State 636 (1992) (lawyer's operation of business selling standard will forms to public is not practice of law if forms are not individualized and advice is not rendered as to selection of form); ABA 297 (1961) (if activity is the practice of law when performed by lawyer, lawyer does not escape ethical requirements by "announcing he is to be regarded as a layman" for that particular purpose). So the services performed by the lawyer in the question presented constitute the practice of law and the lawyer would be governed by the Code in connection with these services.

We believe that the participation of an attorney in the arrangement proposed by Marketer is governed by DR 2-103(B):

> B. A lawyer shall not compensate or give anything of value to a person or organization to recommend or obtain employment by a client, or as a reward for having made a recommendation resulting in employment by a client, except that:
> 1. A lawyer or law firm may refer clients to a nonlegal professional or nonlegal professional service firm pursuant to a contractual relationship with such nonlegal professional or nonlegal professional service firm to provide legal and other professional services on a systematic and continuing basis as permitted by DR 1-107, provided however that such referral shall not otherwise include any monetary or other tangible consideration or reward for such, or the sharing of legal fees; or

The payment by an attorney of $500 and $1400 for a bundle of "leads" to prospective clients would violate DR 2-103(B) because neither of the exceptions in sub-paragraphs (1) or (2) applies. The payments would be compensation paid to Marketer "to recommend or obtain employment by a client," so it would be improper for an attorney to participate in the proposed transaction with Marketer. See N. Y. State 741 (2001) (lawyer may not participate in business network that requires reciprocal referrals) and the opinions cited therein. N.Y. State 705 (1998) does not compel a different result; that opinion indicated that a tax reduction company, acting as an agent for a client, could engage a lawyer to represent the client and that the lawyer's fee could be a portion of the money paid by the client to the company, provided that the company's own fee was separate and distinguishable from the payment for the lawyer's services. N.Y. State 705 is not applicable because it did not involve a lawyer paying for referrals.

CONCLUSION:

It would be improper for an attorney to pay money to a marketing organization in return for that organization providing the attorney with "leads" to potential clients.

OPINION 780 (12/08/2004)

TOPIC: Retaining copies of client's file over client's objection; limitation of attorney liability.

DIGEST: Generally proper for a lawyer to retain copies of a client's file; proper to require a release of malpractice liability as a condition of returning the file without retaining copies.

CODE: DR 2-110(A)(2), 4-101(C)(4), 6-102(A), 9-102(C)(4); EC 4-6.

QUESTIONS:

1. May a lawyer retain copies of the client's file over the objection of the client?

2. May the lawyer demand a release from liability as a condition of not retaining copies?

OPINION:

1. May copies of file documents be retained by the lawyer?

When a lawyer's employment by a client ends, whether because the lawyer withdraws, the client terminates the engagement or the matter is completed, the lawyer is required to deliver to the client property, including files, which the client is entitled to receive as a matter of law. The New York Code of Professional Responsibility (the "Code") does not provide guidance on which documents the client is entitled to receive as a matter of law. Rather, the Code provides in various sections only that the lawyer is ethically obligated to return to the client that which the client is legally entitled to receive. DR 2-110(A)(2) of the Code, governing withdrawal from employment, requires a lawyer contemplating withdrawal to "[deliver] to the client all papers and property to which the client is entitled." Similarly, DR 9-102(C)(4) of the Code provides that a lawyer shall "[p]romptly pay or deliver to the client or third person as requested by the client or third person the funds, securities, or other properties in the possession of the lawyer which the client or third person is entitled to receive."

The question of which documents the client is entitled to receive is "generally a question of law, not ethics." N.Y. State 766 (1993). See N.Y. State 623 (1991) ("Which documents may be deemed to belong to the lawyer is not always easy to ascertain; in certain instances, the lawyer's ownership of such documents may be a complex issue of both law and fact."). See Restatement (Third) of the Law Governing Lawyers §46(2).

Although the Code does not explicitly address the issue of whether the lawyer has an interest in the file that would permit the lawyer to retain copies of file documents, there can be little doubt that the lawyer has such an interest. As a preliminary matter, nothing in the Code prohibits a lawyer from retaining copies of the file, while EC 4-6 refers to "personal papers of the client" as distinguished from "papers of the lawyer." DR 4-101(C)(4) of the Code provides as an exception to the general rule of confidentiality the lawyer's right to reveal a client's confidences or secrets in order to collect fees or defend against an accusation of wrongful conduct. Implicit in that rule is the lawyer's right to retain copies of the file in order to collect a fee or to defend against an accusation of wrongful conduct New York case law appears to recognize that both the client and the lawyer have an interest in the file.[17] Finally, the lawyer's right to retain copies of the file may be reflected in a retainer agreement or an engagement letter.

In summary, we agree with the several ethics opinions from other jurisdictions that a lawyer may retain copies of the file at the lawyer's expense.[18] This general rule may be subject to exceptions that we are not required to elaborate on in this opinion, such as where the client has a legal right to prevent others from copying its documents and wishes for legitimate reasons to ensure that no copies of a particular document be available under any circumstances.

17 In Sage Realty Corp. v. Proskauer Rose Goetz & Mendelsohn, 91 N.Y.2d 30, 37 (1997), the Court of Appeals observed that courts have "refused to recognize a property right of the attorney in the file superior to that of the client." The New York Supreme Court case cited in Sage for that proposition is Bronx Jewish Boys v. Uniglobe, Inc.:

> Under New York law, an attorney has a general possessory retaining lien which allows an attorney to keep a client's file until his/her legal fee is paid. Implied in this is the rule that attorneys have no possessory rights in the client files other than to protect their fee. In other words, the file belongs to the client.

Bronx Jewish Boys v. Uniglobe, Inc., 166 Misc. 2d 347, 350, 633 N.Y.S. 2d 711, 713 (Sup. Ct. 1995) (citation omitted, emphasis added). Although Bronx Jewish Boys held that the "file belongs to the client", the Court of Appeals in Sage observed that both the lawyer and client have an interest in the "client's" file. See also In re Grand Jury Proceedings (Vargas), 727 F.2d 941, 944-45 (10th Cir.) ("So far as we can determine, it is a general principle of law that client files belong to the client . . . the attorney's interest is only that of a retaining lien and his interest at best is a pecuniary one, not an interest of ownership, nor privacy"), cert. denied sub nom, Vargas v. United States, 469 U.S. 819 (1984); Matter of Calestini, 321 F. Supp. 1313, 1316 (N.D. Ca. 1971) ("In the instance of a legal file, the client has the right to the file. It is therefore 'property' of the client"). But see Michigan Ethics Committee Op. R-19 (2000) ("There is no legal support in Michigan for the proposition that the files are the property of the client. The applicable legal precedent involving other professionals closely analogous to lawyers demonstrates that the courts have recognized that such professionals provide services, not goods.")

18 For instance, Nebraska adopted the rule that "a client is entitled to (1) the documents he gave the lawyer; (2) anything acquired in discovery; (3) all correspondence; and (4) all notes, memorandums, and briefs generated by the lawyer," although "[t]he lawyer may retain copies of the file, but may not charge for photocopying unless the fee agreement provided otherwise." Neb. Op. 2001-03 (2001), indexed in ABA/BNA Lawyers' Manual on Professional Conduct 1201:5501 (emphasis supplied). Similarly, Massachusetts demands that an attorney return to the client any "original documents supplied by the client," as well as "any investigatory or discovery documents for which the client has paid out-of-pocket expenses." Mass. Op. 92-4 (1992), indexed in ABA/BNA Lawyers' Manual on Professional Conduct 1001:4603. Massachusetts allows the firm to keep copies of those documents at its own expense. Id. A similar opinion was reached by San Francisco, which recognized that although "[t]he lawyer must return all materials the client delivered to him . . . the lawyer may copy a client's file before turning it over." S.F. Bar Op. 1990-1 (1990), indexed in ABA/BNA Lawyers' Manual on Professional Conduct 901:1851. San Francisco also concluded that the lawyer must copy the file at his own expense. Id. Alabama allows an attorney to retain a copy of a client's file so long as the attorney bears the cost of reproduction. Ala. Op. 88-102 (1988), indexed in ABA/BNA Lawyers' Manual on Professional Conduct 901:1048 ("A lawyer who previously served as counsel for a client and is replaced by other counsel may keep the client's files only if the client so directs because the files belong to the client. The lawyer may, however, retain copies of the client's file at her own expense").

Likewise, the Ohio State Bar Association requires an attorney to promptly deliver a file to a former client, but permits an attorney to retain copies of the file at the attorney's own expense. Ohio Op. 92-8 (1992), indexed in ABA/BNA Lawyers' Manual on Professional Conduct 1001:6856 ("A lawyer whose former client requests receipt of her case file and has paid the lawyer in full must promptly deliver the file to the client. The lawyer may keep a copy of the file but may not charge the client for the copying costs"). The Colorado Bar Association arrived at the same conclusion, requiring that, upon termination, lawyers "surrender papers and property to which the client is entitled." Colo. Op. 104 (1999), indexed in ABA/BNA Lawyers' Manual on Professional Conduct 1101:1902. Colorado permits a lawyer "to retain copies of documents surrendered to a client," but adds that the lawyer "may not charge the client for duplication costs." Id. Similarly, the Kentucky Bar Association opined, "When a lawyer is discharged, he should deliver to the client all property and files to which the client is entitled . . . [t]he lawyer may wish to copy items in the client's file." Ky. Op. E-235 (1980), indexed in ABA/BNA Lawyers' Manual on Professional Conduct 801:3902.

2. May a lawyer demand a release as a condition of not retaining copies of the file?

Although this Committee has previously held that a lawyer may not insist on a general release as a condition of returning the client's file, N.Y. State 339 (1974), it has not addressed the question whether a lawyer's agreement to give up the right to retain copies of the file may be conditioned on such a release. Because we believe that a lawyer has a right to retain copies of the file, if the client objects to the lawyer's retention of copies, we hold that the lawyer may insist on a general release as a condition of acquiescence.

DR 6-102(A) of the Code prohibits a lawyer from "prospectively" seeking to limit liability to a client for malpractice, but does not prohibit a lawyer from seeking a release for work already completed, as contemplated here. A lawyer may "ethically negotiate with a former client for the settlement or release of potential malpractice claims, but only after the lawyer takes specific steps to insure that the negotiations are fair", which steps include advising the client to seek independent counsel in the negotiation and consummation for the release. N.Y. State 591 (1988).[19]

CONCLUSION:

A lawyer may generally retain copies of documents in the client's file at the lawyer's own expense, even over the client's objection. As a condition of foregoing this right, a lawyer may seek to have the client release the lawyer from malpractice liability.

(19-04)

19 To maintain fair negotiations with a former client, a lawyer must adhere to the following conditions: "a client must be fully appraised of the facts pertaining to the representation that may give rise to specific claims against the lawyer; the lawyer has been discharged or has withdrawn from the representation in accordance with DR 2-110; and the lawyer has advised the client to secure independent counsel in the negotiation and consummation of such an agreement." N.Y. State 591 (1988); N.Y. State 275 (1972). To maintain fair negotiations, an attorney may not retain a lien on a client's papers and documents. Id. ("Fair negotiations over a release are not possible while the lawyer retains a position of advantage by withholding the client's papers"). Although an attorney may retain a lien on a client's papers until the client compensates the attorney for any unpaid legal fees, N.Y. State 567 (1984), the attorney may not retain the file as a mechanism to secure a release from malpractice. N.Y. State 591 (1988) ("The lawyer may not retain the client's files as a bargaining chip to secure a release."). See also Wis. Op. E-85-12 (1986), indexed in ABA/BNA Lawyers' Manual on Professional Conduct 801:9117 ("A lawyer may not condition the return of client documents and the settlement of his related fees upon the client's release of any legal malpractice claims . . . unless the client is advised in writing to secure independent counsel in the negotiation and consummation of such agreement") (emphasis supplied).

TOPIC: Matrimonial lawyer's duty upon discovery that financial statement filed with family Court contained material errors due to fraud by client.

DIGEST: A matrimonial lawyer who learns that a financial statement submitted by the lawyer to family court contains a material omission, and that the client perpetrated a fraud on the tribunal, must call upon the client to rectify the material omission. If the client refuses, the lawyer must withdraw the financial statement. If the lawyer knows or it is obvious that continued employment will result in violation of a Disciplinary Rule, the lawyer must withdraw from the representation, with the court's permission if required under its rules.

CODE: DR 1-102, 2-110, 4-101, 7-102; EC 7-6.

QUESTION:

A matrimonial lawyer, in order to submit a financial statement on behalf of a client, certified the accuracy of the statement to family court.[20] After filing the statement, the lawyer learns that it contains a material error relating to the omission of substantial client assets. Is the lawyer required to withdraw the financial statement?

OPINION:

DR 7-102(B)(1) of the Lawyer's Code of Professional Responsibility (the "Code") states that:

> A lawyer who receives information clearly establishing that the client has, in the course of the representation, perpetrated a fraud upon a person or tribunal shall promptly call upon the client to rectify the same, and if the client refuses or is unable to do so, the lawyer shall reveal the fraud to the affected person or tribunal, except when the information is protected as a confidence or secret.

20 See 22 NYCRR §202.16(e) ("Every paper served on another party or filed or submitted to the court in a matrimonial action shall be signed as provided in section 130-1.1[A] of this Title"); see also 22 NYCRR §130-1.1A(b) ("By signing a paper, an attorney or party certifies that, to the best of that person's knowledge, information and belief, formed after an inquiry reasonable under the circumstances, the presentation of the paper or the contentions therein are not frivolous as defined in section 130-1.1(c) of this Subpart"). 22 NYCRR §130-1.1(c) states that:

> (c) For purposes of this Part, conduct is frivolous if:
> (1) it is completely without merit in law and cannot be supported by a reasonable argument for an extension, modification or reversal of existing law;
> (2) it is undertaken primarily to delay or prolong the resolution of the litigation, or to harass or maliciously injure another; or
> (3) it asserts material factual statements that are false.
> Frivolous conduct shall include the making of a frivolous motion for costs or sanctions under this section. In determining whether the conduct undertaken was frivolous, the court shall consider, among other issues the circumstances under which the conduct took place, including the time available for investigating the legal or factual basis of the conduct, and whether or not the conduct was continued when its lack of legal or factual basis was apparent, or should have been apparent, or was brought to the attention of counsel or the party.

Therefore, the lawyer must first determine if he or she received information "clearly establishing" that the client has committed a fraud. "Fraud" under the Code "does not include conduct, although characterized as fraudulent by statute or administrative rule, which lacks an element of scienter, deceit, intent to mislead, or knowing failure to correct misrepresentations which can be reasonably expected to induce detrimental reliance by another." Code, Definition 9. If the lawyer is uncertain of the client's state of mind in making this determination, EC 7-6 states that the lawyer should "resolve reasonable doubts in favor of the client."[21]

If the lawyer has information clearly establishing the client's fraud, then the lawyer must call upon the client to rectify the same, and if the client refuses, the lawyer must "reveal the fraud to the affected person or tribunal, except when the information is protected as a confidence or secret." DR 7-102(B)(1). As we stated in N.Y. State 674 (1995):

> In order to balance the attorney's dual duties to preserve confidences and reveal frauds, we interpret the phrase "confidences and secrets" in DR 7-102(B) to mean those confidences and secrets that must be preserved by DR 4-101. In a case where the lawyer is permitted to reveal a confidence or secret under DR 4-101(C), disclosure of the fraud is mandatory under DR 7-102(B).[22]

Although a lawyer is generally prohibited from disclosing a client's confidence or secret,[23] DR 4-101(C)(5) permits disclosure to the extent implicit in withdrawing the financial statement because the statement is still being relied upon by the court[24] and because the lawyer certified the accuracy of the statement in submitting it to the court.[25] In short, permissive disclosure under DR 4-101(C)(5) mandates disclosure under DR 7-102(B)(1).

Therefore, the lawyer is required to withdraw the financial statement, and is required to reveal confidences or secrets to the extent implicit in such withdrawal.

22 Emphasis added. In N.Y. State 674, this Committee concluded that the false testimony provided by a corporate officer in the first day of testimony before a tribunal did not constitute an ongoing crime such that the lawyer would be permitted to disclose the perjury to the tribunal under DR 4-101(C).

23 DR 4-101(A) defines "confidence" as "information protected by the attorney-client privilege under applicable law," and "secret" as "other information gained in the professional relationship that the client has requested be held inviolate or the disclosure of which would be embarrassing or would be likely to be detrimental to the client."

24 DR 4-101(C)(5) permits disclosure of confidences or secrets "to the extent implicit in withdrawing a written or oral opinion or representation previously given by the lawyer, and believed by the lawyer still to be relied upon by a third person where the lawyer has discovered that the opinion or representation was based on materially inaccurate information or is being used to further a crime or fraud."

25 In Nassau County 2003-1, a lawyer learned that his client had misrepresented indigence in order to obtain the lawyer's representation through an indigent lawyer program. The committee concluded that, although the lawyer must call upon the client to "rectify the fraud" and, failing that, to seek to withdraw from the representation, that the fact of the misrepresentation could not be disclosed to the court because the information was protected as a secret. In that case, the lawyer had no role in submitting the fraudulent financial statement that suggested that the client was indigent, whereas here the representation had been certified by the lawyer. See DR 4-101(C)(5); s*ee also* N.Y. City 2002-1 (DR 4-101(C)(3) crime exception to confidentiality does not apply if crime is completed or upon "mere suspicion" that client intends to commit a future crime); N.Y. In addition, the lawyer may withdraw from the representation if (i) withdrawal can be accomplished without material adverse effect on the client's interests, or (ii) the client persists in involving the lawyer's services in conduct the lawyer reasonably believes is criminal or fraudulent, insists that the lawyer engage in illegal conduct or conduct that violates the Disciplinary Rules, or has used the lawyer's services to perpetrate a crime or fraud. DR 2-110(C)(1)(b, c and g). The lawyer must withdraw from the representation[26] if the lawyer knows or it is obvious that continued employment will result in violation of a Disciplinary Rule. DR 2-110(B)(2).

CONCLUSION:

The lawyer is required to withdraw the erroneous financial statement.

OPINION 782 (12/08/2004)

TOPIC: E-mailing documents that may contain hidden data reflecting client confidences and secrets.

DIGEST: Lawyers must exercise reasonable care to prevent the disclosure of confidences and secrets contained in "metadata" in documents they transmit electronically to opposing counsel or other third parties.

CODE: DR 1-102(A)(5), 4-101(B), (C), (D); EC 4-5.

QUESTION:

DR 4-101(B) states that a lawyer shall not "knowingly" reveal a confidence or secret of a client. Does a lawyer who transmits documents that contain "metadata" reflecting client confidences or secrets violate DR 4-101(B)?

OPINION:

Word-processing software commonly used by lawyers, such as Microsoft Word and Corel WordPerfect, include features that permit recipients of documents transmitted by e-mail to view "metadata," which may be loosely defined as data hidden in documents that is generated during the course of creating and editing such documents. It may include fragments of data from files that were previously deleted, overwritten or worked on simultaneously.[27] Metadata may reveal the persons who worked on a document, the name of the organization in which it was created or worked on, information concerning prior versions of the document, recent revisions of the document, and comments inserted in the document in the drafting or editing process. The hidden text may reflect editorial comments, strategy considerations, legal issues raised by the client or the lawyer, legal advice provided by the lawyer, and other information.[28] Not all of this information is a confidence or secret, but it may, in many circumstances, reveal information that is either privileged or the disclosure of which would be detrimental or embarrassing to the client. See DR 4-101. For example, a lawyer may transmit a document by e-mail to someone other than the client without realizing that the recipient is able to view prior edits and comments to the document that would be protected as privileged attorney-client communications. Or, more dramatically, a prosecutor using a cooperation agreement signed by one confidential witness may use the agreement as a template in drafting the agreement for another confidential witness. The second document's metadata could contain the name of the original cooperating witness, and if e-mailed, could expose that witness to extreme risks.

Most Word document files contain a revision log listing the last 10 edits of a document, and identifying the names of the people who worked on the document and the names of the files in which the data was saved. Richard M. Smith, "Microsoft Word bytes Tony Blair in the butt," June 30, 2003, at http://www.computerbytesman.com/privacy/blair.htm (describing how the British government was embarrassed in February 2003 when 10 Downing Street published a dossier on Iraq's security and intelligence organizations and posted it as a Microsoft Word document on their Web site, which through its metadata revealed the identities of the four civil servants who worked on the document as well as various other documents that contained the same information). Similarly, WordPerfect documents may contain information text that had been cut, copied or deleted, as well as the drafter's username, the drafter's initials, the company or organization name, the name of the computer, embedded objects, comments, and other file properties and summary information. "Barry MacDonnell's Toolbox for WordPerfect for Windows – Macros, Tips, and Templates," February 5, 2004, at http://home.earthlink.net/~wptoolbox?Tips/UndoRedo.html.

The Lawyer's Code of Professional Responsibility (the "Code") prohibits lawyers from "knowingly" revealing a client confidence or secret, DR 4-101(B)(1), except when permitted under one of five exceptions enumerated in DR 4-101(C). DR 4-101(D) states that a lawyer "shall exercise reasonable care to prevent his or her employees, associates, and others whose services are utilized by the lawyer from disclosing or using confidences or secrets of a client." See also EC 4-5 ("Care should be exercised by a lawyer to prevent the disclosure of the confidences and secrets of one client to another"). Similarly, a lawyer who uses technology to communicate with clients must use reasonable care with respect to such communication, and therefore must assess the risks attendant to the use of that technology and determine if the mode of transmission is appropriate under the circumstances. See N.Y. State 709 (1998) ("an attorney must use reasonable care to protect confidences and secrets"); N.Y. City 94-11 (lawyer must take reasonable steps to secure client confidences or secrets).

When a lawyer sends a document by e-mail, as with any other type of communication, a lawyer must exercise reasonable care to ensure that he or she does not inadvertently disclose his or her client's confidential information. What constitutes reasonable care will vary with the circumstances, including the subject matter of the document, whether the document was based on a "template" used in another matter for another client, whether there have been multiple drafts of the document with comments from multiple sources, whether the client has commented on the document, and the identity of the intended recipients of the document. Reasonable care may, in some circumstances, call for the lawyer to stay abreast of technological advances and the potential risks in transmission in order to make an appropriate decision with respect to the mode of transmission. See N.Y. State 709 (1998).[29]

Lawyer-recipients also have an obligation not to exploit an inadvertent or unauthorized transmission of client confidences or secrets. In N.Y. State 749, we concluded that the use of computer technology to access client confidences and secrets revealed in metadata constitutes "an impermissible intrusion on the attorney-client relationship in violation of the Code." N.Y. State 749 (2003). See also N.Y. State 700 (1997) (improper for a lawyer to exploit an unauthorized communication of confidential information because doing so would constitute conduct "involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation" and "prejudicial to the administration of justice" in violation of DR 1-102(A)(4) and DR 1-102(A)(5), respectively).[30]

29 Some commentators have suggested that a lawyer has an affirmative duty to remove metadata whenever documents are exchanged with opposing counsel or disclosed to the public. See, e.g., David Hricik & Robert R. Jueneman, The Transmission and Receipt of Invisible Confidential Information, 15 The Professional Lawyer no. 1, p. 18 (Spring 2004) ("To comply with their duty of confidentiality, lawyers should take steps to remove metadata from documents exchanged with opposing counsel or disclosed to the public"). While exercising reasonable care under DR 4-101 may, in certain circumstances, require the lawyer to remove metadata (for example, where the lawyer knows that the metadata reflects client confidences and secrets, or that the document is being sent to an aggressive and technologically savvy adversary), in general the level of care required varies with the particular circumstances of the transmission.

30 Unlike lawyers, non-lawyer recipients of documents containing hidden text have no obligation imposed by the Code to avoid uncovering and exploiting information contained in an e-mailed document's metadata.

CONCLUSION:

Lawyers have a duty under DR 4-101 to use reasonable care when transmitting documents by e-mail to prevent the disclosure of metadata containing client confidences or secrets.

OPINION 783 (01/12/2005)

TOPIC: Interest on delinquent accounts

DIGEST: If a client deliberately disregards an agreement to pay legal fees and expenses, and the letter of engagement or retainer agreement is silent as to interest charges on the delinquency, a lawyer may condition continued representation on the client's agreement to prospectively pay interest on any past due balance for services rendered or to be rendered in the future.

CODE: DR 2-106(A); 2-110(C)(1)(f); 2-110(A)(1).

QUESTION:

If a client deliberately disregards an agreement to pay legal fees and expenses, and the letter of engagement or retainer agreement is silent as to interest charges on the delinquency, may a lawyer condition continued representation on the client's agreement to prospectively pay interest on any past due balance?

OPINION:

In N.Y. State 399 (1975), this Committee held that in order to charge interest on delinquent accounts, a lawyer must advise the client prior to performing services of the fact that interest will be so charged, the definition (time period) of delinquency, and must obtain the client's consent thereto. In addition, the delinquency period, the interest rate and the fee must be reasonable.[1]

If the issue of interest is not discussed prior to commencement of the engagement, and the client deliberately refuses to pay the lawyer's fees or expenses, DR 2-110(C)(1)(f) allows a lawyer to withdraw from representation or, where permission of a tribunal is required, to seek permission to withdraw.[2]

However, we do not believe that a lawyer's only recourse is withdrawal. We believe it is permissible for a lawyer to negotiate the terms of an amended agreement with a deliberately delinquent client and, in consideration of the attorney's not withdrawing, for the client to agree to pay reasonable interest prospectively on any past due balance for services previously rendered or to be rendered in the future. In so finding, we note that the proposed conduct seeks to avoid disruption of the attorney-client relationship and provides the attorney with an alternative to the pre-judgment interest rule of CPLR 5001 so that the attorney is not forced to withdraw and sue the client in order to be made whole.

1 Id. (citing EC 2-16; EC 2-17; EC 2-19; EC 2-23; DR 2-106). See also N.Y. State 729 (2000) (permitting an agreement to pay interest charges on disbursements in contingent fee cases, provided the same "minimum conditions" are met).

2 See DR 2-110(A)(1). In N.Y. State 598 (1989) we held that withdrawal may "not necessarily be appropriate where the client is financially unable to pay." But in this opinion we assume that the client is able to pay so that nonpayment is clearly "deliberate."

Allowing an attorney to negotiate reasonable interest on a deliberately delinquent account is also accommodated by New York's engagement letter rules.[3] Generally, these rules require that a lawyer provide a client with an engagement letter that includes "an explanation of attorney's fees to be charged, expenses and billing practices."[4] An "updated" letter of engagement must be provided "[w]here there is a significant change in the scope of services or the fee to be charged."[5] Although questions of law are beyond our jurisdiction, it appears that the rule would require an "updated" letter of engagement to reflect the new interest arrangement.

This Committee expresses no opinion on whether it would be ethical for an attorney unilaterally to impose reasonable interest on unpaid charges where the letter of engagement or the retainer agreement is silent on the issue.[6] In addition, all fee arrangements between attorney and client, including amended fee arrangements, are subject to DR 2-106(A)[7] as well as pertinent laws, rules and regulations.[8]

CONCLUSION:

If a client deliberately disregards an agreement to pay legal fees and expenses, and the letter of engagement or retainer agreement is silent as to interest charges on the delinquent accounts, a lawyer may condition continued representation on the client's agreement to prospectively pay interest on any past balance due for services previously rendered or to be rendered in the future.

OPINION 784 (01/12/2005)

TOPIC: Ancillary business organizations; conflict of interest

DIGEST: Lawyer-principal in entertainment management firm may represent client of such firm in some but not all types of legal matters.

CODE: DR 1-106; DR 3-101; DR 3-102; DR 5-101; DR 5-104(A).

QUESTION:

May a lawyer, through his or her law firm, represent clients who are separately represented by the entertainment management company in which the lawyer is a principal?

FACTS:

The lawyer is a member of a law firm which concentrates in, among other things, entertainment law. The lawyer is also a principal in a separate management company that represents artists, celebrities, entertainers and corporate clients. Several of the law firm's clients have requested that, through the management company, the lawyer manage their careers in the entertainment industry while the law firm continues to provide them with legal services. Specifically, the management company may enter into (1) a management arrangement with a client or with a business entity owned by the client, for which the management company would receive a standard fee or (2) a business arrangement pursuant to which the management company and the client's business entity would form a separate entity for the purposes of developing the client's business opportunities.

Under either arrangement no non-lawyer employee of the management company will offer legal advice to clients of the law firm, in accordance with DR 3-101, and legal fees will not be shared by the law firm with the management company, in accordance with DR 3-102.

The management company will provide services only to those law firm clients who have requested such services.

OPINION:

DR 1-106(A)(3) of the Lawyer's Code of Professional Responsibility (the "Code") provides that a lawyer who is a controlling party of an entity that the lawyer knows to be providing non-legal services to a client is subject to the disciplinary rules with respect to the non-legal services if the client could reasonably believe that the non-legal services are the subject of an attorney-client relationship. DR 1-106(A)(4) creates a presumption that the client receiving the non-legal services from the non-legal services entity believes the services to be the subject of an attorney-client relationship unless the lawyer qua lawyer advises the client otherwise in writing. Furthermore, DR 1-106(B) provides that a lawyer that is a controlling party of a non-legal services entity shall not permit any non-lawyer providing such services to direct or regulate the professional judgment of the lawyer or to cause the lawyer to compromise the duty of confidentiality.

Shortly after DR 1-106 was added to the Code, this Committee issued N.Y. State 752, 753 and 755 (each in 2002). In N.Y. State 752 we noted that notification to the client under DR 1-106 waives application of the disciplinary rules to the non-legal services. DR 5-101(A) continues to apply to provision of the legal services and bars the lawyer or law firm from offering non-legal services if the non-legal services activity creates an impermissible conflict with the legal representation. If the management company described above will provide non-legal services to a client of the law firm, the law firm may continue to represent the client only if a disinterested lawyer would believe that the representation of the client will not be adversely affected thereby and the client consents to the representation after full disclosure of the implications of the lawyer's interest in the management company.

N.Y. State 752 also discussed earlier Committee opinions which opined that in certain circumstances a lawyer also engaged in a non-legal business cannot provide both legal and non-legal services in the same transaction even with the consent of the client. We noted our determination in these earlier opinions that the lawyer could not act as both the lawyer and broker in the same transaction,[9] and that such opinions rest primarily on DR 5-101(A): "[t]he rationale is that the broker's interest in closing the transaction interferes with the lawyer's ability to render independent advice with respect to the transaction." We concluded that those opinions survived the adoption of DR 1-106.

So while the Code does not impose a per se prohibition upon either arrangement described above, there are likely to be particular transactions negotiated for the client by the management company in which it is improper for the law firm to represent the client. Identification of those transactions may depend at least in part on the dollar value of the transaction and the method by which the management company is compensated. For example, it would be improper for the law firm to represent the client in connection with a valuable endorsement agreement being negotiated by the management company if compensation of the management company will turn on the legal advice to be rendered. The commission payable to the management company might be ten percent of millions of dollars payable to the client under the endorsement contract, while the legal fees in connection with negotiating and drafting the agreement may be only several thousand dollars. In the eyes of a disinterested lawyer, the management company's interest in closing the transaction would interfere with the law firm's ability to render independent legal advice with respect to the transaction.

There are other services that the law firm could generally render to clients of the management company without violating DR 5-101. Examples of such services include estate planning, real property transactions (if neither the lawyer nor the management company is acting as broker) and tax services.

Although we concluded in N.Y. State 755 that DR 5-104(A) does not apply when a lawyer recommends that the client employ a distinct lawyer-owned ancillary business,[10] if the management company and client's business entity form a separate entity as described above, such formation would constitute a business transaction subject to the requirements of DR 5-104(A). Whether or not the law firm may continue to provide legal services to the client with respect to transactions negotiated by the newly formed entity will be controlled by DR 5-101(A) as discussed above.

10 As long as the lawyer takes steps to ensure that the client understands that the protections of the attorney-client relationship do not apply to the non-legal services. DR 1-106(A)(4).

CONCLUSION:

A lawyer may, through his or her law firm, represent clients who are separately represented by the entertainment management company in which the lawyer is a principal, in some but not all types of matters.

OPINION 785 (02/01/2005)

TOPIC: Communications with represented parties; insurance company

DIGEST: An attorney representing a plaintiff in a personal injury action may engage in settlement discussions with a non-lawyer insurance company claims adjuster over the objection of the attorney assigned by the insurance company to represent the defendant-policyholder with respect to the claim, provided that (i) the insurer is not represented by separate counsel with respect to the matter; and (ii) the plaintiff's attorney does not deliberately elicit information protected from disclosure.

CODE: DR 7-104(A)(1)

FACTS:

An individual injured in an automobile accident (the "Plaintiff") filed a personal injury action against the driver of the vehicle alleged to be at fault (the "Defendant"). In response, the Defendant's insurer assigned counsel to defend against the action. Before the suit was commenced, the Plaintiff's attorney engaged in unsuccessful settlement negotiations with the insurance company's non-lawyer claims adjuster. Subsequent to his assignment, the Defendant's attorney learned that Plaintiff's attorney was persisting in communicating with the adjuster in further settlement attempts. Defendant's attorney thereupon instructed the Plaintiff's attorney to cease all such communications.

QUESTION:

May the Plaintiff's attorney engage in direct settlement negotiations with the adjuster over the objection of the attorney assigned by the insurance company to represent the Defendant?

OPINION:

DR 7-104(A)(1) of the Code of Professional Responsibility (the "Code"), commonly referred to as the "no contact" rule, provides that, in the course of a representation, a lawyer shall not "[c]ommunicate or cause another to communicate on the subject of the representation with a party the lawyer knows to be represented by a lawyer in that matter unless the lawyer has the prior consent of the lawyer representing such other party or is authorized by law to do so."[11]

Is the adjuster a represented party for purposes of the "no contact" rule? Or to restate the question, is the adjuster represented by the same counsel assigned to represent the Defendant? We believe not. 40 years ago in N.Y. State 4 (1964), we stated that: "[W]e see nothing improper in an attorney for a claimant entering into negotiations with the adjuster, even where the negotiations include discussion of the legal aspects of liability." We adhere to this conclusion, which is consistent with our many subsequent opinions on the ethically complex tripartite relationship that exists among an insurance company, assigned counsel and a policyholder[12], in holding that contact with the adjuster is not contact with the policyholder.

However, the "no contact" rule will bar unconsented communication with the adjuster if the insurance company is known to be separately represented by counsel with respect to the matter.[13] In addition, an attorney may not deliberately elicit information that is protected by attorney-client privilege or as attorney work product from an unrepresented person, such as the insurance company (for whom the adjuster is an agent).[14] Here, a sizeable portion of the insurance company's file is likely to be protected as work product.[15] Therefore, in discussing settlement with the insurance adjuster, the Plaintiff's attorney must not deliberately elicit such protected information.

CONCLUSION:

An attorney representing a plaintiff injured in an automobile accident may engage in direct settlement discussions with a non-lawyer insurance company claims adjuster over the objection of the attorney assigned by the insurance company to represent the defendant-policyholder with respect to the claim, provided that: (i) the insurer is not represented by separate counsel with respect to the matter, and (ii) the plaintiff's attorney does not deliberately elicit information protected from disclosure in the action.

TOPIC: Pro bono services; expenses of litigation.

DIGEST: A lawyer representing pro bono a provider of legal services to the indigent may not pay the expenses of litigation without the client remaining ultimately liable therefor unless the organization itself is indigent. The test of indigence in these circumstances depends on the financial wherewithal of the organization and not on the purposes it serves.

CODE: EC 2-25, 5-7, 508; DR 5-103.

QUESTION:

Under what circumstances may a lawyer representing pro bono a provider of legal services to the indigent pay the expenses of litigation without the client remaining ultimately liable therefor?

OPINION:

Lawyers frequently render legal services to organizations that provide services to the indigent on a pro bono basis. That is, in addition to providing services to the clients of the organization, lawyers will offer pro bono services to the organization itself on, for example, matters of corporate law, employment issues, or litigation in pursuit of the organization's proprietary interests. Indeed, EC 2-25 encourages lawyers to fulfill their obligation to render public interest and pro bono legal service by providing professional services at no fee or a reduced fee to "public service organizations, where the legal services are designed primarily to address the legal and other basic needs of persons of limited financial means." Moreover, that Ethical Consideration encourages lawyers and law firms by providing "financial support for such organizations to assist in providing legal services to persons of limited financial means."

When a lawyer represents a client in litigation, however, the Code prohibits a lawyer from providing financial support to the client except in narrowly defined circumstances. In particular, DR 5-103 provides:

> While representing a client in connection with contemplated or pending litigation, a lawyer shall not advance or guarantee financial assistance to the client, except that:
> > 1. A lawyer may advance or guarantee the expenses of litigation, including court costs, expenses of investigation, expenses of medical examination, and costs of obtaining and presenting evidence, provided the client remains ultimately liable for such expenses.
> > 2. Unless prohibited by law or rule of court, a lawyer representing an indigent client on a pro bono basis may pay court costs and reasonable expenses of litigation on behalf of the client.

See also DR 2-101(L)(2) (a lawyer advertising contingent fee rates shall disclose "[t]hat, in the event there is no recovery, the client shall remain liable for the expenses of litigation, including court costs and disbursements").

The rule is based on two concerns: (1) that acquiring an excessive financial stake in litigation may have "an adverse effect upon the exercise of free judgment by the lawyer," EC 57; see also EC 58 ("A financial interest in the outcome of litigation also results if monetary advances are made by the lawyer to the client."); and (2) excessive subsidizing of lawsuits "would encourage clients to pursue lawsuits that might not otherwise be brought," ABA Model Rule of Prof. Conduct 1.8, comment 10 (2003). See also N.Y. State 464 (1977) (opining that "if lawyers were permitted to finance their clients' causes, it would generate unmeritorious suits and ultimately obfuscate the elemental difference between the roles of lawyer and client"); N.Y. State 37(a) (1966) (stating that the "basic purpose" of Canon 42, the predecessor to DR 5-103(B), "is to implement the policies against champerty, maintenance and barratry").

The question addressed by this opinion is whether an organization that provides legal services to the indigent can itself be considered an "indigent client" so as to permit the lawyer to pay the expenses of litigation without the organization remaining ultimately responsible therefor. The question is of some practical importance, as the expenses of litigation can be substantial and the resources of the organization are often fully committed to the service of its mission. Moreover, even if a lawyer has no intention of seeking to enforce the legal right to collect expenses from the organization, the board of the organization may be reluctant to expose the organization to even a theoretical legal obligation in those amounts.

DR 5103(B)(2) establishes a two-part test for the exception provided: the client must be indigent and the lawyer must be proceeding pro bono. In the circumstances we are addressing, the client is the organization, not the organization's clients. The question thus is whether the legal services organization itself can meet a test of indigency.

The Code contains no definition of "indigent." New York courts have defined the term "indigent" as "destitute of property or means of comfortable subsistence; needy; poor; in want; necessitous." Healy v. Healy, 99 N.Y.S.2d 874, 877 (Sup. Ct. Kings County 1950); Brown v. Upfold, 123 N.Y.S.2d 342, 345 (Sup. Ct. Onondaga County 1953). The term is also frequently used to mean "inability to afford counsel." See, e.g., Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335, 340, 344 (1963) (using "indigent," "unable to employ counsel" and "too poor to hire a lawyer" interchangeably); Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45, 71-72 (1932) (using "indigent" and "unable to employ counsel" interchangeably); Matter of Stream v. Beisheim, 34 A.D.2d 329, 331, 333 (2d Dep't 1970) (using "indigent" and "financially unable to retain counsel" synonymously); People v. Berkowitz, 97 Misc. 2d 277, 279-80 (Sup. Ct. Kings County 1978) (using "indigency," "financial inability to pay" and "unable to retain proper representation" interchangeably).

There is considerable difficulty in applying these concepts to corporations and associations. As the United States Supreme Court pointed out in holding that corporations and associations were not "persons" entitled to proceed in forma pauperis, "[w]hatever the state of its treasury, an association or corporation cannot be said to 'lac[k] the comforts of life,' any more than one can sensibly ask whether it can provide itself, let alone its dependents, with life's 'necessities.'" Rowland v. California Men's Colony, Unit II Men's Advisory Counsel, 506 U.S. 194, 203 (1993).[16]

In at least two cases, courts have suggested that a corporation organized for a public-interest purpose or serving an impoverished population should be permitted to proceed in forma pauperis, in part in light of those qualities. See Harlem River Consumers Cooperative, Inc. v. Associated Grocers of Harlem, Inc., 71 F.R.D. 93, 96 (S.D.N.Y. 1976) (stating that non-profit corporation formed for "a public interest quality" suing under the antitrust laws could proceed in forma pauperis) (dictum); River Valley, Inc. v. Dubuque County, 63 F.R.D. 123, 125 (N.D. Iowa 1974) (holding that non-profit corporation formed to assist poor people may appear in forma pauperis in light of "the nature of plaintiff's operation and the persons served thereby"), mandamus denied and appeal dismissed on other grounds, 507 F.2d 582 (8th Cir. 1974). See also Comment, Proceeding In Forma Pauperis in Federal Court: Can Corporations Be "Persons"?, 62 Calif. L. Rev. 219, 250-52 (1974) (urging adoption of "primary beneficiary analysis" under which leave to appear in forma pauperis should be granted when the corporation pursues "non-self-interested claims" and the primary beneficiary of the litigation is the public).

In each of these cases, however, the court also was satisfied that the corporation was impecunious.[17] The public-purpose test was advanced as a test for whether the corporate form was a "subterfuge," River Valley, 63 F.R.D. at 125, a consideration that is not relevant in the present context. In any event, these cases (which were overruled by Rowland) have been criticized. See, e.g., Sears, Roebuck & Co. v. Charles W. Sears Real Estate, Inc., 686 F. Supp. 385, 387 n.4 (N.D.N.Y. 1988) (stating that "whether a corporation is a 'person' within the meaning of § 1915 does not depend on the purity of the corporation's motives in prosecuting its interests in the court, nor on the sympathy the court holds for the interests being advanced by the corporation"), aff'd, 865 F.2d 22 (2d Cir. 1988); Move Org. v. United States Dep't of Justice, 555 F. Supp. 684, 692 n.26 (E.D. Pa. 1983) (rejecting Harlem River test and commenting with respect to the above-cited Comment, "it is unclear how I should go about determining whether: the plaintiff was formed for 'public purposes'; the financial benefit to be reaped is direct or indirect; the benefit is substantial; the litigation has a 'public interest aspect'; who is the 'primary beneficiary'; and whether the claims are non-self-interested"); see also Rowland, 506 U.S. at 207 n.9 ("The language of § 1915 . . . suggests indifference to the character of the litigant and to the type of litigation pursued, so long as it is not frivolous or malicious."); S.O.U.P., Inc. v. FTC, 449 F.2d 1142, 1142 (D.C. Cir. 1971) (per curiam) ("The public interest motivating SOUP's members, which I join in applauding, does not help make the corporation 'a person . . . unable to pay such costs or give security therefor.'") (statement of Fahy, J.)

16 The statute at issue in Rowland, and in the cases cited in the following paragraph of text, provided:

> "[A]ny court of the United States may authorize the commencement, prosecution or defense of any suit, action or proceeding, civil or criminal, or appeal therein, without prepayment of fees and costs or security therefor, by a person who makes affidavit that he is unable to pay such costs or give security therefor."

28 U.S.C. § 1915(a) (Supp. IV 1988).

17 See Harlem River, 63 F.R.D. at 95 ("The affidavits submitted together with this application establish to the Court's satisfaction the poverty of the plaintiff corporation. Further, they also establish the poverty of the corporation's membership viewed as a group. Thus, the Court finds the requirement of poverty to have been met . . . ."); River Valley, 63 F.R.D. at 125 ("Considering the nature of plaintiff's operation and the persons served thereby, and in view of the fact that defendants have effectively cut off all previous sources of funds for plaintiff and directed that plaintiff spend no more money, it appears to the court that the plaintiff is truly in good faith without funds to maintain this action.")

The inclusion of the "indigence" requirement in DR 5103(B)(2) (which is restated in EC 58) was the result of a deliberate choice by the drafters of the rule. The ABA Model Rule provision upon which DR 5103(B)(2) was based was originally drafted to apply to all pro bono clients regardless of indigence. Discussion Draft, Model Rules of Professional Responsibility 31 (Jan. 30, 1980) ("A lawyer or legal services organization representing a client without a fee may pay court costs and expenses of litigation on behalf of a client.") The drafters of the Model Rule then substituted the "indigence" standard for the "without a fee" standard. The drafters of DR 5103(B)(2) further restricted the operation of the exception by including both concepts. In addition, in recommending the current text of DR 5103(B), the drafters of the Code declined to adopt the text of the Model Rules that a lawyer might advance litigation expenses "contingent on the outcome of the matter." Instead, the provision in the New York Code retains the more stringent requirement that the client remain "ultimately liable" for the amounts advanced.

The decision in Rowland that organizations are not "persons" within the meaning of the federal statute providing for proceeding in forma pauperis was based on a number of "contextual features" of the statute that are not shared by DR 5-103(B)(2). 506 U.S. at 201. We detect no like basis in the Code to conclude that the term "indigent client" is limited to natural persons. While we recognize that determining the meaning of the term "indigent" in the context of organizations is difficult, we do not believe it is impossible. The organization at issue in Rowland, for example, was an association of prisoners who were not permitted to have bank accounts. We have little doubt that such an association would meet the definition of indigence.

On the other hand, we do not believe the fact that the organization depends on charity or governmental assistance necessarily qualifies it as "indigent." Many nonprofit organizations – universities, museums, and perhaps legal services providers – have very substantial resources. While they may prefer to devote all their resources to the direct service of their mission, all clients would prefer to devote their resources to a cause other than litigation. Basing a test for indigence on the worthiness of the client's cause or on some basis other than financial wherewithal would be inconsistent with the ordinary meaning of the term. Moreover, a test that looked to the purposes the client serves, without further textual guidance in the Code, would be unrestricted in potential scope and potentially arbitrary in application.[18]

We will not attempt in a general opinion such as this to provide monetary guidelines as to what would constitute "indigence." In the end, as with much in the Code, the test will depend on the good judgment of the lawyer. The test should be one that would apply in like fashion to any organization, non-profit or profit-making, and regardless of the perceived societal value of the organization's purposes. It must, in short, depend alone on the financial wherewithal of the organization.

We are mindful that many lawyers offering pro bono services to non-profit providers of legal services to the poor are ready as well to bear the expenses of the suit. That is a choice that a lawyer can exercise by declining to seek recovery of expenses that the lawyer has paid on the client's behalf, 18 A New York court has considered a somewhat analogous question and reached the analogous conclusion. Hospital Credit Exchange, Inc. v. Shapiro, 59 N.Y.S.2d 812, 816 (N.Y.C. Mun. Ct. 1946) (holding that non-profit membership corporation formed by non-profit hospitals to collect unpaid bills could not take advantage of an exemption for charitable corporations contained in the unauthorized-practice statutes, and noting "[i]t is true that its only clients or customers are charitable hospitals. However, the fact that for a fee it serves only charitable institutions, does not make it a charitable corporation"). Similarly here, the fact that the client represents indigent persons does not without more make the client indigent.

just as any lawyer can decline to collect a fee that is owed. But the lawyer may not, "[w]hile representing a client in connection with contemplated or pending litigation," DR 5103(B) – that is, during the pendency of the suit – relieve a non-indigent organization of ultimate responsibility for the expenses.

CONCLUSION:

A lawyer representing on a pro bono basis an organization that provides legal services to the poor may not pay the expenses of litigation without the organization remaining ultimately liable for those expenses unless the organization is itself indigent. The test for "indigence" in this context is one of objective financial wherewithal, and not one that is based on the worthiness of the cause that the organization pursues or the organization's desire to spend its resources in other ways.

TOPIC: Conflict of interest; missing client

DIGEST: A lawyer who represents a wife in a personal injury matter and her husband on a loss of consortium claim cannot continue to represent either if the wife wishes to accept a settlement offer that would bar the husband's claim. If the husband has disappeared, the lawyer must take all reasonable steps to protect the client's interests and to locate the husband client. After exhausting all reasonable efforts to locate the husband, the lawyer may withdraw from the representation.

CODE: DR 2-110, DR 5-105, DR 5-108, DR 7-101(A)(1); EC 5-15.

QUESTION:

May a lawyer who agreed to represent a wife in a personal injury matter and her husband on a derivative loss of consortium claim continue to represent the wife where settlement of her claim would prejudice the husband's interests? How should the lawyer proceed if the husband has disappeared?

OPINION:

A lawyer was retained to represent concurrently a married woman with respect to a personal injury claim and her husband on a derivative loss of services claim. The husband later abandoned the wife and she obtained a divorce. Although no lawsuit was commenced with respect to either claim, a settlement offer has been made to the wife that she would like to accept. Both the wife and the lawyer have lost contact with the former husband.

Differing Interests

A lawyer may represent multiple clients in the same or related matters unless (i) the exercise of independent professional judgment on behalf of one client will be or is likely to be adversely affected by the lawyer's representation of another client, or (ii) the multiple representation would likely involve the lawyer in representing differing interests. DR 5-105(A).[19] In cases where multiple representation would involve an adverse effect on independent professional judgment or representation of differing interests, a lawyer may undertake or continue the multiple representation if a disinterested lawyer would believe that the lawyer can competently represent the interest of each and if each consents to the representation after full disclosure of the implications of the simultaneous representation and the advantages and risks involved. See DR 5-105(C).

If assisting the wife to effect the settlement would prejudice the husband's separate claim,[20] the lawyer must withdraw from both representations.[21] Continuing to represent both parties would involve a simultaneous representation of "differing interests." Specifically, the lawyer would be forced to choose between settling the wife's claim and thus barring the husband from pursuing his loss of consortium claim,[22] or advising the wife to reject the settlement offer that she wishes to accept in order to preserve the husband's claim. In this situation the lawyer could proceed only with the husband's informed consent, which would require explaining to the husband the risk that the loss of consortium claim may be compromised.

19 DR 5-105(B); see also EC 5-15 ("The lawyer should resolve all doubts against the propriety of the representation."

20 Whether settling the wife's claim would prejudice her former husband's claim is a question of law beyond this Committee's jurisdiction.

21 If the lawyer withdrew from only one representation, the remaining representation would be adverse to the former client "in the same or [a] substantially related matter," a violation of DR 5-108.

Missing Client

Because the lawyer has not been discharged by the husband nor withdrawn from the husband's representation, he or she is obligated to continue to protect the husband's interests through reasonably available means.[23] However, the lawyer's inability to communicate with the client makes it difficult to protect the husband's interests. For example, if the client has not authorized the lawyer to file suit, the lawyer cannot know whether the client wishes to pursue the matter. A lawyer may withdraw from a representation if either "withdrawal can be accomplished without material adverse effect on the interests of the client"[24] or "if the client [b]y other conduct renders it unreasonably difficult for the lawyer to carry out employment effectively."[25] DR 2-110(A)(2) requires the lawyer, when withdrawing, to take "steps to the extent reasonably practicable to avoid foreseeable prejudice to the rights of the client, including giving due notice to the client, allowing time for employment of other counsel, delivering to the client all papers and property to which the client is entitled and complying with applicable laws and rules."

Before withdrawing, the lawyer must take all reasonable steps to locate the client. Such steps might include sending a letter via certified mail to the last known address, a personal visit to the last known address, or a search of telephone directories, public records or the Internet to determine the client's current address.[26] If the lawyer has exhausted all reasonable steps and decides to withdraw, the lawyer must send written notice of intent to withdraw to the client's last known address, warning the client that the client's claim may be prejudiced by delay, and suggesting that the client obtain other counsel.

Even if the lawyer withdraws from representation of the husband in accordance with DR 2-110(A)(2),[27] the lawyer would be unable to continue to represent the wife if settling her claim would prejudice the interests of the now-former husband client.[28] Absent consent from the former client (the husband), the lawyer could not continue to represent the wife in the same or a substantially related matter where her interests are materially adverse to the former client.

CONCLUSION:

A lawyer who agreed to represent a wife in a personal injury matter and her husband on a derivative loss of consortium claim may not continue to represent the wife absent both clients' informed consent where settlement of her claim would prejudice the husband's claim for loss of consortium. The lawyer may seek to withdraw from representing the missing client subject to the considerations discussed above.

OPINION 788 (10/21/2005)

TOPIC: Part-time prosecutor represents criminal defendant in a civil matter, conflict of interest, imputation.

DIGEST: A lawyer who has a private practice and serves as a part-time assistant district attorney may not represent a client in a civil matter where the client is being prosecuted by the district attorney's office. The conflict cannot be cured by consent.

CODE: DR 2 110(B)(2), 5 105(B), 5 105(D), 5 108(A)(1).

QUESTION:

The inquirer is a lawyer in private practice who also serves as a part-time assistant district attorney in a small district attorney's office. He shares an office in the district attorney's office and attends staff meetings at which cases are discussed. In his private practice, the inquirer represents a husband and wife in revising their wills. After an initial interview, which resulted in the inquirer requesting certain additional information, the inquirer learns that the district attorney's office in which he works has begun a prosecution of the husband. May the inquirer continue to represent the husband? If there is a conflict of interest, may the conflict be cured by consent?

OPINION:

The Committee concludes that the inquirer may not continue the representation of the husband when the district attorney's office in which the inquirer works is prosecuting the husband. We also conclude that the conflict cannot be cured by consent of the district attorney's office and the private client.

DR 5-105(B) bars a lawyer from concurrent representation of two or more clients if it would "involve the lawyer in representing differing interests," unless each client consents. We have held that part-time prosecutors are limited by DR 5-105 from undertaking certain kinds of work in their private practice: for example, they may not represent criminal defendants in New York State courts[29] or in suing the governmental entity that employs them.[30] Such conflicts are imputed to partners and associates of the part-time prosecutor.[31] This inquiry involves the reverse situation: whether the conflicts of other prosecutors in the office are imputed to the part-time prosecutor so as to bar the part-time prosecutor from conflicting representations in his or her private practice.

DR 5105(D) imputes conflicts under DR 5105(B) to all lawyers "associated in a law firm." A law firm is defined in the Code of Professional Responsibility (the "Code") to include "the legal department of a corporation or other organization." This Committee has repeatedly held that a district attorney's office should be treated as a law firm for purposes of DR 5105(D).[32] We recognize that a part-time prosecutor's affiliation with the district attorney's office may not be as extensive as that of a typical partner or associate in a law firm. However, the part-time prosecutor has full access to the office's information, attends staff meetings and carries on the work of the office in much the same way that other prosecutors do. His or her affiliation with the district attorney's office is at least as extensive as most of-counsel lawyers' affiliation with their law firms,[33] which this committee and others have held gives rise to imputation.[34] A fortiori, because of a greater need to avoid the appearance of impropriety in government, the imputation of conflicts that applies to most "of counsel" lawyers applies to a part-time prosecutor.[35]

Given that there is a conflict of interest, may it be waived?[36] In N.Y. State 657 (1993), we stated that the conflict arising from a part-time prosecutor's acting as criminal defense counsel in New York State courts was not waivable. In that opinion we said, "Because the role of the prosecutor and the defense lawyer are inherently incompatible and the prosecutor has special responsibilities to the public, consent cannot cure the conflict because it is not obvious that the lawyer can adequately represent the Town and the private client."[37] While the inquirer does not seek to act as defense counsel in criminal cases, we believe the same conclusion applies. The risk of the public perceiving favoritism at the prosecutor's office precludes waiver of the conflict.

The Code does not prescribe which representation a lawyer must withdraw from when presented with a non-waivable conflict,[38] but we have said that "[a]s a general rule, disqualification of the entire District Attorney's office is warranted only upon a finding of actual prejudice, a real conflict of interest or the risk of misusing confidences."[39] In this case, where the withdrawal of the entire district attorney's office would require appointment of a special prosecutor to prosecute the husband, and where the estate-planning representation is at an early stage, we believe the inquirer should withdraw from representing the husband. If the facts were different, as when withdrawal from representing the private client would cause substantial prejudice to the client, the lawyer may be required to withdraw from the district attorney's office.

There are also situations in which withdrawal from representing the husband or withdrawal from the district attorney's office might not be sufficient, so that the district attorney's office would be required to withdraw from the prosecution. Under DR 5-108(A)(1), if the representation of the husband and the criminal prosecution are "substantially related," the inquirer would have a disqualifying conflict of interest that would be imputed to the district attorney's office under DR 5-105(D) and would prevent the entire district attorney's office from proceeding against a former client of one of its prosecutors. "The most important factor [in determining whether two matters are substantially related] is whether the . . . lawyer did or could have obtained confidences and secrets in the former representation that should be used against the former client in the current representation."[40] If the criminal prosecution involves allegations of secreting assets, for example, an estate-planning representation might be substantially related to that prosecution, requiring appointment of a special prosecutor.[41] If the alleged crime is a traffic offense, however, that is unlikely.

TOPIC: Consultation with a law firm's in-house counsel on matters of professional ethics involving one or more clients of the law firm.

DIGEST: A law firm may form an attorney-client relationship with one or more of its own lawyers to receive advice on matters of professional responsibility concerning ongoing client representation(s), including on matters implicating the client's interests, without thereby creating an impermissible conflict between the law firm and the affected client(s). The law firm's duty to disclose its conclusions will vary with the circumstances of the matter.

CODE: DR 1-102(A); DR 1-104; DR 1-106; DR 1-107; DR 2-101(E); DR 2-102(A); DR 2-103(D); DR 2-105(A); DR 3-102(A); DR 5-101(A); DR 5-105; DR 5-109; DR 9-102; EC 1-8; EC 5-18; EC 7-7; EC 7-8.

QUESTION:

1. When a law firm seeks advice from one or more of its own lawyers about the firm's legal and ethical obligations in connection with representing a client, without first obtaining the client's consent, does the consultation create an impermissible conflict between the interests of the law firm and those of the affected client?

OPINION:

Background

2. A New York-based law firm has appointed a committee of partners charged with (1) advising the firm and its lawyers on legal and ethical obligations and issues of professional responsibility, (2) assuring the firm's compliance with the law governing lawyers, (3) counseling the firm concerning its systems to facilitate such compliance, and (4) representing the firm in challenges to its professional conduct. Included among the issues that these in-house advisors confront are considering the limits on a lawyer's duty of zealous representation, interpreting and applying the rules governing conflicts of interest, addressing a client's allegation that the firm behaved unethically, and assessing whether the firm has failed in the performance of professional duties to a client.

3. Many of these issues involve questions of law and ethics in which the interests of the law firm may not coincide with the interests of the client(s) whose matters occasion the consultation. For instance, in addition to the duties owed to the affected client(s), lawyers may owe potentially conflicting duties to other existing or former clients, to a court or a regulatory tribunal, to adverse counsel, or to the legal system as a whole. Assuring compliance with these multi-faceted obligations may frequently present complex issues of law and ethics. The question here is whether a law firm's consultation with one of its own in-house lawyers on these types of issues creates a conflict of interest with the affected client under the Code of Professional Responsibility (the "Code"). We conclude that it does not.

ANALYSIS:

4. The question presented is new for this Committee and, as far as our research can find, any ethics committee in the country. Three recent cases – VersusLaw, Inc. v. Stoel Rives, LLP, 111 P.3d 866, 878, 127 Wash. App. 309, 332 (2005), Koen Book Distrib. v. Powell, Trachtman, Logan, Carrle, Bowman & Lombardo, 212 F.R.D. 283, 283-85 (E.D. Pa. 2002), and Bank Brussels Lambert v. Credit Lyonnais (Suisse) S.A., 220 F. Supp. 2d 283, 286-88 (S.D.N.Y. 2002) – suggest that an in-house legal counsel's advice to law firms may not be subject to claims of attorney-client privilege as against their then-clients based on the courts' view that the firm's consultation with its in-house lawyers introduced a conflict between the law firm and its clients.[42] The question of the applicability of the privilege is an evidentiary issue for the courts. The question of what constitutes a conflict of interest under Canon 5 of the Code is one on which we are free to opine.

5. We begin with consideration of the background in the Code against which lawyers in law firms seek advice from in-house ethics advisers – various provisions of the Code that provide for or envision a law firm's obtaining in-house advice about obligations to clients and construction of an ethical infrastructure to facilitate such consultation. We then consider whether seeking and giving such advice creates a personal conflict for the lawyers involved under DR 5-101(A), and then whether the rendering of such advice to a colleague puts the lawyer in the position of representing two clients with conflicting interests under DR 5-105(A) and (B). Finally, we address the extent to which the law firm is obligated under the Code to disclose to the client the fact of its in-house consultations.

The Code's Support for an Ethical Infrastructure

6. The Code explicitly imposes obligations on a law firm as an institution – a departure from the traditional confinement of ethical codes to regulation of individual lawyers. For example, DR 1-104 requires a law firm to make "reasonable efforts" to assure that its lawyers comply with the Code, mandates adequate supervision of the lawyers in the firm, and allocates responsibility between supervisory and subordinate lawyers in the firm. Other Code provisions also apply to the firm, rather than solely to individual lawyers.[43]

7. These rules necessarily create an obligation to establish protocols, appropriate for the size and practice of the firm, to enable the firm to enforce these standards internally. To envision such a system

42 The three cases all rest on In re Sunrise Sec. Litig., 130 F.R.D. 560 (E.D. Pa. 1989), which held "a law firm's communication with in house counsel is not protected by the attorney client privilege if the communication implicates or creates a conflict between the law firm's fiduciary duties to itself and its duties to the client seeking to discover the communication." Id. at 597. The Sunrise court relied in part on the so-called "fiduciary exception" to the privilege, see Garner v. Wolfinbarger, 430 F.2d 1093 (5th Cir. 1970). Other decisions applying that exception, however, such as Beck v. Manufacturers Hanover Trust Co., 218 A.D.2d 1, 17-18 (1st Dep't 1995); Hoopes v. Carota, 142 A.D.2d 906, 910-11 (3rd Dep't 1995) (dictum), aff'd, 74 N.Y.2d 716 (1989); and United States v. Mett, 178 F.3d 1058, 1064 (9th Cir. 1999), find that, when a fiduciary seeks legal advice concerning the fiduciary's own potentially conflicting obligations, including with respect to potentially different interests of beneficiaries, the fiduciary may assert privileges against the beneficiaries. See also RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TRUSTS § 173 cmt. b (1959).

43 See, e.g., DR 1-102(A); DR 1-106; DR 1-107; DR 2-101(E); DR 2-102(A); DR 2-103(D); DR 2-105(A); DR 3-102(A); DR 9-102. See also DR 5-105(E) (requiring a system for checking conflicts); N.Y. State 715 (1999); N.Y. City 2003-3 (outlining minimal requirements for conflicts-checking system). Likewise, in issuing its Sarbanes-Oxley attorney conduct rules, the SEC declared that it expects law firms "to put in place procedures to comply with [its] requirements." without access to confidential advice on legal and ethical issues affecting the firm's obligations is difficult. EC 1-8 is but one suggestion to this effect:

> A law firm should adopt measures giving reasonable assurance that all lawyers in the firm conform to the Disciplinary Rules and that the conduct of non-lawyers employed by the firm is compatible with the professional obligations of the lawyers in the firm. Such measures may include informal supervision and occasional admonition, a procedure whereby junior lawyers can make confidential referral of ethical problems directly to a senior lawyer or special committee, and continuing legal education in professional ethics.

8. These rules persuade us that the Code endorses and in some cases requires mechanisms within a law firm to promote obedience to a firm's obligations. Those ethical obligations frequently raise issues potentially or actually implicating the interests of one or more clients. Either a law firm must address these issues with one of its own lawyers, or else look to others for this advice. To hold that a law firm must always seek guidance outside its halls in order to preserve an attorney-client relationship – that is, to hire outside counsel (whose fiduciary duties may extend only to the firm) in every instance in which such an adversity arises – is simply impractical in the day-to-day life of many law firms, when issues of professional responsibility frequently require prompt responses most usefully provided by lawyers knowledgeable about the firm, its client relationships and its culture. It also imagines a world in which a lawyer must hire another lawyer to practice law, thereby depriving the firm of the well-recognized right to represent itself. [44]

9. Further supporting this conclusion is the substantial literature supporting an in-house ethical infrastructure. "[A] law firm that assumes some collaborative responsibility for the moral climate of the firm's practice can improve morale, the quality of work, and, perhaps, the moral standards of the firm's lawyers and other employees." CHARLES WOLFRAM, MODERN LEGAL ETHICS § 16.2.2, at 881 (1986). 10. We do not believe that the conflicts rules of Canon 5 were intended to prohibit ethics consultation when it is most helpful: during the client representation.

DR 5-101(A): Interests That May Affect Professional Judgment

11. DR 5-101(A) prohibits a lawyer from accepting or continuing employment if the exercise of the lawyer's professional judgment "will be or reasonably may be affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property, or personal interests, unless a disinterested lawyer would believe that the representation of the client will not be adversely affected thereby and the client consents to the representation after full disclosure of the implications of the lawyer's interest." DR 5-105(D) imputes this prohibition to every lawyer in the firm. The issue is whether it is a conflict under DR 5-101(A) for a lawyer to seek or give advice on the firm's ethical obligations to its client while the firm is representing those clients.

12. We believe that a lawyer's interest in ensuring compliance with the lawyer's ethical duties or obligations, or considering the effects of a possible violation of those duties, does not generally raise issues under DR 5-101(A). A lawyer's interest in carrying out the ethical obligations imposed by the Code is not an interest extraneous to the representation of the client. It is inherent in that representation and a required part of the work in carrying out the representation. It is, in other words, not an interest that "affects" the lawyer's exercise of independent professional judgment, but rather is an inherent part of that judgment. The law firm is not only entitled, but required, to consider the ethical implications of what it does on a daily basis. That the law firm does so through consultation does not change the interest being pursued. Such consultation, moreover, has been a part of law practice for generations and indeed is encouraged by the Code.[46] It is too much a part of the fabric and tradition of legal practice to require specific disclosure and consent.

13. This is not to say that the firm's interest in protecting itself can never give rise to a conflict of interest under DR 5-101(A), or that the firm has no obligation to disclose to the client the conclusions resulting from its seeking or giving advice on its ethical obligations or exposure. A firm's conclusion that it has failed to comply with its ethical obligations might, in some circumstances, reasonably be expected to affect its exercise of professional judgment. As we discuss below, when a law firm learns that a client may have a claim against the law firm arising out of the law firm's rendition of legal services, or that the firm may need client consent in order to commence or continue another client representation, or in other circumstances where the client is called upon to act or decide, then the firm may need to disclose to the client the firm's conclusions with respect to the ethical issues.[47] But we do not believe that the consultation of an in-house ethics resource itself raises issues under DR 5-101(A).

DR 5-105(A) & (B): "Differing Interests"

14. DR 5-105(A) and (B) require a lawyer to "decline" or "not continue" multiple employment if the "exercise of independent professional judgment in behalf of a client will be or is likely to be adversely affected by" the lawyer's "acceptance" or "representation" of "another client," or "if it would be likely to involve the lawyer in representing differing interests, except to the extent" permitted by DR 5-105(C). This latter rule permits multiple employment "if a disinterested lawyer would believe that the lawyer can competently represent the interests of each and if each consents to the representation after full disclosure of the implications of the simultaneous representations and the advantages and risks involved." We here treat the relationship between an in-house ethics adviser and the lawyers whom he or she is advising like that of an in-house corporate legal officer. The Code treats lawyers who practice as retained advisers to a corporation no different from other lawyers, and it is clear that in-house advisers have an attorney-client relationship with the corporation that employs them.[48] Thus, the question is whether an in-house ethics advisor represents interests "differing" from those of clients.

15. We think not. The Code defines "differing interests" to mean "every interest that will adversely affect either the judgment or the loyalty of a lawyer to a client, whether it be conflicting, inconsistent, diverse or other interest."[49] The key phrase is that the interest must be one that will "adversely affect either the judgment or the loyalty of a lawyer to a client." Because the Code requires adherence to its rules in service of the many duties a lawyer owes, a law firm's consideration of its own legal and ethical obligations in connection with its representation of one or more clients cannot be said to implicate a "differing interest" that will adversely affect the lawyer's exercise of professional judgment nor the loyalty due a client within the meaning of the Code.[50]

16. To suggest otherwise is counter to everything the Code embodies. The purpose of consultation on a lawyer's ethical and legal obligations is to facilitate the inquirer's adherence to applicable law and rules. Seeking advice from an in-house ethics advisor is intended to facilitate the lawyer's proper exercise of professional judgment and a lawyer's appropriate discharge of the duty of loyalty owed to the client in the same way that an outside client's consultation with a lawyer in the firm is intended to facilitate the client's lawful achievement of legitimate objectives. Considering a lawyer's ethical obligation to represent a client within the bounds of the law, for instance, does not give rise to any rightful claim that such consideration alone adversely affects the lawyer's professional judgment or loyalty, for this is what lawyers are supposed to do. This is true whether the issue at hand is how to conduct oneself in the future or whether conduct in the past was a violation of the Code, for consideration of both questions is part of what clients and the legal system expect lawyers to do, serves to reinforce ethical behavior, and informs future conduct. Simply put, seeking advice on how best to accommodate a lawyer's multi-faceted obligations in service of one or more clients does not, without more, entail the kind of "differing interest" that DR 5-105(A) and (B) regulates. It follows that such consultation does not require compliance with DR 5-105(C) mandating, among other things, advance informed consent to the law firm's representation of itself.

Disclosure Obligations

17. Having concluded that a law firm need not obtain advance informed consent before consulting its own in-house counsel on matters that implicate a client's interests, we must resolve whether a law firm is obliged to advise the client that the firm has consulted with its in-house counsel about a matter of professional responsibility affecting the client. In our opinion, no such obligation exists. Rather, a law firm may in certain circumstances owe the client a duty to advise the client of the firm's conclusions about the firm's legal or ethical obligations, but the firm has no duty to advise the client that the law firm has consulted with its own in-house counsel in reaching those conclusions.

18. This result naturally flows from the conclusion preceding it. Clients are entitled to counsel who comply with applicable standards of professional responsibility. Those lawyers are entitled to seek advice on how best to comply with those standards, and to do so without apprehending that seeking the advice is itself a violation of those standards. The Code does not obligate a lawyer to tell a client how the lawyer has reached a conclusion concerning a particular matter of professional responsibility.

19. Whether a law firm has a duty to disclose the fact of its own internal consideration of ethical issues should not be confused with a law firm's duty, in many circumstances, to disclose the products of that consideration. Nothing in this opinion is intended to alter the lawyer's duty to advise a client of circumstances requiring a client to act. Thus, obviously, when a law firm concludes that the firm may not continue to represent the client under DR 5-101 or DR 5-105, then the firm must so advise the client. The timing and extent of a firm's disclosure obligations will vary with the circumstances. For example, if a firm is considering whether to represent differing interests, disclosure obligations arise when the firm determines that a client has a decision to make – that is, when the firm concludes that a client's informed consent is or later may become a prerequisite to its representation of this or another client. In that circumstance, the firm's duty is to provide the affected client(s) with all the information material to the client's decision whether to establish or continue the attorney-client relationship.[51]

51 See EC 78 ("A lawyer should exert best efforts to ensure that decisions of the client are made only after the client has been informed of relevant considerations."); CHARLES WOLFRAM, supra, § 7.2.4, at 343-46.

20. Similarly, we have previously opined that "whether an attorney has an obligation to disclose a mistake to a client will depend on the nature of the lawyer's possible error or omission."[52] Because "lawyers have an obligation to keep their clients reasonably informed about [a] matter and to provide information that their clients need to make decisions relating to the representation," lawyers have an obligation to a client to disclose "the possibility that they have made a significant error or omission."[53] Whether an error or omission must be disclosed depends on all the relevant facts, such as whether the error or omission gives rise to a colorable malpractice claim, is capable of correction or is injurious to the client.[54]

CONCLUSION:

21. In considering its obligations to its clients, a law firm may consult with one or more lawyers in the Firm without thereby violating the Code's prohibition on the unauthorized representation of differing interests or the Code's prohibition on continuing employment if the exercise of the lawyer's professional judgment might be affected by personal interests. The law firm does not ordinarily need to disclose to the clients the fact of such consultation, but may need to disclose the conclusions reached, as when the firm concludes that it has a conflict or that it has made a significant error or omission.

OPINION 790 (10/27/2005)

TOPIC: Law guardian's conflict of interest when child's parent received non-legal services from guardian's employer.

DIGEST: Conflict may exist where law guardian is employed by agency that has provided services to parent of guardian's ward.

CODE: DR 5-101(A).

QUESTION:

1. May a lawyer employed part-time by an agency that provides services in domestic violence matters accept Law Guardian assignments in the lawyer's private practice if a parent of the ward has received non-legal services from the agency?

FACTS:

2. A non-profit agency provides services in domestic violence disputes and similar types of matters. The services performed range from non-legal services, such as counseling, mental health care, daycare, and other housing and poverty services, to legal representation in civil matters. The agency employs two part-time attorneys and a paralegal. The two attorneys are also appointed from time to time as Law Guardians in their private practices.[55]

OPINION:

3. A Law Guardian appointed by a court to represent the best interests of a child must carry out the Guardian's responsibilities as an advocate of the child's interests and preferences, and an active participant rather than as a neutral party. The Law Guardian's responsibilities can include interviewing persons relevant to the proceeding, obtaining applicable records, reviewing documents exchanged between the parties, making discovery demands and responding to the adversary's requests, participating in pre-trial negotiations and hearings, retaining independent experts, and taking an active role in the trial process.[56]

55 The Family Court Act lists situations where a court is to appoint a Law Guardian, including proceedings that involve custody disputes, juvenile delinquency, adoption or the placement of the child into the custody of a mental health facility. Family Ct. Act § 249 (2005). See also Family Court Act, Article 10 (abuse and neglect proceedings); Social Services Law §358-a (foster care approval proceedings); Social Services Law §392 (foster care review proceedings); Social Services Law §384 (termination of parental rights proceedings); Family Court Act, Article 7 (persons in need of supervision proceedings); Family Court Act, Article 3 (delinquency proceedings).

See also Weiglhofer v. Weiglhofer, 1 A.D. 3d 786, 788, 766 N.Y.S.2d 727, 729 (3d Dep't 2003) ("Because it appears that Supreme Court ordered and relied on a 'report' from the Law Guardian, we take this opportunity to emphasize that a law guardian is the attorney for the children . . . and not an investigative arm of the court."); Matter of Dominique v. Colleen C.-G., 17 A.D. 3d 1038, 1040, 794 N.Y.S.2d 195, 196 (4th Dep't 2005).

4. Because the Law Guardian is an advocate on behalf of the child, there is a potential for conflicts of interest when one of the child's parents has received non-legal services from an agency that employs the Law Guardian.[57] DR 5-101 states:

> A lawyer shall not accept or continue employment if the exercise of professional judgment on behalf of the client will be or reasonably may be affected by the lawyer's financial, business, property, or personal interests, unless a disinterested lawyer would believe that the representation of the client will not be adversely affected thereby and the client consents to the representation after full disclosure of the implications of the lawyer's interest.

5. It is in the public interest to encourage persons willing to undertake the duties of Law Guardian to do so, and persons employed by agencies providing poverty services are often peculiarly qualified to serve in that capacity. In the view of the Committee, the fact that the Law Guardian is employed by the agency does not, without more, constitute such a "financial, business, property or personal interest" that might reasonably be said to affect the Law Guardian's professional judgment in every case. Thus, such a lawyer is required to decline an appointment as Law Guardian on grounds of conflict of interest only when the lawyer's professional judgment will be or reasonably may be affected by his or her employment relationship with the agency.

6. Instances in which a conflict may arise between the lawyer's duty to the agency and a duty to the child include the following:

- the agency's lay or professional staff are likely to testify adversely to the interests of the child on a material issue, necessitating that the Law Guardian cross-examine the staff member;
- there is a potential claim that the agency failed to discharge its responsibilities to the ward, a claim that the Law Guardian would be obligated to evaluate;
- the services provided by the agency otherwise will be a significant issue in the case, particularly if the Guardian has a management position with the agency;
- the lawyer has knowledge of, or access to, information that is confidential to the agency (including the parents' records) that would be beneficial to the ward's case; and
- the lawyer serves subpoenas on the agency that the agency opposes on grounds, for example, of confidentiality or privilege.

57 See, e.g., Matter of Fargnoli v. Faber, 105 A.D.2d 523, 525, 481 N.Y.S.2d 784, 786 (3d Dep't 1984) (declining to appoint non-profit organization as Guardian, finding that "the apparent contacts between petitioner [the mother] and the [non-profit organization] . . . demonstrate, at a minimum, the appearance of a possible conflict of interest, which may infringe upon the independent representation to which the daughters are entitled"); B.A. v. L.A., 196 Misc. 2d 86, 94, 761 N.Y.S. 2d 805, 811 (Fam. Ct. Rockland Cty. 2003) (disqualifying Law Guardian and stating, "the Law Guardian's professional judgment reasonably may be influenced since her adversary [the lawyer for the parent] is a member and president of the Board of Directors of the Legal Aid Society, the agency by which she is employed").

7. In these circumstances – and others in which the lawyer's professional judgment or zeal on behalf of the client might be affected – the lawyer should decline to serve as Law Guardian. If a conflict becomes apparent only after commencement of the Guardianship, the lawyer should withdraw at that time.

8. DR 5-101(A) permits a conflict to be waived if a "disinterested lawyer would believe that the representation of the client will not be adversely affected thereby and the client consents to the representation after full disclosure of the implications of the lawyer's interest." A conflict cannot be cured by consent of the child, however, because a minor is incapable of giving informed consent for purposes of the rule.[58]

CONCLUSION:

9. Depending on the circumstances, a DR 5-101(A) conflict may exist when an agency's part-time lawyer employee acts as a Law Guardian for a child whose parent has received services from the agency, even though the lawyer performed no legal services for the parent at the agency. If a conflict exists, the child is unable to consent to the representation.

OPINION 791 (02/01/2006)

TOPIC: Referrals and solicitation.

AMPLIFIES: N.Y. State 741 (2001)

DIGEST: A lawyer may not participate in an organization that requires the lawyer to refer potential clients or customers to other lawyers or to nonlawyer members in exchange for their referral of legal business, or charges membership fees and other fees and requires nonlawyer members to refer potential clients to the lawyer.

CODE: DR 2-103(B)

We have been asked to reconsider N.Y. State 741 (2001), in which we concluded: "A lawyer may not participate in a business networking organization that requires the lawyer to refer clients to other members in exchange for their referral of legal business." This opinion reaffirms and expands on N.Y. State 741.

FACTS:

The inquiring attorney belongs to a local chapter of a business networking organization. The organization requires members generally to bring referrals or visitors to the chapter meetings, and permits local chapters to set a minimum number of referrals or visitors. The inquirer states, however, that, unlike the business networking organization discussed in N.Y. State 741, her chapter does not require lawyers to refer clients to other members in exchange for their referral of legal business. In addition, the policies of the organization to which the inquirer belongs provide that professional standards outlined in a formal code of ethics supersede the organization's policies.

In exchange for the privilege of membership in the local chapter, a member pays three fees: (1) an "initial registration fee" that goes to the national umbrella organization; (2) an "annual fee" whose purpose is not specified; and (3) an occasional "monthly fee" that is used to pay for working space and breakfast.

OPINION:

A. The Continued Viability of N.Y. State 741.

After reviewing and reconsidering N.Y. State 741 (2001), we continue to believe that its reasoning is sound and its conclusion is correct. A lawyer may not participate in a business networking organization that requires the lawyer to refer clients to other members in exchange for their referral of legal business, and that conclusion is correct whether or not the organization charges the lawyer any membership fees or other fees.

While the inquirer's chapter does not require a lawyer to make referrals to the other members, we believe that an attorney's participation in that chapter would violate DR 2-103(B) of the New York Code of Professional Responsibility because it requires nonlawyer members to make referrals to the lawyer. Even if professional standards in a formal code of ethics (such as the New York Code of Professional Responsibility) supersede the organization's policies for lawyers, we have no indication that similar professional standards governing the various nonlawyer members of the local chapter would supersede their mandate to bring referrals to other chapter members.

In effect, by paying the initial registration fee and the annual fee, the lawyer is paying for referrals. We briefly addressed that aspect of the organization at issue in N.Y. State 741. We will elaborate on that aspect here.

B. The Relevance of DR 2-103(B).

DR 2-103(B) provides as follows:

> A lawyer shall not compensate or give anything of value to a person or organization to recommend or obtain employment by a client, or as a reward for having made a recommendation resulting in employment by a client, except that:
>
> A lawyer or law firm may refer clients to a nonlegal professional or nonlegal professional service firm pursuant to a contractual relationship with such nonlegal professional or nonlegal professional service firm to provide legal and other professional services on a systematic and continuous basis as permitted by DR 1-107, provided however that such referral shall not otherwise include any monetary or other tangible consideration or reward for such, or the sharing of legal fees; or
> A lawyer may pay the usual and reasonable fees or dues charged by a qualified legal assistance organization or referral fees to another lawyer as permitted by DR 2-107.

In our view, the policies and fees of the networking organization violate DR 2-103(B). A lawyer who pays to join and maintain membership in the organization is giving something of value to the organization, and is giving that value knowing that membership will, at least in part, generate recommendations by other members that may lead to employment of the lawyer by new clients. A lawyer may not pay dues to an organization that requires its members to refer potential clients to the lawyer.

The exceptions to DR 2-103(B) do not apply, for the reasons set forth below.

The networking organization does not fit within the exception in DR 2-103(B)(1), because the organization does not constitute a "contractual relationship" with nonlegal professionals pursuant to DR 1-107. Even if the networking organization qualified as a "contractual relationship" under DR 1-107, it would not satisfy the exception in DR 2-103(B)(1) because members must pay "monetary or other tangible consideration" (i.e., the initial and annual fees) to generate referrals, which violates the "provided however" clause of DR 2-103(B)(1).

The networking organization also does not fit within the exception in DR 2-103(B)(2), because the organization is not a "qualified legal assistance organization." That term is defined in the Definitions section of the New York Code of Professional Responsibility as "an office or organization of one of the four types listed in DR 2-103(D)(1) through (4), inclusive, that meets all of the requirements thereof. The four types listed in DR 2-103(D)(1)-(4) are: (1) a legal aid office or public defender office, (2) a military legal assistance office, (3) a lawyer referral service, or (4) an organization that recommends, furnishes, or pays for legal services to its members or beneficiaries. The networking organization is not any of these types.

Nor does the payment to the networking organization satisfy the test of the final clause of the exception in DR 2-103(B)(2), "referral fees to another lawyer as permitted by DR 2-107." We are not talking here about referrals arrangements between lawyers in different firms, which present very different issues from referral arrangements between lawyers and nonlawyers.

CONCLUSION:

Upon reconsideration, we adhere to our opinion in N.Y. State 741 (2001), which concluded that a lawyer may not participate in a business networking organization that requires the lawyer to refer clients to other members in exchange for their referral of legal business, whether or not the organization charges the lawyer any fees. We add here that a lawyer also may not participate in a business networking organization that charges membership dues and/or other fees and requires nonlawyer members to refer potential clients to members of the organization who are lawyers.

TOPIC: Lawyer advertising; testimonial by celebrity client.

DIGEST: Lawyer may advertise on TV or radio using a testimonial by a celebrity client so long as the testimonial is not false, deceptive or misleading and otherwise satisfies the record-keeping requirements for any radio and TV advertising. However, the lawyer may not compensate or give anything of value to the celebrity client for the testimonial, including compensation for the celebrity's time and services in making it.

CODE: DR 2-101(A); 2-101(B); 2-101(F); 2-101(K); DR 2-103(B).

QUESTIONS:

1. May a lawyer or law firm advertise on radio or TV by using a celebrity client to express the client's satisfaction with the law firm's services and the results obtained?

2. If so, may the celebrity client be identified by name?

3. May the lawyer or law firm pay the celebrity client for the client's time and services rendered in making the testimonial?

OPINION:

4. The Lawyer's Code of Professional Responsibility (the "Code") generally permits advertising and other publicity by lawyers provided that it is not "false, deceptive, or misleading." DR 2-101(A). Thus, testimonials by celebrity clients – advertisements using a celebrity client to express satisfaction with the law firm's services and the results obtained – are not permissible if they are false, deceptive, or misleading.

5. In N.Y. State 614 (1990), this Committee concluded that the Code does not impose a ban on all radio or television advertising that uses client testimonials. In that opinion, however, we concluded that it would be improper to use client testimonials describing prior results that "are statements of 'overblown assurances of client satisfaction,' statements that create unjustified expectations or 'false hopes' or statements that fail to contain sufficient information, thus rendering the statement false, deceptive or misleading." We further opined that, in order to prevent misleading the broadcast audience, "some disclaimer should be joined with client endorsements describing prior results to the effect that the endorsement does not guarantee or predict a similar outcome with respect to any future matter on which the lawyer may be retained."

6. N.Y. State 614 was based in part on DR 2-101(B), which at the time prohibited advertisements that contain "puffery, self-laudatory claims regarding the quality of the lawyers' legal services, and claims that cannot be measured or verified." DR 2-101(B) was repealed by the 1999 amendments to the Code. Thereafter, in N.Y. State 771 (2003), which addressed client testimonials on the Internet, this Committee reached conclusions very similar to those we had reached in N.Y. State 614. We concluded that where such client testimonials otherwise would be misleading (but not false or deceptive), a disclaimer like that described in N.Y. State 614 "may be sufficient to bring the advertisement into compliance with DR 2-101(A)," and we further stated that "compliance with DR 2-101(A) may require additional cautionary language if the testimonial . . . is misleading for reasons beyond the mere report of a positive outcome." N.Y. State 771.

7. We have also previously concluded that client testimonials are not invariably misleading, N.Y. State 771; N.Y. State 614, and we see no reason to conclude otherwise just because the client is a celebrity. Thus, in using a celebrity client testimonial, a lawyer or law firm should ensure that the testimonial is not false, deceptive or misleading in nature. If a true, non-deceptive celebrity client testimonial is misleading, the law firm should determine whether a disclaimer accompanying that client testimonial could be fashioned that would dispel the otherwise misleading quality of the testimonial.

8. We see no reason why the mere identification of the celebrity client by name would be problematic. Indeed, we assume that the identity of the celebrity will be known to at least some of the intended audience merely by virtue of the celebrity's voice or appearance.

9. On the other hand, we conclude that it would violate the Code to pay the celebrity client for a testimonial. DR 2-103(B) states that "[a] lawyer shall not compensate or give anything of value to a person . . . to recommend . . . employment by a client, or as a reward for having made a recommendation resulting in employment by a client," with exceptions not relevant here. We consider the celebrity client's testimonial a recommendation of employment and, therefore, payment of the celebrity client by the lawyer or law firm would violate DR 2-103(B). Compare N.Y. State 661 n.2 (1994) (DR 2-103(B) prohibits payment of a client to obtain the client's authorization to dramatize his or her testimonial).

10. In reaching this conclusion, we reject the argument that payment to the celebrity client is merely payment of the cost of the advertisement and, therefore, it should be permissible to make such a payment for the celebrity's time and services in making the advertisement. In N.Y. State 661 we implied that it is permissible to pay non-client actors who participate in lawyer advertisements for their time and services. But when the celebrity is the person actually making the recommendation, he or she is more than an actor with respect to the testimonial; the celebrity is the client making the recommendation. In those circumstances, we believe that there is too great a likelihood that such payment would be a purchase of the celebrity client's willingness to endorse the lawyer and would create the evil at which DR 2-103(B) is directed – a nonlawyer's having "an incentive to refer to lawyers who will pay the highest referral fee, rather than to lawyers who can provide the most effective services." Restatement Third, The Law Governing Lawyers §10, cmt. d (2000).

11. Finally, we note that the Code imposes certain record-keeping and other requirements upon lawyers who engage in any radio and television advertising. See DR 2-101(F); DR 2-101(K)

CONCLUSION:

12. A lawyer or law firm may advertise on radio or TV using client testimonials so long as (i) they are not false, deceptive, or misleading and (ii) they satisfy the record-keeping and other Code requirements relating to radio or TV advertising. The celebrity client may be identified by name in such testimonials. But, the lawyer or law firm may not compensate or give anything of value to the celebrity client for the testimonial, including any compensation to the celebrity client for the client's time or services in making the testimonial.

OPINION 793 (03/17/2006)

TOPIC: Conflicts of interest relating to of counsel attorneys

OVERRULES: N.Y. State 262 (in part)

DIGEST: Except for personal conflicts under DR 5-101(A), conflicts imputed to an attorney under DR 5-105(D) will also be imputed to all lawyers in any firm with which the attorney has an of counsel relationship; where two firms share an of counsel relationship, conflicts of one firm will be imputed to the other.

CODE: DR 2-102(A)(4), DR 4-101, DR 5-101(A), DR 5-105(A), (D), (E), DR 5-108

FACTS:

1. Attorney L has an of counsel relationship with both the XYZ law firm and the ABC law firm. The DEF law firm has an of counsel relationship with the MNO law firm.

QUESTIONS:

2. Are conflicts of interest that arise out of Attorney L's relationship with the XYZ Firm imputed to the attorneys associated with the ABC Firm and vice versa?

3. Are conflicts attributable to the DEF Firm imputed to the MNO Firm and vice versa?

OPINION:

4. DR 2-102(A)(4) of the Lawyer's Code of Professional Responsibility provides that "[a] lawyer or law firm may be designated 'Of Counsel' on a letterhead if there is a continuing relationship with a lawyer or law firm, other than as a partner or associate." We have interpreted an of counsel relationship to mean that the of counsel lawyer is "available to the firm for consultation and advice on a regular and continuing basis."

N.Y. State 262 (1972); see also ABA 90-357 (characterizing the of counsel relationship as "close, regular [and] personal"); N.Y. City 1996-8 (same.[1]

5. DR 5-105(D) prohibits a lawyer from representing a client in many circumstances where another lawyer in the firm would be prohibited from doing so:

> While lawyers are associated in a law firm, none of them shall knowingly accept or continue employment when any one of them practicing alone would be prohibited

1 In N.Y. State 262 (1972) we opined that a law firm could not be designated as "of counsel" to another law firm. DR 2-102(A)(4) was amended in June, 1999 to permit such a relationship. To the extent N.Y. State 262 holds otherwise, it is overruled. We also opined that a lawyer could not be designated as "of counsel" to more than one law firm. We no longer hold to that view. We note, however, that there is a practical limitation on the number of such arrangements that a lawyer may enter into because of the requirement that an of counsel attorney have a significant relationship with the firm. See N.Y. State 773 (2004); ABA 351 (1984) (of counsel designation requires a relationship that is "close and regular, continuing and semi-permanent"); N.Y. City 2000-4 (adopting the same standard).

from doing so under DR 5-101(A), DR 5-105(A) or (B), DR 5-108(A) or (B) or DR 9-101(B) except as otherwise provided therein.

6. Imputation of conflicts from one lawyer in the firm to another lawyer in the firm applies to partners and associates, as well as attorneys who have an of counsel relationship to the firm. In N.Y. State 773 (2004), we concluded that a lawyer who has an of counsel relationship is "associated" with a firm for purposes of imputation of conflicts of interest. See ABA 90-357; N.Y. City 1995-8; see also Nemet v. Nemet, 112 A.D.2d 359 (of counsel relationship leads to imputed disqualification), appeal dismissed, 66 N.Y.2d 602 (1985).[2] We agreed with these authorities and stated that "if a lawyer acting alone would be disqualified from a particular representation based on any of the rules enumerated in DR 5-105(D), then that disqualification is imputed to a law firm with which that lawyer has an 'of counsel' relationship." N.Y. State 773.

7. Thus, any representation that lawyer L could not undertake personally based on the rules enumerated under DR 5-105(D) could not be undertaken by any other lawyer associated with the XYZ Firm and vice versa. Similarly, any representation that lawyer L could not undertake personally could not be undertaken by any other lawyer associated with the ABC Firm and vice versa.

Imputation of Conflicts Among Firms that Have a Common Of Counsel Attorney

8. In this inquiry we now turn to the question whether conflicts imputed to L by virtue of his or counsel relationship with the XYZ Firm will be imputed to lawyers associated with the ABC Firm. For example, if attorney X, a partner with the XYZ Firm, is disqualified from a particular representation under DR 5-105(A), all lawyers associated with the firm XYZ, including L, who has only an of counsel relationship, also are precluded from undertaking the representation. DR 5-105(D). Does that disqualification extend as well to all the lawyers with whom L is associated in the ABC Firm? We conclude that generally it does.

9. DR 5-105(D) might be read literally to hold that while X's conflicts are imputed to L, they could not be re-imputed to anyone outside of the XYZ Firm. DR 5-105(D) provides for imputation when a lawyer practicing alone "would be prohibited from [undertaking the representation] under DR 5-101(A), DR 5-105(A) or (B), DR 5-108(A) or (B), or DR 9-101(B)." L's conflict derives from DR 5-105(D), not from one of the enumerated provisions and thus arguably there is no basis to impute that conflict to lawyers associated with the ABC Firm. In N.Y. State 670 (1994), however, this Committee opined: "In cases where the primary disqualification does not fall within the parameters of one of the enumerated Disciplinary Rules, vicarious disqualification is dependent on the facts and circumstances of the individual case."

10. Turning to the facts and circumstances of the inquiry, we believe that in most cases the reasons for the imputation to L of the conflicts of lawyers associated with XYZ apply equally to the imputation to the lawyers associated with ABC. As noted in the Restatement of the Law Governing Lawyers:

2 In Hempstead. Video, Inc. v. Incorporated Village of Valley Stream, 409 F.3d 127 (2d Cir. 2005), the court refused to disqualify a lawyer and his firm because of imputation of conflicts from another attorney who was of counsel to the firm. Despite the title "of counsel," the attorney did not have a significant continuing relationship with the firm and had no access to confidences and secrets of the firm's clients.

> A lawyer who is of counsel to a firm often has more limited access to confidential client information than firm partners and associates and usually a smaller financial stake in the firm. Nonetheless, the incentive to misuse confidential information, the difficulty of determining when it has been misused, the ostensible professional relationship, as well as the administrative ease of a definite rule, justify extending imputation to lawyers having an of-counsel status.
> Restatement Third, The Law Governing Lawyers § 123 cmt. c(ii) (1998).

11. We previously opined that a lawyer with an of counsel relationship is associated with a law firm for purposes of the imputation of conflicts. N.Y. State 773. By holding oneself out as having an of counsel relationship with a firm, a lawyer conveys to the public that the lawyer has a continuing relationship with a firm that is close and regular. There is a presumption that a lawyer with an of counsel relationship has access to confidences and secrets of the firm's clients. Thus, the of counsel lawyer has a duty of confidentiality, as well as a duty of loyalty, to the clients of both firms with which the lawyer has an of counsel relationship. We believe that this duty of confidentiality must extend to the other lawyers in the firm.[3]

12. Suppose, for example, that lawyer X, a partner in the XYZ Firm, has agreed to represent Client 1 in litigation against Client 2. Client 2 approaches lawyer Y, also a partner in the XYZ Firm, and asks lawyer Y to represent Client 2 in this litigation. Lawyer Y must decline, as must every lawyer associated with the firm, including L. DR 5-105(A). This disqualification is required in part because all of the lawyers are presumed to have access to confidential information about Client 1 that might be used to Client 1's disadvantage in the representation of Client 2.[4] This imputation should apply as well to all lawyers associated with L in Firm ABC. Because the relationship between L and ABC must be a close, continuing relationship,[5] the presumption arising from L's access to the confidences of Client 1 should be imputed to the lawyers in Firm ABC so as to preclude representation of Client 2 in litigation against Client 1.[6]

13. Another reason for the imputation of conflicts is to protect the principle of loyalty to a client. See Model Rules of Professional Conduct R. 1.10 cmt 2 ("The rule of imputed disqualification . . . gives effect to the principle of loyalty to the client as it applies to lawyers who practice in a law firm."). A client of the XYZ Firm is entitled to loyalty from all lawyers associated with XYZ regardless of other arrangements they have made to practice law. Similarly, the client is entitled to the law-

3 This rule would apply as well where one lawyer was a partner or associate in two firms. See Cinema 5, Ltd. v. Cinerama, Inc., 528 F.2d 1384 (2d Cir. 1976).

4 The lawyer does not need to actually convey confidences and secrets to the lawyers at ABC, which of course would be a violation of DR 4-101. It is the mere access to confidences and secrets that triggers the obligation. Emle Indus. Inc. v. Patentex, Inc., 478 F.2d 562 (2d Cir. 1973) (disqualification analysis hinges on whether attorney could have acquired information, not whether it was actually acquired). Cf. Solow v. W.R. Grace, 83 N.Y.2d 303, 306; 632 N.E.2d 437, 438; 610 N.Y.S.2d 128 (1994) (disqualification may be avoided by demonstrating that confidential information was not communicated); N.Y. State 723 (1999) ("In some circumstances, the moving lawyer will not be presumed to have acquired confidences and secrets").

5 See note 1.

6 Cf. N.Y. State 715 (1999) (contract lawyer could not work for two firms representing adverse clients if he is deemed to be associated with both firms even if contract lawyer does not work on the matter); N.Y. State 672 (1995) (implying that conflicts arising under one of the enumerated rules in DR 5-105(D) that would be imputed from one partner to a second partner who was a part-time prosecutor would also be imputed to the DA's office).

yer's continued loyalty when he simultaneously practices at another firm, as well as the loyalty of the lawyers at that second firm.

14. Similarly, the lawyers in two firms that share an of counsel lawyer owe duties of confidentiality to former clients of both firms. Just as the duty of confidentiality bars the lawyers in a firm from appearing adverse to former clients of the firm in matters substantially related to the prior representation, DR 5-108(B); see N.Y. State 723 (1999), lawyers in a firm that share an of counsel lawyer with that first firm are subject to the same prohibition.

15. This position is in substantial accord with that taken by the New York City Bar, which treated the of counsel attorney and the firms as one unit where the attorney was of counsel to more than one firm. The committee stated:

> If the law firm reaches the conclusion that an "of counsel" designation is appropriate, it should bear in mind that for purposes of analyzing conflicts of interest, "of counsel" relationships are treated as if the "counsel" and the firm are one unit. N.Y. City 1995-8. The implication of the "of counsel" relationship will be even more far reaching if the per diem attorney is considered "of counsel" to one or more other law firms; conflicts of interest applicable individually to any of the firms or attorneys would be imputed to all of them.

N.Y. City 1996-8.

It is also in substantial accord with the position of the ABA, which imputed all conflicts of two firms due to a common of counsel lawyer.

> In consequence there is attribution to the lawyer who is of counsel of all of the disqualifications of each firm, and, correspondingly, attribution from the of counsel lawyer to each firm, of each of those disqualifications. . . . [T]he effect of two or more firms sharing an of counsel lawyer is to make them all effectively a single firm, for purposes of attribution of disqualifications.

ABA 90-357.[7]

16. We conclude that the result will often be different where the conflict arises not from a conflicting representation of a client by another lawyer in one of the firms but from a personal interest of such a lawyer. DR 5-101(A) prohibits representation where an attorney's financial, business, personal or property interests might affect the exercise of the attorney's professional judgment. While the Code requires disqualification of the of counsel attorney, as well as all other attorneys in the firm, when one of the firm's lawyers is disqualified because of a personal conflict under DR 5-101(A), see DR 5-105(D), we do not believe that this circumstance automatically requires the disqualification of the attorneys in the other firm with which the common lawyer has an of counsel relationship. For example, suppose that lawyer A is unable to undertake representation of T Co. in litigation against D Co. because A's father is the treasurer of D Co. and A believes that might affect A's ability to represent T Co. While none of the other 1,000 lawyers in the ABC firm who knew of the relationship, including the of counsel lawyer, could represent T Co. (absent consent), we see no reason why a lawyer in the XYZ Firm, other than the of counsel lawyer, could not represent D Co. On the other hand, there may be circumstances where such cross-imputation would be warranted. For example, suppose the of counsel lawyer was one of only three lawyers in each firm and was a major public figure. In that case, where the of counsel lawyer may be prominently associated with both firms in the minds of the firms' clients and where the relationship among the lawyers of the firms is likely to be particularly close, all lawyers in both firms might be disqualified.

7 In ABA 90-357, the committee reconsidered its former view that a lawyer could not be of counsel to more than two firms, and concluded that the Model Rules contained no such restriction. The opinion makes clear that the cost and consequence of multiple relationships was conflict imputation. See also California Op. 1993-129 (where lawyer is of counsel to two firms, the firms are treated as one for conflicts purposes); Massachusetts Op. 01-1 (same); Maine Op. 175 (2001) (same); Ohio Op. 97-2 (1997) (same); Vermont Op. 99-5 (same); Wisconsin Op. E-93-1 (adopting ABA 90-357). ABA 90-357 rests on Model Rule 1.10, which provides for imputation of conflicts arising from enumerated rules that are similar to the rules listed in DR 5-105(D), except that Model Rule 1.10 exempts personal interest conflicts from firm-wide imputation if the conflicts do "not present a significant risk of materially limiting the representation of the client by the remaining lawyers in the firm." Model Rule 1.10(a).

17. We emphasize that imputation of conflicts would not occur where a lawyer's relationship with the firm is more attenuated than that of an of counsel relationship. For example, where a lawyer from Firm A performs legal work on a contract basis with Firm B, or appears as local counsel in a litigated matter principally handled by Firm B, or consults with Firm B on a one-off basis, the lawyer is not deemed "associated" with Firm B. The relationship would not be close, regular, or personal, and the lawyer would not have general access to confidences and secrets of Firm B. Thus none of the lawyer's conflicts from Firm A would be imputed to Firm B.[8] Conversely, even where there is no formal of counsel relationship, imputation may be required in specific cases where the lawyer from Firm A has participated in a matter against a Firm B client and had access to confidences and secrets.[9]

Imputation Where One Firm is Of Counsel to Another Firm

18. A similar question arises when the DEF Firm enters into an of counsel relationship with the MNO Firm. For example, if any lawyer from the DEF Firm is precluded from undertaking a representation, is that disqualification imputed to all lawyers associated with the MNO Firm? Although the Code is silent as to imputed disqualification with respect to law firms sharing an of counsel relationship, we do not believe it makes any difference whether the shared relationship is with one lawyer or an entire firm. In order to create an of counsel designation with another firm, the two firms must have a continuing relationship that, for example, would entail access to confidences and secrets of the other firm's clients.[10] Such access should preclude the MNO Firm from representing any client that the DEF Firm could not represent under the enumerated provisions of DR 5-105(D). Were we to conclude

8 See, e.g., Bison Plumbing City, Inc. v. Benderson, 281 A.D.2d 955, 722 N.Y.S.2d 660, 661 (4th Dept. 2001) (law firm's disqualification not imputed to "special counsel" to law firm); Shelton v. Shelton, 151 A.D.2d 659, 542 N.Y.S.2d 719 (2d Dep't 1989) (mere rental of office space does not create an association where conflicts are imputed); Gray v. Memorial Medical Center, Inc., 855 F. Supp. 377 (S.D. Ga. 1994) (although lawyer had an of counsel title, court found that he was actually a part-time independent contractor and refused to impute conflicts).

9 See, e.g., Fund of Funds Ltd. v. Arthur Andersen & Co., 567 F.2d 225 (2d Cir. 1977) (entire law firm disqualified where one of its lawyers worked extensively as a co-counsel with another firm that could not undertake the representation).

10 As a practical matter, such a relationship is much like that of two branch offices of a single law firm. For example, DR 5-105(D) prohibits an associate working in the New York office of a law firm from representing a client that could not be represented by an associate in the Seattle office of the firm.

otherwise, a law firm could avoid the imputation required by multiple of counsel relationships by designating the entire firm, rather than a single attorney or multiple attorneys as of counsel.[11]

Conflicts Checks

19. One implication of the possibility of one lawyer having multiple of counsel relationships or of firms having a reciprocal of counsel relationship that imputes disqualifications between the firms is the necessity to do a more extensive conflicts check. DR 5-105(E) provides:

> A law firm shall keep records of prior engagements, which records shall be made at or near the time of such engagements and shall have a policy implementing a system by which proposed engagements are checked against current and previous engagements, so as to render effective assistance to lawyers within the firm in complying with DR 5-105(D). Failure to keep records or to have a policy which complies with this subdivision, whether or not a violation of DR 5-105(D) occurs, shall be a violation by the firm. In cases in which a violation of this subdivision by the firm is a substantial factor in causing a violation of DR 5-105(D) by a lawyer, the firm, as well as the individual lawyer, shall also be responsible for the violation of DR 5-105(D).

20. In N.Y. State 720 (1999), we opined that "the intent of the provision can only be effected if a firm adds to its system information about the representations of lawyers who join the firm." This would be true whether the lawyer joining the firm is a partner or associate or has an of counsel relationship. Thus, when lawyer L establishes an of counsel relationship with ABC, the firm has an obligation not only to make inquiries about L's own representations but also the representations of the XYZ Firm so that the ABC lawyers have sufficient information to avoid a violation of DR 5-105(D).[12] Conversely, when L establishes an of counsel relationship with XYZ, that firm has an obligation to make inquiries about the representations of the ABC Firm. This would include past representations because both firms would be precluded from undertaking a current representation of a client whose interests were adverse to a former client of either firm, where the matters were substantially related. DR 5-108; DR 5-105(D) (imputing DR 5-108 conflicts). This is also an ongoing obligation because L and each firm will undertake new representations that may present conflicts for the other firm.[13]

21. Similar obligations arise when the DEF Firm forms an of counsel relationship with the MNO Firm. Because these two firms are essentially treated as one firm, one conflict checking system would cover both firms and all their attorneys.

11 See also Mississippi Op. 180 (1990) (requiring reciprocal attribution of disqualification where two law firms are of counsel); Wisconsin Op. E-93-1 (same).

12 For the possibility that this information may be a confidence or secret or may be considered proprietary information, see N.Y. State 720 (1999). Note that DR 5-105(E) does not require the firm to keep records of personal conflicts under DR 5-101(A). As noted above, in most circumstances there would be no cross-imputation of such conflicts.

13 See Massachusetts Op. 01-1 (on taking on a new matter, conflicts databases of both firms where lawyer is of counsel must be checked); Vermont Opinion 99-5 (two firms sharing one lawyer on an of counsel basis must develop a procedure to screen for conflicts).

CONCLUSION:

22. For the reasons explained above, both questions are answered in the affirmative.

OPINION 794 (03/17/2006)

TOPIC: Conflicts among various projects of a law school legal clinic, temporary or contract lawyers.

DIGEST: If the various divisions of a law school legal clinic share common office space and file space, the conflicts of the entire clinic are imputed to the firms of lawyers who supervise only one clinic division or project, and the conflicts of the law firms are imputed to the clinic.

CODE: DR 2-103(D); DR 2-110; DR 5-105; DR 5-108; DR 5-110; DR 9-101; EC 2-25; EC 5-21; EC 5-23.

QUESTION:

1. A law school's legal clinic assigns different personnel to different "projects" (representations grouped by practice area such as a civil rights project or low-income tax project). If lawyers supervise one of the clinic's projects, are all of the clinic's conflicts imputed to the lawyers' respective firms, and vice versa? Can any steps be taken to prevent such imputation?

OPINION:

2. So long as the clinic's students work in a common space and have shared access to physical files, the entire legal clinic, including the project in question, is a law firm within the meaning of the Code so that the clinic's entire set of conflicts are imputed to the lawyers' firms, and vice versa.

Background

3. A New York lawyer is director of the legal clinic at a law school located in New York State. The legal clinic provides pro bono legal services in which law students, supervised by faculty members admitted to the New York bar, represent mostly low-income persons in matters ranging from civil rights actions to domestic violence complaints. Recently, the clinic has established a new project, which will engage the clinic in representing persons allegedly harmed by improper commercial practices. To facilitate this endeavor, this "Consumer Project" has enlisted the aid of one faculty member who is also "of counsel" to a private law firm, as well as another private practitioner who is a partner in a law firm and will be a clinical instructor. The regular faculty member will direct the Project and also "consult" on individual cases. The clinical instructor will supervise the cases and work with the students to represent the Project's clients.

4. The clinic's director wishes to clarify whether the lawyers' participation in the Consumer Project will result in the imputation of conflicts from the entire clinic to the lawyers' firms and vice versa. The director is concerned that, in view of the extent of the clinic's other projects, the exercise of clearing conflicts with respect to those other projects may be so burdensome as to discourage the participation of the private law firms in the Consumer Project.

5. In particular, the clinic inquires whether the following segregation measures are sufficient to prevent imputation of conflicts of the other projects to the law firms:

First, the offices of the supervising lawyers will not be part of the clinic's common space, though students assigned to the Consumer Project will continue to work side-by-side with students assigned to other projects.[14]

Second, a separate client information database for storing documents electronically will be established to which only Consumer Project personnel will have access. The other projects will share a separate information database, which will be inaccessible to those involved in the Consumer Project. Client files will likewise be separated, but physically located in the common clinic space.

Third, new matters for the Consumer Project will be cleared for conflicts against the legal clinic's conflict checking system and the conflict checking systems of the two law firms whose lawyers will be participating in the Consumer Project. New matters for the clinic's other projects will likewise continue to be cleared for conflicts against the clinic's conflict checking system, but will not be cleared against the systems of the law firms.

Fourth, the legal personnel and administrative assistant involved in the Consumer Project will not have access to the information database of, or responsibility for, any other non-Consumer Project matter.

Finally, the clinic intends to use separate letterhead for the Consumer Project, and to conduct confidentiality training for the students participating in its work.

6. The inquirer asks whether the proposed measures are sufficient to prevent imputation of (i) the clinic's non-Consumer Project representations to the law firms and (ii) the law firms' representations to the other projects of the legal clinic.

7. We conclude that the proposed measures are not sufficient to prevent cross-imputation of conflicts, because of the sharing of work space and physical file space.

Analysis

8. With limited exceptions, the Code of Professional Responsibility treats a law clinic as a law firm. The Code defines a "law firm" to include a "qualified legal assistance organization."[15] A "qualified legal assistance organization" means an "office or organization of one of the four types listed in DR 2-103(D)(1) through (4),"[16] which includes a legal aid office operated or sponsored by a law school.[17] Thus, unless the Code otherwise provides, the rules governing law firms are equally applicable to the law school's legal clinic.[18]

14 The inquirer does not so state, but we assume for purposes of this opinion that the students could not participate in two projects at once, and could not move from one project to another, at least without additional conflict checking.

18 S*ee* N.Y. State 688 (1997) (applying DR 5-101 to legal clinic).

9. These rules include the vicarious disqualification rules of DR 5-105(D). DR 5-105(D) says that, "[w]hile lawyers are associated in a law firm, none of them shall knowingly accept or continue employment when any one of them practicing alone would be prohibited from doing so" under DR 5-101 (conflicts involving a lawyer's personal or business interests); DR 5-105(A) or (B) (conflicts involving differing client interests); DR 5-108(A) or (B) (conflicts involving former clients); or DR 9-101(B) (conflicts involving prior government service).

10. The Code provides an exception to the rules of imputation for legal clinics. DR 5-110(A) states:

> A lawyer may serve as a director, officer or member of a not-for-profit legal services organization, apart from the law firm in which the lawyer participates, notwithstanding that the organization serves persons having interests that differ from those of a client of the lawyer or the lawyer's firm, provided that the lawyer shall not knowingly participate in a decision or action of the organization:
> > 1. If participating in the decision or action would be incompatible with the lawyer's duty of loyalty to a client under DR 5-101 through DR 5-111; or
> > 2. Where the decision or action could have a material adverse effect on the representation of a client of the organization whose interests differ from those of a client of the lawyer or the lawyer's firm.

11. A law school legal clinic is a not-for-profit legal services organization within the meaning of this rule.[19] The public policy underlying DR 5-110 is to encourage lawyers to contribute pro bono legal services and to assist in making legal counsel available to clients with limited means.[20] The rule, however, applies only to lawyers serving as a "director, officer, or member" of such an organization, and does not apply to a lawyer representing clients through the organization.[21] In other words, DR 5-110 distinguishes between lawyers who, on the one hand, administer the organization, make policy, or teach, and on the other hand, the lawyers who represent clients as part of the organization's rendition of legal services. Accordingly, DR 5-105(D) applies in full force to lawyers engaged in the representation of clients through the legal clinic.

12. Whether a lawyer participating in a legal clinic is engaged in the representation of a client is a fact-intensive inquiry. In the circumstances before us, we understand that the full-time faculty member's principal role will be to teach the legal subjects of relevance to the Project, with occasional "consultation" on specific matters. Whether these consultations give rise to the formation of an attorney-client relationship between the teacher and the clinic's client in particular matters depends on all the circumstances. Such a relationship is most likely to exist when the instructor is in receipt of a particular client's confidences and secrets and actively engaged in providing legal services to the client.

20 EC 2-25.

21 See N.Y. State 688 (1997). See also N.Y. State 643 (1993) (legal service organization's board member may represent client against organization's client whether board member's client is paying or pro bono).

On the other hand, we do not think that a teacher's commentary on abstract facts gives rise to an attorney-client relationship.

13. In this situation, the clinic presumes that the nature of the services provided by both of the supervising instructors consists, at least in part, of attorney-client relationships between the instructors and the clinic's clients. In trying to accommodate this fact to the clinic's ethical obligations as a law firm, the clinic likens the faculty members' situation to that of temporary or contract lawyers. The clinic argues that the safeguards it proposes to implement are akin to those deemed sufficient to relieve temporary or contract lawyers hired for particular matters from DR 5-105(D)'s imputation rule. We disagree.

14. This Committee and others have outlined the circumstances in which contract or temporary lawyers may be treated as "associated" in a firm for imputing conflicts.[22] The common and predominant theme of these opinions is the protection of client confidences and secrets. As we said in Opinion 715, whether a lawyer "should be regarded as being associated with a firm while working on a matter for the firm depends on the nature of the relationship, and especially whether [the lawyer] has access to information relating to the representation of firm clients other than the clients for which [the lawyer] is working directly." We wrote:

> Whether a Contract Lawyer who works in the offices of the employing firm should be deemed to have access to the confidences and secrets of all clients of the firm depends upon the circumstances, including whether the firm has a system for restricting access to client files and for restricting informal discussions of client matters. This, in turn, may depend on the size of the firm and the formality of procedures for restricting access to such information. The mere fact that the Contract Lawyer has an office in the employing firm or uses its library or rest rooms does not necessarily mean that the Contract Lawyer should be presumed to have access to confidential information about all clients in the firm. If the Contract Lawyer has general access to the files of all clients of the firm and regularly participates in discussions of their affairs, then he or she should be deemed "associated" with the firm. However, if the firm has adopted procedures to ensure that the Contract Lawyer is privy only to information about clients he or she actually serves, then, in most cases, the Contract Lawyer should not be deemed to be "associated" with the firm for purposes of vicarious disqualification.

15. A similar conclusion applies in opinions addressing office sharing among separate law firms or lawyers in solo practice. We and others have found that, depending on the facts and circumstances of a particular situation, DR 5-105(D) may prevent lawyers who practice separately but share office space from representing clients with differing interests.[23] Under these opinions, with appropriate safeguards, and assuming that the arrangement is not misleading to prospective and actual clients, the sharing of merely the same leasehold, a library, an electronic research account, restrooms, a central phone system with individual lines, or a common receptionist is not sufficient, alone or in combination, to merge lawyers in separate practices into one. Acceptance of these organizations presupposes, however, that the confidences and secrets of the clients of each separate practice will not be shared or appear to be subject to sharing with lawyers working on a conflicting matter.

16. Such is our objection to the clinic's proposal. Two or more lawyers carrying out conflicting assignments in close proximity in the same space with common tables, facilities and files engender subtle influences that could affect the exercise of independent professional judgment.[24] These "numerous influences might weigh against the unswerving fidelity to the client's interest that professional duty compels."[25] In addition, there is a "real danger that a client's confidences and secrets will be divulged" through the use of "shared clerical staff, common files, or otherwise."[26] "If the physical organization of the office suite places client confidences at risk, it is appropriate to treat the association as a firm or to determine that adverse interests may not be represented."[27]

17. Here, students involved in the Consumer Project will be working side-by-side in the same space with students working on the clinic's other matters. Although an electronic barrier will be erected to prevent access to client documents on a database, no physical barrier separates Consumer Project students from access to the files on other clinic matters or vice versa. Such proximity requires that the legal clinic, including the Consumer Project, be treated as a single law firm. Consequently, by reason of DR 5-105(D), the disabilities of any of the legal personnel of the legal clinic are imputed not only to other members of the clinic but also to the law firms with which the faculty advisors are associated.[28]

18. We are not inattentive to the clinic's concern that our result will discourage the participation of private practitioners but we do not believe that concern allows us to ignore what the Code and its interpreters say. Innumerable lawyers in private practice contribute generously of their time to pro bono efforts in keeping with the precepts of Canons 4 and 5. No better place exists to instill these values in the profession than applying the same standards to those studying to join it.

CONCLUSION:

19. So long as a legal clinic's students work in a common space and have shared access to physical files, the entire legal clinic's personnel, including lawyers who supervise only a single project of the clinic, are a law firm within the meaning of the Code so that the conflicts of all those personnel are imputed to the lawyers' firms, and vice versa.

TOPIC: Medical doctor/lawyer advertising for malpractice claimants.

DIGEST: A medical doctor admitted to the New York bar whose business plan is to advertise for patients to assess the merits of prospective malpractice claims for referral to other lawyers must disclose in advertising that he or she is a lawyer and may not split fees with the other lawyers without obtaining client consent, ensuring that the overall fee is reasonable and taking joint responsibility for the matter.

CODE: DR 1-102(A), DR 2-101, DR 2-103(A) (2)(e), DR 2-103(B), DR 2-107, DR 7-109(C).

QUESTION:

1. May a medical doctor who is a member of the New York bar advertise his or her availability as a doctor to assess the viability of medical malpractice claims, and his or her availability to refer viable claimants to lawyers, without disclosing the doctor's membership in the bar or intention to share in any contingency fee recovered by the lawyer to whom the client is referred?

BACKGROUND:

2. A medical doctor who is also a member of the New York bar currently performs expert medical services for other lawyers in connection with medical malpractice matters, including identifying claims as meritorious, assisting counsel in pretrial proceedings on medical issues, and locating appropriate testifying experts for trial in medical malpractice actions. The inquirer believes that a substantial number of potential malpractice claimants who are unwilling to consult a lawyer, at least initially, about injuries that may give rise to medical malpractice claims may be willing to consult with a physician on that subject. Accordingly, to attract this clientele, the inquirer proposes to advertise the inquirer's medical credentials to the public, offering to ascertain at no cost whether such possible claimants, in the inquirer's judgment, have claims sufficiently meritorious to warrant referral to a lawyer.

3. The inquirer's advertising would state that the purpose of the cost-free physical examination is to determine whether in a medical doctor's judgment a viable legal claim exists, and the inquirer's willingness to refer such viable claims to a lawyer. The inquirer would not refer any claimant to a lawyer without the claimant's advance consent. The advertising would not disclose that the doctor is also a lawyer, nor the inquirer's expectation and intention of being paid a fee by the lawyer to whom the claimant would be referred. In all cases, the inquirer would act solely as a medical consultant, and not represent the claimant as counsel in a malpractice action. In consideration of these services, the inquirer intends to receive a portion of the contingency fee, if any, earned by the lawyer to whom the matter is referred.

OPINION:

4. At the threshold, we mark the limits of our opinion. We offer no view on the rules governing advertising by the medical profession for services unrelated to the practice of law. Assuming the law and rules of the medical profession permit it, we know of no reason why a physician who happens to have a law degree may not advertise for patients without reference to the law degree as long as the advertiser is offering and actually providing only medical (or for that matter other non-legal) services to the patient. As far as we are concerned, the term "medical" or other "non-legal" services includes offering solely a medical opinion about whether specific medical care may be responsible for an alleged injury.

5. That does not end the inquiry, though, because to us the question is whether a doctor/lawyer occupied in assessing injuries as legal claims is engaged in the practice of law. No easy line unambiguously divides a purely medical opinion about the sources and causes of an injury and a legal opinion on the viability of a medical malpractice claim. The line has consequences for law and ethics, for the non-lawyer/doctor and for the lawyer/doctor. For instance, it may be that, solely as medical practitioners (not experts), non-lawyer/doctors may evaluate the viability of medical malpractice claims without thereby engaging in the unauthorized practice of law – an issue of law on which we do not opine. Likewise, it may be that lawyer/doctors may advertise their ability to evaluate, for medical malpractice cases, the standard of care employed and the extent to which any shortfall in that case resulted in injury, without thereby subjecting the lawyer/doctor to rules governing lawyer advertising.

6. Here, though, we have a doctor/lawyer whose practice consists of considering the viability of a medical malpractice claim for referral to a lawyer. In this context, we believe that the doctor/lawyer is engaged in the practice of law. In N.Y. State 678 (1996), considering a similar question in the context of a lawyer acting as a divorce mediator, we said:

> [A]uthorities have disagreed as to whether to conceptualize divorce mediations as a legal or nonlegal service when provided by lawyers. Our judgment is that, on the present state of facts about how lawyers function as mediators, lawyers who serve as mediators should be presumed to be rendering a legal service. Presumably a lawyer who serves as a mediator outside of the law office, gives no legal advice or opinions, and does not draw up the agreement is not acting in any legal capacity, and is not then governed by the lawyer's code. This would, however, be a rare case.
> N.Y. State 678 (citations omitted) (emphasis in original).

7. We think that this conclusion is even more true here, where the inquirer intends to consider not only medical issues of causation but also the legal issues of the viability of a claim, which may include questions such as the timeliness of the claim, whether the potential damages warrant pursuit of the claim, and the likelihood of success on the merits. Although instances may occur in which the inquirer might defer such questions to independent counsel, we believe that such instances are likely to be the exception, not the rule. It follows that, because the services being advertised are legal services, the inquirer's advertising must comply with the rules on lawyer advertising. Among other things, this means that advertising that omits the inquirer's legal background would be "false, deceptive or misleading" in violation of DR 2-101.

8. If the inquirer discloses his or her legal background, however, a separate concern arises, and that is the omission from advertising of the inquirer's intention to refer all matters to other lawyers for a share of a fee. Whether a lawyer must disclose in advertising an intention to enlist the aid of other counsel depends on the circumstances of a matter or practice area. We believe, however, that a lawyer holding himself or herself out as a medical malpractice lawyer, with the present intention of never practicing as such but instead referring all such cases to others, would be engaged in false and misleading advertising in violation of DR 2-101. Cf. DR 2-103(A)(2)(e)(a lawyer may not solicit professional employment from a prospective client by written or recorded communication if the lawyer "intends or expects, but does not disclose, that the legal services necessary to handle the matter competently will be performed primarily by another lawyer who is not affiliated with the soliciting lawyer as a partner, associate or of counsel").

9. Even if we assume the exceptional case – one in which the doctor/lawyer is fully able to separate the medical from the legal – we still conclude that ethical issues infect the inquirer's business plan. In such circumstances, the principal difficulties with the inquirer's plan lie not with the proposed advertising, but with the proposed arrangements between the inquirer and the lawyers who would take the matters. Even if the inquirer were not a lawyer or resigned from the bar tomorrow, the Code forbids the proposed arrangements, whether with a doctor or anyone else.

10. DR 2-103(B) prohibits payments for legal referrals except in certain circumstances, none of which apply here. Here, the lawyer to whom the inquirer refers the matter would be compensating the inquirer for having made a recommendation resulting in employment by a client, a clear violation of that rule. A lawyer may not violate a Disciplinary Rule, nor circumvent one through the actions of another. DR 1-102(A). We believe that this Rule necessarily means that a lawyer may not aid or abet another lawyer in violating a Disciplinary Rule. Thus, this referral-for-a-fee program is impermissible, even for one acting solely as a doctor, because as a lawyer the inquirer would be aiding the violation of a Disciplinary Rule by another lawyer.

11. That is not all. DR 2-107 proscribes dividing legal fees with a lawyer who is not a partner or associate of the lawyer's firm except where the other lawyer acts as a lawyer for the client, assumes joint responsibility for the matter (or performs services in proportion to the fee received), and receives a fee with the client's consent that, together with the other lawyer's fee, is reasonable in the aggregate. Because the inquirer does not intend to act as counsel nor advise the client of participation in any fee arrangement, the proposed course of action would violate this rule. See also N.Y. State 698 (1998) (lawyer may not accept medical malpractice case from a medical consultant if consultant requires the attorney's agreement to a contingent consultant fee as a precondition).

12. To the extent that the inquirer may seek to accommodate his or her conduct to the requirements of DR 2-107 – that is, by assuming joint responsibility for the representation as a lawyer who receives a portion of a reasonable contingent fee with client consent – the inquirer clearly could not do so without full compliance with the lawyer advertising rules, including disclosure in advertising of membership in the bar.

CONCLUSION:

13. We end with the same caveat with which we began. We offer no opinion whether a medical doctor may advertise the doctor's availability to provide medical opinions to patients on whether a breach of a reasonable standard of medical care caused a patient's injury. If a medical doctor may do so, we know of no reason why that same medical doctor may not thereafter be paid a fixed (not a contingent) fee by a lawyer as a consulting or testifying expert in a medical malpractice action. See DR 7-109(C) (lawyer may not pay a witness contingent on the outcome of a case). In our view, however, a member of the New York bar who holds a medical degree, and who purports to act only as a medical doctor with patients visiting the doctor solely as a doctor, may not establish an impermissible referral service for lawyers, split fees with those lawyers, and conceal these arrangements from prospective clients in advertising or otherwise.

TOPIC: Obligation to inform third parties of potential claims.

DIGEST: A lawyer who represents the administrator of an estate has no ethical obligation to contact creditors holding claims who have failed to file claims in the estate proceeding to advise them that they should do so.

CODE: DR 7-102(A)(5).

QUESTION:

1. If a lawyer who represents the administrator of an estate has advised the attorney for a creditor of the decedent's death, and the creditor's attorney subsequently withdraws a court action on the claim in the apparent but erroneous belief that the estate has no assets, must the lawyer for the administrator contact the creditor's attorney to advise the creditor's attorney that the estate has assets and that the creditor should file a claim?

OPINION:

2. An attorney who represents the administrator of an estate discovered shortly after having been retained that the decedent was the defendant in a litigated matter in which the decedent had defaulted, leading to a default judgment on the merits with a hearing still to be held on damages. As soon as the attorney for the administrator became aware of this litigation, the attorney notified the plaintiff's attorney by letter that the decedent had died, and that the matter was therefore stayed. The attorney for the administrator received no response to his letter or any other inquiry from the plaintiff's attorney.

3. About one year later, when the administrator's attorney was prepared to distribute the proceeds from the sale of the estate's assets, the administrator's attorney checked on the litigation. In so doing, the administrator's attorney discovered that approximately three months after the letters of administration were issued and at least six months after the petition for appointment of the administrator in Surrogate's Court, the attorney for the plaintiff in the litigation sent a letter to the court where the litigation was pending, stating that the plaintiff's attorney was closing the file and that the court could close its file as well. The plaintiff's attorney also advised that the defendant had died and, wrongly, that there was no estate proceeding pending.

4. At the time the attorney sent the court this letter, a search of the Surrogate's Court records would have revealed that a petition had been filed for letters of administration, which petition noted the value of the estate and that the letters had been issued.

5. Assuming that the law imposes no affirmative obligation on the attorney for the administrator to notify potential creditors, where no misrepresentation has been made regarding the assets of a pending estate and the information is properly on file with the Surrogate's Court, the attorney for the estate has no ethical obligation to notify an attorney in a litigation involving the decedent of the fact that the letters of administration have been issued in the estate and/or that the estate does have some assets.

6. Statements made by lawyers to third parties can become a matter of ethical concern. A lawyer may not "[k]nowingly make a false statement of law or fact." DR 7-102(A)(5). The conduct of the attorney for the administrator here does not approach violation of this standard. At no time, whether directly or by implication, did the administrator's attorney indicate that the estate was insolvent. In fact, the implication of the insistence that the lawsuit be stayed pending issuance of letters of administration is to the contrary, that is, it implied that the estate did have assets that would be affected by this claim. The attorney representing the plaintiff did not make further inquiry, and apparently did not check the public record, which would have disclosed the existence of assets in the estate, nor did that attorney file a claim in the estate proceeding.

CONCLUSION:

7. The Committee finds that absent representation to the contrary, an attorney for the administrator of an estate has no ethical obligation to notify the creditor of an estate that the estate has assets and that the creditor should therefore file a claim. We do not opine on whether the administrator's attorney could reveal this to the plaintiff's attorney.

OPINION 797 (04/26/2006)

TOPIC: Client fraud/misstatements.

CLARIFIES: N.Y. State 674 (1995) N.Y. State 781 (2004)

DIGEST: Under DR 7-102(B), if a lawyer determines that a client has made false representations to the court in an affidavit, the lawyer must call upon the client to correct the information in the affidavit, and, if the client refuses, the lawyer must withdraw any misstatements the lawyer made in certifying the client's statements. The lawyer must also consider whether the lawyer is required or permitted to withdraw from the representation under DR 2-110(B) or (C).

CODE: DR 2-110(A); 2-110(B), 2-110(B)(2); 2-110(C); 2-110(C)(1)(g); DR 4-101; 4-101(A); 4-101(C); 4-101(C)(3), (5); DR 7-101(A)(1); DR 7-102(A)(2), (3), (4), (5), (7); 7-102(B); 7-102(B)(1); EC 1-1; 1-9; 5-1; 7-10.

QUESTION:

1. A lawyer has filed a probate petition that sought the issuance of letters testamentary to a person who was ineligible to receive them by reason of that person's prior conviction of a felony. The lawyer did not know of these facts when the lawyer filed the petition, but learned them later. What are the lawyer's ethical obligations?

OPINION:

2. A lawyer represents a client who was named the executor under a decedent's will and is the sole beneficiary named in the will and the decedent's only heir at law. The lawyer files the client's oath, required to seek appointment as executor, with the Surrogate's Court. In order to file the papers with the court, the lawyer also signs the form, which constitutes a certification that to the best of the lawyer's knowledge, information and belief, formed after an inquiry reasonable under the circumstances, the form contains no material misstatements of fact.[29] The court issues letters testamentary. Subsequently, the client informs the lawyer that the client is a convicted felon. As such, under SCPA §707(1)(d), the client is ineligible to receive letters testamentary. The estate remains unsettled.

3. Does the lawyer have any obligations to the Surrogate's Court and other potentially interested third parties? Is the information about the client's felony conviction protected as a confidence? Must the lawyer withdraw if the client refuses voluntarily to disclose the client's status as a felon?

29 The oath of an executor includes the statement, "I am not ineligible to receive letters [testamentary]." Under the Rules of the Chief Administrator (22 NYCRR § 130-1.1A(b), by signing a paper, an attorney certifies that, to the best of the attorney's knowledge, information and belief, formed after an inquiry reasonable under the circumstances, the presentation of the paper or the contentions therein are not frivolous as defined in Part 130. Under that Part, a paper is "frivolous" if, among other things, it asserts material factual statements that are false. In determining whether the conduct was frivolous, a court will consider whether or not the conduct was continued when its lack of factual basis was apparent, should have been apparent, or was brought to the attention of counsel or the party. 22 NYCRR §130-1.1(c).

DR 7-102(B)(1): Authority to Disclose Fraud on Person or Tribunal

4. DR 7-102(B)(1) of the Lawyer's Code of Professional Responsibility (the "Code") states that a lawyer who receives information clearly establishing that the client has, in the course of the representation, perpetrated a fraud upon a person or tribunal > shall promptly call upon the client to rectify the same, and if the client refuses or is unable to do so, the lawyer shall reveal the fraud to the affected person or tribunal, except when the information is protected as a confidence or secret.

5. Whether the client has committed fraud on the court is a legal question beyond the jurisdiction of this Committee. The answer will depend upon whether the client knew that he or she was misstating information or omitting information in the Executor's oath. See Code, Definition 9 (fraud includes knowing failure to correct misrepresentations which can be reasonably expected to induce detrimental reliance by another). If the lawyer concludes that the client has committed a fraud, the lawyer must call upon the client to disclose to the court that the client was not eligible to receive letters testamentary. If the client refuses to make or authorize the correction, as noted above, DR 7-102(B)(1) instructs the lawyer to reveal the fraud "except when the information is protected as a confidence or secret." (Emphasis supplied.)

Exception for Information Protected as a Confidence or Secret

6. The extent to which the lawyer may disclose the client's fraud thus depends upon whether the information that would be disclosed is protected as a confidence or secret. Under DR 4-101(A), a confidence is information protected by the attorney-client privilege under applicable law. Determining whether information is protected by the attorney-client privilege is a question of law that is beyond the scope of our jurisdiction. See CPLR § 4503.

7. A secret is any information gained by the lawyer in the professional relationship that the client has requested be held inviolate or the disclosure of which would be embarrassing or would be likely to be detrimental to the client. Whatever the conclusion with respect to the attorney-client privilege, either the fact of the felony conviction or the fact that the client has committed perjury would qualify as "secrets" under the Code.

Exceptions to Protection as Confidences and Secrets: DR 4-101(C)(3)

8. DR 4-101(C) contains a number of exceptions to the lawyer's duty of confidentiality, including DR 4-101(C)(3) and (5). DR 4-101(C)(3) permits a lawyer to reveal the client's intention to commit a crime and the information necessary to prevent the crime. It does not specifically apply to frauds, unless the fraud itself constitutes a crime. It appears that, because the lawyer did not know of the client's intention to misrepresent the client's status, but only learned of it after its occurrence, the client's fraud is now a past fraud and DR 4-101(C)(3) is inapplicable.[30]

9. Until 1990, the rule in New York was that, if the client refused to correct a fraud or to authorize the lawyer to do so, the lawyer was prohibited from disclosing the fraud, and was required either to stand by silently or to withdraw from the representation under DR 2-110(C)(1)(g) (lawyer may [but is not required] to withdraw when the client has used the lawyer's services to perpetrate a crime or fraud.)

10. In 1990, DR 4-101(C)(5) was added to the Code. Under DR 4-101(C)(5), a lawyer may reveal confidences or secrets of the client to the extent "implicit in withdrawing a written or oral opinion or representation previously given by the lawyer and believed by the lawyer still to be relied upon by a third person where the lawyer has discovered that the opinion or representation was based on materially inaccurate information or is being used to further a crime or fraud."

11. By signing the client's papers in accordance with Part 130, the lawyer has made a representation to the Surrogate's Court. We have considered whether the Surrogate's Court is a person within the meaning of DR 4-101(C)(5). The term "person" is defined in Definition 3 of the Code as including "a corporation, an association, a trust, a partnership, and any other organization or legal entity." DR 7-102(B) clearly distinguishes between a "person" and a "tribunal," indicating that the intent of the drafters may have been to exclude tribunals from the ambit of the term "person." In addition, many Code provisions that use the term "person" or "third person" clearly are referring to clients, potential clients, witnesses and other participants in the legal process. See, e.g., EC 1-1; EC 1-9. On the other hand, there are several Code provisions where a tribunal logically could be included within the ambit of the term. See, e.g., EC 5-1; EC 7-10; DR 7-101(A)(1). We do not believe that the drafters of DR 4-101(C)(5) intended to exclude tribunals from the scope of the term "person" as used in this rule, and thus give lawyers less discretion to correct fraudulent acts towards tribunals than towards others. Accordingly, we believe that DR 4-101(C)(5) gives discretion to a lawyer to withdraw the lawyer's representation under Part 130, which requires the withdrawal of the client's affidavit. The lawyer is not authorized by DR 4-101(C)(5) to explain the reasons for the withdrawal of the affidavit, since that section authorizes the disclosure of client confidences and secrets only to the extent implicit in withdrawing the representation.

12. Our opinion in N.Y. State 781 (2004) implicitly reaches a similar conclusion that a tribunal is a third "person" within the meaning of DR 4-105(C). In that opinion, we discussed a matrimonial lawyer who learned that a financial statement submitted by the lawyer to family court contained a material omission. In order to submit the financial statement on behalf of the client, the lawyer had certified the accuracy of the statement to the court. We therefore found that the lawyer had made a misrepresentation to the court, and that DR 4-101(C)(5), permitting disclosure to the extent implicit in withdrawing such a certification, was applicable.

30 Academics and others have suggested that, even if a client's criminal or fraudulent conduct occurred in the past, it might constitute a continuing crime or fraud, and, thus, not constitute past conduct for purposes of DR 4-101(C)(3). Some have suggested that a fraud should be deemed continuing where it has future consequences. Some have suggested that the mere continuation of the harmful effect of an otherwise completed client wrong should not affect the determination of whether the client's conduct is past conduct, especially when disclosure of the future consequences necessarily would involve disclosure of the past conduct. Finally, others suggest a distinction based on whether the client disclosed the wrongful conduct for the purposes of seeking legal advice with respect to the conduct. See generally N.Y. City 2002-1.

13. In N.Y. State 781, we went on to state that, since the lawyer was permitted to reveal the information under DR 4-101(C)(5), the information was not "protected as a confidence or secret" within the meaning of DR 7-102(B)(1), and the lawyer therefore was required to reveal the information to the court to the extent implicit in withdrawing the financial statement, if the client refused to do so. This conclusion was based on our opinion in N.Y. State 674 (1995), which also addressed which information is "protected" as a confidence or secret within the meaning of the last clause of DR 7-102(B)(1), and interpreted the phrase as meaning those confidences and secrets that must be preserved by DR 4-101. We therefore concluded that "where the lawyer is permitted to reveal a confidence or secret under DR 4-101(C), disclosure of the fraud is mandatory under DR 7-102(B)." (Emphasis in original.)[31]

14. We clarify that this broad language, which was quoted in N.Y. State 781, means only that the lawyer must reveal the fraud to the extent permitted by DR 4-101(C). DR 4-101(C)(5) authorizes disclosure of the client's fraud only to the extent implicit in withdrawing the lawyer's representation under Part 130. Consequently, the facts surrounding the client's conduct are still protected as a confidence or secret. Since DR 7-102(B)(1) requires the lawyer to reveal the fraud "except when the information is protected as a confidence or secret," the lawyer cannot reveal the facts underlying the fraud, but only do what the lawyer is permitted to do – withdraw the lawyer's own certification.

15. In the case at hand, DR 4-101(C)(5) authorizes the lawyer, and therefore the lawyer is required, to withdraw the lawyer's certification. Because the lawyer is not authorized to disclose the nature of the falsehood, the lawyer is not authorized further to disclose the client's secret and therefore is not required to disclose it under DR 7-102(B)(1).

16. The fact that the client is the sole beneficiary named in the will and the decedent's only heir at law should not, in our opinion, affect the lawyer's decision in this matter. The executor has a responsibility to pay creditors of the estate, as well as estate taxes, if any. Consequently, the executor's duties are not only to the beneficiary. Public policy in this state has determined that faithful execution of the duties of executor should not be entrusted to a person convicted of a felony.

17. After withdrawing his or her certification, the lawyer must consider whether the lawyer must withdraw from representing the client. Withdrawal would be mandatory if the lawyer knows that continued employment would result in violation of a Disciplinary Rule. DR 2-110(B)(2). Such rules

31 N.Y. State 781 quoting N.Y. State 674. In N.Y. State 674, the information "protected" was the information that the client had committed perjury in an arbitration proceeding. We concluded that this information was a past fraud and that it could not be characterized as continuing or ongoing for purposes of the future crimes exception in DR 4-101(C)(3). Consequently, we held that, if the client refused to recant the perjury, the lawyer was not authorized to disclose it under DR 4-101(C)(3) and therefore was not required to disclose it under DR 7-102(B)(1). Nassau County 2003-1 is to a similar effect. In that opinion, a lawyer learned that his client had misrepresented indigence in order to obtain the lawyer's representation through an indigent lawyer program. Because the lawyer had not made any representations to the court, the Nassau County Bar Association ethics committee concluded that, if the client refused to rectify the fraud, the information was protected as a secret and the lawyer could not disclose it to the court. (Since continued representation, however, would result in a fraud on the program, the opinion went on to conclude that the lawyer must withdraw from the representation.)

might include DR 7-102(A)(2), (3), (4), (5) or (7). In a matter before a tribunal, court permission may be required for withdrawal. DR 2-110(A).

CONCLUSION:

18. Under DR 7-102(B), if a lawyer determines that a client has made false representations to the court in an affidavit, the lawyer must call upon the client to correct the information in the affidavit, and, if the client refuses, the lawyer must consider what additional steps to take. Where the lawyer has made a representation to the court regarding an affidavit or other filing, the lawyer must withdraw the representation. However, the lawyer is not authorized to disclose the client's confidences and secrets except to the extent implicit in such withdrawal. The client's disclosures to the lawyer do not lose their protection as confidences or secrets simply because the withdrawal of the lawyer's representation may imply to a court that there is a problem with the filing. The lawyer should also consider whether he or she may or must withdraw from representing the client under DR 2-110(B) or (C).

TOPIC: Practice of criminal law by legislator/lawyer

DIGEST: A lawyer/county legislator may not represent criminal defendants in cases involving members of a police department or district attorney's office over which the legislature has budget or appointment authority. It is irrelevant whether the county or the budget is large or the representation involves only plea bargaining. If the lawyer/legislator is employed by a law firm, other lawyers in the firm are not per se vicariously disqualified, but imputed disqualification may be appropriate where members of the public are likely to suspect that the lawyer/legislator's influence will have an effect on the prosecution of the case.

CODE: DR 1-102(A)(5), DR 5-101(A), DR 5-105(A) and (B), DR 5 105(D), DR 5-108(A) and (B), DR 8-101(A), Canon 9, DR 9-101, DR 9 101(B)(1)(a).

QUESTION:

1. May a lawyer who is also a member of a county legislature practice criminal law in the county where he/she is a legislator if the legislature has budget authority over the police department or district attorney's office? If the lawyer is personally disqualified from representing a client, and the lawyer is associated with a law firm, are the other lawyers in the firm vicariously disqualified?

DISCUSSION:

2. N.Y. State 692 (1997) and 702 (1998) prohibit a legislator/lawyer from participating in a matter that requires the legislator to cross-examine a police officer, or to be adverse to a prosecutor, who works for the county where the legislature has the authority to approve the budget of the county. Thus a legislator/lawyer could represent defendants in federal criminal cases or criminal cases brought by the attorney general of New York, but could not undertake representations in any court in the county in which the budget for the prosecutors or law enforcement witnesses must be approved by the legislative body on which the lawyer/legislator sits. We have been asked a number of questions pertaining to the practice of criminal law by a county legislator:

(1) Whether N.Y. State 692 and 702 may be distinguished where the county in which the legislator serves is large and has a large budget;

(2) Whether the lawyer/legislator may, with the advance consent of the client, handle criminal work in that county if the work involved only plea bargaining, on the understanding that if more were required, the lawyer/legislator would pass the case to another lawyer; and

(3) Whether the lawyer/legislator may take a position in a criminal defense firm in a nearby county that represents criminal-defense clients in the county where the lawyer is a legislator, if the lawyer/legislator is screened from those matters.

Size of County or Budget

3. As we noted in N.Y. State 692, this Committee has been addressing the limits of the private law practice that may ethically be maintained by a part-time legislator for more than 30 years. The purpose of ethical restrictions on the practice of criminal law by legislators is to prevent private clients from retaining a part-time public official in the hope of gaining an improper advantage as a result of the lawyer's public office. DR 8-101(A). They also are designed to prevent public suspicion that the client may be gaining some improper advantage by retaining the public official. Id. For example, if the lawyer/legislator would be adverse to law enforcement authorities (e.g., because he or she would have to cross-examine them) or prosecutors over whom the legislature has budgetary control or influence, we believe that the lawyer/legislator should be disqualified because of the possibility that the law enforcement officers or prosecutors would exercise undue caution in handling the case.

4. In N.Y. State 431 (1976), we distinguished between whether the legislature had line item approval over members of the prosecutor's office or rather appropriated a lump sum for the entire office, leaving it to the district attorney to set the salaries of his or her assistants. We allowed the lawyer-legislator to be adverse to a prosecutor or law enforcement officer in the latter case. In N.Y. State 692, however, we rejected that distinction. Although one of the reasons for this rejection was that an appearance of impropriety might exist where a small legislature, small DA's office or small police department was involved in a lump sum budget approval, we did not limit disqualification to these instances. Rather, we stated that a lawyer-legislator should not take on a matter that will require the lawyer to cross-examine a police officer from a police department over which the legislature exercises budgetary or appointment authority or be adverse to a prosecutor whose office is similarly affected. We believe the concerns that motivate this prohibition apply regardless of the size of the legislature at issue. Accordingly, the fact that the legislator's county is large and has a large budget is irrelevant to whether he or she may practice criminal law in the county.

Representation Involving Solely Plea Bargaining

5. This Committee has a series of opinions dealing with the issue of whether a lawyer may limit the scope of representation of a client. For example, in N.Y. State 604 (1989), we held that a lawyer whose client is the subject of a grand jury investigation that could result in serious felony charges and does not have sufficient funds to pay for the lawyer's services beyond the grand jury stage may enter into a limited-scope retainer, provided that the limitation is consistent with competent representation under the Lawyer's Code of Professional Responsibility (the "Code") and provided that the lawyer makes certain disclosures to the client. We express no opinion as to whether a representation limited to post-indictment plea bargaining would be consistent with competent representation under the Code.

6. Even assuming that limiting the scope of the representation to plea bargaining were appropriate under other circumstances, however, we do not believe that a limited representation would circumvent the conflicts described above. In plea bargaining, the lawyer/legislator still would have to conduct an investigation and interview members of the police force, and would be bargaining with the members of the county prosecutor's office. Consequently, all of the policy reasons for our earlier positions apply in this case.

Vicarious Disqualification of Other Lawyers in the Legislator's Firm

7. The third question is whether the lawyer/legislator may take a position as associate, partner or "of counsel" lawyer in a criminal defense firm in a nearby county, without affecting the ability of other lawyers in that firm to represent criminal-defense clients in the county court of the county where the lawyer/legislator is a legislator. In particular, the inquirer asks whether any vicarious disqualification of the other lawyers in the firm can be avoided by the creation of a screening mechanism within the firm.

8. Prior to 1990, our opinions applied vicarious disqualification to the partners or associates of a lawyer-legislator. See, e.g., N.Y. 415 (1975). At that time, DR 5-105(D) of the Code provided that, if one lawyer in a law firm was disqualified from representation, then all were disqualified. In 1990, however, the Code was amended so that such vicarious disqualification applies only when the primary lawyer was prohibited from undertaking the representation under DR 5-101(A), DR 5-105(A) or (B), DR 5-108(A) or (B) or DR 9-101.

9. In N.Y. State 692, the basis of the disqualification of the lawyer/legislator is stated to be DR 1-102(A)(5) (lawyer shall not "engage in conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice"), which is not one of the Code sections for which vicarious disqualification applies under the current text of DR 5-105(D). The ban on a lawyer-public officer appearing before or adverse to entities over which the public officer has some control might also be said to arise out of rules relating to the appearance of impropriety or improper influence. Canon 9, DR 8-101(A). None of these Code sections are sections to which automatic vicarious disqualification applies under DR 5-105(D).

10. In N.Y. State 773 (2004), we discussed whether a lawyer public official could be "of counsel" to a law firm without resulting in disqualification of the law firm from a private representation. We identified two different situations in which vicarious disqualification might apply: (1) Where the lawyer/public official was disqualified under one of the Code sections enumerated in DR 5-105(D), in which case the entire firm is disqualified. This includes a case where the bar against the lawyer/public official arises because the public official's duties might conflict with the lawyer's duties to a client, in which case the disqualification arises out of DR 5-101(A), and other lawyers in the firm are subject to automatic imputation under DR 5-101(D). (2) Where the lawyer/public official was disqualified under a Code section other than one of the enumerated ones, in which case there is no per se imputed disqualification of the other lawyers in the firm, although, depending upon the circumstances of the proposed representations, disqualification might be appropriate.

11. Where the lawyer/legislator is a partner or associate of a law firm (including being associated as an "of counsel" lawyer) but does not undertake representations involving questioning of police or taking positions adverse to district attorneys, and does not undertake representations that might conflict with his or her duties as a public official (e.g., lobbying for or against matters being considered by the legislature), we believe the other lawyers in the lawyer/legislator's firm should not be per se disqualified from undertaking representations that the lawyer/legislator cannot undertake. A representation by another lawyer in the firm may, however, involve facts and circumstances where the lawyer/legislator's disqualification should be imputed to everyone in the firm.

12. Because the purpose of disqualifying the lawyer/legislator is to avoid the public perception that the lawyer/legislator is misusing his or her influence over police and prosecutors, the circumstances in which others in the firm should be disqualified are those in which the public is likely to suspect that the lawyer/legislator's influence will still have an effect. This is most likely to occur where the lawyer/legislator is particularly prominent, e.g., a party leader, or where the case is particularly prominent, even if the lawyer/legislator is not personally working on the case.

Screening

13. Formal screening may be used as a mechanism to ensure that the lawyer/legislator does not participate in the representation where the lawyer/legislator is personally disqualified. But if the facts and circumstances were such that the disqualification of the lawyer/legislator were imputed to others in the firm, screening would not prevent the imputation. The Code in New York does not generally recognize the efficacy of screening. The only instance where the Code allows screening is in the case of a former government employee who was personally and substantially involved in a matter as a public employee and who later joins the private sector. DR 9-101(B)(1)(a). That is not the case here.

CONCLUSION:

14. A lawyer who is a member of a county legislature may not undertake criminal representation in cases involving members of a police department or district attorney's office over which the legislature has budget or appointment authority. The size of the county or budget is not relevant. The lawyer/legislator may not undertake such a criminal representation that involves only plea bargaining, since the plea bargaining would be with the members of the same prosecutor's office. If the lawyer/legislator is employed by a law firm, the lawyers in the firm are not automatically disqualified from undertaking cases that the lawyer/legislator could not accept, but imputed disqualification may be appropriate where members of the public are likely to suspect that the lawyer/legislator's influence will have an effect on the prosecution of the case.

OPINION 799 (09/29/2006)

EXPLAINS: N.Y. State 779 (2004)

TOPIC: Advertising and Solicitation; Internet Website Directory

DIGEST: Lawyer may not participate in website that charges lawyer a fee to provide information about potential clients whom lawyer will then contact, where the website purports to analyze the prospective client's problem and selects which of its subscribing lawyers should respond, nor may the lawyer contact the prospective client by telephone unless the prospective client has expressly requested a telephone contact.

CODE: DR 1 102(A), DR 2 101(A),(K), DR 2-103(A), (B), (D), DR 3 101 (A)

QUESTION:

1. May a lawyer use the services of a website that forwards inquiries from potential clients to subscribing lawyers, where the subscribing lawyers pay a fee to participate in the service and the service purports to analyze the prospective client's problem and select an appropriate lawyer for the matter?

OPINION:

2. An increasing number of websites and internet services offer to put lawyers in touch with persons seeking representation. In this opinion, we address some of the ways in which the New York Code of Professional Responsibility (the "Code") applies to the use of such services.

3. The websites typically ask potential clients to identify themselves and state the nature of their legal problem. Using such information, the website contacts those lawyers who have subscribed to their service and indicated an interest in undertaking matters of the kind described by the prospect. One or more of the lawyers notified by the website may then contact the prospective client directly by return e-mail and/or by telephone, to ask whether the prospective client wants to retain that lawyer.

4. The extent to which the websites review and evaluate the potential client's statement of the legal problem varies. Some of the websites represent that a staff attorney will screen the requests submitted by the prospective client and screen the prospective attorneys. Others represent that they are not a referral service and do not review the prospective client's submission. Rather they forward the submission automatically to the law firms selected by the client. These sites may provide prospective clients with various tools to limit the attorneys listed, including filters for geographical area or practice area of the subscribing lawyers.

5. The services generally charge the lawyer a fee that is either refunded or discounted if the service does not provide an economic benefit to the subscribing lawyer. The websites the Committee has reviewed are run from locations outside New York.

6. Because of the wide variation in the structure and function of the many web-based services operating in this area, this opinion does not attempt to address every factual permutation. It is only a general guide to the ethical obligations of New York lawyers who make use of web-based matching services.

7. We discuss first two questions raised by the operation of these websites: (a) whether a lawyer who participates in the service is paying for a recommendation in violation of DR 2-103(B); and (b) whether a lawyer who contacts a client referred by the website is soliciting employment from a prospective client in violation of DR 2-103(A). We also provide guidelines regarding such services that arise out of other provisions of the Code.

Paying for a recommendation in violation of DR 2-103(B)

8. DR 2-103(B) provides, with exceptions not applicable here, "A lawyer shall not compensate or give anything of value to a person or organization to recommend or obtain employment by a client, or as a reward for having made a recommendation resulting in employment by a client . . . ." The question is whether the services "recommend or obtain employment."

9. We begin with the observation that a traditional advertising directory in paper form, such as the "yellow pages," is not recommending or obtaining employment within the meaning of DR 2-103(B). The question is at what point an online "directory" website becomes a referral service for purposes of DR 2-103(B). For example, an online yellow pages that provides tools by which a potential client can filter a list of attorneys by geography and/or practice area (e.g., to create a list of attorneys in "Albany" who do "personal injury" work) does not violate the rule.

10. We find that the line is crossed, however, when a website purports to recommend a particular lawyer or lawyers for the prospective client's problem, based on an analysis of that problem. For example, if a potential client describes a slip-and-fall incident on an intake form and the website determines that the problem calls for a personal injury lawyer and then recommends one or more attorneys in that area, the website is "recommending" those lawyers.[32] This conclusion applies whether the website's selection of counsel is the result of human intelligence or a computer program designed to respond to certain key words (e.g., if the potential client uses the words "injury", "doctor" or "fell" on an intake form, the program would characterize the problem as one of "personal injury" in order to recommend lawyers). Such activity is prohibited by other than a qualified lawyer referral service. DR 2-103(D).[33]

32 We express no opinion as to whether the website may be operating in violation of Section 495(1)(d) of the Judiciary Law ("No corporation . . . shall . . . furnish attorneys or counsel"). If the website were to be operating in violation of the Judiciary Law or found to be otherwise engaged in the unauthorized practice of law, it would be unethical for a lawyer to participate in its operations. DR 3-101(A).

Improper solicitation in violation of DR 2-103(A)

11. We turn next to whether a lawyer using a website under the circumstances described above is engaged in improper solicitation if the lawyer contacts the prospective client by telephone. DR 2-103(A) provides:

> A lawyer shall not solicit professional employment from a prospective client:
> > 1. By in-person or telephone contact, except that a lawyer may solicit professional employment from a close friend, relative, former client or current client.

12. While the Code clearly prohibits solicitation of clients by telephone contact, the question here is whether a lawyer responding to a prospective client's posting inviting such contact is engaged in "solicitation." We agree with the New York City Bar[34] that in such situations the client has invited the contact, and that an invited contact is not a "solicitation" within the meaning of the Code (the term is not currently defined). In view of the Code's express prohibition on telephone solicitation, however, we believe that follow-up contacts by phone must be preceded by a clear and unambiguous request from the potential client for telephone contact. For example, it generally would not be sufficient that the website contains a statement that by using the website the prospective client thereby consents to having one or more lawyers telephone the client. It generally would be sufficient if the potential client is specifically asked to check a box in order to authorize telephone contact.

33 In N.Y. State 779 (2004), we found a violation of DR 2-103(B) where a lawyer pays a marketing organization to furnish the lawyer with "leads" to potential clients. We there explained:

> The payment by an attorney . . . for a bundle of "leads" to prospective clients would violate DR 2-103(B) because neither of the exceptions in sub-paragraphs (1) or (2) applies. The payments would be compensation paid to Marketer "to recommend or obtain employment by a client," so it would be improper for an attorney to participate in the proposed transaction with Marketer.

This language is susceptible to an interpretation that any payment made to a third party for information which enables a lawyer to "obtain" a client is prohibited by DR 2-103(B) unless the circumstances of the payment fall within one of the stated exceptions to the rule. Such an interpretation, which might be deemed to bar participation even in an "electronic yellow pages" service, overstates our conclusion in N.Y. State 779. That opinion should be understood to apply only to those situations in which the organization is effectively making referrals or where it may be deemed to have actively solicited and obtained potential clients for its participating lawyers. In N.Y. State 779, the marketing organization caused its customers to sign a power of attorney form, as well as a retainer agreement, and actually collected a fee for the lawyer to whom the matter would eventually be forwarded. The prospective client was thus effectively committed before the lawyer had agreed to undertake the representation. In every meaningful sense, like the classic "runner," the marketing organization had "obtained" a client and, for a fee, had agreed to forward the client to the lawyer. To the same effect is a recent opinion of the Committee on Professional Ethics of the State Bar of Texas, wherein that body prohibited lawyers from participating in an internet matching service on the grounds that the service was effectively "soliciting or referring prospective clients." Texas Op. 561 (2005). Texas Op. 573 (2006) clarified that Texas Op. 561 was not prohibiting all internet matching services, but rather only those services that exercise "discretion" in selecting lawyers.

34 In N.Y. City 2000-1, the Committee on Professional and Judicial Ethics of the Association of the Bar of the City of New York considered whether a lawyer's response to a website posting by a person seeking legal counsel should be deemed solicitation. The City Bar committee concluded that a lawyer's response did not constitute "advertising" or "solicitation" as those terms are used in the Code. Rather, the City Bar committee reasoned that it was the prospective clients who "in effect, have 'solicited' [the responding] attorneys." Because the method of communication there employed was electronic posting, however, the City Bar did not have to address the issue of whether a participating lawyer could contact the prospect by telephone.

Guidelines for permissible website matching services

13. In addition to the prohibitions contained in DR 2-103, the Code contains other relevant restrictions and rules, which we do not attempt to completely address here. A lawyer's public communications – including directory listings – may not be "false, deceptive or misleading," for example, and must include the name, office address and telephone number of the attorney or law firm whose services are being offered. DR 2-101(A); DR 2-101(K); N.Y. State 756 (2002) ("we believe the use of a web site or e-mail address as the sole identifier of a firm's office address does not satisfy the requirement of DR 2-101[K]").

14. Based on these rules and the foregoing discussion of DR 2-103, we suggest the following guidelines with respect to a website service in which a New York lawyer may pay to participate:

- refrains from recommending its subscribing lawyers or otherwise making claims about the competence or character of its subscribing lawyers;
- refrains from claims that it will analyze the prospect's legal problem in order to find a suitable lawyer;
- explains that its subscribing lawyers have paid to be listed with the service;
- states the office address and telephone number of each lawyer participating in the service;
- specifies the means of communication that its subscribing lawyers may employ when responding to the prospective client's posting and provides for telephone contact only if the prospective client clearly and unambiguously authorizes the service to forward the request and telephone number to the selected attorneys; and
- advises users that the services of the website do not constitute legal representation or the practice of law.

15. In addition, lawyers using such a website should take reasonable measures to prevent the inadvertent disclosure by the prospective client of privileged information.[35] Depending on circumstances, such measures may include some or all of the following:

- the website service should afford the prospective client an opportunity to screen the list of lawyers who will be shown the prospective client's posting and remove lawyers from the list;
- the service should only reveal the prospective client's identity to those subscribing lawyers that the prospect requested;
- the service and the lawyer should minimize the communication of confidential information between the subscribing lawyer and the prospective client until the lawyer has been retained and has completed an appropriate conflicts check;

35 EC 4-1 ("Both the fiduciary relationship existing between lawyer and client and the proper function of the legal system require the preservation by the lawyer of confidences and secrets of one who has employed or sought to employ the lawyer.").

- the service should caution the prospective client that the information provided to the service may not be protected by the attorney-client privilege, where that statement is applicable.

16. As in any other contact with a current or potential client, when following up the prospective client's posting, the subscribing lawyer should avoid any statements that are "false, deceptive or misleading" under DR 2-101(A); should not engage in any form of "coercion, duress or harassment" under DR 2-103(A)(2)(c); and should otherwise treat the prospective client with the courtesy and integrity expected of all lawyers. See DR 1-102(A)(7). Generally, where the prospect indicates an unwillingness to engage the lawyer, the lawyer should refrain from further retention discussions with such party. Cf. N.Y. State 481 (1978) (if client indicates hesitancy about designating the client's lawyer as executor, lawyer should "immediately desist and expressly withdraw his suggestion.").

CONCLUSION:

17. For the reasons stated, the question posed is answered in the negative. While websites may be used for advertising purposes, they can not, in exchange for a fee, carry out activities that in a non-web setting would constitute prohibited solicitation or referral.

OPINION 800 (11/03/2006)

TOPIC: Conflicts of interest, appearance of impropriety; part-time prosecutor serving as appointed counsel for indigent respondents in Family Court proceedings.

DIGEST: A part-time prosecutor is not precluded from accepting all assignments as court-appointed counsel in Family Court. In specific types of cases and specific situations, including cases in which law enforcement personnel with whom the prosecutor works as a prosecutor are involved, and cases that are quasi-criminal in nature, the prosecutor is barred from accepting assignments. In other cases, the part-time prosecutor must carefully consider whether conflicts or the appearance of impropriety would preclude the assignment. Any doubt must be resolved against accepting an assignment.

CODE: DR 2-110, DR 5-101, DR 5-105, DR 9-101 EC 5-15, EC 9-1

QUESTION:

1. May a part-time prosecutor accept assignment to represent indigent persons in Family Court proceedings of a neighboring county?

OPINION:

2. A part-time prosecutor seeks appointment to a panel authorized to accept assignment of cases on behalf of indigent respondents in the Family Court in a neighboring county. Attorneys appointed to serve on the assigned counsel program in the Family Court can be assigned to represent either petitioners or respondents (except in child protective proceedings, proceedings involving allegations of willful failure to pay court-ordered support, and paternity proceedings, in which program attorneys are only assigned to represent respondents).

3. The Family Court hears matters involving children and families, including child protective proceedings, adoption, custody and visitation, support, family offense, guardianship, delinquency, paternity, persons in need of supervision (PINS), and foster care approval and review. While certain Family Court matters are more likely to involve related criminal matters, virtually all types of proceedings heard by the Family Court are likely to have some involvement of law enforcement agencies or similar governmental entities. In neglect and abuse cases, for example, multiple government entities are often involved. The local child protective service[36] investigates allegations and the county attorneys present ("prosecute") the case in the Family Court. Family offense cases by their nature pose a great risk of criminal charges being brought. In custody and visitation cases, the practices may vary by county, but many Family Courts request reports from probation departments, in addition to (or instead of) reports from local child welfare officials. Child support cases, too, could involve law enforcement and/or prosecution. In these and other cases, the Family Court may also request reports from other governmental agencies, including the probation department.

4. Whether a part-time prosecutor from a neighboring county can accept assignments to represent indigent people in a Family Court depends on all the relevant facts and circumstances. No per se rule prohibits all such assignments. Nonetheless, the attorney seeking appointment must carefully consider a number of factors in each type of proceeding and in each individual matter. The attorney must avoid all conflicts of interest, ensuring that neither the attorney's own interests[37] nor the attorney's simultaneous work as a prosecutor[38] preclude the attorney from exercising independent judgment on behalf of his or her clients. In many cases, a conflict might not be apparent at the outset of the case. For this reason, the attorney must be careful to avoid those cases where a conflict is likely to occur. Cf. EC 5-15 ("the lawyer should resolve all doubts against the propriety of representation").

5. In at least three situations, the attorney, in our view, would be barred from accepting any assigned cases: matters in which officers or other law enforcement personnel with whom the prosecutor works (or has worked) as a prosecutor are involved; juvenile delinquency proceedings; and Persons in Need of Supervision (PINS) proceedings.

6. As we have previously noted, a part-time prosecutor should not accept defense work in any proceeding in which "investigating officers and law enforcement personnel are those with whom the attorney associates as prosecutor." NY State 544 (1982). We perceive no difference in the Family Court setting.

7. We have previously held that a part-time prosecutor is barred from representing defendants in juvenile delinquency proceedings. N.Y. State 171 (1970). The defense function in juvenile delinquency proceedings, although not categorized as "criminal," is indistinguishable from defense in an adult criminal proceeding. See N.Y. State 544 (1982) ("an attorney who has prosecutorial responsibilities as an incident of part-time employment by a local governmental unit is disqualified from the private practice of criminal law in all courts of the state");[39] N.Y. State 427 (1976) (private criminal defense work by a part-time prosecutor is improper).

37 DR 5-101 of the New York Lawyer's Code of Professional Responsibility (the "Code") provides:

> A. A lawyer shall not accept or continue employment if the exercise of professional judgment on behalf of the client will be or reasonably may be affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property, or personal interests, unless a disinterested lawyer would believe that the representation of the client will not be adversely affected thereby and the client consents to the representation after full disclosure of the implications of the lawyer's interest.

38 DR 5-105 of the Code provides, in relevant part:

> A. A lawyer shall decline proffered employment if the exercise of independent professional judgment in behalf of a client will be or is likely to be adversely affected by the acceptance of the proffered employment, or if it would be likely to involve the lawyer in representing differing interests, except to the extent permitted under DR 5-105(C) [regarding consent].
> B. A lawyer shall not continue multiple employment if the exercise of independent professional judgment in behalf of a client will be or is likely to be adversely affected by the lawyer's representation of another client, or if it would be likely to involve the lawyer in representing differing interests, except to the extent permitted under DR 5-105 (C).

39 N.Y. State 544 rests on DR 5-105 and DR 9-101:

> The theory is that "since a prosecutor represents the people of the state, it is improper for him [or her] to represent individual clients charged with criminal violations." And "[a]cting as a prosecutor on one case one day, and appearing the next day even in a different court representing a private citizen who had been charged with a criminal act or violation or law would give rise to an appearance of improper conflict of interest."
> Quoting N.Y. State 184 (1971).

8. We believe PINS proceedings are functionally indistinguishable from juvenile delinquency proceedings and the same rule should apply. PINS proceedings bear most, if not all, of the hallmarks of defense work. The child is being "charged" with specific conduct, law enforcement personnel are inextricably involved in the proceeding, and the child has a liberty interest in the outcome of the proceeding. Also, the charges must be sustained by proof beyond a reasonable doubt. Although locked detention is no longer a permissible disposition in a PINS proceeding, children adjudicated to be PINS can be removed from their home and placed in facilities where their liberty is severely constricted.

9. Representation of respondent parents in child protective proceedings (Family Court Article X, neglect and abuse) bears special mention. In child protective proceedings, respondent parents are answering to charges from the government regarding their parenting. Ultimately, the parent could temporarily or permanently lose custody of the child as a result of this proceeding. Here, too, even if the government personnel charging the parents are not those with which the part-time prosecutor would be involved, a part-time prosecutor must be particularly sensitive to the appearance of impropriety that may arise from his or her attempting to appear adverse to authorities conducting proceedings very similar to those of a prosecutor.

10. In all cases, the attorney must carefully evaluate the individual facts and circumstances prior to accepting appointment and, consistent with DR 2-110, will often need to withdraw if a conflict arises during the course of the representation.[40] Assigned clients ordinarily have no choice in the assignment. Moreover, clients are likely to be prejudiced if counsel must be substituted during the course of a proceeding. Therefore, the attorney must resolve any doubt against accepting an assignment.[41]

11. The attorney must also strive to ensure that dual roles – part-time prosecutor and part-time advocate for poor people in Family Court – do not give rise to an appearance of impropriety. DR 9-101; EC 9-1. In addition to issues relating to conflicts, the part-time prosecutor would need to ensure that the assigned counsel plan's clients and the public at large do not perceive the attorney's dual roles to be improper.[42]

CONCLUSION:

12. While a part-time prosecutor from a neighboring county may accept assignment to represent indigent people in certain Family Court proceedings, careful analysis must be undertaken in each case. No appointment can be accepted where the appointment would lead to a conflict of interest or create the appearance of impropriety. (8-06)

40 Client consent, in a case where a conflict is consentable, is often not possible. Consent can only be sought where the prospective client would be empowered to withhold consent freely. Assuming arguendo that the prosecutor's office would consent, it would be difficult to obtain voluntary consent from an assigned client. See, e.g., N.Y. State 490 (1978) (When seeking consent, the attorney "should be particularly sensitive to any element of submissiveness on the part of their indigent clients; and, such requests should be made only under circumstances where the [attorney] is satisfied that [his or her] clients could refuse to consent without any sense of guilt or embarrassment.").

41 Because of the high likelihood that conflicts will arise even in cases in which a part-time prosecutor may take on the representation, it may be administratively impractical for the part-time prosecutor to serve on the assigned counsel panel. The administrative burden that would be entailed might lead the panel administrator to establish a policy to exclude part-time prosecutors from the assigned counsel panel.

42 Of course, the attorney cannot suggest that his or her status as a part-time prosecutor would enable the attorney to influence the court or obtain better results for an assigned client. See DR 9-101(C).

OPINION 801 (11/17/2006)

TOPIC: Partnership with out-of-state attorney

DIGEST: Not proper for New York attorney to partner with out-of-state attorney if services performed by such attorney are the unauthorized practice of law

CODE: DR 3-101(A), DR 3-102(A)

QUESTION:

1. May a lawyer form a professional partnership with an attorney who is admitted in another state, but not in New York, where the out-of-state attorney would work exclusively from a New York office on matters arising in New York?

OPINION:

2. A New York lawyer is contemplating forming a professional partnership with an attorney who is admitted in another state, but not in New York. The prospective partnership would maintain offices only in New York, and would work exclusively on matters arising in New York. The firm's letterhead and business cards would indicate that the out-of-state attorney is admitted solely in that other state. While the New York attorney and the out-of-state attorney would divide overall case-handling responsibilities equally, the New York attorney would handle all court appearances and retain ultimate responsibility for all legal work performed in the office. The out-of-state attorney would handle office work, including "paperwork" and meeting with clients, but only under the supervision of the New York attorney. The New York attorney would split fees with the out-of-state attorney.

3. As a threshold matter, it is clearly permissible for a New York attorney to form a partnership with a lawyer who is admitted only in another jurisdiction. N.Y. State 175 (1971). A New York lawyer may not, however, form a partnership with an out-of-state attorney if the out-of-state attorney would be engaged in the unauthorized practice of law in New York state. DR 3-101(A) ("A lawyer shall not aid a non-lawyer in the unauthorized practice of law.").

4. The rules on unauthorized practice of law are creatures of statute (Judiciary Law §478), not the ethics code. As a consequence, this Committee does not opine on what specific acts by an out-of-state attorney constitute the unauthorized practice of law. We note, however, that a New York court has held that "when legal documents are prepared for a layman by a person in the business of preparing such documents, that person is practicing law." Servidone Construction Corp. v. St. Paul Fire & Marine, 911 F. Supp. 560, 568 (N.D.N.Y. 1995) (finding retainer agreement unenforceable because legal services provided in New York by out-of-state attorney constituted unauthorized practice of law, notwithstanding his partnership with an attorney admitted in New York).

5. If the out-of-state lawyer is engaged in the unauthorized practice of law, then the New York lawyer would violate DR 3-101(A) by partnering with the lawyer. If the out-of-state lawyer were to limit activities to those permitted of a non-lawyer, such as a paralegal, then the New York lawyer would violate DR 3-102(A) by partnering with the lawyer, as it is impermissible for a New York lawyer to share fees with a non-lawyer. The Committee expresses no opinion on whether these conclusions would apply to partnerships involving an out-of-state lawyer—such as a retired lawyer—admitted in a state other than New York but not working in New York.

CONCLUSION:

6. Where the legal services performed in New York by an out-of-state attorney would constitute the unauthorized practice of law in New York under DR 3-101(A), it is unethical for a New York attorney to form a partnership with the out-of-state attorney.

OPINION 802 (11/28/2006)

TOPIC: Municipal bond counsel; multiple representation.

DIGEST: A lawyer may serve as both "bond counsel" and counsel to the borrower in an issuance of tax-exempt bonds as long as (1) bond counsel's role is limited to opining on the transaction and not negotiating the terms of the bond and (2) borrower consents to the limitation of the lawyer's role or, if there are multiple clients involved, they all consent to the multiple representation.

CODE: DR 5-105(A); DR 5-105(C)

QUESTION:

l. May a law firm serve as both bond counsel and borrower's counsel in connection with the issuance of tax-exempt bonds by a conduit bond issuer such as an industrial development agency or municipal housing authority?

OPINION:

2. A tax-exempt organization described in Section 501(c) of the Internal Revenue Code (the "borrower") intends to submit an application to a local industrial development agency (the "IDA") requesting assistance in connection with a proposed tax-exempt improvement project whereby the IDA will issue tax-exempt bonds for the benefit of the borrower.[43] Prospective underwriters of the bond issue will require the written opinion of "bond counsel" relating to the tax- exempt status of the bonds and their exemption from registration under federal securities laws. The borrower has been a client of the inquiring law firm for a period of time and has asked the law firm to act both as borrower's counsel and as bond counsel in connection with the proposed bond issue.

3. At the outset, we recognize that there is a tension between the roles of bond counsel and borrower's counsel. Bond counsel is expected to provide, for the benefit of prospective bond purchasers, an objective judgment on questions such as the tax-exempt status of the bonds, while borrower's counsel may be expected by some clients to act as a partisan advocate, by, for example, seeking aggressive tax positions.

4. Canon 5 of the New York Code of Professional Responsibility (the "Code") governs a lawyer's duty of loyalty to a client. DR 5-105(A) of the Code provides that a lawyer has a conflict of interest if (i) the lawyer's judgment on behalf of a client is likely to be adversely affected thereby or (ii) the employment would involve the lawyer in representing "differing interests." DR 5-105(C) of the Code provides, however, that a lawyer may represent multiple clients in the face of such a conflict if (i) "a disinterested lawyer would believe that the lawyer can competently represent the interest of each" and (ii) each client consents to the representation after full disclosure of the implications, advantages and risks of so doing.

43 In a typical IDA bond financing the borrower will enter into an installment sales agreement with the IDA pursuant to which the borrower is required to make installment payments sufficient to provide payment of the principal of, and interest on, the bonds issued by the IDA.

5. To analyze this inquiry under DR 5-105, we begin with the question of who the client is when a lawyer is retained as "bond counsel." We see two possibilities. First, the client could be the borrower, who is retaining bond counsel to deliver an opinion on which ultimate investors might rely. In that case, there would be one client in both engagements and no conflict under DR 5-105. The client would need to understand, however, that the duty of the law firm as concurrent bond counsel is solely to opine on the bonds from a neutral perspective[44] and this would limit the lawyer's ability to act as an "advocate." In addition, the law firm may have a duty to disclose that the firm represents the borrower in any opinion it may render, although such a duty stems primarily from contract or tort law rather than from an attorney-client relationship.

6. Alternatively, the borrower could be hiring the law firm to represent another entity, such as the IDA.[45] We understand that such multiple representation is not unusual in this area. A publication of the National Association of Bond Lawyers notes, "In various circumstances and in various jurisdictions, it may not be unusual for a lawyer who serves as bond counsel to serve as issuer's counsel, conduit borrower's counsel, underwriter's counsel, or trustee's counsel in the same or other transaction involving some or all of the same parties."[46]

7. In this case, there are two clients with differing interests. The potential interest of the borrower in aggressive tax approaches is a differing interest from the IDA's presumed interest in conservative tax approaches. The question remains whether such a conflict is waivable under DR 5-105(C). As noted above, DR 5-105(C) requires that the proffered engagement pass a "disinterested lawyer" test and that consent be obtained from the affected clients.

8. We conclude that in most circumstances the conflict is consentable, provided that bond counsel's role is limited to opining on the transaction and not negotiating the terms of the bond. As we noted in N.Y. State 753 (2002), a lawyer may not be put in the position "of negotiating with him or herself." Particularly because of the apparent widespread acceptance of multiple representation in the relevant practice area, however, we conclude that bond counsel's professional judgment in delivering an opinion on the tax-exempt status and validity of the bonds will not necessarily be affected by the fact that he or she is also representing the borrower. Indeed, the borrower will be looking to counsel for counsel's view of the status of the bonds, and there is no reason to believe counsel would render a different opinion to the borrower if counsel were not engaged as bond counsel. Of course, consent of both clients must also be obtained after providing the disclosure required by DR 5-105(C).

9. In addition to the duties arising from the attorney-client relationship, bond counsel may also have obligations to the ultimate purchasers of the bonds who rely on the opinion that bond counsel renders. But those duties primarily derive not from the Code but from contract, tort or other law. We agree with the conclusion of a New Jersey ethics opinion that "[b]ond counsel has a duty to those who

In accordance with the limitations cited herein, the question is answered in the affirmative.

TOPIC: Provision of out-of-state non-legal services.

DIGEST: If permitted by other jurisdictions' regulation, including their regulation of the unauthorized practice of law, a law firm may engage in debt collection activities outside the state that do not constitute the practice of law, provided the firm makes appropriate disclosures to the client and avoids misleading debtors.

CODE: DR 1-102(A)(4); DR 1-104(A); DR 1-106; DR 3-101(B).

QUESTION:

1. A law firm whose lawyers are admitted to practice in New York represents creditors in New York. It seeks to engage in debt collection activities outside New York without engaging in the practice of law. Under what circumstances may it assist its clients in debt collection activities as a non-legal service in jurisdictions where its lawyers are not licensed to practice?

OPINION:

2. The threshold question is whether the collection activities will violate the regulatory provisions of the jurisdictions in which the activities take place. If so, the law firm may not undertake these activities. For example, the collection activities may constitute the practice of law by the firm's lawyers in the states in which they are not licensed to practice and may therefore constitute the unauthorized practice of law in violation of laws or rules of those other states. If the proposed activities would violate another state's regulation of the unauthorized practice of law, the activities would subject the firm to discipline in New York as a result.[47]

3. Assuming that a firm may engage in collection activities outside New York consistently with other states' regulations, it is not per se impermissible for a firm to do so under the New York Code. Assuming that collection services comprise non-legal services that are not prohibited as the unauthorized practice of law, DR 1-106 makes clear that a law firm may provide such services independently of the legal services it provides to its clients. DR 1-106(C) defines "non-legal services" to "mean those services that lawyers may lawfully provide and that are not prohibited as an unauthorized practice of law when provided by a non-lawyer." With respect to lawyers or law firms providing "non-legal services" to clients, DR 1-106(A) provides in pertinent part that:

> 1. A lawyer or law firm that provides non-legal services to a person that are not distinct from legal services being provided to that person by the lawyer or law firm is subject to these Disciplinary Rules with respect to the provision of both legal and non-legal services.

47 See New York Lawyer's Code of Professional Responsibility, Disciplinary Rule ("DR") 3-101(B) ("A lawyer shall not practice law in a jurisdiction where to do so would be a violation of regulations of the profession in that jurisdiction."); DR 1-104(A) ("A law firm shall make reasonable efforts to ensure that all lawyers in the firm conform to the disciplinary rules.").

> 2. A lawyer or law firm that provides non-legal services to a person that are distinct from legal services being provided to that person by the lawyer or law firm is subject to these Disciplinary Rules with respect to the non-legal services if the person receiving the services could reasonably believe that the non-legal services are the subject of an attorney-client relationship.
> 4. For purposes of DR 1-106(A)(2) . . ., it will be presumed that the person receiving non-legal services believes the services to be the subject of an attorney-client relationship unless the lawyer or law firm has advised the person receiving the services in writing that the services are not legal services and that the protection of an attorney-client relationship does not exist with respect to the non-legal services . . . .

Because collection activities outside New York will presumptively be subject to the disciplinary rules governing an attorney-client relationship, a law firm seeking to avoid the obligations of an attorney-client relationship must advise the client in writing that the services are not legal services and that the protection of an attorney-client relationship does not exist with respect to the non-legal services. Further, the law firm must otherwise avoid misleading the client to believe that it is rendering legal services subject to the protection of an attorney-client relationship.

4. Similarly, the firm must avoid misleading debtors with whom it communicates pursuant to the collection activities.[48] For example, it may not use its law firm letterhead in communicating with debtors and must otherwise avoid suggesting to debtors in such communications that the firm or its representatives are functioning as lawyers engaged in the representation of the creditor-client or that the firm or its representatives might undertake legal action on the creditor-client's behalf.

5. This Committee has recognized that, notwithstanding the adoption of DR 1-106, there will be situations in which concurrently providing legal and non-legal services to a client is impermissible under the conflict-of-interest rules.[49] While a conflict may arise in particular situations, a law firm's collection activities for a creditor-client outside New York ordinarily would not be reasonably likely to impair the firm's exercise of professional judgment in legal matters in New York relating to other collections on behalf of the same or other clients.

CONCLUSION:

6. A New York law firm may assist its clients in debt collection activities as a non-legal service in jurisdictions where its lawyers are not licensed to practice if (1) permitted by the applicable rules of the other jurisdictions, including their regulation of the unauthorized practice of law, (2) the firm advises clients in writing that the services are not legal services and that the protection of an attorney-client relationship does not exist with respect to the non-legal services, and (3) the law firm does not use its law firm letterhead in communicating with debtors and otherwise avoids misleading debtors. OPINION 804 (11/29/2006)

TOPIC: Conflict of interest; attorneys for legal services corporation with separate private practices.

DIGEST: Attorney for small legal services corporation may not represent a private client as respondent in a legal proceeding in which petitioner is represented by legal services corporation.

CODE: Definition 2; DR 1-104(A); DR 5-105(D)

QUESTION:

1. May an attorney for a small legal services corporation represent in a private practice a respondent in a Family Court proceeding in which the petitioner is represented by the legal services corporation?

OPINION:

2. The inquirer, a private practitioner, joined with a small group of lawyers to form a qualified legal services corporation. The corporation provides legal assistance and representation to persons charged with a crime or who are entitled to counsel pursuant to certain provisions of the Family Court Act, the Correction Law or the Surrogate's Court Procedure Act and who are financially unable to obtain counsel. The legal services corporation provides such services under a county plan for representation adopted in accordance with Article 18-B of the County Law. The lawyers who formed the corporation all provide indigent legal services on behalf of the corporation. The inquirer states that in providing such services the lawyers do not consult with each other or otherwise discuss cases handled by them on behalf of the corporation. At the same time, each of them receives a pro rata share of the fees paid by the county to the corporation, and each of these same lawyers maintains a separate private practice of law.

3. This Committee has long held that the legal staff of a small legal services corporation is like a law firm and that the possibility of disqualifying conflicts must be evaluated on that basis.[50] These holdings are consistent with the definition of a law firm found in the Code: "'Law firm' includes, but is not limited to . . . a qualified legal assistance organization."[51]

4. In this case, the lawyers involved are the legal staff of the legal services corporation, and are thus like a law firm. As such, where, as in this case, one of them would be disqualified from repre-

51 Code, Definitions 2. In People v. Wilkins, 28 N.Y.2d 53, 56, 268 N.E.2d 756, 757, 320 N.Y.S.2d 8, 10 (1971), the Court of Appeals stated that the inference that information flows freely among members of a law partnership did not apply to "a large public-defense organization such as the Legal Aid Society." Wilkins involved a petition to vacate a conviction based on claimed ineffective assistance of counsel arising out of an asserted conflict. The Court relied heavily on the absence of trial taint or any evidence of prejudice to the convicted defendant. Our holdings, on the other hand, address prospective disqualification under applicable ethical standards. We note as well that Wilkins was decided well before the 1999 amendments to the definition of "law firm" in the Code, which added the reference to "a qualified legal assistance organization."

senting a party in a matter because of the concurrent representation of another party in the same matter with a differing interest, all of them would be vicariously disqualified, absent informed consent.[52] Thus, no one of them could in his or her private practice represent the respondent in a family court proceeding in which the petitioner is represented by the legal services corporation or vice versa. The rule exists not only to protect the confidences and secrets of clients but also to recognize the fact, and the expectation of the public, that lawyers in a law firm – including lawyers in a legal services office – have a real and substantial connection, including a financial interest, that aligns their interests.[53]

5. In this case, moreover, consent of the parties would not cure the conflict, because two lawyers from the same "law firm" would be representing opposing parties in a single litigation.[54]

CONCLUSION:

6. An attorney for a legal services corporation may not, in his or her private practice, represent the respondent in a Family Court proceeding in which the petitioner is represented by another of the corporation's attorneys acting in the name of the legal services corporation.

OPINION 805 (01/10/2007)

TOPIC: Withdrawal From Employment For Non-payment Of Fees And Expenses

DIGEST: A retainer agreement may not ethically provide for a client's advance assent to a lawyer's withdrawal from employment based on the client's failure to pay agreed legal fees and expenses, but the agreement may advise the client of the lawyer's right to withdraw, subject to court approval where applicable, if the client "deliberately disregards" a payment obligation.

CODE: DR 1 102(A)(1); DR 2 110(C)(1)(f); DR 2 110(C)(5)

QUESTION:

1. May a lawyer include a provision in a retainer agreement that would secure a client's advance assent to a lawyer's withdrawal from employment if the client fails to pay agreed legal fees and expenses in a timely manner?

OPINION:

2. A retainer agreement must not mislead the client with regard to the attorney's obligations, "including the obligation to continue as counsel in the absence of a permissible ground for withdrawing from the representation."[1] It would, therefore, be unethical to include a provision that did not accurately set forth the circumstances under which a lawyer may withdraw from representation where the plaintiff fails to pay legal fees and expenses.[2] A retainer agreement that purported to permit a lawyer to withdraw upon a failure to pay agreed legal fees or expenses in a timely manner, without more, would not accurately state the applicable rules, and therefore would be impermissible.

3. Permissive withdrawal from employment is governed by Disciplinary Rule 2-110(C). That rule provides for withdrawal from employment "if withdrawal can be accomplished without material adverse effect on the interests of the client. . . ." In addition, pursuant to subparagraphs (1) through (6) of that section, a lawyer may withdraw upon twelve specifically enumerated grounds. Those grounds include where the client "deliberately disregards an agreement or obligation to the lawyer as to expenses or fees"[3] and where the client "knowingly and freely assets to termination of the employment."[4]

4. In N.Y. State 719 (1999), we addressed the issue of advance assent to a lawyer's withdrawal from employment for nonpayment of fees in domestic relations matters. We stated:

1 N.Y. State 719 (1999).

2 Id. See also DR 1-102(A)(1) (lawyer shall not violate a Disciplinary Rule).

3 DR 2-110(C)(1)(f).

4 DR 2-110(C)(5).

> [A]lthough DR 2-110(C)(5) specifically permits withdrawal if the "client knowingly and freely assents to termination of the employment," it does not authorize an agreement in advance by which the client assents to termination upon some future occurrence that is unrelated to achieving the objectives of the representation. For assent to be made "knowingly," it must be made with knowledge and understanding of all the facts and circumstances at the time of the termination of the employment.[5]

The same is true outside the domestic relations context.

5. Although it is well established that more than mere failure to pay is required to satisfy the "deliberate disregard" standard, the ultimate determination of whether there has been "deliberate" disregard is highly fact sensitive. For example, an inadvertent failure to pay or a failure to pay a de minimus amount would not, by itself, be "deliberate."[6] Yet, under certain circumstances a client's non-payment of fees because of an inability to pay may be deemed "deliberate."[7] We noted some of the conflicting considerations pertinent to the issue in N.Y. State 598 (1989): potential prejudice to the client, the broad professional obligation to render services to the needy, an attorney's own financial interests, and the need of the tribunal for orderly proceedings. We stated:

> It is impossible to determine in the abstract the appropriate resolution of these competing factors; each case must be assessed to determine a result that will be fair to the client, the attorney and the court, taking the rights and interests of each into account. If the requirement of DR 2-110(C)(1)(f) that the client act "deliberately" in refusing to pay were construed to apply only to a purposeful and intentional choice on the client's part, the several competing factors implicated by a client's inability to pay would in effect be automatically resolved against withdrawal; in particular, the reasonableness of the attorney's expectation of and entitlement to payment for services would be eliminated as a consideration in determining the appropriateness of withdrawal. This interpretation would likely give rise to disputes concerning the extent to which the client is in fact unable to pay and the priorities by which the client manages the expenditure of limited resources. Accordingly, we reject this interpretation. We believe that a client "deliberately disregards and agreement or obligation" to pay legal fees whenever the failure is conscious rather than inadvertent, and is not de minimus in either amount or duration.[8]

6. We also emphasized the particular balancing test that must be employed by a tribunal in evaluating even a conscious failure to pay legal fees, stating:

> Although withdrawal is, therefore, permissible under DR 2-110(C)(1)(f) where a client has failed to pay counsel a known obligation, withdrawal will not necessarily be appropriate in all such circumstances where the client is financially unable to pay. The amount of work performed and paid for in comparison to the work remaining, the amount of the fees paid to date, and the likely effect on the client are some of the factors that need to be assessed in ascertaining whether withdrawal is appropriate in a particular case.[9]

7. None of these considerations is reflected in a clause by which a client purports to agree that a lawyer may withdraw if the client fails to pay legal fees and expenses in a timely manner. Accordingly, we conclude that a lawyer may not seek advance assent to the lawyer's withdrawal from employment based on a client's failure to pay legal fees and expenses, and a lawyer may not ethically include such a provision in a retainer agreement.

8. No rule of ethics, however, precludes a lawyer from advising a client in a retainer agreement of the lawyer's right to terminate the employment based on the "deliberate disregard" standard of DR 2-110(C)(1)(f), provided that the client is also advised that if the lawyer is engaged before a tribunal, the lawyer must obtain the tribunal's permission before withdrawing if the tribunal rules so require.[10] Although a lawyer cannot terminate the employment without also taking reasonably practicable steps to avoid foreseeable prejudice to the client, including notice to the client, allowing time for successor counsel to be obtained, and turning over client papers and property,[11] we do not believe that the client must be informed of all these points in the retainer agreement.

CONCLUSION:

9. The question is answered in the negative.

OPINION 806 (01/29/2007)

TOPIC: Referrals by foreign lawyers; permissibility of fee sharing.

DIGEST: A New York law firm may participate with a foreign law firm in handling legal matters in New York referred by the foreign firm, and in sharing of legal fees in such matters, where the foreign firm's lawyers have professional education, training and ethical standards comparable to those of American lawyers and the firm otherwise complies with DR 2 107(a).

CODE: DR 2 102(D), 2 107(A), 3 102(A), 3 103(A), EC 3 8.

QUESTION:

Where New York and Italian law firms, neither of whose attorneys reside in or are licensed to practice in the other's country, refer legal matters to each other, may the New York firm share a percentage of its fees with the Italian law firm for matters referred to the New York firm, and if so, under what condition and in what proportions?

OPINION:

A New York lawyer is the member of a New York law firm "affiliated" with an Italian law firm, none of whose attorneys resides in or is licensed to practice law anywhere in the United States. While at least some of the New York firm's attorneys are licensed to practice in other states, none resides in or is licensed to practice in Italy. The word "affiliated" is said to be limited in its meaning to the mutual referral of matters as between the two firms. Although the New York lawyer travels to Italy from time to time to assist the Italian firm there on cases referred by the lawyer's firm (presumably in conformity with Italian law), no attorney from the Italian firm comes to New York to assist the New York firm on cases the Italian firm refers to the New York firm. The Italian firm's participation in such matters involves consultation, advice and guidance, all rendered from Italy. The New York lawyer is satisfied that the Italian firm is in fact a firm of attorneys, all of whom are licensed and in good standing to practice law in Italy pursuant to the laws of that country and that they are bona fide members of the Italian bar.

Assuming that the Italian firm refers a matter to the New York firm that generates a fee to the New York firm and that the Italian firm does not record time on the matter but is available for consultation, advice and guidance and is therefore actively involved in and adding value to the matter, we consider whether the New York firm may share a percentage of its earned fees with the Italian firm, and, if so, in what proportion.

This Committee does not render opinions on issues of law, as opposed to ethics, nor on issues of ethical conduct regulated by the law or codes of professional conduct outside of the State of New York. Its responsibility is limited, rather, to the issuance of opinions based upon the application of the New York Code of Professional Responsibility.

DR 3-102(A) prohibits a lawyer from sharing fees with a "non-lawyer" (except in circumstances not relevant here). The ethical requirements governing the division of legal fees among lawyers not associated with the same firm are prescribed in DR 2-107(A). It reads as follows:

A. A lawyer shall not divide a fee for legal services with another lawyer who is not a partner in or associate of the lawyer's law firm, unless:

1. The client consents to employment of the other lawyer after a full disclosure that a division of fees will be made.

2. The division is in proportion to the services performed by each lawyer or, by a writing given the client, each lawyer assumes joint responsibility for the representation.

3. The total fee of the lawyers does not exceed reasonable compensation for all legal services they rendered the client.

The initial question to be determined is whether the lawyers of the Italian firm are "lawyers" within the meaning of DR 2-107(A) or "non-lawyers" within the meaning of DR 3-102(A).

DR 3-103(A) prohibits lawyers from entering into law partnerships with non-lawyers.[12] While on its face the rule might appear to prohibit affiliations with persons not licensed to practice law in New York, that interpretation is tempered by DR 2-102(D) which provides that if a partnership is formed between lawyers of different jurisdictions, the partnership's letterhead must clearly state the jurisdiction in which each lawyer is licensed to practice law. DR 2-102(D) thus contemplates the formation of partnerships between lawyers of different jurisdictions.[13] In N.Y. State 542 (1982) this committee applied that conclusion to lawyers in a jurisdiction outside the United States — there, Great Britain — and it has likewise applied the conclusion to lawyers in Japan[14] and Sweden.[15]

In N.Y. State 542, this committee observed that a lawyer admitted to practice law in any jurisdiction of the United States is not a "non-lawyer" for the purposes of DR 3-103(A) (citing N.Y. State 175 (1970) and N.Y. State 144 (1970)). With respect to persons recognized as lawyers in non-U.S. jurisdictions, our committee adopted an analysis that compares the educational requirements for admission to practice, and standards of professional conduct and discipline, of the non-U.S. jurisdiction with those of New York State in order to determine whether "to consider such persons beyond the traditional proscription against lay partnerships."[16]

Accordingly, if the Italian legal system is determined upon inquiry to provide persons admitted or licensed to practice law with education, training and ethical standards comparable to those of American lawyers, Italian lawyers may be considered "lawyers" within the meaning of DR 2-107(A). Although, as noted above, we have in the past made such a determination with respect to the legal systems of several other nations, we decline to do so here or in the future, as we believe it is not necessary or appropriate for this Committee to continue to do so.

Thus, if (1) lawyers admitted or licensed to practice law in Italy meet the standard set forth above, (2) the New York firm fully discloses to the client the firm's intent in a matter to share its fees with the Italian firm and has obtained the client's consent to such arrangement pursuant to DR 2-107(A)(1), (3) the total fee in the matter will not exceed reasonable compensation for all legal services rendered to the client (DR 2-107(A)(3)), (4) the Italian law firm takes joint responsibility for the matter or the portion of the fee it earns is in proportion to the services it performs, and (5) the Italian law firm's work on, or taking joint responsibility for, the matter is not otherwise barred,[17] we find no Code prohibition on the New York firm's sharing a percentage of its legal fees with the Italian firm. In particular, under DR 2-107(A)(2), which permits the sharing of fees where a firm takes joint responsibility for the matter, if the criteria set forth above are met, we find no impediment to a foreign lawyer or law firm assuming such joint responsibility.

CONCLUSION:

Based upon the information presented above, and upon the assumption that members of a foreign law firm are in fact "lawyers" and that both firms act in full compliance with the provisions of DR 2-107(A) and are not otherwise disqualified under the Code, nothing in the New York Code prohibits the New York firm from sharing a percentage of its reasonably stated fees with a foreign firm for legal services rendered to clients on matters referred to the New York firm by the foreign firm.

TOPIC: Imputation of conflicts of interest; dual representation of buyer and seller of real estate

DIGEST: A part-time associate of a law firm is "associated" with the law firm for the purpose of imputation of conflicts of interest. The buyer and seller of residential real estate may not engage separate attorneys in the same firm to advance each side's interests against the other, even if the clients give informed consent to the conflict of interest.

CODE: DR 5-105(C), (D)

QUESTION:

1. A law firm employs a part-time associate who works for the firm two days per week. When not working at this law firm, the part-time associate operates her own separate private practice of law, at a separate location, where she works as a sole practitioner and handles her own clients, maintains her own files and has her own trust account. A client approached the sole practitioner at her separate practice and asked her to represent the client in buying some residential real estate. The seller approached a partner in the law firm that employs the sole practitioner part-time and asked the partner to represent him as the seller in the same transaction. May the law firm, with full disclosure and consent, represent the seller in a residential real estate transaction while its part-time associate, operating out of her separate practice, represents the buyer in the same transaction?

OPINION:

Designation of part-time lawyer as an associate

2. A threshold question is whether it is proper to refer to the part-time lawyer as an "associate" of the law firm. The New York City Bar ethics committee has opined that a lawyer who works for a law firm on a continuing basis and spends 10-15 hours per week on firm matters, but does not work exclusively for that law firm, cannot be referred to by the law firm as an "associate." N.Y. City 1996-8. The New York City Bar opinion cites numerous authorities for the proposition that an "associate" means a "salaried lawyer-employee" and concludes that to call a per diem lawyer—who is paid to work only on specific matters and who does not work exclusively for the firm—an "associate" would be misleading. We agree that it would be misleading to clients and the public to call a lawyer an "associate" where that lawyer is called in from time to time to work only on specific matters and is paid on a per diem basis.[18]

3. We do not believe, however, that a part-time lawyer must work for only one firm in order to be properly called an "associate." Where the part-time lawyer is regularly available to consult with the firm and its clients on a variety of matters, albeit during limited hours, the term "associate" can be proper even though the lawyer does not work exclusively for that firm. In this connection we note that

18 Cf. N.Y. State 715 (1999) ("If the Contract Lawyer has general access to the files of all clients of the firm and regularly participates in discussions of their affairs, then he or she should be deemed 'associated' with the firm. However, if the firm has adopted procedures to ensure that the Contract Lawyer is privy only to information about clients he or she actually serves, then, in most cases, the Contract Lawyer should not be deemed to be 'associated' with the firm for purposes of vicarious disqualification.").

a single lawyer can be a partner in two different law firms. Cinema 5, Ltd. v. Cinerama, Inc., 528 F.2d 1384 (2d Cir. 1976). We see no reason that a lawyer cannot be an associate in two law firms where the lawyer has a part-time relationship with each firm, if the relationship with each otherwise bears the typical hallmarks of a firm-associate relationship as it is generally understood.

Imputation of conflicts to a part-time associate

4. Disciplinary Rule 5-105(D) provides that "[w]hile lawyers are associated in a law firm, none of them shall knowingly accept or continue employment when any one of them practicing alone would be prohibited from doing so under DR 5-101(A), DR 5-105(A) or (B), DR 5-108(A) or (B), or DR 9-101(B) except as otherwise provided therein."

5. A lawyer who is held out to the public as an associate is plainly "associated" with the firm for purposes of DR 5-105(D). The clear implication of calling a lawyer an "associate" of the law firm is that the lawyer is "available to the firm for consultation and advice on a regular and continuing basis." N.Y. State 262 (1972) (term 'of counsel' may only be used where there is a continuing relationship). See also N.Y. State 794 (2006); N.Y. State 793 (2006); N.Y. State 773 (2004); ABA 90-357 (1990). A law firm may not denominate a lawyer as an associate and then take the position that the lawyer is not an associate for the purpose of imputation of conflicts of interest.

6. While properly calling a lawyer an associate means that he or she is associated with the law firm for the purposes of imputation of conflicts of interest, calling the same lawyer something else does not by itself mean that conflicts are not imputed. The label is not dispositive. A lawyer who has another title, such as "contract lawyer," will be deemed to be "associated" with the law firm in the circumstances set forth in our opinion N.Y. State 715 (1999).

Associated lawyers representing buyer and seller in real estate transactions

7. The buyer and the seller of real estate will ordinarily have differing interests in the transaction. Such differences, which would require the exercise of independent legal judgment by the lawyers for each party, include such things as the nature of the deed to be given; customs to be followed in making adjustments; points in the title report which may or may not be disregarded; and what title company to use. N.Y. State 38 (1966).

8. We recognized in N.Y. State 38 (1966) and N.Y. State 611 (1990) that "in unusual and very limited circumstances" one lawyer might properly undertake dual representation of both parties to a real estate transaction. Our conclusion was based on former Canon 6 and later on Disciplinary Rule 5-105(C), which provides:

> In the situations covered by DR 5-105(A) and (B) a lawyer may represent multiple clients if a disinterested lawyer would believe that the lawyer can competently represent the interest of each and if each consents to the representation after full disclosure of the implications of the simultaneous representation and the advantages and risks involved.

9. We concluded in N.Y. State 162 (1970) that a single lawyer could represent both parties to a real estate transaction where the interests of buyer and seller are not actually or potentially differing or would vary only slightly. In N.Y. State 611 (1990), we opined that a single lawyer could represent the seller and the lender in a real estate transaction where the parties have reached a complete accord on the business terms of the transaction, no points of importance remain for negotiations, and a title policy is to be obtained. See also N.Y. County 615 (1973) (lawyer may represent in a real estate transaction, with their consent, both buyer and seller who had already agreed upon the purchase price, time and manner of payment, and other terms and conditions of the sale).

10. Where such dual representation by a single lawyer might be permissible, we have cautioned that the lawyer "should not routinely assume that dual representation of these parties will be ethically permissible in every transaction." N.Y. State 611. A lawyer undertaking to represent both buyer and seller of real estate should heed the admonition of N.Y. State 38 (1966), repeated in N.Y. State 162: "Dual representation should be practiced sparingly and only when it is clear that neither party will suffer any disadvantage from it. It is difficult to justify, except in unusual and very limited circumstances . . ."

11. Under DR 5-105(D), these limitations on a single lawyer representing two parties in a real estate transaction apply as well to representation by a single law firm. The opinions discussed above, in which we concluded that a single lawyer may, in unusual and very limited circumstances, undertake dual representation of both parties to a real estate transaction, involve cases where there is little or no actual adversity between the two parties and they have both sought out a single lawyer (or law firm) to represent them jointly. This might occur, for example in a family transaction or where two clients of a lawyer or law firm have agreed on substantially all of the terms of the transaction and together ask the lawyer or law firm to document the transaction for them both[19].

12. The situation under consideration in this opinion is quite different: Here a buyer and a seller of residential real estate each determined at the outset of the negotiations to be represented by separate lawyers in separate firms, and the two clients separately approached lawyers in different firms to negotiate the terms of the transaction between them. The parties' decision at the outset that they should be represented by two different lawyers in two different firms reflects an actual adversity and conflict of interest between them that would require the two lawyers to negotiate or bargain against each other as adversaries.

13. A conflict like the one here is not consentable under DR 5-105(C). In such a situation, a disinterested lawyer would not conclude that the two lawyers could "competently represent the interests of each." See N.Y. City 2001-2 ("If the dual representations require lawyers to directly negotiate the substantive business terms with each other, the direct adversity could preclude such concurrent representation – even with consent.").[20]

CONCLUSION:

14. The question is answered in the negative.

(11-06)

19 Even in this situation, if potential adversity between the clients became actual, the single lawyer or law firm would usually have to withdraw from representing both of the parties unless the clients have consented to have the lawyer continue for only one of them. DR 5-108(A) (a lawyer may not, without consent, represent a client adverse to a former client in the same or a substantially related matter); EC 5-15.

20 This conclusion is much the same as that which would be reached if two lawyers in the same firm sought consent for one to represent plaintiff and the other defendant in contested litigation.

TOPIC: Obtaining a security interest in litigation (or its proceeds) to recover fees in prior proceeding.

DIGEST: In the absence of an available charging lien, a lawyer may not obtain a security interest in either (a) a client's cause of action to recover fees from a prior proceeding or (b) the proceeds of such cause of action, if the lawyer represents the client in the litigation pursuing the cause of action.

CODE: DR 5-103A; EC 5-1, 5-7.

QUESTIONS:

1. Third parties are often responsible for the legal fees of individuals and business entities. These arrangements may take the form of insurance or indemnity obligations. The latter is frequently the case for senior executives of companies who, for example, face litigation based upon conduct within the scope of their employment ("Primary Actions"). While the beneficiary of these obligations is the executive (the "Client"), their counsel in the Primary Action obviously has a keen interest in seeing to it that those obligations are honored. When they are not honored, the Client may pursue remedies at law, such as an action for a declaration that the third party has an obligation to fund legal fees and/or a claim for breach of contract for past due sums (a "Fee Litigation").

2. Defense counsel in the Primary Action, however, generally has no direct recourse against the third party for unpaid legal fees. Assuming a charging lien is not available to cover the unpaid fees in the Primary Action (and whether a charging lien does apply is a question of law on which the Committee does not opine), this circumstance raises the following questions:

(a) May a lawyer obtain a security interest in the proceeds of a Fee Litigation, to secure the Client's outstanding legal fees and expenses owed to that lawyer in the Primary Action, when the lawyer is representing the client in the Fee Litigation?

(b) Would the answer to the foregoing question be different if the lawyer took a security interest in (or assignment of) the Fee Litigation itself?

(c) Would the answer to the foregoing questions be different if defense counsel in the Primary Action did not represent the Client in the Fee Litigation?

OPINION:

3. DR 5-103(A) provides that a "lawyer shall not acquire a proprietary interest in the cause of action or subject matter of litigation he or she is conducting for a client. . . ." As we explained in N. Y. State 786 (2005), the rule is premised upon two basic concerns: that (1) acquiring a financial stake in litigation may adversely effect a lawyer's exercise of independent judgment, and (2) the subsidizing of litigation by interested counsel might encourage clients to pursue lawsuits that should not otherwise be brought.

4. These considerations are further reflected in EC 5-7, which provides in part that the > possibility of an adverse effect upon the exercise of free judgment by the lawyer on behalf of the client during litigation generally makes it undesirable for the lawyer to acquire a proprietary interest in the cause of the client or otherwise to become financially interested in the outcome of the litigation.

Even where the interests of a client and lawyer might appear to be aligned, there is a possibility that the lawyer's judgment might be compromised by the self-interest created by a proprietary interest in the litigation.

5. Defense counsel in the Primary Action obviously has a powerful interest in the successful prosecution of the Fee Litigation, since any recovery therein will primarily be to his or her benefit. Indeed, this distinguishes a Fee Litigation from circumstances in which by statute or otherwise a prevailing party is entitled to an award of legal fees; there, other – primary – relief is also awarded (such as a declaratory judgment that some conduct is wrongful). In a Fee Litigation, the only relief sought is the recovery of legal fees. While the Client may bear responsibility for the fees in the Fee Litigation if it is unsuccessful, the lawyer's particular interest in the result of the Fee Litigation is evident. Thus, obtaining a proprietary interest in the Fee Litigation for the work done in that litigation is likely to create incentives that may affect a lawyer's exercise of independent judgment, and falls within the proscription of DR 5-103(A).

6. While the Rule explicitly proscribes the taking of a "proprietary interest," the Code does not define that term. The common understanding of "proprietary interest" is broad: essentially, an interest in property. Indeed, BLACK'S LAW DICTIONARY (8th ed. 2004) defines "proprietary interest" as any "interest held by a property owner." Further, the concerns animating DR 5-103(A) – which we noted in paragraph 3 above – equally suggest that the term "proprietary interest" should not be unduly circumscribed in defining the scope of DR 5-103(A).

7. In this spirit, we believe that a "security interest" is a "proprietary interest" within the meaning of DR 5-103(A).[21] Were a lawyer to obtain a "security interest" in Fee Litigation, the policies DR 5-103(A) seeks to further would be transgressed: obtaining a security interest, like obtaining any other proprietary interest in the litigation, might (a) affect the lawyer's ability to exercise independent judgment and (b) encourage the pursuit of litigation that should not otherwise be brought.

8. We also understand that there is a distinction between taking a proprietary interest "in the cause of action or subject matter of the litigation" and taking such an interest "in the proceeds" of the Fee Litigation, in the event the lawsuit succeeds.[22] But making such a distinction in applying DR 5-103(A) would subvert its purpose, and invite the very mischief the Rule is designed to avoid.

9. On the other hand, DR 5-103(A) would not prevent an attorney from taking a proprietary interest in Fee Litigation where the lawyer is not representing the Client in the Fee Litigation. In this circumstance, the two underlying reasons for the prohibition under DR 5-103(A) (the potential impingement on a lawyer's independent judgment and the encouragement of lawsuits that should not otherwise be brought) are not implicated. Thus, a lawyer may acquire a proprietary interest in a client's cause of action or subject of litigation where the lawyer is not representing the client in that particular matter.

21 See, e.g., BLACK'S LAW DICTIONARY 1387 (8th ed. 2004) (defining "security interest" to be a form of "property interest"). See also 11 U.S.C. § 101(51) ("security interest" is a "lien created by an agreement").

22 See, e.g., N.Y. State 769 (2003) (distinguishing between a transfer of a claim and an assignment of the proceeds of a claim); Grossman v. Schlosser, 19 A.D.2d 893, 244 N.Y.S.2d 749 (2nd Dept. 1963) (same).

10. Moreover, a lawyer is not without recourse in collecting unpaid legal fees. DR 5-103(A)(1) permits a lawyer to acquire a lien "granted by law to secure the lawyer's fee or expenses." As E 5-7 notes, "it is not improper for a lawyer to protect the right to collect a fee for his or her services by the assertion of legally permissible liens, even though by doing so the lawyer may acquire an interest in the outcome of litigation." The Model Rules are different; they permit a lawyer to have not just liens "granted" by law, but also liens "authorized" by law.[23] This difference was purposeful: "authorized" replaced "granted" in order to "permit any legally recognized lien to secure fees to be acquired in property that is the subject of the litigation." ABA 02-427. But, as with DR 5-103(A), the lien must still secure the lawyer's "fee or expenses." One such lien is the "charging lien" granted by Section 475 of the Judiciary Law, which attached to funds created by the attorney's efforts. [24] This opinion assumes, however, that a charging lien is not available in the Fee Litigation, or for some reason not sufficient, to cover the lawyer's work in the Primary Action (a question we do not decide).

CONCLUSION:

11. An attorney may not obtain a security interest in the proceeds of a client's cause of action against a third party for the payment of legal fees. The answer is no different if the attorney were to take a security interest in (or assignment of) the action itself. However, DR 5-103(A) does not prohibit a lawyer taking a proprietary interest in Fee Litigation so long as the lawyer is not representing the Client in the Fee Litigation.

(12-06)

23 Model Rule 1.8(i)(1).

24 DR 5-103(A)(2) also permits contingency fee arrangements.

OPINION 809 (02/12/2007)

TOPIC: Aiding the unauthorized practice of law

DIGEST: A lawyer who continues to represent a client in a transaction in which the counter-party has chosen to be represented by a non-lawyer is not thereby aiding the unauthorized practice of law.

CODE: DR 3-101(A); DR 7-101(A)(3) EC 3-8

QUESTION:

1. Is a lawyer aiding the unauthorized practice of law where the lawyer, in order to carry out the representation of a client in a transaction, communicates and deals with a non-lawyer who has been engaged by the client's counter-party and may be engaged in the unauthorized practice of law?

OPINION:

Underlying Situation

2. There are many situations in which a lawyer, representing a client in a transactional matter, may find that the client's counter-party has chosen to be represented and advised by a non-lawyer. Some examples include:

- The lawyer represents a lender in a refinancing transaction involving assignment of the client's mortgage to a new lender. Various counter-parties to the transaction, such as mortgage brokers, bankers, or the new lender, have chosen to have their part of the transaction managed by non-lawyer entities, sometimes known as "settlement" companies. The settlement companies undertake various tasks, such as reviewing notes for proper endorsements and closing the new loan. None of the counter-parties is represented by a lawyer in the transaction.

- The lawyer represents a seller in a real estate transaction. The buyer is not represented by a lawyer, but instead has engaged a real estate agent to handle the transaction. The lawyer observes the real estate agent advising the buyer on the legal meaning of terms in the transactional documents and preparing for the buyer's signature further instruments affecting the title of the subject real estate.

- The lawyer represents the groom in negotiation of a pre-nuptial agreement. The bride is represented by a person the lawyer knows to be a suspended or disbarred lawyer.

3. In all of these and many similar transactional situations,[25] the lawyer may suspect or may actually know that the counter-party's representative is engaged in the unauthorized practice of law. DR 3-101(A) provides: "A lawyer shall not aid a non-lawyer in the unauthorized practice of law." If

25 This opinion is limited to transactional situations and does not encompass situations involving litigation, in which there may be, for example, special duties to the court. As stated below, while the third of these examples appears clear, we express no opinion whether in these examples the non-lawyer representative is in fact engaging in the unauthorized practice of law.

the lawyer continues to represent his or her own client and therefore necessarily communicates and deals with the non-lawyer representative, has the lawyer violated DR 3-101(A)?

4. Whether a particular action constitutes the unauthorized practice of law (UPL) is a question of law on which this Committee does not opine. See N.Y. State 705 (1998). Furthermore, it is a question which can sometimes be quite vexing and without a clear answer. In situations where a lawyer merely suspects that the non-lawyer may be engaged in UPL, the lawyer is under no duty to inquire further. If the situation is unclear, the lawyer may properly proceed with the transaction in the normal manner, dealing with the non-lawyer as necessary to conclude the transaction. In other situations, it may be quite clear to the lawyer that the non-lawyer is engaging in UPL, as where a suspended lawyer is representing and advising a counter-party on a legal matter. In those situations, what is the lawyer's proper course of action?

Meaning of "aid" in DR 3-101(A)

5. We believe that "aid" as used in DR 3-101(A) requires an intention to substantially assist or cause another to commit an act that constitutes the unauthorized practice of law, as opposed to doing something for one's own purposes that incidentally permits the other person to commit that act.

6. For example, in this Committee's prior opinions concerning DR 3-101(A), we have often concluded that certain acts by a lawyer could constitute aiding UPL. In all of those opinions, the common thread was that the lawyer was engaging in an affirmative act that substantially enabled the non-lawyer to practice law and was done with the purpose and intent of doing so.[26]

7. The situation before us is quite different. Here we have a lawyer who is representing his or her client in a transaction. Through no fault and no act by, and no encouragement from, the lawyer (or the client), the lawyer finds that the counter-party has chosen to engage a non-lawyer to carry out the transaction. This situation was not caused by the lawyer in any way. Further, the lawyer's actions in continuing with the transaction are intended to serve the lawyer's client, not to facilitate the non-lawyer in UPL. The lawyer is not substantially enabling the non-lawyer's engaging in UPL nor is that incidental result intended by the lawyer. Of course, the lawyer must not encourage the non-lawyer to engage in UPL (see EC 3-8) and must not steer business to the non-lawyer.

8. We do not believe that merely continuing to represent one's own client—in a transaction into which a third party, not under the lawyer's (or client's) control, has chosen to introduce a non-lawyer who is engaging in UPL— is aiding that non-lawyer in UPL. Absent any affirmative intent or desire to substantially assist the non-lawyer in UPL, or some direct financial or other benefit to the lawyer from 26 N.Y. State 801 (2006) (lawyer may not partner with out-of-state attorney where that attorney would be engaging in UPL); N.Y. State 705 (1998) (explaining when lawyer may accept referrals from non-attorney tax reduction company); N.Y. State 662 (1994) (lawyer may not affiliate with non-lawyer to represent homeowners in small claims proceeding to reduce real estate taxes); N.Y. State 644 (1993) (lawyer may not form corporation with non-lawyer to assist homeowners in obtaining real estate tax reductions); N.Y. State 633 (1992) (lawyer may not enter into contractual arrangement with non-lawyer corporation to provide debt consolidation service to debtors); N.Y. State 618 (1991) (salaried lawyer may not remit legal fees to corporate employer); N.Y. State 557 (1984) (lawyer may not form firm with non-lawyer accountant for purpose of providing legal services); N.Y. State 423 (1975) lawyer may not merge with a non-lawyer collection agency corporation); N.Y. State 343 (1974) (lawyer may not delegate supervision of execution of will to paralegal); N.Y. State 334 (1974) (lawyer may not continue to use suspended lawyer's name in firm name); N.Y. State 304 (1973) (lawyer may not delegate taking of deposition to non-lawyer employee).

the non-lawyer's engaging in UPL (other than the ordinary benefit arising from completing the transaction for which the lawyer was engaged), the lawyer is not aiding UPL. All the lawyer is doing is representing a client; the incidental effect of that proper act is that the non-lawyer is able to engage in UPL.[27]

9. We find affirmative support for this conclusion in DR 7-101(A)(3), which prohibits the lawyer from intentionally prejudicing or damaging the client during the course of the professional relationship. We note that reaching the opposite conclusion—that merely continuing to represent one's own client is aiding UPL—would come at the expense of the client. The lawyer's refusal to deal with the non-lawyer might well mean that the client is forced to forgo the services and advice of his or her own lawyer or to abandon a favorable transaction that the client wants to consummate. Assuming that the client wants to go forward with the transaction, a rule that required the lawyer to refuse to deal with the non-lawyer would allow the counter-party effectively to deny the client the right to have representation by a lawyer.

10. We are aware of some contrary authority. Arizona Opinion 99-07 concluded that it would be improper for an Arizona lawyer to negotiate with a nonlawyer insurance adjuster representing the opposing party.[28] That opinion arose in the particular context of a statute that the Arizona ethics committee concluded would permit adjusters to engage in the "unauthorized" practice of law. Two published dissents disagreed with the majority opinion. One concluded that it was not at all clear that the statutorily authorized adjusters were practicing law. The other dissent followed much the same path we do in this opinion. The dissent noted:

> The ordinary meaning of the word 'assist' is not so broad. Ordinarily the word connotes cooperation or affirmative aid of some kind. . . . The Committee majority's conclusion has immense implications. If negotiating an agreement for another party is "the practice of law", then real estate brokers, sports agents, and accountants (to name only a few of the most obvious examples) are "practicing law". The Committee majority's opinion would prevent a lawyer from negotiating on behalf of a client with any of these professionals.

11. We agree with the Arizona dissent. We conclude that the majority's interpretation of the word "assist" in the Arizona version of DR 3-101(A) failed to balance properly the client's right to zealous representation by counsel against the policy of discouraging the unauthorized practice of law.

CONCLUSION:

12. For the reasons given, the question is answered in the negative. (5-06)

27 By way of a more extreme example, imagine that the lawyer owns an office building; the lawyer rents a suite of offices to Attorney X for a period of years. During that time, X is suspended from the practice of law. The lawyer knows of the suspension and knows that X is continuing to practice law in the rented office. We do not think it would be seriously contended that continuing to comply with the obligations of the lease is aiding UPL.

MODIFIES: N.Y. State 165 (1970), 260 (1972)

TOPIC: Representation of private clients by a government contract attorney

DIGEST: An attorney who provides legal services to clients on behalf of a county agency and maintains a private practice may not represent clients in the private practice in a matter in which the attorney participated as a government lawyer so long as the client is entitled to representation by the public agency. The lawyer may, however, represent the client in the private practice with respect to a different matter so long as the lawyer did not solicit the client to engage the lawyer.

CODE: DR 2-103(A); DR 5-108(A); Canon 9; DR 9-101(B)

QUESTION:

1. Under what circumstances may a lawyer who serves as a contract attorney for a county office represent clients in the lawyer's private practice where the lawyer previously had contact with the client in the lawyer's capacity as a government attorney?

OPINION:

2. The inquirer is a contract attorney for a county Office for Aging and maintains a private practice in the same county. The county office provides a range of legal services for elderly clients who qualify. In some circumstances the client who is eligible for representation with respect to a specific matter nevertheless may choose to seek private representation, or a client may not qualify for representation by a county attorney because the matter is outside the scope of services that the county office provides or the client does not qualify for such services. In either case, whether the client seeks private representation by choice or necessity, it may be necessary for the lawyer to refer the client to a private, fee-for-services legal practice. This opinion discusses situations in which a client who has met with the county lawyer may subsequently seek representation by the county lawyer in his or her private practice.

3. DR 9-101(B) of the Lawyer's Code of Professional Responsibility provides that a "lawyer shall not represent a private client in connection with a matter in which the lawyer participated personally and substantially as a public officer or employee." An initial issue is whether DR 9-101(B) applies to the attorney. The attorney in question is technically not an employee of the county, but rather an independent contractor who has contracted to perform services in exchange for a fee. While the Code uses the term "employee," which is not defined, we believe that the intent is to include within the ambit of DR 9-101(B) independent contractors who perform legal services for a public entity, such as the county.[29] A second issue is whether DR 9-101(B) is limited to the case where the attorney has left public employment. We have opined that DR 9-101(B) also applies when the attorney is a public employee and simultaneously continues a private practice.[30]

29 Cf. N.Y. State 630 (1992) ("special counsel who regularly represents the town . . . would be the functional equivalent of a member of the town attorney's staff"); N.Y. State 708 (1998) (private lawyer hired to represent public agency subject to DR 9-101[B]).

30 N.Y. State 506 (1979) ("the use of the past tense in DR 9-101(B) is without relevance to a resolution of the question").

4. A third issue is whether DR 9-101(B) applies when the county attorney's client is not the government but a third party. While DR 9-101(B) often applies when the attorney subsequently represents a party in a matter adverse to the government agency for which the attorney worked, the language of DR 9-101(B) is not so limited. By its terms, the rule applies when the attorney represents a private client in a matter in which the lawyer participated personally and substantially while working for the government regardless of whether the attorney is now adverse to the government. Numerous authorities have so noted.[31]

5. We have also previously opined that DR 9-101(B) applies when the government lawyer represented a third party. For example, in N.Y. State 506 (1979) we opined that an assistant county attorney who represented a wife in proceedings brought against her husband under the Uniform Support of Dependents Law could not subsequently privately represent the wife in an action to recover arrearages under a separation agreement. We considered it "immaterial" that the objectives of the contemplated private employment would be fully consistent with those of the lawyer's prior representation. We noted that the impropriety that DR 9-101(B) addresses is that of using a public office to secure private advantage and that the ethical proscription exists regardless of whether the private employment is consistent with the public representation.

6. In an analogous situation the Committee looked to DR 9-101(B) for guidance to determine whether a Legal Aid Society lawyer could continue to represent in private practice those whom the attorney represented while employed by the Society. In N.Y. State 534 (1981), the Committee opined that while DR 9-101(B) literally did not apply because the Legal Aid Society was not a government agency, the former staff attorneys could not undertake to represent for a fee those whom they previously served in connection with matters for which they had substantial responsibility so long as such clients remain eligible to receive representation without charge.

7. In N.Y. State 708 (1998) we opined that an attorney who represented a foster care agency in extra-judicial surrender proceedings may not represent prospective adoptive parents who seek to adopt the child involved in those proceedings. Again, we opined that although DR 9-101(B) did not literally apply because the foster care agency was a private entity, the strong public policy concerns underlying the rule were implicated. We noted:

> DR 9-101(B) should be seen as providing an illustration of a general policy underlying much of Canon 9. It is a policy which may be seen to develop from the Code's expressed purpose to promote public confidence in our system of justice and the various mechanisms, or agencies, which have been created to serve that system. Where the public might reasonably perceive that such agencies are being used for the personal > advantage of [its] attorneys, consistent with the broad purposes of Canon 9, the attorneys have been prohibited from undertaking various kinds of private employment.[32]

8. We follow the same approach here. Where the attorney has represented a client under the auspices of the county Office for the Aging, the attorney may not subsequently represent the client in the attorney's private practice in connection with the same matter so long as the client is eligible to receive representation from the county office. This properly guards against the concern that the government attorney not use the attorney's public office to private advantage.

9. We next consider situations in which the attorney had contact with the prospective client through the attorney's position with the county office but did not represent the client with respect to the matter for which the client now seeks representation. For example, the lawyer may have met with the client but did not provide representation with respect to a matter either because the matter was not within the scope of services provided by the county office or because the client was not eligible for services. The client subsequently seeks the lawyer's representation with respect to the matter. Alternatively, the lawyer may have represented the client with respect to a matter under the auspices of the county office but the client now seeks representation with respect to a different matter. In each case the lawyer may represent the client provided the lawyer has not solicited the representation and provided the lawyer tells the potential client about the availability of the services the county offers if the client would be eligible for the services.

10. DR 2-103(A) provides:

> A. A lawyer shall not engage in solicitation:
> > 1. by in-person or telephone contact, or by real-time or interactive computer-accessed communication unless the recipient is a close friend, relative, former client or existing client; or
> > 2. by any form of communication if:
> > > a. the communication or contact violates DR 2-101(A), DR 2-103(G) or DR 7-111;
> > > b. the recipient has made known to the lawyer a desire not to be solicited by the lawyer;
> > > c. the solicitation involves coercion, duress or harassment;
> > > d. the lawyer knows or reasonably should know that the age or the physical, emotional or mental state of the recipient makes it unlikely that the recipient will be able to exercise reasonable judgment in retaining a lawyer; or > e. the lawyer intends or expects, but does not disclose, that the legal services necessary to handle the matter competently will be performed primarily by another lawyer who is not affiliated with the soliciting lawyer as a partner, associate or of counsel.

11. Ordinarily a lawyer may engage in in-person or telephone solicitation of representation from a very limited class of people that includes existing or former clients. Nevertheless we believe it would not be appropriate for the attorney working under contract with the county Office for the Aging to solicit either current or former clients in any of the situations described above. This Committee has repeatedly held that lawyers in the public's employ, whether full or part-time, must scrupulously avoid using their public offices to promote their private interests and practices.[33]

12. In N.Y. State 165 (1970) and N.Y. State 260 (1972), the Committee opined that it would be unethical for a public defender to represent in his or her private practice anyone who had contacted the public defender's office for assigned representation. The Committee subsequently modified those opinions and opined that the public defender could represent the accused in a private representation where the contact with the attorney was the result of independent factors and not merely the contact with the public defender's office.[34] The latter opinion left intact the opinions in N.Y. State 165 and N.Y. State 260 that a public defender should not represent a private client where the potential client originally sought public defender representation and was found to be unqualified for public assistance. This portion of N.Y. State 165 and N.Y. State 260 should be limited to the criminal context discussed in those opinions. The concern for the integrity of the criminal justice system calls for a more stringent rule for public defenders than is necessary for civil matters.

13. Where the client is not eligible for representation by the county office, we believe there is not likely to be any perception that the attorney is using the public office to obtain clients so long as the attorney does not solicit the private representation. Particularly with respect to the types of matters handled by the county Office for the Aging, the client may have difficulty obtaining representation and there is no reason to prevent the attorney from undertaking the matter simply because the client consulted the Office for the Aging first in order to determine that the client was not eligible for public representation.

CONCLUSION:

14. A lawyer employed by a government agency may represent in his or her private practice a client who has previously been served by the government agency except where the representation is with respect to a matter in which the government lawyer participated and the client remains eligible for representation by a lawyer for the government agency.

OPINION 811 (04/13/2007)

TOPIC: Conflicts of interest; public defender

DIGEST: Where a public defender cannot be assigned due to a conflict, the public defender may not review billing vouchers of the counsel assigned to the matter to determine or recommend whether they should be paid.

CODE: DR 5-101, 5-105(C), (D), 7-101(A)(1); EC 5-1, 5-15.

QUESTION:

1. May a public defender employed by the county perform a review of billing vouchers submitted by counsel assigned pursuant to Article 18-B of the County Law where the 18-B lawyer is appointed because the public defender has a conflict?

OPINION:

2. New York law requires each county to establish a plan to provide attorneys for people who are entitled to legal representation in criminal and family matters but who cannot afford to pay for counsel.[35] Counties are permitted to use any of four methods to provide such counsel: a public defender, a private legal aid bureau, a bar association plan for rotation of private counsel, or a combination of these.[36] In many cases, counties that have chosen to establish a public defender in accordance with County Law Article 18-A rely on private attorneys under Article 18-B in cases in which the public defender is unable to represent an indigent litigant because of a conflict of interest with another client of the office (co-defendants in a criminal proceeding, for instance).

3. A number of counties do not have a separate program or coordinator that would have responsibility for reviewing bills submitted by attorneys assigned to represent poor people under Article 18-B. Some counties may require the public defender to review billing vouchers of assigned conflict counsel. Some of these counties go further and include the assigned counsel budget in the appropriation for the public defender's office.[37]

5. The Committee concludes that if the public defender's office is barred from representing a party because of a conflict, it would similarly be barred from reviewing the billing vouchers of assigned counsel to determine whether they should be paid by the county. In reviewing those billing materials, the public defender's office would not only likely be exposed to work product about the trial preparation activities of assigned counsel, but would be called upon to determine or advise the county whether those expenditures were excessive. The office owes a duty of loyalty, EC 5-1, and of zealous advocacy, DR 7-101(A)(1), to its client in the matter that conflicts with the expectation of the county that the office provide impartial advice on whether the bills of the 18-B lawyer are appropriate. This may be viewed as a conflict under DR 5-105 between two clients of the office – the county, which hires the office to provide legal advice on the appropriateness of the 18-B lawyer's bills,[38] and the client in the matter that creates a conflict. Alternatively, it may be viewed as a conflict under DR 5-101 between the interests of the client in the matter and the office's own interest in properly carrying out its obligation to provide impartial review of the bills.[39] Under either view, the result is the same. This prohibition would prevent any member of the public defender's staff from engaging in the review of billing submissions.[40] In short, if the public defender's office is conflicted from representing a party in litigation, the office may not get back involved in the representation by participation in determining whether the assigned counsel's bills should be paid.[41]

6. Conflicts under DR 5-101 and DR 5-105 can often be waived with the informed consent of the affected clients, DR 5-105(C), but several circumstances make it unlikely that consent will cure the conflict here. First, we have noted that it is often difficult to obtain informed consent to waiver of a conflict from indigent clients who have been assigned counsel.[42] Moreover, a lawyer or law office (such as the public defender's office) rarely can represent multiple criminal defendants.[43] Indeed, in seeking the appointment of 18-B counsel because of a conflict, the public defender is likely to have concluded that the conflict was not consentable. If the conflict that precluded the public defender from representing the defendant was not consentable, the same conflict would prevent the public defender from reviewing the bills of the defendant's 18-B counsel and would presumably not be consentable.

CONCLUSION:

8. Where counsel is assigned to represent a criminal defendant because the public defender has a conflict, the public defender may ordinarily not review the bills submitted by assigned conflict counsel so as to determine or recommend whether they should be paid. (35-06)

OPINION 812 (05/03/2007)

TOPIC: Communication with a represented party.

DIGEST: Unless prohibited by state or local law, DR 7-104(A)(1) permits a lawyer representing a private party before a town planning board to communicate with individual planning board members about pending determinations provided: (a) the proposed communications solely concern policy issues; and (b) the lawyer gives planning board counsel reasonable advance notice of the proposed communications.

CODE: DR 7-104(A)(1); EC 7-15, 7-18.

QUESTION:

1. Over the objection of counsel representing a town planning board, may in-house counsel for a real estate development company communicate privately, separately, and informally about the developer's pending applications with individual members of the board who support the developer's proposed project?

OPINION:

2. The inquirer is in-house counsel to a limited liability company engaged in the business of shopping center development. In that capacity, the inquirer is the "public face" of the developer and represents the developer before various government bodies to secure required land use permits and approvals.

3. The inquiry concerns a development project for which a State Environmental Quality Review Act ("SEQRA") review and site plan and subdivision approvals are pending before a seven-member town planning board. The project is controversial and has engendered substantial public opposition. The town board, which has no jurisdiction over the determinations to be issued by the planning board, is said to support the shopping center project. However, a majority of the members of the planning board, including the planning board chair, are said to oppose the project.

4. The planning board is represented with respect to the shopping center project by outside counsel. The developer has also secured outside counsel to "formally" represent the developer before the planning board, limiting in-house counsel's role to communicating "separately and informally" on behalf of the developer with the "more receptive" minority of planning board members who support the project. The inquirer states that these communications are "not in the nature of legal advice or assistance" and are "not designed to supplant guidance provided to the board by their own legal counsel." Rather, the separate communications "are confined to the provision and receipt of factual information and the discussion of state and local environmental and land use issues and polices" and are intended "to ensur[e] that supportive members of the planning board have the information they need to counter the opposition's efforts to derail the project, and are able to share facts and strategies with the developer." The developer thus seeks to create an even playing field with "[m]embers of the public who oppose the project [and who] communicate and strategize freely with like-minded members of the planning board, without going through the board's legal counsel."

5. Counsel for the planning board has objected to the separate, private communications regarding the project with individual members of the planning board, and has directed that the inquirer limit his communications to written submissions addressed to the planning board secretary for distribution to the entire board and for inclusion in the administrative record.

6. Against this background, the inquirer asks whether he may ethically persist in the "informal communications" with individual members of the planning board.

7. The inquiry is governed by DR 7-104(A)(1), known as the "no-contact" rule, which provides:

> During the course of the representation of a client a lawyer shall not communicate or cause another to communicate on the subject of the representation with a party the lawyer knows to be represented by a lawyer in that matter unless the lawyer has the prior consent of the lawyer representing such other party or is authorized by law to do so.

See also EC 7-18.

8. Because consent has clearly not been given, and because the planning board is represented with respect to the matter, the proposed communications are prohibited under the "no-contact" rule unless within the meaning of DR 7-104(A)(1): (a) planning board members are not "parties"; or (b) the communications are otherwise "authorized by law." We address each question in turn.

1. Are Planning Board Members "Parties"?

9. The answer to this question is controlled by application of the standard set forth by the New York Court of Appeals for determining the "party" status of employees of corporations and other entities for DR 7-104(A) purposes in Niesig v. Team I:

> The test that best balances the competing interests, and incorporates the most desirable elements of the [various] approaches, is one that defines "party" to include corporate employees whose acts or omissions in the matter under inquiry are binding on the corporation (in effect, the corporation's "alter egos") or imputed to the corporation for purposes of its liability, or employees implementing the advice of counsel.[44]

10. We have held the Niesig test to be applicable to governmental units.[45] Thus, DR 7-104(A)(1), as interpreted by Niesig, prohibits "only communications with government officials who have authority, individually or as part of a larger body, to bind the government or to settle a litigable matter, or whose act or omission gave rise to the matter in controversy."[46] Here, as the planning board is invested with the power to issue binding SEQRA, site plan and subdivision determinations with respect to the matter before it, the Niesig "party" test is satisfied.

46 N.Y. State 652 (citing N.Y. City 1991-4 and Ohio Opinion 92-7).

2. Are the Proposed Communications with the Planning Board "Authorized by Law"?

11. In N.Y. State 404 (1975) we recognized an "implicit exception" to the broad no-contact prohibition of DR 7-104(A)(1) where a "public body is involved," based on the "overriding public interest [which] compels that an opportunity be afforded to the public and their authorized representatives to obtain the views of, and pertinent facts from, public officials representing them." Accordingly, we opined that private counsel could, without the consent of school district counsel, properly communicate about a controversy with an individual member of a school board who disagreed with the school board decision being contested by the lawyer's client. This sentiment – that the literal application of the "no-contact" rule must be tempered by constitutional considerations where the First Amendment right to petition government is implicated – is shared by most authorities.[47]

12. This concern for protecting the First Amendment interests of citizens to contact governmental decision makers has also led to specific no-contact rule exceptions in California and the District of Columbia.[48]

13. The issue of whether a lawyer who is representing a private party in a controversy may communicate about the matter with responsible government officials without the prior consent of government counsel has been comprehensively addressed by the American Bar Association Standing Committee on Ethics and Professional Responsibility in ABA 97-408. Noting the "tension between a citizen's right of access and the government's right to be protected from uncounselled communications by an opposing party's lawyer,"[49] the ABA Committee interpreted Model Rule 4.2, the functional equivalent of DR 7-104(A)(1),[50] to allow unconsented contacts with government officials that would otherwise have been prohibited by the no-contact rule, but subject to three conditions. First, the official to be contacted must have authority to take or recommend action in the controversy. Second, the sole purpose of the communication must be to address a policy issue. Third, advance notice of the proposed communications must be given to the lawyer representing the government official in the

47 See, e.g., American Canoe Ass'n Inc. v. St. Albans, 18 F. Supp. 2d 620 (S.D. W. Va. 1998) (the right to contact and communicate with government officials is a right of citizenship); ABA Formal Op. 97-408 (1997) (Model Rule 4.2 "does not prohibit a lawyer representing a private party in a controversy with the government from communicating directly with government officials who have authority to take or recommend action in the matter, provided the communication is solely for the purpose of addressing a policy issue, including settling the controversy."); Alabama Opinion 2003-03 (lawyer defending employees and officials of state board of education in suit by county board of education may communicate directly with county board of education members to discuss settlement); Kansas Opinion 00-06 (lawyer for zoning applicant may contact city officials about client's application despite city attorney's contrary directive because "a citizen must always have access to his or her government"); Utah Opinion 115 (1993) (lawyer may contact any employee of a represented government agency after advising the employee of the matter in question and of the lawyer's representation therein); see also RESTATEMENT OF LAW GOVERNING LAWYERS (THIRD) § 101(1), at 102 (2000) ("Unless otherwise provided by law . . . the prohibition . . . against contact with a represented non-client does not apply to communications with employees of a represented government agency or with a governmental officer being represented in the officer's official capacity.").

48 California Rule of Professional Conduct 2-100(C)(1) (providing that the general no-contact rule "does not apply to communications with a public officer, board, committee or body"); District of Columbia Rule of Professional Conduct 4.2(d) (providing that the District's no-contact rule does not prohibit "communications by a lawyer with government officials who have the authority to redress the grievances of the lawyer's client").

49 ABA Formal Op. 97-408, at 7.

50 Model Rule 4.2 (Communication with Person Represented by Counsel) provides: "In representing a client, a lawyer shall not communicate about the subject of the representation with a person the lawyer knows to be represented by another lawyer in the matter, unless the lawyer has the consent of the other lawyer or is authorized to do so by law or a court order."

matter so as to afford government counsel the opportunity to advise his or her client with respect to the communication, including whether even to entertain it.[51]

14. Insofar as set forth in this opinion, we adopt the approach taken in ABA Formal Op. 97-408 and here conclude, on the facts presented, that the proposed communications fall within the protection of the First Amendment right to petition. They are, therefore, not prohibited by DR 7-104(A)(1), provided that counsel for the planning board is given reasonable advance notice that such communications will occur.[52] Although the precise parameters of the constitutional right to petition are beyond our jurisdiction, we note that communications directed to government officials who do not have the authority to take or recommend action in the matter, or communications that are intended to secure factual information relevant to a claim (for example, mere witnesses to government misconduct), should both be fully subject to the no-contact rule as, in each of these situations, there are no First Amendment considerations at play.[53]

15. Our resolution of this inquiry comes with several important caveats. First, we do not opine on whether additional "private," "separate" or "informal" communications with board members may violate a state statute or local ordinance that governs planning board procedures, or whether such communications may implicate a locally adopted ethics code. Second, we do not here address ex parte communications with an adjudicatory government body, such as a zoning board of appeals, which present different considerations.[54] Third, the inquirer may not deliberately elicit information that is protected by attorney-client privilege or as attorney work product.[55] Fourth, the inquirer should cease contact with a planning board member if the member so requests.[56]

CONCLUSION:

16. Absent the application of state or local ordinances that prohibit or regulate the practice, and subject to the qualifications set forth in this opinion, DR 7-104(A)(1) permits a lawyer representing a private party before a town planning board to communicate with individual planning board members about pending SEQRA, site plan and subdivision determinations provided: (a) the proposed communications solely concern municipal development policy issues; and (b) the lawyer gives planning board counsel reasonable advance notice of the proposed communications.

CLARIFIES: N.Y. State 803 (2006)

TOPIC: Unauthorized practice of law; debt collection; letterhead

DIGEST: A lawyer who provides debt collection services as a non-legal service may not use law firm letterhead in doing so, but a lawyer who, as a lawyer, represents clients in collecting debts may use law firm letterhead.

CODE: DR 1-106(A), 1-102(A)(4), EC 3-6.

QUESTION:

1. A lawyer in New York has been retained by several debt collection agencies, both in New York and out of state, to assist in the collection of debts. The lawyer has hired employees of the debt collection agencies to assist in this work, including preparing letters to debtors. The employees are located in New York and out of state. May the lawyer use the lawyer's letterhead in sending letters to the debtors?

OPINION:

2. We see no impediment in the New York Code of Professional Responsibility to a New York lawyer, acting as a lawyer, using law office letterhead in seeking to collect a debt, assuming no violation of any other jurisdiction's rules. In N.Y. State 803 (2006) we addressed an inquiry in which a lawyer wished to engage in a debt collection business outside of New York without engaging in the practice of law in the state where that business was conducted. The lawyer was not admitted in that state. Rather, the inquirer there sought to assist clients in collecting debts as a non-legal service, which we assumed was permitted by the rules of that other state. Our opinion focused primarily on the requirements of DR 1-106(A) where a law firm is offering both legal and non-legal services, and in particular the requirement that the lawyer advise the client in writing that the protection of the attorney-client relationship does not exist with respect to the non-legal services.

3. In addition, in paragraph 4 of the opinion we addressed the implications of DR 1-102(A)(4), which prohibits a lawyer from engaging in "conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit, or misrepresentation." We said:

> Similarly, the firm must avoid misleading debtors with whom it communicates pursuant to the collection activities [citing DR 1-102(A)(4)]. For example, it may not use its law firm letterhead in communicating with debtors and must otherwise avoid suggesting to debtors in such communications that the firm or its representatives are functioning as lawyers engaged in the representation of the creditor-client or that the firm or its representatives might undertake legal action on the creditor-client's behalf.

4. This discussion of the use of firm letterhead related only to the conduct of a collection business as a non-legal activity in a state where that was permitted. Our concern was that the lawyer not mislead debtors as to the capacity in which the lawyer is acting, so as to suggest, for example, that a lawyer has considered the merits of the claim or is preparing to sue the debtor.

5. In the present inquiry, a lawyer proposes to offer legal services to the lawyer's debt-collection-agency clients. In that situation, the lawyer is acting as a lawyer in seeking to collect the debt, and can use law office letterhead in doing so.

6. We caution that in conducting such a debt-collection practice, the lawyer must adequately supervise his or her non-lawyer employees.[57] A lawyer must retain full professional responsibility and meaningful involvement in supervising the activities of law firm employees. As we said in N.Y. State 179 (1971), "It would not be improper to permit a stenographer in the office of the client to type the collection letters in the form prepared by the attorney and to forward them to the attorney, who would read, sign and mail the letters to the debtors in the event the letters met with the attorney's approval." But it would be a violation were the lawyer to turn the sending of the lawyer's collection letters over to the collection agency or to the lawyer's debt-collection employees without any meaningful involvement by the lawyer.[58]

7. As in N.Y. State 803, we express no opinion on any question arising out of the rules relating to the unauthorized practice of law. We do not opine on the law or ethics rules of any other jurisdiction.[59]

CONCLUSION:

8. The New York Code of Professional Responsibility does not prevent a lawyer offering legal services from using the lawyer's law firm letterhead in the course of representing clients in collecting a debt. If the law firm undertakes to offer debt collection services as a non-legal service in places where doing so is otherwise permitted, the lawyer should not use law firm letterhead in doing so, as that would suggest that the lawyer is offering legal services.

57 See EC 3-6 (delegation of tasks to clerks, secretaries and other nonlawyers "is proper if the lawyer maintains a direct relationship with the client, supervises the delegated work, and has complete professional responsibility for the work product").

58 Cf. Clomon v. Jackson, 988 F.2d 1314, 1320 (2d Cir. 1993) (finding violation of federal law prohibition on use of "false, deceptive or misleading" representations or means in debt collection where lawyer did not determine to whom letters over his name should be sent, did not see, review or approve letters before they were sent, and did not know to whom they were sent).

59 Indeed, we do not opine on what constitutes unauthorized practice of law in New York either, because the rules governing unauthorized practice of law in New York are matters of law, not the Code of Professional Responsibility. New York Judiciary Law §§ 476-a, 476-b, 478, 484-486.

OPINION 814 (03/03/2008)

(Revised and Reissued)

TOPIC: Supervision of a branch office managed by a non-partner.

OVERRULES: N.Y. State 175

DIGEST: In N.Y. State 175 (1971), this Committee opined that the New York Lawyer's Code of Professional Responsibility permitted a multi-state firm to practice in New York under a firm name that included names of non- New York lawyers only if the firm had an active partner admitted in New York. In New York Criminal and Civil Courts Bar Association v. Jacoby & Meyers, decided in 1984, the New York Court of Appeals reached the same conclusion under the New York Judiciary Law. In this opinion, we re- examine the question under the Code based on intervening Code amendments and developments in legal practice. In our view, the Code now permits the New York office of a multi-state law firm to be staffed solely by a non-partner lawyer who is admitted to practice in New York where the non-partner lawyer is supervised by an out-of-state partner who is licensed in another state but not in New York.

CODE: DR 1-104(A), (C); DR 2-102(D); DR 2- 106; DR 4-101; DR 5-105(E); DR 6-101; DR 9-102; EC 1-8; EC 2-28.

QUESTION:

1. May the New York office of a multi-state firm be staffed solely by a non-partner who is admitted in New York, where the non-partner is supervised by an out-of-state partner who is admitted in another state, but not in New York?

OPINION:

2. A lawyer admitted to practice in New York State is contemplating becoming an associate or of counsel to what will be a two-person law firm, with offices in New York and New Jersey. The New York attorney will be paid a salary and will work out of and manage the New York office, but will not share in the overall profits and liabilities of the law firm. The firm will practice in the name of the New Jersey attorney, who is not admitted in New York.

This Committee's Opinion in N.Y. State 175

3. In N.Y. State 175 (1971), this Committee addressed whether a multi-state law firm could use for its New York office a name composed of the names of one or more partners who are not admitted to practice in New York. We noted that before New York adopted the Lawyer's Code of Professional Responsibility (the "Code") in 1970, numerous opinions by other ethics committees[60] had held that the inclusion in the firm name of one never admitted to practice in New York was improper. These opinions rested at least in part on the ground that the name falsely implied that all named partners were locally admitted. We concluded that DR 2-102(D) of the then-new Code had effected a change that undermined those earlier opinions, because DR 2-102(D) expressly permits partnerships among lawyers licensed in different jurisdictions to use the same firm name in each jurisdiction.[61] In light of this provision, we opined in Opinion 175 that a multi-state law firm could use in New York a name composed of the names of one or more lawyers not admitted in New York "provided the circumstances are not such as to cause the local use of the name to be misleading." We concluded, however, that the firm had to have a partner admitted in New York:

60 Opinion 175 cited N.Y. City 684 (1946), N.Y. City 698 (1946), N.Y. City 700 (1946), N.Y. City 749 (1950), N.Y. City 786 (1954), N.Y. County 182 (1920), N.Y. County 426 (1954), ABA Inf. 830 (1965), ABA Inf. 1059 (1968) and ABA 318 (1967).

> To avoid the danger of franchising [an out-of-state law firm's name] and the risk of misleading the public, the Committee is of the opinion that a multi-state law firm may not use in New York a name composed of one or more lawyers not admitted to practice in New York unless the local lawyer is a true partner with a real share in the over-all profits, liabilities and professional responsibilities of the entire firm.

The Court of Appeals' Opinion in Jacoby & Meyers

4. Thirteen years later, in New York Criminal and Civil Courts Bar Association v. Jacoby & Meyers, 61 N.Y.2d 130, 136, 460 N.E.2d 1325, 1328, 472 N.Y.S.2d 890, 894 (N.Y. 1984), the New York Court of Appeals (the state's highest court) addressed the same question under New York Judiciary Law section 478, which prohibits the unauthorized practice of law. The Court held that it was not a violation of that statute for a multi-state law firm to practice in New York under a firm name that includes the names of lawyers not admitted in New York, "provided that it has an active partner who is admitted to practice in New York.[62]" The Court did not explain the source of this proviso or its rationale. The Court's opinion was based largely on an interpretation of the Judiciary Law,[63] but it noted that opinions of ethics committees recognize the ethical propriety of practice in New York by

61 DR 2-102 (D) as adopted in 1970 – and unchanged today – provides:

> A partnership shall not be formed or continued between or among lawyers licensed in different jurisdictions unless all enumerations of the members and associates of the firm on its letterhead and in other permissible listings make clear the jurisdictional limitations on those members and associates of the firm not licensed to practice in all listed jurisdictions; however, the same firm name may be used in each jurisdiction.

62 The Court articulated this requirement twice in its opinion. The other reference reads, "A multi-state law firm (consisting of partners admitted to practice in different States) may practice law in New York State if at least one of its active partners is admitted to practice in this State, and it may conduct such practice under a firm name comprised of a combination of surnames, although none of them is the surname of a partner licensed to practice in New York." 61 N.Y. 2d. at 132, 460 N.E.2d at 1325, 472 N.Y.S.2d at 891 (emphasis added). The firm in the Jacoby & Meyers case had a New York partner resident in New York State, who was supervising "20 or so" offices around New York State. The Court found no violation of Judiciary Law § 478.

63 The Court at one point distinguished between the relative weight to be given statutory law and the provisions of the Code, noting that "the provisions of the Code of Professional Responsibility are not entitled in all instances to be accorded the status of statute or case law," but that DR 2-102(D) (quoted above) "fairly states the appropriate application to multi-state law firms of the provisions of section 478 of the Judiciary Law." 61 N.Y.2d at 135-36, 460 N.E.2d at 1327, 472 N.Y.S.2d at 893.

multi-state law firms that include lawyers not admitted in New York. In that connection, the Court cited our opinion in N.Y. State 175 (1971[64]), among others.[65]

Is N.Y. State 175 Still Valid?

5. Our jurisdiction is limited to questions arising under the Code, and does not extend to interpreting New York's statutes on the unauthorized practice of law. To the extent the Court of Appeals' proviso in Jacoby & Meyers was based on those statutes, we express no opinion on the question other than to observe that if the conduct is illegal, it is also unethical.[66] To the extent the proviso in Jacoby & Meyers was based in part on our views in Opinion 175,[67] we believe subsequent amendments to the Code, and changes in law firm practices over the last 37 years, call for a re-examination of the conclusion we reached in Opinion 175. Having re-examined that conclusion, we no longer adhere to it, for the reasons set forth below.

6. It is clear from the text of DR 2-101(D), and we have previously opined (for example, in N.Y. State 801 [2006] and N.Y. State 144 [1970]), that a New York attorney may form a partnership with a lawyer who is admitted only in another jurisdiction. Nothing in the Code, however, states that partnership is the only permissible professional relationship between a New York lawyer and an out-of-state lawyer or firm. To the contrary, while the Code repeatedly mentions "partners" and "associates," the Code generally imposes the same ethical obligations on all lawyers whether they are partners or not. In general, under the Code a New York lawyer is a New York lawyer regardless of the title bestowed upon the lawyer by the lawyer's firm.

7. Since Opinion 175 and since the Court of Appeals' decision in Jacoby & Meyers, the Code has been amended to provide for explicit regulation of law firms as entities, rather than only of New York lawyers. Under amendments to DR 1-104(A) and (C) of the Code adopted in 1996, a law firm has an obligation to ensure the ethical conduct of attorneys in its New York offices.[68] Thus, the drafters of the Code have chosen to ensure law firm compliance with the Code by directly regulating law firms as entities rather than solely by regulating law firm partners. To the extent the conclusion in Opinion 175 was based on a concern that only a partner can ensure that lawyers in a firm confirm with ethical stan-

64 The Court quoted the portion of our Opinion 175 that stated, "a multi-state law firm practicing in New York may use the same name as in other states." 61 N.Y.2d at 136 n.3, 460 N.E.2d at 1327 n.3, 472 N.Y.S.2d at 893 n.3.

65 In addition, relying in part on our Opinion 175, a state trial court in 1979 held that a multi-state law firm with an office in New York must have at least one partner admitted in New York. Rosenberg v. Johns- Manville Sales Corp., 99 Misc. 2d 554, 558, 416 N.Y.S.2d 708, 710 (Sup. Ct. N.Y. County 1979) (multi- state firm practicing in New York must have at least one partner admitted to practice in New York).

66 DR 1-102(A) states that a lawyer or law firm shall not "(3) [e]ngage in illegal conduct that adversely reflects on the lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness as a lawyer" or "(5) [e]ngage in conduct that is prejudicial to the administration of justice."

67 We note that the Hon. Hugh R. Jones, the author of the Court's opinion in Jacoby & Meyers, served as Chair of our Committee from 1961 to 1964.

68 DR 1-104(A) and (C) provide:

A law firm shall make reasonable efforts to ensure that all lawyers in the firm conform to the disciplinary rules.

C.A law firm shall adequately supervise, as appropriate, the work of partners, associates and nonlawyers who work at the firm. The degree of supervision required is that which is reasonable under the circumstances, taking into account factors such as the experience of the person whose work is being supervised, the amount of work involved in a particular matter, and the likelihood that ethical problems might arise in the course of working on the matter.

dards,[69] these amendments substantially undermine that conclusion. These new rules do not require that the firm include any New York lawyers as partners.[70] Indeed, in N.Y. State 762 (2003), we concluded that, "[a]t a minimum, . . . the Disciplinary Rules that are specifically applicable to law firms apply to firms with a New York office and at least one New York lawyer affiliated with the firm in that office." (Emphasis added.) This is consistent with 22 N.Y.C.R.R. §§ 603.1(b) and 603.2(b), the only rules that any of the four New York judicial departments have adopted defining which law firms are subject to the Code. Under sections 603.1(b) and 603.2(b), which are in the First Department rules, any law firm that "has as a member, employs, or otherwise retains an attorney or legal consultant" who is subject to the New York Code can be disciplined for professional misconduct under the Code. (Emphasis added.)

8. The firm's specific supervisory obligations also do not require that there be a New York partner. The firm is obligated to make reasonable efforts to ensure that all lawyers "conform to the disciplinary rules," and the firm must "adequately supervise" the work of all of the attorneys in the firm. Generally, this requires the firm to develop systems to ensure that its New York lawyers comply with New York's disciplinary rules and that the firm's practice is conducted in a professional and ethical manner.[71]To discharge this duty, the firm may consider establishing systems and procedures: (i) to ensure that lawyers reach agreement with clients on fees and provide accurate bills (DR 2-106; EC 2-28); (ii) to educate lawyers and nonlawyers about the importance of maintaining client confidences and secrets and to assist with the maintenance of client confidences (DR 4- 101); (iii) to keep records of prior engagements and to detect conflicts of interest (DR 5- 105(E)); (iv) to oversee work handled by any New York attorney and ensure that the lawyer is handling his or her matters competently (DR 6-101); (v) to allow non-partners to raise concerns about ethical conduct (EC 1-8); (vi) to segregate client funds and maintain appropriate records (DR 9-102); and (vii) to provide continuing legal education in professional ethics to attorneys (EC 1-8). None of this requires a New York-admitted partner.

9. Indeed, a lawyer in New York may ethically practice as a sole practitioner, without any partners in the firm at all, and may even operate multiple offices. If a lawyer is ethically permitted to prac-

69 See Rosenberg, 99 Misc. 2d at 558, 416 N.Y.S.2d at 710 (multi-state firm must have at least one New York-admitted partner, because an associate is "not capable of setting policy for the firm, or of holding himself out to the public as the firm, or of accepting the legal responsibility for all of its acts and those of its other employees").

70 We are aware that the language of DR 1-104(D)(2) assigns particular responsibility to partners in law firms. It states:

> D. A lawyer shall be responsible for a violation of the Disciplinary Rules by another lawyer or for conduct of a non-lawyer employed or retained by or associated with the lawyer that would be a violation of the Disciplinary Rules if engaged in by a lawyer if:
> 2. The lawyer is a partner in the law firm in which the other lawyer practices or the non-lawyer is employed, or has supervisory authority over the other lawyer or the non- lawyer, and knows of such conduct, or in the exercise of reasonable management or supervisory authority should have known of the conduct so that reasonable remedial action could be or could have been taken at a time when its consequences could be or could have been avoided or mitigated.

Under this rule, however, the partner is responsible only if he or she knows, or should have known, of the conduct. The same responsibility is imposed on a non-partner lawyer in the firm who has supervisory authority over another lawyer or non-lawyer. Thus, the responsibility imposed by DR 1-104(D)(2) does not depend on the status as a partner but on the status as a supervisor, of which partners are only one category.

71 N.Y. State 762 (2003); see also EC 1-8 ("A law firm should adopt measures giving reasonable assurance that all lawyers in the firm conform to the Disciplinary Rules and that the conduct of non- lawyers employed by the firm is compatible with the professional obligations of lawyer in the firm.").

tice alone, with sole and complete responsibility under DR 1-104 for his or her law firm's ethical compliance, it is difficult to see, as a practical matter, why the same lawyer could not maintain responsibility for ethical compliance by the New York office of a law firm whose partners are all based in offices outside New York. Since the Code allows any lawyer admitted in New York to run a law firm alone, there is no obvious reason why the Code should not also allow a lawyer admitted in New York to run the New York office of an out-of-state firm even if the New York lawyer is an associate rather than a partner.

10. Moreover, in the 37 years since Opinion 175, the bar and users of legal services have become familiar with the presence in New York of firms that originated or have their principal offices outside the State – and indeed outside the country – and that practice here under their nationwide or worldwide names. This now-widespread practice draws into question the concerns about "franchising" and consequent dilution of adherence to ethical standards that we had in 1971, when cross-border partnerships were new. In addition, a wide variety of employment and partnership arrangements have become common in law firms since 1971, including "contract partners," "non- equity partners," "contract lawyers" and other appelations. These two developments together call into question the continued viability of our conclusion in Opinion 175 that operating without a New York-admitted partner was inherently misleading. Examining the question against the backdrop of legal practice today, we do not think that the presence of a New York office implies that the out-of-state firm has a New York partner as opposed to a New York lawyer who is, for example, an associate or a non-equity partner. Accordingly, we overrule Opinion 175.

11. We thus find no express or implied requirement in the Code that a firm with a New York office have a partner admitted in New York. Of course, the lawyers in the New York office must comply with New York State statutes on unauthorized practice of law as interpreted by the courts. In addition, the firm's letterhead and advertisements must not misleadingly state or imply that the associates or of counsel who work in the New York office are partners.[72] But as long as the New York office is staffed by one or more lawyers admitted to practice in New York and in good standing in New York, we conclude that the Code does not itself require that the firm have a partner admitted in New York.

CONCLUSION:

12. Under the New York Lawyer's Code of Professional Responsibility, the New York office of a multi-state firm may be managed by an associate or of counsel attorney who is admitted in New York and supervised by an out-of-state partner who is licensed in another state. The law firm is responsible for establishing procedures to ensure that the New York attorney complies with New York's disciplinary rules. We caution lawyers, however, with respect to the Court's statements in Jacoby & Meyers, 61 N.Y.2d at 130, 136, 460 N.E.2d at 1325, 1328, 472 N.Y.S.2d at 890, 894, noted above, regarding the requirements of the New York Judiciary Law. If it is illegal under those statutes for a law firm to maintain an office in New York when it has no New York-admitted partner, it would also be unethical. (40-06)

72 DR 2-101(A)(1) (barring advertisements that contain "statements or claims that are false, deceptive or misleading"); DR 2-102(C) ("A lawyer shall not hold himself or herself out as having a partnership with one or more other lawyers unless they are in fact partners."); DR 2-102(D) (permitting a firm to use the same name in various jurisdictions if "all enumerations of the members and associates of the firm make clear the jurisdictional limitations on those members and associates of the firm not licensed to practice in all listed jurisdictions"). We do not address what might be required to make a particular communication not misleading.

TOPIC: Practice of a New York lawyer in a foreign jurisdiction.

DIGEST: A New York lawyer who can lawfully engage in conduct in a foreign jurisdiction that would be the practice of law in New York, even though the lawyer is not formally admitted to practice in the foreign jurisdiction, is generally subject to the ethics rules in the foreign jurisdiction, and not all of the provisions of the New York Code, provided the lawyer principally practices in that jurisdiction and the conduct's primary effect is not in New York.

CODE: DR 1-102(A)(3), DR 1-105(A), DR 1-105(B), DR 9-102, EC 1-12.

QUESTION:

1. What ethics rules govern the conduct of an attorney who is admitted to practice in New York and works principally in a foreign jurisdiction, when the lawyer, although not formally admitted to practice in a foreign jurisdiction, is permitted to engage in conduct there that would be the practice of law in New York?

OPINION:

2. A lawyer admitted to practice in New York is contemplating an employment relationship with a law firm in a foreign jurisdiction. That jurisdiction permits the lawyer to undertake work that would be the practice of law if performed in the New York, but the New York lawyer does not need to be nor will the lawyer be formally admitted to practice in the foreign jurisdiction. Because the New York lawyer will not be formally admitted to practice, the lawyer cannot, for example, represent clients in the courts of the foreign jurisdiction. The jurisdiction has a code of ethics for attorneys who are admitted to practice, but that code does not apply to the New York lawyer because the lawyer is not admitted to practice in the foreign jurisdiction.

3. Under DR 1-105(A), a lawyer admitted in New York is subject to the disciplinary authority of New York regardless of where the lawyer practices. In certain circumstances, however, "[i]n the exercise of the disciplinary authority of this state," the disciplinary rules of another jurisdiction will be applied. DR 1-105(B)(1) provides that in connection with a proceeding in a court to which the lawyer has been admitted, the rules of the court apply. "For any other conduct," DR 1-105(B)(2) states:

> a. If the lawyer is licensed to practice only in this state, the rules to be applied shall be the rules of this state, and
> b. If the lawyer is licensed to practice in this state and another jurisdiction, the rules to be applied shall be the rules of the admitting jurisdiction in which the lawyer principally practices; provided, however, that if particular conduct clearly has its predominant effect in another jurisdiction in which the lawyer is licensed to practice, the rules of that jurisdiction shall be applied to that conduct.

4. It is clear that DR 1-105(B)(1) applies where the New York lawyer appears in a court in a foreign jurisdiction. If the lawyer cannot appear in court, DR 1-105(B)(1) has no application. With respect to DR 1-105(B)(2)(b), it is the opinion of the Committee that "licensed to practice" includes not only formal licensing procedures like those required by the states in the United States, but also less formal procedures that authorize a lawyer to undertake activities in a foreign jurisdiction that would constitute the practice of law if they were undertaken in the United States. So long as the activities are lawful in the jurisdiction in which they are performed, it is our view that a lawyer undertaking such activities is "licensed to practice" in that jurisdiction, and that jurisdiction is an "admitting jurisdiction," for purposes of DR 1-105(B)(2)(b). If the lawyer principally practices in that jurisdiction and the particular conduct does not clearly have its predominant effect in New York, then under DR 1-105(B)(2)(b), the rules of the foreign jurisdiction apply.

5. A contrary interpretation would lead to anomalous results. It would be impractical, for example, to require a lawyer living abroad and working in a law firm there with foreign clients – and receiving funds in foreign currency – to keep funds in a New York bank account with only New York lawyers as signatories, as required by DR 9-102(B) and (E).

6. This may mean that a New York lawyer will be permitted to undertake representations that the lawyer could not undertake in New York. For example, the rules of the foreign jurisdiction may permit the lawyer to proceed against a current client in an unrelated matter, which the New York rules prohibit absent client consent. Because that is permitted by the rules of the foreign jurisdiction, however, it would not surprise clients.[73]

7. Although not stated in DR 1-105, we believe that certain rules of the New York Code that apply to lawyers even when not engaged in the practice of law -- such as the rule prohibiting illegal conduct that adversely reflects on a lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness as a lawyer[74] -- apply wherever the lawyer practices.[75]

CONCLUSION:

8. A New York lawyer who is permitted by the law of a foreign jurisdiction to engage in conduct in a foreign jurisdiction that would constitute the practice of law if undertaken in New York, even though the lawyer is not formally admitted to practice law, is "licensed to practice" in that jurisdiction. If the lawyer principally practices in that jurisdiction and the particular conduct does not have its predominant effect in New York, the rules of the foreign jurisdiction govern the conduct.

OPINION 816 (10/26/2007)

TOPIC: Advance payment retainer; client trust account.

DIGEST: A lawyer may ethically accept an advance payment retainer, place such funds in the lawyer's own account, and retain any interest earned. The Lawyer may require the client to forward an advance payment retainer to pay for final fees that accrue at the end of the relationship.

RULES: DR 2-106(C), DR 2-110(A); DR 9-102(A), (C).

QUESTION:

1. May a lawyer ethically accept an advance payment retainer and place such funds in the lawyer's own account while retaining any interest earned from such amount?

2. If so, may a lawyer request the client to forward an advance payment retainer to pay for final fees that accrue at the very end of the relationship, with interim fees billed out as they are performed?

OPINION:

3. Recently, we have received inquiries regarding the continued validity of our opinion in N.Y. State 570 (1985), which addressed the ethical propriety of what is commonly known as an advance payment retainer. An advance payment retainer is a sum provided by the client to the lawyer to cover payment of legal fees expected to be earned during the representation. To the extent the fees advanced are not earned during the representation, the lawyer agrees to return them to the client. This form of retainer should be distinguished from a general retainer, which is a sum paid to the lawyer for being available to the client. A general retainer is earned upon receipt.[76] The recent inquiries regarding advance payment retainers may stem from the fact that since we issued Opinion 570 in 1985, there have been several significant developments on the subject of retainer agreements and the language in DR 9-102 has been substantially amended. Therefore, it is now appropriate to revisit the principles stated in N.Y. State 570.

4. In New York State 570 we concluded that fees paid to a lawyer in advance of services rendered are not necessarily client funds and need not be deposited in a client trust account. Therefore, any interest earned on these fee advances may be retained by the lawyer. The opinion cautioned, however, that the lawyer is obliged to return any portion of the fee advance that is not earned during the representation.[77]

5. If the parties agree to treat advance payment of fees as the lawyer's own, the lawyer may not deposit the fee advances in a client trust account, as this would constitute impermissible commingling.[78] "On the other hand, the lawyer may agree to treat advance payment of legal fees as client funds and deposit them in a client trust account; in that event any interest earned on the funds while in the client trust account must be remitted to the client."[79]

6. Since 1985, we have cited N.Y. State 570 on several occasions.[80] N.Y. State 570 has also been cited with approval by the Appellate Division, Fourth Department and the New York city Bar ethics committee.[81] The validity of such an advance payment retainer has also been recently recognized by the Supreme Court of Illinois.[82]

7. In opinion 570, we noted that "it appears that the drafters of the Code of Professional Responsibility did not consider advance payments of fees to be client funds necessitating their deposit in a trust account." Although DR 9-102 has been substantially amended since 1985, the changes do not affect the reasoning of that opinion. DR 2-110(A)(3) requires a lawyer who withdraws from representing a client to "refund promptly any part of a fee paid in advance that has not been earned." As we observed in Opinion 570, this provision does not require that the advance be deposited in a client rust account until earned. This conclusion is supported by the language in DR 2-110(A), which still separately classifies fee advances and client property. DR 2-110(A)(2) requires a lawyer planning to withdraw from representing a client to "deliver to the client all papers and property to which the client is entitled" while DR 2-110(A)(3) separately provides for the refund of any unearned "fee paid in advance." In sum, the standards delineated in N.Y. State 570 for advance payment retainers are still valid today.

8. We note that advance payment retainer agreements, like any other fee agreement between a lawyer and client, must be "fair, reasonable, and fully know and understood by the client."[83] These agreements must also comply with other relevant provisions of the Code. In this respect, we construe DR 9-12 to require the lawyer to maintain complete records of any advance payment retainer received and to render appropriate account to the client regarding the retainer.[84] Although the advance payment retainer is not client property, the client retains an interest in that portion of the retainer that is not yet earned by the lawyer. Furthermore, at the conclusion of the representation the lawyer must promptly return any portion of the advance payment retainer that is not earned.[85] Finally, it would be inappropriate for a lawyer to negotiate a nonrefundable advance payment retainer with the client.[86]

85 DR 9-102©(4) (requiring a lawyer to "pay or deliver to the client or third person as requested by the client or third person the funds, securities or other properties in the possession of the lawyer which the client or third person is entitled to receive").

86 See DR 2-106©(2)(b) (prohibiting use of a nonrefundable fee clause in a domestic relations matter); Matter of Cooperman, 83 N.Y.2d 465, 633 N.E.2d 1069, 611 N.Y.S.2d (1994) (holding that the payment of a nonrefundable fee for specific services, in advance and irrespective of whether professional services are actually rendered, is per se violative of public policy).

9. An advance payment retainer will obviously benefit the lawyer by helping to ensure that he or she will be paid for services rendered, at least to the extent of the advance. This form of arrangement can also benefit the client, who may wish to hire counsel to defend the client from judgment creditors. If the lawyer deposited such a retainer in a client trust account, the funds would remain the property of the client and might be subject to claims of the client's creditors, thereby making it difficult for the client to retain counsel.[87] Therefore, it is imperative for a lawyer at the outset of the representation to discuss the advantages and disadvantages of advance payment retainers and to reach an agreement about the treatment of any such advances. These agreements should be confirmed in writing in the engagement letter where one is required.[88]

10. We also conclude that an attorney may request an advance payment retainer for final fees that accrue at the very end of the relationship, with interim fees filled out as they are performed. While such an arrangement is permissible, it must comply with the standards outlined in Jacobson and our prior opinions. If the advance payment retainer is intended to be payable only once specific services use performed, it must describe the services that it is intended to cover. If the services outlined in the agreement are not provided, that portion of the advance payment retainer must be promptly returned to the client.[89]

CONCLUSION:

11. A lawyer may ethically accept an advance payment retainer and need not place such funds in a client trust account. If the advance payment retainer is placed in the lawyer's account, the lawyer may retain any interest earned from such amount. A lawyer may request an advance payment retainer for final fees that accrue at the very end of the relationship.

OPINION 817 (11/02/2007)

TOPIC: Lawyer's participation in residential real estate purchase and sale closing that includes a "seller's concession" and "grossed up" sale price.

DIGEST: Participation in residential real estate transaction that includes a "seller's concession" and "grossed up" sale price is prohibited unless the transaction is entirely lawful, the gross-up is disclosed in the transaction documents and no parties are misled to their detriment.

CODE: DR 1-102(A)(3), (4), (5); DR 7-102(A) (7).

QUESTION:

1. Following written agreement between buyer and seller of real estate as to terms, the purchaser requests that the agreed actual sale price be increased by 3% to cover the purchaser's anticipated closing costs, and that the seller grant purchaser a "seller's concession" in an equal amount. The buyer thereby obtains a mortgage loan based upon an increased amount, the actual purchase price plus the buyer's closing costs.

2. Seller's counsel is advised by the lender that this type of seller's concession is "done all the time" by lenders, and it is apparently authorized in the lender's underwriting manual.[90] Moreover, the lender advises seller's counsel that the practice is also acceptable to the Federal National Mortgage Association ("Fannie Mae") and the Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corp. ("Freddie Mac"), who are among the major purchasers of residential mortgage loans.

3. Seller's counsel is unaware whether the lender's underwriting guidelines, or those of Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, discuss a price "gross up" and is concerned that there is no assurance that the "ultimate purchaser of the loan" would be aware of the selling price "gross up" used to offset the seller's concession. Moreover, counsel is concerned that the reporting of a "grossed up" selling price on the purchaser's mortgage application and the HUD-1 Settlement Statement may violate federal law, and in particular 18 U.S.C. §§ 1001, 1010, and 1012 (which criminalize fraud in certain transactions concerning the federal government).

4. Counsel asks whether participation in this transaction, as seller's attorney, will violate New York's Code of Professional Responsibility.

OPINION:

5. It is clear that DR 1-102(A)(3) prohibits an attorney from engaging in "illegal" conduct; and DR 7-102(A) provides that "[i]n the representation of a client, a lawyer shall not . . . (7) counsel or assist the client in conduct the attorney knows to be illegal or fraudulent." Therefore, if the conduct at issue is unlawful or fraudulent, it is per se unethical. We do not opine on issues of law, however, so we cannot determine whether it is criminal or fraudulent.

90 According to the inquirer, the manual appears to approve of seller's contributions up to a maximum of 6% of the selling price (where there is a 10% deposit; if the deposit is less than 10%, the maximum seller's concession allowed is 3%). The lender has also provided seller's counsel with a redacted HUD-1 Settlement Statement from a transaction the bank recently closed, showing the grossed-up contract price on Lines 101 and 401, and the "Seller's Concession" as reductions on Lines 215 and 515.

6. This Committee does construe the Code, however. DR 1-102(A)(4) prohibits "conduct involving dishonesty . . . deceit, or misrepresentation." While we have not previously addressed the specific question raised here,[91] two other state ethics opinions have considered closely related questions.

7. First, in North Carolina Formal Ethics Opinion 12 (2001),[92] a developer sold a lot for a certain purchase price, giving an early buyer a credit at closing. The developer, hoping to maintain the price of future sales, wanted the lawyer to obtain deed tax stamps based upon the higher price recited in the purchase agreement. The ethics committee of the North Carolina Bar, applying provisions substantially the same as the applicable New York Code provisions, determined that such conduct would be barred as involving dishonesty and misrepresentation, at least in part because the deed recordation concealed (and was intended to hide) from subsequent purchasers of nearby lots, the fact that the credit had been given.

8. Still more closely on point, in Opinion 710 (2006),[93] the New Jersey Supreme Court Advisory Committee on Professional Ethics considered facts like those presented here. In that opinion, the practice was described as follows:

> A contract for the sale of residential property has been prepared by a realtor and signed by both seller and buyer for a set purchase price with a mortgage contingency. Either during attorney review or thereafter, the lawyers for the seller and the buyer are required to amend the contract by increasing the purchase price and the mortgage contingency amount in like amounts. In addition, the attorneys are asked to amend the contract to provide that the seller give a credit to the purchaser at closing in the same amount, calling it a "seller's concession" or "seller's payment of purchaser's closing costs." The inquirer states that the amendments are calculated to increase the size of the purchaser's mortgage loan and "is a fraudulent practice perpetrated on the ultimate investor."
> The Committee notes that in recent years residential mortgage lending has, through the secondary market, become a major category of finance in this country. As a result of federal programs, those who originate loans may earn financing fees at the closing and then convey those loans to entities such as the Government National Mortgage Association (known as Ginnie Mae), the Federal National Mortgage Association (known as Fannie Mae) and the Federal Home Loan Mortgage Association (known as Freddie Mac). These programs, in turn, after buying the mortgages from the originators, then issue "mortgage-backed bonds" to investors, who receive the periodic payments of principal and interest from the borrowers.

91 In N.Y. State 545 (1982) we held that it was improper for a lawyer to execute a Real Property Transfer Report that set forth a purchase price that excluded the cost of a number of "extras." The Committee presumed that the conduct violated the Real Property Law, and was therefore barred by DR 7-102(A)(7), and did not reach the question of "dishonest . . . deceit, or misrepresentation."

93 2006 WL 3891474.

> This secondary market enables the originating lender to sell the loan, and to originate more loans and financing fees with the sales proceeds. In addition, the secondary market has created an investment market for low risk mortgage based securities, and attracts investment dollars into the residential mortgage business.
> On the facts set forth in the inquiry, it appears that the sales contract as amended is submitted to the original mortgage lender, or broker, with the sale price increase and corresponding credit expressly stated, but without any assurance that assignees in the secondary market would be aware of the device employed to increase the size of the mortgage loan.

9. Based upon this description, New Jersey Op. 710 determined that the practice violated the prohibitions contained in New Jersey's Rules of Professional Conduct against counseling or assisting a client in conduct that the lawyer knows is illegal, criminal or fraudulent, and engaging in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation:

> By manipulating the sales price in the manner described by the inquirer, either the originating lender or the secondary investors may be deceived as to the true market price of the house. The deception is the credit to the buyer given by the seller to offset the increase in purchase price. The credit is not justified by any additional property or rights to be sold to purchaser, or by a legitimate charge against the seller on account of any actual costs assumed by it and otherwise payable by the buyer.
> In the present inquiry, it would seem that the originating lender would have the opportunity to uncover the ruse upon a close reading of the contract and the loan application, and to protect itself before completing the transaction, but it is less clear that persons investing in the secondary market would have the same opportunity, or would have recourse against the assignor in the event a later default occurs and a loss is suffered as a result of the enhanced sales price.

The opinion concludes that a lawyer's participation in the increase in the purchase price and offsetting credit was improper because it "involves a deceit, intending that the mortgage loan investor will rely on the misrepresentations in the contract in determining the size of the mortgage loan." The advisory committee also said that the conduct "compromises the integrity of the underwriting of the loan because it exposes the lender and those who purchase the resulting loan to a greater risk of loss than is knowingly accepted."

10. New Jersey Op. 710 provoked requests for clarification from the Mortgage Bankers Association of New Jersey and the North Central Jersey Association of Realtors.[94] They asserted that New Jersey Op. 710 was based on a misunderstanding of mortgage lending practices and was leading New Jersey attorneys to refuse to work on mortgage loans containing seller's concessions of any kind. The mortgage bankers association said that seller's concessions made to permit financing of closing costs serve a salutary purpose because low-income and first-time buyers often do not realize at the time of contract that they will not have sufficient cash to cover the closing costs.[95] The realtor association asked whether the opinion covered, for example, closing credits for repairs to resolve problems uncovered by the home inspection process.[96]

11. A week after the original issuance, the New Jersey committee clarified that New Jersey Op. 710 "address[ed] fictional and deceptive increases in purchase prices unrelated to the actual circumstances or costs of closing, and contrary to the expectations of the lender or the ultimate holder of the mortgage." The clarification stated that the opinion was meant to bar only those seller's concessions not premised on "a legitimate charge against the seller on account of any actual costs assumed by it and otherwise payable by the buyer," and did "not implicate a contract of sale that explicitly states that the seller shall provide the buyer with a credit against legal and legitimate costs or expenses related to the sale, which would otherwise be absorbed by the buyer, such as actual closing costs."[97]

12. The clarification thus addressed, and found permissible, some shifting of costs otherwise borne by buyers, but continued to find impermissible an increase in the purchase price and an offsetting credit to permit the buyer to finance closing costs.[98]

13. This Committee is neither a legislative, nor a judicial body. Just as we cannot opine on matters of law nor can we "find facts." Thus, while we recognize the evidence that the practice of grossing up the price post-contract has become common, we find the concerns expressed in North Carolina Op. 12 and New Jersey Op. 710 of considerable weight.[99]

14. The issue is whether the lawyer's participation in such a transaction facilitates deception or misrepresentation. It seems obvious that there is potential deception implicit in the transactions, but we cannot determine whether or in what circumstances actual deception will occur. Thus we hold that a lawyer may not ethically participate in such a "gross up" of the actual purchase price and concomitant seller's concession unless there is neither deception nor misrepresentation at work in the transaction and its predictable consequences. At a minimum this means that the gross-up (and not merely the grossed-up purchase price) must be disclosed in the transaction documents. We are persuaded that merely reporting "a seller's concession" may imply either that the seller has agreed to reduce the purchase price he or she would otherwise have obtained or that the reported sales price is the actual price of the property, less certain costs the seller has agreed to pay. If neither of these is the case, then reporting a concession, without more, is misleading under DR 1-102.

97 Notice to the Bar, Clarification of Advisory Committee on Professional Ethics Opinion 710 (Dec. 22, 2006).

98 While New Jersey Op. 710 was thereafter approvingly cited as supporting the imposition of civil liability and professional discipline against attorneys participating in transactions that include seller's concessions, see Dodge*, Creative Financing,* 43 Arizona Attorney 8 (June 2007), it has also been strenuously criticized in some quarters, see Schonberger, Real Estate Attorneys Miscast as Mortgage-Market Watchdog, 187 N.J.L.J. 1123 (March 26, 2007) ("[T]he advisory committee failed to understand that the secondary mortgage investor is not unknowingly buying risk . . . . Perhaps more important is the existence, and actions, of professionals [such as appraisers] between the mortgagor and ultimate secondary market buyer.").

99 This Committee has long recognized that the lawyer's obligation under DR 1-102(A)(4) not to engage in conduct involving deception extends to deception of both clients and non-clients. See N.Y. State 626 (1992) (holding that the lawyer must provide non-client borrower with information to judge whether the lawyer's fee is or is not excessive); N.Y. State 796 ¶ 6 (2006) (noting that statements made to third parties "can become a matter of ethical concern" under DR 7-102(A)(5), which bars a lawyer from "[k]nowingly mak[ing] a false statement of law or fact").

CONCLUSION:

15. On the facts presented here, and for the reasons above, we conclude that participation in such transactions is unethical unless there is no unlawful conduct, and there is full disclosure in the transaction documents of the substance and effect of the transaction.

TOPIC: Conflicts of interest; persons paying for representation of another; designated underwriters' counsel.

DIGEST: Designated underwriters' counsel may represent the underwriters in a securities offering even though the issuer appointed and pays counsel, provided that underwriters consent after disclosure of material facts. In certain cases, with informed consent of the affected clients, designated underwriters' counsel may also represent the issuer.

CODE: DR 5-101(A), 5-105(A), (B), (C), 5-107(A), (B).

QUESTION:

1. When a law firm is selected by an issuer of securities to serve as the designated counsel for the underwriters of securities to be issued by that company or other entity, may the attorney also perform legal services for the company or entity?

OPINION:

2. A common practice among issuers that frequently issue investment grade securities is to designate one law firm to represent the investment banks selected to underwrite the issuer's securities offerings (a "Designated Underwriters' Counsel"). This practice is common for both corporate and municipal issuers. Frequently, the issuer will make this designation even before it has determined to undertake an offering, decided on the type of offering, or selected who the underwriters will be.[100] And, often, the selected law firm will continue in that role for a considerable period, spanning multiple offerings.

3. The appointment of a Designated Underwriters' Counsel is thought to benefit the frequent issuer, underwriters and investors. Because such counsel works consistently on offerings of the issuer's securities, it becomes particularly familiar with the issuer, and thereby better able to make judgments about the information that should be disclosed in offering documents. This familiarity may therefore improve the quality of disclosure in offering documents, lower transaction costs and promote the efficiency of the capital markets by allowing seasoned issuers to reach the capital markets quickly, as market and other opportunities arise. The ability to reach the capital markets quickly and opportunistically is particularly important in the context of so-called "shelf" offerings.[101] In addition, having a single law firm as underwriters' counsel for frequent issuers rather than different firms chosen by the lead underwriter for different offerings gives the issuer the benefit of underwriter's counsel more familiar with the issuer's business and able to update its knowledge more quickly and cost effectively.

4. Although – by definition – the Designated Underwriters' Counsel represents the underwriters, the counsel's fees are paid by the issuer. Further, as noted, the Designated Underwriters' Counsel is also selected for this work by the issuer. Occasionally, an issuer who becomes familiar with a law firm as underwriter's counsel may wish to hire the firm on an unrelated matter. An issuer may also wish to select, as Designated Underwriters' Counsel, a lawyer or law firm that regularly represents the issuer or that otherwise has a personal relationship with an officer of the issuer (e.g., a family member).

5. A law firm's work for the underwriters in an offering may conflict with the interests of the issuer. For example, there may be competing interests when negotiating the underwriting agreement – the contract pursuant to which the underwriting banks agree with the issuer to underwrite the securities to be sold. Similarly, in the course of preparing for a securities offering, there may be disagreement about what is "material" for purposes of disclosure in offering documents. As the Municipal Securities Rulemaking Board has explained, "The potential for conflict of interest is inherent in the issuer's selection of the counsel whose particular responsibilities may include advocating decisions that the issuer may oppose or may perceive as not to be in its best interest."[102] But while the underwriter and the issuer may be adverse to one another at certain points during the preparation of a securities offering, both have the shared goal of completing the offering in a timely manner and complying with all applicable laws.

ANALYSIS:

6. Against this background, we examine the relevant ethical issues that Designated Underwriters' Counsel must keep in mind when representing the underwriters, both where such counsel performs no legal work for the issuer and where he or she does.

7. Where the law firm performs no work for the issuer. Lawyers are frequently engaged to represent a client where a third party will be responsible for payment of the lawyer's fees. One very common example is where an insurance policy protects the client in connection with a litigated matter. As we said in N.Y. State 721, at 3 (1999), "Despite the fact that an insurance company has retained the lawyer pursuant to its contractual duty to defend the policyholder, the client is the policyholder, not the insurance company." The obligation to exercise independent professional judgment on behalf of the client continues even when the lawyer's fee is being paid by a third person.[103] The mere fact that a third party is paying the lawyer's fees thus does not present a disabling conflict.[104] Nor does the prospect of repeated work, for the same or different clients – be they policyholders or underwriters. Indeed, DR 5-107(A) and (B) specifically contemplates that third parties may be obligated to pay attorneys fees.

8. The Code explicitly requires that a lawyer whose fees will be paid by a third party obtain consent of the client, after full disclosure of all relevant facts and circumstances, before accepting such compensation. Investment banks in the business of underwriting are usually well aware of the role played by Designated Underwriters' Counsel and that their selection was made, and compensation

103 See, e.g., DR 5-107(B) ("Unless authorized by law, a lawyer shall not permit a person who recommends, employs, or pays the lawyer to render legal service for another to direct or regulate his or her professional judgment in rendering such legal services, or to cause the lawyer to compromise the lawyer's duty to maintain the confidences and secrets of the client under DR 4-101(B).").

104 See Nassau County 2003-2 (attorney may accept legal fees from a private school to represent students with disabilities and their parents in disputes with local school districts over the placement of students in appropriate schools even though in any given case the appropriate school may turn out to be a school other than the private school paying the attorney's fees).

will be provided, by the issuer. Accordingly, the underwriters' consent to the issuer's selection and payment of Designated Underwriters' Counsel is usually implicit in the underwriters' agreeing to serve as an underwriter in the contemplated transaction. But Designated Underwriters' Counsel specifically needs to consider, and fully disclose to the underwriters, any material facts or circumstances – beyond the selection as Designated Underwriters' Counsel by the issuer and what that ordinarily entails – that might bear on the lawyer's ability to exercise independent professional judgment on behalf of the client (the underwriter) or otherwise interfere with the lawyer's ability to adequately represent the client.[105] As an extreme example, such circumstances might include that a substantial percentage of the law firm's work consists of acting as Designated Underwriters' Counsel for the particular issuer whose securities the investment bank will be underwriting, or that the responsible partner is the brother of the issuer's chief financial officer or of the elected official responsible for the designation (in the case of municipal securities).

9. The Code also specifically cautions against the third party unduly interfering with the lawyer's representation of its client. Thus, the third party may not "impose conditions that would lead to inadequate representation or constrain the lawyer's independent professional judgment on behalf of the client."[106]

10. Where the law firm performs work for the issuer. Outside counsel to an organization or municipality obviously owes duties to the client, including the duties of zealous representation and loyalty. Where a law firm that represents an issuer is selected to serve as Designated Underwriters' Counsel, there is a potential for conflict.

11. The Code defines "differing interest" to mean "every interest of a client that will adversely affect either the judgment or the loyalty of a lawyer to a client, whether it be a conflicting, inconsistent, diverse, or other interest." Because the interests of an issuer and its underwriters may differ during the course of an offering (e.g., on what disclosures are necessary), it is possible that a law firm that currently represents both the underwriters and the issuer will be subject to "differing interests" that would preclude accepting the assignment as Designated Underwriters' Counsel or require withdrawing from it.[107]

12. In certain circumstances, however, conflicts can be waived by the clients: a lawyer can represent multiple clients with differing interests if a disinterested lawyer would believe that the lawyer can competently represent the interest of each client, and if each consents to the representation after full disclosure of the implications of the simultaneous representation and the advantages and risks involved.[108] That analysis is fact intensive.[109] For example, if all or substantially all of the lawyer's

105 See, e.g., DR 5-101(A) (absent informed consent, lawyer may not accept employment "if the exercise of professional judgment on behalf of the client will be or reasonably may be affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property, or personal interests"); DR 5-105(A) (same if independent professional judgment will be or is likely to be adversely affected by other client relationships).

109 See Iowa Opinion 2006-03 (law firm may, with consent, represent issuer in a bond offering where it has represented, or does represent, the underwriter in unrelated matters); N.Y. income was derived from representing the issuer, a disinterested lawyer would likely conclude that the lawyer could not competently represent the interests of the underwriters in connection with an offering.[110] Another example would be if a law firm were asked to represent both the issuer and the underwriters in connection with the offering itself. This is ethically permissible in certain situations, but before undertaking the representation the firm would need to obtain informed consent from each client, and to take precautions in the event that disputes among the clients arose (such as having other counsel, for example, in-house counsel, handle those aspects of the matters).[111]

13. Where consent is available, the lawyer or law firm should, in framing the appropriate disclosure, consider the amount of work done for the issuer, the importance of that work to the law firm (financially or otherwise), and any other connections between the law firm and the issuer. For example, litigators at the law firm acting as the Designated Underwriters' Counsel may be representing the issuer in a lawsuit that will be the subject of due diligence (and, possibly, the subject of disclosure in the offering documents). In considering whether to seek consent of the issuer and underwriter in this situation, consideration should be given to whether the litigators may be called upon to reveal information to the corporate lawyers performing due diligence, and if so on what terms. The lawyer may wish to consider whether it is appropriate to advise the issuer to waive confidentiality vis-à-vis the underwriters and the effect on the privilege of doing so, or instead, for example, to set up firewalls to "screen" off the two sets of lawyers. All of this will require the informed consent of the clients, which consent will be effective only if the disinterested-lawyer test of DR 5-105 is met.

CONCLUSION:

14. A law firm selected to serve as Designated Underwriters' Counsel by a company must carefully consider its relationship with the company selecting it, and assess whether a disinterested lawyer would conclude that the law firm can competently represent the interests of the underwriters in light of its relationship with the company, and if so, ensure that the underwriters appropriately consent to its representation of them.

---

110 This example is meant only for illustrative purposes and not to define an outer boundary. Specific facts and circumstances will dictate when the relationship between the lawyer, or law firm, and the issuer is such that the disinterested lawyer test would not be met.

OPINION 819 (12/18/2007)

TOPIC: Settlement of fee arrangements and improper fee splitting.

DIGEST: A lawyer may agree with a client to accept less than the judicially-determined fee in a domestic relations matter, as long as doing so is not inconsistent with any statements the lawyer has made to a tribunal or any such inconsistent statements are corrected.

CODE: DR 1-102(A)(4), DR 2-106(C)(2), DR 3-102(A), DR 7-102(A)(5), DR 9-102 (C)(4).

QUESTION:

1. After a court awards legal fees to a lawyer pursuant to section 237 of the Domestic Relations Law, none of which the other party has yet to pay to the lawyer, may the lawyer, as part of a settlement with the lawyer's own client, agree with the lawyer's client to accept less than the full award of legal fees and, in the event the responsible party later pays any part of the award, to reimburse the client for amounts collected from the responsible party up to the amount of the agreed settlement?

BACKGROUND:

2. A lawyer enters into a fee agreement with a client for the provision of legal services relating to the New York Domestic Relations Law. The fee agreement provides for the client to pay an initial retainer to be credited against total hourly charges. At the conclusion of the matter, the court awards the lawyer an amount equal to the lawyer's total hourly charges pursuant to section 237 of the Domestic Relations Law, which the adverse party is obliged to pay to the lawyer. The adverse party does not pay.

3. To settle the debt created by the fee agreement between the lawyer and the client, the lawyer agrees to accept, in full satisfaction of the amounts owing by the client, an immediate payment equaling the initial retainer plus an additional amount that is less than the lawyer's total time charges (and hence less than the judicial award). In return, the client seeks the lawyer's agreement that, if the adverse party pays the lawyer any amount up to the settlement amount, then the lawyer will remit such sums to the client to make the client whole. The lawyer is concerned whether the reimbursement of such amounts would constitute an illicit fee-sharing arrangement with a non-lawyer.

OPINION:

4. In our view, no such concern is warranted. We assume for our purpose that the arrangement with the client comports with DR 2-106(C)(2), which governs fee agreements in domestic relations matters, as well as Part 1400 of the Rules of the Appellate Divisions, entitled "Procedure for Attorneys in Domestic Relations Matters." Because our charter is limited to addressing matters of ethics and not questions of law, nothing here is meant to be a legal opinion on the meaning of section 237 of the Domestic Relations Law. Subject to the foregoing, and to the caveat below, we do not believe that the proposed settlement is an unethical fee-sharing compact.

5. Section 237 of the Domestic Relations Law authorizes a court, in circumstances set forth there, to order a party to a matrimonial action to pay counsel fees "directly to the attorney of the other spouse to enable that spouse to carry on or defend the action or proceeding as, in the court's discretion, justice requires." The purpose of the statute is to "redress the economic disparity between the monied spouse and the non-monied spouse" by investing the court with the discretion "to make the more affluent spouse pay for the legal expenses of the needier one."[112] Although the statute provides for the payment to be made directly to the attorney, courts may direct the payment to be made to the party if that party has already advanced funds to his or her counsel.[113]

6. When a court awards a fee under section 237, the amounts that may be paid by the responsible party are to replace those that may have been paid by the client, but the award does not release the client from liability from the full amount of any fee agreement if the responsible party does not pay. Thus a court is not permitted, in granting an award under that section, to preclude the lawyer "from seeking to recover payment of the full amount of the attorneys' fees in [a] separate action based on the retainer agreement entered into by" the lawyer and client.[114] Likewise, a court may direct a lawyer, and the lawyer would be required in the absence of an overriding contractual arrangement, to refund to the client any amounts previously paid to the lawyer by the client that the lawyer receives from the adverse party in satisfaction of a section 237 award.[115] The settlement proposed here is consistent with the fee award: the client will end up paying an agreed amount in fees, but only to the extent the responsible party fails to pay the awarded amount.

7. We conclude that the proposed settlement does not violate any Disciplinary Rule, and in particular DR 3-102(A). "The purpose of the rule against fee sharing is to remove any incentive for nonlawyers to engage in undesirable behavior such as (1) interfering with a lawyer's professional judgment in handling a legal matter, (2) using dishonest or illegal methods . . . in order to win a case . . . , or (3) encouraging or pressuring a lawyer to use such improper methods."[116] Such perils typically arise from the sharing of fees with non-client third parties.[117] None of these concerns exists in the allocation of fees between a lawyer and a client, and certainly not in the context of a fee-shifting statute that is designed to ensure that the client is made whole for fee amounts the client may have paid.

8. We caution that the arrangement with the client must be consistent with any statements or submissions made to the court in connection with the application for an award of counsel fees. A lawyer may not engage in conduct involving fraud or dishonesty,[118] and shall not make any knowingly false statement of law or fact in the course of representing a client.[119] It is essential that the lawyer comply with any representation made to the court concerning the use of the funds awarded, or amend any such statement if needed.

CONCLUSION:

9. Subject always to a lawyer's obligation to avoid false or misleading statements to a tribunal, a lawyer may settle a fee agreement with a client by accepting less than the judicially-determined fee in a domestic relations matter and agreeing to reimburse the client for amounts the lawyer later receives pursuant to a fee award up to the amount of the agreed-upon settlement.

OPINION 820 (02/08/2008)

TOPIC: Use of e-mail service provider that scans e-mails for advertising purposes.

DIGEST: A lawyer may use an e-mail service provider that conducts computer scans of e-mails to generate computer advertising, where the e-mails are not reviewed by or provided to human beings other than the sender and recipient.

CODE: DR 4-101; EC 4-3.

QUESTION:

May a lawyer use an e-mail service provider that scans e-mails by computer for keywords and then sends or displays instantaneously (to the side of the e-mails in question) computer-generated advertisements to users of the service based on the e-mail communications?

OPINION:

Our starting point is N.Y. State 709 (1998), which addressed the use of Internet e-mail. We concluded based on developing experience that there is a reasonable expectation that e-mails will be as private as other forms of telecommunication and that therefore, under DR 4-101,[1] a lawyer ordinarily may utilize unencrypted e-mail to transmit confidential information. We also noted, however, that a lawyer may not transmit client confidences by e-mail where there is a heightened risk of interception, and that "[a] lawyer who uses Internet e-mail must also stay abreast of this evolving technology to assess any changes in the likelihood of interception as well as the availability of improved technologies that may reduce such risks at reasonable cost."[2]

In recent years, some e-mail providers have offered free or low-cost e-mail services in which, in exchange for providing the user with e-mail services – sending and receiving e-mail and providing storage on the provider's servers – the provider's computers scan e-mails and send or display targeted advertising to the user of the service. The e-mail provider identifies the presumed interests of the service's user by scanning for keywords in e-mails opened by the user. The provider's computers then send advertising that reflects the keywords in the e-mail. As an example, an e-mail that referred to travel to a particular locale might be accompanied by an advertisement for travel service providers in that locale.

Under the particular e-mail provider's published privacy policies, no individuals other than e-mail senders and recipients read the e-mail messages, are otherwise privy to their content or receive targeted advertisements from the service provider. Consequently, when the e-mail service provider sends or generates instantaneous computer-generated advertising based on computer scans of the lawyer's e-mails with clients, the risks posed to client confidentiality are not meaningfully different from the risks in using other e-mail service providers that do not employ this practice. We conclude, therefore, that the obligation to preserve client confidentiality does not preclude using such a service.[3]

1 Under DR 4-101 of the New York Lawyer's Code of Professional Responsibility, lawyers are required to preserve the confidences and secrets of their clients, subject to certain exceptions, and to exercise reasonable care to prevent their employees, associates and others whose services they utilize from disclosing such confidences and secrets.

We would reach the opposite conclusion if the e-mails were reviewed by human beings or if the service provider reserved the right to disclose the e-mails or the substance of the communications to third parties without the sender's permission (or a lawful judicial order). Merely scanning the content of e-mails by computer to generate computer advertising, however, does not pose a threat to client confidentiality, because the practice does not increase the risk of others obtaining knowledge of the e-mails or access to the e-mails' content. A lawyer must exercise due care in selecting an e-mail service provider to ensure that its policies and stated practices protect client confidentiality.[4] Unless the lawyer learns information suggesting that the provider is materially departing from conventional privacy policies or is using the information it obtains by computer-scanning of e-mails for a purpose that, unlike computer-generated advertising, puts confidentiality at risk, the use of such e-mail services comports with DR 4-101.

CONCLUSION:

A lawyer may use an e-mail service provider that conducts computer scans of e-mails to generate computer advertising, where the e-mails are not reviewed by or provided to other individuals.

3 DR 4-101(B)(3) of the New York Code provides that a lawyer may not "knowingly . . . [u]se a confidence or secret of a client for the advantage of the lawyer or of a third person, unless the client consents after full disclosure." It might be argued that, under the literal text of this provision, using such an e-mail provider would constitute improper "use" of a client's confidences or secrets for the benefit of a third party – namely, the e-mail service provider that sells the advertising. We do not believe that the incidental "use" here, or the benefits derived therefrom, are within the contemplation of the rule anymore than the profits earned by other providers of services to lawyers, such as litigation support companies, which handle or are exposed to client confidences. See EC 4-3 (quoted below). We note as well that the advertisements go only to e-mail recipients who are themselves users of the e-mail service provider and presumably chose to receive the advertising. The use therefore also does not "disadvantage" clients within the meaning of DR 4-101(B)(2) by subjecting them to "junk mail" that the clients have not elected to receive.

4 Cf. EC 4-3 ("Unless the client otherwise directs, it is not improper for a lawyer to give limited information to an outside agency necessary for statistical, bookkeeping, accounting, data processing, banking, printing, or other legitimate purposes, provided the lawyer exercises due care in the selection of the agency and warns the agency that the information must be kept confidential.").

TOPIC: Threat by prosecutor of criminal prosecution to aid enforcement of civil claim.

DIGEST: A prosecutor who suggests a civil resolution in lieu of a criminal prosecution must have probable cause to support the criminal charge.

CODE: DR 7-102(A)(1), (2); DR 7-103(A); DR 7-105(A); EC 7-13; EC 7-21.

QUESTION:

1. May a prosecutor, in aid of civil efforts to recoup alleged overpayments of welfare benefits, communicate to an alleged recipient of such an overpayment that the prosecutor will defer criminal prosecution to allow time for civil resolution but will be required to consider prosecution further if there is no satisfactory civil resolution?

OPINION:

2. An assistant district attorney ("ADA") assigned to the welfare fraud bureau in the district attorney's office in which the ADA serves has been asked by the Department of Social Services ("DSS") in the county to send a letter, drafted by DSS, to persons suspected of having received welfare benefits for which they were not eligible. The letter would state that the District Attorney's office has received a report "prepared by the Investigative/Fraud Unit" that the recipient had received welfare benefits for which the recipient was not eligible. The letter would further state that the District Attorney's office "has accepted this case for proposed review for criminal prosecution," but suggests "as an alternative to prosecution," that the recipient contact a DSS fraud investigator to work out a civil resolution of the claim. The letter invites the recipient to discuss with the DSS investigator any concerns the recipient may have that the complaint is in error or unfounded but goes on to state: "Should this procedure be followed [administrative resolution of the complaint as a civil matter], my office intends to defer any possible prosecution. However, unless the situation, which led to the filing of this complaint, is satisfactorily resolved, I will be required to review this matter again to determine if prosecution is then warranted."

3. The proposed letter, which can be readily characterized as a "we won't prosecute if you pay up" letter, will likely have a coercive effect on its recipient. As such, the letter may be seen to implicate DR 7-105(A), which states, "A lawyer shall not present, participate in presenting, or threaten to present criminal charges solely to obtain an advantage in a civil matter," and EC 7-21, which cautions against using "the criminal process to coerce adjustment of private civil claims."[5]

4. In carrying out his or her special responsibilities as a public prosecutor, a prosecutor needs to be quite careful in suggesting civil resolution as a means of avoiding criminal prosecution. In the Committee's view, the letter proposed here does not fulfill those special responsibilities. In coming to that conclusion, however, we need not and do not reach the applicability of EC 7-21 or of DR 7-105(A). Rather, we look to DR 7-102(A)(1) and (2) and DR 7-103(A).

5 Cf. Cowles v. Brownell, 73 N.Y.2d 382, 388, 389, 538 N.E.2d 325, 328, 329, 540 N.Y.S.2d 973, 976, 977 (1989) (Titone, J., concurring in the result) (agreements in which criminal charges are dismissed in exchange for a release from civil liability "offend public policy" because, among other reasons, they "encourage prosecutors to violate" DR 7-105 and EC 7-21).

5. DR 7-102(A)(1) and (2) enjoin all lawyers not to assert or "advance," inter alia, an unwarranted position or claim. Under DR 7-103(A), public prosecutors, in particular, are barred from instituting criminal charges that are not supported by probable cause. EC 7-13 explains: "The responsibility of a public prosecutor . . . is to seek justice, not merely to convict." If there is no probable cause or a case is unprovable, a prosecutor must refrain from instituting charges or, once having done so, must drop the charges and do so without exacting any price.[6] Thus, before making a charge of unlawful conduct against anyone, and throughout the maintenance of that charge, a public prosecutor has a responsibility to investigate the facts and circumstances and to confirm that there is and continues to be probable cause to believe that the target of that charge is guilty and that the charge is provable.

6. Even though the proposed letter states only that the District Attorney's office may "review" the case for criminal prosecution, and invites the recipient to discuss why the complaint is in error or unfounded, we believe that the clear import of the letter is that the ADA who signs it believes that the recipient has committed a crime ("it appears from the report [of the Investigative/Fraud Unit] that you received benefits . . . you were not eligible to receive") and that the recipient will be prosecuted if he or she doesn't pay.

7. In N.Y. State 770, we opined that it would be "clearly not ethical" for a prosecutor to reach an agreement not to bring charges on condition that the person who would be charged make a donation to a non-profit organization, "unless there is probable cause that the person committed an offense."[7] We conclude that the same is true here, where the proposed letter would seek to extract a settlement of a claimed civil liability to DSS.

8. As the Court of Appeals said in Cowles v. Brownell, "The prosecutor's obligation is to represent the people and to that end, to exercise independent judgment in deciding to prosecute or refrain from prosecution."[8] If the District Attorney or an ADA has investigated a matter sufficiently to have formed an opinion that there is probable cause, he or she would be, as a general matter, ethically free to seek lawful dispositions other than prosecution to judgment. In that event, the ADA could, for example, write a letter such as the one at issue here calling upon the recipient to pay, or to explain why he or she should not be required to pay, to avoid the commencement of a formal prosecution.

9. Needless to say, if upon investigation the prosecutor is not able to form an opinion that there is probable cause, he or she would be ethically bound not to prosecute and not to seek a quid pro quo for abstaining from doing so. A fortiori, if a prosecutor has not conducted an investigation sufficient to support an opinion one way or the other, that prosecutor would not be ethically free to charge the would-be recipient with any unlawful conduct or to propose a disposition alternative to prosecution as in the proposed letter.

CONCLUSION:

OPINION 822 (06/27/2008)

TOPIC: Lawyer's duty to report violation of disciplinary rule

CLARIFIES: N.Y. State 531

DIGEST: A lawyer who satisfies the prerequisites to trigger mandatory reporting of a Disciplinary Rule by another lawyer must report such conduct to an appropriate authority, such as a tribunal (in a litigated matter) or to the appropriate Grievance Committee. Filing a report with a lawyer assistance program is not sufficient.

CODE: DR 1-102(A), 1-103(A); EC 1-4

QUESTION:

1. If a lawyer has an obligation to report a violation of a Disciplinary Rule by another lawyer, to whom must the lawyer report? Does filing a report with a lawyer assistance program satisfy the reporting requirement?

OPINION:

2. In certain circumstances a lawyer is required by the Code of Professional Responsibility to report a violation of a Disciplinary Rule to the appropriate authority. DR 1-103(A) provides:

> A lawyer possessing knowledge, (1) not protected as a confidence or secret, or (2) not gained in the lawyer's capacity as a member of a bona fide lawyer assistance or similar program or committee, of a violation of DR 1-102 that raises a substantial question as to another lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness as a lawyer shall report such knowledge to a tribunal or other authority empowered to investigate or act upon such violation.

DR 1-102(A) provides:

> A lawyer or law firm shall not: (1) Violate a disciplinary rule. (2) Circumvent a Disciplinary Rule through the actions of another. (3) Engage in illegal conduct that adversely reflects on the lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness as a lawyer. (4) Engage in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit, or misrepresentation. (5) Engage in conduct that is prejudicial to the administration of justice. (6) Unlawfully discriminate in the practice of law . . . .

3. The New York State Bar Association has a Lawyer Assistance Program (LAP) to deal with issues of alcohol abuse, substance abuse, and related mental health issues. There are also 17 similar committees formed by local bar associations. According to its statement of purpose, the NYSBA LAP provides education and confidential assistance to lawyers, judges, law school students, and immediate family members who are affected by the problems of substance abuse, stress, or depression. Its goal is to assist in the prevention and early identification of problems that can affect professional conduct and quality of life and to assist in arranging appropriate intervention where such problems are identified.

The services provided by the NYSBA LAP, for example, include early identification of impairment; motivating impaired attorneys to seek help; assessing and evaluating the problem and developing an appropriate treatment plan; providing information on training programs on alcoholism, drug abuse and stress management; and referring impaired attorneys to community resources, self-help groups, outpatient counseling, or detoxification and rehabilitation services.[9] Lawyers who serve on committees or programs have no obligation to report a violation of DR 1-102.[10]

4. This opinion deals with the obligations of lawyers who do not serve on such committees. In N.Y. State 635 (1992) we discussed the four prerequisites that must be met before a lawyer has a reporting obligation under DR 1-103(A). They are:

> (1) The lawyer must possess a sufficient degree of knowledge of ostensibly wrongful conduct; a mere suspicion of misconduct is not sufficient.
> (2) Any knowledge included in the lawyer's report must not be protected as a confidence or secret.
> (3) The conduct in question must violate a Disciplinary Rule.
> (4) The violation must raise a substantial question as to the lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness.

For purposes of this opinion we assume that a lawyer has satisfied all four tests; that is, the lawyer has a sufficient degree of knowledge of a violation of a Disciplinary Rule by another lawyer that raises a question about the other lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness and that knowledge is neither a confidence or secret. Thus, the lawyer has a mandatory reporting obligation under DR 1-103(A). The question this opinion addresses is to whom the lawyer must report.

5. DR 1-103(A) requires a lawyer to report the knowledge of a violation "to a tribunal or other authority empowered to investigate or act upon such violation." The inquirer asks whether reporting to an LAP would satisfy that obligation. In our opinion, while lawyers are to be encouraged to refer to an LAP lawyers who are abusing alcohol or other substances or who face mental health issues, such a referral would not satisfy the ethical reporting requirement.[11]

6. DR 1-103 requires reporting to a tribunal or other authority empowered to investigate or act upon such violation. Although the Code does not further specify to whom reporting is required, the phrase "investigate or act" suggests that the "authority" must be a court of competent jurisdiction or a body having enforceable subpoena powers. Thus, a violation in the course of litigation could be reported to the tribunal before which the action is pending. In both a litigation and a non-litigation context, the report could be filed with a grievance or disciplinary committee operating under the powers granted to them by the Appellate Division of the State Supreme Court pursuant to Section 90 of the Judiciary Law and court rules.[12] The report could be filed with the grievance committee in the Appellate Department in which litigation is pending or with the grievance committee in the Department where the lawyer is admitted or where the prohibited conduct occurred.

10 DR 1-103(A); see also Judiciary Law § 499 (treating the confidential information provided to lawyers on such committees as privileged).

11 We note that lawyers may refer other lawyers to an LAP in situations where the alcohol or substance abuse or mental health issue has not resulted in any violation of a Disciplinary Rule. A lawyer in such a situation may not be so impaired that the lawyer's representation of clients is affected. For example, the lawyer may suffer from stress and depression and need assistance but still be able to perform legal work competently. See generally ABA Formal Op. 03-429 (obligations with respect to mentally impaired lawyer within a law firm); ABA Formal Op. 03-431 (lawyer's duty to report rule violations by another lawyer who may suffer from disability or impairment).

7. The report need not be made immediately or without some reasonable effort at remediation, particularly where the consequences of reporting the violation may be more harmful to the lawyer's client than some alternative course of action.[13] Once a report has been made to an appropriate authority, notwithstanding the existence of other authorities to which the report could have been made, the reporting lawyer's obligation under the Code will be deemed satisfied.[14]

8. In N.Y. State 531 (1981), the Committee, in holding that members of an LAP may ethically refrain from reporting professional misconduct, noted that the LAP "committee of the bar stands in a position analogous to that of 'a tribunal or other authority empowered to investigate or act.'" In this opinion we clarify that an LAP is not an appropriate authority to which misconduct can be reported. In contrast to a tribunal or grievance committee, an LAP has no formal powers. LAP services are voluntary. Although an LAP may seek to assist a lawyer in need of assistance, the lawyer does not need to respond and may refuse the assistance of the LAP. Furthermore, without the assistance of the affected lawyer, the LAP has no power to investigate whether the impairment has resulted in a violation of a Disciplinary Rule.

9. The purpose of the reporting requirement is to assist courts, disciplinary agencies and other authorities in policing members of the bar.[15] The focus of an LAP is on assisting in the lawyer's recovery process, not on any code violations that may have resulted from the lawyer's impairment. Disciplining a lawyer for a Code violation may be at odds with the recovery process. The fact that a lawyer's impairment has resulted in a violation of the profession's disciplinary rules may be a lever to convince the lawyer that he or she needs help. The process of obtaining that help, however, will not satisfy the profession's obligation to regulate itself.

12 See, e.g., Nassau County 98-12 (if reporting is required, lawyer can report to the court or to the grievance committee); N.Y. City 1995-5 (misconduct should be reported to the appropriate disciplinary or grievance committee). Cf. People v. Romero, 91 N.Y.2d 750, 698 N.E.2d 424, 675 N.Y.S.2d 588 (1998) (holding that N.Y. Jud. Law § 476-a(1) authorized the attorney general to bring a civil action for unauthorized practice of law).

13 See, e.g., U.S. v. Cantor, 897 F. Supp. 110 (S.D.N.Y. 1995) ("DR 1-103 must be read to require reporting . . . within a reasonable time under the circumstances"); N.Y. City 1990-3 ("While it may be permissible in certain limited circumstances to postpone reporting for a brief period of time, we reiterate our caution . . . that 'once a lawyer decides that he or she must disclose under DR 1-103(A), any substantial delay in reporting would be improper.'"); N.Y. City 81-40. Cf. U.S. v. Turkish, 470 F. Supp. 903, 909 n.7 (S.D.N.Y. 1978) (prosecutor who believes defense counsel's representation of multiple clients is a conflict problem could "in most instances" satisfy DR 1-103(A) by raising the problem directly with the attorney, and then, if necessary, the clients themselves).

14 See Nassau County 88–10 ("The code requires that the matter be brought to the attention of the grievance committee, but does not require that it also be reported to the district attorney or other appropriate prosecuting agency having jurisdiction of such matters").

15 EC 1-4 ("The integrity of the profession can be maintained only if conduct of lawyers in violation of the Disciplinary Rules is brought to the attention of the proper officials"); see also Restatement Third, The Law Governing Lawyers § 5 cmt i (collecting authorities regarding the reporting obligation); Matter of Wieder, 80 N.Y.2d 628, 636, 609 N.E.2d 105, 108, 593 N.Y.S.2d 752, 755 (1992) (noting that the legal profession relies upon lawyers to report appropriate cases to protect the public and the integrity of the Bar).

CONCLUSION:

10. A lawyer who is required under DR 1-103(A) to report knowledge of misconduct "that raises a substantial question as to another lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness as a lawyer" may report that knowledge to those agencies described above. Reporting the lawyer's conduct to a lawyer assistance program, while salutary, does not satisfy the lawyer's ethical reporting requirement.

OPINION 823 (06/30/2008)

TOPIC: Joint representation; conflict of interest; withdrawal

DIGEST: A lawyer cannot continue to represent joint clients in litigation if their strategies significantly diverge. The lawyer can continue to represent one of the joint clients in the litigation if the former client provides informed consent to the future representation and the lawyer can represent the current client zealously and competently. The lawyer is required to comply with the court's procedures for withdrawal.

CODE: DR 2-110(A)(1), (2); 4-101(C); 5-105(A), (B), (C); 5-108(A); EC 7-8, 7-9.

QUESTIONS:

1. May a law firm continue to represent joint clients whose strategies significantly diverge in litigation?

2. May a law firm continue to represent one of the joint clients in the litigation after the conflict arises and, if so, under what circumstances?

OPINION:

3. A law firm represents "X" and "Y" in litigation. Prior to the firm's representation of these two clients, they were co-owners of a business, which they then sold. The purchasers sued X and Y. At the outset of the litigation, the interests of X and Y were identical. X and Y interposed a counterclaim against the purchasers.

4. For unknown reasons, the plaintiff purchasers have not vigorously pursued the litigation. X desires to pursue the counterclaim aggressively. Y, however, has directed the lawyer to do nothing and let things remain quiescent.

5. A lawyer may represent multiple clients in the same or related matters unless (i) the exercise of independent professional judgment on behalf of one client will be or is likely to be adversely affected by the lawyer's representation of another client, or (ii) the multiple representation would likely involve the lawyer in representing differing interests.[16] In cases where multiple representation would give rise to an adverse effect on independent professional judgment or representation of differing interests, a lawyer may undertake or continue the multiple representation if a disinterested lawyer would believe that the lawyer can competently represent the interest of each and if each consents to the representation after full disclosure of the implications of the simultaneous representation and the advantages and risks involved.[17]

6. We addressed the representation of joint clients prior to contemplated litigation in N.Y. State 787 (2005). There, the inquiring lawyer was retained to represent a woman on her personal injury claim and her spouse on a derivative loss-of-services claim. The husband subsequently abandoned the wife, and she obtained a divorce. The lawyer and the wife lost contact with the client/former husband. Prior to commencement of personal injury litigation on behalf of the husband and wife, a settlement offer was made to the wife, who wanted to accept it.

16 DR 5-105(A), (B).

7. We observed that if assisting the wife to procure the settlement would prejudice the husband's derivative claim, the lawyer was required to withdraw from both representations:

> Continuing to represent both parties would involve a simultaneous representation of "differing interests." Specifically, the lawyer would be forced to choose between settling the wife's claim and thus barring the husband from pursuing his loss of consortium claim, or advising the wife to reject the settlement offer that she wishes to accept in order to preserve the husband's claim. In this situation the lawyer could proceed only with the husband's informed consent, which would require explaining to the husband the risk that the loss of consortium claim may be compromised.

The consent required under DR 5-105(C) could not be obtained from the husband, who could not be located.

8. Not every disagreement regarding the course to be charted in litigation rises to the level of differing interests. EC 7-7 provides, "In certain areas of legal representation not affecting the merits of the cause or substantially prejudicing the rights of the client, a lawyer is entitled to make decisions."[18] EC 7-8 states that, in areas in which the client is to make the decision, the lawyer should "exert best efforts to ensure that decisions of the client are made only after the client has been informed of relevant considerations." But where joint clients, having received appropriate advice, determine to pursue diametrically opposed strategies, either of which is consistent with law and the lawyer's ethical responsibilities, a conflict of interest exists. In the circumstances of this inquiry, moreover, the conflict is not consentable, because the firm cannot simultaneously pursue both clients' objectives – a disinterested lawyer could not conclude that the lawyer could competently represent the interests of each client. Therefore, the firm cannot continue to represent both clients in the matter.

9. Whether the firm can continue to represent either X or Y in the litigation is governed largely by DR 5-108(A), which provides:

> A lawyer who has represented a client in a matter shall not, without the consent of the former client after full disclosure: (1) Thereafter represent another person in the same or a substantially related matter in which that person's interests are materially adverse to the interests of the former client. (2) Use any confidences or secrets of the former client except as permitted by section DR 4-101(C), or when the confidence or secret has become generally known.

10. Here, the firm's continued representation of X in this matter, who wishes to pursue the counterclaim aggressively, could be materially adverse to the interests of Y, who prefers that nothing be done, apparently in an effort not to arouse sleeping dogs. Similarly, the firm's continued representation of Y may be materially adverse to X, if achieving Y's goal (no action) would be expected to require the lawyer to take action inconsistent with X's goal of vigorous prosecution of the counterclaim. In either case, unless the clients validly consented in advance to continuing representation of one of them in the event of a conflict emerging, the firm needs to obtain the informed consent of the former client after full disclosure. Insofar as necessary to avoid misunderstanding, the firm should explain that the former client is under no obligation to consent to allow the firm to represent the other client and "that no negative consequences will attend [a] denial of consent."[19]

11. Likewise, while there generally are no confidences between co-clients,[20] to the extent that the lawyer has acquired, under an understanding of confidentiality, information not known to the proposed continuing client, "[t]he former client must also be informed that she has the right to insist that all of her confidences and secrets or specific confidences and secrets be held inviolate."[21] In that circumstance, the firm must also consider whether it can competently represent the interest of the continuing client while keeping the former client's confidence. Any restriction placed on the firm by the former client to preserve certain information protected as a confidence or secret may present a compromising influence that may prevent the firm from representing the current client competently and zealously.[22]

12. In withdrawing from representing X and/or Y, the firm must comply with the court's procedures pertaining to withdrawal.[23] In seeking to withdraw, the firm must take steps "to the extent reasonably practicable to avoid foreseeable prejudice to the rights of the client[s], including giving due notice to the client[s], allowing time for employment of other counsel, delivering to the client[s] all papers and property to which the client[s are] entitled and complying with applicable laws and rules."[24]

CONCLUSION:

13. A lawyer cannot continue to represent joint clients in litigation if their strategies significantly diverge. OPINION 824 (07/02/2008)

TOPIC: Conflicts of interest – lawyer's own interest; providing legal services without compensation

DIGEST: An attorney may, without compensation, provide a service of monitoring or reviewing a client's investments to identify any potential claims, even though the attorney may later be considered to handle, with compensation, any resulting litigation.

CODE: DR 1-106; 2-103; 5-101.

QUESTION:

1. May an attorney, at the request of a client, review the client's investment portfolio in order to identify any potential securities fraud claims that the client might have in connection with its investments, without charging the client a fee for this service?

FACTS:

2. A law firm regularly represents plaintiffs in the field of securities fraud litigation. As part of its practice, the firm monitors the investment portfolios of existing institutional, pension fund clients. The service involves the client retaining a law firm to monitor the client's investments. The lawyer agrees to notify the client when the lawyer identifies a potential securities fraud claim that, in the opinion of the lawyer, might be pursued by the client. Once notified, the client is free to take no action, hire another lawyer to represent it in connection with the claim, or hire the monitoring lawyer to handle the matter. The monitoring lawyer does not charge any fee to the client for the monitoring service. Should the client select the monitoring firm to represent it, the subsequent litigation is handled pursuant to a separate retainer agreement entered into between the client and the lawyer after the client has made the decision to pursue the matter.

OPINION:

3. There is nothing in the Lawyers' Code of Professional Responsibility prohibiting an attorney from providing legal services without compensation. The fact that the reviewing attorney would be considered to handle any resulting litigation does not change that conclusion. We note that the arrangement to provide a monitoring service creates an attorney-client relationship, with all rights, responsibilities and obligations that apply whenever an attorney-client relationship is established. Among those responsibilities and obligations under the Disciplinary Rules are those pertaining to conflicts of interest and confidences of clients.

4. DR 5-101 provides that "[a] lawyer shall not accept or continue employment if the exercise of professional judgment on behalf of the client will be or reasonably may be affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property, or personal interests." We do not believe that a lawyer's interest in being hired to pursue any potential securities fraud claim he or she may uncover creates a conflict under this clause. It is inherent in the attorney-client relationship that a lawyer may benefit from a recommendation that legal services are needed with respect to a particular problem.

5. Because the described monitoring services are legal services involving the professional judgment of a lawyer, the provisions of DR 1-106, relating to the provision of legal and non-legal services by a lawyer or law firm, are not relevant to the inquiry. We note that, while it would be prudent to prepare an engagement letter or retainer agreement with respect to the free monitoring service, none is required by the New York engagement letter rules, because the monitoring lawyer is not expected to charge $3,000 or more for the service.[25] The practitioner considering undertaking such an arrangement must, however, assure compliance with the rules prohibiting solicitation.[26] This opinion does not address issues of substantive law.

CONCLUSION:

6. A lawyer may accept retention by a client, without compensation, to review the client's investment portfolio in order to identify any potential securities fraud claims that the client may have, under the circumstances described above, even though the client may retain the lawyer, on a paying basis, to handle any resulting litigation.

26 DR 2-103.

TOPIC: Third-party payors; clients referred by, and legal services paid for by, employee assistance program.

DIGEST: There is no ethical bar to lawyer providing legal services by telephone to client referred to the lawyer, and paid for by, an employee assistance program, nor to accepting ancillary private retention by such clients.

CODE: DR 2-103(A), (D), (F)(4); 4-101; 5-101; 5-103; 5-105; 5-105(E); 5-107(A), (B); 5-108; 5-108(A)(2); 6-101. EC 2-34, 8-3.

QUESTIONS:

1. May a lawyer ethically provide legal services via telephone consultation with clients referred by an Employee Assistance Program that pays the lawyer for those services?

2. May the lawyer ethically accept private retention from such employees when their matters cannot be resolved via telephone, and additional legal work not covered by the EAP is required?

OPINION:

3. The evolution of programs intended to make relatively inexpensive legal services available to underserved populations has long been encouraged by the bar.[27] Employee Assistance Programs (EAPs) are employee benefit programs offered by some employers, often in conjunction with a health insurance plan. EAPs are intended to help employees deal with personal problems that might adversely impact their work performance or health. Some EAPs include free or reduced-price legal services offered by one or more lawyers or law firms with which the EAP contracts for this purpose. While employees may be referred to an EAP provider by the employer's human resources department, the employer generally does not otherwise know who is using the program unless there are extenuating circumstances and the proper release forms have been signed.

4. The primary ethical question is one of third-party referral and payment, and provided the Code is in all other respects fully honored, we believe that the proposed arrangement is ethically permissible. A number of the most salient considerations are outlined below.

5. First, while third-party payment for legal services is common, the lawyer receiving such payment must comply with DR 5-107(A) and (B), by making full disclosure to the client and obtaining the client's consent to the arrangement, and ensuring that the employer-payor does not direct or regulate the lawyer's professional judgment or compromise the lawyer's duty to maintain confidences.[28]

27 See EC 2-34 and EC 8-3, encouraging lawyers to provide services to persons of limited means.

28 Cf. N.Y. State 721 (1999) (lawyer may agree to insurance company's requirement that lawyer use a legal research service as long as, inter alia, this does not lead to inadequate representation or constrain the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client).

6. Second, to the extent the lawyer offers anything of value in exchange for the referral of EAP clients to the lawyer, DR 2-103(F) may be applicable. DR 2-103(F)(4) sets forth the circumstances under which a lawyer may "be recommended, employed or paid by, or may cooperate with," a "bona fide organization which recommends, furnishes or pays for legal services to its members or beneficiaries." As long as the EAP has procedures to provide appropriate relief for employees who assert that representation by counsel furnished by the EAP would be "unethical, improper or inadequate under the circumstances of the matter involved," most EAPs will meet those requirements.[29]

7. Third, the fact that these clients are served by telephone consultations does not limit the lawyer's obligations with respect to conflicts of interest. All of the duties imposed by DR 5-101 (personal interests), DR 5-105 (concurrent representation), DR 5-108 (former client conflicts), and DR 5-102 (lawyer as witness) must be fulfilled. Also, DR 5-105(E) requires that the lawyer keep records sufficient to identify conflicts with respect to these clients.

29 DR 2-103(F)(4)(d). We do not decide in this opinion whether a discount offered by the lawyer to the employer, as the person paying fees for representation of another, would constitute giving something of value to obtain employment by the client, but we merely observe that the requirements of DR 2-103(F)(4) may apply to EAPs. DR 2-103(D) states that "[a] lawyer shall not compensate or give anything of value to a person or organization to recommend or obtain employment by a client, or as a reward for having made a recommendation resulting in employment," with certain enumerated exceptions. DR 2-103(F)(4) provides one such exception:

> A lawyer or the lawyer's partner or associate or any other affiliated lawyer may be recommended, employed or paid by, or may cooperate with one of the following offices or organizations which promote the use of the lawyer's services or those of a partner or associate or any other affiliated lawyer, or request one of the following offices or organizations to recommend or promote the use of the lawyer's services or those of the lawyer's partners or associate, or any other affiliated lawyer as a private practitioner, if there is no interference with the exercise of independent professional judgment on behalf of the client:
> . . .
> a. Any bona fide organization which recommends, furnishes, or pays for legal services to its members or beneficiaries provided the following conditions are satisfied:
> b. Neither the lawyer, nor the lawyer's partner, nor associate, nor any other affiliated lawyer nor any non-lawyer, shall have initiated or promoted such organization for the primary purpose of providing financial or other benefit to such lawyer, partner, associate or affiliated lawyer.
> c. Such organization is not operated for the purpose of procuring legal work or financial benefit for any lawyer as a private practitioner outside of the legal services program of the organization.
> d. The member or beneficiary to whom the legal services are furnished, and not such organization, is recognized as the client of the lawyer in the matter.
> e. The legal service plan of such organization provides appropriate relief for any member or beneficiary who asserts a claim that representation by counsel furnished, selected or approved by the organization for the particular matter involved would be unethical, improper or inadequate under the circumstances of the matter involved; and the plan provides an appropriate procedure for seeking such relief.
> f. The lawyer does not know or have cause to know that such organization is in violation of applicable laws, rules of court or other legal requirements that govern its legal service operations.
> g. Such organization has filed with the appropriate disciplinary authority, to the extent required by such authority, at least annually a report with respect to its legal service plan, if any, showing its terms, its schedule of benefits, its subscription charges, agreements with counsel and financial results of its legal service activities or, if it has failed to do so, the lawyer does not know or have cause to know of such failure.

8. Fourth, the lawyer's duties in respect of client confidences and secrets, as defined in DR 4-101 and DR 5-108(A)(2), must be honored, notwithstanding the brevity of the interaction with these EAP clients.

9. Fifth, the rules on in-person solicitation of work set forth in DR 2-103(A) do not bar in-person or telephone solicitation of existing or former clients, but the lawyer may not seek such work if the particular employee has made known a desire not to be so solicited.[30]

10. Sixth, under DR 6-101, the lawyer must provide competent representation in these matters. A determination that the complexity of a problem is such that a telephone consultation will be insufficient must be communicated to the client. As we opined in N.Y. State 664 (1994), "[c]ompetent representation in a particular [telephone consultation] may require" a great deal more than merely providing general legal advice. Any limitation on the scope of the advice offered must be disclosed.

11. Finally, although we do not opine on issues of law, we note that New York's engagement-letter rules, found at 22 NYCRR Part 1215, may require the lawyer to set forth the scope of the engagement and the billing arrangement (among other things) in an engagement letter to, or retainer agreement with, the employer. Those rules also may require a separate letter to, or retainer agreement with, the employee-client for any matters undertaken that are to be paid for by the employee-client if the fees from that separate engagement are expected to amount to $3,000 or more.

12. We assume in respect of the second question that the EAP has no objection to the lawyer accepting private retention from its referred clients. If that is correct, and the lawyer does not improperly seek to be paid separately for work covered by the EAP, we see no reason under the Code why the lawyer may not accept such work.[31]

CONCLUSION:

13. Subject to the conditions described above respecting compliance with all relevant Code provisions, the two questions are answered in the affirmative.

OPINION 826 (09/12/2008)

TOPIC: Conflicts of interest; multiple representation

DIGEST: No per se rule prohibits a lawyer from representing plaintiffs in declaratory judgment actions against an insurance carrier and simultaneously defending that carrier against other insureds in other declaratory judgment actions, or from obtaining advance waivers of the conflict. Where the actions involve related issues of law, however, whether the clients can validly consent depends on, among other things, potential "positional conflicts," the possibility that the lawyer may need to cross-examine employees of a client, and the possibility that confidential information derived from one representation may be of use in another.

CODE: DR 4-101(B)(2); DR 5-101(A); DR 5-105(A) and (C); EC 5-15

QUESTION:

1. May a lawyer agree to defend an insurance company in coverage disputes arising out of construction accidents while simultaneously representing other insureds in other coverage cases against that insurance company arising out of unrelated construction accidents?

OPINION:

2. The inquirer is a member of a law firm that regularly represents property owners and construction managers who are defendants in construction accident cases and who were denied insurance coverage. The firm represents these clients, as plaintiffs, in actions filed against the insurance carriers for declaratory relief invalidating the coverage disclaimers and enjoining the carriers to defend and indemnify them, on grounds that the plaintiffs are "additional insureds" in subcontractor liability policies. The firm has been approached by one of the defendant insurance companies to represent it as a defendant in other, unrelated declaratory judgment and injunction actions brought by other insureds. The inquirer asks whether the firm may take on these engagements.

3. A lawyer may not take on or continue the concurrent representation of multiple clients if the representation would "involve the lawyer in representing differing interests" or if "the exercise of independent professional judgment in behalf of a client will be or is likely to be adversely affected," unless the lawyer obtains the informed consent of each client affected by the conflict "after full disclosure of the implications of the simultaneous representation and the advantages and risks involved" and "a disinterested lawyer would believe that the lawyer can competently represent the interest of each."[32] "Differing interests" are defined broadly by the Code to "include every interest that will adversely affect either the judgment or the loyalty of a lawyer to a client, whether it be conflicting, inconsistent, diverse or other interest."[33]

4. Here, there clearly is a conflict with respect to the matters involving the carrier that the lawyer or law firm proposes to defend. If the lawyer or law firm takes on those matters, the lawyer or firm will be representing in the existing actions one client – the insurance company – adverse to another client – the insureds – and can proceed only if the conflict is consentable and all clients involved provide informed consent.[34] In considering whether the conflict is consentable and the nature of the disclosure required in obtaining consent, the situation in this inquiry presents particular issues.

32 DR 5-105(A) and (C).

33 Code Definitions.

5. First, because of the standardized nature of many insurance policies, there is a significant probability that a lawyer or law firm representing the carrier may be called upon to take the opposite side of an issue that the lawyer is simultaneously litigating on behalf of a declaratory judgment plaintiff in another case – for example, the outer time limit for timely notice of claim, the required specificity for a valid notice of disclaimer, or the scope of coverage afforded by a particular clause. This type of "positional" or "issue conflict" does not present an automatic bar to the multiple representation. EC 5-15 states, "[A] lawyer may generally represent parties having antagonistic positions on a legal question that has arisen in different cases, unless representation of either client would be adversely affected. Thus, it is ordinarily not improper to assert such positions in cases pending in different trial courts."[35]

6. Even where there is a risk of creating an adverse precedent, such conflicts are generally subject to consent if the client is adequately informed of the issues involved.[36] There may be circumstances, however, in which the lawyer's effectiveness on behalf of one client may be impaired by the representation of the other client, as for example, where the lawyer's own advocacy of the contrary position may be used against the lawyer in the representation of one of the clients, or where the lawyer will feel constrained by the position he or she has taken in one case from arguing vigorously for the contrary position. In such cases, it will generally not be possible to meet the requirement of DR 5-105(C) that "a disinterested lawyer would believe that the lawyer can competently represent the interest of each."

7. A second consideration is whether the lawyer may need to cross-examine an employee of the carrier client in the representation of an insured. There is nothing in the abstract that prevents an adequately advised client from consenting to be sued by the client's lawyer in unrelated matters, particularly if the client is a sophisticated consumer of legal services, as are most insurance companies. But 34 Under the Code, individual lawyers have the conflict, but pursuant to DR 5-105(D) their conflict is imputed to every lawyer in their firm.

35 See also Model Rule 1.7 cmt. 24 ("The mere fact that advocating a legal position on behalf of one client might create precedent adverse to the interests of a client represented by the lawyer in an unrelated matter does not create a conflict of interest. A conflict of interest exists, however, if there is a significant risk that a lawyer's action on behalf of one client will materially limit the lawyer's effectiveness in representing another client in a different case; for example, when a decision favoring one client will create a precedent likely to seriously weaken the position taken on behalf of the other client."); ABA 93-377 ("[I]f the two matters are being litigated in the same jurisdiction, and there is a substantial risk that the law firm's representation of one client will create legal precedent, even if not binding, which is likely materially to undercut the legal position being urged on behalf of the other client, the lawyer should either refuse to accept the second representation or (if otherwise permissible) withdraw from the first, unless both clients consent after full disclosure of the potential ramifications of the lawyer continuing to handle both matters."); RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF THE LAW GOVERNING LAWYERS § 128(f) (2000) ("A lawyer ordinarily may take inconsistent legal positions in different courts at different times. . . . However, a conflict is presented when there is a substantial risk that a lawyer's action in Case A will materially and adversely affect another of the lawyer's clients in Case B. . . . If a conflict of interest exists, absent informed consent of the affected clients . . . , the lawyer must withdraw from one or both of the matters.").

36 See, e.g., Model Rule 1.7 cmt. 24 ("If there is significant risk of material limitation, then absent informed consent of the affected clients, the lawyer must refuse one of the representations or withdraw from one or both matters.") (emphasis added); sources cited in the preceding footnote.

depending on such questions as the seniority of the employee, the importance of the testimony, and the nature of the cross-examination, it may be impossible to meet the disinterested-lawyer test where such a suit would require cross-examination of an insurance carrier employee. Similar considerations would be presented if the lawyer were required to cross-examine an expert that the lawyer might have used or be using in a case for the other side.

8. Third, the firm that seeks to represent both the carriers and the declaratory judgment plaintiffs in coverage disputes should be mindful of DR 5-101(A), which concerns conflicts arising from a "lawyer's own financial, business, property or personal interests." To the extent there may be a significant disparity in the fees likely to be generated by the owners and construction managers on the one hand, and the carrier on the other hand, there may be an "inclination . . . to 'soft peddle' or de-emphasize certain arguments or issues – which otherwise would be vigorously pursued – so as to avoid impacting the other case."[37]

9. In addition, a lawyer may not use for the benefit of the insureds any confidential information that the lawyer has learned in the course of representing the carrier.[38] If in a particular case for an insured, for example, the practices of the carrier or of individual employees of the carrier with respect to a certain issue may be called into question, it may well not be possible for the lawyer to avoid using confidential information derived from a prior representation of the carrier regarding those practices.[39] In such cases, again, the lawyer might not be able to satisfy the "disinterested lawyer" test.

10. To the extent that the lawyer concludes that a conflict is consentable, the lawyer should advise the clients of these considerations in obtaining that consent. The lawyer's disclosure should address, as necessary in a particular case and depending on the sophistication of the client, questions such as the possibility that advocating a favorable legal position in one client's case may be prejudicial to a client in another case, the possibility that the lawyer or a lawyer in the firm may need to cross-examine an employee of the carrier, and any other considerations that may reasonably be thought to affect the lawyer's independent professional judgment or the vigor of the lawyer's representation of the clients.

11. A further consideration is whether the lawyer or law firm seeking to represent a carrier in a series of actions while continuing to bring actions by insureds against that carrier may seek an advance waiver of conflicts with respect to future cases the lawyer or law firm may take on. If the conflicts are otherwise consentable, there is sufficient disclosure of the nature of the conflicting representations that may arise and the client is capable of understanding the waiver, a lawyer or law firm generally may ethically request and rely upon the advance waiver of a future multiple-representation conflict.[40] The extent of the disclosure necessary, and potentially the scope of the advance waiver, may depend on, among other things, the sophistication of the client.[41] For example, where a client is relatively unsophisticated in legal matters, an advance waiver is more likely to be enforceable if it is

37 ABA 93-377.

38 DR 4-101(B)(2) bars a lawyer from knowingly using "a confidence or secret of a client to the disadvantage of the client."

39 See N.Y. City 2005-2 ("There are situations, however, where information that the lawyer has in his or her mind from the first representation is so material to the second representation that the lawyer cannot avoid using the information.").

41 See id. at 5.

limited to lawsuits on behalf of the carrier of the same general kind as the lawyer or law firm is then prosecuting, as opposed to a more open-ended waiver.

12. The lawyer should review the validity of such an advance waiver both when the waiver is given and when it is triggered. For example, the lawyer would not be able to rely on an advance waiver by an insured broadly permitting the lawyer or firm to represent the carrier defendant in other construction-accident suits against other insureds if the lawyer or firm thereafter wishes to take on a lawsuit on behalf of the carrier that would require the lawyer or firm to argue for a position that would limit the lawyer's effectiveness in arguing for the insured.

CONCLUSION:

13. There is no per se rule that would disqualify a lawyer from representing certain declaratory judgment plaintiffs against the insurance carrier and simultaneously defending the carrier against other declaratory judgment plaintiffs in coverage disputes. The possibility of positional conflicts, however, will require careful consideration in each case of the nature of the issues presented and the effect on the representation of other clients of the positions taken on behalf of one. In some cases, considerations such as the identity of the likely witnesses and whether the lawyer has confidential information derived from representation of the carrier that may be of use in the representation of the insured may also limit the lawyer's ability to obtain informed consent to the conflict. For these reasons, the burden of satisfying the "disinterested lawyer" test in these cases will often be a high one.

OPINION 827 (11/03/2008)

TOPIC: Direct payment of client's audit expense from law firm account; sharing of legal fees

DIGEST: Not unethical to cooperate with outside audit of client's billings, nor to pay a percentage of gross billing to the auditor directly from firm account, at the direction of the client.

CODE: DR 1-102, DR 2-103, DR 3-102, DR 4-101

QUESTION:

1. Where a client hires an outside vendor to monitor and administer its legal bills and requires that the lawyer or law firm pay the auditor's bills, may the firm ethically participate in the auditing function and may the lawyer permit the costs of such services to be paid by the law firm, where the bills are based on a percentage of the firm's billings to the client? May the firm permit the payments to the auditor to be made directly from its operating account?

OPINION:

2. A law firm regularly defends an entity in personal injury defense litigation. The entity "self-insures," so no insurance company is involved in retaining the law firm or conducting the client's defense. The client has hired an outside vendor (an auditor) to monitor and administer the client's legal expenses. The auditor's bills will be based on a percentage of the law firm's billing. The client informs the law firm that the law firm must permit the auditor's fee to be withdrawn automatically from the law firm's bank account.

3. In N.Y. State 716 (1999), this Committee considered whether a lawyer might ethically cooperate with an outside auditor hired by an insurer, where the lawyer represented not the insurer, but the insured. There, where the decision to employ the auditor was not the client's decision, we looked primarily to DR 4-101, which deals with the lawyer's duty of confidentiality to the client. We determined that the lawyer would need to obtain informed and knowledgeable consent from the client before sharing confidential billing records with the auditor. We did not, however, view cooperation with the auditor as intrinsically impermissible.

4. Here, where the client has sought the auditor's services, the problem addressed in N.Y. State 716 is less immediate. Even so, a lawyer should take steps to ensure that the client understands any risks for the client that follow from disclosure of billing information to the auditor. These risks include the possibility of further disclosure by the auditor to others, the possibility that the disclosure will waive the attorney-client privilege, and the possibility that the information disclosed to the auditor might somehow be used adversely to the client.[42]

5. Assuming the client understands and wishes to go forward despite these risks, we turn next to DR 3-102 which states that "[a] lawyer or law firm shall not share legal fees with a non-lawyer," with 42 "The nature of the necessary disclosure [to the client] will vary somewhat from case to case and client to client. . . . Ordinarily, however, the lawyer should at least discuss the nature of the information to be found in the billing records sought by the auditor as well as the relevant legal and nonlegal consequences of the client's decision." N.Y. State 716.

exceptions not relevant on these facts. The rule in its apparent simplicity might seem to prohibit the arrangement described above. We think it does not.

6. The arrangements here at issue are simply an incident of fee-negotiation with a client, an agreement to allocate costs between client and lawyer. They are not, properly speaking, fee division. While no lawyer is obligated to agree to the arrangement, the mere fact that the auditor's fee is calculated based upon the lawyer's billings does not make the payment from the lawyer to the auditor the division of a legal fee. Moreover, as we opined in N.Y. State 733 (2000), the intention of DR 3-102 is to secure the client-attorney relationship against outside interference: "fee-splitting between lawyer and layman poses the possibility of control by the lay person, interested in his own profit, rather than the client's fate."[43] This concern is absent in the allocation of fees between a lawyer and a client.[44]

7. The arrangement here also does not raise any concerns under DR 2-103(D), which prohibits a lawyer from "compensat[ing] or giv[ing] anything of value to a person or organization to recommend or obtain employment by a client," again with exceptions not relevant here.[45] Here, the client is already the firm's client. The auditor is engaged by the client to monitor its legal bills, and compensated for that service – not for bringing the client to the lawyer.

This conclusion is not affected by the manner of payment requested by the client. Nothing in the Code bars a lawyer from agreeing to permit the client or the auditor from automatically withdrawing the auditor's fees from the lawyer's operating account.

CONCLUSION:

Subject to the conditions described – notably that the client, with a full understanding of the arrangements and their implications, chooses to employ the auditor – the lawyer may cooperate with and compensate the auditor from the firm's operating account.

OPINION 828 (03/10/2009)

TOPIC: Staff attorneys of state agency; communication with persons represented by counsel; imputation of non-lawyer investigator's conduct

DIGEST: Conduct of state agency's non-lawyer investigators would not be imputed to its staff attorneys unless investigators operated under staff attorneys' supervision

CODE: DR 1-104(C) and (D), DR 7-104(A) and (B)

QUESTION:

1. A certain New York State agency maintains a staff of attorneys and non-lawyer investigators to oversee the operations of its licensees. Usually, an investigation will be undertaken by the agency without any supervision of the investigators by staff counsel. When misconduct by a licensee is discovered, a report will be prepared by one of the investigators for review by counsel; and, where appropriate, counsel may then prosecute the matter pursuant to the New York State Administrative Procedure Act.[1]

2. On occasion, before a matter is assigned to a staff attorney, an investigator will learn that one of the licensees under investigation is represented by counsel. Under such circumstances, what are the ethical obligations of the staff attorneys employed by the agency and do they have any obligation to condition or prevent its investigator from continuing to communicate directly with the licensee?

OPINION:

3. DR 1-104 states in relevant part:

> C. A law firm shall adequately supervise, as appropriate, the work of . . . non-lawyers who work at the firm. . . .
> D. A lawyer shall be responsible for a violation of the Disciplinary Rules by another lawyer or for conduct of a non-lawyer employed by or retained by or associated with the lawyer that would be a violation of the Disciplinary Rules if engaged in by a lawyer if:
> > 1. The lawyer orders, or directs the specific conduct, or, with knowledge of the specific conduct, ratifies it; or

1 We express no opinion on whether the New York State Administrative Procedure Act authorizes the procedures described in this opinion. Our jurisdiction is limited to answering questions of professional ethics and does not extend to deciding issues of substantive or procedural law.

> 2. The lawyer . . . has supervisory authority over the . . . non-lawyer, and knows of such conduct, or in the exercise of reasonable management or supervisory authority should have known of the conduct so that reasonable remedial action could be or could have been taken at a time when its consequences could be or could have been avoided or mitigated.

4. DR 7-104 states in relevant part:

>
> > 1. Communicate or cause another to communicate on the subject of the representation with a party the lawyer knows to be represented by a lawyer in that matter unless the lawyer has the prior consent of the lawyer representing such other party or is authorized by law to do so.
> B. Notwithstanding the prohibitions of DR 7-104(A) . . . , a lawyer may cause a client to communicate with a represented party . . . provided the lawyer gives reasonable advance notice to the represented party's counsel that such communications will be taking place.

5. In light of the foregoing provisions, we will initially assume for purposes of our analysis that the agency's investigators are acting under the supervision or control of its staff attorneys. If that were so, then once the staff attorneys knew that the subject licensees were represented by counsel in connection with the agency's investigation of their conduct, the staff attorneys would be prohibited from ordering or directing the agency's non-lawyer investigators to communicate further with the licensees without obtaining the prior consent of the licensees' counsel or complying with the "advance notice" requirement of DR 7-104(B). See, e.g., N.Y. State 768 (2003) (explaining when lawyer "knows" that counter-party is represented by counsel); N.Y. State 735 (2001) (defining "party"). In such circumstances, the lawyers' ethical responsibility would derive from the expectation that they would properly supervise the investigators; it would not derive from the mere fact that they use non-lawyer investigators.

6. On the facts stated, however, the agency's investigators do not appear to be acting under the supervision or control of the staff attorneys. It also does not appear that the staff attorneys have any ethical responsibility under DR 1-104 to supervise the non-lawyer investigators' conduct.[2]

7. The non-lawyer investigators are clearly not "employed or retained" by the staff attorneys. Cf. DR 1-104(D). Rather, they are employed by the agency. Similarly, they do not "work at the firm." Cf. DR 1-104(C). Rather, they work at the agency. Nor can the investigators be said to be "associated" with the staff attorneys because, as that term is used in DR 1-104, the non-lawyer investigators are deemed to be associated only with the agency, not with its counsel.

2 We caution that, even in the absence of any systemic supervision or control of the non-lawyer investigators, the agency's staff lawyers would still be prohibited by the provisions of DR 1-102(A)(2) ("circumvent . . . through the actions of another") and DR 7-104(A)(1)("cause another to communicate") from directing or causing the non-lawyer investigators to continue having such communications in violation of the lawyer's prescribed ethical responsibilities under the Code.

8. Hence, on the facts here present, the provisions of DR 1-104 must be deemed inapposite to the relationship between the agency's investigators and its staff counsel. Accordingly, absent other factors discussed below, the agency's staff attorneys would have no ethical obligation to supervise the non-lawyer investigators.

9. Although the Code would not necessarily require the agency's staff attorneys to supervise the non-lawyer investigators, the agency could require such supervision as a condition of their counsel's employment. Once such supervision becomes a condition of the staff attorneys' employment, the ethical responsibility described in DR 1-104 would follow. Under such circumstances, the requirements of DR 1-104(C) and DR 1-104(D)(2) would then prohibit the staff attorneys from being willfully ignorant of their investigators' conduct, and responsibility for that conduct could be imputed to the staff attorneys.

10. Ultimately, imputation of the non-lawyer investigators' conduct to the agency's staff attorneys will thus depend on whether the lawyer has "supervisory authority" over the conduct of the non-lawyer. Whether a lawyer has supervisory authority over the conduct of a non-lawyer, vel non, will often be a matter of analyzing the operational relationship between the two individuals within the context of the organization, and the purpose and function of the agency in question. Where, for example, the agency requires its investigators to be instructed by staff attorneys concerning the procedures to be followed before undertaking an investigation, the conduct of the investigators will generally be imputed to the attorneys. Cf. N.Y. County 737 (2007). Where, on the other hand, there is no requirement or expectation that the agency's investigators will operate under the guidance of the staff attorneys, then consistent with the standards set forth in DR 1-104, the conduct of the investigators will not ordinarily be imputed to the staff attorneys.

11. The new New York Rules of Professional Conduct that will take effect on April 1, 2009 are substantially identical to the Disciplinary Rules construed and applied in this opinion.

CONCLUSION:

12. For the reasons stated, subject to the qualifications set forth above, the question posed is answered in the negative.

(19-08).

OPINION 829 (04/29/2009)

TOPIC: Conflicts of interest, consent confirmed in writing.

DIGEST: A consent to a conflict of interest that was validly given prior to April 1, 2009, the effective date of the new Rules of Professional Conduct, does not need to be obtained anew solely on account of the adoption of the new Rules.

RULES: 1.0(e), 1.0(j), 1.7(b), 1.9.

QUESTION:

1. Under Rules 1.0(e), 1.0(j), 1.7 and 1.9 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct, which prescribe new rules for a client's consent to a conflict of interest, including a new requirement that such consents be "confirmed in writing," does a lawyer who obtained a consent to a conflict prior to the effective date of those rules need to obtain a new consent to the conflict?

OPINION:

2. New York's Rules of Professional Conduct became effective April 1, 2009. Under Rule 1.7(b), where a lawyer has a conflict of interest arising out of the lawyer's representation of two or more clients or out of the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests, the lawyer may proceed with the representation or representations if:

> (1) the lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client;
> (2) the representation is not prohibited by law;
>
> (3) the representation does not involve the assertion of a claim by one client against another client represented by the lawyer in the same litigation or other proceeding before a tribunal; and
> (4) each affected client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing.[3]

Rule 1.0(j) defines "informed consent" as follows:

> "Informed consent" denotes the agreement by a person to a proposed course of conduct after the lawyer has communicated information adequate for the person to make an informed decision, and after the lawyer has adequately explained to the person the material risks of the proposed course of conduct and reasonably available alternatives.

3 Rule 1.7(b) (emphasis added). Similarly, under Rule 1.9, where a lawyer has a conflict of interest arising out of a representation of a former client, the lawyer may proceed with the representation of the current client if "the former client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing."

Rule 1.0(e) defines "confirmed in writing" as follows:

> "Confirmed in writing" denotes (i) a writing from the person to the lawyer confirming that the person has given consent, (ii) a writing that the lawyer promptly transmits to the person confirming the person's oral consent, or (iii) a statement by the person made on the record of any proceeding before a tribunal. If it is not feasible to obtain or transmit the writing at the time the person gives oral consent, then the lawyer must obtain or transmit it within a reasonable time thereafter.

3. These provisions are broadly similar to those that applied under the former New York Code of Professional Responsibility (the "Code"), except that the requirement that client consents be confirmed in writing is new. The Code, which was in effect prior to April 1, 2009, did not specify any particular form for such consents.[4]

4. The inquirer has represented a client for a number of years pursuant to a retainer agreement. The retainer agreement includes a waiver of certain conflicts that may arise out of then-existing engagements, or future engagements, on behalf of other clients. The inquirer asks whether it is necessary to obtain a new consent to conflicts otherwise covered by the existing waiver and execute a new retainer agreement reflecting the new consent.

5. In adopting the new Rules, the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of the State of New York directed that the new Rules would be effective April 1, 2009, but the Court did not provide for any other transitional rules.[5] There is no basis for concluding that consents given prior to the adoption of the new Rules are impaired or invalid as a consequence of the change in the Rules.[6] Thus, if a consent to a conflict of interest was valid when given, and by its terms continues to apply to ongoing or new representations after April 1, 2009, and the application of the consent to a new matter is otherwise valid, there is no need to re-confirm or re-obtain the consent solely on account of the adoption of the new Rules. (We do not here address the circumstances under which a consent to a waiver may be valid in any other respect.)

6. With respect to the particular inquiry before us, the inquirer states that the consent was contained in a retainer agreement. It thus already satisfied the new requirement that the consent be confirmed in writing, but the same conclusion would apply to oral consents that were validly given prior to the effective date of the new Rules. The new requirement that consent to a conflict be "confirmed in writing" modifies the giving of consent. Thus, only consents that are given under the new Rules – that is, on or after April 1, 2009 – must be "confirmed in writing." This conclusion is supported by the second sentence of Rule 1.0(e) (defining "confirmed in writing"), which specifies that the writing must be obtained or transmitted at the time the person gives oral consent or within a reasonable time thereafter. There is no suggestion that consents given much earlier must now meet the formal requirements of the new Rules. We note also that the new Rules do not require that the client actually sign an agreement containing the consent. See Rule 1.0(e)(ii). Moreover, any type of writing, even an e-mail, from the lawyer to the client confirming an oral consent would be sufficient. See Rule 1.0(x) (defining "writing" to include email or any other "tangible or electronic record of a communication or representation").

4 DR 5-101(A) (if "client consents to the representation after full disclosure of the implications of the lawyer's interest"); DR 5-105(C) ("if each [client] consents to the representation after full disclosure of the implications of the simultaneous representation and the advantages and risks involved").

6 See, e.g., Hays v. Ward, 179 A.D.2d 427, 429, 578 N.Y.S.2d 168, 169 (1st Dep't 1992) ("Where a statute states in clear and explicit terms, as here, that it takes effect on a certain date, it is to be construed as prospective in application."); Murphy v. Board of Education, 104 A.D. 796, 797, 480 N.Y.S.2d 138, 139 (2d Dep't 1984) ("As a general rule statutes are to be construed as prospective only in the absence of an unequivocal expression of a legislative intent to the contrary, and where a statute directs that it is to take effect immediately, it does not have any retroactive operation or effect . . . ."), aff'd, 64 N.Y.2d 856, 476 N.E.2d 651, 487 N.Y.S.2d 325 (1985).

CONCLUSION:

7. The requirements in the new Rules of Professional Conduct that govern obtaining consents to conflicts, including the new requirement that consents be "confirmed in writing," do not apply to consents validly given before the effective date of those Rules. Client consents to conflicts validly given prior to April 1, 2009 do not need to be obtained anew solely on account of the adoption of the new Rules.

OPINION 830 (06/11/2009)

TOPIC: Solicitation; advertising; public education for lay persons

DIGEST: A lawyer may ethically contact lay organizations to inform them that he is available as a public speaker on legal topics, but must adhere to advertising and solicitation requirements under the Rules where the communication is made expressly to encourage participants to retain the lawyer or law firm.

RULES: 1.0(a), 7.1(a), 7.3(a), (q), (r)

QUESTION:

1. May a lawyer contact an organization of laymen and inform them of his availability as a public speaker on legal topics?

OPINION:

2. Before Bates v. State Bar of Arizona, 433 U.S. 350 (1977), New York's Disciplinary Rules prohibited attorneys from engaging in any and all forms of solicitation. In N.Y. State 379 (1975), this Committee said that those pre-Bates Disciplinary Rules prohibited an attorney from initiating any contact to lay organizations. However, as explained in N.Y. State 508 (1979), the New York Code of Professional Responsibility was substantially revised in 1978 in the light of Bates. As amended, DR 2-103(A) prohibited only those solicitations that were "in violation of any statute or court rule." Also before Bates, certain Ethical Considerations in the Code permitted lawyers to participate only in educational programs conducted or sponsored "under proper auspices" (such as bar associations). After Bates, the Ethical Considerations were amended and those restrictions were eliminated.

3. Accordingly, N.Y. State 508 went on to determine that a law firm may organize and promote by mail legal seminars expressly designed for non-lawyers. The Committee explained that "with advertising now permitted and the requirements of the Code relating to sponsorship now repealed, much of the rationale for the traditional prohibition on lawyers organizing and promoting legal seminars, or other programs of public education for lay persons, has been removed." The Committee noted, however, that it did not have the power to pass on whether such direct mailing constituted improper solicitation under New York Judiciary Law § 479, or whether § 479 was constitutional under Bates and its progeny.

4. Today, Rules 7.1 and 7.3 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct, which took effect on April 1, 2009, control attorney advertisements and solicitations. Specifically, Rule 7.1 generally regulates "advertising" by lawyers and Rule 7.3 regulates "solicitation" by lawyers (which is a special form of lawyer advertising).

5. An "advertisement" is defined by Rule 1.0(a) (in the Terminology rule) as follows:

> "Advertisement" means any public or private communication made by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm about that lawyer or law firm's services, the primary purpose of which is for the retention of the lawyer or law firm. It does not include communications to existing clients or other lawyers.

6. "Solicitation" is defined in Rule 7.3(b) as follows:

> For purposes of this Rule [7.3], "solicitation" means any advertisement initiated by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm that is directed to, or targeted at, a specific recipient or group of recipients, or their family members or legal representatives, the primary purpose of which is the retention of the lawyer or law firm, and a significant motive for which is pecuniary gain. It does not include a proposal or other writing prepared and delivered in response to a specific request of a prospective client.

7. Rule 7.3(a) of the Code prohibits a lawyer from engaging in "solicitation" by the following means (among others):

> (1) by in-person or telephone contact, or by real-time or interactive computer-accessed communication unless the recipient is a close friend, relative, former client or existing client; or
> (2) by any form of communication if:
> > (i) the communication or contact violates Rule 4.5, Rule 7.1(a), or paragraph (e) of this Rule.

8. Rule 7.1(a) prohibits any lawyer advertising that "(1) contains statements or claims that are false, deceptive or misleading; or (2) violates a Rule."

9. Comment 9 to Rule 7.1 expressly recognizes that "lawyers should encourage and participate in educational and public-relations programs concerning the legal system, with particular reference to legal problems that frequently arise." Comment 9 further notes that "[a] lawyer's participation in an educational program is ordinarily not considered to be advertising because its primary purpose is to educate and inform rather than to attract clients." However, "a program might be considered to be advertising if, in addition to its educational component, participants or recipients are expressly encouraged to hire the lawyer or law firm." In that case, Rules 7.1 and 7.3 would regulate the communications. (The Comments have been adopted only by the New York State Bar Association, not by the Courts.)

10. We also note that Rule 7.1(q) expressly permits a lawyer to "accept employment that results from participation in activities designed to educate the public to recognize legal problems, to make intelligent selection of counsel or to utilize available legal services." Further, Rule 7.1(r) provides that "[w]ithout affecting the right to accept employment, a lawyer may speak publicly or write for publication on legal topics so long as the lawyer does not undertake to give individual advice."

11. Applying these rules, definitions, and Comment 9 to this inquiry, a lawyer may contact a lay organization to alert the organization that the lawyer is available as a public speaker on legal topics. However, if the communication is made expressly to encourage participants in the program to retain the lawyer or law firm, then the communication falls within the definitions of "advertisement" and

"solicitation," and such communications concerning the program must comply with Rules 7.1 and 7.3.

12. As previously noted, this Committee lacks jurisdiction to determine whether such communications are permitted under § 479 of the Judiciary Law, which prohibits solicitation by attorneys, and likewise lacks jurisdiction to determine whether § 479 remains constitutional in light of Bates and its progeny.

CONCLUSION:

13. For the reasons stated, and subject to the qualifications set forth above, a lawyer may ethically contact lay organizations to inform them that he or she is available as a public speaker on legal topics.

OPINION 831 (08/14/2009)

TOPIC: Disclosure of fraud on the tribunal and fraudulent conduct

DIGEST: Where a lawyer learns that a client, before April 1, 2009 (the effective date of the new N.Y. Rules of Professional conduct), had committed fraud on a tribunal, the lawyer's obligation to disclose the fraud is governed by DR 7-102(B)(1) of the former Code of Professional Responsibility, which generally did not permit disclosure of confidences or secrets, and not by rule 3.3 of the new Rules of Professional Conduct, which may require disclosure of confidential information necessary to remedy the fraud. Where the fraud occurred before April 1, 2009, this conclusion applies whether the lawyer learns of the fraud before or after April 1, 2009

RULES AND CODE: 1.0(i), 1.6, 1.7(b)(4), 1.9(a), Code: 3.3(b); Code Definitions "fraud"; DR 4-101, 7-102(B)(1)

QUESTION:

1. Where a lawyer, prior to April 1, 2009, represented a client in obtaining a conditional discharge of a misdemeanor charge, contingent on the client's not being arrested for a period of time, and then, after April 1, 2009, the lawyer learned from the client that the client had been arrested shortly before the plea, must the lawyer disclose the arrest to the prosecutor or the tribunal?

OPINION:

2. The inquirer represented a defendant accused of a misdemeanor. The inquirer arranged a plea bargain under which the defendant pleaded guilty to a violation of disorderly conduct with a conditional discharge. Under the terms of the sentence of conditional discharge, the defendant avoided incarceration or probation as long as she was not arrested within the next six months. In the course of the plea, the client represented to the court and the prosecutor that she (the client) had "stayed out of trouble" since the misdemeanor arrest.

3. A short time later, but after April 1, 2009, the client told the inquirer that in fact she had been arrested the week before the plea in a different county. The inquirer asks whether he must inform the prosecutor or the court about the client's prior arrest.

4. New York adopted new Rules of Professional Conduct that became effective on April 1, 2009.[7] Both the new Rules and the former Code of Professional Responsibility have provisions addressing a lawyer's obligations where a client engages in fraudulent conduct before a tribunal. Both provisions require a lawyer to take remedial measures, but the rules differ on two significant points: First, and most clearly, the provisions differ on the critical question of whether a lawyer must disclose protected confidential information if required to remedy the fraud. Second, the definition of "fraudulent conduct" in the new rules differs from the interpretation we placed on the definition of "fraud" in the old rules with respect to whether fraudulent conduct includes misleading or deceptive conduct short of actual fraud under the applicable law.[8]

8 See paras. 9-10 below

5. Under DR 7-102(B)(1) of the old Code, a lawyer who learned that a client had "perpetrated a fraud upon a person or tribunal" was required to "promptly call upon the client to rectify the same. If the client refuse[d] or [was] unable to do so," the lawyer was required to "reveal the fraud to the . . . tribunal, except when the information is protected as a confidence or secret." (Emphasis added.)[9]

6. Rule 3.3(b) of the new Rules eliminates the exception for confidences and secrets (now called simply "confidential information"). Rule 3.3(b) provides:

> A lawyer who represents a client before a tribunal and who knows that a person intends to engage, is engaging or has engaged in criminal or fraudulent conduct related to the proceeding shall take reasonable remedial measures, including, if necessary, disclosure to the tribunal.

7. Contrary to the Code exception for confidences and secrets, new Rule 3.3(c) expressly states that this duty applies "even if compliance requires disclosure of information otherwise protected by Rule 1.6." (Rule 1.6 defines the protections accorded to confidential information.)[10]

8. There is also a difference in the definitions of the applicable conduct that triggers this requirement, at least as we had interpreted it. The definition of the term "fraud" in the old Code was not a definition as such, but rather a clarification. It said:

> "Fraud" does not include conduct, although characterized as fraudulent by statute or administrative rule, which lacks an element of scienter, deceit, intent to mislead, or knowing failure to correct misrepresentations which can be reasonably expected to induce detrimental reliance by another.

9. In the absence of a Code definition of "fraud," we interpreted the term "fraud upon a tribunal" in DR 7-102(B) to refer to the term "fraud" in the law outside of the Code (except to the extent that

9 The italicized language was added to the Code in 1976. See N.Y. State 454 (1976). This rule was not absolute. The exception extended only to information "protected" as a confidence or secret. We repeatedly held that information was not protected as a confidence or secret if one of the exceptions to disclosure in DR 4-101 applied. N.Y. State 797 ¶ 13 (2005); N.Y. State 781 (2004); N.Y. State 674 (1995); N.Y. State 466 (1977). In addition, the Court of Appeals stated that in certain circumstances "counsel has a duty to disclose witness perjury to the Court." People v. Berroa, 99 N.Y.2d 134, 142, 753 N.Y.S.2d 12, 18, 782 N.E.2d 1148, 1154 (2002) (citing People v. DePallo, 96 N.Y.2d 437, 729 N.Y.S.2d 649, 754 N.E.2d 751 (2001)).

10 It is unclear when the disclosure obligations under the new rule end. In past opinions, we appear to have assumed that the disclosure obligations in DR 7-102(B) where information was not "protected" as a confidence or secret ended when the proceeding in question concluded. N.Y. State 674 (discussing whether a lawyer must reveal perjury "discovered after the fact when the proceeding in which the perjury was committed (and later discovered) has not yet concluded"); N.Y. State 466 ("since the existence of the negotiable instrument is not relevant to any pending proceeding"). The New York State Bar Association proposal for the new rule, adopting the language of the ABA Model Rules, would have codified this interpretation in Rule 3.3. The proposal stated, "The duties stated in paragraphs (a) and (b) continue to the conclusion of the proceeding and apply even if compliance requires disclosure of information otherwise protected by Rule 1.6." New York State Bar Association Proposed Rules of Professional Conduct 160 (Feb. 1, 2008) (emphasis added) (available at www.nysba.org/proposedrulesofconduct020108. As noted in the text, Rule 3.3 as adopted by the courts omits the phrase "continue to the conclusion of the proceeding and." There is thus an argument that the courts in adopting the rule intended the obligation to continue past the end of the proceeding and, potentially, indefinitely – or at least for some reasonable period of time. The broadest version of this interpretation seems to us implausible. We believe the obligation extends for as long as the effect of the fraudulent conduct on the proceeding can be remedied, which may extend beyond the end of the proceeding – but not forever. If disclosure could not remedy the effect of the conduct on the proceeding, but could merely result in punishment of the client, we do not believe the Rule 3.3 disclosure duty applies.

any such law should require a mental state other than that set forth in the above definition). We said in N.Y. State 797 (2005), "Whether the client has committed fraud on the court is a legal question beyond the jurisdiction of this Committee."[11]

10. The definition of "fraud" or "fraudulent" in the new rule appears to be broader. It provides:

> "Fraud" or "fraudulent conduct" denotes conduct that is fraudulent under the substantive or procedural law of the applicable jurisdiction or has a purpose to deceive, provided that it does not include conduct that, although characterized as fraudulent by statute or administrative rule, lacks an element of scienter, deceit, intent to mislead, or knowing failure to correct misrepresentations that can be reasonably expected to induce detrimental reliance by another.[12]

While the new phrase "denotes conduct that is fraudulent under the substantive or procedural law of the applicable jurisdiction" codifies our interpretation of "fraud" under the Code, the inclusion of the disjunctive "or has a purpose to deceive" would appear to draw in conduct beyond conduct that constitutes "fraud" under applicable law.[13]

11. In this case, any "fraud" or "fraudulent conduct" occurred prior to April 1, 2009. In N.Y. State 829 (2009), we opined that the new rules requiring that waivers of conflicts of interest be "confirmed in writing"[14] apply only to waivers given by clients after April 1, 2009. We relied both on the language of the particular rules at issue there as well as on the general rule that, unless otherwise clearly stated, statutes are to be construed as prospective in application only.[15]

12. The application of the effective date here is less straightforward. The language of the rule does not provide much guidance. Conceivably, because the rule speaks of a lawyer who "knows" of fraudulent conduct – in the present tense – it could be interpreted to refer to anyone who has such knowledge on or after the effective date, regardless of when the fraudulent conduct occurred and regardless of when the lawyer learned of that conduct. We do not believe this interpretation is correct. The new rule is a dramatic break from the prior understanding of a lawyer's duties in the face of improper conduct by a client or witness.

13. The presumption that new rules do not apply retroactively has particular strength where a person may rely on the pre-existing rules. Where the rules have changed, a client – even a client who has engaged in fraud – should be able to rely on the advice or warnings he or she may have received, or 11 But see N.Y. State 681 (1996) ("Regardless of the legal determination of the criminal effect of the client's actions, it appears that the client may be using the lawyer's services to perpetuate a fraud on the tribunal.").

12 Rule 1.0(i) (emphasis added).

13 The use of the disjunctive here was a change from the New York State Bar Association proposal. New York State Bar Association Proposed Rules of Professional Conduct, supra n.3, at 4 ("'Fraud' or 'fraudulent conduct' denotes conduct that is fraudulent under the substantive or procedural law of the applicable jurisdiction and has a purpose to deceive . . . .") (emphasis added).

Ward*, 179 A.D.2d 427, 429, 578 N.Y.S.2d 168, 169 (1st Dep't 1992) ("Where a statute states in clear and explicit terms, as here, that it takes effect on a certain date, it is to be construed as prospective in application."); Murphy v. Board of Education, 104 A.D. 796, 797, 480 N.Y.S.2d 138, 139 (2d Dep't 1984), aff'd, 64 N.Y.2d 856, 476 N.E.2d 651, 487 N.Y.S.2d 325 (1985)).

the correct understanding he or she had, regarding the "rules of the road" that govern the lawyer-client relationship. We believe the same should apply whether the lawyer learns of the fraud before or after April 1, 2009, as long as the client's fraudulent conduct occurred prior to that date. The client has committed himself or herself when the fraud occurred.[16]

14. In this case, as noted, the fraudulent conduct in question occurred before the effective date of the new rules. We therefore apply DR 7-102(B)(2) and not Rule 3.3(b) to determine whether the lawyer has an obligation to disclose the fact that the client was arrested a week before entering a conditional discharge plea. Even if the client's false representation that he had stayed out of trouble was a "fraud on the tribunal" within the meaning of DR 7-102(B)(1) – as seems likely – it is clear that the information that the lawyer subsequently acquired was a confidence or secret. The lawyer would therefore have an obligation to disclose the information only if the information was not "protected" under DR 4-101.[17] Here, no exception to the duty of confidentiality applies, and therefore the information remains "protected" as a confidence or secret. While under DR 4-101(C)(3) (as under new Rule 1.6(b)(2)) a lawyer may disclose information necessary to prevent a future crime, the inquirer here learned of the client's misrepresentation after it occurred, when it was past wrongdoing, not a future crime.[18]

15. Some writers have questioned whether Rule 3.3 is inconsistent with the protections afforded criminal defendants under the Fifth and Sixth Amendments of the United States Constitution.[19] There is also some question whether the new requirement of Rule 3.3, a court-adopted rule, can override the statutory protection to the attorney-client privilege afforded by CPLR § 4503(a).[20] In view of the result we reach, we express no opinion on these questions.

CONCLUSION:

16. Where a lawyer learns that, prior to April 1, 2009, a client had committed fraud on a tribunal, the lawyer's obligation to disclose the fraud is governed by DR 7-102(B)(1) of the former Code of Professional Responsibility, and not by Rule 3.3 of the new Rules of Professional Conduct. Unlike Rule 3.3, DR 7-102(B)(1) did not permit disclosure of information protected as a confidence or secret in these circumstances.

16 Of course, once the lawyer learns of the fraud, he or she cannot use the fraudulent testimony in argument or otherwise. That was true under DR 7-102 as it is under Rule 3.3.

18 The answer might be different if the lawyer himself had made a "written or oral opinion or representation . . . believed by the lawyer still to be relied upon by a third person [and that] was based on materially inaccurate information or is being used to further a crime or fraud." In that circumstance, the confidence might not be protected to the extent disclosure is implicit in the lawyer's withdrawing the prior representation. DR 4-101(C)(5).

OPINION 832 (12/03/2009)

TOPIC: Attorney's provision of nonlegal services

DIGEST: Where a lawyer sells shelf corporations (a nonlegal service) to people he regards as non-clients, and provides no legal services in connection with those nonlegal services, but the lawyer's status as a lawyer is visible to the public, then absent a disclaimer or other steps, the recipients of the nonlegal services could reasonably believe there is an attorney-client relationship and thus the Rules of Professional Conduct would apply.

RULES: 5.7

COMMENTS: Comments 1 & 3 to Rule 5.7

QUESTION:

1. A sole practitioner would like to provide what the lawyer describes as a "nonlegal service" to non-clients. The "nonlegal service" is the sale of "shelf corporations." (The term "shelf corporation" means a company that has had no recent activity or that was created to be "put on the shelf" to age. Shelf corporations are often sold to investors who want to start a company but do not want to go through the incorporation process.) Do the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") relating to advertising and solicitation apply to the sale of shelf corporations to non-clients?

OPINION:

2. Rule 5.7 contains rules relating to nonlegal services provided by lawyers. (The Appellate Divisions adopted new Rules of Professional Conduct effective April 1, 2009.) The first two subparagraphs – Rule 5.7(a)(1) and (a)(2) – apply if an attorney is providing both legal and nonlegal services to clients. Under Rule 5.7(a)(1) if the nonlegal services are "not distinct" from the legal services provided by the lawyer to the client, then the Rules apply to both the legal and the nonlegal services. Under Rule 5.7(a)(2), if the nonlegal services and the legal services provided by the lawyer to the client are "distinct" from each other, then the Rules apply to both the legal and nonlegal services only "if the person receiving the services could reasonably believe that the nonlegal services are the subject of an attorney-client relationship."

3. Rule 5.7(a)(4) addresses whether a person receiving nonlegal services "could reasonably believe that those services are the subject of an attorney-client relationship." Specifically, the rule states that even where the legal and nonlegal services provided to the client are distinct from each other, it is "presumed that the person receiving nonlegal services believes the services to be the subject of a client-lawyer relationship unless the lawyer or law firm has advised the person receiving the services in writing that the services are not legal services and that the protection of a client-lawyer relationship does not exist with respect to the nonlegal services . . . ." (Emphasis added.) However, the specified writing only serves to reverse the presumption, not to prove conclusively that the services are not legal services. As we noted in N.Y. State 755 (2002):

> We are not suggesting by this opinion that the mere statement, even in writing, to that effect is an automatic safe harbor, and DR 1-106 does not say so. The writing serves to > reverse the presumption against the lawyer that would otherwise exist. It is possible that in certain circumstances, such as where the client is unsophisticated and has had a long relationship with the lawyer and where, despite the existence of a separate entity, the nonlegal services are not completely separated from the rendition of legal services, the writing would be insufficient to disabuse the client of a reasonable belief that the lawyer would be acting to protect the client.

Id. at 5; see also Rule 5.7, cmt. 3.

4. The lawyer's intention to sell shelf corporations only to people he regards as non-clients (and not to clients) appears to assume that he would not provide legal advice to the non-client purchasers of the corporations. That assumption may not be warranted. To test that assumption, we consider below three different ways in which the shelf corporations might be sold.

Scenario One: Lawyer Provides Legal Services

5. We first consider the possibility that the lawyer provides legal advice about shelf corporations to the purchasers, such as giving a prospective purchaser the attorney's views about (i) the legality of shelf corporations in general, (ii) the validity of a specific corporation, (iii) the advantages, rights, or benefits of shelf corporations, or (iv) the tax consequences of purchasing or owning a shelf corporation. The Rules do not define legal services, and many services do not fall neatly into the category of legal services because they may legally be undertaken by both lawyers and nonlawyers. However, "when such services are performed by a lawyer who holds himself out as a lawyer, they constitute the practice of law and the lawyer, in performing them, is governed by the Code." N.Y. State 557 (1984) at p. 2.

6. Thus, despite the fact that a nonlawyer might be entitled to provide some advice about a shelf corporation without committing the unauthorized practice of law, when a lawyer provides such advice it becomes the provision of legal services. Thus, if the lawyer provides legal advice about shelf corporations to purchasers, the lawyer would be providing legal services to them. In that situation, the Rules of Professional Conduct – including the rules regarding lawyer advertising and solicitation – would apply both to the legal advice and to the sale of the corporations. Moreover, because the lawyer would actually be rendering legal services, the disclaimer in Rule 5.7(a)(4) would not be effective.

Scenario Two: Lawyer Does Not Provide Legal Services

7. We next consider the possibility that the lawyer provides no legal advice whatsoever to the purchasers about the shelf corporations. For the assumption that the lawyer provides no legal advice to remain true, the lawyer could not answer the kinds of questions a prospective customer might ask that are likely to call for legal advice (e.g., What are the tax consequences? How long may I leave the corporation on the shelf? Do I have to notify the state if I buy a shelf corporation? Is the corporation validly formed?). For example, if the shelf corporations were sold over the Internet, and the attorney was not identified anywhere on the web site as a lawyer, and any information about the corporations was provided only in writing (e.g., via FAQs or links to articles), and purchasers never communicated with the lawyer directly and had no opportunity to ask for advice, then the lawyer would not be giving legal advice to purchasers. In that case the Rules would not generally apply to those sales.

8. Even where the lawyer would be generally exempt from the application of the Rules with respect to the sales, however, the exemption would not be absolute. Some Rules of Professional Conduct, such as Rule 8.4(c) (prohibiting conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit, or misrepresentation), would still apply. Thus, the lawyer could not engage in dishonest, fraudulent, or deceptive conduct relating to the advertising or solicitation of the nonlegal services.

Scenario Three: Lawyer's Status as a Lawyer Is Visible to the Public

9. Finally, we consider the possibility that the attorney does not provide any legal advice to the purchaser of the shelf corporation but the attorney's status as a lawyer is visible to the public (e.g., the attorney uses a law office name or letterhead, or advertises the sales on the lawyer's web site, or puts "Esq." or "J.D." after the lawyer's name). In that case there is a substantial risk that the purchaser of the shelf corporations will be misled as to whether an attorney-client relationship exists. The risk is great because the client may be confused about the nature of the attorney's role. In speaking about the need for the lawyer to avoid potential confusion between legal and nonlegal services provided to an individual, Comment 1 to Rule 5.7 notes that avoiding confusion is essential > so that the person for whom the nonlegal services are performed understands that the services may not carry with them the legal and ethical protections that ordinarily accompany a client-lawyer relationship. The recipient of the nonlegal services may expect, for example, that the protection of client confidences and secrets, prohibitions against representation of persons with conflicting interests, and obligations of a lawyer to maintain professional independence apply to the provision of nonlegal services when that may not be the case.

10. The same concerns are relevant when the attorney sells to customers who are aware of the attorney's status as a lawyer. Even if the attorney merely identifies himself as a lawyer when selling shelf corporations but does not promise or provide legal services, the risk of confusion is great and purchasers could reasonably believe that they had an attorney-client relationship with the seller.

11. Where the attorney's status as a lawyer is visible, one way for a lawyer to avoid application of the Rules to the sale of nonlegal services would be to give the purchaser in writing the Rule 5.7(a)(4) disclaimer stating that the no legal services are being rendered and that the protection of an attorney-client relationship does not exist. We emphasize, however, that even if the lawyer provides the disclaimer specified in Rule 5.7(a)(4), it would not be effective if the lawyer actually provided legal advice or other legal services to the customer of the nonlegal business.

CONCLUSION:

12. Where a lawyer provides legal services to a client, the Rules of Professional Conduct apply to the legal services. Where a lawyer provides nonlegal services to non-clients, the Rules generally are not applicable to the provision of the nonlegal services although some Rules of Professional Conduct would still apply. Where the attorney provides no legal services in connection with the provision of nonlegal services such as those here – the sale of shelf corporations – but the attorney's status as a lawyer is visible to the public, then absent a disclaimer or other steps, the recipients of the nonlegal services could reasonably believe there is an attorney-client relationship, and thus the Rules would apply. 28-08

TOPIC: Clients (Prospective); Communications; Duty of Lawyer.

DIGEST: An attorney is not required to respond to unsolicited letters from incarcerated individuals requesting legal representation.

RULES: Rule 1.18(a); Rule 1.18(e).

QUESTION:

[1] Is an attorney ethically required to respond to unsolicited letters from incarcerated individuals requesting legal representation for personal injury or other claims?

OPINION:

[2] No provision of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct imposes a general obligation upon an attorney to promptly answer unsolicited mail – or to answer it at all. We found that such an obligation arose under the former New York Code of Professional Responsibility only in the context of communications from an adversary or a client. See N.Y. State 407 (1975) ("The consistent failure of a lawyer to respond to telephone calls and correspondence from fellow attorneys is in violation of the Code. A lawyer is obligated to return telephone calls and inquiries from fellow members of the Bar, as well as from clients.") (citing former EC 7-10, EC-7-37, EC 7-38, and EC 7-39); see also 22 NYCRR § 1210.1(5) (Statement of Client's Rights provides that a client is entitled to have "telephone calls returned promptly"); N.Y. State 396 (1975) ("The consistent failure of a lawyer to respond to calls from his clients is in violation of [former] Canons 6 and 9") (all emphasis added).

[3] We do not address whether an obligation to respond to communications from clients and other lawyers continues under the new Rules. We address here only unsolicited communications from incarcerated individuals who are neither adversaries nor clients. In New York, the only guideline of general application regarding an attorney's obligation to respond to unsolicited inquiries from persons other than adversaries or clients appears not in the Rules of Professional Conduct, which are mandatory, but rather in Standard IV of the New York State Standards of Civility, an aspirational goal not subject to enforcement through discipline. Standard IV says: "A lawyer should promptly return telephone calls and answer correspondence reasonably requiring a response." 22 NYCRR Part 1200, app. at IV (emphasis added).

[4] Even applying that aspirational standard, however, we believe that an unsolicited letter from an incarcerated individual requesting legal representation does not, without more, reasonably require a response. We also note that a lawyer's receipt of truly unsolicited communications requesting legal representation does not create a lawyer-client relationship. See, e.g., Knigge v. Corvese, 2001 WL 830669, at *3-4 (S.D.N.Y. 2001) (holding that multiple voicemail messages seeking legal representation and requesting return phone calls did not result in formation of an attorney-client relationship because it was not reasonable for caller to believe that his "unilateral" decision to leave such messages could result in such a relationship).

[5] Nor, under Rule 1.18 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct, does the sender become a "prospective client" unless the lawyer subsequently "discusses" with the sender the "possibility of forming a client-lawyer relationship." Rule 1.18(a); see also Rule 1.18(e)(1) ("A person who . . . communicates information unilaterally to a lawyer, without any reasonable expectation that the lawyer is willing to discuss the possibility of forming a client-lawyer relationship . . . is not a prospective client within the meaning of paragraph 1.18"). Thus, Rule 1.18 confirms our view that an unsolicited letter from an incarcerated individual requesting legal representation, without more, does not reasonably require a response.

[5] This opinion does not address the circumstances, if any, in which an e-mail requesting legal representation or legal advice, although constituting the initial contact between a lawyer and the sender, may be deemed a response to a web site inviting public inquiry, in which case the communication could not be fairly characterized as "unsolicited." Cf. N.Y. City 2001-1 (absent a disclaimer warning that information sent by prospective clients will not be treated as confidential, information imparted to an attorney in good faith by a prospective client in an e-mail generated in response to an internet web site maintained by the law firm should be held in confidence even though the attorney has declined the representation).

CONCLUSION:

[6] An attorney is not ethically required to respond to unsolicited letters from incarcerated individuals requesting legal representation.

OPINION 834 (12/15/2009)

Distinguishing N.Y. State 771 (2003) in light of rule changes

TOPIC: Use of disclaimer with client testimonials or endorsements.

DIGEST: Under the New York Rules of Professional Conduct, truthful client testimonials or endorsements are permitted if accompanied by the disclaimer specified in Rule 7.1(e)(3).

RULES: 7.1(a)(1), (d)(3), and (e)(3)

QUESTION:

1. Must an advertisement that contains a client testimonial or endorsement also contain the disclaimer: "Prior results do not guarantee a similar outcome"?

OPINION:

2. Our opinion in N.Y. State 771 (2003) concluded that as long as an advertisement containing client testimonials was not false, deceptive or misleading, it was not necessary for the advertisement to contain the disclaimer that prior results did not guarantee a similar outcome.[21] We now examine whether this conclusion is modified in the New York Rules of Professional Conduct that took effect on April 1, 2009 (the "Rules").[22]

3. Rule 7.1(d)(3) provides that an advertisement that complies with Rule 7.1(e) may contain "testimonials or endorsements of clients . . . and of former clients."[23] Rule 7.1(e)(3) requires advertisements containing testimonials or endorsements of clients to include the following disclaimer: "Prior results do not guarantee a similar outcome." Therefore, under the new Rules, an advertisement that contains a client testimonial requires the prescribed disclaimer concerning results.

4. At the time we decided N.Y. State 771, the New York Code of Professional Responsibility did not have a specific Disciplinary Rule dealing with client testimonials. However, DR 2-101(A) of the Code did prohibit advertisements that were "false, deceptive or misleading," so this Committee examined client testimonials under that standard. We opined under that standard that the nature of the testimonial determined whether a disclaimer of the kind now mandated by Rule 7.1(e)(3) was required. Like DR 2-101(A) of the old Code, new Rule 7.1(a)(1) prohibits testimonials that are false, deceptive or misleading, but now Rule 7.1(e)(3) always requires the disclaimer set out in that subparagraph.

21 N.Y. State 771 was decided in the context of website advertising, but the principles enunciated in that opinion applied to all forms of attorney advertising, as does this opinion.

22 The rule amendments addressed in this opinion are based verbatim on language that took effect on February 1, 2007, when the Courts amended the Disciplinary Rules governing advertising and solicitation in the old Code of Professional Responsibility.

23 A restriction on testimonials or endorsements from current clients is contained in Rule 7.1(c)(1), which provides that an advertisement shall not "include an endorsement of, or testimonial about, a lawyer or law firm from a client with respect to a matter still pending." Rule 7.1(c)(1) was declared unconstitutional and its enforcement was permanently enjoined in Alexander v. Cahill, 634 F.Supp.2d 239 (N.D.N.Y. 2007), but the defendants (disciplinary counsel in all four Departments) appealed to the Second Circuit, and the appeal was still pending when we issued this opinion. The outcome does not affect our analysis here because Rule 7.1(c) regulates only the types of testimonials and endorsements permitted, not whether they require a disclaimer.

CONCLUSION:

5. We answer the question in the affirmative. Under Rule 7.1(e)(3), an advertisement that contains a client testimonial or endorsement must also contain the disclaimer: "Prior results do not guarantee a similar outcome."

OPINION 835 (12/24/2009)

TOPIC: Multijurisdictional law practice by corporate counsel

DIGEST: The question of whether an out-of-state lawyer may serve as in-house counsel for a New York corporation and maintain an office in New York is not answered by the New York Rules of Professional Conduct, but rather is a question of law beyond the Committee's jurisdiction.

RULES: Rule 5.5.

QUESTION:

1. May a person who is not admitted to practice law in New York but who is admitted to practice law and is in good standing in another U.S. jurisdiction serve as general counsel for a corporation headquartered in New York and maintain an office in New York for that purpose?

OPINION:

2. In New York, as elsewhere, the law generally forbids the unauthorized practice of law ("UPL"), which may include legal work performed by out-of-state lawyers as well as by non-lawyers. (The term "out-of-state lawyer" is not defined in the Rules but we use the term "out-of-state lawyer" for purposes of this opinion to mean a person who is not admitted to practice in New York but is admitted to practice and in good standing in another U.S. jurisdiction.) In New York, §§ 476-a, 478 and 484 of the Judiciary Law govern the unauthorized practice of law. Generally speaking, these provisions forbid individuals from maintaining a law practice or otherwise providing legal services in New York unless they are licensed to practice law in this state or otherwise authorized to render particular legal services in New York (for example, by admission pro hac vice).

3. The scope and application of these Judiciary Law provisions is a question of law that courts of New York have addressed, albeit infrequently. See, e.g., El Gemayel v. Seaman, 72 N.Y.2d 701, 707 (1988) (finding that "in the circumstances of this case, phone calls to New York by plaintiff, an attorney licensed in a foreign jurisdiction, to advise his client of the progress of legal proceedings in that foreign jurisdiction, did not, without more, constitute the 'practice' of law in this State in violation of [Judiciary Law] § 478"); Spivak v. Sachs, 16 N.Y.2d 163 (1965) (holding that a California attorney engaged in the unlawful practice of law in New York by assisting an acquaintance in New York with her divorce, where the California attorney became substantially involved in the client's New York affairs – spending 14 days in New York attending meetings, reviewing drafts of a separation agreement, discussing the client's financial and custody problems, recommending a change in New York counsel and, based on his knowledge of New York and California law, rendering his opinion as to the proper jurisdiction for the divorce action and related marital and custody issues).

4. Among other things, the case law suggests that out-of-state lawyers are not engaging in the "unauthorized practice of law" in New York when they perform "incidental and innocuous" legal work in New York in the course of representing clients from their home jurisdictions. El Gemayel v. Seaman, 72 N.Y.2d at 707; accord Spivak v. Sachs, 16 N.Y.2d at 168 ("recognizing the numerous multi-State transactions and relationships of modern times, we cannot penalize every instance in which an attorney from another State comes into our State for conferences or negotiations relating to a New York client and a transaction somehow tied to New York").

5. In New York, the question of whether an out-of-state lawyer is engaged in the unauthorized practice of law in New York is exclusively a matter of law. Unlike the professional conduct rules of most other states, the New York Rules of Professional Conduct ("N.Y. Rules") that took effect on April 1, 2009 do not include provisions modeled on ABA Model Rule 5.5(b), (c) & (d). In jurisdictions in which the courts have adopted provisions comparable to Model Rule 5.5(b)-(d), the provisions have two related effects – they both judicially "authorize" out-of-state lawyers to practice law in the jurisdiction within the limits set by Rule 5.5, and they interpret the conduct authorized by Rule 5.5 as conduct that does not violate the jurisdiction's statutory and common law regulation of UPL. The rule functions as if it were a global pro hac vice order admitting every out-of-state lawyer to practice in the jurisdiction within the limits described in Rule 5.5. (Of course, even in states that have adopted ABA Model Rule 5.5, an out-of-state lawyer who desires to appear in court in a state where the lawyer is not licensed to practice must still seek formal admission pro hac vice to that court.)

6. The New York State Bar Association has twice recommended (first in 2003, then again in 2008) that the New York courts adopt provisions similar to those in ABA Model Rule 5.5, but both times the Appellate Divisions have declined to do so. Consequently, the N.Y. Rules include no provision comparable to ABA Model Rule 5.5(d)(1), which would authorize out-of-state lawyers to work in New York as in-house corporate counsel other than in proceedings in which pro hac vice admission is required. Nor does New York have a court-adopted "in-house registration" rule, like that of many states, authorizing out-of-state lawyers who satisfy registration requirements to practice law in the state. See ABA Model Rule for Registration of In-House Counsel (adopted by the ABA House of Delegates in August 2008).[24]

7. The jurisdiction of this Committee is limited to answering questions about the meaning and application of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct. We do not interpret court rules or statues. The question whether an out-of-state lawyer may serve as in-house corporate counsel with an office in New York without gaining admission to the New York Bar is entirely a matter of state law governed principally by the Judiciary Law, which is statutory. It is not governed by any provision in the N.Y. Rules of Professional Conduct. Consequently, this Committee lacks jurisdiction to answer the question.

CONCLUSION:

8. The question whether an out-of-state lawyer may serve as in-house counsel for a New York corporation and maintain an office in New York for that purpose is a question of law, and is not answered by the New York Rules of Professional Conduct. The question is therefore beyond our jurisdiction and we offer no opinion on the question. Because the question is a recurring one, however, this Committee urges the Appellate Divisions and/or the New York State Legislature to provide further guidance regarding whether and to what extent out-of-state lawyers – especially in-house lawyers who provide services solely to a corporate employer – are authorized to practice law in New York. OPINION 836 (02/25/2010)

TOPIC: Dual representation of Guardian and incapacitated person in a proceeding to terminate the guardianship.

DIGEST: Lawyer who previously represented incapacitated Client in connection with the appointment of a Guardian for Client may later undertake dual representation of both Client and Guardian in a proceeding to terminate the guardianship, provided (a) Lawyer reasonably believes that Lawyer will be able to competently and diligently represent both clients, and (b) Lawyer obtains informed consent from each client, confirmed in writing.

RULES: 1.0(e); 1.0(j); 1.7; 1.14

COMMENTS: Comment 28 to Rule 1.7

QUESTION:

[1.] May Lawyer, who previously represented an incapacitated Client in connection with the appointment of a Guardian for Client, later represent both Client and Guardian in a proceeding to terminate the Guardianship?

OPINION:

[2.] Lawyer represented an incapacitated Client in connection with the appointment of a Guardian for Client. At that time, Guardian (one of Client's adult children) was appointed with Client's consent. Some time later, Client, Guardian, and Client's other adult children all agreed that the guardianship should be terminated. The reasons for terminating the guardianship are twofold: (1) Client has been living independently and no longer needs a Guardian, and (2) Guardian is planning to move across the country.

[3.] Client and Guardian have asked Lawyer to represent them both in a proceeding to discharge the Guardian. We will assume that the court wishes both Client and Guardian to be represented and approves of this dual representation.

[4.] There is always the possibility that a conflict of interest will arise between a guardian and the incapacitated person who is or will be the subject of the guardianship. While such conflicts might be more likely to arise at the inception of guardianship proceedings, they might also occur in connection with the termination of the guardianship. For example, it might be that the guardian seeks to escape the responsibilities of the guardianship even though the incapacitated person would be better served by continuing it. Here, the fact that the Guardian wishes to terminate the guardianship in anticipation of moving across country raises this possibility.

[5.] The proposed dual representation of Guardian and Client in a proceeding to terminate the guardianship must be analyzed under Rule 1.7 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct, adopted effective April 1, 2009. Rule 1.7 provides:

> RULE 1.7. CONFLICT OF INTEREST: CURRENT CLIENTS
> (a) Except as provided in paragraph (b), a lawyer shall not represent a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that either:
> (1) the representation will involve the lawyer in representing differing interests; or
> (2) there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests.
> (b) Notwithstanding the existence of a concurrent conflict of interest under paragraph (a), a lawyer may represent a client if:
> (1) the lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client;
>
> (2) the representation is not prohibited by law;
>
> (3) the representation does not involve the assertion of a claim by one client against another client represented by the lawyer in the same litigation or other proceeding before a tribunal; and
> (4) each affected client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing.

[6.] The proposed dual representation will involve Lawyer in representing differing interests because a person who has been found to be incapacitated in the past presumably needs a guardian until proven otherwise, while the Guardian here wishes to be relieved of his guardianship responsibilities. The differing interests create a conflict under Rule 1.7(a)(1). Therefore, the conflict must be analyzed under Rule 1.7(b)(1)-(3) to determine whether it is consentable (i.e., waivable).

[7.] It appears at present that the parties are aligned in interest and agree that the guardianship should be terminated, so any serious clash of interests between Client and Guardian is merely a future possibility. Therefore, unless other factors or circumstances of which we are unaware suggest a different conclusion, we think Lawyer may reasonably believe that he will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to both parties (Client and Guardian) in this matter. In particular, the belief appears reasonable because this representation does not occur in an adversarial setting and the whole matter will be under the supervision of the court.

[8.] If Lawyer, based on an appropriate investigation, reasonably believes that he can provide competent and diligent representation to both clients, then Rule 1.7(b)(1) does not prohibit the dual representation. Moreover, because the proposed dual representation is not prohibited by law and will not involve the lawyer in asserting a claim by either client against the other, neither Rule 1.7(b)(2) nor Rule 1.7(b)(3) prohibits the dual representation. Provided Lawyer meets the standards set forth in Rule 1.7(b)(1)-(3), the conflict is consentable.[1]

[9.] Consentability alone, however, is not enough. When a conflict is consentable, Rule 1.7(b)(4) requires that Lawyer actually obtain informed consent, confirmed in writing, from each of the clients. Rule 1.0(e) defines "confirmed in writing," and we assume lawyer will confirm any consent in writing in accordance with that definition. Rule 1.0(j) defines the crucial term "informed consent" as follows:

> "Informed consent" denotes the agreement by a person to a proposed course of conduct after the lawyer has communicated information adequate for the person to make an informed decision, and after the lawyer has adequately explained to the person the material risks of the proposed course of conduct and reasonably available alternatives.

[10.] Accordingly, Lawyer must fully inform each party of the possible risks of the dual representation. One such risk is that material disagreements may later arise between the two clients that will preclude Lawyer from reasonably believing that he can continue to provide competent and diligent representation to each of them. In that case, Lawyer would no longer be able to represent both clients, and both clients would have to engage new lawyers unless one client (who would now be a former client) gives informed consent, confirmed in writing, for the lawyer to continue representing the other client.

[11.] When obtaining informed consent from Client, Lawyer must take special care because Client is presently deemed to be incapacitated and under guardianship. However, three sources – Rule 1.14 our Rules of Professional Conduct[2], our prior opinion in N.Y. State 746[3], and New York's Mental Hygiene Law[4] – all support the conclusion that Client may consent to this dual representation despite Client's present legal designation of incapacity. Of course, Lawyer must carefully assess Client's capacity to understand the conflict and to make a reasoned decision whether to consent to the representation despite the conflict. This careful assessment is necessary because if Client's capacity to make reasoned decisions is so diminished that she cannot give informed consent to the dual representation, then Lawyer cannot satisfy the informed consent requirement of Rule 1.7(b)(4). If a lawyer

1 Comment 28 to Rule 1.7 recognizes that "[w]hether a conflict is consentable depends on the circumstances. For example, a lawyer may not represent multiple parties to a negotiation if their interests are fundamentally antagonistic to each other, but common representation is permissible where the clients are generally aligned in interest, even though there is some difference in interest among them."

2 Rule 1.14 ("Client with Diminished Capacity") deals with representing a person with diminished capacity and directs that "the lawyer shall, as far as reasonably possible, maintain a conventional relationship with the client."

3 In N.Y. State 746 (2001) (which was based on provisions of the New York Lawyer's Code of Professional Responsibility then in effect), we said "there is generally no bar to representing a client whose decision making capacity is impaired, but who is capable of making decisions and participating in the representation. Insofar as the client is making reasoned decisions concerning those matters that are for the client to decide and these decisions appear to be in the client's best interests, there would ordinarily be no need for the lawyer even to consider withdrawing from the representation or seeking the appointment of a guardian who would substitute his or her judgment for that of the client." This is consistent with recognizing an incapacitated client's ability to consent to the dual representation.

4 The Mental Hygiene Law mandates that an incapacitated person should be afforded the greatest amount of independence and self-determination possible, and states that an incapacitated person retains all of the powers and rights except those which are specifically granted to the guardian. N.Y. Mental Hyg. Law § 81.20 and 81.29.

cannot satisfy the informed consent requirement of Rule 1.7(b)(4), then the lawyer cannot undertake the dual representation.

[12.] In seeking Client's informed consent to the dual representation, Lawyer must take Client's capacity into account and provide Client with information and explanations suitable to Client's understanding. Again, since the discharge of the Guardian will take place only if the court determines it is appropriate, any concerns we might have about the feasibility of obtaining informed consent from the incapacitated Client are substantially mitigated.

CONCLUSION:

[13.] Lawyer who previously represented an incapacitated Client in connection with a the appointment of a Guardian for Client may later undertake dual representation of both Client and Guardian seeking termination of the guardianship, provided Lawyer reasonably believes that Lawyer will be able to competently and diligently represent both clients and Lawyer obtains informed consent from each client, confirmed in writing.

OPINION 837 (03/16/2010)

TOPIC: Confronting false evidence and false testimony.

DIGEST: Rule 3.3 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct requires an attorney to disclose client confidential information to a tribunal if disclosure is necessary to remedy false evidence or testimony. The exception in former DR 7-102(B)(1) exempting disclosure of information protected as a client "confidences or secret" no longer exists.

RULES: Rule 1.0(k); Rule 1.6; Rule 3.3; DR 4-101; DR 7-102

QUESTION:

1. Inquiring counsel's client gave sworn testimony at an arbitration proceeding concerning a document. The document was admitted into evidence based upon the testimony. Counsel's client also testified concerning the client's actions in preparing the document and submitting the document to the client's employer.

2. In a later conversation between client and counsel, the client informed counsel that the document was forged. Counsel thereby came to know that the document was some of the client's testimony concerning the document were false.

3. Inquiring counsel raises the following questions:

(1) Is counsel required to inform the tribunal that the document in question is a forgery and that some of the testimony relating to the document is false?

(2) If not, what other steps would constitute reasonable remedial measures? In particular, would it suffice for counsel to inform the tribunal and opposing counsel that the evidence and any testimony relating to it are being withdrawn, and that he intends to proceed based on all other evidence properly before the tribunal?

(3) Is counsel required to withdraw from representation of the client? If so, would withdrawal constitute a reasonable and sufficient remedial measure?

OPINION:

4. The New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") were formally adopted by the Appellate Divisions and took effect on April 1, 2009. The Rules replaced the New York Code of Professional Responsibility (the "Code"). The Rules are now codified at 22 NYCRR Part 1200 (as was the Code previously). Comments to the Rules also took effect on April 1, 2009 but have been adopted only by the New York State Bar Association, not by the courts.

The Old Code and the New Rules

5. In the former New York Code of Professional Responsibility, DR 7-102(B) provided (with emphasis added):

> A lawyer who receives information clearly establishing that:
> (1) the client has, in the course of the representation, perpetrated a fraud upon a person or tribunal shall promptly call upon the client to rectify the same, and if the client refuses or is unable to do so, the lawyer shall reveal the fraud to the effected person or tribunal, except when the information is protected as a confidence or secret.

The New Rules

6. Rule 3.3 ("Conduct Before a Tribunal") now covers the same ground that was previously covered by DR 7-102. Rule 3.3(a)(3) provides, in relevant part:

> If a lawyer, the lawyer's client, or witness called by the lawyer has offered material evidence and the lawyer comes to know of its falsity, the lawyer shall take reasonable remedial measures, including, if necessary, disclosure to the tribunal.

Rule 3.3(b) provides, in relevant part:

> A lawyer who represents a client before a tribunal and who knows that a person . . . is engaging or has engaged in criminal or fraudulent conduct related to the proceeding shall take reasonable remedial measures, including, if necessary, disclosure to the tribunal.

Rule 3.3(c) provides:

> The duties stated in paragraphs (a) and (b) apply even if compliance requires disclosure of information otherwise protected by Rule 1.6.[5]

Analysis of the Changes

7. In Roy Simon, Comparing the New NY Rules of Professional Conduct to the Existing NY Code of Professional Responsibility (Part II), N.Y. Prof. Resp. Report, March 2009, Professor Simon characterized Rule 3.3 as:

> perhaps the most radical break with the existing Code. Under DR 7 (102(B)(1) of the current Code of Professional Responsibility, if a lawyer learns ("receives information clearly establishing") after the fact that a client has lied to a tribunal, then the lawyer "shall reveal the fraud" to the tribunal, "except when the information is protected as a confidence or secret" – which it nearly always will be, because disclosing that a client has committed perjury is embarrassing and detrimental to the client. Thus, the exception swallows the rule, and confidentiality trumps candor to the court in the current Code. In contrast, Rule 3.3(a) provides that if a lawyer or the lawyer's client has offered evidence to a tribunal and the lawyer later learns ("comes to know") that the > evidence is false, the lawyer "shall take reasonable remedial measures, including, if necessary, disclosure to the tribunal." Rule 3.3(c) makes crystal clear that the disclosure duty applies "even if" the information that the lawyer discloses is protected by the confidentiality rule (Rule 1.6). This is a major change from DR 7-102(B)(1) . . .

5 Rule 1.6 ("Confidentiality of Information") governs a lawyer's obligation to safeguard "confidential information." "Confidential information" under the Rules includes what were formerly referred to under the Code as confidences and secrets. Compare former DR 4-101(A) of the Code, with Rule 1.6(a).

8. As noted in Comment [11] to Rule 3.3:

> A disclosure of a client's false testimony can result in grave consequences to the client, including not only a sense of betrayal but also loss of the case and perhaps a prosecution for perjury. But the alternative is for the lawyer to cooperate in deceiving the court, thereby subverting the truth-finding process, which the adversary system is designed to implement. See, Rule 1.2(d).

9. By its terms, DR 7-102(B)(1) came into play only if (1) the attorney "receive[d] information clearly establishing that" (2) a "fraud" had been perpetrated upon a person or tribunal.

10. Thus, the benchmark for invoking counsel's responsibility has shifted from DR 7-102(B)'s receipt of information clearly establishing fraud on a tribunal to Rule 3.3(a)'s standard of "actual knowledge of the fact in question". Rule 1.0(k) defines "knowingly," "known," "know" or knows" with the proviso that "[a] person's knowledge may be inferred from circumstances." That definition is consistent with Rule 3.3, Comment [8], which observes:

> The prohibition against offering or using false evidence applies only if the lawyer knows that the evidence was false. A lawyer's reasonable belief that evidence is false does not preclude its presentation to the trier of fact. A lawyer's actual knowledge that evidence is false, however, can be inferred from the circumstances. See, Rule 1.0(k) for the definition of "knowledge." Thus, although a lawyer should resolve doubts about the veracity of testimony or other evidence in favor of the client, the lawyer cannot ignore an obvious falsehood.

11. Another difference between the old Code and the new Rules is that DR 7-102(B)(1) required a "fraud" to have been perpetrated. Rule 3.3(b) likewise applies only in the case of "criminal or fraudulent" conduct, but Rule 3.3(a)(3) requires a lawyer to remedy false evidence even if it was innocently offered.[6]

12. Remedial measures are limited, however, by CPLR §4503(a)(1), the legislatively-enacted attorney-client privilege. The attorney-client privilege takes precedence over the Rules because the Rules are court rules rather than statutory enactments. However, CPLR §4503's limit on remedial measures extends only to the introduction of protected information into evidence. As explained in Comment [3] to Rule 1.6:

6 To the extent that this Committee's prior opinions in N.Y. State 674 (1994), N.Y. State 681 (1996), and N.Y. State 797 (2006) premised their results upon the inability of the Committee to ascertain whether a "fraud" had occurred or was occurring, or upon the existence of an "exception" which relieved an attorney of the obligation to disclose a fraud on a tribunal if the fraud was discovered by the attorney via a client confidence or secret, those results would today require a re-analysis in light of the existing Rules.

> The principle of client-lawyer confidentiality is given effect in three related bodies of law: the attorney-client privilege of evidence law, the work-product doctrine of civil procedure and the professional duty of confidentiality established in legal ethics codes. The attorney-client privilege and the work-product doctrine apply when compulsory process by a judicial or other governmental body seeks to compel a lawyer to testify or produce information or evidence concerning a client. The professional duty of client-lawyer confidentiality, in contrast, applies to a lawyer in all settings and at all times, prohibiting the lawyer from disclosing confidential information unless permitted or required by these Rules or to comply with other law or court order.

See Gregory C. Sisk, Change and Continuity in Attorney-Client Confidentiality: The New Iowa Rules of Professional Conduct, 55 Drake L. Rev. 347, 381-384 (Winter 2007) (contrasting exceptions to Iowa's confidentiality rule with exceptions to Iowa's attorney-client privilege and asserting that such exceptions "are not exceptions to the attorney-client privilege"); Gregory C. Sisk, Rule 1.6 Confidentiality of Information, 16 Ia. Prac., Lawyer and Judicial Ethics §5:6(d)(E)(2009 ed.).

13. As elaborated by Professor Sisk, Rule 3.3 Candor Toward the Tribunal, 16 Ia. Prac., Lawyer and Judicial Ethics § 7:3(e)(3)(2009 ed.):

> Unless an exception to confidentiality under the rules (such as the Rule 3.3 duty to disclose false evidence) is directly co-extensive with an exception to the attorney-client privilege, the lawyer is authorized or required to share information only in the manner and to the extent necessary to prevent or correct the harm or achieve the designed purpose, but not to testify or give evidence against the client. When an exception to confidentiality stated in the ethics rules does not align with an exception to the attorney-client privilege, the lawyer's duty of disclosure is limited to extra-evidentiary forms, namely sharing the information with the appropriate person or authorities. In sum, the exception to confidentiality in Rule 3.3 does not permit introduction of attorney-client communications into evidence through lawyer testimony or permit inquiry about those communications as part of the presentation of evidence before any tribunal, absent a recognized exception to the privilege itself.[7]

See also, Michael H. Berger and Katie A. Reilly, The Duty of Confidentiality: Legal Ethics and the Attorney-Client and Work Product Privileges, 38-JAN Colo. Law. 35, 38 (January 2009) (concluding that privileged communications are subject to the permissive disclosure provisions of Rule 1.6).

7 The attorney-client privilege itself would not cover material which falls under the crime-fraud exception to the attorney-client privilege. Because the crime-fraud exception has typically been applied tin situations involving documentary discovery which are quite different from the scenarios contemplated by Rule 3.3, and because the crime-fraud exception has been interpreted to apply only to situations in which the client communication was itself in furtherance of the crime or fraud (see, e.g., United States v. Richard Roe, Inc., 68 F. 3d 38, 40 (2d Cir. 1995) ("[A] party seeking to invoke the crime-fraud exception must at least demonstrate that there is probable cause to believe that a crime or fraud has been attempted or committed and that the communications were in furtherance thereof."); Linde v. Arab Bank, PLC, 608 F.Supp.2d 351, 357 (E.D.N.Y, 2009) (quoting U.S. v. Richard Roe, Inc., for the proposition that the crime-fraud exception does not apply simply because privileged communications would provide an adversary with evidence of a crime or fraud), the precise nature of the interplay between Rule 3.3, the attorney-client privilege, and the crime-fraud exception to that privilege remains to be explored in further court decisions and ethics opinions.

14. In the criminal, as opposed to civil, sphere, Rule 3.3's mandate to disclose client confidential information may be limited or prohibited by the Fifth Amendment (self-incrimination) and/or the Sixth Amendment (ineffective assistance of counsel) to the United States Constitution. See Monroe H. Freedman, Getting Honest About Client Perjury, 21 Geo. J. Legal Ethics 133 (Winter 2008). As explained in Comment [7] to New York Rule 3.3:

> The lawyer's ethical duty may be qualified by judicial decisions interpreting the constitutional rights to due process and to counsel in criminal cases. The obligation of the advocate under the Rules of Professional Conduct is subordinate to such requirements.

15. Some decisions construing Rule 3.3's predecessor (DR 7-102) did not find such constitutional limitations, but those decisions addressed "future perjury" situations. See, e.g. People v. Andrades, 4 N.Y. 3d 355 (2005) (defendant was not deprived of his rights to effective assistance of counsel and to a fair suppression hearing when his attorney advised the court, prior to defendant's testimony at a Huntley hearing, that counsel wished to present the client's testimony in narrative form, or else withdraw from the case, pursuant to the mandates of DR 7-102(A)(4) – (8)); People v. DePallo, 96 N.Y. 2d 437 (2001) (defendant was not deprived of his right to effective assistance of counsel when his attorney disclosed to the court that defendant intended to commit perjury); People v. Darrett, 2 A.D.3d 16 (1st Dep't 2003) (defendant's counsel improperly revealed more than necessary to the court to convey what proved to be an inaccurate belief that the defendant would commit perjury); Nix v. Whiteside, 475 U.S. 157 (1986) (right to effective assistance of counsel as not violated by attorney who refused to cooperate in presenting perjured testimony). Situations involving past rather than future perjury will of necessity await further judicial development.

Duration of the duty to take remedial measures

16. The New York State Bar Association recommended that New York Rule 3.3(c) track ABA Model Rule 3.3(c), and thus include the proviso that "[t]he duties stated in paragraphs (a) and (b) continue to the conclusion of the proceeding . . .". The State Bar's proposal also included a Comment [13] to Rule 3.3, which explained that proposed Rule 3.3(c) "establishes a practical time limit on the mandatory obligation to rectify false evidence or false statements of law and fact. The conclusion of the proceeding is a reasonably definite point for the termination of the mandatory obligation." See Proposed Rules of Professional Conduct, pp. 132-138 (Feb. 1, 2008). But the State Bar's proposal was not embodied in New York Rule 3.3(c) as adopted by the Appellate Divisions. Therefore, the duration of counsel's obligation under New York Rule 3.3(c) as adopted may continue even after the conclusion of the proceeding in which the false material was used. Cf., N.Y. County 706, n. 1 (1995) (noting that under ABA Rule 3.3(b) the duty to take remedial measures would end at the close of the proceeding). This Committee has noted that the endpoint of the obligation nevertheless cannot sensibly or logically be viewed as extending beyond the point at which remedial measures are available, since a disclosure which exposes the client to jeopardy without serving any remedial purpose is not authorized under Rule 3.3. See N.Y. State 831, n. 4 (2009).

Application to the facts on this inquiry

17. Rule 3.3(a)(3) does not apply unless the false evidence or testimony that has been offered is also "material." While inquiring counsel has not specifically addressed the question of materiality, for purposes of this opinion we assume that the testimony and the documentary evidence at issue were "material." See, e.g., N.Y. County 732 (2004) at p. 5 (discussion of the materiality requirement under DR 4-101(C) that permitted withdrawal of a lawyer's opinion if based on "materially inaccurate" information). Were this not the case, inquiring counsel would be under no obligation to take any remedial action, and would instead be bound by the usual obligation to safeguard confidential information imposed by Rule 1.6.

18. Here, whether inquiring counsel's conversation with his client constituted a communication covered by the attorney-client privilege presents an issue of law beyond the Committee's purview. See, e.g., N.Y. State 674 (1994) (noting that whether disclosure is "required by law or court order" is a question beyond the Committee's jurisdiction). However, inquiring counsel has stipulated that he now "knows" that his client has offered material evidence and testimony which was false. Rule 3.3(a)(3) therefore requires inquiring counsel to "take reasonable remedial measures," whether or not the client's conduct was "criminal or fraudulent" (the standard for invoking 3.3(b)).

19. Disclosure of the falsity, however, is required only "if necessary." Moreover, because counsel's knowledge constitutes confidential information under Rule 1.6, and does not fall within any of the exceptions contained in Rule 1.6(b), if disclosure is not "necessary" under Rule 3.3, it would also not be permitted under Rule 1.6. Therefore, if there are any reasonable remedial measures short of disclosure, that course must be taken.

20. In the situation addressed in this opinion, inquiring counsel has suggested an intermediate means of proceeding – he would inform the tribunal that the specific item of evidence and the related testimony are being withdrawn, but he would not expressly make any statement regarding the truth or falsity of the withdrawn items. The Committee approves of this suggestion. This would be the same sort of disclosure typically made when an attorney announces an intent to permit a criminal defendant client to testify in narrative form. It may lead the court or opposing counsel to draw an inference adverse to the lawyer's client, but would not involve counsel's actual disclosure of the falsity. See People v. Andrades, 4 N.Y.3d 355 (2005) (counsel advised the court that he planned to present defendant's testimony in narrative form, and counsel's disclosure was open to inference that defendant planned to perjure himself, but counsel's action was proper because it was a passive refusal to lend aid to perjury rather than an unequivocal announcement of counsel's client's perjurious intentions); Benedict v. Henderson, 721 F.Supp. 1560, 1563 (N.D.N.Y. 1989) (affirming counsel's use of the narrative form of testimony "without intrusion of direct questions," because counsel thereby met his "obligation . . . not to assist in any way presenting false evidence").

21. Inquiring counsel should be aware that before acting unilaterally, he should bring the issue of false evidence to the client's attention, and seek the client's cooperation in taking remedial action. Comment [10] to New York Rule 3.3 provides:

> The advocate's proper course is to remonstrate with the client confidentially, advise the client of the lawyer's duty of candor to the tribunal, and seek the client's cooperation with respect to the withdrawal or correction of the false statements or evidence. If that fails, the advocate must take further remedial action. If withdrawal from the representation is not permitted or will not undo the effect of the false evidence, the advocate > must make such disclosure to the tribunals is reasonably necessary to remedy the situation . . . .

Counsel's actions are thus mandated by Rule 3.3(a)(3) (after client consultation) and are not subject to the client's veto.

22. Counsel remains under the continuing obligation of CPLR §4503(a) to refrain from offering attorney-client privileged evidence adverse to the client, and in fact is under a continuing obligation to invoke the attorney client-privilege if called to testify or otherwise produce evidence adverse to the client. In addition, counsel should be cognizant of the restriction on ex parte communications noted in Rule 3.5(a)(2), and in related Comment [2] to New York Rule 3.5

23. Since counsel is able to proceed without violating these Rules, withdrawal from representation pursuant to Rule 1.16(b)(1) is not required. Indeed, since it would not undo the effect of the false evidence, withdrawal would be insufficient to qualify as a "reasonable remedial measure" under Rule 3.3(a).

CONCLUSION:

24. Rule 3.3 requires an attorney to take reasonable remedial measures even if doing so would entail the disclosure to a tribunal of client confidential information otherwise protected by Rule 1.6. However, if reasonable remedial measures less harmful to the client than disclosure are available, then disclosure to the tribunal is not "necessary" to remedy the falsehood and the attorney must use measures short of disclosure.

OPINION 838 (03/10/2010)

TOPIC: Whether a rule-making or rate-making proceeding before an administrative agency or one of its officials should be considered as being before a "tribunal" for purposes of the Rules; and whether ex parte communications in such a proceeding are prohibited.

DIGEST: Whether a rule-making or rate-making proceeding before an administrative agency or one of its officials should be considered a proceeding before a "tribunal" for purposes of the Rules is a question of fact. Principles that would apply to the determination include (a) whether individual parties will be affected by the decision; (b) whether the parties have the opportunity to present evidence and cross-examine other providers; and (c) whether the ultimate determination will be made by a person in a policy-making role or instead by an independent trier of fact such as an administrative law judge. Even if the proceeding is before a "tribunal," Rule 3.5 does not apply unless the proceeding is an "adversary proceeding" and the agency does not have its own rules or regulations authorizing ex parte communications in connection with such proceedings.

RULES: 1.0(l), 1.0(w), 1.7, 1.16, 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 3.7, 3.9, 4.1-4.4, 8.3, 8.4

QUESTION:

1. When would a proceeding before a New York State administrative agency, such as the Public Service Commission, be considered a proceeding before a "tribunal" for purposes of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct? Is the relevant criterion what the Agency is doing (i.e. adjudication versus rulemaking) or how it is acting (i.e. using an adjudicative process)?

2. If an Agency rule-making or rate-making proceeding qualifies as being before a "tribunal," does Rule 3.5 always prohibit a lawyer from communicating ex parte as to the merits of the matter with a judge or other official of the tribunal?

DISCUSSION:

What is a tribunal?

3. Many of the rules in the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"), as effective April 1, 2009, prescribe lawyer conduct when acting before a tribunal. See, e.g. Rule 1.7(b)(3) (conflicts in proceedings before a tribunal), Rule 1.16(c)(13) & (d) (withdrawal in matters pending before a tribunal), Rule 3.3 (candor to a tribunal), Rule 3.4 (fairness to opposing parties and counsel in appearances before a tribunal), Rule 3.5 (impartiality of tribunals), Rule 3.7 (lawyer as witness in matter before a tribunal), and Rule 8.3 (reporting misconduct to a tribunal).

4. The New York Code of Professional Responsibility, which was effective prior to the adoption of the Rules, defined "Tribunal" as including "all courts, arbitrators and other adjudicatory bodies." See Definition 6. The ABA Model Rules of Professional Conduct did not define the term "tribunal" until 2001, when the ABA adopted a definition of "tribunal" that included not only courts but also binding arbitration, legislative bodies, administrative agencies or other bodies "acting in an adjudicative capacity." The definition of "tribunal" in the New York Rules adopts the definition in the ABA

Model Rules. Specifically, New York's definition of "tribunal, which appears in Rule 1.0(w), reads as follows:

> "Tribunal" denotes a court, an arbitrator in an arbitration proceeding or a legislative body, administrative agency or other body acting in an adjudicative capacity. A legislative body, administrative agency or other body acts in an adjudicative capacity when a neutral official, after the presentation of evidence or legal argument by a party or parties, will render a legal judgment directly affecting a party's interests in a particular matter.

5. Under this definition, acting in an adjudicative manner is not enough to bring agency proceedings within the definition of a tribunal. An administrative agency qualifies as a "tribunal" only when a neutral official, after presentation of evidence or legal argument by a "party or parties," will render a judgment that directly affects the party's interests in a particular matter. The definition of "matter," which is found in Rule 1.0(l), includes an "administrative proceeding . . . involving a specific party or parties."[8]

6. In many administrative agencies, a rule-making proceeding is not a matter before a "tribunal" within the meaning of the Rules because rule-making does not involve a specific party or parties. Rather, rule-making applies generally to all covered persons. In some cases, the agency's procedures may include elements that are also found in an adjudicative proceeding. For example, the proceeding might involve the taking of testimony in formal hearings. However, we believe it is not the taking of testimony or a formal hearing that characterizes a tribunal, but rather the rendering of a legal judgment on the law and the evidence that directly affects the interests of one or more parties to the matter.

7. There is evidence in Rule 3.9, entitled "Advocate in Non-Adjudicative Matters," that the drafters of the Rules did not consider rule-making to be an "adjudicative" procedure.[9] Comments [1] and [1A] to that rule state (with emphasis added):

> [1] In representation before bodies such as legislatures, municipal councils and executive and administrative agencies acting in a rule-making or policy-making capacity, lawyers present facts, formulate issues and advance argument regarding the matters under consideration. The legislative body or administrative agency is entitled to know that the lawyer is appearing in a representative capacity. Ordinarily the client will consent to being identified, but if not, such as when the lawyer is appearing on behalf of an undisclosed principal, the governmental body at least knows that the lawyer is acting in

8 Because the definition of "matter" in the Rules requires a specific party or parties, we do not give dispositive weight to the decision of the New York Court of Appeals in Allied Chemical v. Niagara Mohawk, 72 N.Y.2d 271 (1988). In that case, the Appellate Division found that certain Public Service Commission rulemaking proceedings that involved notice and comment and other "adjudicative-type procedural safeguards," were "quasi-judicial." Since the PSC's rulemaking proceeding had given Allied Chemical a full and fair opportunity to contest the same issue that would be determined in the second proceeding, the Court of Appeals held that the doctrine of collateral estoppel would prevent Allied from litigating the issue before a court. The finding that the PSC proceeding was "quasi-judicial" for purposes of collateral estoppel, however, is not dispositive of whether that type of PSC proceeding satisfies the definition of "tribunal" under the Rules.

9 We also note that the State Administrative Procedure Act ("SAPA") provides certain rules with respect to rule-making (SAPA Article 2) and adjudicatory proceedings (SAPA Article 3). In that regard, SAPA § 102(2)(ii) defines a "rule" as including "prescription for the future of rates," although certain rules regarding subscriber rates contained in an application to the public service commission are not included. Similarly, SAPA § 102(3) defines an "adjudicatory proceeding" as an activity "which is not a rule making proceeding . . . in which a determination of the legal rights, duties or privileges of named parties thereto is required by law to be made only on a record and after an opportunity for a hearing."

a representative capacity as opposed to advancing the lawyer's personal opinion as a citizen. Representation in such matters is governed by Rule 4.1 through 4.4 and 8.4.

[1A] Rule 3.9 does not apply to adjudicative proceedings before a tribunal. Court rules and other law require a lawyer, in making an appearance before a tribunal in a representative capacity, to identify the client or clients and provide other information required for communication with the tribunal or other parties.

8. Comment [1] to Rule 3.9 indicates that, when a lawyer is representing a client before an administrative agency acting in a rule-making capacity, the representation is governed by Rules 4.1 through 4.4 and 8.4.

9. Comment [1A] makes clear that, when a lawyer is acting before a tribunal, disclosure of the client's name is imperative. However, when a lawyer is representing a client in a rule-making proceeding, the lawyer need disclose only that he or she is acting in a representative capacity – the lawyer need not disclose the name of the client. The clear implication of this difference – a lawyer must disclose a client's name when representing a client before a tribunal but not when representing a client in a rule-making proceeding – is that the drafters of the Rules did not consider rule-making to be a proceeding before a "tribunal."

10. Rate-making proceedings may be difficult to classify. They may sometimes be adjudicatory in nature and sometimes not. Rate-making proceedings often affect individual parties, and often involve an administrative law judge who will take evidence and make a recommendation to the agency. However, the determination of rates is often a political or quasi-legislative process, which is based on policy considerations as well as evidence of costs. Such quasi-legislative and policy considerations may implicate the rights of participants to petition the government within the meaning of the First Amendment. ("Congress shall make no law . . . abridging . . . the right of the people . . . to petition the Government for a redress of grievances."). See California Motor Transport Co. v. Trucking Unlimited, 404 U.S. 508, 510 (1972) (same philosophy that underlies the Petition Clause governs the approach of citizens or groups of citizens to administrative agencies, and the right to petition extends to all departments of the government). Not surprisingly, therefore, Comment [1] to Rule 3.9 indicates that agencies acting in a policy-making capacity are acting in a non-adjudicative capacity.

11. In sum, a government agency may sometimes act in an adjudicative capacity, and thus qualify as a "tribunal," and at other times act in an non-adjudicative capacity, and thus not qualify as a "tribunal." Ultimately, whether the fact-finder in a rule-making or rate-making proceeding should be deemed to be a "tribunal" for purpose of the Rules is a question of fact that is beyond the jurisdiction of this Committee. The Agency's own characterization, or the characterization under the State Administrative Procedure Act, is not necessarily dispositive.

12. To generalize, we believe the determination of whether a particular proceeding is adjudicatory will involve one or more of the following factors:

(a) Whether specific parties will be affected by the decision;

(b) Whether the parties have the opportunity to present evidence and cross examine other providers or evidence; and

> (c) Whether the ultimate determination will be made by a person in a policy-making role or by an independent trier of fact, such as an administrative law judge.

Application of Rule 3.5

13. Rule 3.5, entitled "Maintaining and Preserving the Impartiality of Tribunals and Jurors," is designed to preserve the impartiality of tribunals by prohibiting improper influence through (i) gifts, loans and political contributions, or (ii) ex parte communications. Impartiality is not defined in the Rules, but rather in the Code of Judicial Conduct, where its meaning is given as the "absence of bias or prejudice" for or against "particular parties," and "maintaining an open mind in considering issues." New York Code of Judicial Conduct §100.0(R).

14. Even if it is determined that a particular rule-making or rate-making proceeding is before a "tribunal" because the proceeding involves a neutral official who, after presentation of evidence or legal argument by a party or parties, will render a judgment, on the facts and the law that directly affects one or more parties' interests in a particular matter, Rule 3.5 would not necessarily apply.

15. New York Rule 3.5(a)(2), regarding communications on the merits of a matter, has no direct counterpart in the ABA Model Rules of Professional Conduct. Rather, Rule 3.5(a)(2) is derived from DR 7-110(B) of the former New York Code of Professional Responsibility. Both DR 7-110(B) and Rule 3.5(a)(2) apply only "in an adversary proceeding." Thus Rule 3.5 would only apply if the particular rule-making or rate-making proceeding were deemed to be an "adversarial proceeding."

16. Moreover, even if the rule-making or rate-making proceeding were deemed to be an "adversarial proceeding," an Agency could still determine on its own that Rule 3.5 should not apply. See, e.g., Rule 3.5(a)(2)(iv), which states:

> A lawyer shall not . . . in an adversarial proceeding communicate or cause another person to do so on the lawyer's behalf, as to the merits of the matter with a judge or official of a tribunal or an employee thereof before whom the matter is pending, except . . . as otherwise authorized by law . . . ." [Emphasis added.]

CONCLUSION:

17. Whether a rule-making or rate-making proceeding by an administrative agency or one of its officials should be considered a proceeding before a "tribunal" for purposes of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct is a question of fact. Principles that would apply to the determination include (a) whether individual parties will be affected by the decision; (b) whether the parties have the opportunity to present evidence and cross-examine other providers; and (c) whether the ultimate determination will be made by a person in a policy-making role or instead by an independent trier of fact, such as an administrative law judge.

Even if the proceeding is determined to be one before a "tribunal," Rule 3.5's restrictions on communicating with the tribunal would apply only if (i) the proceeding is determined to be an "adversary proceeding," and (ii) the agency has not adopted its own rules or regulations authorizing ex parte communications in connection with such proceedings. OPINION 839 (03/16/2010)

TOPIC: Group radio advertising.

DIGEST: Group radio advertisement that does not broadcast the lawyer's name, principal law office address and telephone number, but instead directs listeners to contact an agent who provides that information, is prohibited under Rule 7.1(h).

RULE: 7.1(h)

QUESTION:

1. May a lawyer participate in a group radio advertisement that does not broadcast the lawyer's name, principal law office address and telephone number?

OPINION:

2. A lawyer would like to participate in a group radio advertisement in which the lawyer's name and contact information would not be included in the broadcast. Instead, listeners would be directed to call or visit the website of an agent who would provide the lawyer's name, address and telephone number to any listener who identified himself as a New York State resident. In giving out that directory information, the agent would exercise no discretion. The inquirer asks whether this format would comply with N.Y. State 597 (1989), in which this Committee determined that in certain circumstances a lawyer could ethically participate in group television advertisements aimed at persons with particular types of legal problems. Specifically, N.Y. State 597 (at p. 3) did not prohibit a lawyer from participating in a group advertisement:

> if the advertisement presents in a meaningful fashion the names of the lawyers or law firms participating in the group advertisement, along with their addresses and the geographical areas assigned to them, so that the potential client knows the identify of the lawyer to whom his call will be referred and there is no discretion in referrals on the part of the advertising agent.

3. As we recognized in N.Y. State 597, the court rules then in effect in each of the four Appellate Divisions provided: "All advertisements of legal services shall include the name, office address and telephone number of the attorney or law firm whose services are being offered" (N.Y. State 587, p. 2, n. 1). That rule is continued nearly verbatim in Rule 7.1(h), which provides: "All advertisements shall include the name, principal law office address and telephone number of the lawyer or law firm whose services are being offered." Here, the proposed advertisement will not present the information required by Rule 7.1(h). Rather, an advertising agent will provide the lawyer's name and contact information in response to a listener request. That method does not evidence the presentation "in a meaningful fashion" in the advertisement of the lawyer's name, address and assigned geographical area. It thus falls short of what N.Y. State 597 contemplated. Accordingly, we are constrained to conclude that Rule 7.1(h) prohibits the inquirer from participating in the proposed group radio advertisement.

4. We recognize that, as a practical matter, our conclusion precludes lawyers from participating in group advertising on the radio if the group consists of more than a few participants. Unlike a group television advertisement, in which lawyer directory information for many lawyers might be scrolled across the screen during a voice over, a radio spot does not lend itself to broadcasting lengthy lists. Nonetheless, Rule 7.1(h) is clear and unambiguous, and permitting a group radio advertisement that does not present the names and addresses of all participating lawyers in the advertisement itself would require amendment of the Rule. We urge the State Bar and the Courts to give such an amendment serious attention.

CONCLUSION

5. We answer the question in the negative. A lawyer may not participate in a group radio advertisement that does not broadcast the lawyer's name, principal law office address and telephone number.

OPINION 840 (03/26/2010)

Distinguishing N.Y. State 786 (2005) in light of rule changes

TOPIC: Lawyer paying pro bono client's litigation expenses.

DIGEST: Under the New York Rules of Professional Conduct, a lawyer is ethically permitted to pay the litigation expenses of a pro bono client whether the pro bono client is indigent or not.

RULES: 1.8(e)(2)

CODE: DR 5-103(B)

QUESTION:

1. Is a lawyer ethically permitted to pay the litigation expenses of its pro bono client, an organization that provides legal services to the indigent, even though the organization itself is not indigent?

OPINION:

2. A lawyer represents, on a pro bono basis, a non-profit organization that provides legal services to indigent people. The lawyer wishes to pay the organization's expenses in the litigation, but the organization itself is not indigent. In N.Y. State 786 (2005), decided under the former New York Code of Professional Responsibility, this Committee concluded that a lawyer was ethically prohibited from paying the litigation expenses of a pro bono organizational client that provided legal services to the poor unless the organization itself was indigent.[10] We now examine whether the question would be answered differently under the New York Rules of Professional Conduct that took effect on April 1, 2009 (the "Rules").[11] We conclude that it would.

3. At the time N.Y. State 786 was issued, DR 5-103(B)(2) of the New York Code of Professional Responsibility required that a client be both pro bono and indigent in order for the lawyer to be permitted to pay the client's litigation expenses. In contrast, Rule 1.8(e)(2) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct provides that "a lawyer representing an indigent or pro bono client may pay court costs and expenses of litigation on behalf of the client." (Emphasis added). Therefore, under the new Rules, as long as the lawyer is representing the client on a pro bono basis, the lawyer may pay the pro bono client's court costs and expenses of litigation whether the pro bono client is indigent or not.

10 N.Y. State 786 adopted a test for indigence of an organization relating to "objective financial wherewithal, and not one that is based on the worthiness of" the organization's cause or motivations.

11 The rule amendments addressed in this opinion pre-date the April 1, 2009 amendments (which included adoption of the ABA Model Rules format). Specifically, the rule amendments at issue here originally took effect on February 1, 2007 in conjunction with extensive amendments to the advertising and solicitation rules in the old New York Code of Professional Responsibility.

CONCLUSION:

4. A lawyer providing pro bono legal representation to an organization that provides legal services to the indigent is ethically permitted to pay the organization's litigation expenses whether or not the organization is indigent.

OPINION 841 (04/12/2010)

TOPIC: Lawyer sending e-mails to other lawyers seeking referrals of people injured by a particular pharmaceutical product.

DIGEST: E-mails to other lawyers requesting referrals of clients are not "solicitations" regulated by Rule 7.3. However, the e-mails must comply with Rules 7.4 and 8.4(c).

RULES: 1.0(a); 1.5(g); 7.1; 7.3; 7.3(b); 7.4; 8.4(c).

COMMENTS: Rule 7.1, cmt. 7; Rule 7.3, cmt. 1.

QUESTION:

1. May a lawyer send e-mails to other lawyers asking them to refer cases to the sending lawyer involving people injured by a particular pharmaceutical product?

FACTS:

2. A lawyer who handles cases involving people injured by a particular pharmaceutical product proposes sending e-mails to other lawyers advising them that he is handling such cases and inviting the recipients of the e-mails to refer such cases to the lawyer.

OPINION:

3. Rule 7.3 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") establishes restrictions on solicitation by lawyers and sets forth the filing requirements for any permitted solicitation. Rule 7.3(b) defines the term "solicitation." It states that, for purposes of Rule 7.3:

> "solicitation" means any advertisement initiated by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm that is directed to, or targeted at, a specific recipient or group of recipients, or their family members or legal representatives, the primary purpose of which is the retention of the lawyer or law firm, and a significant motive for which is pecuniary gain. [Emphasis added.]

4. The communication in question here contains many elements of Rule 7.3(b) – it is "by a lawyer . . . targeted at . . . a group of recipients"; the "primary purpose" of the communication is "the retention of the lawyer"; and a "significant motive" for the communication is "pecuniary gain." But the communication lacks one crucial element of a solicitation: the communication is not an "advertisement" because it will be sent to other lawyers. Rule 1.0(a) (which defines "advertisement") expressly excludes communications to other lawyers from the definition of "advertisement." Specifically, Rule 1.0(a) provides:

> "Advertisement" means any public or private communication made by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm about that lawyer or law firm's services, the primary purpose of which is for the retention of the lawyer or law firm. It does not include communications to existing clients or other lawyers. [Emphasis added.]

5. Since the communication in question will be sent only to other lawyers, it is not an "advertisement." Therefore, it is also not a "solicitation" within the meaning of Rule 7.3(b). See Rule 7.3, cmt. 1 ("By definition, a communication that is not an 'advertisement' is not a solicitation.") A communication that is not a "solicitation" is not subject to the filing requirements (or any other requirements) of Rule 7.3. Moreover, since the communication is not an advertisement, it is also not subject to the provisions of Rule 7.1 ("Advertising"). Comment 7 to Rule 7.1 provides that communications to other lawyers are excluded from the special rules governing lawyer advertising even if their purpose is the retention of the lawyer or law firm sending them.

6. Of course, the communications must nonetheless comply with Rule 8.4(c), which prohibits a lawyer from engaging in conduct involving "dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation," and they must comply with Rule 7.4 ("Identification of Practice and Specialty"), which prohibits a lawyer or law firm from stating that the lawyer or law firm is a "specialist" or "specializes" in a particular field of law except in special circumstances.

7. Finally, if the attorney sending the communications intends to share a portion of the fee with a referring attorney, the sending attorney must comply with Rule 1.5(g), which regulates a division of legal fees with another lawyer not associated with the same law firm.

CONCLUSION:

8. A lawyer may ethically send e-mails to other lawyers asking for referrals of clients who have been injured by a particular pharmaceutical product. Since a communication to other lawyers is expressly excluded from the definition of "advertisement," the communication is not an advertisement, and is therefore also not a "solicitation." Consequently, it is not subject to the provisions of either Rule 7.1 or Rule 7.3. However, it is subject to the provisions of Rule 7.4 and Rule 8.4(c).

TOPIC: Using an outside online storage provider to store client confidential information.

DIGEST: A lawyer may use an online data storage system to store and back up client confidential information provided that the lawyer takes reasonable care to ensure that confidentiality will be maintained in a manner consistent with the lawyer's obligations under Rule 1.6. In addition, the lawyer should stay abreast of technological advances to ensure that the storage system remains sufficiently advanced to protect the client's information, and should monitor the changing law of privilege to ensure that storing the information online will not cause loss or waiver of any privilege.

RULES: 1.4, 1.6(a), 1.6(c)

QUESTION:

1. May a lawyer use an online system to store a client's confidential information without violating the duty of confidentiality or any other duty? If so, what steps should the lawyer take to ensure that the information is sufficiently secure?

OPINION:

2. Various companies offer online computer data storage systems that are maintained on an array of Internet servers located around the world. (The array of Internet servers that store the data is often called the "cloud.") A solo practitioner would like to use one of these online "cloud" computer data storage systems to store client confidential information. The lawyer's aim is to ensure that his clients' information will not be lost if something happens to the lawyer's own computers. The online data storage system is password-protected and the data stored in the online system is encrypted.

3. A discussion of confidential information implicates Rule 1.6 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"), the general rule governing confidentiality. Rule 1.6(a) provides as follows:

> A lawyer shall not knowingly reveal confidential information . . . or use such information to the disadvantage of a client or for the advantage of a lawyer or a third person, unless:
> > (1) the client gives informed consent, as defined in Rule 1.0(j);
> > (2) the disclosure is impliedly authorized to advance the best interests of the client and is either reasonable under the circumstances or customary in the professional community; or
> > (3) the disclosure is permitted by paragraph (b).

4. The obligation to preserve client confidential information extends beyond merely prohibiting an attorney from revealing confidential information without client consent. A lawyer must also take reasonable care to affirmatively protect a client's confidential information. See N.Y. County 733

(2004) (an attorney "must diligently preserve the client's confidences, whether reduced to digital format, paper, or otherwise"). As a New Jersey ethics committee observed, even when a lawyer wants a closed client file to be destroyed, "[s]imply placing the files in the trash would not suffice. Appropriate steps must be taken to ensure that confidential and privileged information remains protected and not available to third parties." New Jersey Opinion (2006), quoting New Jersey Opinion 692 (2002).

5. In addition, Rule 1.6(c) provides that an attorney must "exercise reasonable care to prevent . . . others whose services are utilized by the lawyer from disclosing or using confidential information of a client" except to the extent disclosure is permitted by Rule 1.6(b). Accordingly, a lawyer must take reasonable affirmative steps to guard against the risk of inadvertent disclosure by others who are working under the attorney's supervision or who have been retained by the attorney to assist in providing services to the client. We note, however, that exercising "reasonable care" under Rule 1.6 does not mean that the lawyer guarantees that the information is secure from any unauthorized access.

6. To date, no New York ethics opinion has addressed the ethics of storing confidential information online. However, in N.Y. State 709 (1998) this Committee addressed the duty to preserve a client's confidential information when transmitting such information electronically. Opinion 709 concluded that lawyers may transmit confidential information by e-mail, but cautioned that "lawyers must always act reasonably in choosing to use e-mail for confidential communications." The Committee also warned that the exercise of reasonable care may differ from one case to the next. Accordingly, when a lawyer is on notice that the confidential information being transmitted is "of such an extraordinarily sensitive nature that it is reasonable to use only a means of communication that is completely under the lawyer's control, the lawyer must select a more secure means of communication than unencrypted Internet e-mail." See also Rule 1.6, cmt. 17 (a lawyer "must take reasonable precautions" to prevent information coming into the hands of unintended recipients when transmitting information relating to the representation, but is not required to use special security measures if the means of communicating provides a reasonable expectation of privacy).

7. Ethics advisory opinions in several other states have approved the use of electronic storage of client files provided that sufficient precautions are in place. See, e.g., New Jersey Opinion 701 (2006) (lawyer may use electronic filing system whereby all documents are scanned into a digitized format and entrusted to someone outside the firm provided that the lawyer exercises "reasonable care," which includes entrusting documents to a third party with an enforceable obligation to preserve confidentiality and security, and employing available technology to guard against reasonably foreseeable attempts to infiltrate data); Arizona Opinion 05-04 (2005) (electronic storage of client files is permissible provided lawyers and law firms "take competent and reasonable steps to assure that the client's confidences are not disclosed to third parties through theft or inadvertence"); see also Arizona Opinion 09-04 (2009) (lawyer may provide clients with an online file storage and retrieval system that clients may access, provided lawyer takes reasonable precautions to protect security and confidentiality and lawyer periodically reviews security measures as technology advances over time to ensure that the confidentiality of client information remains reasonably protected).

8. Because the inquiring lawyer will use the online data storage system for the purpose of preserving client information - a purpose both related to the retention and necessary to providing legal services to the client - using the online system is consistent with conduct that this Committee has deemed ethically permissible. See N.Y. State 473 (1977) (absent client's objection, lawyer may provide confidential information to outside service agency for legitimate purposes relating to the representation provided that the lawyer exercises care in the selection of the agency and cautions the agency to keep the information confidential); cf. NY CPLR 4548 (privileged communication does not lose its privileged character solely because it is communicated by electronic means or because "persons necessary for the delivery or facilitation of such electronic communication may have access to" its contents).

9. We conclude that a lawyer may use an online "cloud" computer data backup system to store client files provided that the lawyer takes reasonable care to ensure that the system is secure and that client confidentiality will be maintained. "Reasonable care" to protect a client's confidential information against unauthorized disclosure may include consideration of the following steps:

(1) Ensuring that the online data storage provider has an enforceable obligation to preserve confidentiality and security, and that the provider will notify the lawyer if served with process requiring the production of client information;

(2) Investigating the online data storage provider's security measures, policies, recoverability methods, and other procedures to determine if they are adequate under the circumstances;

(3) Employing available technology to guard against reasonably foreseeable attempts to infiltrate the data that is stored; and/or

(4) Investigating the storage provider's ability to purge and wipe any copies of the data, and to move the data to a different host, if the lawyer becomes dissatisfied with the storage provider or for other reasons changes storage providers.

10. Technology and the security of stored data are changing rapidly. Even after taking some or all of these steps (or similar steps), therefore, the lawyer should periodically reconfirm that the provider's security measures remain effective in light of advances in technology. If the lawyer learns information suggesting that the security measures used by the online data storage provider are insufficient to adequately protect the confidentiality of client information, or if the lawyer learns of any breach of confidentiality by the online storage provider, then the lawyer must investigate whether there has been any breach of his or her own clients' confidential information, notify any affected clients, and discontinue use of the service unless the lawyer receives assurances that any security issues have been sufficiently remediated. See Rule 1.4 (mandating communication with clients); see also N.Y. State 820 (2008) (addressing Web-based email services).

11. Not only technology itself but also the law relating to technology and the protection of confidential communications is changing rapidly. Lawyers using online storage systems (and electronic means of communication generally) should monitor these legal developments, especially regarding instances when using technology may waive an otherwise applicable privilege. See, e.g., City of Ontario, Calif. v. Quon, 130 S. Ct. 2619, 177 L.Ed.2d 216 (2010) (holding that City did not violate Fourth Amendment when it reviewed transcripts of messages sent and received by police officers on police department pagers); Scott v. Beth Israel Medical Center, 17 Misc. 3d 934, 847 N.Y.S.2d 436 (N.Y. Sup. 2007) (e-mails between hospital employee and his personal attorneys were not privileged because employer's policy regarding computer use and e-mail monitoring stated that employees had no reasonable expectation of privacy in e-mails sent over the employer's e-mail server). But see Stengart v. Loving Care Agency, Inc., 201 N.J. 300, 990 A.2d 650 (2010) (despite employer's e-mail policy stating that company had right to review and disclose all information on "the company's media systems and services" and that e-mails were "not to be considered private or personal" to any employees, company violated employee's attorney-client privilege by reviewing e-mails sent to employee's personal attorney on employer's laptop through employee's personal, password-protected e-mail account).

12. This Committee's prior opinions have addressed the disclosure of confidential information in metadata and the perils of practicing law over the Internet. We have noted in those opinions that the duty to "exercise reasonable care" to prevent disclosure of confidential information "may, in some circumstances, call for the lawyer to stay abreast of technological advances and the potential risks" in transmitting information electronically. N.Y. State 782 (2004), citing N.Y. State 709 (1998) (when conducting trademark practice over the Internet, lawyer had duty to "stay abreast of this evolving technology to assess any changes in the likelihood of interception as well as the availability of improved technologies that may reduce such risks at reasonable cost"); see also N.Y. State 820 (2008) (same in context of using e-mail service provider that scans e-mails to generate computer advertising). The same duty to stay current with the technological advances applies to a lawyer's contemplated use of an online data storage system.

CONCLUSION:

13. A lawyer may use an online data storage system to store and back up client confidential information provided that the lawyer takes reasonable care to ensure that confidentiality is maintained in a manner consistent with the lawyer's obligations under Rule 1.6. A lawyer using an online storage provider should take reasonable care to protect confidential information, and should exercise reasonable care to prevent others whose services are utilized by the lawyer from disclosing or using confidential information of a client. In addition, the lawyer should stay abreast of technological advances to ensure that the storage system remains sufficiently advanced to protect the client's information, and the lawyer should monitor the changing law of privilege to ensure that storing information in the "cloud" will not waive or jeopardize any privilege protecting the information.

TOPIC: Lawyer's access to public pages of another party's social networking site for the purpose of gathering information for client in pending litigation.

DIGEST: A lawyer representing a client in pending litigation may access the public pages of another party's social networking website (such as Facebook or MySpace) for the purpose of obtaining possible impeachment material for use in the litigation.

RULES: 4.1; 4.2; 4.3; 5.3(b)(1); 8.4(c)

QUESTION:

1. May a lawyer view and access the Facebook or MySpace pages of a party other than his or her client in pending litigation in order to secure information about that party for use in the lawsuit, including impeachment material, if the lawyer does not "friend" the party and instead relies on public pages posted by the party that are accessible to all members in the network?

OPINION:

2. Social networking services such as Facebook and MySpace allow users to create an online profile that may be accessed by other network members. Facebook and MySpace are examples of external social networks that are available to all web users. An external social network may be generic (like MySpace and Facebook) or may be formed around a specific profession or area of interest. Users are able to upload pictures and create profiles of themselves. Users may also link with other users, which is called "friending." Typically, these social networks have privacy controls that allow users to choose who can view their profiles or contact them; both users must confirm that they wish to "friend" before they are linked and can view one another's profiles. However, some social networking sites and/or users do not require pre-approval to gain access to member profiles.

3. The question posed here has not been addressed previously by an ethics committee interpreting New York's Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") or the former New York Lawyers Code of Professional Responsibility, but some guidance is available from outside New York. The Philadelphia Bar Association's Professional Guidance Committee recently analyzed the propriety of "friending" an unrepresented adverse witness in a pending lawsuit to obtain potential impeachment material. See Philadelphia Bar Op. 2009-02 (March 2009). In that opinion, a lawyer asked whether she could cause a third party to access the Facebook and MySpace pages maintained by a witness to obtain information that might be useful for impeaching the witness at trial. The witness's Facebook and MySpace pages were not generally accessible to the public, but rather were accessible only with the witness's permission (i.e., only when the witness allowed someone to "friend" her). The inquiring lawyer proposed to have the third party "friend" the witness to access the witness's Facebook and MySpace accounts and provide truthful information about the third party, but conceal the association with the lawyer and the real purpose behind "friending" the witness (obtaining potential impeachment material).

4. The Philadelphia Professional Guidance Committee, applying the Pennsylvania Rules of Professional Conduct, concluded that the inquiring lawyer could not ethically engage in the proposed conduct. The lawyer's intention to have a third party "friend" the unrepresented witness implicated Pennsylvania Rule 8.4(c) (which, like New York's Rule 8.4(c), prohibits a lawyer from engaging in conduct involving "dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation"); Pennsylvania Rule 5.3(c)(1) (which, like New York's Rule 5.3(b)(1), holds a lawyer responsible for the conduct of a nonlawyer employed by the lawyer if the lawyer directs, or with knowledge ratifies, conduct that would violate the Rules if engaged in by the lawyer); and Pennsylvania Rule 4.1 (which, similar to New York's Rule 4.1, prohibits a lawyer from making a false statement of fact or law to a third person). Specifically, the Philadelphia Committee determined that the proposed "friending" by a third party would constitute deception in violation of Rules 8.4 and 4.1, and would constitute a supervisory violation under Rule 5.3 because the third party would omit a material fact (i.e., that the third party would be seeking access to the witness's social networking pages solely to obtain information for the lawyer to use in the pending lawsuit).

5. Here, in contrast, the Facebook and MySpace sites the lawyer wishes to view are accessible to all members of the network. New York's Rule 8.4 would not be implicated because the lawyer is not engaging in deception by accessing a public website that is available to anyone in the network, provided that the lawyer does not employ deception in any other way (including, for example, employing deception to become a member of the network). Obtaining information about a party available in the Facebook or MySpace profile is similar to obtaining information that is available in publicly accessible online or print media, or through a subscription research service such as Nexis or Factiva, and that is plainly permitted.[12] Accordingly, we conclude that the lawyer may ethically view and access the Facebook and MySpace profiles of a party other than the lawyer's client in litigation as long as the party's profile is available to all members in the network and the lawyer neither "friends" the other party nor directs someone else to do so.

CONCLUSION:

6. A lawyer who represents a client in a pending litigation, and who has access to the Facebook or MySpace network used by another party in litigation, may access and review the public social network pages of that party to search for potential impeachment material. As long as the lawyer does not "friend" the other party or direct a third person to do so, accessing the social network pages of the party will not violate Rule 8.4 (prohibiting deceptive or misleading conduct), Rule 4.1 (prohibiting false statements of fact or law), or Rule 5.3(b)(1) (imposing responsibility on lawyers for unethical conduct by nonlawyers acting at their direction).

(76-09)

12 One of several key distinctions between the scenario discussed in the Philadelphia opinion and this opinion is that the Philadelphia opinion concerned an unrepresented witness, whereas our opinion concerns a party – and this party may or may not be represented by counsel in the litigation. If a lawyer attempts to "friend" a represented party in a pending litigation, then the lawyer's conduct is governed by Rule 4.2 (the "no-contact" rule), which prohibits a lawyer from communicating with the represented party about the subject of the representation absent prior consent from the represented party's lawyer. If the lawyer attempts to "friend" an unrepresented party, then the lawyer's conduct is governed by Rule 4.3, which prohibits a lawyer from stating or implying that he or she is disinterested, requires the lawyer to correct any misunderstanding as to the lawyer's role, and prohibits the lawyer from giving legal advice other than the advice to secure counsel if the other party's interests are likely to conflict with those of the lawyer's client. Our opinion does not address these scenarios.

OPINION 844 (10/08/2010)

TOPIC: Lawyer/legislator serving as appointed counsel for indigent respondents in Family Court proceedings.

DIGEST: Rules 8.4(d) and 1.11(f)(2) prohibit a county legislator from accepting appointments by the Family Court to serve as attorney for the child in juvenile delinquency, PINS, neglect, or abuse proceedings.

RULES: 1.11(f)(2) and 8.4(d).

QUESTION:

1. Where a county legislature approves funding and appointments for both the office of county attorney and the office of counsel for the county department of social services, may a part-time county legislator accept appointment by the Family Court to serve as attorney for the child (formerly known as law guardian) in juvenile delinquency, PINS, neglect or abuse proceedings?[13]

OPINION:

2. This Committee has addressed analogous situations before. Under the authority of former DR 1-102(A)(5) (lawyer shall not "engage in conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice") and former DR 8-101(A)(2) (lawyer who is also public official shall not "use the public position to influence, or attempt to influence, a tribunal to act in favor of the lawyer or of a client"), this Committee has determined that a lawyer/legislator may not represent criminal defendants in cases involving members of a police department or district attorney's office over which the legislature has budget or appointment authority. N.Y. State 798 (2006); N.Y. State 692 (1997). The prohibition applies even if the legislator would abstain from all votes affecting the police budget or the district attorney's budget. N.Y. State 702 (1998). The language of DR 1-102(A)(5) and DR 8-101(A)(2) has been incorporated without change into the New York Rules of Professional Conduct as Rules 8.4(d) and 1.11(f)(2), respectively.

3. Rules 8.4(d) and 1.11(f)(2) apply with equal force to prohibit service as attorney for the child in juvenile delinquency and PINS proceedings for three reasons: (a) the legislator's role is the functional equivalent of a criminal defense attorney, (b) the child's liberty is at stake, and (c) the legislator would be adverse to the county attorney's office, whether or not the legislator actually cross-examines county-funded or county-appointed law enforcement or other personnel.

4. We recognize that neglect and abuse proceedings are somewhat different from juvenile delinquency and PINS proceedings. For example, the attorney for the child may, in a particular neglect and abuse case, take the same position as the county attorney or the county department of social services with respect to the proposed placement of a child, the proposed termination of parental rights, or other issues. Nonetheless, for two reasons, both equally important, we believe that the ethical prohibition against accepting any of these Family Court appointments should be the same.

13 "PINS" stands for "persons in need of supervision."

5. First, the public may perceive that the county legislator may be receiving favored treatment from the county attorney or the county department of social services. This perception is not dissipated in situations where the legislator agrees with those offices regarding a recommended disposition of a particular neglect or abuse case. To the contrary, the perception of favored treatment may be reinforced – perhaps the public will believe that the county attorney or department of social services agrees with the legislator's position not because it is correct but rather because the legislator holds budget or appointment authority over them and they are afraid to disagree.

6. Second, looking beyond mere perception, there is an unacceptable risk that representatives of the county attorney's office or of the county department of social services will in fact compromise their independence and adjust their positions in a neglect or abuse proceeding to conform to the legislator's recommendations or views as attorney for the child in a particular case. That is, there is a real risk that the county attorney's office or the county department of social services, in deference to the county legislator's status, will agree with the legislator either to curry favor and secure the legislator's budget or appointment support, or to avoid antagonizing the legislator and precipitating retaliatory opposition to the budget and appointment requests that those offices must submit for legislative approval.

CONCLUSION:

7. We answer the question in the negative. It is not ethically permissible for a county legislator to accept appointments by the Family Court to serve as attorney for the child in juvenile delinquency, PINS, or neglect and abuse proceedings.

OPINION 845 (10/14/2010)

TOPIC: Lawyer/real estate broker sharing her brokerage commission with lawyers who refer buyers or sellers.

DIGEST: A lawyer who is also a real estate broker may ethically offer to share her broker's commission with attorneys who refer buyers or sellers to her if either (a) the referring lawyer is not representing the buyer or seller in the real estate transaction, or (b) the referring lawyer is representing the buyer or seller in the real estate transaction but remits or credits the referral fee to the client and obtains the client's informed consent to the potential conflict arising from the referral fee.

RULES: 1.0(a) 1.7, 1.8(f), 8.4(a).

FACTS:

1. An attorney has recently decided to work as a real estate broker, but has not given up her New York law license. She desires to advertise that she will pay a percentage of her broker's commission to attorneys who refer buyers or sellers to her. In the past, she has received similar letters from other attorneys, but she is unsure if it such offers are ethically acceptable.

QUESTION:

2. May a licensed lawyer who is also a real estate broker (but is acting solely as a broker in any real estate transaction) ethically advertise that she will share her broker's commission with attorneys who refer buyers or sellers to her?

OPINION:

3. The Committee assumes for purposes of this analysis that (a) the inquiring attorney is functioning solely as a real estate broker, not as a lawyer, in the real estate transactions in question, and (b) if the inquiring attorney offers any legal services in other matters, they will be distinct from the non-legal services which she renders as a real estate broker, and (c) the attorney will comply with Rule 5.7 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"), effective April 1, 2009, if it is applicable.

A. Communications to Other Lawyers Are Not "Advertisements"

4. As a preliminary matter, an advertisement that an attorney places solely in her capacity as a real estate broker, with no intention of attracting legal business, is not an "advertisement" within the meaning of Rule 1.0(a) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct. Rule 1.0(a) provides as follows:

> "Advertisement" means any public or private communication made by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm about that lawyer or law firm's services, the primary purpose of which is for the retention of the lawyer or law firm. It does not include communications to existing clients or other lawyers.

5. Here, since the purpose of the inquiring attorney's communications offering to share her brokerage commissions is not "the retention of the lawyer" as a lawyer, the broker's communication lacks an essential element of an "advertisement" under Rule 1.0(a). Also, the attorney proposes to direct her referral fee offer to other lawyers, and Rule 1.0(a)'s definition of "advertisement" expressly excludes "communications to . . . other lawyers."

B. Referral fees to lawyers who represent the buyers or sellers in the transaction

6. The Committee's jurisdiction is limited to interpreting and applying the Rules. The Committee does not render opinions on questions of law, and thus does not opine on whether the proposed arrangement violates any statute or regulation. If the proposed arrangement violates any state or federal law or regulation, it perforce would be unethical. N.Y. State 667 (1994); N.Y. State 595 (1988); N.Y. State 576 (1986). For purposes of this opinion, however, the Committee assumes, with respect to substantive law outside the Rules of Professional Conduct, that an attorney lawfully may accept a share of a real estate brokerage commission, that a real estate broker may lawfully pay a share of her commission to a lawyer as a referral fee, and that the proposed arrangement otherwise is legal.

7. Rule 8.4(a) provides that a lawyer shall not "violate or attempt to violate the Rules of Professional Conduct, [or] knowingly assist or induce another to do so . . . ." We therefore focus our analysis on whether another attorney's receipt of the referral fees that the inquiring attorney proposes to pay would violate the Rules of Professional Conduct. If so, then the inquiring attorney's payment of such fees would "assist or induce another" (the receiving lawyer) to do so.

8. This Committee has often opined that a lawyer cannot act as a lawyer in the same transaction in which a lawyer acts a real estate broker because of the possible conflict between the client's interest and the lawyer's own personal interest. See, e.g., N.Y. State 752 (2002); N.Y. State 493 (1978); N.Y. State 340 (1974); N.Y. State 291 (1973); N.Y. State 208 (1971). "The rationale is that the broker's interest in closing the transaction interferes with the lawyer's ability to render independent advice with respect to the transaction." N.Y. State 752 (2002). Thus, acting as both a lawyer and broker in a real estate transaction was a nonconsentable conflict under DR 5-101(A) of New York's former Code of Professional Responsibility, which prohibited a lawyer from accepting or continuing employment if the exercise of professional judgment on behalf of a client "will be or reasonably may be affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property, or personal interests, unless a disinterested lawyer would believe that the representation of the client will not be adversely affected thereby and the client consents . . . ."

9. The successor to DR 5-101(A) is Rule 1.7(a)(2), which prohibits representation if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that "there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests." This prohibition applies in the circumstances before us unless, per Rule 1.7(b)(1) and (b)(4), "the lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client" and the client gives "informed consent, confirmed in writing."

10. In this Committee's opinion, under Rule 1.7 it remains a nonconsentable conflict for an attorney to act as both a lawyer and broker in the same transaction. That leads to the question whether a lawyer who could not act as counsel in a real estate transaction may nevertheless receive a share of the broker's commission in that transaction.

11. This Committee opined in N.Y. State 745 (2001) that a lawyer who is disqualified from a matter on nonconsentable conflict of interest grounds may not receive a referral fee for referring that matter. Cf., Nassau County 89-33 (N.Y.L.J., Dec. 4, 1989, at 7, col. 1) (mortgage broker prohibited from paying a commission to an attorney, whom the broker would denominate as an "associate" broker, if the associate broker would also represent the client in the real estate transaction).

12. Rule 8.4(a) says that a lawyer shall not "knowingly assist or induce another" to violate the Rules of Professional Conduct, so an attorney functioning as a real estate broker is prohibited from paying a referral fee or partial commission to a referring attorney if the attorney-broker knows that the referring attorney's acceptance of the payment would breach these Rules. See, e.g., Nassau County 93-3 (N.Y.L.J., March 28, 1994, at 8, col. 4) (an attorney has an affirmative duty to report the misconduct of another lawyer who has undertaken to act as a lawyer and real estate broker on the same transaction).

13. Accordingly, under Rule 8.4(a), if the inquiring lawyer/broker knows that the referring attorney will simultaneously represent the buyer or seller in the real estate transaction and keep a share of the real estate brokerage commission, the inquiring attorney may not share her brokerage commission with the referring attorney.

C. Referral fees to lawyers who represent buyers or sellers in the transaction but remit or credit the referral fee to the client

14. The next question is whether a lawyer/broker may properly pay referral fees where the attorney receiving the referral fee is (or will be) acting as a lawyer for the referred brokerage client in the same real estate transaction but the receiving attorney agrees to remit or credit the referral fee to the client.

15. In N.Y. State 753 (2002), we explained the rationale for the ban on an attorney serving as both a real estate broker and a lawyer in the same real estate transaction: "a lawyer should not have a personal stake in the advice rendered, and the broker who is paid if the transaction closes cannot be fully independent in advising the client as a lawyer." If the lawyer receiving the referral fee will remit or credit the full amount to the client, that will largely remove the receiving attorney's "personal stake" but it will not entirely negate the potential for conflict. Even if the lawyer remits or credits the referral fee to the client, the attorney will still have an incentive to refer real estate clients to a broker who pays a referral fee (i.e., shares her commission) because the referral fee (in effect a reduced real estate brokerage commission) will enable the attorney to offer potential clients a reduced brokerage fee (or an equivalent cash payment or credit) for utilizing the attorney's services, thus attracting more business to the attorney.

16. In N.Y. State 682 (1996), we noted that our prior opinions have allowed an attorney to receive a referral fee from providers of non-legal services or products for referring clients if (a) the client consents after full disclosure, (b) the legal fee and the referral fee together do not constitute an excessive fee for legal services, and (c) the attorney remits the referral fee to the client if the client so requests.

In these opinions, the referral concerned a product or service that was "fairly uniform among providers" and either was (1) "required in an objectively determinable quantity incident to the legal services performed by the attorney" (e.g., a mortgage and title insurance in connection with a real estate transaction), or (2) was "unconnected with any particular legal services" (e.g. certificates of deposit). These conflicts were consentable because "the fungible nature of the products or services and the objectively determinable amount at issue insulate the client from any ill effects from the attorney's conflicting interest."

17. On the other hand, N.Y. State 682 also noted two prior opinions stating that the attorney's receipt of a referral fee or other financial interest in a transaction with the client was "absolutely forbidden" where the interests of the attorney and client were in such direct conflict that a client could not give meaningful consent to the conflict transaction. The conflict in those opinions was that the attorney's remuneration "varied according to the quantity of the product or service . . . purchased by the client, which was itself based upon the attorney's legal advice . . . ." See N.Y. State 682 (1994) (investment advice); N.Y. State 671 (1994) (life insurance); N.Y. State 619 (1991) (life insurance). The prospect of a commission might tempt the attorney to give the client different (and inferior) legal estate planning advice due to the attorney's financial interest. Thus, N.Y. State 682 explained and extended the analysis in N.Y. State 671 as follows:

> [N]o meaningful consent is available to permit an attorney to retain life insurance referral fees. The services of an investment advisor, similar to life insurance carriers, vary substantially among different providers. Also like life insurance, the amount of the product or services required – i.e., the amount of money entrusted to the investment advisor – is not objectively determined by the transaction, presenting the potential that the attorney might increase the referral fee by recommending that more of the client's funds be entrusted to the advisor without appropriate regard to the client's interests. . . .
> Accordingly, disclosure and consent would not cure the direct and substantial conflict between the client's and lawyer's interests inherent in accepting a referral fee from the investment advisor, even where the client is offered the choice to claim the referral fee and the attorney purports to exercise independent judgment in framing his or her initial recommendation to consult an investment advisor. Clients view recommendations of other professionals as part of their representation by their lawyers, and expect that lawyers will act as trusted fiduciaries in such matters.

18. We think the present situation – real estate brokerage – falls somewhere in between "fairly uniform" products and services like title insurance and certificates of deposit (where receiving a referral fee in connection with client work is routinely consentable as long as the referral fee is remitted to the client), on the one hand, and highly variable products and services like life insurance and investment advice (where receiving a referral fee is nonconsentable even if the referral fee is remitted to the client), on the other hand. While the quality of real estate brokerage services varies among providers, the services are "required in an objectively determinable quantity incident to the legal services performed by the attorney" because a client typically employs only one broker per transaction, commissions are relatively standard, and the size of the broker's commission depends on the price of the home the client purchases. Moreover, although a referral fee gives the lawyer a financial incentive to refer a client to that particular broker even if the fee is passed on to the client, clients are generally aware that they have many real estate brokers to choose from, and clients are generally capable of evaluating different brokers.

19. Therefore, this Committee believes that a real estate lawyer may ethically accept a referral fee with the client's informed consent, including a reminder that the client is free to choose a real estate broker other than the one her lawyer recommends. ("Informed consent" is defined in Rule 1.0(j) to include the lawyer's communication of "information adequate for the person to make an informed decision," including "the material risks of the proposed course of conduct and reasonably available alternatives.") As a corollary, a lawyer/broker may pay a share of her commission to a lawyer who refers a buyer or seller if the referring lawyer obtains her own client's informed consent and remits or credits the commission to that client.

20. There is one more step. The lawyer/broker (the inquirer here) must confirm that the referring attorney will remit or credit the fee or commission to the client. This should be readily ascertainable and does not threaten privileged communications between the referring lawyer and her client. However, because of practical difficulties and the danger of intruding on the attorney-client relationship, the lawyer/broker need not confirm the referring attorney's compliance with the disclosure and consent requirements, (This point is further explained below in the last paragraph before our conclusion.)

D. Referral fees to lawyers who do not represent the referred clients in the transaction

21. The final question is whether a lawyer/broker may properly pay referral fees to an attorney who refers clients on real estate transactions in which the referring attorney will not be representing the client. We are not aware of any New York ethics opinion addressing this precise issue, but several other jurisdictions have considered whether a lawyer may generally accept a referral fee from a person providing a non-legal product or service to a referred client. The results have been inconsistent. Many of the conflicting authorities were collected in Pennsylvania Opinion 2000-100, 2000 WL 567996, which concluded as follows:

> [T]he Rules permit a lawyer to accept a referral fee from a service provider, provided that the lawyer is scrupulous in determining under the particular circumstances that payment of the referral fee will not impact the lawyer-client relationship or the lawyer's exercise of independent professional judgment and that the client consents to the arrangement on the basis of full disclosure and consultation.

22. In N.Y. State 764 (2003), this Committee approved an attorney's acceptance of an earnings credit against bank charges based upon balances held in the attorney's IOLA account as long as the attorney made full disclosure to the client and obtained the client's informed consent, even though the earnings credit "may well influence the attorney's decision as to where client's trust funds should be deposited, and that decision would have a direct and adverse financial impact upon the client if an IOLA account is chosen." The Committee's conclusion was based on the language of former DR 5-107(A)(2) and EC 2-21. That language is now contained, with little change, in Rule 1.8(f), which provides, in relevant part, as follows:

> A lawyer shall not accept . . . anything of value related to the lawyer's representation of the client, from one other than the client, unless:
> (1) the client gives informed consent;
> (2) there is no interference with the lawyer's independent professional judgment or with the client-lawyer relationship; and
> (3) the client's confidential information is protected as required by Rule 1.6.

23. We believe that N.Y. State 764 remains applicable under Rule 1.8(f). Thus, assuming that the requisites set forth in Rule 1.8(f) are met, a lawyer attorney may ethically accept referral fees or commissions from non-legal service providers in matters where the lawyer is not representing the client.

24. As a real estate broker, an attorney generally is not ethically obligated to affirmatively monitor the details of compliance of the attorneys from whom the lawyer/broker receives referrals. In particular, the lawyer/broker is not expected to monitor whether referring attorneys make full disclosure to, and obtain informed consent from, their clients. Ordinarily, therefore, it would not be a violation of Rule 8.4(a) for the inquiring attorney to offer and pay referral fees to attorneys for client referrals if the referring attorneys will not actually be representing the clients in the real estate transactions at issue.

25. However, an attorney cannot ignore obvious violations, see, Rule 1.0(k) ("knowledge may be inferred from circumstances"), so if the inquiring attorney knows that a referring attorney has not obtained informed consent from that client regarding the referral to the lawyer/broker, then the lawyer/broker should (a) withhold the referral fee until the referring attorney cures the violation, or (b) refuse the referral, or (c) take other appropriate remedial steps so that she does not assist another lawyer in violating the Rules of Professional Conduct.

CONCLUSION:

26. Because the inquiring attorney is still a licensed attorney, Rule 8.4(a) prohibits her from assisting another lawyer in conduct that would violate the Rules of Professional Conduct. Accordingly, whether the inquiring attorney may share her real estate commissions with referring attorneys depends on whether the referring lawyer would be violating the Rules by accepting the referral fee.

27. An attorney is prohibited from simultaneously representing a client in a real estate transaction and receiving a portion of the brokerage commission (i.e., a referral fee) from a real estate broker to whom the attorney refers a client, unless the attorney remits or credits the referral fee to that client. An attorney functioning as a real estate broker (such as the inquiring attorney) is therefore prohibited from knowingly paying a referral fee or sharing a commission without confirming that the commission will be remitted, or equivalent credit given, to the referring attorney's client.

28. However, an attorney functioning as a real estate broker is not prohibited from paying a referral fee or sharing her real estate commission with an attorney who refers her clients to the lawyer/broker if the referring attorney will not be representing the client in the real estate transaction at issue.

TOPIC: Contacts by non-lawyer insurance company representatives with workers' compensation claimants represented by counsel

DIGEST: A lawyer for an insurance carrier may not, without prior consent of claimant's counsel, send forms directly to a specific claimant where the lawyer knows the claimant is represented by counsel with respect to the claim, but if the lawyer gives reasonable advance notice to claimant's counsel, the lawyer may cause the insurance carrier's employees to send the forms. The fact that a lawyer designed, or assisted in designing, forms to be sent by non-lawyer employees of the carrier to claimants as a class does not trigger the requirements of Rule 4.2, even though the lawyer knows that some of the claimants are represented by counsel.

RULES: 4.2.

CODE: DR 7-104(A)(1).

FACTS:

1. An insurance carrier provides workers' compensation insurance for employers in New York State. The insurance company employs (or contracts with) personnel to act as claims adjusters, examiners, investigators or third-party administrators to investigate and manage workers' compensation claims. (Although the personnel have varying titles, we will refer to all of them in this opinion by the generic term "claims adjusters.") The claims adjusters are not lawyers (or at least are not acting as lawyers in the claims adjuster jobs). In the course of investigating and managing claims, the claims adjusters regularly communicate with claimants.

2. The facts presented to us indicate that every claimant with whom the claims adjusters communicate is a party to an ongoing Workers' Compensation Board proceeding, and some of the claimants are represented by legal counsel regarding their claims. The carrier knows which claimants are represented by counsel because 12 NYCRR § 300.17 requires attorneys or licensed representatives representing claimants to file a "notice of retainer" with the Workers' Compensation Board "immediately upon being retained" and to transmit a copy of this form to the insurance carrier "at the time of filing." Whether claimants are represented by counsel or not, the carrier sends forms to claimants that seek information on their work status or entitlement to benefits. The insurers may later use the information on these forms against the claimants (e.g., to seek a change in benefits due to a claimant's status, or to disqualify a claimant from receiving benefits if the representations on a form prove false).

3. When an insurance carrier sends a form to a claimant in the above circumstances, is an attorney for the insurance carrier violating the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") if:

(a) the form is sent by an attorney to a specific claimant? or

(b) the form is sent by a non-attorney to a specific claimant at the direction of an attorney? or

(c) the form is sent by a non-attorney not acting under an attorney's direction, but an attorney designed or assisted in designing the form and will use the information from the form? or

(d) the form is sent on a regular basis via computerized process without human intervention, but an attorney designed or assisted in designing the form or will use the information from the form? or

(e) the attorney provides reasonable advance notice to the claimant's counsel?

(f) If the answer to question (e) is yes, what constitutes "reasonable advance notice" in the case of written and oral communications?

OPINION:

4. The most relevant provision of the Rules of Professional Conduct for this inquiry is Rule 4.2, which has two subparagraphs. Rule 4.2(a) prohibits lawyers from communicating or causing another to communicate about the subject of the representation with a party the lawyer knows to be represented by another lawyer in the matter, without the prior consent of the other lawyer. Rule 4.2(b), however, permits a lawyer to "cause a client" to communicate with a represented person, and counsel the client with respect to those communications, provided the lawyer gives "reasonable advance notice" to the represented person's counsel that such communications will be taking place.[14]

5. We note at the outset that the restrictions of Rule 4.2 do not apply if a lawyer "is authorized . . . by law" to communicate or cause another to communicate with a represented party. Thus, if the Workers' Compensation Board has validly authorized insurance carrier attorneys to con-

14 Rule 4.2 provides:

> (a) In representing a client, a lawyer shall not communicate or cause another to communicate about the subject of the representation with a party the lawyer knows to be represented by another lawyer in the matter, unless the lawyer has the prior consent of the other lawyer or is authorized to do so by law.
> (b) Notwithstanding the prohibitions of paragraph (a), and unless otherwise prohibited by law, a lawyer may cause a client to communicate with a represented person unless the represented person is not legally competent, and may counsel the client with respect to those communications, provided the lawyer gives reasonable advance notice to the represented person's counsel that such communications will be taking place.

Because the facts presented to us indicate that every claimant in question is at all relevant times a party to an ongoing Workers' Compensation Board proceeding, we need not address here whether Rule 4.2 restricts contact with a represented person who is not a "party" to a relevant proceeding. Compare Grievance Comm. for Southern District of New York v. Simels, 48 F.3d 640 (2d Cir. 1995) (criminal defense lawyer did not violate DR 7-104(A)(1) by interviewing witness represented in related matter) with N.Y. State 735 (2001) (in noncriminal cases, the term "party" in DR 7-104(A)(1) should be read broadly to cover represented witnesses) and N.Y. State 785 (2005) ("[T]he 'no contact' rule will bar unconsented communication with [a nonparty insurance] adjuster if the insurance company is known to be separately represented by counsel with respect to the matter.").

tact claimants, or to cause claims adjusters to contact claimants directly, with respect to matters before the Board, then Rule 4.2 would not restrict such contacts.[15]

Question (a):

6. Assuming that the restrictions of Rule 4.2 apply to sending the forms in question, it is clear that Rule 4.2(a) would prohibit the insurance carrier's attorneys from sending the forms themselves, absent prior consent of the claimant's counsel, if the lawyer knows that the claimant is represented by counsel.

Questions (b) and (e):

7. Where the lawyer directs the insurance company's non-lawyer agents to send a form to a specific claimant, Rule 4.2(b) applies and the lawyer may ordinarily "cause a client to communicate with a represented person." In that case, the lawyer may proceed without the "prior consent" of the claimant's counsel as long as the lawyer gives "reasonable advance notice" to the claimant's counsel.

Question (f):

8. Rule 4.2 does not further define what constitutes "reasonable advance notice." We believe the term must be interpreted in light of the purpose of the requirement, which is to permit the represented party's lawyer to counsel his or her client on what to do when the client is contacted by the insurance company. The notice thus must be provided in a manner and with enough time so that the receiving lawyer has a reasonable amount of time, under all the circumstances, to contact his or her client regarding the planned communication. This is consistent with the sound guidance contained in former EC 7-18 of the New York Code of Professional Responsibility, which stated, in relevant part:

> "Reasonable advance notice" means notice provided sufficiently in advance of the direct client-to-client communications, and of sufficient content, so that the represented person's lawyer has an opportunity to advise his or her own client with respect to the client-to-client communications before they take place.

15 The Board's regulations provide that a licensed representative for an insurance carrier should "communicate with an adverse party who is represented by an attorney or licensed representative only through such attorney or representative," see 12 NYCRR § 302-2.6, but some Board opinions state that this regulatory limitation on communications with an adverse party "applies only to licensed representatives, whom the Board regulates, and attorneys for the parties, who are regulated by the Appellate Division and by the Code of Professional Responsibility, in their professional dealings with the adverse parties in litigated matters, and does not apply to claimants, employers and carriers themselves." Matter of Nick Tahou's Inc., 2008 NY Wrk. Comp. 70210028, 2008 NY Wrk. Comp. LEXIS 9427. See also Fink Baking Co., 2007 NY Wrk. Comp. 34566, 2007 NY Wrk. Comp. LEXIS 10305 (carrier did not err in asking its investigator to obtain represented claimant's written statement regarding work activity because "a carrier has an absolute right . . . to have direct contact with claimants on behalf of its insured"); NYS Dept of Corrections, 2001 NY Wrk. Comp. 59800320, 2001 NY Wrk. Comp. LEXIS 97590 (restriction in § 302-2.6 "applies to the representatives of claimants, employers and carriers, not to the claimants, employers and carriers themselves"). We express no view on whether the Board's regulations permit communications with claimants when those communications would be prohibited by Rule 4.2, or whether the Board's decisions supersede the restrictions of Rule 4.2. Those are questions of law beyond our jurisdiction.

Questions (c) and (d):

9. The more difficult questions concern the level of attorney involvement in the design of the forms, and the procedures for sending the forms, that will constitute "causing" the client to communicate with the claimant for purposes of Rule 4.2. We considered a related question in N.Y. State 828 (2009). In that opinion, a New York State agency maintained a staff of non-lawyer investigators who would conduct investigations of agency licensees "without any supervision of the investigators by staff counsel." When misconduct by a licensee was discovered, a report would be prepared by one of the investigators for review by counsel and possible prosecution by counsel. We opined that the non-lawyer investigator's conduct in contacting represented licensees would not be imputed to the agency's staff attorneys unless the attorneys were charged with "supervision or control" of the investigators, which was not the case. We observed:

> Where, for example, the agency requires its investigators to be instructed by staff attorneys concerning the procedures to be followed before undertaking an investigation, the conduct of the investigators will generally be imputed to the attorneys. . . . Where, on the other hand, there is no requirement or expectation that the agency's investigators will operate under the guidance of the staff attorneys, then . . . the conduct of the investigators will not ordinarily be imputed to the staff attorneys.

10. We did not specifically address in N.Y. State 828 the extent to which a lawyer's involvement in setting up or designing a general program of contacts with counterparties, some of whom may be represented by counsel, would constitute "supervision or control." With respect to the present inquiries, we conclude that the fact that an attorney designed or assisted in designing a form to be sent to claimants generally – some of whom may be represented by counsel – does not, for the purposes of Rule 4.2, constitute "causing" the carrier to communicate with those claimants who are represented. In other words, designing a form to be sent by non-lawyers does not by itself amount to supervision and control over the non-lawyers.[16]

11. This conclusion is based on sound policies. A client such as the insurance carrier here should be able to consult with its lawyers on generalized or mass communications with claimants or other counterparties. If an attorney's design or advice about mass communications triggered Rule 4.2 based merely on the statistical probability (or even certainty) that some of the counterparties would be represented by counsel, then insurance carriers and similar clients might be chilled in seeking such advice—a perverse result that was not the intent of Rule 4.2.[17] Rather, we believe Rule 4.2 is triggered by an attorney's involvement in sending a communication to a specific claimant (or set of claimants) only when the attorney knows that the specific claimant (or set of claimants) is represented in the matter in question. Thus, we answer questions (c) and (d) in the negative.

16 Another rule about causing another to violate the Rules of Professional Conduct is Rule 8.4(a), which provides that a "lawyer or law firm shall not violate the Rules of Professional Conduct, knowingly assist or induce another to do so, or do so through the acts of another." A lawyer who complies with Rule 4.2(b) by causing another person (a client) to communicate with the opposing party upon reasonable advance notice to opposing counsel is not violating Rule 4.2(a). Thus, a lawyer who complies with Rule 4.2(b) also is not violating Rule 8.4(a).

17 A lawyer should not, of course, design the form so as to seek privileged information or to discourage represented claimants from consulting with their counsel. See Rule 4.2, Cmt. 1 (Rule 4.2 protects represented parties against "uncounseled disclosure of information relating to the representation") and Rule 4.2, Cmt. 11 (lawyer "may not advise the client to seek privileged information").

CONCLUSION:

12. In answer to question (a), an attorney for the insurance company may not, without obtaining consent of the claimant's counsel under Rule 4.2(a), send a form directly to a specific claimant where the lawyer knows that the claimant is represented by counsel with respect to the workers' compensation claim.

13. In answer to questions (b) and (e), the attorney for the insurance carrier may direct a non-lawyer employee of the carrier to communicate with a represented claimant after the attorney gives "reasonable advance notice" to the claimant's counsel within the meaning of Rule 4.2(b).

14. In answer to question (f), such a communication must be provided in a manner and with enough time so that the receiving lawyer has a reasonable amount of time, under all the circumstances, to contact his or her client and advise the client what to do when contacted by the insurance company.

15. In answer to questions (c) and (d), where non-lawyer claims adjusters send forms to claimants who are represented by counsel, or where a computerized process sends such forms without human intervention to represented and unrepresented claimants, Rule 4.2 does not apply simply because a lawyer designed or assisted in designing the forms unless the attorney knows that a specific claimant is represented by counsel in the matter.

TOPIC: Conflicts of interest; lawyer's responsibilities to third parties; lawyer as corporate officer.

DIGEST: An attorney may represent the beneficial owner of a mortgage note and mortgage, and may concurrently serve as an officer of the mortgagee of record, for the purposes of executing a mortgage assignment to the beneficial owner and prosecuting a mortgage foreclosure action in the assignee's name.

RULES: 1.0(f); 1.7(a); 1.7(b).

QUESTION:

1. May an attorney represent the beneficial owner of a mortgage note and mortgage, and concurrently serve as an officer of the mortgagee of record, for the purposes of executing a mortgage assignment to the beneficial owner and prosecuting a mortgage foreclosure action in the assignee's name?

FACTS:

2. In 1993, the real estate mortgage industry created an electronic registration system for mortgages. Mortgage Electronic Registration Systems, Inc. ("MERS"), a Delaware corporation, was established to act as nominee and mortgagee of record for members of the system (the "MERS System"). The purpose of the MERS System was to facilitate the transfer and assignment of mortgages in the secondary mortgage market by bypassing, in favor of instant and inexpensive private electronic registration, the more cumbersome preparation and expensive recording of paper mortgage assignments in the real property records of the nation's municipal recording authorities. In New York, regardless of how many electronic assignments of the mortgage occurred within the MERS System, MERS would remain the mortgagee of record as reflected by the public records of the county clerks.

3. In 2006, the New York Court of Appeals upheld the continuing utility of the private MERS System by affirming a writ of mandamus and declaring that the Suffolk County Clerk was statutorily required to record and index mortgages, assignments of mortgage, and discharges of mortgage that named MERS as nominee or mortgagee of record. See Merscorp, Inc., v. Romaine, 8 N.Y.3d 90 (2006).

4. In connection with the specific question before us, the inquirer has related the following facts, which we assume to be true. The inquirer is an attorney ("Attorney") who represents the current mortgagee ("Client") in a pending residential mortgage foreclosure action. The inquirer does not represent MERS in the foreclosure action, and does not otherwise represent or provide legal services to MERS. The mortgage instrument executed by the mortgagor and the initial lender at the closing in October 2007 provided that MERS would be the mortgagee of record "acting solely as a nominee for Lender and Lender's successors and assigns." The initial lender subsequently sold the mortgage loan, and the inquirer's Client is the current assignee and holder of the note and mortgage, which is duly registered in the MERS System, but not in the real property records of the county clerk.

5. Many residential foreclosure actions brought in the name of MERS, as nominee and mortgagee of record, have foundered on the question of MERS' standing to sue. See, e.g., LaSalle Bank

National Association v. Lamy, 12 Misc.3d 1191(A), 2006 WL 2251721 (N.Y. Sup. Ct. Suffolk Cty. 2006) (citations omitted) ("this court and others have repeatedly held that a nominee of the owner of the note and mortgage, such [as] MERS, may not prosecute a mortgage foreclosure action in its own name as nominee of the original lender because it lacks ownership of the note and mortgage at the time of the prosecution of the action"). To avoid dismissal or delay for lack of standing, some members of the MERS System, including inquirer's Client here, have elected to prepare and record a paper assignment with the county clerk before commencing the foreclosure action. That way, the plaintiff in the foreclosure action will not be merely the mortgagee of record; rather, the plaintiff will be the real party in interest and the holder of the mortgage note.

6. To accommodate the expeditious preparation and recording of these paper assignments from MERS as assignor to Client, as assignee, a three-party agreement entitled "Agreement for Signing Authority" was entered into between MERS, Client and Attorney in December 2007. This agreement appointed Attorney, plus three non-lawyer members of Attorney's staff, as assistant secretaries and vice presidents of MERS, and authorized each of them (i) to execute, on MERS behalf, any assignment of any mortgage lien or any release of any mortgage loan registered to Client in the MERS System, and (ii) to execute all documents necessary to foreclose upon real property secured by a mortgage loan registered to Client in the MERS System.

OPINION:

A. Are There Conflicts Under Rule 1.7(a)(2)?

7. Against this background, we are asked whether Attorney's dual role – officer of MERS (or supervisor of three employee non-lawyer officers of MERS) and counsel for Client – constitutes a conflict of interest. This inquiry is governed by Rule 1.7(a)(2) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"), which addresses conflicts between a client and the personal interests of the client's lawyer. Specifically, Rule 1.7(a)(2) provides:

> (a) Except as provided in paragraph (b), a lawyer shall not represent a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that . . . (2) there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests.

8. Because Attorney here was selected, engaged and paid by Client, not by MERS, to prosecute the foreclosure proceeding, there is no basis for a "reasonable lawyer" to conclude, under Rule 1.7(a)(2), that there exists a "significant risk that [Attorney's] professional judgment on behalf of [Client] will be adversely affected by lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests" arising from Attorney's limited signing authority on behalf of MERS.

B. Are There Conflicts Under Rule 1.7(a)(1)?

9. We will also address Rule 1.7(a)(1), which addresses conflicts between or among multiple clients. Rule 1.7(a)(1) provides as follows:

> (a) Except as provided in paragraph (b), a lawyer shall not represent a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that . . . (1) the representation will involve the lawyer in representing differing interests.

10. Rule 1.7(a)(1) is not at issue because MERS is not a client of Attorney. Rather, Attorney represents only one client, the mortgagee. Nonetheless, for the sake of completeness, we note that there are no "differing interests" between MERS and Client that would create a conflict of interest under Rule 1.7(a)(1). Rule 1.0(f) defines "differing interests" to include "every interest that will adversely affect either the judgment or loyalty of a lawyer to a client, whether it be a conflicting, inconsistent, diverse or other interest." There are no differing interests between MERS and Client because the mortgage assignment from MERS to Client did not convey any tangible interest in real property. Rather, MERS was merely a nominee mortgagee of record without any economic interest in the outcome of the foreclosure proceeding. Similarly, MERS's express grant to Attorney of the requisite authority to prosecute the foreclosure action is not adverse to MERS.

11. Moreover, even if a conflict of interest did arise under subparagraphs (a)(1) or (a)(2) of Rule 1.7, the conflict was cured pursuant to Rule 1.7(b). It was cured when Attorney obtained informed consent from the affected Client, confirmed in writing, as reflected in the Agreement for Signing Authority described above.

12. It is conceivable, of course, that in preparing and prosecuting the foreclosure action, Attorney will discover some error or omission on the part of MERS that has created a viable defense to the foreclosure action or that could result in substantial delay to the entry of a mortgage foreclosure judgment in Client's favor. For example, it is possible that the electronic records of the MERS system are materially incomplete or inconsistent with Client's putative status as mortgagee. This circumstance, in which Attorney erroneously relied upon the accuracy of the MERS System in exercising the Attorney's signing authority to create and record a paper assignment in anticipation of a mortgage foreclosure action, might rise to the level of conflicting fiduciary obligations between Attorney as assistant secretary and vice president of MERS, on the one hand, and Attorney as foreclosure counsel for Client, on the other hand. Such a situation would require further analysis under Rule 1.7(a)(2) and (b). However, as far as we have been informed, such a conflict does not exist here.

13. We do not opine on the application of the Real Property Law, or other State or federal statutes, to the execution of the mortgage assignment or any other documents submitted in the foreclosure action. That is beyond our jurisdiction as an ethics committee.

CONCLUSION:

14. Based on the facts presented, and subject to the qualifications stated, we answer the inquiry in the affirmative. An attorney may represent the beneficial owner of a mortgage note and mortgage, and concurrently serve as an officer of the mortgagee of record, for the purposes of executing a mortgage assignment to the beneficial owner and prosecuting a mortgage foreclosure action in the assignee's name.

OPINION 848 (12/22/2010)

TOPIC: Attorney newsletters; advertisements; disclaimers about prior results

DIGEST: Whether a publication by a lawyer or law firm is an "advertisement" depends on its content, its intended purpose, and the targeted audience. With certain exceptions, if a publication is an advertisement, it must be labeled "Attorney Advertising," and if it makes certain types of claims it must include the precise disclaimer set out in Rule 7.1(e)(3). If a law firm's website is an advertisement, it must say "Attorney Advertising" on the home page.

RULES: 1.0(a) and 7.1(d), (e) & (f)

FACTS:

1. A law firm ("Law Firm") is contemplating publishing an educational newsletter, which is intended to be informative. Law Firm will publish the newsletter in both hard copy and electronic formats. Law Firm will send the newsletter to current clients, former clients, persons who are not clients, attorneys, and persons not in any of those categories who have affirmatively opted to receive the firm's newsletters, announcements, emails, or blog posts. Law Firm wants to direct the recipients of the newsletter to the firm's website and to the firm's attorneys, but does not want such references to render the newsletter an "advertisement" that will be governed by Rule 7.1.

2. Law Firm also publishes marketing brochures, blogs and announcement emails, and Law Firm currently maintains a website that includes its own disclaimer regarding prior case results. The disclaimer reads as follows: "Case results depend upon a variety of factors unique to each case and matter. Similar results are not guaranteed in any future case." Neither this disclaimer nor the statement "Attorney Advertising" appears on the home page of Law Firm's website.

QUESTIONS:

3. Is a law firm's educational newsletter an "advertisement" under the New York Rules of Professional Conduct if it refers to the lawyers and law firm who send out the newsletter?

4. Must a law firm use the exact disclaimer language included in Rule 7.1(e)(3) of the New York State Rules of Professional Conduct regarding prior results, or is substantially similar language acceptable?

5. Does language disclaiming similar results in future cases as those achieved in prior cases relieve a law firm of the need to state "Attorney Advertising" on the home page of its website?

OPINION:

A. Is Law Firm's Educational Newsletter an "Advertisement"?

6. The first question is whether Law Firm's educational newsletter is an "advertisement" within the meaning of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"). This question is important because if a communication is deemed to be an "advertisement" as defined in Rule 1.0(a), then the language and format of the communication are governed by Rule 7.1.[18] For example, Rule 7.1(f) requires that most lawyer advertising must be labeled "Attorney Advertising."

7. Rule 1.0(a) defines "advertisement" as follows:

> "Advertisement" means any public or private communication made by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm about that lawyer or law firm's services, the primary purpose of which is for the retention of the lawyer or law firm. It does not include communications to existing clients or other lawyers.

8. In determining whether Law Firm's contemplated educational newsletter is an attorney advertisement within the meaning of Rule 1.0(a) – and is therefore subject to the mandates set out in Rule 7.1 – we consider three factors: (i) the intent of the communication, (ii) the content of the communication and (iii) the targeted audience of the communication.

9. Regarding the first factor – the intent of the communication – Law Firm's newsletter is deemed to be advertising under Rule 1.0(a) only if its primary goal is "the retention of the lawyer or law firm." Contact or biographical information about the lawyers or the law firm contained in the newsletter does not, without more, transform an otherwise educational communication into advertising. As with general marketing materials (such as pencils, pads, and T-shirts), stating the firm's name, logo and contact information does not change attorney communications into advertising under the Rules "if their primary purpose is general awareness and branding, rather than retention of the law firm for a particular matter." See Rule 7.1, Cmt. 8; cf. Rule 7.1, Cmt. 10 (if information disseminated in connection with not-for-profit sponsorship by a firm is limited to the name of the law firm, contact information, brief description of areas of practice and the fact of sponsorship of the event, the communication is not considered advertising.)

10. Regarding the second factor – the content of the newsletter – Comment 7 to Rule 7.1 provides the following guidance:

> Topical newsletters, client alerts, or blogs intended to educate recipients about new developments in the law are generally not considered advertising. However, a newsletter, client alert, or blog that provides information or news primarily about the lawyer or law firm (for example, the lawyer or law firm's cases, personnel, clients or achievements) generally would be considered advertising. [Emphasis added.]

Thus, whether the newsletter is considered advertising will depend in part on its content.

11. Regarding the third factor – the audience for the communication — the definition of "advertisement" expressly excludes existing clients or other lawyers. Accordingly, communications that otherwise meet the criteria for an advertisement are not required to conform to the strict requirements of Rule 7.1 if they are directed to existing clients or other lawyers. Moreover, we believe that certain

18 In Alexander v. Cahill, 598 F.3d 79 (2nd Cir. 2010), the Second Circuit affirmed almost all of a district court decision that certain provisions of Rule 7.1 are unconstitutional. Defendants filed a petition for certiorari in the United States Supreme Court on August 9, 2010, but that petition has been denied.

communications to former and prospective clients are not advertisements. Specifically, according to Rule 7.1, Comment 7:

> Communications to former clients that are germane to the earlier representation are not considered to be advertising. . . . Communications, such as proposed retainer agreements or ordinary correspondence with a prospective client who has expressed interest in, and requested information about, a lawyer's services" are not advertising . . .

12. If Law Firm determines that its educational newsletter is an advertisement under the Rules – which will depend mainly on the intent (purpose) and content of the newsletter – then Law Firm should consider the audience for the newsletter in order to determine whether it must be labeled "Attorney Advertising." If the newsletter is produced in hard copy and mailed to the general public, then Law Firm must include the "Attorney Advertising" label required by Rule 7.1(f). Likewise, if the newsletter will also be circulated and made available electronically via the firm's website, via email, and via blogs, and posts, where the precise nature of the receiving audience is unknown, Law Firm must include the phrase "Attorney Advertising" on the electronic versions of the newsletter. However, Law Firm has the option of omitting that language in versions of the newsletter that are sent only to existing clients, other lawyers, or persons who meet the exceptions for former and prospective clients discussed above, because communications to those persons are not advertising even if their primary purpose is the retention of the lawyer or law firm.

B. Must Law Firm Use the Precise Disclaimer Set Out in Rule 7.1(e)(3)?

13. The second question is whether Law Firm must use in its newsletter the exact disclaimer language included in Rule 7.1(e)(3) of the New York State Rules of Professional Conduct regarding prior results, or instead whether substantially similar language would be acceptable.

14. We do not know the content of the proposed newsletter, but we will assume it will contain some of the categories of information governed by Rule 7.1(d), which allows a law firm to include certain types of information in an advertisement (e.g., "statements that are reasonably likely to create an expectation about results the lawyer can achieve," and "statements that compare the lawyer's services with the services of other lawyers"), provided the advertisement complies with Rule 7.1(e). In turn, Rule 7.1(e)(3) states, in relevant part, as follows:

> (e) It is permissible to provide the information set forth in paragraph (d) provided . . .
> > (3) it is accompanied by the following disclaimer: "Prior results do not guarantee a similar outcome." [Emphasis added.]

15. We believe the precise disclaimer language specified in Rule 7.1(e)(3) is required, and that paraphrasing or similar language does not comply with the Rules. Rule 7.1 is written with great specificity regarding both content and format. For example, the disclaimer just quoted from Rule 7.1(e)(3) is placed inside quotation marks, and the last line of Rule 7.1(f) (quoted below) provides that in the case of email advertising, "the subject line shall contain the notation 'ATTORNEY ADVERTISING." (Quotation marks and capital letters in the original.) We think this high degree of specificity as to language and formatting dictates strict compliance with the requirements of Rule 7.1(e)(3). Language that is substantially similar to the specific disclaimer language prescribed in Rule 7.1(e)(3) is not sufficient and does not negate the need to include the precise disclaimer set out in Rule 7.1(e)(3). Omitting that exact language violates the plain language of the rule.

16. We also believe, however, that a law firm may include additional language alongside the Rule 7.1(e)(3) disclaimer as long as the additional language does not undermine or contradict the Rule 7.1(e)(3) "prior results" disclaimer. Nothing in Rule 7.1 prohibits additional language unless it is false, deceptive, or misleading – see Rule 7.1(a)(1). But when an advertisement contains information falling within the ambit of Rule 7.1(d), a law firm does not satisfy Rule 7.1(d) and 7.1(e)(3) by substituting other language for the mandated language. It must include the exact wording set out in the rule.

C. Must Law Firm's Home Page Say "Attorney Advertising"?

17. The third question is whether language disclaiming similar results in future cases as those achieved in prior cases relieves Law Firm of the need to state "Attorney Advertising" on the home page of its website. This question is controlled by Rule 7.1(f), which provides as follows:

> Every advertisement other than those appearing in a radio, television or billboard advertisement, in a directory, newspaper, magazine or other periodical (and any web sites related thereto), or made in person pursuant to Rule 7.3(a)(1), shall be labeled 'Attorney Advertising' on the first page, or on the home page in the case of a web site. If the communication is in the form of a self-mailing brochure or postcard, the words 'Attorney Advertising' shall appear therein. In the case of electronic mail, the subject line shall contain the notation 'ATTORNEY ADVERTISING.' [Emphasis added.]

18. Under Rule 7.1(f), all of Law Firm's communications that fall within the definition of "advertisement," including the home page of the firm's website, must include the phrase "Attorney Advertising." Thus, if Law Firm's newsletter, website, marketing brochures, blogs, announcement emails, or other communications constitute advertising under the Rules, then the communication must be labeled as "Attorney Advertising" unless specifically exempted by the Rules. The "Attorney Advertising" label "serves to dispel any confusion or concern that might be created when non-lawyers receive letters or emails from lawyers" and the recipients otherwise might not otherwise know whether these communications are advertisements or educational items. See Rule 7.1, Cmt. 5. Conversely, because advertisements in newspapers and on television and radio are "self evidently advertisements" and there is "no risk of such confusion or concern," the Rules do not require those forms of advertising to include the label "Attorney Advertising."

CONCLUSION:

19. Whether a newsletter or other law firm communication is an "advertisement" under the New York Rules of Professional Conduct depends on three factors – the content of the communication, the intent (purpose) of the communication, and the targeted audience of the communication. If a particular communication is an "advertisement" within the meaning of Rule 1.0(a), then it is governed by Rule 7.1. However, limited references to the law firm, its lawyers, and their contact information do not transform an otherwise educational newsletter into an advertisement.

20. Advertisements that include information of the types set out in Rule 7.1(d), such as statements that are reasonably likely to create an expectation about results the lawyer can achieve, statements that compare the lawyer's services with the services of other lawyers, or statements describing or characterizing the quality of the lawyer's or law firm's services, must include the specific disclaimer language set out in Rule 7.1(e)(3), which states: "Prior results do not guarantee a similar outcome." The Rules permit additional language that does not contradict or undermine that disclaimer, but the Rules do not permit substitute language.

21. Finally, every advertisement other than those appearing in a radio, television or billboard advertisement, in a directory, newspaper, magazine or other periodical (and any web sites related thereto) must be labeled "Attorney Advertising" as prescribed by Rule 7.1(f), and the statement "Attorney Advertising" must also appear on the home page of the firm's website if the website is an "advertisement." The presence of the "prior results" disclaimer required by Rule 7.1(e)(3) does not relieve a law firm of the obligation to include the words "Attorney Advertising" on its home page.

TOPIC: Conflicts analysis of concurrent representation of a bank and an equipment manufacturer in a vendor equipment financing program

DIGEST: A lawyer who has previously represented a bank in connection with an equipment vendor financing program may later represent the equipment vendor regarding the vendor's participation in such a program while continuing to represent the bank on unrelated matters, provided the lawyer obtains the informed consent of each client, confirmed in writing.

RULES: 1.0(f), 1.7

FACTS:

1. The inquiring lawyer represents a bank (the "Bank") in connection with an equipment vendor financing program. In this program, the Bank agrees with an equipment supplier to provide equipment lease financing for the supplier's customers to enable the customers to acquire the supplier's equipment. Among the documents in the program is a lease in which the supplier is the lessor and the supplier's customer is the lessee. If, among other things, the customer satisfies the Bank's credit standards, then the supplier sells the lease to the Bank for an amount approximating the cost of the financed equipment.

2. The Bank retained the inquirer several years ago to advise it in connection with its program with a particular equipment supplier (the "Supplier"), which had provided the form lease documents. The inquirer reviewed these lease documents to ensure they were purchase-worthy from the Bank's perspective, and advised the Bank on certain modifications that the inquirer considered appropriate.

3. The Supplier has not previously engaged the inquirer to perform legal work. Rather, the Supplier's in-house finance and legal staff conduct the negotiations over the lease with the Supplier's customers and draft the lease documents, with occasional input from inquirer (in his capacity as the Bank's counsel) and from the Bank's finance personnel. The Supplier's staff is not experienced in this negotiation and drafting, so the Supplier has asked the inquirer whether he would be available to represent the Supplier to perform various tasks.

QUESTIONS:

4. May the inquiring lawyer represent the Supplier in any or all of the following activities while continuing to represent the Bank in unrelated matters?

- Taking over from the Supplier's in-house staff the negotiation and drafting of new leases with the Supplier's customers. These new leases would be sold to the Bank or possibly used in similar financing programs that the Supplier establishes with other lenders.

- Assisting the Supplier in organizing an efficient lease documentation process and educating its staff on equipment financing.

- Representing the Supplier in various transactions (other than its financing program with the Bank).

5. If the inquirer agrees to represent the Supplier in this matter, he anticipates amicably ending his representation of the Bank with respect to the Supplier's program while continuing to represent the Bank from time to time on other, unrelated matters. The inquirer asks whether agreeing to represent the Supplier as requested would raise any conflict issues. We conclude that certain of the representations would give rise to conflict issues, and these issues turn on the same analysis whether the inquirer continues to represent the Bank in unrelated matters (and thus remains inquirer's current client) or ceases to represent the Bank (and thus becomes the inquirer's former client) while continuing to work on the financing program for the Supplier.

OPINION:

6. Rule 1.7 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") governs concurrent conflicts of interest. Rule 1.7 says, in summary, that a conflict of interest arises if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that (i) the representation of one client will involve the lawyer in representing differing client interests or (ii) there is a significant risk that the lawyer's own interests will adversely affect the exercise of the lawyer's professional judgment on a client's behalf. If either type of conflict exists, then the lawyer may proceed only if the lawyer reasonably believes the lawyer can provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client and the lawyer obtains each affected client's informed consent, confirmed in writing.

7. Rule 1.9 governs conflicts of interest with former clients. Rule 1.9 says, in applicable part, that a lawyer who has formerly represented a client in a matter may not thereafter represent another client in the same or a substantially related matter in which the subsequent client's interests are materially adverse to the first client's interests unless the subsequent client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing.

8. According to the inquirer's plan, the Bank will remain a current client on matters unrelated to the Supplier's financing program and become a former client on the substantially related matter of the Supplier's financing program. Whether the inquirer's proposed representation of the Supplier constitutes a conflict of interest depends on whether the Bank's interests will differ from those of the Supplier in any of the three assignments the Supplier has suggested, as well as on whether a significant risk exists that the lawyer's own interests (for instance, the importance of his ongoing relationship with the Bank to his law practice) will adversely affect the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of either the Supplier or the Bank. We analyze in turn each task that the Supplier has asked the inquirer to perform.

9. Taking over the negotiation and drafting currently done by the Supplier's in-house staff. Although lease negotiations are between the Supplier and its customer as counterparties, the lease transaction is in contemplation of the Bank's acquisition of the lease. In some situations, the Bank's involvement as a lender or other participant in a transaction in which the inquirer (who is still the Bank's lawyer on other matters) represents another party may give rise to a conflict of interest, and in other instances it may not. This is a case-by-case determination.

10. In the circumstances here, we believe that the particular interests of the Bank and the Supplier will involve the lawyer in representing "differing interests" within the meaning of Rule 1.7(a)(1) and Rule 1.0(f) (defining "differing interests" as "every interest that will adversely affect either the judgment or the loyalty of a lawyer to a client, whether it be a conflicting, inconsistent, diverse, or other interest"). While the Bank and the Supplier appear to be broadly aligned in interest in the proposed transactions with the Supplier's customers, the interests of the Bank and the Supplier may be "differing" within the meaning of the Rule with respect to the issues that are likely to arise in negotiation of the lease terms. In particular, the Supplier will likely be primarily interested in closing an equipment leasing deal, while the Bank is likely to be primarily interested in ensuring that the Supplier's customer satisfies the Bank's credit standards.

11. These divergent goals are sufficient to implicate the concerns of Rule 1.7(a) regarding the representation of differing interests. See Rule 1.7, cmt. [7] ("Differing interests can also arise in transactional matters. For example, if a lawyer is asked to represent the seller of a business in negotiations with a buyer represented by the lawyer, not in the same transaction but in another, unrelated matter, the lawyer could not undertake the representation without the informed consent of each client); N.Y. City 2001-2 (law firm may represent client whose interests in transaction are adverse to those of a current client in a separate matter if a disinterested lawyer would believe that the law firm can competently represent the interests of each client). The divergent goals also sufficient to implicate the concerns of Rule 1.9(a) in barring a lawyer from representing a new client (the Supplier) whose interests are "materially adverse" to the interests of a former client (the Bank) in a matter substantially related to the lawyer's work for the former client (the lawyer's work on behalf of the Bank regarding the Supplier's equipment financing program).

12. Nevertheless, we do not believe that the circumstances necessarily create a conflict beyond the capacity of informed consent to cure. If the inquirer reasonably believes that he will be able to "provide competent and diligent representation" to the Supplier in this matter and to the Bank in the unrelated matters – i.e., that he will neither "pull his punches" in representing the Supplier's interests as a lessor in order to serve the Bank's interests as a lender, nor diminish his vigor in representing the Bank in unrelated matters – and if both clients give informed consent, confirmed in writing, then the inquirer is ethically permitted to take on the negotiations with the Supplier's customers regarding leases while continuing to represent the Bank in unrelated matters. See Rule 1.7(b)(1), (4).

13. Assisting Supplier in organization and education. The same is true with respect to the second of the requested assignments, assisting the Supplier's with education and organization. Although these activities could be said to be in the Bank's interests in minimizing the Bank's transaction costs, the main point of the exercise is to affect the negotiations between the Supplier and the Supplier's customers, which could give rise to the same differing interests with the Bank as the actual negotiation and drafting of the lease documents. For instance, when training the Supplier's employees, the lawyer would have to decide whether to instruct employees to negotiate credit terms aggressively (for the Bank's benefit) or to relax credit terms to obtain the customer's prompt acceptance (for the Supplier's benefit). Yet here, too, we do not believe that the conflict is necessarily non-consentable. As before, if inquirer reasonably believes that inquirer will be able to "provide competent and diligent representation" to the Supplier in this matter and to the Bank in unrelated matters, and if both clients give informed consent confirmed in writing, the inquirer is ethically permitted to provide this assistance to Supplier while continuing to represent the Bank in other matters.

14. Working on Supplier transactions outside of Bank program. The inquirer's representation of the Supplier in matters not involving the Bank would not raise any special conflict issues apart from those we discuss above. To the extent that inquirer needs to obtain the Bank's consent to conflicts arising out of any future representations of the Bank adverse to the Supplier, the extent of the representation of the Supplier may be material to any consent.

CONCLUSION:

15. A lawyer who has previously represented a bank in connection with an equipment vendor financing program may later represent the equipment vendor regarding the vendor's participation in the financing program while continuing to represent the bank on unrelated matters, provided the lawyer obtains the informed consent of each client, confirmed in writing.

OPINION 850 (01/19/2011)

TOPIC: Law firm name – former partner

DIGEST: A law firm may not use the name of a former partner in the firm name if the former partner continues to practice law elsewhere.

RULES: 7.5(b), 8.4(d)

QUESTION:

1. May a law firm use the name of a former partner in its firm name if the former partner departs from the firm but continues to practice law as general counsel to a corporation?

FACTS:

2. The inquirer is a member of a law firm, fictionally styled ABCD. Named partner B was recently hired as an officer and general counsel of a closely held corporation located in the same city as the firm. Upon accepting this position, B withdrew as a partner of ABCD. B continues to have a close social relationship with the law firm and regularly refers matters to the firm, but B no longer participates in law firm matters and neither draws an income nor takes a salary from the firm.

3. ABCD prefers not to change the law firm name, however, "due to cost and the possibility of confusion that would be caused by a name change." ABCD, which is comprised of twenty-five lawyers (of whom ten are partners), "does nothing intentionally to trade off B's name or reputation." Based on the fact that B is now employed by a corporation as general counsel, does not compete with the law firm in any way, does not hold himself out as being available to take on matters from the public, and does not take on matters from the general public for compensation, the inquirer asks whether B has "retired" from the practice of law so that the firm can continue to include B in the firm name.

OPINION:

4. The question is governed by Rule 7.5(b) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct, which provides that "[a] lawyer in private practice shall not practice under a trade name, a name that is misleading as to the identity of the lawyer or lawyers practicing under such name, or a firm name containing names other than those of one or more of the lawyers in the firm. . . ." Cf. Rule 7.5, cmt. 1 ("In order to avoid the possibility of misleading persons with whom a lawyer deals, a lawyer should be scrupulous in the representation of professional status. Lawyers should not hold themselves out as being partners or associates of a law firm if that is not the fact, and thus lawyers should not hold themselves out as being partners or associates of a law firm if that is not the fact"). Rule 7.5(b) includes an exception, however, allowing a firm to "use as, or continue to include in its name the name or names of one or more deceased or retired members of the firm or of a predecessor firm in a continuing line of succession."

5. In N.Y. State 266 (1972), we interpreted the relevant portion of Rule 7.5(b)'s identical predecessor provision in the New York Lawyer's Code of Professional Responsibility, DR 2-102(B), and concluded that "[a] law firm may continue the name of a retired partner in the partnership name provided he does not practice law independently of the firm. . . .” We noted that “[s]o long as the former partner has a continuing relationship with the firm and to the extent he practices law it is with his former firm, he will not be considered to be practicing independently of the firm and the firm may properly continue his name as part of the firm name.”

6. Here, however, B is still actively engaged in the practice of law as the general counsel to a corporation. While Rule 7.5(b) allows a law firm to use the name of a retired member of the firm, B has not “retired” from the practice of law within the meaning of that provision. See 22 NYCRR § 118.1(g) (“An attorney is ‘retired’ from the practice of law when, other than the performance of legal services without compensation, he or she does not practice law in any respect and does not intend ever to engage in acts that constitute the practice of law.”); cf. Rule 1.17(a) (“Retirement shall include the cessation of the private practice of law in the geographic area . . .”). Therefore, Rule 7.5(b) does not permit the continued use of B’s name in the firm name. See also former New York Lawyer’s Code of Professional Responsibility EC 2-11 (“the name of a partner who withdraws from a firm but continues to practice law should be omitted from the firm name in order to avoid misleading the public”).

7. Moreover, using the firm name ABCD after B’s withdrawal as a partner of ABCD, even though B continues the active practice of law elsewhere in the same geographic area, violates Rule 7.5(b), because the name ABCD “is misleading as to the identity of the lawyer or lawyers practicing under [the] name.” See North Carolina Formal Opinion 20 (2007) (opining that if an attorney leaves a firm and begins engaging in the private practice of law, the firm could not continue to use the attorney’s surname in the firm name because it would be misleading): Maryland Ethics Op. 00-03 (1999) (professional corporation may not continue to include the name of a former member of the firm who is no longer a shareholder and is practicing elsewhere, as such designation would be misleading); District of Columbia Op. 277 (1997) (“[i]t is . . . misleading to include in a firm name the name of a lawyer practicing elsewhere”); see also Rule 8.4(d) (“A lawyer or law firm shall not engage in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation.”).

CONCLUSION:

8. A law firm may not use the name of a former partner in its firm name when the former partner departs from the firm but continues to practice law as general counsel to a corporation.

OPINION 851 (01/19/2011)

TOPIC: Using a law firm photograph in a newspaper advertisement.

DIGEST: An advertisement for a law firm may feature a photograph with non-lawyer employees of the firm provided that the advertisement, viewed as a whole, is not misleading about the size of the firm, its ethnic or gender diversity, or whether those pictured are lawyers.

RULE: 7.1

QUESTION:

1. May an advertisement for a law firm feature a photograph of the entire firm, including non-lawyer staff such as paralegals and secretaries?

OPINION:

2. Rule 7.1(a) of the Rules of Professional Conduct states that "[a] lawyer or law firm shall not use or disseminate or participate in the use or dissemination of any advertisement that: (1) contains statements or claims that are false, deceptive or misleading; or (2) violates a Rule."

3. A photograph in a law firm's advertisement makes "statements or claims" within the meaning of Rule 7.1(a). The issue before us is whether a photograph of a law firm that includes non-lawyers such as paralegals and secretaries would violate Rule 7.1 by creating a misimpression about the size of the firm, the ethnic or gender diversity of its personnel, or whether all those appearing in the photograph are lawyers.

4. This Committee's prior opinions state that, when a law firm holds a non-lawyer out to the public, the firm must identify the non-lawyer as such to avoid confusing or misleading the public. For instance, we have opined that the name of a non-lawyer may appear on law firm letterhead as long as the letterhead includes appropriate disclosure of the non-lawyer's professional status. See N.Y. State 500 (1978) ("While non-lawyer status will no longer preclude the use of a person's name on a firm's letterhead, his name should be accompanied by language that makes clear his non-lawyer status."). Similarly, a law firm may permit a paralegal to use a business card with the law firm's name as long as the card identifies the paralegal as a non-lawyer. See N.Y. State 640 (1992) (when a law firm lists a paralegal on a letterhead or business card "the primary concern is to insure that the listing is not false, deceptive or misleading"). Each of these prior opinions interpreted DR 2-101, the predecessor of Rule 7.1, but the principles are the same. See also ABA Inf. Opinion 89-1527 ("The listing of nonlawyer support personnel on lawyers' letterheads is not prohibited . . . so long as the listing is not false or misleading. In order to avoid being misleading, the listing must make it clear that the support personnel who are listed are not lawyers.").

5. The Connecticut Bar Association's Committee on Professional Ethics addressed a similar question and concluded that an advertisement containing a photograph of a firm's two lawyers and the firm's paralegals would not violate that state's ethics rules as long as the "proposed advertisement makes it clear that [the] paralegals are not lawyers or otherwise competent to practice law (i.e., they are staff or assistants)." Connecticut Inf. Opinion 92-27.

6. We agree with Connecticut's approach, and we conclude here that an advertisement containing a photograph of a law firm is ethically permissible if the photograph, viewed in the context of the advertisement as a whole, is not misleading. One way to ensure that a firm photograph including non-legal staff is not misleading would be to accompany the photograph with a caption specifying the professional status of each person in the photograph or stating that the photo includes non-legal staff.[1]

CONCLUSION:

7. The question presented is answered in the affirmative, subject to the qualifications stated above. An advertisement for a law firm may feature a photograph that includes non-lawyer employees of the firm provided that the advertisement, viewed as a whole, is not misleading about the size of the firm, its ethnic or gender diversity, or whether the people in the photograph are lawyers.

Cahill*, 598 F.3d 79 (2d Cir. 2010), petition for cert. denied, (U.S. Dec 13, 2010)) (No. 10-203). In Alexander, the Second Circuit addressed the constitutionality of parts of DR 2-101(C) and DR 2-103(G), including DR 2-101(C)(3)'s prohibition of attorney advertising featuring "the portrayal of a fictitious law firm, the use of a fictitious name to refer to lawyers not associated together in a law firm, or otherwise imply[ing] that lawyers are associated in a law firm if that is not the case." 598 F.3d at 90. The Court interpreted this provision to apply "only to situations in which lawyers from different firms give the misleading impression that they are from the same firm." Id. Subject to that interpretation, the Court held that the provision did not violate the First Amendment. Id.

TOPIC: Settlement agreements requiring attorney to indemnify client's obligation to third party

DIGEST: An attorney may not agree to indemnify a client's obligations to a third party as part of a settlement of the client's claim.

RULES: 1.2(a); 1.8(e); 5.6(a); and 8.4(a).

QUESTION:

1. May a lawyer agree to indemnify a client's obligations to a third party as part of a settlement of the client's claim?

OPINION:

2. The inquirer represents several plaintiffs in asbestos litigation. She notes that, under Section 111 of the Medicare, Medicaid, and SCHIP Extension Act of 2007 ("MMSEA"), defendants and insurance carriers have new reporting requirements in connection with settlements of personal injury claims. Under these new requirements, whenever there is a settlement, the defendant and its insurer have a duty to report certain payment details to the government and can be fined significantly if they fail to report. According to the inquirer, "the defendants and their insurers have been formulating ways to cover themselves in the event that plaintiffs provide them with the wrong information." The inquirer notes that one of the things frequently requested from the plaintiff's attorney is an indemnification with regard to Medicare liens owed by the attorney's client.

3. The applicability and requirements of the MMSEA are questions of law beyond the scope of this Committee's jurisdiction. We note, however, that the scenario posed by the inquirer is strikingly similar to those addressed in several recent ethics opinions. For example, in N.Y. City 2010-3, the New York City Bar's Committee on Professional and Judicial Ethics addressed whether an attorney representing a settling plaintiff may enter into a hold harmless/indemnity agreement for the benefit of the settling defendants. The opinion noted that plaintiffs in personal injury litigation frequently obtain financial assistance from Medicaid, Medicare, workers compensation carriers, or private insurance coverage. Furthermore, when a plaintiff is entitled to funds through a damages award or settlement at the conclusion of the litigation, such carriers or agencies may be entitled by statute or contract to reimbursement from the plaintiff for any payments the carriers or agencies have made to the plaintiff. These entities therefore frequently seek to recoup amounts the defendant has paid to the plaintiff in the litigation. See, e.g., Fasso v. Doerr, 12 N.Y.3d 80 (2009) (plaintiff's health insurer permitted to intervene in plaintiff insured's medical malpractice action to assert an equitable subrogation claim against defendant doctor for reimbursement of the payments the health insurer made for plaintiff's medical expenses); Teichman v. Community Hosp. of Western Suffolk, 87 N.Y.2d 514 (1996) (noting that if an injured party receives settlement monies from a tortfeasor to cover medical expenses that were paid by plaintiff's insurer, the insurer may recoup its disbursements from its insured).

4. As noted in N.Y. City 2010-3, defendants and their attorneys who settle cases generally are aware that payments made under a settlement agreement may be subject to the liens or claims of plaintiff's insurance providers or other creditors. In addition, defendant tortfeasors may be subject to subrogation claims brought by plaintiff's health insurers. See Fasso, 12 N.Y.3d at 86-87 ("It is well established that when an insurer pays for losses sustained by its insured that were occasioned by a wrongdoer, the insurer is entitled to seek recovery of the monies it expended under the doctrine of equitable subrogation"). To protect themselves against any potential liability for those claims, defendants frequently demand language in the settlement agreement stipulating that the settling plaintiff will hold defendants harmless from any claims made by insurers or other creditors. Defendants also frequently demand that the plaintiff's attorney personally guarantee the plaintiff's indemnification obligation and hold defendants harmless from any third party claims.

5. Rule 1.8(e) provides, in pertinent part, "While representing a client in connection with contemplated or pending litigation, a lawyer shall not advance or guarantee financial assistance to the client." Rule 1.8(e)(1)-(2), however, states exceptions providing that the lawyer may "advance court costs and expenses of litigation, the repayment of which may be contingent on the outcome of the matter," and may pay court costs and expenses of litigation on behalf of "an indigent or pro bono client."

6. "Financial assistance" comes in many forms, including gifts, loans, and guarantees. See, e.g., ABA 04-432 (lawyer's posting or arranging for the posting of a bond to secure release from custody of a client the lawyer represents in the matter in which the client has been detained constitutes "financial assistance" under Model Rule 1.8(e), but falls within the ambit of the exception in subparagraph (e)(1) for "court costs and expenses of litigation"); Missouri Opinion 125 (2008) ("Any type of guarantee to cover a client's debts constitutes financial assistance."). Cf. New York Rule 1.8, cmt. [10] ("Lawyers may not subsidize lawsuits or administrative proceedings brought on behalf of their clients, including making or guaranteeing loans to their clients for living expenses, because to do so would encourage clients to pursue lawsuits that might not otherwise be brought and because such assistance gives lawyers too great a financial stake in the litigation."). An attorney's agreement to indemnify the client for the client's failure to meet her own obligations, such as the payment of a Medicare lien, constitutes a "guarantee [of] financial assistance" that is prohibited by Rule 1.8(e). See N.Y. City 2010-3.

7. As noted above, Rule 1.8(e)(1)-(2) creates exceptions to the prohibition against advancing or guaranteeing financial assistance to the client in connection with litigation and permits the lawyer to advance or pay "court costs and expenses of litigation" in certain situations. A lawyer's agreement to indemnify or guarantee the client's obligations under a settlement does not fall within this exception because the settlement obligation does not constitute a "court cost" or "expense of litigation." As Comment [9B] to Rule 1.8 explains:

> [P]aragraph (e) limits permitted financial assistance to court costs directly related to litigation. Examples of permitted expenses include filing fees, expenses of investigation, medical diagnostic work connected with the matter under litigation and treatment necessary for the diagnosis, and the costs of obtaining and presenting evidence. Permitted expenses do not include living or medical expenses other than those listed above.

See N.Y. City 2010-3 ("a client's obligation to use settlement proceeds to satisfy a lien or other indebtedness is a personal obligation of the client, and, for purposes of the Rule, is indistinguishable from the client's obligation to pay other expenses such as medical expenses or residential rent").

8. While Rule 1.2(a) requires a lawyer to "abide by a client's decision whether to settle a matter," the lawyer cannot pursue or enter into a settlement that violates the Rules. See Rule 1.2, cmt. [1] (a lawyer should "take whatever lawful and ethical measures are required to vindicate a client's cause or endeavor") (emphasis added); see also Rule 5.6(a)(2) ("A lawyer shall not participate in offering or making . . . an agreement in which a restriction on a lawyer's right to practice is part of the settlement of a client controversy."); Rule 5.6, cmt. [2] ("Paragraph (a)(2) prohibits a lawyer from agreeing not to represent other persons in connection with settling a claim on behalf of a client."). Therefore, a lawyer cannot pursue or enter into a settlement agreement that requires the lawyer to advance or guarantee financial assistance to the client in violation of Rule 1.8(e) even if the client desires such a course of action.

9. Insofar as a lawyer may not agree to indemnify his or her own client's obligations to a third party as part of a settlement of the client's claim, it is also impermissible for another lawyer to enter into a settlement that requires such an indemnification. See Rule 8.4(a) ("A lawyer or law firm shall not . . . violate or attempt to violate the Rules of Professional Conduct [or] knowingly assist or induce another to do so").

CONCLUSION:

10. Rule 1.8(e) prohibits a lawyer from agreeing to indemnify a client's obligations to a third party as part of a settlement of the client's claim, and Rule 8.4(a) prohibits another lawyer's participation in a settlement that requires such an indemnification.

OPINION 853 (03/01/2011)

TOPIC: Law firm name including name of partner who becomes inside counsel to a corporation.

DIGEST: A name partner who becomes inside counsel to a corporation will not be "retired" under Rule 7.5(b) so as to allow the firm to retain the partner's name in the firm's name. The firm also may not retain the partner's name in the firm's name if the partner's time working as inside counsel is considered an open-ended leave of absence, or if the partner becomes of counsel to the firm and minimizes his participation in the firm while working as inside counsel. Finally, if the partner is simultaneously associated with both the law firm and the corporation's legal department, the conflicts of one may be imputed to the other.

RULES: 1.7(a), 1.10(a)&(e), 5.1, 7.5(a)&(b).

QUESTION:

1. Inquirer is a name partner of a law firm (the "Firm"). Another name partner (the "Partner") in the Firm "will transition to an in house corporate position shortly." The Partner has not yet withdrawn from the Firm, and Inquirer hopes that the Partner will remain a partner of the Firm. The Firm wishes to retain the Partner's name in the Firm's name, and Inquirer poses three questions about the permissibility of doing so:

> A. May the Firm retain the Partner's name in the Firm's name because the Partner will be "retired"?
> B. May the Firm retain the Partner's name in the Firm's name because the Partner may be treated "essentially on a leave of absence, notwithstanding that he continues as a partner and can come and go as he pleases"?
> C. May the Firm retain the Partner's name in the Firm's name if the Partner becomes "of counsel" to the Firm and "minimizes his participation" in the Firm?

After addressing these questions, we raise a question of our own regarding whether conflicts of the corporation's legal department will be imputed to the Firm, and vice versa.

OPINION:

2. The main rule governing questions about law firm names is Rule 7.5(b) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"), which provides:

> A lawyer in private practice shall not practice under a trade name, a name that is misleading as to the identity of the lawyer or lawyers practicing under such name, or a firm name containing names other than those of one or more of the lawyers in the firm, except that . . . if otherwise lawful, a firm may use as, or continue to include in its name the name or names of one or more deceased or retired members of the firm or of a predecessor firm in a continuing line of succession. [Emphasis added.]

Question A: Will the Partner be "retired" under Rule 7.5(b)?

3. Rule 7.5(b) permits a law firm to "include in its name the name or names of one or more . . . retired members of the firm," so the first question is whether a Partner working in house at a corporation will be "retired" within the meaning of Rule 7.5(b). In N.Y. State 850 (2011), we opined that a lawyer who is still actively engaged in the practice of law as the general counsel to a corporation has not "retired" from the practice of law within the meaning of Rule 7.5(b). We therefore concluded that a law firm "may not use the name of a former partner in its firm name when the former partner departs from the firm but continues to practice law as general counsel to a corporation." For the same reasons, the Partner in the inquiry here will not be "retired" under Rule 7.5(b), and the Firm cannot retain his name in the Firm's name on that basis.

Question B: May the Partner be treated "as essentially on a leave of absence, notwithstanding that he continues as a partner and can come and go as he pleases"?

4. The next question is whether the Partner may be treated as if he were a partner essentially on "leave of absence" while he is working in house at the corporation, allowing the Firm to retain his name in the Firm's name on that basis. In N.Y. State 381 (1975), this Committee opined that the name of a professional legal corporation "may not properly include the name of [a] former partner who is practicing law with another firm." An in-house lawyer at a corporation is practicing with another law firm because Rule 1.0(h) defines "Firm" or "law firm" to include "the legal department of a corporation or other organization."

5. Moreover, while the Partner is working in house at the corporation, the facts suggest that the Partner would not be active in the Firm. In N.Y. State 346 (1974), we opined that a law firm may not list on its letterhead an "inactive" partner practicing in another jurisdiction because "there is no proper purpose to be served by such a listing," and the "designation of an inactive partner would only tend to confuse the public as to the status and responsibility of the inactive member." Similarly, in N.Y. County 735 (2006), the committee opined that whether a lawyer's name may properly be included in a firm's name under the predecessor to Rule 7.5(b) involves a "qualitative" test of whether the lawyer is "sufficiently involved to provide the supervision required of the law firm collectively and himself individually as a manager of the law firm and partner" under DR 1-104 (the predecessor to Rule 5.1). That committee also concluded that if the lawyer in question "were not in fact practicing with the firm," then the name of the firm that includes the absent lawyer would violate the rule governing law firm names. We agree with that conclusion.

6. Accordingly, we conclude that the name of a partner who is not retired from the practice of law, but is practicing elsewhere and is not actively involved in the supervision and management of the law firm's practice, cannot be included in the firm's name.

7. We note that the inquiry here refers to "essentially . . . a leave of absence," but the facts suggest an open-ended departure to practice elsewhere with no particular expectation by the Firm that the Partner will ever return. We express no view on whether a partner who leaves a firm for a relatively brief period, or leaves in other circumstances with the expectation of returning, must always remove his or her name from the law firm's name.

Question C: May the Firm retain the Partner's name in the Firm's name if the Partner takes "of counsel" status and "minimizes his participation" in the Firm?

8. The third question is whether the Firm may keep the Partner's name in the Firm name if the Partner takes of counsel status and "minimizes his participation" in the Firm. As a threshold matter, there is no prohibition on retaining in a firm's name the name of a former partner who has retired and taken of counsel status. See ABA 90-357 (1990) (finding no risk of misleading the public in that situation). See generally N.Y. City 1995-9 ("There is no requirement that a firm's name consist exclusively of partners; a person's continuing 'of counsel' relationship with the firm is enough").

9. But the Partner here will not qualify as an "of counsel" lawyer while working full time as an in house lawyer at a corporation. An of counsel relationship is one in which "the of counsel lawyer is 'available to the firm for consultation and advice on a regular and continuing basis.'" N.Y. State 793 (2006). The ABA Standing Committee on Ethics and Professional Responsibility has described the "core characteristic properly denoted by the title 'counsel'" as "'a close, regular, personal relationship.'" ABA 90-357 (1990). See also Rule 7.5(a)(4) ("A lawyer . . . may be designated 'Of Counsel' . . . if there is a continuing relationship with a lawyer or law firm, other than as a partner or associate.")

10. In an opinion closely on point, the Ethics Advisory Panel of the Rhode Island Supreme Court opined that a law firm could not continue to use the name of a partner who took a position as inside counsel and became "of counsel" to the firm. Rhode Island Opinion 94-65 (1994). The Panel stated that "if the lawyer is a named partner of the firm and is retiring to become 'of counsel,' the lawyer's name may be retained in the firm name. This is not true if instead of retiring, the lawyer is withdrawing to practice in another place, to take other employment or is taking a leave of absence." (Citations omitted.) The panel reasoned that retaining the lawyer's name in the firm's name under the circumstances "connotes a partnership and is therefore misleading to the public." The Nebraska Lawyers' Advisory Committee recently reached a similar conclusion. In Nebraska Opinion 10-04 (2010), the committee opined that if a "retired partner resumes the practice of law outside and apart from the firm, continued use of the attorney's name in the former firm's name is misleading to the public and therefore prohibited. This is true even if the attorney becomes 'of counsel' to the former firm after resuming practice." The committee reasoned that "[w]hen an attorney is actively practicing law and the attorney's name appears in a firm name . . . there is an implicit representation to the public that the lawyer is a partner or principal in that firm with fully shared responsibility for the firm's work."

11. We agree with the Rhode Island and Nebraska committees, and we therefore conclude that, as we understand the facts here, the Firm may not continue to include the Partner's name in the Firm's name if the Partner becomes of counsel and minimizes his participation in the Firm while working as inside counsel at a corporation.

Listing of predecessor firm

12. Although we have concluded that it would be inappropriate to retain the Partner's name in the Firm name under any of the alternative scenarios presented, the Firm may wish to consider whether it meets the criteria for listing, on its letterhead and professional announcement cards, "the names and dates of predecessor firms in a continuing line of succession," under Rules 7.5(a)(2), (4). If so, the Firm may note the former Firm name on its letterhead and announcement cards. However, even if the Firm may do so, under the facts here it may not use that former name as the Firm's name on an ongoing basis. See, e.g., N.Y. State 622 (1991) (articulating factors for determining when a law firm may continue to use the name of a successor law firm).

Imputation of conflicts of interest

13. Finally, although Inquirer has focused on questions about retaining the Partner's name in the Firm's name, we perceive an additional issue regarding imputed conflicts of interest. Rule 1.10(a), New York's main rule on imputation of conflicts, provides: "While lawyers are associated in a firm, none of them shall knowingly represent a client when any one of them practicing alone would be prohibited from doing so by Rule 1.7, 1.8 or 1.9, except as otherwise provided therein."

14. The term "associated" is not defined in the Rules. We have previously opined that "the concept extends beyond lawyers who are partners, associates or 'of counsel' in a firm, [but] it does not apply to all lawyers who are in any way 'connected' or 'related.'" N.Y. State 715 (1999) (whether a contract lawyer is "associated" with a law firm "depends on the facts and circumstances of the employment"). The touchstone is whether the lawyer "has general access to the files of all clients of the firm and regularly participates in discussions of their affairs." Id. Thus, conflicts may be imputed from the Partner to the Firm if, after he assumes the position of inside counsel, the Partner continues to be "associated" with the Firm, albeit on a basis that is too attenuated for him to be held out as either a name partner or of counsel.

15. More broadly, if the Partner is simultaneously associated for purposes of Rule 1.10(a) with both the Firm and the legal department of the corporation, the conflicts of the Firm and the legal department will generally be shared and must become part of both of their conflict-checking systems under Rule 1.10(e). For example, in N.Y. State 793 (2006), we considered the circumstance when an attorney ("L") simultaneously had an of counsel relationship with two law firms, XYZ and ABC. We concluded that if attorney X, a partner with the XYZ firm, was disqualified from a particular representation under the predecessor to Rule 1.7(a), then all lawyers associated with the firm XYZ, including L, were also disqualified, and the disqualification generally extended to the lawyers with whom L was associated in the ABC law firm. See also N.Y. City 2007-2 (discussing the imputation of conflicts in the context of a "secondment," such as a temporary assignment of a lawyer to a corporate client, and discussing how to safeguard against imputation); ABA 90-357 ("the effect of two or more firms sharing an of counsel lawyer is to make them all effectively a single firm, for purposes of attribution of disqualifications"); D.C. Opinion 338 (2007) (a lawyer may be a partner in one firm and of counsel to another firm, but "any disqualification of a lawyer in either firm will be imputed to all lawyers in both firms," unless an exception applies).

CONCLUSION:

16. The Partner, who is becoming inside counsel to a corporation, will not be "retired" under Rule 7.5(b), and it would therefore be improper to retain the Partner's name in the Firm's name on that basis. Nor may the Firm continue to retain the Partner's name in the Firm's name if the Partner is considered to be on an open-ended leave of absence, or if the Partner takes of counsel status and minimizes his participation in the Firm while working elsewhere as inside counsel. If the Partner is simultaneously "associated" with both the Firm and the legal department of the corporation, the conflicts of the each one will generally be imputed to the other, and the conflict-checking systems of both the corporation's legal department and the Firm need to take the other's conflicts into account.

TOPIC: Reporting known or suspected violation of Rules of Professional Conduct by another lawyer.

DIGEST: Lawyer who was employed by another lawyer must report knowledge of former employer's violation of the Rules of Professional Conduct if the violation raises a substantial question about the employer's honesty, trustworthiness, or fitness as a lawyer and if the report does not disclose confidential information. If the former employee lacks knowledge, he may report a good faith belief or suspicion of the former employer's professional misconduct to an appropriate authority if the report does not disclose confidential information, but may not communicate that belief or suspicion to the employer's clients.

RULES: 1.6, 8.3(a) & (c).

FACTS:

1. Lawyer A (for "Associate") was formerly employed by another lawyer, Lawyer P (for "Partner"). Lawyer A believes that Lawyer P wrongfully failed to pay wages and premiums on employer-provided health insurance, overbilled clients, and misrepresented to his clients the services that he could perform for them. (Lawyer A does not suggest that any of the clients were his personal clients, and we assume for purposes of this inquiry that they were not.)

QUESTION:

2. Lawyer A (the inquirer) has raised two related questions:

> A. May (or must) Lawyer A report Lawyer P's alleged misconduct to a disciplinary authority?
> B. May (or must) Lawyer A inform Lawyer P's clients about Lawyer P's alleged misconduct?

OPINION:

Question A: May (or must) Lawyer A report Lawyer P's alleged misconduct to a disciplinary authority?

3. The most relevant rule in the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") is Rule 8.3. That rule provides, in pertinent part:

> (a) A lawyer who knows that another lawyer has committed a violation of the Rules of Professional Conduct that raises a substantial question as to that lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness as a lawyer shall report such knowledge to a tribunal or other authority empowered to investigate or act upon such violation.
> * * * * *
> (c) This Rule does not require disclosure of:

(1) information otherwise protected by Rule 1.6; or

(2) information gained by a lawyer or judge while participating in a bona fide lawyer assistance program.

4. In N.Y. State 635 (1992), which construed DR 1-103 (the nearly identical predecessor to Rule 8.3), this Committee opined that a lawyer in Lawyer A's situation must report professional misconduct by another lawyer (here, Lawyer P) if four criteria are satisfied. Those criteria are consistent with the New York Rules of Professional Conduct that took effect on April 1, 2009. The four criteria are as follows:

A. Lawyer A has "actual knowledge" or a "clear belief" as to the pertinent facts, i.e., more than a "mere suspicion" or a "reasonable belief";

B. None of the information that would be essential for Lawyer A's report is protected as confidential information (see Rule 8.3(c)(1)) and none of the information was gained while participating in a bona fide lawyer assistance program (see Rule 8.3(c)(2));

C. Based upon Lawyer A's knowledge about the facts, Lawyer A knows or has a "clear belief" that Lawyer P has violated one or more Rules of Professional Conduct; and

D. The violation "raises a substantial question" as to Lawyer P's "honesty, trustworthiness or fitness as a lawyer" (Rule 8.3(a)).

5. As in N.Y. State 635, we express no opinion here on the question whether Lawyer P's alleged conduct was a "violation of the Rules of Professional Conduct" or, if it was, whether the violation raises a "substantial question" as to Lawyer P's "honesty, trustworthiness or fitness as a lawyer . . . ." Rule 8.3(a). Answering those questions would require us to make factual determinations about circumstances that may well be disputed, and would require us to evaluate the past conduct of an attorney other than the inquirer. As in N.Y. State 635, "It is for [Lawyer A] to determine, based on his knowledge of all the pertinent facts and circumstances, whether the foregoing prerequisites have been met" and, therefore, whether Lawyer A must report Lawyer P's misconduct to an appropriate tribunal or disciplinary authority.

6. Even if Lawyer A determines that he is not required to report lawyer P, he is nevertheless permitted to report his reasonable suspicions of misconduct if the report does not reveal confidential information protected by Rule 1.6. "As a general proposition, a lawyer is always free to report evidence of what may constitute improper conduct by another attorney, subject to the obligations to preserve client confidences and secrets. The lawyer need not have actual proof of misconduct; a good faith belief or suspicion that misconduct has been committed is a sufficient basis for making a report." N.Y. State 635 at p. 4, citing N.Y. State 480 (1978.) See also SIMON'S NEW YORK CODE OF PROFESSIONAL RESPONSIBILITY ANNOTATED 77 (2008 ed.) ("a lawyer may report another lawyer based on rumor, suspicion, or hearsay, and may report activities raising less-than-substantial questions about a lawyer's fitness as a lawyer").

7. But the freedom to report a good faith belief or suspicion of misconduct should not become a pretext for a report intended "to gain advantages or concessions from other lawyers in the course of litigation, in private business transactions, or in interpersonal relationships, or by attorneys acting purely out of spite." N.Y. State 635 at p. 4. Even though disciplinary complaints are confidential under Judiciary Law §90, "it would be patently improper for a lawyer to make a report of misconduct and subject another lawyer to investigation without having a reasonable basis for doing so or solely to gain a tactical advantage in a matter." Id. (citations omitted). See also SIMON'S NEW YORK CODE OF PROFESSIONAL RESPONSIBILITY ANNOTATED, supra, at 78 (mandatory reporting rule "should not be used as a weapon against opposing lawyers or competing law firms").

Question B: May (or must) Lawyer A inform Lawyer P's clients about Lawyer P's alleged misconduct?

8. Lawyer A is not required to inform Lawyer P's clients about Lawyer P's alleged misconduct. However, assuming Lawyer A does not improperly disclose confidential information concerning any client, and assuming Lawyer A acts in good faith, Lawyer A is permitted to disclose knowledge (as distinguished from a suspicion) of Lawyer P's misconduct to the affected client or clients. (Whether such a disclosure could violate the dictate of § 90 of the New York Judiciary Law that disciplinary complaints shall be confidential unless and until professional discipline is publically imposed is a question of law as to which we offer no opinion.)

9. However, before making any such discretionary report to Lawyer P's clients, Lawyer A should carefully consider the dangers of informing another lawyer's clients about that lawyer's misconduct. As this Committee observed in N.Y. State 480 (1978), the dangers inherent in reporting another lawyer's misconduct to that lawyer's clients are greater than the dangers of reporting the lawyer's misconduct to appropriate authorities. In particular, divulging another lawyer's alleged misconduct to that lawyer's clients may unnecessarily endanger that lawyer's attorney-client relationships.

10. Moreover, a lawyer may not inform another lawyer's clients about mere suspicions of the other lawyer's misconduct. We recognized in N.Y. State 480 that a lawyer may properly report mere suspicions to an appropriate authority, but we perceived "a substantial danger in permitting a lawyer to approach present clients of the suspected counsel" because in that instance "the sanctity of the attorney-client relationship weighs far more heavily in favor of proscribing the communication. . . . Usually the interests of all can best be served by reporting suspicious conduct to an appropriate authority. The former client's confidence in his present counsel should not be jeopardized unnecessarily."

11. In deciding whether to disclose either actual knowledge or a clear, good faith belief of misconduct by another lawyer to anyone other than an appropriate tribunal or disciplinary authority, therefore, a lawyer should carefully weigh (i) the certainty or uncertainty of his belief (i.e., whether the belief rises to the level of knowledge or a clear belief, as opposed to a mere suspicion), (ii) the risk of unnecessary and perhaps unwarranted damage to the other lawyer's attorney-client relationships, and (iii) the countervailing risks of irreparable injury to the interests of the other lawyer's clients absent prompt and effective disclosure to them.

CONCLUSION:

12. Lawyer A must report the conduct of his former employer, Lawyer P, to an appropriate authority if all four of the following criteria are met: (1) Lawyer A has knowledge or a clear belief concerning the pertinent facts (i.e., he has more than a reasonable belief or mere suspicion); (2) Lawyer A's report will not reveal confidential information protected by Rule 1.6 or information that Lawyer A gained while participating in a bona fide lawyer assistance program; (3) the conduct by Lawyer P constitutes a violation of one or more Rules of Professional Conduct; and (4) the violation raises a substantial question as to Lawyer P's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness as a lawyer.

13. If all four of those criteria are met, Lawyer A may also report such misconduct to the affected clients of Lawyer P – but before informing the clients, Lawyer A should carefully weigh both dangers to Lawyer P's attorney-client relationships if the affected clients are informed against the countervailing dangers to the clients if they are not informed.

14. Even if Lawyer A is not satisfied that all four criteria have been met, Lawyer A may nevertheless report a good faith belief or suspicion of Lawyer P's alleged misconduct to an appropriate authority, provided that the report of the suspected misconduct does not require the disclosure of confidential information or information that Lawyer A gained while participating in a bona fide lawyer assistance program. But Lawyer A may not inform Lawyer P's clients about mere suspicions of Lawyer P's misconduct.

TOPIC: Conflict of interest; referral of clients to spouse's litigation financing company.

DIGEST: A lawyer conducting litigation for a client may not refer the client to a litigation financing company owned by the inquiring lawyer's spouse to provide financial assistance that the lawyer personally would be barred from providing.

RULES: 1.8(e), 1.8(i), 8.4(a).

QUESTION:

1. When clients of a personal injury law firm have financing needs in connection with contemplated or pending litigation, may a lawyer at the firm refer such clients to a legal financing company formed by the lawyer's spouse for the purpose of advancing funds to clients?

OPINION:

2. The inquirer practices law at a firm that handles personal injury cases. Clients of the firm are sometimes unable to pay living expenses or litigation expenses, and they may turn to a litigation financing company for help. The inquirer's spouse would therefore like to establish a litigation financing company to aid such clients, and the inquirer would like to refer clients to the spouse's litigation financing company.

3. This plan implicates provisions in the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") concerning financial assistance to clients, taking a proprietary interest in a client's matter, and violating a Rule of Professional Conduct through the actions of another.

Prohibitions in Rule 1.8

4. Rule 1.8 is entitled "Current Clients: Specific Conflict of Interest Rules." Rule 1.8(e), which is identical to DR 5-103(B) of the former Code of Professional Responsibility as amended in 2007, provides:

> While representing a client in connection with contemplated or pending litigation, a lawyer shall not advance or guarantee financial assistance to the client, except that:
> (1) a lawyer may advance court costs and expenses of litigation, the repayment of which may be contingent on the outcome of the matter;
> (2) a lawyer representing an indigent or pro bono client may pay court costs and expenses of litigation on behalf of the client; and
> (3) a lawyer, in an action in which an attorney's fee is payable in whole or in part as a percentage of the recovery in the action, may pay on the lawyer's own account court costs and expenses of litigation. In such case, the fee paid to the > lawyer from the proceeds of the action may include an amount equal to such costs and expenses incurred.

5. If the inquiring attorney had asked this Committee whether a lawyer could personally form a litigation financing company to advance funds to clients, the Committee would have concluded that such an act violates Rule 1.8(e). Under Rule 1.8(e), the inquirer personally could not advance funds to clients in the form of loans. As Comment [10] to Rule 1.8 provides:

> Lawyers may not subsidize lawsuits or administrative proceedings brought on behalf of their clients, including making or guaranteeing loans to their clients for living expenses, because to do so would encourage clients to pursue lawsuits that might not otherwise be brought and because such assistance gives lawyers too great a financial stake in the litigation.

6. Nor could the inquirer overcome the prohibition against giving financial assistance to a client by obtaining the client's informed consent. As observed in SIMON'S NEW YORK RULES OF PROFESSIONAL CONDUCT ANNOTATED 116 (West 2009 ed.), "Rule 1.8 . . . makes some personal interest conflicts non-consentable no matter how fully a lawyer discloses the potential for conflicts of interest that will harm the client." Rule 1.8(e) addresses a type of personal conflict of interest that is not waivable by the client and cannot be cured by the client's consent.

7. Likewise, a lawyer may not evade the prohibition on financial assistance to clients by purchasing an interest in a client's litigation instead of providing a loan. Purchasing a proprietary interest would violate a different provision, Rule 1.8(i), which is substantially identical to former DR 5-103(A). Rule 1.8(i) states:

> A lawyer shall not acquire a proprietary interest in the cause of action or subject matter of litigation the lawyer is conducting for a client, except that the lawyer may:
> (1) acquire a lien authorized by law to secure the lawyer's fee or expenses; and
> (2) contract with a client for a reasonable contingent fee in a civil matter subject to Rule 1.5(d) or other law or court rule.

8. However, there is at least one legitimate route to avoiding the restrictions imposed by Rule 1.8(e) and (i): a lawyer may refer a client to a financial institution in which the lawyer has no interest. In N.Y. State 666 (1994), a lawyer wished to refer a client to a financial institution that would lend the client money for living expenses. Repayment of the loan would be contingent on the successful resolution of the client's claim for personal injuries. The Committee concluded that "a mere referral to the lending institution would not be unethical per se," considering that the lawyer did not propose to "pay" or "advance" any part of the loan. "The lawyer's sole function would be to refer the client to a lending institution that then would assess the value of the claim and take a lien on its proceeds to secure the loan."

9. In N.Y. State 769 (2003), which specifically concerned the litigation financing industry, we acknowledged that a lawyer could ethically refer clients to a litigation financing company, but we added: "As we pointed out in N.Y. State 666 (1994), the lawyer cannot own any interest in the financing institution; any such interest would be prohibited by the Code."

Referring Clients to the Lawyer's Spouse

10. That background brings us to the question posed here. If a lawyer may ethically refer a client to a lending institution in which the lawyer has no interest for the purpose of obtaining a loan contingent on the outcome of the client's case, may a lawyer refer a client to a lending institution owned by the lawyer's spouse?

11. The Committee has frequently concluded that various rules relating to conflicts involving financial interests apply both to the lawyer and to the lawyer's business relationships with the lawyer's spouse. See, e.g., N.Y. State 738 (2001) (referral to title abstract company in which spouse had an interest); N.Y. State 493 (1978), (lawyer or spouse as broker); N.Y. State 340 (1974) (lawyer and spouse as salesperson in a brokerage agency); N.Y. State 291 (1973) (lawyer or spouse with interest in a brokerage agency); N.Y. State 244 (1972) (lawyer and spouse real estate broker). For example, in N.Y. State 738 we asked: "May an attorney who represents clients engaged in real estate matters refer those clients to a title abstract company in which the attorney's spouse has an ownership interest?" We had stated in two previous opinions that a lawyer could not refer a real estate client to a title abstract company in which the lawyer personally owned an interest unless the abstract work was "purely ministerial" and the lawyer obtained consent from the client after full disclosure. Noting the unified financial interests of husband and wife, and based on N.Y. State 244, N.Y. State 291, N.Y. State 340, and N.Y. State 493, we concluded in N.Y. State 738 that an attorney "may not refer a real estate client to a title abstract company for other than ministerial title work where the lawyer's spouse has an ownership interest in the abstract company."

12. We believe the same conclusion applies when a lawyer refers clients to a litigation financing company owned by the lawyer's spouse, at least to the extent the lawyer personally would be barred from providing financial assistance to a client. Moreover, referring clients to a litigation financing company owned by the lawyer's spouse would usually also implicate Rule 8.4(a), which provides: "A lawyer or law firm shall not: (a) violate or attempt to violate the Rules of Professional Conduct, knowingly assist or induce another to do so, or do so through the acts of another." Referring clients to the spouse's financing company would violate Rule 1.8(e) "through the acts of another," essentially using the spouse as a front for advancing improper financial assistance to a client for whom the lawyer is conducting litigation.

CONCLUSION:

13. A lawyer may not refer a client for whom the lawyer is conducting litigation to a litigation financing company owned by the lawyer's spouse in order to advance financial assistance to the client based on the prospective recovery in that litigation if the lawyer personally would be barred from providing that financial assistance.

OPINION 856 (03/17/2011)

TOPIC: Limiting the scope of a representation to particular stage of a matter.

DIGEST: A lawyer may limit the scope of the representation of a client provided that the client gives informed consent to the limitation, the scope of the representation is reasonable under the circumstances, and the limitation is not prejudicial to the administration of justice. However, even if the original limitation is permissible, the ethical obligation to represent the client may extend beyond the initial limitation contemplated by the lawyer and client if withdrawal from the representation requires court permission and the court withholds or denies that permission.

RULES: 1.2(c), 1.16(c)-(e), 8.4(d).

QUESTION:

1. May a lawyer limit representation of a client in a criminal case to representation for arraignment purposes only?

OPINION:

2. A union legal services plan regularly retains a lawyer to represent union members in criminal matters for arraignment purposes only. After arraignment, the legal services plan requires the union member to personally obtain counsel (either the original legal services plan attorney or some other private attorney) for the remainder of the criminal matter or, if the member cannot afford to retain counsel, to seek a court-appointed or legal aid attorney. Occasionally, however, a court will disregard the terms of the union's legal services plan and order a legal services plan attorney to continue representing the union member after arraignment, even if the member cannot afford the attorney's fees and the member does not personally retain the legal services plan's attorney.

A. Is limited representation ethically permissible?

3. The first question that arises is whether it is ethical for a lawyer to enter into a limited scope representation (in this case, through arraignment only) and then withdraw unless the client personally retains him or her.

4. The attorney-client relationship is generally contractual in nature, and the lawyer and client may ordinarily determine the scope of their relationship, but any contractual limitation on the scope of the lawyer's representation must be consistent with the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules").

5. Limited representation is directly addressed in Rule 1.2(c) of the Rules of Professional Conduct, which provides as follows:

> A lawyer may limit the scope of the representation if the limitation is reasonable under the circumstances, the client gives informed consent and where necessary notice is provided to the tribunal and/or opposing counsel.

6. Comments [6] and [6A] to Rule 1.2 are helpful in understanding this rule. Those Comments provide, in relevant part, as follows:

> [6] The scope of services to be provided by a lawyer may be limited by agreement with the client or by the terms under which the lawyer's services are made available to the client.
> [6A] In obtaining consent from the client, the lawyer must adequately disclose the limitations on the scope of the engagement and the matters that will be excluded. In addition, the lawyer must disclose the reasonably foreseeable consequences of the limitation. In making such disclosure, the lawyer should explain that if the lawyer or the client determines during the representation that additional services outside the limited scope specified in the engagement are necessary or advisable to represent the client adequately, then the client may need to retain separate counsel, which could result in delay, additional expense, and complications.

7. Rule 1.2(c) had no direct equivalent in the former Disciplinary Rules, but this Committee issued an opinion on limited representation under the old Code of Professional Responsibility. That opinion, N.Y. State 604 (1989), is consistent with Rule 1.2(c) and its Comment and is useful in applying Rule 1.2(c) to the present inquiry.

8. In N.Y. State 604, we opined that a lawyer may limit the scope of a representation to the investigative and grand jury proceedings in a matter if three conditions are satisfied. First, the lawyer must obtain the client's agreement to the limitation after the lawyer has disclosed "all relevant circumstances," including: (i) the potential outcomes of the limited representation, (ii) the possibility that the client may need to promptly retain new counsel depending on the outcome of the limited representation, and (iii) any facts affecting the substantive rights of the client or the client's ability to retain replacement counsel. This condition parallels the "informed consent" requirement in Rule 1.2(c). Second, the scope of the representation must be sufficiently broad to allow the lawyer to render practical (i.e., competent) service to the client. This condition matches the requirement in Rule 1.2(c) that the limitation must be "reasonable under the circumstances." Third, the lawyer's limited representation must not be prejudicial to the administration of justice (e.g., it must not violate a court rule or unreasonably delay the court's calendar). This condition is today found in Rule 8.4(d) of the Rules of Professional Conduct, which prohibits a lawyer or law firm from engaging in "conduct that is prejudicial to the administration of justice."

9. Simila*r*ly, on the facts before us here, we believe that limiting the representation to arraignment pursuant to the union legal services plan is ethical provided that the lawyer complies with Rule 1.2(c) and Rule 8.4(d). We believe the lawyer can comply with those rules by satisfying the three conditions set out in N.Y. State 604: (a) the lawyer must obtain the client's consent after giving the client the information necessary to make an informed decision whether to agree to the limitation, (b) the limitation must be reasonable under the circumstances (i.e., the scope of the representation must be sufficiently broad to enable the lawyer to render competent service), and (c) the limitation must not be prejudicial to the administration of justice.

10. As to the language in Rule 1.2(c) concerning notice to the tribunal and/or opposing counsel "where necessary," we think notice of the limited representation is "necessary" under Rule 1.2(c) only if a court rule requires such notice, and we lack jurisdiction to interpret court rules. See generally N.Y. County Lawyers 742 (2010) (interpreting the notice clause of Rule 1.2(c) in the context of "ghostwriting").

B. Is withdrawal after arraignment ethically permissible?

11. The second question that arises is whether the union legal services plan lawyer may freely withdraw following arraignment if the client cannot afford to pay the lawyer's fees and does not enter into a new retainer agreement with the lawyer providing for post-arraignment representation.

12. Ordinarily, if a lawyer has obtained, in advance, the client's knowing and free assent to terminate the representation upon the occurrence of certain specified events, then the lawyer may withdraw when those events occur. See Rule 1.16(c)(10) ("Except as stated in paragraph (d), a lawyer may withdraw from representing a client when . . . the client knowingly and freely assents to termination of the employment"). In addition, N.Y. State 604, while not directly discussing advance assent to withdrawal, indicates that a lawyer may ethically agree with a client to terminate a representation after "a discreet stage of a matter," and arraignment is such a "discreet stage."

13. Of course, there are some limitations on advance consent to withdrawal. We expressed some of those limitations in N.Y. State 719 (1999), where a domestic relations lawyer's retainer agreement said that the lawyer would have "good cause" to withdraw if (among other things) the client failed to follow the lawyer's advice, failed to approve an expert recommended by the lawyer, failed to pay any bill within thirty days, or failed to approve a change in the lawyer's hourly rate. We concluded that these grounds for withdrawal were not authorized under DR 2-110 (the predecessor to Rule 1.16), and that the withdrawal provisions were therefore improper under the general principle that a retainer agreement "may not authorize the attorney to withdraw from the representation under circumstances in which withdrawal would be impermissible under DR 2-110." We also said that the provision in DR 2-110 permitting withdrawal when a client "'knowingly and freely assents to termination' . . . does not authorize an agreement in advance by which the client assents to termination upon some future occurrence that is unrelated to achieving the objectives of the representation." (Emphasis in original.)

14. We applied the reasoning of N.Y. State 719 in N.Y. State 805 (2007). There we concluded that a retainer agreement "may not ethically provide for a client's advance assent to a lawyer's withdrawal from employment based on the client's failure to pay agreed legal fees and expenses," but could "advise the client of the lawyer's right to withdraw, subject to court approval where applicable, if the client 'deliberately disregards' a payment obligation."

15. N.Y. State 719 and N.Y. State 805 are distinguishable from the situation here. Both of those opinions rested on a lawyer's attempts to gain through a retainer agreement the right to withdraw on grounds not set forth in the withdrawal rule (then DR 2-110, now Rule 1.16). The situation before us now, in contrast, is more like the situation in N.Y. State 604, which approved a retainer agreement in which the client agreed that the lawyer could terminate a representation after "a discreet stage of a matter." That describes the facts at hand. Also, the "objectives of the representation" (providing counsel for the client at arraignment, which can occur on short notice) have been met here. Accordingly, our reasoning in N.Y. State 719 and N.Y. State 805 do not prohibit a retainer agreement in which a lawyer obtains a client's informed advance consent for the lawyer to withdraw after arraignment. By representing the client through arraignment, the lawyer has completed the representation that the client expected the lawyer to undertake.

16. However, even if a lawyer validly obtains a client's informed advance consent to withdraw after a discrete stage (such as after arraignment), the lawyer must also comply with Rule 1.16(d), which provides: "If permission for withdrawal from employment is required by the rules of a tribunal, a lawyer shall not withdraw from employment in a matter before that tribunal without its permission." As N.Y. State 604 observed, the Appellate Division rules in all four departments require both assigned and retained counsel to represent a defendant in trial court "until the action or proceeding has been terminated" in that court. Those rules remain in effect today. See 22 NYCRR § 606.5(a)(1) (First Department); 22 NYCRR § 671.2 (Second Department); 22 NYCRR § 821.1(a) (Third Department); 22 NYCRR § 1022.11(a) (Fourth Department). Although interpreting the rules of the Appellate Divisions is beyond the jurisdiction of this Committee, we can confidently observe that permission to withdraw from the representation is likely to be required with respect to representation in a criminal matter once the lawyer has entered an appearance on behalf of a client for purposes of an arraignment, whether or not the client is willing or able to pay the attorney for future stages of the representation.

17. Rule 1.16(d) also provides: "When ordered to do so by a tribunal, a lawyer shall continue representation notwithstanding good cause for terminating the representation." Thus, even if the original limitation on the representation was ethical, and even if the lawyer has good cause for terminating the representation because the client knowingly and freely assented, in advance, to the lawyer's withdrawal after arraignment, Rule 1.16(d) requires the lawyer to continue the representation if ordered to do so by the court. The court may take into account whether or not the client can afford to pay the lawyer's fees for continuing the representation after arraignment – that is up to the court – but if the court orders the lawyer to continue the representation, then Rule 1.16(d) requires the lawyer to continue the representation even if the client cannot pay for the representation.

18. Finally, we caution that even when a court permits the lawyer to withdraw from the representation of a criminal defendant at the end of arraignment, Rule 1.16(e) obligates the lawyer to "take steps, to the extent reasonably practicable, to avoid foreseeable prejudice to the rights of the client. . . ." Rule 1.16(e) notes that these steps may include, among others, (i) "allowing time for the client to employ other counsel," (ii) "delivering to the client all papers and property to which the client is entitled," and (iii) "complying with applicable laws and rules." Cf. N.Y. State 604 ("it is not unethical for a lawyer . . . to terminate his or her services under the contract upon indictment, as long as there is enough time between the indictment and the trial date for the client to hire and prepare new counsel.").

CONCLUSION:

19. A lawyer may limit the scope of the lawyer's representation of a client provided that the lawyer complies with Rule 1.2(c) and Rule 8.4(d). A lawyer can comply with Rules 1.2(c) and 8.4(d) by satisfying three conditions: (a) the lawyer must obtain the client's consent after giving the client the information necessary to make an informed decision as to the limitation, (b) the scope of the representation must be reasonable under the circumstances, and (c) the limitation must not be prejudicial to the administration of justice. However, even if the initial limitation on the scope of the representation is permissible, a lawyer's ethical obligation to represent a client may extend beyond the initial limitation if a court's permission to withdraw from the representation is required and the court denies permission. Finally, if the court does grant permission to withdraw, the lawyer must take steps to the extent reasonably practicable to avoid foreseeable prejudice to the rights of the client.

OPINION 857 (03/17/2011)

TOPIC: In-person distribution of announcements of law firm's name change.

DIGEST: Distribution of law firm's announcements by a lawyer's employee must not involve in-person contact with recipients, or the distribution will constitute forbidden in-person solicitation.

RULES: 7.1, 7.3, 7.5

QUESTION:

1. May an attorney have her employee personally distribute professional announcements to nearby residences?

OPINION:

2. The inquiring attorney has changed the name of her law firm and wishes to have her paralegal personally deliver an announcement of the renaming to residences near her office.

3. Rule 7.5(a)(2) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") permits lawyers to use professional notices announcing a law firm's name change, provided the announcements comply with Rule 7.1 ("Advertising"). However, the methods of distributing such announcements are subject to some restrictions. In particular, Rule 7.3(a) prohibits lawyers from engaging in solicitation by "in-person or telephone contact" unless the recipient is "a close friend, relative, former client or existing client." Rule 7.3(b) defines "solicitation" to mean, in pertinent part:

> any advertisement initiated by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm that is directed to, or targeted at, a specific recipient or group or recipients, or their family members or legal representatives, the primary purpose of which is the retention of the lawyer or law firm, and a significant motive for which is pecuniary gain.

4. This Committee addressed the issue of the hand-delivery of advertising in N.Y. State 659 (1994). There, the inquiring attorney asked whether he could allow his law firm's advertisement to be included in an "information package" to be distributed by a car dealer to car buyers. The Committee concluded that hand-delivery of the packet to car buyers by the dealer would not transform the distribution into a prohibited in-person solicitation by the lawyer. We said:

> The Committee . . . does not perceive any substantive difference between sending an advertisement through the mail and having it handed to a recipient as part of an information package. It is presumed that the delivery of the information package will not be made by the attorney (and thus would not involve in person solicitation of a prospective client by the attorney), and that the car dealer or his employee will deliver the information package but not discuss the advertisement with the purchaser.

5. The Committee's conclusion in N.Y. State 659 that the car dealer's personal distribution of the lawyer's advertisement was not a forbidden in-person solicitation rested on the facts that the car dealer was not being paid by the attorney and would not discuss the advertisement with car buyers.

Here, however, the proposed delivery agent is the attorney's own paid employee and agent (her paralegal), so N.Y. State 659 is not dispositive.

6. The lawyer cannot have her paralegal do what the lawyer herself is forbidden to do, so the propriety of the proposed distribution by the lawyer's paralegal rests on whether the paralegal's hand-delivery of the announcement constitutes in-person solicitation in violation of Rule 7.3(a). See Rule 8.4(a) ("A lawyer or law firm shall not (a) violate or attempt to violate the Rules of Professional Conduct . . . through the acts of another").

7. The inquirer contends that the delivery would not meet the definition of "solicitation" in Rule 7.3(b) because the announcement is not an "advertisement" within the meaning of Rule 1.0(a). It is not an advertisement or solicitation, the inquirer says, because its "primary purpose" is not "pecuniary gain." We reject that contention. The inquirer is not offering her services pro bono, and the primary motive is surely the hope that once the recipients of the announcement know she is in the neighborhood, some of them will retain her. See Rule 7.3, Comment [2] (contrasting a lawyer's advertisement "that has as a significant motive for the lawyer to make money" with "a public-interest lawyer offering pro bono services.") We therefore conclude that the name-change announcement is an "advertisement" within the meaning of Rule 1.0(a) because it is a communication by the inquiring lawyer about her firm whose "primary purpose . . . is the retention of the lawyer or law firm." Similarly, we conclude that the announcement is a "solicitation" within the meaning of Rule 7.3(b) because "a significant motive . . . is pecuniary gain" and it is "directed to, or targeted at," a specific recipient or recipients. (Comment [3] to Rule 7.3 notes that any advertisement that is made by in-person or telephone contact is "directed to or targeted at" a specific recipient or recipients.)

8. Given that the name-change announcement is a solicitation, we see two possibilities. On one hand, if the inquirer proposes to have her paralegal deliver these announcements in a manner that will bring the paralegal into personal contact with the residents, the Committee concludes that the delivery will constitute an impermissible in-person solicitation (unless the recipients are close friends, relatives, former clients, or existing clients). On the other hand, if the paralegal will simply leave a name-change announcement at a residence – for example, by hanging the announcement on a door handle or placing it on a porch – and if the paralegal has no personal contact with the recipients, then the paralegal's delivery of the announcements will not constitute forbidden in-person solicitation. The ban in Rule 7.3(a) is not against all solicitation – it is only against in-person solicitation. The inquirer must avoid in-person solicitation through her paralegal.

9. Rule 7.3 imposes various additional requirements and restrictions on any solicitation directed to a recipient in New York State, but the inquirer has not raised any issues concerning those requirements and restrictions, so we do not address them. We assume that the inquirer will study and abide by all applicable provisions of Rule 7.3.

CONCLUSION:

10. Provided the announcements are delivered without any personal contact between the inquirer's paralegal and the recipients, provided the announcements conform to the requirements of Rule 7.1, and provided the inquirer abides by all applicable requirements and restrictions of Rule 7.3, the inquirer may cause her paralegal to deliver the name-change announcements to residences.

OPINION 858 (03/17/2011)

TOPIC: Conditioning in-house attorney's employment on execution of a confidentiality agreement.

DIGEST: A general counsel licensed in New York may ethically require staff attorneys to sign a confidentiality agreement that arguably extends staff attorney confidentiality obligations, after their employment ends, to information not otherwise protected as confidential information under the New York Rules of Professional Conduct, if the agreement makes plain that such confidentiality obligations do not restrict the staff attorney's right to practice law after termination and do not expand the scope of the staff attorney's duty of confidentiality under the Rules.

RULES: 1.6(a), 1.9(c), 5.6(a)

QUESTION:

1. As a condition of an in-house staff attorney's employment or continued employment, may a New York lawyer acting as in-house general counsel for a New York not-for-profit corporation require an in-house staff attorney to enter into an employee confidentiality agreement which (1) prohibits the employee-attorney from disclosing information deemed confidential, including information as to the employer's trade secrets and business and regulatory activities; and (2) contains a "savings clause" providing that the restrictive covenant shall be interpreted consistently with applicable rules of professional conduct and will not restrict the lawyer's right to practice law following employment?

FACTS:

2. The inquiring attorney, a New York attorney, is the in-house general counsel of a New York not-for-profit corporation (the "Corporation"). The Corporation has regional offices across the country, including in New York, and it employs in-house staff attorneys who are members of the New York bar. This inquiring attorney wants to require the Corporation's in-house attorneys to enter into the same confidentiality agreement imposed on all other current or prospective employees as a condition of employment or continued employment. The proposed confidentiality agreement is a form agreement intended to have effect in multiple jurisdictions.

3. The Corporation provides regulatory and business services and engages in research and marketing activities. These services and activities involve highly sensitive information. The information that the Corporation seeks to keep confidential may relate to the Corporation and may also relate to its customers, vendors and members.

4. The proposed confidentiality agreement purports to bar employees from using or disclosing information (except as required by the scope of the employee's employment duties) that the Corporation has delineated as confidential. The proposed agreement provides that these confidentiality obligations survive termination of employment – indefinitely as to all trade secrets, and for two years with respect to any other confidential information. However, the proposed confidentiality agreement sets forth exclusions for previously acquired information, public knowledge, or information available from other sources, and sets forth an exception for compliance with court orders.

5. The proposed confidentiality agreement also contains a "savings clause" applicable only to licensed attorneys. The savings clause expressly limits the agreement's confidentiality restrictions by providing that the agreement "shall be interpreted to be consistent with" the applicable rules of professional conduct or ethics rules and that it "shall not expand the scope" of an attorney's duties to maintain privileged and confidential information under any such rules.[2]

OPINION:

6. The central question here is whether the proposed confidentiality agreement will restrict an in-house lawyer's right to practice law following employment. Rule 5.6(a)(1) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") prohibits lawyers from participating in, offering or making agreements that restrict the right of a lawyer to practice law upon the termination of an employment relationship. Specifically, Rule 5.6(a)(1) provides as follows:

> (a) A lawyer shall not participate in offering or making:
> > (1) a partnership, shareholder, operating, employment, or other similar type of agreement that restricts the right of a lawyer to practice after termination of the relationship, except an agreement concerning benefits upon retirement. . . . [Emphasis added.]

7. The main purposes of Rule 5.6(a)(1) are to protect the ability of clients to choose their counsel freely and to protect the ability of counsel to choose their clients freely. See Rule 5.6, cmt. [1] ("An agreement restricting the right of lawyers to practice after leaving a firm not only limits their professional autonomy but also limits the freedom of clients to choose a lawyer."); N.Y. State 129 (1970) ("A covenant restricting a lawyer after leaving the partnership from fully practicing his profession appears . . . to be an unwarranted restriction on the right of the lawyer to choose his clients in the event they seek his services and an unwarranted restriction on the right of the client to choose the lawyer he wishes to represent him"); see also Cohen v. Lord, Day & Lord, 75 N.Y.2d. 95, 98 (1989) ("The purpose of the rule is to ensure that the public has the choice of counsel"). Agreements prohibited by Rule 5.6 have the practical effect of restricting the pool of available attorneys and thus limiting a client's choice of legal counsel and a lawyer's autonomy in accepting new engagements.

8. When one New York lawyer seeks to impose a confidentiality provision on another New York lawyer as a condition of employment, a pivotal question is whether the confidentiality provision defines protected information more expansively than Rule 1.6(a), which itself is quite broad. Rule 1.6(a) provides, in pertinent part, as follows:

> "Confidential information" consists of information gained during or relating to the representation of a client, whatever its source, that is (a) protected by the attorney-cli-

2 The proposed agreement that we address in this inquiry provides:

> If I am a licensed attorney, this confidentiality provision is not meant to restrict my right to practice law, after I cease to be an employee, in violation of the applicable rules of professional conduct (such as Rule 5.6 or its equivalent), and the confidentiality provision shall be interpreted to be consistent with all such rules. The confidentiality provision shall not expand the scope of my duty to maintain privileged or confidential information under Rule 1.6, Rule 1.9, or other applicable rules of professional conduct.

> ent privilege, (b) likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed, or (c) information that the client has requested be kept confidential. "Confidential information" does not ordinarily include (i) a lawyer's legal knowledge or legal research or (ii) information that is generally known in the local community or in the trade, field or profession to which the information relates.

9. A New York attorney's continuing obligation of confidentiality after termination of employment is almost equally broad, though not unlimited. Rule 1.9(c) provides that a lawyer who has formerly represented a client in a matter, or whose present or former firm has formerly represented a client in a matter, shall not thereafter:

> (1) use confidential information of the former client protected by Rule 1.6 to the disadvantage of the former client, except as these Rules would permit or require with respect to a current client or when the information has become generally known; or
> (2) reveal confidential information of the former client protected by Rule 1.6 except as these Rules would permit or require with respect to a current client.

10. If the proposed confidentiality agreement protects more information than Rules 1.6(a) and 1.9(c), a New York lawyer who enforces the agreement after an in-house legal employee terminates employment may be violating Rule 5.6(a)(1) by restricting the former in-house lawyer's practice of law. However, as a practical matter, because the definition of confidential information in Rule 1.6 is so broad, most contractual confidentiality provisions are not likely to exceed the scope of a New York lawyer's confidentiality obligations under the Rules.

11. This Committee's prior opinions regarding restrictive covenants that affect competition, and the Committee's prior opinions regarding obligations that restrict a lawyer's right to practice law, arose in the quite different contexts of partnership agreements and settlement agreements. See N.Y. State 129 (1970) (lawyer must not "be a party to or participate in a partnership or employment agreement with another lawyer that restricts the right of the lawyer to practice law after the termination of the relationship created by the agreement"); N.Y. State 730 (2000) (lawyers must not enter into a settlement agreement whose overly-broad confidentiality provisions restrict the right of the lawyer to practice law). Thus, N.Y. State 129 and N.Y. State 730 do not control the present situation. Much more closely on point are New Jersey Opinion 708 (2006) ("it may be reasonable for a corporation to request its lawyers to sign a non-disclosure or confidentiality agreement, provided that it does not restrict in any way the lawyer's ability to practice law or seek to expand the confidential nature of information obtained by the in-house lawyer"); and Washington State Advisory Opinion 2100 (2005) (confidentiality provision that dealt specifically with a lawyer's post-employment activities unrelated to the practice of law did not violate Rule 5.6(a)).

12. In any event, the proposed confidentiality agreement in question contains a so-called "savings clause." This savings clause specifically states that, as applied to licensed attorneys, the agreement's provisions are not meant to restrict the employee's post-termination right to practice law in violation of the applicable rules of professional conduct or in violation of the ethics rules of the jurisdictions in which the attorney is licensed. The agreement also provides that it is to be interpreted consistently with all such rules and does not expand the duty to maintain confidentiality under those rules.

13. The effect of this "savings clause" is to make plain that, to the extent the limitations imposed by the proposed agreement appear to be more stringent than the Rules, the limitations in the agreement apply only to an attorney's use and disclosure of information with respect to the practice of law. Thus, even if the contractual confidentiality provision on its face might be construed to expand the scope of an attorney's confidentiality obligations beyond those provided by the Rules, the savings clause keeps the agreement within the confines of the Rules and renders further analysis under Rule 5.6 unnecessary. See Connecticut Informal Opinion 02-05 (2002) (deciding, in connection with a proposed employment agreement that would apply to lawyers, that a savings clause in the agreement "fairly vitiates ethical concerns over executing, procuring execution, and/or enforcement of the agreement while seeking to preserve legitimate non-ethical concerns").

14. We therefore determine that the proposed confidentiality agreement does not run afoul of Rule 5.6(a)(1). In making this determination, this Committee does not reach or imply any conclusion as to whether the confidentiality agreement is enforceable. However, we have noted that "an agreement restricting a lawyer's right to practice law may be enforceable even if it violates the disciplinary rule." N.Y. State 730 (2000) (citing Feldman v. Minars, 230 A.D.2d 356 (N.Y. 1st Dep't 1997)). Conversely, a contractual provision that passes ethical muster may be unenforceable. In either case, enforceability is a question of law beyond our jurisdiction.

CONCLUSION:

15. A general counsel who is a New York attorney may require in-house staff attorneys to sign a confidentiality agreement that might otherwise extend staff attorney confidentiality obligations, after the employment period, to information not otherwise protected as confidential information under the Rules, if the agreement makes plain that such confidentiality obligations do not restrict the former in-house attorney's right to practice law following employment and do not expand the scope of the attorney's duty of confidentiality under the Rules.

OPINION 859 (03/25/2011)

TOPIC: Part-time government attorneys: conflicts of interest, imputed conflicts, non-consentable conflicts.

DIGEST: A part-time Department of Social Services attorney's representation, in a criminal proceeding, of a private client who is also a respondent in unrelated child abuse and neglect proceedings brought by Social Services, creates an incurable conflict of interest that is imputed to the other members of the Social Services legal unit.

RULES: 1.0(f) & (h), 1.7, 1.8, 1.9, 1.10, 1.11.

FACTS:

1. A County's Department of Social Services ("Social Services") has a legal unit ("Legal Unit") that employs one full-time attorney (the inquirer) and one part-time attorney. The full-time attorney supervises the Legal Unit and has an office at Social Services. The part-time attorney is in private practice and does not have an office at Social Services. However, the part-time attorney frequently visits Social Services and its Legal Unit to retrieve and discuss files, to conference cases, and to obtain supplies.

2. Social Services brought a child neglect petition against an individual (the "Respondent"), and the Legal Unit assigned the case to the part-time attorney. Upon assignment, the part-time attorney realized that the Respondent is the part-time attorney's client in an "unrelated" local criminal proceeding.[3]

QUESTIONS:

3. These facts raise four related questions:

   a. May the part-time attorney represent the Respondent in the child neglect proceedings brought by Social Services?

   b. Would consent (waiver) by the Respondent (or Social Services) cure the conflict?

   c. If the conflict cannot be cured by consent, may the full-time attorney in the Legal Unit prosecute the child neglect proceedings?

   d. Would a screening process avoid or cure the conflict?

3 The inquirer has informed the Committee that the criminal proceeding is "unrelated." We accept that representation for purposes of this opinion and we understand it to mean that the criminal proceeding involves a different factual setting, although it is difficult to imagine how the existence of a criminal proceeding, and the facts relating to the criminal proceeding, would not be potentially germane to Social Services in prosecuting a neglect and abuse proceeding involving the Respondent. Cf. Rule 1.9, cmt. [3] (explaining meaning of "substantially related").

OPINION:

4. To represent Social Services against the Respondent, and simultaneously to act on behalf of the Respondent in an unrelated criminal proceeding, will involve the lawyer in representing "differing interests," a phrase defined by Rule 1.0(f) to include "every interest that will adversely affect either the judgment or the loyalty of a lawyer to a client, whether it be a conflicting, inconsistent, diverse, or other interest."

5. Rule 1.7(a)(1) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct prohibits concurrent representations involving "differing interests," unless they are permitted by Rule 1.7(b). Rule 1.7(b) provides as follows:

> (b) Notwithstanding the existence of a concurrent conflict of interest under paragraph (a), a lawyer may represent a client if:
>
> (1) the lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client;
>
> (2) the representation is not prohibited by law;
>
> (3) the representation does not involve the assertion of a claim by one client against another client represented by the lawyer in the same litigation or other proceeding before a tribunal; and
> (4) each affected client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing.

6. The first of these four conditions – the lawyer's reasonable belief that the lawyer can competently and diligently represent each affected client – is the "by far the most important" element in the analysis. ROY D. SIMON, SIMON'S NEW YORK RULES OF PROFESSIONAL CONDUCT ANNOTATED 102 (West 2009 ed.). It determines whether a conflict can or cannot be cured by disclosure and consent. (A conflict is also non-consentable when a representation is "prohibited by law" or when the same lawyer is representing both sides in the same proceeding before a tribunal, but those situations are not presented here.) "The consentability language in Rule 1.7(b) is somewhat different but nevertheless essentially equivalent to language formerly found in DR 5-101(A) and DR 5-105(C)." Id.

7. This Committee has repeatedly opined that a part-time prosecutor who is also in private practice is barred from representing criminal defendants in any state court New York. See N.Y. State 544 (1982) ("attorney who has prosecutorial responsibilities as an incident of part-time employment by a local governmental unit is disqualified from the private practice of criminal law in all courts of the state.");. N.Y. State 657 (1993) (if part-time attorney for Town prosecutes traffic violations, then he is "precluded from representing, in criminal cases, a defendant in any court of the State," and consent cannot cure the conflict); N.Y. State 788 (2005) (part-time prosecutor may not act as criminal defense counsel in New York State courts, "risk of the public perceiving favoritism at the prosecutor's office precludes waiver of the conflict"). We have also said that a part-time prosecutor is barred from representing a criminal defendant in a civil matter and that the conflict "cannot be cured by consent." Id. Here we determine that the Department of Social Services attorney is subject to these principles.

8. In N.Y. State 788, a part-time prosecutor, as part of her private practice, had begun revising wills for a husband and wife when the lawyer learned that another attorney in the same prosecutor's office was bringing criminal charges against the husband. Applying the Disciplinary Rules then in effect in New York, the Committee concluded that (i) a prosecutor (including a part-time prosecutor) may not represent a private client in a civil matter if the private client is also a criminal defendant in a matter brought by the same prosecutor's office, (ii) the part-time prosecutor's conflict could not be cured by consent, and (iii) the conflict was imputed to the entire prosecutor's office. We advised the part-time prosecutor to withdraw from representing the client in the civil matter if withdrawal could be accomplished without prejudice to the client. However, if withdrawal would prejudice the civil client, and if the civil matter was "substantially related" to the criminal matter, then the entire prosecutor's office should be disqualified and a special prosecutor appointed. "If the criminal prosecution involves allegations of secreting assets, for example," we said, "an estate-planning representation might be substantially related to that prosecution, requiring appointment of a special prosecutor. If the alleged crime is a traffic offense, however, that is unlikely.")

9. N.Y. State 657 and 788 both noted that prosecutors have special responsibilities to the public that render the roles of prosecutor and defense counsel "inherently incompatible." In addition, there are significant risks of an actual or perceived miscarriage of justice because a prosecutor's office may show favoritism to persons who hire part-time prosecutors to represent them in other matters. See also N.Y. State 683 (1996) (a prosecutor's "special duty" to seek justice "imposes a responsibility on prosecutors not only to ensure the fairness of the process by which a criminal conviction is attained, but also to avoid the public perception that criminal proceedings are unfair.").

10. N.Y. State 800 (2006) dealt with a situation closer to the one here. A part-time prosecutor sought to represent indigent persons in Family Court matters. We held that "a part-time prosecutor is not precluded from accepting all assignments as court-appointed counsel in Family Court." Yet we also said that "[i]n specific types of cases and specific situations, including cases in which law enforcement personnel with whom the prosecutor works as a prosecutor are involved, and cases that are quasi-criminal in nature, the prosecutor is barred from accepting assignments." We emphasized that the attorney "must avoid all conflicts of interest, ensuring that neither the attorney's own interests nor the attorney's simultaneous work as a prosecutor preclude the attorney from exercising independent judgment on behalf of his or her clients . . . ."

11. N.Y. State 800 also focused on ways in which law enforcement matters may be intertwined with Family Court matters (including child protective proceedings, adoption, custody and visitation, support, family offense, guardianship, delinquency, paternity, persons in need of supervision (PINS), and foster care approval and review). We said:

> [V]irtually all types of proceedings heard by the Family Court are likely to have some involvement of law enforcement agencies or similar governmental entities. In neglect and abuse cases, for example, multiple government entities are often involved. The local child protective service investigates allegations and the county attorneys present ("prosecute") the case in the Family Court. Family offense cases by their nature pose a great risk of criminal charges being brought . . .

12. Therefore, the Committee concluded in N.Y. State 800 that the part-time prosecutor was barred from accepting assigned cases in three situations: (a) matters involving law enforcement personnel with whom the lawyer works (or has worked) as a part-time prosecutor; (b) juvenile delinquency proceedings; and (c) PINS proceedings. The Committee then singled out representation of respondent parents in abuse and neglect proceedings (i.e., child protective proceedings) for "special mention," saying:

> In child protective proceedings, respondent parents are answering to charges from the government regarding their parenting. Ultimately, the parent could temporarily or permanently lose custody of the child as a result of this proceeding. Here, too, even if the government personnel charging the parents are not those with which the part-time prosecutor would be involved, a part-time prosecutor must be particularly sensitive to the appearance of impropriety that may arise from his or her attempting to appear adverse to authorities conducting proceedings very similar to those of a prosecutor.

13. The role of the Social Services attorney when prosecuting child abuse and neglect proceedings is comparable to the role of the D.A.'s office in criminal prosecutions. In both, the attorney represents the interests of the state in matters with grave consequences (incarceration in one, custody and parentage in the other). Like the D.A. in criminal prosecutions, the Social Services prosecutor has a special role that is "inherently incompatible" with the role of defense counsel. See N.Y. State 657 and N.Y. State 788.

14. The public can assume that individuals will be driven by great forces to do everything they can to avoid the consequences of a prosecution or a finding of child abuse and neglect. That urge may include – or so the public might believe – hiring a part-time Social Services attorney in an unrelated proceeding to secure an advantage in the child abuse and neglect case. This creates significant risks of an actual or perceived miscarriage of justice due to potential favoritism shown to persons who hire part-time prosecutors to represent them in other matters.

15. Moreover, the personnel with whom the part-time Social Services attorney will work in neglect and abuse proceedings will often include law enforcement personnel. See N.Y. State 800. Those same personnel may oppose the part-time Social Services attorney when representing the defendant in the criminal matter. In the criminal defense role, therefore, the part-time Social Services attorney might have to impeach the same law enforcement personnel on whom Social Services relies in abuse and neglect proceedings. Accordingly, a part-time Social Services attorney prosecuting an abuse and neglect case cannot "reasonably believe[]" that he or she will be able to "provide compe*te*nt and diligent representation to each affected client" within the meaning of Rule 1.7(b)(1).

16. Regarding our first and second questions, therefore, we conclude that the part-time attorney may not represent the Respondent in the child neglect proceedings brought by Social Services, and we further conclude that informed consent (waiver) by the Respondent or by Social Services (or by both) cannot cure the conflict.

17. That brings us to our third question: May the full-time Social Services attorney who works in the same office with the inquiring attorney prosecute the abuse and neglect case against the Respondent while the part-time attorney defends the Respondent in the "unrelated" criminal matter? We also answer no to this question. Under Rule 1.10(a): "While lawyers are associated in a firm, none of them shall knowingly represent a client when any one of them practicing alone would be prohibited from doing so by Rule 1.7, 1.8 or 1.9, except as otherwise provided therein." The full-time and part-time Social Services attorneys are "associated in a firm" under Rule 1.10(a) because Rule 1.0(h) defines a "firm" to include "lawyers employed in . . . a government law office . . . ." This conclusion is consistent with N.Y. State 788, which reiterated our long-held view that a D.A.'s office must be treated as a "law firm" for purposes of imputation of conflicts.

18. Thus, the part-time lawyer's conflicts are imputed to the entire Social Services Legal Unit. The part-time Social Services attorney has access to information about the office and its cases. This access is comparable to the access enjoyed by a lawyer who is "of counsel" to a law firm. An of counsel lawyer's conflicts are imputed to all lawyers in the firm. See N.Y. State 773 (2004) (if lawyer who serves on municipal board is disqualified from a particular representation, the disqualification is imputed to a law firm with which that lawyer has an "of counsel" relationship). Therefore, under Rule 1.10(a), the part-time attorney's conflicts are imputed to all attorneys in the Social Services Legal Unit.

19. Conversely, the part-time attorney's conflicts of interest arising from government service are imputed to (and therefore disqualify) the part-time attorney's partners and associates in private practice. See N.Y. State 450 (1976) (if part-time town attorney is disqualified, then his firm is also disqualified from representing private clients in matters where clients may need building permits, zoning variances, etc., from the town).

20. Turning to our fourth question, can a screening mechanism prevent imputation of the conflict? No. Under Rule 1.11(b)(1), screening mechanisms apply only to former government employees moving to private practice. Screening cannot prevent imputation of a current employee's conflicts to the other attorneys in the government office.

21. However, screening is not the only solution. If the part-time attorney stops working at Social Services, then the imputation will cease. Social Services may then continue prosecuting the parents for abuse and neglect as long as Social Services lawyers do not possess confidential information about the Respondent that the part-time attorney represents in private practice. See Rule 1.10(b) (when a lawyer terminates an association with a firm, the firm may not oppose any client of the terminated lawyer if any lawyer in the firm still has confidential information about the terminated lawyer's client).

22. Alternatively, if the part-time attorney can and does ethically withdraw from representing the Respondent in the unrelated criminal matter, Social Services may continue to prosecute the Respondent (who would now be the part-time attorney's former client) for abuse and neglect. Since the facts state that the criminal matter is not substantially related (and is indeed unrelated) to the abuse and neglect proceedings, Social Services would not need the consent of the part-time attorney's former client pursuant to Rule 1.9. See N.Y. State 788 (D.A.'s office may continue prosecuting former client of part-time D.A. as long as criminal prosecution is not substantially related to matter in which part-time prosecutor represented defendant in private practice.)

CONCLUSION:

23. The part-time Social Services attorney may not represent the Respondent in abuse and neglect proceedings brought by Social Services. The full-time attorney is disqualified from representing Social Services in the child neglect and abuse proceedings against the Respondent while the part-time attorney is representing the Respondent in the unrelated criminal matter. These conflicts of interest are not curable by consent or by screening, but may be cured if the part-time attorney either terminates his association with Social Services or withdraws from representing the Respondent in the unrelated criminal matter.

OPINION 860 (04/26/2011)

TOPIC: Compensation of nonlawyer "Business Developer" by law firm with grant writing business.

DIGEST: If grant writing involves legal services, then Rule 5.4(a) prohibits a law firm from paying a nonlawyer Business Developer a percentage of grants awarded to clients, and the Business Developer may not advertise or solicit grant writing business in violation of Rules 7.1, 7.2, and 7.3.

If grant writing does not involve legal services, but the law firm also provides legal services to grant writing clients, then the law firm must determine if the legal services are "distinct" from the nonlegal grant writing services. If the legal and nonlegal services are not distinct, then the Rules of Professional Conduct apply to both the legal and nonlegal services. If they are distinct and the law firm gives grant writing clients the written disclaimer set forth in Rule 5.7(a)(4), then Rules governing advertising, solicitation, and compensation will not apply to the grant writing services (but Rules not dependent on an attorney-client relationship will still apply).

RULES: 5.4(a), 5.5, 5.7(a), 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 8.4.

QUESTION:

1. A law firm assists municipal and not-for-profit clients in applying for competitive grants. (We use the term "client" in this opinion to mean the same thing as "customer" – the term "client" does not imply that an attorney-client relationship exists.) The law firm poses a series of related questions:

2. a. May the law firm hire a nonlawyer "Business Developer" to help attract new clients for the law firm's grant writing services?

   b. If so, may the law firm pay the Business Developer a percentage of grants awarded to clients that the Business Developer brought to the firm? (The Business Developer would not prepare grant applications.)

   c. Does it make a difference whether the Business Developer is an independent contractor rather than an employee?

   d. Does it matter whether grant writing services are legal services or nonlegal services?

OPINION:

3. The inquiring law firm has a number of municipal and not-for-profit clients who have signed retainer letters engaging the law firm's services in connection with applying for grants. (We refer to these services as "grant writing services.") When the law firm identifies a grant opportunity, it contacts clients who have signed retainer letters and brings the grant opportunity to their attention. If a client wishes to pursue the grant opportunity, the client passes a resolution to pursue it, after which the law firm writes the grant application. The law firm may be compensated on either an hourly basis or on a contingent fee basis.

Are Grant Writing Services "Legal Services"?

4. The initial question raised by the inquiry is whether the law firm's grant writing services are legal services, nonlegal services, or a combination of the two.

5. Comment [2] to Rule 5.5 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"), which deals with the unauthorized practice of law, states: "The definition of the 'practice of law' is established by law and varies from one jurisdiction to another." We do not render opinions on matters of law (and defining unauthorized practice is a matter of law), but we note that Ethical Consideration 3-5 of the former Code of Professional Responsibility gave the following helpful guidance: "Functionally, the practice of law relates to the rendition of services for others that call for the professional judgment of a lawyer. The essence of the professional judgment of the lawyer is the educated ability to relate the general body and philosophy of law to a specific legal problem of a client . . . ."

6. A definition of "nonlegal services," on the other hand, is expressly contained in the Rules of Professional Conduct. Rule 5.7 provides: "For purposes of this Rule, 'nonlegal services' shall mean those services that lawyers may lawfully provide and that are not prohibited as an unauthorized practice of law when provided by a nonlawyer." This definition begs the question of what constitutes unauthorized practice of law, but it seems likely that grant writing services may be performed without giving legal advice. If that is the case, then the grant writing services at issue here would constitute nonlegal services – but since we lack jurisdiction to say definitively whether the grant writing services are legal services or nonlegal services, our opinion will explore the consequences of both determinations.

Consequences If Grant Writing Services Are Legal Services

7. If the grant writing services are legal services, then the Rules would prohibit the law firm from soliciting grant writing business in person or by telephone contact from persons other than close friends, relatives, existing clients, and former clients – see Rule 7.3 – and the law firm would be prohibited from violating this Rule "through the acts of another," such as a Business Developer – see Rule 8.4(a).

8. Moreover, if grant writing services are legal services, then paying the Business Developer a percentage of the grant awards would violate Rule 5.4(a) (which bars a lawyer from sharing legal fees with a nonlawyer). This would be true whether the Business Developer is an employee of the law firm or a non-employee agent (i.e., an independent contractor). See N.Y. State 565 (1984) (paying marketing and public relations firms a commission or percentage of fees from clients the firms obtained would be an improper division of fees with a nonlawyer).

9. However, despite the general prohibition in Rule 7.2(a) on compensating a person to recommend clients, the law firm could hire a nonlawyer Business Developer to engage in advertising and solicitation activities in which lawyers themselves could ethically engage. See Rule 7.2, cmt. [1] (a lawyer may "compensate employees, agents and vendors who are engaged to provide marketing or client development services"). For example, the Business Developer, like the lawyers in the firm, could develop printed or web-based marketing materials and could solicit grant writing business in person or by telephone from the law firm's existing and former clients.

Consequences If Grant Writing Services Are Not Legal Services

10. If grant writing services are not legal services, we need to apply Rule 5.7 ("Responsibilities Regarding Nonlegal Services"). That rule applies in two situations that might arise in the circumstances of this inquiry.

11. Rule 5.7(a)(1) applies where (i) the law firm simultaneously provides both legal and nonlegal services to a client, and (ii) the legal and nonlegal services are "not distinct" from each other – for example, where the law firm provides both grant writing services and tax advice or other legal services related to the grant application.

12. Rule 5.7(a)(2) applies where (i) the law firm simultaneously provides both legal and nonlegal services to a client, but (ii) the legal and nonlegal services are "distinct" from each other – for example, where the law firm represents the client in a tort suit unrelated to the grant application. In such cases, a question arises whether the client receiving the nonlegal services mistakenly believes that they are legal services because they are being delivered by a law firm. Rule 5.7(a)(4) addresses this question, stating:

> For purposes of paragraph (a)(2) . . . it will be presumed that the person receiving nonlegal services believes the services to be the subject of a client-lawyer relationship unless the lawyer or law firm has advised the person in writing that the services are not legal services and that the protection of a lawyer-client relationship does not exist with respect to the nonlegal services. . . .

Thus, Rule 5.7(a)(2) requires the law firm to answer two questions – (i) is the firm providing both legal and nonlegal services, and (ii) if so, are the two distinct?

13. Whether the law firm is providing both legal and nonlegal services is a question of fact. The main question is whether the law firm is giving legal advice to a client that is also a grant writing client. As we noted in N.Y. State 832 (2009), even when a nonlawyer could provide a "nonlegal" service without engaging in the unauthorized practice of law, if a law firm in fact provides legal advice in connection with a nonlegal service, then the law firm would be providing legal services as well as nonlegal services.

Are the Legal and Nonlegal Services "Distinct"?

14. If the law firm is providing both legal and nonlegal services to the same client, then the applicability of the Rules of Professional Conduct depends on whether the legal and nonlegal services are "distinct" from each other. If they are not distinct, then the Rules of Professional Conduct apply to both the legal and the nonlegal services. Rule 5.7(a)(1). If they are distinct, then the Rules do not apply to the nonlegal services, unless "the person receiving the services could reasonably believe that the nonlegal services are the subject of an attorney-client relationship." Rule 5.7(a)(2).

15. The question whether the nonlegal services are "distinct" is easier to answer when the legal and nonlegal services are provided by two different entities (i.e., the law firm provides only legal services and a separate entity provides the nonlegal services). Where the law firm itself provides both legal and the nonlegal services, however — as the inquiring firm proposes here – clients may have difficulty distinguishing between the two. If the law firm's legal advice is related to the law firm's provision of grant writing services, we think the legal and nonlegal services are "not distinct." For example, if the law firm writes a grant and also advises the grant writing client regarding the legal conditions of the grant or the tax implications of obtaining the grant, the line between the legal and nonlegal services may be far from distinct.

16. Even if a separate entity (rather than the law firm itself) provides the nonlegal services, client confusion remains a concern if the separate nonlegal entity provides the nonlegal services from the law firm's own offices because the client is aware of the law firm's status as a law firm. Cf. N.Y. State 832 (2009) (risk of confusion when attorney's status as a lawyer is visible to the public). In that case, the law firm must either give the disclaimer set forth in Rule 5.7(a)(4) or abide by the Rules of Professional Conduct with respect to the nonlegal services.

What If the Law Firm Provides No Legal Services to the Client?

17. If grant writing services are not legal services, then another possibility is that the law firm may provide only grant writing services and provide no legal advice to a client, either in connection with the grant writing services or in unrelated matters. In that case, the law firm could hire and pay the Business Developer on terms that would not be permitted by the Rules if the law firm were also performing legal services for the client.

18. However, even if the law firm does not provide any legal advice to a grant writing client, confusion may arise. If the law firm provides the grant writing services out of its own offices, a substantial risk arises that the client may be misled as to whether an attorney-client relationship exists. As explained in Comment [1] to Rule 5.7: "The recipient of the nonlegal services may expect, for example, that the protection of client confidences and secrets, prohibitions against representation of persons with conflicting interests, and obligations of a lawyer to maintain professional independence apply to the provision of nonlegal services when that may not be the case." To avoid this confusion, the lawyer should give the grant writing client the written disclaimer suggested by Rule 5.7(a)(4) (quoted in ¶ 10 above). The disclaimer would explain that the grant writing services are not legal services and that the protection of an attorney-client relationship does not exist with respect to those services. See N.Y. State 832.

19. Even if the Rules on advertising, solicitation, and compensation do not apply to the grant writing services because the law firm is not providing legal services to the client and has given the disclaimer set out in Rule 5.7(a)(4), the law firm would remain subject to all Rules that do not depend on the existence of a legal representation or an attorney-client relationship. See Rule 5.7, cmt. [4]. For example, the law firm could not engage in illegal, dishonest, fraudulent or deceptive conduct, and could not state or imply an ability to influence a public official improperly or to achieve results using means that violate the Rules or other law. See Rule 8.4(c), (e). The law firm also would be required to provide appropriate supervision of nonlawyers who work for the law firm. See Rule 5.3.

CONCLUSION:

20. If grant writing involves legal services, then Rule 5.4(a) prohibits a law firm from compensating a nonlawyer Business Developer (whether an employee or outside contractor) by paying a percentage of grants awarded to clients. Moreover, the Business Developer may not advertise or solicit business in violation of Rules 7.1, 7.2, and 7.3.

21. If grant writing does not involve legal services, but the law firm also provides legal services to grant writing clients, then the law firm must determine whether the legal and nonlegal services are "distinct" from each other within the meaning of Rule 5.7. If they are "not distinct," then the Rules apply to both the legal and nonlegal services, so the activities and compensation of the Business Developer will be subject to Rules 5.4(a), 7.1, 7.2, and 7.3.

22. If the law firm provides "distinct" legal and nonlegal services – or if it provides only nonlegal services – to grant writing clients, and if the law firm gives grant writing clients the written disclaimer set forth in Rule 5.7(a)(4), then the Rules governing advertising, solicitation, and compensation do not apply to the grant writing services. In that case, the law firm may pay a Business Developer on terms that would not otherwise be permitted by the Rules – but Rules not dependent on the existence of a legal representation or an attorney-client relationship will still apply to the law firm.

TOPIC: Name and ownership of the New York office of a law firm

DIGEST: The New York office of a law firm cannot operate under a trade name, nor can it operate under a name that does not include the name of any current or deceased partner or a name that combines the name of a current or deceased partner with a trade name. The New York office of a law firm operating as a PLLC may have as one of its owners another PLLC located outside New York so long as all of the owners of the out-of-state PLLC are attorneys and all legal fees generated by the out-of-state PLLC are distributed only to attorneys. A lawyer admitted in New York and another jurisdiction that permits a law firm to practice under a trade name may be of counsel to a firm with a trade name.

RULES: 5.4, 7.5(b), 8.5

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is admitted to the New York bar and is of counsel to a law firm that currently operates in State X. The law firm has asked the inquirer to open a New York office of the firm. The firm's name in State X is the XYZ Law Group, where "X," "Y," and "Z" are the first letters of the firm's practice areas.

QUESTIONS:

2. These facts raise four distinct questions:

   a. May the New York office of a law firm ethically operate under the name XYZ Law Group where "X," "Y," and "Z" are the first letters of the firm's practice areas?

   b. May the New York office of a law firm ethically operate under the name Doe XYZ Law Group where Doe is the name of a New York-admitted lawyer who is of counsel to the firm?

   c. May a New York firm that operates as a PLLC have an out-of-state PLLC as an owner?

   d. May a New York lawyer be of counsel to an out-of-state firm that is permitted to operate under a trade name?

OPINION:

Question (a): May a law firm ethically operate in New York under the name XYZ Law Group where "X," "Y," and "Z" are the first letters of the firm's practice areas?

3. The first question is answered by Rule 7.5(b) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct, which provides:

   A lawyer in private practice shall not practice under a trade name, a name that is misleading as to the identity of the lawyer or lawyers practicing under such name, or a > firm name containing names other than those of one or more lawyers in the firm . . . and, if otherwise lawful, a firm may use as, or continue to include in its name the name or names of one or more deceased or retired members of the firm or of a predecessor firm in a continuing line of succession. . . . A lawyer or law firm may not include the name of a nonlawyer in its firm name . . . .

4. Although Rule 7.5(b) does not define "trade name," in N.Y. State 740 (2001), this Committee opined that "using a name that is not the legal name of one or more partners or former partners in the law firm constitutes use of a trade name." In N.Y. State 636 (1992), this committee concluded that a lawyer could not use a firm name that did not include the name of any attorneys associated with the firm, because doing so would be misleading. Thus, a New York firm could not operate under the name XYZ Law Group because XYZ Law Group, under these facts, is a trade name.

Question (b): May the New York office of a law firm ethically operate under the name Doe XYZ Law Group where Doe is the name of a New York-admitted lawyer who is of counsel to the firm?

5. The second question involves the use of the surname of a non-partner in the out-of-state firm coupled with the trade name of the out-of-state firm. In N.Y. State 732 (2000), this Committee opined that an attorney named X and a number of associates could practice under the name the X Law Group. That opinion followed N.Y. State 495 (1978), where this Committee opined that the Law Firm of John Doe could not operate a branch under the name "Law Firm of Richard Roe" where Richard Roe was not a partner in the John Doe law firm. We noted: "If there is no true relationship analogous to that of partners between the firm's stockholders and the lawyer who is intended to staff its branch office, the use of that lawyer's name for the branch office would be misleading. The relationship must be analogous to that of a true partnership and must include a genuine sharing of profits, liabilities and professional obligations." Thus the use of the name Doe XYZ Law Group (and the like) would be improper where Doe was not a partner of the firm.

6. Even if the attorney whose name was used as part of the law firm name was a partner in the firm and admitted to practice in New York, the New York office of the firm could not practice under the name Doe XYZ Law Group. Rule 7.5(b) also requires that the firm name not be misleading as to the identity of the lawyers practicing under such name. A trade name can be used as a motto that is used in conjunction with the name(s) of lawyer principals. See N.Y. State 636 (1992) (approving use of the term "The Will Store" in conjunction with names of the law firm's principals); von Wiegen v. Committee on Professional Standards, 63 N.Y.2d 163 (1984) (approving the use of "The Country Lawyer" as a motto in conjunction with the lawyer's name). Use of the trade name as part of the firm name, however, is misleading, since the public will have no idea as to what the letters refer.

Question (c): May a New York firm that operates as a PLLC have an out-of-state PLLC as an owner?

7. The third question involves ownership of one PLLC by another. Under the proposal made to the inquirer, the New York branch office of the XYZ Law Group would be set up as a New York PLLC. The XYZ Law Group operates as a PLLC in State X and would be an owner of the New York branch office.

8. Rule 5.4 of the New York Rules provides that "[a] lawyer or law firm may not share legal fees with a nonlawyer" (with exceptions not relevant here). The question is whether Rule 5.4 would prevent the PLLC located in State X from being an owner of the New York PLLC. So long as the PLLC in State X is owned entirely by attorneys[4] and all legal fees generated by the State X PLLC are distributed only to attorneys, there is no sharing legal fees with a nonlawyer within the meaning of Rule 5.4. In that case, the PLLC in State X could be an owner of the New York PLLC. (Whether the substantive law regarding PLLCs in New York or in State X allows one PLLC to own all or part of another PLLC is a question of law on which we express no opinion.)

Question (d): May a New York lawyer be of counsel to an out-of-state firm that is permitted to operate under a trade name?

9. The fourth question addresses whether a lawyer admitted in New York and in another jurisdiction that permits a law firm to practice under a trade name may be of counsel to a firm with a trade name even though the lawyer could not do so in New York. Rule 8.5(a) provides that a lawyer admitted to practice in New York is subject to the disciplinary authority of New York regardless of where the lawyer's conduct occurs. Rule 8.5(b)(2) provides, however, that "[i]f the lawyer is licensed to practice in [New York] and another jurisdiction, the rules to be applied shall be the rules of the admitting jurisdiction in which the lawyer principally practices." Because the conduct—practicing with a firm that uses a trade name—principally occurs in the other jurisdiction, the applicable ethical rules would be those of the other jurisdiction. Assuming it is ethical to practice under a trade name in that jurisdiction (a question we do not have the jurisdiction to answer), the lawyer could do so.

CONCLUSION:

10. To summarize, we answer the four questions as follows:

(a) The New York office of a law firm may not ethically operate under a trade name.

(b) The New York office of a law firm may not operate under either a name that does not include the name of a current or deceased partner or a name that includes the name of a current or deceased partner combined with a trade name.

(c) A law firm operating as a PLLC in New York may have as one of its owners another PLLC operating in State X so long as all of the owners of the PLLC in State X are attorneys and all legal fees generated by the PLLC in State X are distributed only to attorneys.

(d) A lawyer admitted in New York and another jurisdiction that permits a law firm to practice under a trade name may be of counsel to a firm with a trade name.

OPINION 862 (05/10/2011)

TOPIC: Imputed conflict of interest in a public defender office

DIGEST: A part-time Assistant Public Defender cannot, in his private practice, represent a client that another full-time or part-time Assistant Public Defender in the same Public Defender office cannot represent because of a conflict of interest unless the conflict can be and is waived.

RULES: 1.0(h) & (p); 1.7, 1.9, 1.10(a) & (d); 7.2(b).

FACTS:

1. An attorney with a solo private practice located in County A is also a part-time Assistant Public Defender in the Public Defenders Office of County B. The County B Public Defenders Office includes five full-time Public Defenders and four part-time Assistant Public Defenders, two of whom are assigned to the Criminal Courts and two of whom are assigned to the Family Court in County B. The inquirer is one of the two part-time Assistant Public Defenders assigned to the Family Court.

2. When a lawyer in the County B Public Defenders Office has a conflict of interest in a criminal case, a common method of resolving the conflict is to ask the County B Criminal Courts to appoint an attorney from its Assigned Counsel list. The inquirer would like to be added, in his private practice capacity, to the County B Criminal Courts Assigned Counsel list. If he is added to that list, he would be assigned to represent criminal defendants in matters where another Assistant Public Defender (full-time or part-time) has a conflict of interest. However, the inquirer is uncertain whether the other Assistant Public Defender's conflict of interest would be imputed to him.

QUESTION:

3. May a part-time Assistant Public Defender in a county Public Defenders Office accept an assignment from the Criminal Courts of that county to represent a defendant when another full-time or part-time Assistant Public Defender in the same county Public Defenders Office cannot represent that defendant because of a conflict of interest?

OPINION:

4. The factual premise of this inquiry is that another Assistant Public Defender in the county Public Defenders Office has a disqualifying conflict of interest that prevents him from representing a particular client in the county's Criminal Court. We will assume for purposes of this opinion that the other Assistant Public Defender's conflict arises under one of three provisions: (i) it arises under Rule 1.7(a)(1) because of a conflict with another current client (e.g., the Assistant Public Defender already represents a co-defendant in the same matter), or (ii) it arises under Rule 1.7(a)(2) because of the Assistant Public Defender's personal interests (e.g., the Assistant Public Defender is related to the alleged crime victim), or (iii) it arises under Rule 1.9 because of a conflict with a former client (e.g., the Assistant Public Defender would need to cross-examine a prosecution witness who is his former client in a substantially related matter).[5] The question before us is whether any of those conflicts would also disqualify the other Assistant Public Defenders in the same office, including the inquirer. The answer depends on whether the conflict is imputed to the inquirer under the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") and, if so, whether the imputed conflict can be cured by consent.

A. Is the other Assistant Public Defender's conflict imputed?

5. To determine whether a conflict of interest is imputed, we look at New York's imputation rule, Rule 1.10(a), which provides as follows:

> While lawyers are associated in a firm, none of them shall knowingly represent a client when any one of them practicing alone would be prohibited from doing so by Rule 1.7, 1.8 or 1.9, except as otherwise provided therein.

6. We have assumed that the other Assistant Public Defender is "prohibited . . . by Rule 1.7, 1.8 or 1.9" from taking on the matter in question. Therefore, whether Rule 1.10(a) imputes the other Assistant Public Defender's conflict to the inquirer depends on whether the inquirer and the disqualified Assistant Public Defender are "associated" in a "firm."

7. Is the Public Defender's Office a "firm"? We conclude that it is. Rule 1.0(h) defines "firm" or "law firm" to include "lawyers employed in a qualified legal assistance organization." Rule 1.0(p), in turn, defines a "qualified legal assistance organization" to mean "an office or organization of one of the four types listed in Rule 7.2(b)(1)-(4) that meets all of the requirements thereof." A "public defender office . . . operated or sponsored by a government agency" is one of the four types expressly listed in Rule 7.2(b)(1)-(4). Thus, the attorneys in the inquirer's Public Defender Office constitute a "firm."

8. Is the inquirer "associated" in the firm (the Public Defender's Office) with the disqualified Assistant Public Defender? We conclude that he is. The phrase "associated" includes part-time attorneys as well as full-time attorneys. See N.Y. State 173 (1970) (part-time public defender cannot privately represent one of two co-defendants with conflicting interests where the other co-defendant is represented by the public defender office). The fact that the inquirer appears as a Public Defender only in Family Court rather than in the Criminal Courts does not change the result. The inquirer still is "associated" with the disqualified Assistant Public Defender in the same "firm" (the County B Public Defenders Office) even though his area of practice is different from that of the conflicted Assistant Public Defender. Rule 1.10(a) imputes conflicts to all lawyers in a firm, in all practice areas, not just to lawyers in the same department or practice area.

9. Therefore, under Rule 1.10(a), the other Assistant Public Defender's conflict is imputed to the inquirer. This result is consistent with our past opinions. See, e.g., N.Y. State 592 (1988) and N.Y. State 462 (1977) (applying the imputation rule to all attorneys in a public defender office). Although

5 We recognize that conflicts could conceivably arise under other rules. For example, if the conflicted Assistant Public Defender is in the midst of negotiating media rights with the defendant with respect to the alleged crime, or if the conflicted Assistant Public Defender is a former prosecutor, or if the conflicted Assistant Public Defender witnessed the alleged crime, then a conflict could arise under Rule 1.8(d) (addressing media rights), or Rule 1.11 (governing conflicts for former government employees), or under Rule 3.7 (the advocate-witness rule). Conflicts of that type are relatively rare, however, and the inquirer did not mention any of them, so we will not address them in this opinion.

those opinions were decided under DR 5-105(D) of the former Code of Professional Responsibility, we continue to follow them because Rule 1.10(a) is nearly identical to DR 5-105(D).

B. Can the imputed conflict be waived?

10. Rule 1.10(d) provides an avenue for curing the inquirer's imputed conflict. Rule 1.10(d) provides: "A disqualification prescribed by this Rule may be waived by the affected client or former client under the conditions stated in Rule 1.7." Thus, if the inquirer can satisfy the conditions in Rule 1.7(b) for waiving conflicts of interest, then the inquirer's imputed conflict will be cured. To qualify to seek a waiver from the affected clients pursuant to Rule 1.10(d), a lawyer (here, the inquirer) must meet all of the following four conditions set forth in Rule 1.7(b):

> 2. the representation is not prohibited by law;
>
> 3. the representation does not involve the assertion of a claim by one client against another client represented by the lawyer in the same litigation or other proceeding before a tribunal; and
> 4. each affected client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing.

11. We will assume that the inquirer's representation would not be "prohibited by law" within the meaning of Rule 1.7(b)(2) and that the inquirer's representation would not involve the assertion of a claim by one client against another client in the same litigation within the meaning of Rule 1.7(b)(3). Therefore, the key to determining whether the conflict can be waived is whether the inquirer "reasonably believes" that he "will be able to provide competent and diligent representation" to the assigned client within the meaning of Rule 1.7(b)(1) despite the other Assistant Public Defender's conflict of interest, and whether informed consent to the conflict, confirmed in writing, can be obtained from the necessary client(s) or former client.

12. Whether the inquirer could reasonably believe that he "will be able to provide competent and diligent representation" to the client in question depends on all of the facts and circumstances. Since the inquirer has not yet been appointed to a case pursuant to the Assigned Counsel program, we do not have those facts and circumstances and cannot make a determination regarding Rule 1.7(b)(1). However, assuming that the imputed conflict is consentable, we can provide some general guidance about obtaining consent under Rule 1.7(b)(4).

13. To cure a conflict, Rule 1.7(b)(4) requires informed consent from "each affected client." Which clients are affected depends on why the conflict arises. If the imputed conflict arises under Rule 1.7(a)(1) because of another current client, then the inquirer (or some other attorney in the Public Defender's office) must obtain informed consent, confirmed in writing, from both the inquirer's assigned client and the conflicted Assistant Public Defender's current client. If the conflict arises under Rule 1.7(a)(2) because of the conflicted Assistant Public Defender's personal interests, then consent is required only from the inquirer's own assigned client, because no other client is affected. If the conflict arises under Rule 1.9 because of the conflicted Assistant Public Defender's former client, then the inquirer must obtain consent from the conflicting former client. (Since the inquirer did not personally represent the former client, we assume that the inquirer does not personally possess any confidential information of the former client. If the inquirer were in possession of any of the former client's confidential information that has not become generally known, further analysis would be necessary.) In any case, each affected client's consent must be confirmed in writing. If all required consents are obtained and confirmed in writing, then the inquirer's disqualification by imputation will be cured and the inquirer may represent the assigned criminal defendant.

CONCLUSION:

14. A lawyer who is a part time Assistant Public Defender in a county Public Defender office may not agree to represent a criminal defendant when another full-time or part-time Assistant Public Defender in the same Public Defender Office is prohibited from representing that defendant because of a conflict of interest arising under Rule 1.7 or 1.9 unless the lawyer's imputed disqualification can be and is waived as provided in Rule 1.10(d).

OPINION 863 (05/10/2011)

TOPIC: Out-of-state lawyer's practice of immigration law in New York State; disclosing jurisdictional and practice area limitations on letterhead and business cards.

DIGEST: Whether a lawyer not admitted in New York may practice immigration law in New York is a question of law beyond the Committee's jurisdiction. If a lawyer may practice immigration law in New York, her letterhead and business cards must fairly disclose the jurisdictional and subject matter limitations on her practice.

RULES: 5.5, 7.1(a), 7.3, 7.5(a) & (d), 8.4(b), 8.5

QUESTIONS:

1. May a lawyer who is not admitted in New York State, but who is currently working at an immigration law firm within the state, practice law in New York State exclusively in immigration matters?

2. Assuming that the lawyer is permitted to engage in practice in New York State exclusively in immigration matters, must the lawyer's letterhead and business cards disclose jurisdictional and subject matter limitations on her practice?

OPINION:

3. The inquirer is licensed in Texas, but not New York. She works at an "immigration law firm" within New York State that "exclusively practice[s] immigration law." She inquires about her right to practice immigration law in New York and about the scope of her duty under Rule 7.5(d) to disclose the jurisdictional limitations on her practice on the firm letterhead, on her business card, and on her email signature block.

Question 1: May an Out-of-State Lawyer Practice Immigration Law in New York?

4. Whether an "out-of-state lawyer" may practice law in New York State is a question of law beyond the scope of the Committee's jurisdiction. N.Y. State 835 (2009). (We use the term "out-of-state lawyer" to mean a person who is not admitted to practice in New York but who is admitted to practice and in good standing in another U.S. jurisdiction.) As we observed in N.Y. State 835, the unauthorized practice of law in New York is governed by Judiciary Law §§ 476-a, 478 and 484. In particular, Judiciary Law § 478 provides that it is unlawful for a person not admitted in New York "to hold himself out to the public as being entitled to practice law . . . or advertise the title of lawyer."

5. Federal law provides that a member in good standing of the bar of the highest court of any state, who is not under suspension or otherwise restricted in his or her practice of law, may practice before a Federal Immigration Court. See 8 C.F.R. §§ 1001.1(f), 1292.1(a)(1). Whether these federal provisions permit a lawyer to engage in a limited practice of law in New York State without being admitted in New York is purely a question of law that is not answered by the New York Rules of Professional Conduct. Therefore, it is beyond our jurisdiction. N.Y. State 835.

6. Assuming the inquirer is permitted to "exclusively practice immigration law" in New York, the issue arises as to whether the New York Rules of Professional Conduct apply to her conduct within New York State. The inquirer assumes that the Rules do apply, but this is also a question of law beyond the scope of the Committee's jurisdiction. Rule 8.5(b)(2), which addresses the rules of disciplinary conduct that will be used to examine the inquirer's conduct, i.e., conduct that is not "in connection with a proceeding in a court," refers only to lawyers admitted in New York State.

7. Although the inquirer is not admitted in New York, the New York Rules more than likely will govern her proposed conduct in New York State. The New York Rules of Professional Conduct specify that the Rules apply to lawyers who are not admitted in New York, but who offer to provide legal services in New York. See Rule 7.3(i) (provisions of Rule 7.3 governing solicitation "shall apply to a lawyer or members of a law firm not admitted to practice in this State who shall solicit retention by residents of this State."). Furthermore, Judiciary Law § 90(2) states that the Supreme Court "shall have the power and control over attorneys and counselors-at-law," thus broadly establishing judicial governance over the conduct of attorneys practicing within the State. See also N.Y. State 761 (2003), n.4 (noting broad applicability of New York Code under Appellate Division Rules and concluding that "Disciplinary Rules that are specifically applicable to law firms under the New York Code apply to firms with a New York office and at least one New York lawyer affiliated with the firm in that office").

8. New York courts have also noted that they retain the "inherent authority" to discipline attorneys for misconduct independent of any violations of New York's rules of conduct, which focus exclusively on prohibitions applicable to a "lawyer." See In re Wong, 275 A.D.2d 1, 710 N.Y.S.2d 57 (1st Dep't 2000) (interpreting similar provisions in prior Code of Professional Responsibility). In the end, however, whether the inquiring lawyer is subject to the jurisdiction of the New York courts and to the applicable rules governing the attorney's conduct are questions of law beyond the scope of the Committee's jurisdiction.

Question 2: How Must the Inquirer Describe Her Practice Limitations?

9. Assuming that the inquirer may engage in practice exclusively in immigration matters in New York State, must the lawyer's letterhead, business cards, and email signature block disclose jurisdictional and/or subject matter limitations on her practice? That question is addressed by Rules 7.1 and 7.5.

10. Rule 7.1(a)(1) prohibits a lawyer from using or disseminating any advertisement that "contains statements or claims that are false, deceptive or misleading." Rule 7.5(a) provides that a lawyer's professional cards and letterhead (among other things) must be "in accordance with Rule 7.1 . . . ." Rule 7.5(d) provides, in pertinent part, that when a law partnership practices in New York with lawyers licensed in different jurisdictions, "all enumerations of the members and associates of the firm on its letterhead and in other permissible listings [must] make clear the jurisdictional limitations on those members and associates of the firm not licensed to practice in all listed jurisdictions."

11. The inquirer asks if she can satisfy those Rules by simply stating "Admitted in Texas" or if she must additionally note: "Practice limited solely to Immigration and Nationality Law."

12. Assuming the New York Rules apply to the inquirer's conduct, we believe that compliance with Rules 7.5(a) and 7.5(d) in these circumstances requires that the lawyer note on the firm letterhead where her name appears, and on her business cards, that (a) she is admitted to practice only in Texas, and (b) her practice in New York is limited solely to immigration matters. See New Jersey Supreme Court Committee on Unauthorized Practice of Law, Committee on Attorney Advertising, Opinion 44 (2008) (if an out-of-state attorney is practicing exclusively immigration law in New Jersey, "all communications (including the firm's letterhead, business cards, website, and advertising materials) must specifically state that the attorney is not licensed in New Jersey and that the attorney's practice is limited to immigration matters"); Pennsylvania Ethics Op. 2005-14 (2005) ("Rules 7.1 and 7.5b require that the inquirer note on all her letterhead, office signage, business cards and on/in any other publicity or advertising vehicles, that she is admitted only in the state to which she is licensed, and that her practice in Pennsylvania is strictly limited to Immigration and Naturalization").

13. For a lawyer in these circumstances to simply list that she is "Admitted in Texas" would not sufficiently "make clear the jurisdictional limitations" on the lawyer's practice as required by Rule 7.5(d). See ABA Informal Op. 777 (1965) (a legend such as "Admitted to Practice in New York" would be improper because "it would not negative the right (or admission) to practice in the District" of Columbia, where the lawyer was not admitted). The requirement that the inquirer list the state in which she is licensed is essential to enable a member of the public to ascertain if a lawyer is admitted in good standing. Without this information, it would be unduly burdensome for potential clients and others to ascertain whether the inquirer is in good standing.

14. In addition, we believe that it would be prudent (though not required by the Rules) for the inquirer to add that she is "not licensed in New York State" (or words to that effect). That limitation would avoid any possible confusion regarding whether the inquirer is or is not licensed in New York.

15. A lawyer's jurisdictional and subject matter limitations need not necessarily be included in an email signature block. If, however, the email constitutes an "advertisement" as defined in Rule 1.0(a), then it must comply with Rule 7.1(a). If it is also a "solicitation" under Rule 7.3(b) (defining certain types of advertising as "solicitation"), then it must also comply with Rule 7.3. Even if an email is not an advertisement (and thus also is not a solicitation), the lawyer must not state or imply through any communication that she is admitted to practice in New York. See Rule 8.4 (c) (prohibiting a lawyer from engaging in conduct involving "dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation").

CONCLUSION:

16. Whether a lawyer who is not admitted to practice law in New York State may engage in a practice within New York State exclusively limited to immigration law is purely a question of law that is not answered by the New York Rules of Professional Conduct and is therefore beyond our jurisdiction. Assuming the lawyer is permitted to practice exclusively immigration law in New York State, and assuming that the New York Rules govern the lawyer's conduct, then the lawyer must note on her letterhead and on her business cards that (a) she is admitted to practice only in Texas, and (b) her practice in New York is limited solely to immigration matters. Finally, even though the Rules do not require her to do so, the inquirer would be prudent to add that she is "not licensed in New York State" (or words to that effect).

OPINION 864 (05/10/2011)

TOPIC: Fee sharing and co-counsel arrangements with a lawyer not licensed in New York; disclosure in retainer and closing statements

DIGEST: A lawyer is ethically permitted to work on a personal injury case with an out-of-state lawyer and share legal fees with that lawyer if the arrangement complies with Rule 1.5(g).

RULES: 1.5(g), 5.1, 5.4(b), 5.5, 7.5(d).

QUESTION:

1. The inquirer, a New York lawyer who desires to works on a personal injury case in New York with a lawyer who is admitted in another state but not New York (the "Out-of-State Lawyer"), raises three related questions:

> A. May the New York lawyer share legal fees with the Out-of-State Lawyer?
>
> B. If so, should the name of the Out-of-State Lawyer and the basis for the division of fees be placed in the retainer agreement that the New York lawyer provides to the client?
> C. Should the Out-of-State Lawyer's name and the basis for the division of fees be included in any retainer statement and/or closing statement that the New York lawyer files with the Office of Court Administration?

OPINION:

2. The inquirer, a personal injury lawyer who is admitted and practicing law in New York, has been contacted by the Out-of-State Lawyer, who represents a client in another state on certain matters. The client was injured as the result of an accident that occurred in New York. The Out-of-State Lawyer suggests that the New York lawyer "handle" the case but that the Out-of-State Lawyer remain involved and be compensated for her work out of the recovery proceeds. The inquirer asks whether the fee sharing arrangement is ethically permissible even though the Out-of-State Lawyer is not admitted in New York. In addition, the inquirer asks about how to prepare the retainer agreement for the client and what to disclose about the Out-of-State Lawyer under the rules of the Appellate Divisions.

Question A: Sharing Legal Fees with an Out-of-State Lawyer

3. Rule 1.5(g) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct states that a lawyer shall "not divide a fee for legal services with another lawyer who is not associated in the same law firm" unless three factors are met:

> (1) the division is in proportion to the services performed by each lawyer or, by a writing given to the client, each lawyer assumes joint responsibility for the representation;

(2) the client agrees to employment of the other lawyer after a full disclosure that a division of fees will be made, including the share each lawyer will receive, and the client's agreement is confirmed in writing; and

(3) the total fee is not excessive.

4. Implicit in the inquirer's question is whether a non-New York lawyer qualifies as a "lawyer" for purposes of the fee-sharing safe harbor set forth in Rule 1.5(g). The issue is an important one because the term "lawyer" when used in a New York Rule of Professional Conduct does not have a constant, fixed meaning, and may have different meanings in different rules and contexts. See, e.g., Wally Larson, Jr. and Lewis Tesser, Who is the "Lawyer" Governed by New York's Disciplinary Rules, Bloomberg Law Reports – New York Law at 8-11 (June 2009).

5. Consider the predecessor of Rule 5.1(a) – DR 1-104(A) – which provided: "A law firm shall make reasonable efforts to ensure that all lawyers in the firm conform to the Disciplinary Rules." (Emphasis added.) In N.Y. State 762 (2003), which inquired about supervisory responsibilities in a New York law firm that had offices in multiple states, we interpreted that language to require a New York firm to make reasonable efforts only to ensure that "lawyers subject to the New York [Rules] who are affiliated with the firm comply with the New York [Rules].". Since Rule 5.1(a) is virtually identical to DR 1-104(A), that interpretation still holds. Thus, the term "lawyer" in Rule 5.1(a) means a lawyer admitted in New York and subject to New York Rules for purposes of the conduct at issue.

6. In other Rules, however, we have interpreted the term "lawyer" to mean something broader. For example, Rule 5.4(b), like its predecessor DR 3-103(A), prohibits a lawyer from forming a law partnership with a "nonlawyer." In N.Y. State 806 (2007), we noted that the predecessor of Rule 7.5(d) – DR 2-102(D) – explicitly contemplated partnerships between New York lawyers and lawyers licensed in other jurisdictions. We concluded that while the predecessor of Rule 5.4(b) might appear on its face to prohibit partnerships between a New York lawyer and a non-New York lawyer, the language of Rule 7.5(d) must mean that a "nonlawyer" is someone not subject to comparable educational requirements for admission and standards of training, professional conduct and discipline. In other words, a "lawyer" need not be admitted and practicing in New York to qualify as a "lawyer" for purposes of Rule 5.4(b). See also N.Y. State 542 (1982) (a lawyer admitted to practice law in any U.S. jurisdiction is not a "non-lawyer" under DR 3-103)

7. Various other New York Rules also use the term "lawyer" to refer to something broader than a New York-admitted practitioner. For example, Rule 7.3(i) states that the restrictions on solicitation apply to a "lawyer" who is "not admitted to practice in this State" but who solicits retention by New York residents. Rule 7.5(d) refers to "lawyers licensed in different jurisdictions." And Rule 8.5 refers to a "lawyer admitted in this state" and "lawyer licensed to practice in this state," implying that the term "lawyer" standing alone could apply to those not admitted or licensed in New York State.

8. In N.Y. State 806 (2007), which is even more closely on point, we construed DR 2-107(A), which was the predecessor of Rule 1.5(g). We concluded that a New York law firm is ethically permitted to "participate with a foreign law firm in handling legal matters in New York referred by the foreign firm, and in sharing of legal fees in such matters, where the foreign firm's lawyers have professional education, training and ethical standards comparable to those of American lawyers and the firm otherwise complies with. DR 2-107(A)." (Emphasis added.) We reasoned that if an examination shows that Italian lawyers have education, training and ethical standards comparable to those of American lawyers, Italian lawyers may be considered "lawyers" within the meaning of Rule 1.5(g). N.Y. State 806 also noted (in footnote 2) that virtually every jurisdiction examining the issue has permitted its lawyers to divide fees with out-of-state lawyers, provided that in-state ethics requirements are satisfied.

9. What we implied in N.Y. State 806, we now make explicit. Lawyers from other U.S. jurisdictions are "lawyers" within the meaning of Rule 1.5(g), and New York lawyers may share fees with lawyers from other U.S. jurisdictions as long as the fee-sharing arrangement complies with the terms of Rule 1.5(g). We do not believe that sharing fees with the Out-of-State Lawyer will diminish the quality of the representation or undermine the inquirer's ability to fulfill the duties of loyalty and confidentiality. See generally ROY SIMON, SIMON'S CODE OF PROFESSIONAL RESPONSIBILITY ANNOTATED at 447 (2008) ("Unlike a disbarred lawyer or a lawyer disqualified due to a conflict of interest, the out-of-state lawyer could handle the matter personally if he came to New York to be admitted pro hac vice."); Rule 5.4, cmt. [1] (the prohibition on fee-sharing with nonlawyers is intended to protect the lawyer's professional independence of judgment). Cf. Rule 1.5, Cmt. [7] ("Joint responsibility for the representation entails financial and ethical responsibility for the representation as if the lawyers were associated in a partnership.").

10. We assume that the Out-of-State Lawyer would not violate New York's rules against unauthorized practice of law. If our assumption is incorrect, then the inquirer might be violating Rule 5.5(b) (lawyer shall not aid nonlawyer in the unauthorized practice of law). See N.Y. State 801 (2006) (interpreting the term "nonlawyer" for purposes of DR 3-103(A), the Code predecessor of Rule 5.5(b), to mean a non-New York lawyer, and interpreting DR 3-103(A) to prohibit a New York attorney from partnering with an out-of-state attorney whose services constitute the unauthorized practice of law).

Question B: The Retainer Agreement Provided to the Client.

11. Given that the New York lawyer and the Out-of-State Lawyer will be dividing the legal fees from the personal injury action, the New York lawyer asks whether the name of the Out-of-State Lawyer and the basis for the division of fees must be placed in the retainer agreement that the New York lawyer intends to provide to the client. Two provisions of Rule 1.5 are potentially relevant.

12. Rule 1.5(c) addresses the specific contents of the "writing" that a lawyer must promptly give to a client in a contingent fee matter. That writing must state "the method by which the fee is to be determined, including the percentage or percentages that shall accrue to the lawyer in the event of settlement, trial or appeal; litigation and other expenses to be deducted from the recovery; and whether such expenses are to be deducted before or, if not prohibited by statute or court rule, after the contingent fee is calculated." The writing must also "clearly notify the client of any expenses for which the client will be liable regardless of whether the client is the prevailing party." But despite this high level of detail, Rule 1.5(c) does not say that the share of the fee that each lawyer will receive must appear in the required writing. Nor does it say that the writing must be a retainer agreement.

13. Rule 1.5(g)(2) (already quoted above) requires that the inquirer obtain the client's agreement to employment of the Out-of-State Lawyer "after a full disclosure that a division of fees will be made, including the share each lawyer will receive, and the client's agreement is confirmed in writing" – but it does not say that this information must appear in the retainer agreement. We assume that the inquirer will comply with Rule 1.5(g).

14. We therefore conclude that the New York Rules of Professional Conduct do not require either the name of the Out-of-State Lawyer or the basis for division of fees to be included in a retainer agreement. It may be that court rules outside the Rules of Professional Conduct require such information. See, e.g., 22 NYCRR Part 1215 (requiring a written letter of engagement or a retainer agreement in certain matters, and specifying their contents). But interpreting court rules is outside the jurisdiction of this Committee.

Question C: The Closing Statement Filed with OCA.

15. The inquirer also asks whether the Out-of-State Lawyer's name and the basis for the fee division must be reflected on any retainer and/or closing statements filed with the Office of Court Administration. The inquirer appears to be referring to the requirements of court rules such as 22 NYCRR §603.7 (1st Dept.) and §691.20 (2nd Dept.), which prescribe filing requirements in claims or actions for personal injuries, property damage, etc. (The Third and Fourth Departments of the Appellate Division do not have analogous requirements.) Again, our Committee's jurisdiction is limited to interpreting the New York Rules of Professional Conduct. We do not interpret the filing requirements of the First or Second Judicial Departments as set forth in the Rules of the Appellate Courts.

CONCLUSION:

16. A New York lawyer handling a personal injury case referred by an out-of-state lawyer is ethically permitted to work on the case with the out-of-state lawyer and share legal fees with the out-of-state lawyer, provided that the arrangement complies with Rule 1.5(g).

OPINION 865 (05/10/2011)

TOPIC: Estate planner serving as attorney for executor; conflict of interest; legal malpractice

DIGEST: Lawyer who prepared estate plan for decedent may represent executor despite recent change in law of legal malpractice in Estate of Schneider v. Finmann (N.Y. 2010) provided that lawyer does not perceive a colorable claim of legal malpractice arising out of the estate planning.

RULES: 1.7, 1.10(a), 1.16.

FACTS:

1. The inquirer prepared an estate plan for his client and supervised the execution of a Will in furtherance of the plan. The Will named the deceased client's nephew executor of his estate. The client has recently died, and the estate is ready for administration. The nephew has asked the inquirer to represent him in connection with the estate's administration, but the inquirer is concerned because a recent change in the law permits executors to sue estate planners for malpractice, and both the estate plan and the Will were prepared well within any period of limitations possibly applicable to the inquirer's conduct (meaning that the statute of limitations will not be available as a defense to any claim).

QUESTION:

2. In light of Estate of Schneider v. Finmann, 15 N.Y.3d 306 (2010), may an attorney who prepared an estate plan for a client agree to act as counsel to the executor after the client's death?

OPINION:

3. On June 17, 2010, in Estate of Schneider v. Finmann, 15 N.Y.3d 306 (2010), the New York Court of Appeals overruled a long line of cases in the estate planning field. The overruled cases had held that the doctrine of privity effectively barred the estates of deceased estate planning clients from filing a legal malpractice suit against the lawyers who planned the decedent's estate. In Schneider, the Court of Appeals held that the executor or personal representative of the decedent "stands in the shoes of the decedent," and therefore has "the capacity to maintain a malpractice claim on the Estate's behalf." at 309.

4. Shortly after publication of the Court's decision in Schneider, a number of authorities speculated on the consequent expansion of an executor's obligations and liabilities, as well as the obligations and liabilities of lawyers providing estate planning services. Although the Court did not expressly give the estate's beneficiaries the right to bring a suit for legal malpractice, some commentators suggested that an aggrieved beneficiary might ask the executor to sue a lawyer whose alleged incompetence had caused them to receive less from the estate than they believed they otherwise would have obtained. See, e.g., David Siegel, New York State Law Digest, No. 607, at 3-4 (July 2010). Others questioned whether an attorney could ethically agree to represent an executor in connection with the administration of any estate that the attorney had planned.

The relevant rule: Rule 1.7

5. We begin our analysis with Rule 1.7 of the Rules of Professional Conduct, which states in relevant part:

> (a) Except as provided in paragraph (b), a lawyer shall not represent a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that . . . (2) there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests.
> (b) Notwithstanding the existence of a concurrent conflict of interest under paragraph (a), a lawyer may represent a client if (1) the lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation . . . (2) the representation is not prohibited by law . . . (3) the representation does not involve the assertion of a claim by one client against the another client represented by the lawyer in the same litigation or other proceeding before a tribunal; and (4) each affected client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing.

6. Before applying Rule 1.7, we distinguish three different situations:

> A. The lawyer who prepared the estate plan realizes at the outset – before commencing representation of the executor in the administration of the estate – that he (the lawyer) may have committed legal malpractice and that the executor would have a colorable malpractice claim against him.
>
> B. The lawyer at the outset of representing the executor in the administration of the estate does not perceive any basis for claiming that he (the lawyer) committed malpractice, and does not believe the executor would have a colorable malpractice claim against him.
> C. The lawyer did not initially perceive any basis for a legal malpractice claim against him, but has come to realize during the representation of the executor that he (the lawyer) may have committed legal malpractice and that the executor would have a colorable malpractice claim against him.

Situation A: Lawyer perceives colorable legal malpractice claim at outset

7. In the first situation – the lawyer who prepared the estate plan and/or drafted the Will realizes at the outset that the legal work was negligent to a degree that gives rise to a colorable (i.e., prima facie) claim of malpractice – a conflict of interest arises under Rule 1.7(a)(2). The conflict arises because there is a "significant risk" that the lawyer's professional judgment will be adversely affected. Moreover, if the lawyer realizes that the executor could assert a colorable claim of malpractice against the lawyer, the consent provisions of Rule 1.7(b) could not be satisfied. To permit the lawyer to undertake such a representation would place the lawyer in the manifestly untenable position of having to counsel the executor on whether to sue himself (the lawyer). In such circumstances, the lawyer could not "reasonably believe[]" that he could provide "competent and diligent representation" to the executor. In that instance, Comment [14] to Rule 1.7 is instructive. It says:

> [S]ome conflicts are nonconsentable. If a lawyer does not reasonably believe that the conditions set forth in paragraph (b) can be met, the lawyer should neither ask for the client's consent nor provide representation on the basis of the client's consent. A client's consent to a nonconsentable conflict is ineffective. . . .

8. Accordingly, if the preparer/drafter believes at the outset that the executor has a colorable claim of legal malpractice against him, then the preparer can neither ask for the executor's consent to the conflict nor represent the executor if the executor volunteers consent to the conflict. Therefore, the lawyer may not agree to represent the executor – and pursuant to the imputation rule, Rule 1.10(a), no other lawyer in the lawyer's firm may represent the executor either.

9. Moreover, we have held that an attorney is ethically bound to report to a client any significant error or omission that may give rise to a claim of malpractice. See, e.g., N.Y. State 734 (2000) (legal services organization must report to client a "significant error or omission that may give rise to a possible malpractice claim"); N.Y. State 275 (1972) (lawyer has "affirmative duty" to advise client that lawyer's failure to act resulted in claim being barred by statute of limitations). An executor "stands in the shoes of the decedent" (Schneider). Thus, a lawyer in the first situation must report to the client (who was formerly the decedent, but is now the executor) that the lawyer's preparation of the estate plan has given rise to a colorable claim of malpractice against him. The same opinions, however, have noted that not all errors or omissions will give rise to a claim of malpractice. Some errors or omissions are insignificant, and there is no need to report them. That is essentially the second situation, which we address next.

Situation B: Lawyer does not perceive colorable legal malpractice claim at outset

10. In the second situation – the lawyer who prepared the estate plan or drafted the Will does not believe at the outset that the executor could assert a colorable claim for legal malpractice against him – our conclusion is different. If the preparer/drafter perceives no apparent basis for a claim of malpractice, then no "significant risk" arises that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the executor will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own interests, and the need to obtain consent under Rule 1.7(b) is not triggered. Accordingly, there is no reason to require the lawyer or the lawyer's firm to decline representation of the estate. In such cases, the Court's decision in Schneider should have no effect on the long established practices of the trusts and estates bar, and the lawyer may agree to represent the executor after the client's death. Moreover, even if the lawyer perceives some insignificant error or omission in the prior representation, the lawyer has no duty to report it to the client.

Situation C: Lawyer perceives colorable legal malpractice claim during representation

11. In the third situation – the lawyer does not perceive any basis at the outset for claiming that he committed malpractice, but comes to believe during the representation that the executor has a colorable claim for malpractice against the lawyer – the conflict again becomes nonconsentable. Just as in the first situation, the lawyer is in the untenable position of having to counsel the executor on whether to sue the lawyer. Rule 1.7(a)(2) does not distinguish between conflicts that exist at the outset of a representation and conflicts that arise during a representation. In either situation, the conflict is nonconsentable, both for the lawyer and for all other lawyers associated with his firm. Pursuant to Rule 1.16(b)(1), the lawyer must withdraw (with the court's permission, if required) to avoid a violation of the Rules, and must upon withdrawal "take steps, to the extent reasonably practicable, to avoid foreseeable prejudice to the rights of the client" (the executor). Moreover, as in the first situation, the lawyer must report the apparent legal malpractice to the executor.

12. In sum, if the lawyer who prepared the estate plan knows at the outset or anytime after the representation of the executor commences that the quality of the plan is subject to a colorable challenge (or where the plan has in fact been challenged) on grounds that it was incompetently prepared, the lawyer cannot represent the executor, and furthermore must disclose to the executor any facts that would permit the executor to evaluate the apparent malpractice. If not, the lawyer may represent the executor in the administration of the estate.

13. Thus, the Court's decision in Schneider has not changed the basic conflicts issues in cases where legal malpractice in preparing the estate plan is not apparent. Lawyers who are engaged in estate planning have traditionally handled the administration of the estates that they have planned. For example, it has long been held that fiduciaries may retain their own firms to act as counsel on the estates that they administer. See, e.g., N.Y. State 471 (1977) (receiver in a mortgage foreclosure action may retain the law firm of which he is a member as his counsel). The apparent risk in such retention has been viewed as outweighed by various advantages – both practical and economic – in permitting lawyer-fiduciaries and their firms to serve in both capacities. These advantages are outweighed only when the lawyer who prepared the plan perceives a colorable claim of legal malpractice, in which case Rule 1.7(b)(1) makes the conflict nonconsentable.

Settling a legal malpractice claim

14. A lawyer may settle a claim for malpractice with a client provided three conditions are satisfied: (a) the client has been fully apprised of the facts pertaining to the representation that may give rise to specific claims against the lawyer; (b) the lawyer has been discharged or has withdrawn from the representation; and (c) the lawyer has advised the client to secure independent counsel in the negotiation of the settlement agreement. See, e.g., N.Y. State 591 (1988) ("A lawyer may ethically negotiate with a former client for the settlement or release of potential malpractice claims, but only after the lawyer takes specific steps to insure that the negotiations are fair," including withdrawing from representation). To satisfy this line of opinions, a lawyer who perceives a colorable malpractice claim against himself for his estate planning must withdraw pursuant to Rule 1.16 before seeking to settle the claim, and must apprise the client (the executor) of the facts giving rise to the malpractice claim and of the desirability of engaging independent counsel to evaluate the claim.

CONCLUSION:

15. In light of Estate of Schneider v. Finmann, a lawyer who prepared an estate plan for a client may agree to act as counsel to the executor after the client's death as long as the lawyer does not perceive a colorable claim for legal malpractice before or during the representation of the executor. However, if the lawyer does perceive a colorable claim for legal malpractice before or during the representation, then the conflict is nonconsentable and the lawyer (and all other lawyers associated with his firm) must decline or withdraw from the representation and the lawyer must inform the executor of the facts giving rise to the claim.

OPINION 866 (05/23/2011)

TOPIC: Disclosure of confidential information to prevent reasonably certain death or substantial bodily harm or to prevent a crime; confidential information acquired after termination of representation

DIGEST: Under the New York Rules of Professional Conduct, a lawyer is permitted (but not required) to disclose a current or former client's confidential information if the lawyer reasonably believes disclosure is necessary to prevent reasonably certain death or substantial bodily harm or to prevent the client or former client from committing a crime. Information relating to the representation of a client may be confidential information even though it is acquired after the client-attorney relationship has ended.

RULES: 1.6(a)-(b); 1.9(c)

QUESTIONS:

1. When a lawyer has acquired confidential information about a client or former client evidencing a risk of death or substantial bodily harm, do the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (i) require the lawyer to disclose such information, (ii) prohibit the lawyer from disclosing such information, or (iii) give the lawyer discretion whether or not to disclose such information?

2. Can information acquired after the termination of a representation constitute confidential information of the former client?

FACTS:

3. Inquirer assisted two principals, Doe and Roe, in forming a business (the "company"). Inquirer's professional services consisted principally of preparing the organizing documents and assisting with organizational activities and filings. Inquirer understood that Doe and Roe on their own would carry forward the company's business (e.g., obtaining any necessary registrations and licenses, negotiating any leases or contracts, and the like). Four months after inquirer organized the company, without the direct assistance of inquirer, the company received its operating license as a center for the on-site provision of certain services to the public.[6]

4. Inquirer provided no further assistance after forming the entity, and the clients did not ask him for any further assistance. Accordingly, inquirer believes that his representation of Doe and Roe in connection with the company concluded when he completed the organizing steps. However, inquirer never sent a termination letter to Doe and Roe, and Doe and Roe never expressly terminated inquirer's services. In other words, Doe and Roe have never explicitly acknowledged or confirmed, either in writing or orally, that inquirer's representation has terminated.

6 Examples of businesses that provide services to the public and require an operating license from the government include private schools, nursing homes, restaurants, hospitals, hospices, day care centers, and rehabilitation facilities. For purposes of our opinion, it would make no difference which type of business inquirer represented.

5. After notice of formation of the company was published but before the company received an operating license, inquirer provided legal assistance to Doe in his individual capacity. Inquirer's legal services to Doe individually concerned a matter unrelated to the organization or business of the company owned by Doe and Roe together.

6. Also after the company had been organized but before the company received its operating license, inquirer overheard a conversation that is the centerpiece of the inquiry here. Inquirer has not identified the speakers, but during the conversation, one of the speakers said that the principals of the company had failed to secure a license because the water available in the premises where the company proposed to provide on-site services had failed to meet required water quality standards. The speaker also said that the principals intended to submit a water sample from another location for testing in order to meet the required water quality standard. Apart from this conversation, inquirer has no knowledge of the water quality at the proposed premises and no knowledge (as distinguished from belief or suspicion) of what in fact the company or anyone acting on its behalf said or did with respect to water quality to secure an operating license.

7. Inquirer asks whether the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") require him to disclose the information about the water quality, prohibit him from disclosing the information, or give him discretion whether or not to disclose the information. In addition, given his belief that his representation of Doe and Roe with respect to their company ended before he overheard the conversation about water quality, inquirer asks whether the information he acquired after the attorney-client relationship ended is protected by the Rules as "confidential information."

OPINION:

8. At the outset, regardless of ethical requirements, inquirer would be well-advised to consider discussing his concerns with the client or former client. Such a discussion would be consistent with Comment [6A] to Rule 1.6, which advises a lawyer to remonstrate with the lawyer's client before making a disclosure of confidential information permitted under Rule 1.6(b)(1), (2) or (3). Even where possible disclosure would not be governed by Rule 1.6 and the advice of Comment [6A] to remonstrate would not apply, such a conversation would afford the Doe and/or Roe an opportunity to remediate the problem, if any, or to allay inquirer's concerns that a problem exists.

Meaning of the term "confidential information"

9. We now turn to the Rules and their application to the facts presented. If the information inquirer heard in the critical conversation is not "confidential information," then the rules protecting confidential information (discussed below) do not apply and inquirer is free to disclose the contents of the conversation if he so desires. We therefore first consider whether the information that inquirer overheard in the critical conversation is "confidential information" protected by the Rules.

10. "Confidential information" is defined in Rule 1.6(a) as "information gained during or relating to the representation*, whatever its source*," that meets one of three criteria: (i) it is protected by the attorney-client privilege, or (ii) it is likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed, or (iii) the client has asked that the information be kept confidential. (Emphasis supplied.) Given the nature of the critical conversation, there can be little doubt of its potential, if revealed, to embarrass or harm not only the company but also its principals. Thus we are brought to the questions of whether the critical conversation is information "gained during or relating to" either the representation of the principals, Doe and Roe, or the separate representation of Doe. If the answer is "yes" to either of those questions, either with respect to the principals in the joint representation or to Doe in the individual representation, then the information gleaned from the conversation is confidential information protected by Rule 1.6. If the information is confidential information, then inquirer must not reveal it or use it to the disadvantage of the client unless an exception to Rule 1.6 applies. We will first address the remaining elements of confidential information, and then address the possible exceptions.

11. The Rules generally protect confidential information with respect to current and former clients to the same extent. Rule 1.9(c) provides, in pertinent part, that a lawyer shall not reveal confidential information of a former client protected by Rule 1.6 except as would be permitted or required with respect to a current client. But whether information qualifies as "confidential information" in the first place does differ depending on whether a client is a present or former client. Under the definition in Rule 1.6(a), information can be "confidential information" simply if it is acquired "during" the representation, but information acquired after the representation terminates can be "confidential information" only if it "relates" to the representation. Since it is unclear from the facts whether Doe and/or Roe are current clients or former clients, we will address both possibilities.

Protection of information gained during the attorney-client relationship

12. The question is whether inquirer's representation of Doe and Roe was a continuing representation at the time of the critical conversation or, in the alternative, whether it had previously ended. The answer to the question depends on whether the clients reasonably believed that they continued to have a client-attorney relationship with inquirer (e.g., whether the principals reasonably believed that inquirer stood ready to provide legal advice and counsel to them on demand, pursuant to the initial retainer or engagement letter). See RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF THE LAW GOVERNING LAWYERS §14 (lawyer-client relationship arises when a person manifests intent to a lawyer that the lawyer provide legal services for the person and the lawyer either manifests consent to do so or knows the person reasonably relies on the lawyer to do so). This inquiry is highly fact dependent.

13. The facts presented here are ambiguous. On the one hand, inquirer provided services to the principals only in connection with the organization of the company. He completed that assignment before he overheard the critical conversation and provided no further services to the principals or to the company after the company was organized. On the other hand, inquirer has had no written or oral communication with the company or its principals explicitly marking an end to the representation. Other factors that could bear upon whether the representation continued beyond the critical conversation include: (a) the terms of the original retainer or written letter of engagement, particularly any stated scope and duration of the engagement; (b) the length of time between the completion of the organizing work and the time of the critical conversation; and (c) whether either or both of the principals were continuing to communicate with inquirer about company business at or near the time of the critical conversation.

14. Under the facts presented, we cannot say conclusively whether inquirer's representation of Doe and Roe had ended by the time of the critical conversation. For example, it is unclear what the retainer or engagement letter provided, how much time passed after inquirer finished organizing the company, whether the principals communicated with inquirer about company business after the organizing work was done, who took part in the critical conversation, or the purpose of the conversation.

15. In addition, inquirer represented Doe individually at roughly the same time that he represented Doe and Roe together. Revelation of a conversation suggesting that Doe, his co-member Roe, or the company they owned had falsified test data concerning drinking water in order to secure a license to operate would be embarrassing or detrimental to Doe, so the critical conversation is protected confidential information as to Doe as well. Therefore, inquirer must apply the same analysis to his representation of Doe as to his representation of Doe and Roe jointly.

16. If either the company or Doe continued to be inquirer's current client, then we must ask whether the information was acquired "during . . . the representation." Literally read, this requirement could be merely temporal, so that any information whatsoever that a lawyer learns from any source after a lawyer begins and before the lawyer finishes representing any client is "confidential information" if disclosure would be detrimental or embarrassing to the client or if the client requested that the lawyer not discuss the information. This reading would extend to information learned from third parties having no connection to the subject matter of the representation or even in the course of another representation. We do not think this purely temporal reading is sound.

17. A more sensible reading is that "during" implies some connection between the lawyer's activities on behalf of the client and the lawyer's acquisition of the information – for example, if the lawyer learned the information because of the lawyer-client relationship.[7] We do not need to decide here the precise parameters of any such requirements beyond the temporal. Although we do not know the circumstances of the conversation that the lawyer overheard, it is clear that the information can be traced directly or indirectly to the principals, and that should be enough to meet any requirement beyond the temporal that may be implied by the phrase "during . . . the representation." Thus, if the representation of either Doe and Roe or of Doe alone was continuing at the time inquirer learned the information, then inquirer is bound by Rule 1.6 with respect to the contents of the conversation. In other words, absent an exception to his duty of confidentiality under Rule 1.6, he may not disclose the information to anyone.

Protection of information acquired after the termination of a representation

18. If, on the other hand, inquirer's representations of Doe and Roe had already terminated – and Doe and Roe were former clients rather than current clients – when he overheard the critical conversation, the question arises whether information acquired after the termination of a representation can constitute confidential information of a former client. We conclude that it can.

19. Rule 1.6(a) defines confidential information to include both information acquired "during" the representation and information "relating to" the representation. Either element is sufficient. Thus, if the information contained in the conversation related to the representation, then inquirer is bound by

7 Cf. Nassau County Bar Op. 05-1 (duty not to prejudice a client "during the course of" the representation in DR 7-101(A) (now Rule 1.1(c)(2)) "extends only to the professional services the lawyer is rendering to the client"); Roy Simon, SIMON'S NEW YORK RULES OF PROFESSIONAL CONDUCT ANNOTATED 34 (2009 ed.) ("Rule 1.1(c)(2) does not prohibit a lawyer from prejudicing or damaging a client outside the scope of the representation. . . . as long as [the lawyer's] activities do not undermine or negate the professional work the lawyer is performing for the client.").

Rules 1.6 and 1.9(c) with respect to that information even if inquirer gained the information after the representation ended. Whether information learned after a representation has concluded is information "relating to" that representation depends upon a variety of factors, including but not limited to: (a) whether the information concerned or grew out of specific aspects of the representation and was revealed in the lawyer's presence because of the lawyer's prior representation; (b) whether the information came from the client or the client's close associates (e.g., independent contractors who conducted the water tests), as opposed to coming from third parties; and (c) whether lawyer learned the information as a result of further active inquiry or investigation after the representation ended, as opposed learning the information accidentally.

20. In this case, if licensure was discussed or contemplated by inquirer during his representation of the company, or if inquirer participated in the critical conversation with one or both of the principals or close associates, or if inquirer sought the information in any way, then the overheard conversation would be more likely to be deemed "relating to" inquirer's representation of the company. See RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF THE LAW GOVERNING LAWYERS § 59, cmt. c ("post-representation confidential client information might be acquired, for example, in the form of information on subsequent developments").

21. If, however, the issue of licensure was never part of the representation of Doe and Roe and was not discussed with or addressed by inquirer, and if there is no reason to think that the participants in the conversation permitted or intended inquirer to overhear the conversation because of his prior representation, one could reasonably argue that the conversation was unrelated to the representation of the company and therefore not within the scope of Rule 1.6 vis à vis the company.

22. To recapitulate our analysis so far, if inquirer concludes that he had no on-going client-attorney relationship either with the two principals or with Doe individually at the time of the critical conversation, and if he concludes that the information gleaned from the critical conversation does not relate to either representation, then neither Rule 1.6 nor Rule 1.9(c) nor any other provision of the Rules of Professional Conduct bears upon the question of whether inquirer may or may not disclose the information gained from that conversation. If, however, inquirer concludes that either or both representations had not ended, or if he concludes that the information gleaned from the critical conversation relates to either or both of the representations, then inquirer's knowledge of the conversation and its content is information gained "during" or "relating" to the representation, and is thus "confidential information" whose disclosure is governed by Rule 1.9(c) and/or Rule 1.6. Because such information must not be revealed or used to the disadvantage of a client unless an exception applies, we will now address the possible exceptions to the duty of confidentiality.

Do any exceptions to the duty of confidentiality apply?

23. Rule 1.6(a) provides that a lawyer may not disclose confidential information unless at least one of three circumstances obtains: (i) the client gives "informed consent"; (ii) disclosure is "impliedly authorized to advance the best interests of the client" and is either "reasonable under the circumstances" or "customary in the professional community"; or (iii) disclosure is permitted by Rule 1.6(b). Here, the first two exceptions – informed consent or implied authorization – do not appear to apply, but we need to determine whether one or more of the permissive bases for disclosure set forth in paragraph (b) may apply.

24. Two exceptions are potentially relevant here. The first is Rule 1.6(b)(1), which provides that "a lawyer may reveal or use confidential information to the extent that the lawyer reasonably believes necessary (1) to prevent reasonably certain death or substantial bodily harm." (Emphasis supplied.) This exception recognizes "the overriding value of life and physical integrity" (Comment [6B]), but is a wholly discretionary exception – it says "may," not "must." See Rule 1.6, cmts. [6]-[6D]. The second potentially relevant exception is Rule 1.6(b)(2), which extends a similar exception to disclosure that the lawyer reasonably believes necessary "to prevent the client from committing a crime." The remaining exceptions in paragraph (b) have no apparent application in this case.

25. Whether death or substantial bodily harm to anyone is a "reasonably certain" outcome of exposure to the drinking water in the licensed premises is a question of fact and judgment. See Rule 1.6, cmt. [6A]. For this exception to apply, the lawyer must believe that death or substantial bodily harm is reasonably certain to ensue from exposure to the drinking water at issue here, and that belief must be reasonable, and the lawyer must conclude that disclosure is "reasonably necessary" to prevent such death or bodily harm. "Such harm is reasonably certain to occur if it will be suffered imminently or if there is present and substantial risk that a person will suffer such harm at a later date if the lawyer fails to take action necessary to eliminate the threat." Rule 1.6(b), cmt. [6B]. Here, where inquirer does not know if the submission of the improper water sample even took place, and does not know what is wrong with the actual water at the licensed premises, it seems unlikely that the lawyer could form a reasonable belief, based on the limited facts that he knows, that death or substantially bodily harm is reasonably certain to occur.

26. Whether the company or anybody on its behalf has committed a crime (such as larceny by false pretenses or operating a business requiring a license without a valid license), and whether that crime is a continuing one, are questions of law beyond the jurisdiction of this Committee. If a lawyer reasonably believes that the client is engaged in a continuing crime or intends to commit a new crime, then to the extent necessary to prevent the continuation of the original crime or the commission of a new crime, the lawyer may (but need not) disclose the contents of the conversation. See Rule 1.6(b)(2). See generally N.Y. City 2002-1 (2002) (interpreting the phrase "intention of a client to commit a crime" and discussing continuing crimes). However, Rule 1.6(b)(2) does not permit disclosure of confidential information concerning a completed or past crime; it applies only to confidential information necessary to prevent a continuing or otherwise future crime.

27. In deciding whether to make a disclosure that is permissible under Rule 1.6 (b), a lawyer should consider, inter alia, the factors set forth in Comments [6] through [6D] to Rule 1.6. The admonition in Comment [6A] that we pointed out in paragraph 8 above especially bears repeating:

> When a lawyer learns that a client intends to pursue or is pursuing a course of conduct that would permit disclosure under paragraphs (b)(1), (b)(2) or (b)(3), the lawyer's initial duty, where practicable, is to remonstrate with the client. In the rare situation in which the client is reluctant to accept the lawyer's advice, the lawyer's threat of disclosure is a measure of last resort that may persuade the client.

CONCLUSION:

28. Under the New York Rules of Professional Conduct, a lawyer is permitted (but is not required) to disclose confidential information of a current or former client if the lawyer reasonably believes disclosure is necessary to prevent reasonably certain death or substantial bodily harm or to prevent the commission of a crime by the client or former client. Information is confidential if the lawyer acquires the information "during" a representation, provided there is some connection between the lawyer's activities on behalf of the client and the lawyer's acquisition of the information, but information "relating to" the representation of a client may be confidential information even if it is acquired after the client-attorney relationship to which it relates has ended.

OPINION 867 (05/31/2011)

TOPIC: Simultaneous representation of lender and seller in residential real estate transaction

DIGEST: Different lawyers in the same law firm may not represent the lender and the seller in a residential real estate transaction unless the lawyers each satisfy the requirements of Rule 1.7 and other applicable Rules.

RULES: 1.0(e) & (f), 1.4, 1.6, 1.7, 1.10

QUESTION:

1. Do the New York Rules of Professional Conduct that took effect on April 1, 2009 permit different lawyers in the same law firm to represent both the mortgage lender and the seller in a residential real estate transaction, or does such representation instead present a non-waivable conflict of interest?

OPINION:

2. Rule 1.7 ("Conflict of Interest: Current Clients") addresses the limited circumstances under which one lawyer may represent multiple clients in the same transaction. Rule 1.7 serves the combined functions of DR 5-101 and DR 5-105 of the former New York Code of Professional Responsibility (the "Code"), but Rule 1.7 contains more detail and requires that client consent be confirmed in writing. Rule 1.7 provides as follows:

> (a) Except as provided in paragraph (b), a lawyer shall not represent a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that either:
> > (1) the representation will involve the lawyer in representing differing interests; or
> > (2) there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests.
>
> (b) Notwithstanding the existence of a concurrent conflict of interest under paragraph (a), a lawyer may represent a client if:
>
> > (1) the lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client;
> >
> > (2) the representation is not prohibited by law;
> >
> > (3) the representation does not involve the assertion of a claim by one client against another client represented by the lawyer in the same litigation or other proceeding before a tribunal; and
> > (4) each affected client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing.

3. This Committee previously addressed whether a lawyer may represent both a lender and seller in the same transaction. In N.Y. State 611 (1990), issued under the former Code, we concluded:

> A lawyer may not represent the lender and the seller in a real estate transaction unless after weighing the specific facts and circumstances the lawyer is satisfied that it is not likely that the interest of these parties will differ and unless both clients consent after full disclosure of the implications of multiple representation.

4. Other opinions under the Code also concluded that a lawyer may sometimes represent more than one party to a real estate transaction. See, e.g., N.Y. State 438 (1976) (allowing joint representation of lender and borrower with their informed consent if a disinterested lawyer would believe the lawyer can competently represent both); N.Y. County 615 (1973) (allowing representation, with informed consent, of buyer and seller who had already agreed upon the principal terms and conditions of sale); N.Y. State 162 (1970) (allowing lawyer to represent both buyer and seller with their consent if their interests are not actually or potentially differing); N.Y. State 38 (1966) (representation of buyer and seller "should be practiced sparingly and only when it is clear that neither party will suffer any disadvantage from it"). Under the new Rules, our view of dual representation of a lender and seller in non-litigated real estate transactions remains unchanged. We now analyze the specific situation presented here.

A. Do the clients have "differing interests" under Rule 1.7(a)(1)?

5. Before accepting the dual engagement, the lawyers for each party must assess whether their prospective clients have "differing interests." The phrase "differing interests" is defined in Rule 1.0(f) as "every interest that will adversely affect either the judgment or the loyalty of a lawyer to a client, whether it be conflicting, inconsistent, diverse, or other interest." Comment [8] to Rule 1.7 provides general guidance on determining whether dual representation would involve the lawyer in representing "differing interests":

> [8] Differing interests exist if there is a significant risk that a lawyer's exercise of professional judgment in considering, recommending or carrying out an appropriate course of action for the client will be adversely affected or the representation would otherwise be materially limited by the lawyer's other responsibilities or interests. For example, the professional judgment of a lawyer asked to represent several individuals operating a joint venture is likely to be adversely affected to the extent that the lawyer is unable to recommend or advocate all possible positions that each client might take because of the lawyer's duty of loyalty to the others. The conflict in effect forecloses alternatives that would otherwise be available to the client. The mere possibility of subsequent harm does not itself require disclosure and consent. The critical questions are the likelihood that a difference in interests will eventuate and, if it does, whether it will adversely affect the lawyer's professional judgment in considering alternatives or foreclose courses of action that reasonably should be pursued on behalf of the client.

6. Even where it may appear that there is a unity of interest or a common objective between the seller and the lender in a relatively simple real estate transaction and no direct negotiations will take place between the seller and the lender, the representation will usually involve the lawyer in representing "differing interests."[8] As we noted in N.Y. State 611, a conflict might arise where the seller would want to close the sale but the lender might decide it has no obligation to make the loan.

B. Is the conflict consentable under Rule 1.7(b)?

7. If a conflict based on differing interests exists under Rule 1.7(a)(1), then the lawyer must determine whether the conflict is consentable under Rule 1.7(b). A concurrent conflict of interest is consentable if (1) the lawyer reasonably believes that he or she can provide "competent and diligent representation" to each client affected by the conflict; (2) the representation is "not prohibited by law"; and (3) the lawyer will not be required to assert "a claim by one client against another client" that the lawyer represents in the same litigation or proceeding before a tribunal. We have no reason to believe that the dual representation would be "prohibited by law," and representation in a real estate transaction will not require the lawyer to assert any claims in litigation. However, we must assess the element in Rule 1.7(b)(1): whether the lawyer can reasonably believe that he or she can provide competent and diligent representation to both parties. Comment [28] to Rule 1.7 provides valuable guidance on this element. It provides, in relevant part:

> Whether a conflict is consentable depends on the circumstances. For example, a lawyer may not represent multiple parties to a negotiation if their interests are fundamentally antagonistic to one another, but common representation is permissible where the clients are generally aligned in interest, even though there is some difference in interest among them.

8. Another source of guidance is N.Y. City 2001-2, which said that lawyers contemplating dual representation in a transaction should consider multiple factors, including the following:

> 1. The nature of the conflict. In a transaction where common interests predominate over issues in dispute, the possibility of an adverse effect on the exercise of the lawyer's independent professional judgment is significantly mitigated. .. . .
> 2. The likelihood that client confidences or secrets in one matter will be relevant to the other representation. . . . To the extent that neither client's confidential information could be used to its disadvantage in the conflicting representation or to the advantage of the other client, this concern is not implicated. . . .
>
> 3. The ability of the lawyer or law firm to ensure that confidential information of the clients will be preserved.. . . . [S]creening and the establishment of other information control devices may be appropriately offered by the lawyer or demanded by the client as a condition of the client's consent. . . .
> 4. The ability of the lawyer to explain, and the client's ability to understand, the reasonably foreseeable risks of the conflict. . . . [T]he sophistication of the client is a > factor that must be considered in determining the effectiveness of client consent to a transactional conflict. . . .

8 Because we conclude that there are always differing interests under these circumstances, it is not necessary to analyze the second prong of Rule 1.7(a)(2), i.e. whether the lawyer's personal interests likewise create a conflict. In other settings, however, conflicts may arise from a lawyer's personal interests rather than from differing interests.

> 5. The lawyer's relationship with the clients. . . . [T]he lawyer [must] be able to represent both clients with equal and undiminished vigor. . . .

9. Regarding the factor of sophistication (factor # 4 above), N.Y. City 2001-2 stated that "sophisticated corporate and institutional clients can consent to conflicts which might be non-consentable in cases involving unsophisticated lay clients who are not represented by independent counsel in connection with the consent." Nevertheless, we have imposed some limits on dual representation even with respect to sophisticated clients. See e.g., N.Y. State 823 (2008) (lawyer cannot continue to represent either joint client in a litigation if their strategies significantly diverge); N.Y. State 807 (2007) (the fact that buyer and seller each sought independent counsel to represent them in negotiations against the other reflected a level of adversity that could not be waived when, unbeknownst to buyer and seller, the attorneys they separately approached turned out to be associated in the same firm).

10. Lawyers at the same firm should be especially cautious before agreeing to represent two parties to a residential (as opposed to commercial) real estate transaction, even if the interests of the two clients are generally aligned and the potential for litigation or disclosure of confidences seems small. The typical seller in a residential real estate transaction is relatively unsophisticated when compared to the institutional lender who, by its size, power, and business potential to the law firm, may have an inherently stronger relationship with the lawyer.[9] This imbalance could interfere with the lawyer's ability to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client, implicating Rule 1.7(b)(1). Cf. Rule 1.7, cmt. [33] ("each client in the common representation has the right to loyal and diligent representation").

11. The factor of confidentiality is especially important in determining whether simultaneous representation of the lender and seller is permissible. Confidentiality is governed by Rule 1.6 ("Confidentiality of Information"). Under Rule 1.6(a), a lawyer representing the seller in a real estate transaction has a duty of confidentiality to the seller. If concerns arise regarding the acceptability of title, or environmental problems, or any condition of closing, then Rule 1.4 ("Communication") may obligate the lawyer to advise the lender of the facts giving rise to those concerns, but Rule 1.6(a) may prohibit the lawyer from disclosing that information to the lender absent the seller's informed consent. The opposing mandates of Rule 1.4 and Rule 1.6 may thus create an irreconcilable conflict of interest. For example, the lawyer cannot recommend that the seller disclose environmental problems with the property simply to please the lender, but the lawyer cannot recommend that the lender close the loan without learning about those problems. When a lawyer must disclose one client's confidential information to another client in order to represent the second client competently and diligently, but the disclosure is prohibited because the first client will not consent and no exception to the duty of confidentiality applies, then the conflict is ordinarily non-waivable because the lawyer cannot provide competent and diligent representation to each client. See N.Y. City 2005-2 (the "critical question is whether the representation of either client would be impaired").

9 If the lawyer or law firm anticipates repeat business from the lender but not from the seller, for example, the lawyer must carefully determine whether the expectation of future business from the lender creates a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the residential seller will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial interests. If so, a conflict would be triggered under Rule 1.7(a)(2) as well.

C. Has the lawyer obtained each client's informed consent, confirmed in writing?

12. Where a lawyer has determined under Rule 1.7(b)(1) that the conflict arising from a multiple representation is consentable, Rule 1.7(b)(4) requires the lawyer to obtain each affected client's "informed consent, confirmed in writing," after full disclosure of the implications of the multiple representation. Informed consent is defined in Rule 1.0(j) to denote "the agreement by a person to a proposed course of conduct after the lawyer has communicated information adequate for the person to make an informed decision, and after the lawyer has adequately explained to the person the material risks of the proposed course of conduct and reasonably available alternatives."

13. As an integral part of obtaining informed consent, the lawyer should explain the implications of the multiple representation for the attorney-client privilege and the lawyer's duty of confidentiality to each client under the Rules. When obtaining informed consent, lawyers should advise clients – unless the parties have an explicit understanding to the contrary – that information gained in the representation may not be privileged if a dispute later arises between the parties, see RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF THE LAW GOVERNING LAWYERS § 75 (2000), and that the lawyer may be forced to withdraw from one or both representations if a dispute arises between the two clients, see Rule 1.7(a)(1), or if either client will not allow the lawyer to convey confidential information material to the other client's matter, see Rule 1.7, cmt. [27] ("lawyer will have to withdraw from one or both representations if one client decides that some matter material to the representation should be kept secret from the other"); Rule 1.7, cmt. [31] ("as part of the process of obtaining each client's informed consent, the lawyer should advise each client that . . . the lawyer will have to withdraw if one client decides that some matter material to the representation should be kept from the other").

14. Each client's consent must be confirmed in writing. Rule 1.0(e) gives a lawyer a choice of three methods: (1) the lawyer may obtain a writing from the client to the lawyer confirming that the client has given consent; (2) the lawyer may promptly transmit a writing to the client memorializing the client's oral consent; or (3) the lawyer may obtain confirmation directly from the client in a statement on the record in a proceeding before a tribunal. Here there is no proceeding before a tribunal, but either of the first two methods of confirming consent will suffice.

D. May different lawyers from the same firm represent the lender and the seller?

15. The specific question here is not whether one lawyer may represent both the lender and the seller in the same residential real estate transaction, but rather whether different lawyers at the same law firm may represent both the lender and the seller in that transaction. The analysis that applies to different lawyers within a law firm who seek to represent two parties to a residential real estate transaction parallels the analysis that applies to one lawyer seeking to represent two parties in the same transaction. The imputation rule under the New York Rules of Professional Conduct, Rule 1.10(a), provides that while lawyers are associated in a firm, none of them shall knowingly represent a client when any one of them practicing alone would be prohibited from doing so by Rule 1.7, 1.8, or 1.9. However, Rule 1.10(d) states that a disqualification by imputation "may be waived . . . under the conditions stated in Rule 1.7." Those conditions include the informed consent of each client. The law firm therefore must first determine whether the two proposed clients have differing interests under Rule 1.7(a)(1) or if there is a significant risk that the lawyer's judgment will be adversely affected by the lawyer's personal interests under Rule 1.7(a)(2). Either situation will create a conflict.

16. If there is a conflict, lawyers in the same firm must not undertake the dual representation unless the representation complies with Rule 1.7(b). If, after carefully weighing the facts and circumstances of the particular transaction, both lawyers in the firm reasonably believe that they can provide competent and diligent representation to their respective clients despite the differing interests between the clients, if the dual representation is not prohibited by law, and if the lawyers obtain informed consent from each client confirmed in writing, the representation of the lender and the seller by different lawyers in the same law firm is permitted. Otherwise, it is not.

CONCLUSION:

17. Different lawyers at the same law firm may not represent both the mortgage lender and the seller in a residential real estate transaction except in the very limited circumstances where the lawyers can satisfy their obligations to each client under Rule 1.7 and other applicable Rules.

OPINION 868 (05/31/2011)

TOPIC: Concurrent representation of corporation and sole shareholder, director and officer.

DIGEST: An attorney may concurrently represent a corporation and its sole shareholder, director and officer in prosecuting a property damage action on behalf of the corporation, and in defending against a third-party claim against the president of the corporation alleging that the claim is fraudulent.

RULES: 1.0(f), 1.7(a)(1), 1.13(d).

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is an attorney ("Attorney") who represents a corporation ("Corporation") in an action against a trucking company ("Trucker"). The President ("President") of the Corporation is the sole shareholder, director and officer of Corporation. In the action against the Trucker, the Corporation alleges that the Trucker caused damages to the Corporation's valuable goods (some fragile antique furniture) while the goods were in transit.

2. The insurance carrier for the Trucker conducted an investigation regarding the allegedly damaged goods and concluded that the Corporation's claim for damages was fraudulent. (The carrier believes the antiques were already damaged before they were shipped.). The Trucker therefore interposed a third-party claim against the President of the Corporation personally and referred the matter to the District Attorney for possible criminal prosecution. The President of the Corporation has asked Attorney to continue representing the Corporation in its civil claim against the Trucker and, in addition, to represent him personally both as a third-party defendant in the civil action and as a criminal defendant in any criminal prosecution that may be lodged against him.

QUESTION:

3. Is there a conflict of interest between the Corporation and its President that would prohibit Attorney from representing both the President personally and the Corporation under these circumstances?

OPINION:

4. Rule 1.13, entitled, "Organization as Client," and Rule 1.7, entitled, "Conflict of Interest: Current Clients," of the Rules of Professional Conduct ("Rules") govern this inquiry. Rule 1.13(d) provides as follows:

> A lawyer representing an organization may also represent any of its directors, officers, employees, members, shareholders or other constituents, subject to the provisions of Rule 1.7. If the organization's consent to the concurrent representation is required by Rule 1.7, the consent shall be given by an appropriate official of the organization other than the individual who is to be represented, or by the shareholders.

5. Rule 1.13(d) therefore requires us to analyze Attorney's simultaneous representation of the Corporation and the President according to the provisions of Rule 1.7. Under Rule 1.7(a)(1), Attorney's simultaneous representation of the Corporation and its President creates a concurrent conflict of interest if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that such representation will involve the lawyer in representing "differing interests." The term "differing interests" is defined by Rule 1.0(f) to mean "every interest that will adversely affect either the judgment or the loyalty of a lawyer to a client, whether it be a conflicting, inconsistent, diverse, or other interest."

6. In many situations, differing interests arise when an organization and one of its officers are accused of fraud, because the organization cannot properly defend against the fraud charges without investigating the conduct of the individual officer – but the individual officer prefers not to be investigated. ROY SIMON, SIMON'S NEW YORK RULES OF PROFESSIONAL CONDUCT ANNOTATED 103 (2009 ed.). Here, however, inasmuch as the President is the sole shareholder, director and officer of Corporation, this principle has no practical application.

7. First, if the fraud allegations are proven and the civil action is determined in the Trucker's favor, the adverse financial consequence to the Corporation will pass through to the President as the sole owner of Corporation. The Corporation and the President therefore do not have "differing interests" in the matter. Rather, the President and the Corporation are united in interest in devising a successful strategy to prosecute the damages claim and to oppose the third-party fraud claim.

8. Second, engaging separate counsel for the President would likely be of significant benefit to the Trucker and prejudicial to both the Corporation and the President in the civil litigation. Lost would be the advantage of one attorney shaping a united defense strategy that would limit damaging disclosures. Separate counsel might also impede the obvious strategy that should be employed for the benefit of President, which would be to allow Corporation to accept responsibility in any civil settlement and in the disposition of any related criminal charges.

9. Our conclusion applies only to the particular facts presented, and would not necessarily hold if there were additional shareholders, officers or directors. We also note that even where, as here, a corporation has a single owner and director, if the corporation is insolvent, differing interests may exist between the corporation and its creditors.[10]

CONCLUSION:

10. On the facts presented, an attorney may concurrently represent a corporation and its sole shareholder, director and officer in prosecuting a property damage action on behalf of the corporation and may simultaneously defend the shareholder/director/officer against a third-party fraud claim.

Supp.2d 184, 202 (S.D.N.Y. 2009) ("[T]he duty that directors owe to the creditors of an insolvent corporation under New York law is defined primarily by the 'trust fund doctrine.' Specifically, 'officers and directors of an insolvent corporation are said to hold the remaining corporate assets in trust for the benefit of its general creditors.' As such, "directors of an insolvent corporation owe a fiduciary duty to preserve the assets of the corporation for the benefit of creditors.'") (internal citations omitted).

TOPIC: Permissible law firm names.

DIGEST: A law firm may not include an area of law in the law firm name. A sole practitioner may use the terms "Firm" or "Law Firm" as part of the law firm name.

RULES: 7.1(a), 7.5(b).

QUESTIONS:

1. A lawyer we will call John Smith would like to use a name such as "The Smith Tax Law Firm" for his practice, and he has asked two questions about the propriety of doing so.

A. May a firm name include an area of law in which the lawyer or law firm practices (such as "Tax" in this case)?

B. May a solo attorney practice under a name containing the word "Firm"?

OPINION:

Question A: May Mr. Smith include the word "Tax" in the name of his firm to identify an area of his law practice?

2. Apart from the context of firm names, lawyers are generally permitted to identify their practice areas. Rule 7.4(a) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") provides: "A lawyer or law firm may publicly identify one or more areas of law in which the lawyer or law firm practices, or may state that the practice of the lawyer or law firm is limited to one or more areas of law . . . ."

3. Thus, a lawyer who complies with other relevant ethical rules (such as those prohibiting deception, regulating advertising, and restricting claims of specialization) could describe his firm as a "tax law firm" on a website or in other advertising apart from the law firm name. Under Rule 7.5 ("Professional Notices, Letterheads and Signs") a lawyer may state the nature of a legal practice, to the extent permitted under Rule 7.4 ("Identification of Practice and Specialty"), in the contexts of professional cards (Rule 7.5(a)(1)), professional announcement cards (Rule 7.5(a)(2)), office signs (Rule 7.5(a)(3)), and letterheads (Rule 7.5(a)(4)).

4. Law firm names, however, are subject to more stringent regulations than the regulations that govern advertising. With limited exceptions, a lawyer in private practice may not "practice under a trade name, a name that is misleading as to the identity of the lawyer or lawyers practicing under such name, or a firm name containing names other than those of one or more of the lawyers in the firm . . . ." Rule 7.5(b). This rule serves to protect the public from being deceived as to the identity, responsibility or status of those who use the firm name. See N.Y. State 732 (2000) (applying trade name prohibition in former Code of Professional Responsibility).

5. The prohibition against trade names is broad, permitting use of little beyond the names of lawyers presently or previously associated with the firm. As an indication of this breadth, other parts of Rule 7.5(b) create exceptions allowing a firm name to include the names of deceased or retired partners or requiring firms to add terms such as "PC," "LLC," or "LLP" only in specified circumstances, suggesting that absent those circumstances, such names or terms might create impermissible trade names.

6. Precedents from this Committee confirm the breadth of the trade name prohibition. In N.Y. State 740 (2001), we said: "Using a name that is not the legal name of one or more partners or former partners in the law firm constitutes use of a trade name" within the meaning of the predecessor to Rule 7.5(b). In N.Y. State 445 (1976), we disapproved the firm name "Community Law Office." To support our decision, we cited former EC 2-11, which indicated that "a lawyer in private practice should practice only under his own name, the name of a lawyer employing him, a partnership name composed of one or more of the lawyers practicing in a partnership, or, if permitted by law, in the name of a professional legal corporation, which should be clearly designated as such."

7. This broad prohibition has been applied to disallow firm names adding even limited terms to the names of the lawyers in the firm. In one case, "The People's Law Firm of Jan L. Shephard, Attorney, P.C.," was disapproved by a court not only as a deceptive name but also as a prohibited trade name. In re Shephard, 92 A.D.2d 978, 979 (3d Dept. 1983). Indeed, N.Y. State 740, supra, found that an impermissible trade name would result merely from adding the letter "A" to the front of the names of lawyers associated with the firm. These precedents were decided under the Code of Professional Responsibility, but the prohibition of trade names in the Rules continues in the same terms, and we interpret it in the same way.

8. Another restriction on law firm names is that lawyers may not make deceptive or misleading statements, whether in advertisements or otherwise. See Rule 7.1(a)(1) (prohibiting "false, deceptive or misleading" statements in lawyer advertisements) and Rule 8.4(c) (prohibiting a lawyer or law firm from engaging in "conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation"). The phrase "Tax Law Firm" as part of a firm name may be literally true, but literal truths can nonetheless be misleading. We are concerned that unsophisticated consumers could read "The Smith Tax Law Firm" as saying more than just that the firm practices tax law. The name would be misleading to the extent it suggests that there is a legal entity called a "tax law firm" – falsely implying an officially recognized subcategory of law firms that have more authority or more skill to practice tax law than do "ordinary" law firms.

9. We recognize that restrictions on a law firm's use of a trade name may raise constitutional issues. Compare Friedman v. Rogers, 440 U.S. 1 (1979) (upholding a Texas law prohibiting optometry trade names), with Alexander v. Cahill, 598 F.3d 79, 95 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 131 S. Ct. 820 (2010) (distinguishing Friedman on its facts but also noting doubt as to Friedman's continued validity). As of now, however, the courts have not struck down Rule 7.5(b). Nor was that provision challenged in Alexander v. Cahill. If the constitutionality of the prohibition on the use of trade names by private lawyers is someday litigated, one of the issues may be the potential for deception that we have mentioned above. Ultimately the courts may or may not see that potential as sufficient to justify the restriction, but the constitutionality of the prohibition on trade names is a question of law beyond our Committee's jurisdiction.

10. However, language that may be impermissible as a trade name may be permissible as a separate firm "motto." See In re Von Wiegen, 63 N.Y.2d 163, 176 (1984) (finding that "The County Lawyer," which appeared underneath the firm name on the firm's letterhead, was a permissible "motto" rather than an impermissible "trade name"); see also N.Y. State 636 (1992) ("We see nothing inherently misleading in the phrase 'The Will Store' and thus perceive no per se ethical proscription on the use of that phrase as a motto in conjunction with the name or names of one or more lawyer principals, but a trade name may not stand alone if the firm is comprised of lawyers and some of its activities, if carried on by lawyers, would constitute the practice of law").

Question B: May Mr. Smith use the name "The Smith Law Firm" even though he is the only lawyer in the firm?

11. Mr. Smith also asks whether he may use the name "The Smith Law Firm." We conclude that he may do so. Even though Mr. Smith is a sole practitioner, his use of the word "Firm" in the name of his practice would not violate Rule 7.5(b). Indeed, "The Smith Law Firm" would clearly and accurately identify the one lawyer practicing under that firm name. Use of the word "Firm" would not suggest that more than one lawyer is involved. See Rule 1.0(h) (defining "law firm" to include a "sole proprietorship").

CONCLUSION:

12. Mr. Smith may not use the name "The Smith Tax Law Firm" because including a practice area in the firm name renders it an impermissible trade name and is misleading to the extent it implies that there is an officially recognized entity called a "tax law firm." He may, however, use the name "The Smith Law Firm" even though he is the only lawyer in the firm.

OPINION 870 (05/31/2011)

TOPIC: Non-exclusive referral agreement between lawyer and nonlawyer debt reduction company; contingent legal fee based on the amount of debt reduction lawyer obtains for clients.

DIGEST: A lawyer may enter into a non-exclusive reciprocal referral agreement with a debt reduction company that is also the lawyer's client, provided the referral arrangement is non-exclusive. The lawyer may also enter into a contingent fee agreement with a debtor client for legal services in connection with debt reduction. However, if the lawyer knows that a client is unlikely to have sufficient financial resources to meet the agreed-upon future payment obligations to creditors, then a contingent fee based on the nominal reduction in debt may be excessive.

RULES: 1.5, 1.7, 5.7, 5.8, 7.2.

QUESTIONS:

1. The inquirer asks two questions:

   A. May a lawyer enter into a non-exclusive reciprocal referral arrangement with a debt reduction company?

   B. May a lawyer represent debtors who are customers of the debt reduction company when they need legal services to assist with their debt reduction efforts, and charge a contingent fee calculated as a percentage of the amount of debt reduction obtained?

FACTS:

2. The inquiring lawyer is considering entering into a business arrangement with a debt reduction company (the "Debt Reduction Company" or the "Company"). The lawyer and the Debt Reduction Company will not have any common employees; they will not share offices; and the lawyer will not hold any equity interest in the Debt Reduction Company.

3. From time to time, as the Debt Reduction Company's needs arise, the lawyer will provide legal services to the Company on a fee-for-services basis. Examples of services the lawyer might provide to the Company include incorporation, licensing, defense of tort and workers' compensation claims, and other business matters. The lawyer will also represent customers of the Debt Reduction Company when those customers need legal services that the Company cannot provide and the customers ask the lawyer to provide those legal services, but the Company will not pay the lawyer to represent its customers. Rather, the customers will pay their own legal fees.

4. Debt reduction companies are engaged in the business of offering ways for consumers to reduce their debt. Although the services and products of the companies may vary widely, the three most common means for debt reduction are bankruptcy, debt renegotiation, and debt consolidation. Each of these methods may entail legal and nonlegal services.

5. Here, the lawyer and the Debt Reduction Company wish to enter into a non-exclusive reciprocal referral agreement in which each will agree to refer potential clients to the other. If a client initially contacts the lawyer for debt reduction services, the lawyer will ordinarily refer the client to the Debt Reduction Company for nonlegal services if the need for such services appears. Conversely, if the client initially contacts the Debt Reduction Company for debt reduction services, the Company will ordinarily refer the client to the lawyer for any needed legal services. The agreement will provide that referrals in both directions are optional (i.e., the Company will remain free to refer customers to other lawyers, and the lawyer will remain free to refer debtors to other debt reduction companies, or to make no referral at all).

6. The agreement will also provide that the lawyer will refer clients to the Debt Reduction Company only when the lawyer believes the referral to be in the best interest of the client. The lawyer will represent debtor-customers who choose to select the lawyer as their counsel. When the client retains both the lawyer and the Debt Reduction Company, the Company will provide nonlegal services associated with debt reduction. The client will pay a contingent fee to the Debt Reduction Company, measured as a percentage of the debt reduction obtained. At the same time, the lawyer will provide legal services associated with debt reduction to the client. The client will pay a contingent fee to the lawyer, likewise measured as a percentage of the debt reduction obtained. Each of the fees – the fee to the Debt Reduction Company and the fee to the lawyer – will be calculated, billed and collected separately.

OPINION:

Question A: Is a Non-Exclusive Referral Arrangement Permissible?

7. Under the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"), may the inquirer enter into an agreement with the Debt Reduction Company that will provide for each party to refer clients to the other on a non-exclusive basis? The lawyer will refer clients to the Debt Reduction Company only when the lawyer believes that the referral to Company is in the client's best interest. If not, the lawyer will either make no referral (because the client does not need debt reduction services) or will refer the client to some other debt reduction service (because another service is better suited to the client's needs than the Company). In N.Y. State 765 (2003), we approved such an arrangement under DR 1-107(C) and DR 2-103(B).

8. Former DR 1-107(C) is substantively identical to Rule 5.8(c), which provides that the restrictions imposed on relationship between lawyers and nonlegal professional service companies by Rule 5.8 "shall not apply to relationships consisting solely of non-exclusive reciprocal referral agreements or understandings between a lawyer or law firm and a nonlegal professional or nonlegal professional service firm." The introductory language in former DR 2-103(B) is identical to the introductory language in Rule 7.2(a), which provides that a lawyer "shall not compensate or give anything of value to a person or organization to recommend or obtain employment by a client, or as a reward for having made a recommendation resulting in employment by a client" (with exceptions not applicable here). Therefore, the reasoning of N.Y. State 765 applies here and the proposed non-exclusive referral arrangement is permitted under the Rules.

9. We also need to ask, however, whether a non-exclusive reciprocal referral relationship makes the lawyer "affiliated" with the Debt Reduction Company within the meaning of Rule 5.7. Under Rule 5.7(a)(3), if a lawyer is "affiliated" with an entity that provides nonlegal services, the nonlegal services will be subject to the Rules if the recipient of the nonlegal services "could reasonably believe that the nonlegal services are the subject of a client-lawyer relationship." Rule 5.7(a)(4) states that such a reasonable belief is presumed, but that the presumption may be rebutted if the lawyer either (i) has a "de minimis" interest in the entity providing the nonlegal services, or (ii) "has advised the person receiving the nonlegal services in writing that the services are not legal services and that the protection of a client-lawyer relationship does not exist with respect to the nonlegal services . . . ." Comment [4] to Rule 5.7 points out that even though the presumption of an attorney-client relationship may be rebutted in this manner, the scope of the exemption is not absolute. Only the Rules that are dependent on the existence of an attorney-client relationship may be exempted in this manner.

10. The very limited arrangement proposed here does not make the lawyer "affiliated" with the Company under Rule 5.7. In our view, something more than a non-exclusive referral arrangement is needed to rise to the level of an affiliation under that Rule. Here, the only connections between the lawyer and the Debt Reduction Company are the non-exclusive referral agreement and that each – independently – intends to calculate their fee based on a percentage of the debt reduction attained. The lawyer and the Debt Reduction Company have no common employees; they do not share offices; the lawyer has no e*quity inte*rest in the Company; and we accept the lawyer's representation that the referral arrangement will be non-exclusive both in name and in fact. Under these circumstances, we conclude that the lawyer is not "affiliated" with the Debt Reduction Company within the meaning of Rule 5.7.

11. Even though we conclude that Rule 5.7 does not apply to this very limited relationship, and even though the referrals are to be made on a non-exclusive basis, the lawyer may need to disclose the relationship with the Company to the lawyer's clients or prospective clients, and obtain their informed consent, before referring them to the Company or accepting them as clients based on referrals from the Company. The disclosure and consent may be necessary to comply with Rule 1.7(a) (governing representations involving "differing interests" and representations where the lawyer's financial or other person interests create a "significant risk" that the lawyer's professional judgment will be "adversely affected"). See N.Y. State 765 ("a reciprocal referral arrangement would generally constitute a conflict of interest . . . such that the relationship would need to be disclosed and consent obtained before the lawyer made the referral"). Here, the need for disclosure is heightened because the reciprocal referral relationship is with one of the lawyer's clients (the Company). Even without the reciprocal referral relationship, Rule 1.7 might require the lawyer to disclose to debtor clients that he is referring them to another client (or that they have been referred to him by another client), and to obtain their informed consent before making a referral to the Company (or accepting a referral from the Company).

12. In addition, while Rule 5.7(a)(4) does not require the lawyer to disclose to clients that the services rendered by the Debt Reduction Company are not legal services and therefore do not enjoy the protection of a client-lawyer relationship, the lawyer may still consider it prudent to make this disclosure to avoid confusion or surprise on the part of clients who might otherwise believe that the Company is providing legal services.

Question B: May the Lawyer's Fee Be a Percentage of the Debt Reduction?

13. Rule 1.5(c) authorizes a fee contingent on the outcome of a matter unless a contingent fee is prohibited by Rule 1.5(d) or other law. In N.Y. State 390 (1975), we recognized that contingent fees are permitted unless prohibited by statute, rule, regulation or ordinance. In N.Y. State 697 (1997), we approved a hybrid fee (a combination of an hourly fee and a contingent fee) provided the fee was not excessive. We are not aware of any prohibition on charging a contingent fee for legal services that produce a debt reduction. Based on that understanding, we conclude that the proposed fee arrangement is proper, assuming that the fee is not excessive or illegal. See N.Y. State 705 (1998) ("if the lawyer may receive a fee contingent on the amount by which taxes are reduced, the lawyer may receive a fee that is a percentage of the tax reduction company's fee, where that fee is itself a percentage of the amount by which taxes are reduced").

14. The lawyer should consult Rule 1.5(a)(1)-(8) for a list of factors to consider when evaluating whether the contingent fee is excessive in all of the circumstances. In this connection, we note that, in many cases involving nonlawyer debt reduction companies, it has been reported that the client is expected to pay a percentage fee based on the amount of debt reduced, as reflected in an agreement with creditors. In some cases that debt reduction is contingent on the debtor meeting all of the obligations of the agreement in the future. If the lawyer knows that a particular client is unlikely to have the financial resources to meet those obligations, then the nominal amount of debt reduction obtained may significantly overstate the amount of the debt reduction ultimately attained, and hence may overstate the value of the legal and nonlegal services to the debtor. In such a case, the proposed contingent fee based on a percentage of the nominal debt reduction may produce an "excessive" fee, which would be prohibited under Rule 1.5(a). (We express no opinion on the propriety of the fee arrangement between the client and the Debt Reduction Company, since our jurisdiction is limited to interpreting the Rules of Professional Conduct as they apply to lawyers.)

CONCLUSION:

15. A lawyer may enter into a non-exclusive referral agreement with a debt reduction company, provided the arrangement is non-exclusive in fact. Although the very limited relationship at issue here does not make the lawyer "affiliated" with the Debt Reduction Company within the meaning of Rule 5.7, the lawyer would nevertheless be prudent to provide clients with the disclaimer set out in Rule 5.7(a)(4). In addition, to comply with Rule 1.7, the lawyer may need to disclose the non-exclusive reciprocal referral arrangement to clients and prospective clients, and obtain their informed consent, before referring clients to the Debt Reduction Company or accepting clients referred by the Debt Reduction Company.

16. A lawyer may enter into a contingent fee agreement for legal services in connection with debt reduction work. However, if the lawyer knows that a particular client is unlikely to have adequate financial resources to meet the reduced obligations, a contingent fee based on the nominal reduction in debt (as opposed to the actual reduction ultimately attained) may be excessive.

TOPIC: Conflicts of interest with former clients

DIGEST: An attorney may not oppose a former client in a different matter without the former client's informed consent, confirmed in writing, if a reasonable lawyer would perceive a substantial risk that the attorney would normally have learned confidential information during the prior representation that could be used against the former client in the present matter.

RULES: 1.9(a) & (c)

QUESTION:

1. May an attorney represent a new client who is adverse to a former client in a different matter?

OPINION:

2. The inquiring attorney wishes to represent a husband (the "Husband") in a divorce proceeding against his wife (the "Wife"). However, the attorney is concerned because he represented the Wife three years ago in a Family Court matter. In that Family Court matter, the Wife sought to modify a child visitation order regarding her child from a previous relationship. That child is not the Husband's child, and the Husband was not involved in the previous matter. However, the Husband and the Wife have three children in common through the present marriage. An existing Family Court order has already determined custody issues regarding the three children in common, and the inquiring attorney considers it "likely" that the existing custody order regarding these three children will be incorporated into the ultimate divorce decree. The inquirer does not say, however, whether the Wife agreed to the existing custody order or whether she will agree to its incorporation into the divorce decree. May the inquirer represent the Husband in the divorce proceedings?

3. Under Rule 1.9(a) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"), an attorney may not represent a client whose interests are materially adverse to a former client, unless the former client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing, if the matter on behalf of the present client is "substantially related" to the matter in which the attorney represented the former client. According to Comment [3] to Rule 1.9:

> Matters are "substantially related" for purposes of this Rule if they involve the same transaction or legal dispute or if, under the circumstances, a reasonable lawyer would conclude that there is otherwise a substantial risk that confidential factual information that would normally have been obtained in the prior representation would materially advance the client's position in the subsequent matter. [Emphasis added.]

4. Here, the matters plainly do not involve "the same transaction or legal dispute." The matter the inquirer handled for the Wife was a visitation dispute in which the Husband was not involved, whereas the new matter is a divorce action in which the Husband is involved. But as explained by Comment [3] to Rule 1.9, the matters are nevertheless "substantially related" for purposes of Rule 1.9(a) if "a reasonable lawyer would conclude that there is otherwise a substantial risk that confidential factual information that would normally have been obtained in the prior representation would materially advance the [present] client's position in the subsequent matter." Comment [3] also provides an illustration that may apply here: "For example, a lawyer who has represented a businessperson and learned extensive private financial information about that person may not then represent that person's spouse in seeking a divorce."

5. We emphasize that the "reasonable lawyer" test articulated in Comment [3] is not whether the lawyer actually obtained confidential information about the former client in the prior matter that would be useful against her in the present matter. Rather, the test is whether a reasonable lawyer would perceive a sizeable risk that a competent lawyer handling the prior matter would normally have gained confidential information about the former client that could be turned to the present client's advantage in the matter against the former client. In other words, the "reasonable lawyer" test presumes that an attorney has confidential information about a former client if a reasonable lawyer would see a substantial risk that a typical attorney would have acquired such information in the prior matter. As Comment [3] explains:

> . . . A former client is not required to reveal the confidential information learned by the lawyer in order to establish a substantial risk that the lawyer has confidential information to use in the subsequent matter. A conclusion about the possession of such information may be based on the nature of the services the lawyer provided the former client and information that would in ordinary practice be learned by a lawyer providing such services. [Emphasis added.]

6. Here, the former representation of the Wife concerned visitation rights of third parties regarding a child unrelated to the marriage in which a divorce is now sought. A reasonable lawyer may conclude that the inquirer, in that former representation, would normally have obtained information concerning such things as the Wife's financial resources, the home life of the child, and the Wife's parenting skills. If that information is also relevant in the impending divorce action, a reasonable lawyer might also perceive a significant risk that the inquirer will use that information to the Husband's material advantage (and to the Wife's material disadvantage) in the divorce proceeding. However, applying the reasonable lawyer test to determine whether to matters are "substantially related" within the meaning of Rule 1.9 requires a factually intensive analysis, and we have only a skeletal version of the facts. What a "reasonable lawyer" would conclude in the situation at hand depends on a more nuanced description of the nature of the two matters than we have been given here.

7. For example, if the parenting ability or financial condition of the Wife were issues in the prior representation, or if other issues would normally have given a competent attorney reason to seek out confidential information during the prior representation that would materially advance the interests of the Husband (and be materially damaging to the Wife) in the divorce case, then the "reasonable lawyer" test of Comment [3] would be satisfied and the two matters will be deemed "substantially related" under Rule 1.9(a).

8. If the former matter and the present matter are deemed "substantially related," then Rule 1.9(a) prohibits the inquirer from representing the Husband in the divorce matter absent the Wife's informed consent, confirmed in writing. The terms "confirmed in writing" and "informed consent" are defined in Rule 1.0(e) and (j) respectively as follows:

(e) "Confirmed in writing" denotes (i) a writing from the person to the lawyer confirming that the person has given consent, (ii) a writing that the lawyer promptly transmits to the person confirming the person's oral consent, or (iii) a statement by the person made on the record of any proceeding before a tribunal. If it is not feasible to obtain or transmit the writing at the time the person gives oral consent, then the lawyer must obtain or transmit it within a reasonable time thereafter.

(j) "Informed consent" denotes the agreement by a person to a proposed course of conduct after the lawyer has communicated information adequate for the person to make an informed decision, and after the lawyer has adequately explained to the person the material risks of the proposed course of conduct and reasonably available alternatives.

9. Whether or not the prior and present matters are substantially related, the inquirer must abide by the restrictions of Rule 1.9(c) in the divorce proceeding and elsewhere. Specifically, Rule 1.9(c)(1) prohibits the inquirer from using confidential information of the former client to the disadvantage of the former client "except as these Rules would permit or require with respect to a current client or when the information has become generally known," and Rule 1.9(c)(2) prohibits the inquirer from revealing confidential information of the former client that is protected by Rule 1.6 – whether to her advantage, disadvantage, or otherwise – "except as these Rules would permit or require with respect to a current client."

CONCLUSION:

10. Whether an attorney may oppose a former client in a new and different matter without the former client's informed consent (confirmed in writing) depends on whether a reasonable lawyer would perceive a substantial risk that a competent attorney would normally have learned confidential factual information during the prior representation that could be used against the former client in the new matter.

OPINION 872 (06/03/2011)

TOPIC: Attorney nicknames and translations of foreign names

DIGEST: An attorney may, consistent with the Rules of Professional Conduct, use a different first name than the one the attorney listed on the Roll of Attorneys, assuming the name used is not misleading as to the attorney's identity. The attorney must, however, comply with any applicable statutes, rules or guidelines governing attorney registration and name changes.

RULES: 7.5(b), 8.4(c).

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is admitted to practice in New York State and has a Polish first name. This first name is the name under which the inquirer is listed on the Roll of Attorneys and Counselors-at-Law maintained in the office of the Clerk of the Court and the name he uses when submitting papers to court and in any formal communication. For the simplicity of informal communication in English, the inquirer would like to use a somewhat different first name, which he says is an accurate translation of his name from Polish to English. He would also like to use this English name on business cards and on his firm's website.

QUESTION:

2. For purposes of business cards, informal communications, and a law firm website, may an attorney use a first name different from the one the attorney has listed on the official Roll of Attorneys?

OPINION:

A. Applicable Rules of Professional Conduct

3. Two provisions of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct are relevant here. Rule 7.5(b) provides, among other things, that "[a] lawyer in private practice shall not practice under a trade name [or] a name that is misleading as to the identity of the lawyer or lawyers practicing under such name." And Rule 8.4(c) prohibits an attorney from engaging in "conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation."

4. Under the circumstances presented here, a lawyer's use of an English name is not misleading as to the identity of the lawyer and is not dishonest, fraudulent, deceitful, or a misrepresentation. Therefore, the name does not run afoul of either Rule 7.5(b) or Rule 8.4(c). We therefore conclude that an attorney may ethically use an accurate English translation of his first name listed on the Roll of Attorneys in informal communications, on business cards, and on his firm's website. Similarly, an attorney could use a name that is not necessarily an accurate translation, such as a nickname by which the attorney is commonly known, as long as the name is not misleading as to the lawyer's identity.

5. Our conclusion here is consistent with prior opinions in this realm. In N.Y. City 82-37 (1982), the inquiring attorney practiced for a number of years and was a name partner in his law firm. He sought to obtain a legal name change for himself and his family in court, and asked the City Bar's ethics committee whether he could continue to use his original name in the practice of law after legally changing his name. Because the attorney had practiced under his original name for many years, the Committee saw little "possibility that his continued use of this name after the name change [was] intended or likely to mislead." Accordingly, the Committee concluded that using the name would not violate DR 2-102(B), the predecessor provision to Rule 7.5(b). Similarly, in N.Y. City 638 (1943), the ethics committee concluded that it was ethically permissible for an attorney who had been admitted to practice under her "married name" to use her "maiden name" in the practice of law.

B. Statutes, court rules, and judicial guidelines

6. Compliance with the Rules of Professional Conduct that we have cited above, however, may not be sufficient. The attorney should also abide by any statutes, court rules, and judicial guidelines that govern an attorney in these circumstances. For example, Judiciary Law § 468 ("Official registration of attorneys to be kept by the chief administrator of the courts") requires the Chief Administrator of the Courts to maintain an official register of attorneys and counselors-at-law in the state of New York. Likewise, in Part 118 of the Rules of the Chief Administrator of the Courts ("Registration of Attorneys"), a provision at 22 NYCRR § 118.1(e) requires that attorneys periodically file registration statements on a form provided by the Chief Administrator of the Courts, which must include, among other things, the name of the attorney. If the information on file changes, 22 NYCRR § 118.1(f) requires that "the attorney shall file an amended statement within 30 days of such change."

7. Furthermore, each of the four judicial departments within the Appellate Division maintains a Roll of Attorneys and Counselors-at-Law in the respective office of the Clerk of the Court. The Second Department's website, under "Attorney Matters/Change of Name/Introduction" notes the following:

The name under which an attorney is authorized to practice law is the name under which he or she was admitted to practice and which is recorded in the Roll of Attorneys and Counselors-at-Law maintained in the office of the Clerk of the Court. An attorney may not begin to practice under a different name without the prior approval of an application to do so by the Appellate Division in the Department in which he or she was admitted. Such a change may, under limited circumstances defined by law, be made administratively by the Clerk of the Court. All others require an application to the court for an order authorizing the change.

http://www.nycourts.gov/courts/ad2/attorneymatters_NameChangeApplications.shtml. The other three judicial departments have adopted similar procedures. See http://www.courts.state.ny.us/courts/ad1/Committees&Programs/CFC/index.shtml#NameChange (1st Dep't); http://www.courts.state.ny.us/ad3/Admissions/AttorneyNameChange.pdf (3rd Dep't); http://www.nycourts.gov/courts/ad4/Clerk/AttyMttrs/baradmin.html#Name (4th Dep't).

8. The Second Department's guidelines on "Name Change Applications" note that "[t]here are often reasons to seek a change of the name under which an attorney is authorized to practice law that do not fall within the statutes permitting such a change to be made administratively and thus require the change to be made by court order." Specifically listed among the situations requiring a court order are cases in which an attorney "wishes to practice under the familiar form of the given names under which he or she was admitted to practice, such as 'Jimmy Carter' rather than 'James Earl Carter.'"

9. The scope, interpretation, and application of the cited statutes, rules and guidelines present questions of law beyond the jurisdiction of this Committee. Our jurisdiction is limited to interpreting the New York Rules of Professional Conduct. We note, however, that the inquiring attorney must comply with all applicable statutes and court rules. Assuming the use of the English translation of the attorney's first name comports with these requirements, the inquirer's proposed use of that name is not unethical under the Rules.

CONCLUSION:

10. For purposes of business cards, informal communications, and a law firm website, an attorney may, under the New York Rules of Professional Conduct, use a different first name from the one the attorney listed on the Roll of Attorneys as long as the name used is not misleading as to the attorney's identity. The attorney must, however, comply with any applicable statutes, rules or guidelines governing attorney registration and name changes.

OPINION 873 (06/09/2011)

TOPIC: Offering a prize to join attorney's social networking sites

DIGEST: The Rules of Professional Conduct do not prohibit an attorney from offering a prize to join the attorney's social network as long as the prize offer is not illegal, but if the primary purpose of the prize offer is the retention of the attorney, then it will constitute an "advertisement" and will be subject to the rules governing lawyer advertising. If the prize offer is an advertisement, and if it is targeted to specific recipients, and if a significant motive is pecuniary gain, it will also constitute a "solicitation" and will be subject to additional requirements and restrictions.

RULES: 1.0(a) & (c), 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, and 8.4(c).

QUESTION:

1. May a lawyer offer a prize as an incentive to connect to the inquirer on social networking sites?

OPINION:

2. The inquirer currently uses various social networking sites, including Facebook, LinkedIn and MySpace. The inquirer is considering offering the chance to win a prize (to be determined) for connecting to the inquirer on one of those sites. By building the inquirer's social network this way, the inquirer hopes to market the inquirer's legal services more effectively.

3. The Committee assumes that the proposed "prize" will be awarded randomly to someone simply for agreeing to connect to the inquirer on one of the inquirer's social networking sites (e.g., for agreeing to become a new "friend" or "contact"). The Committee also assumes that a person will not be required or expressly invited to retain the inquirer as an attorney in order to be eligible for the prize.

4. Preliminarily, we note that there may be laws or regulations governing sweepstakes and games of chance that could apply to the inquirer's proposal. The Committee does not address these issues because the Committee does not opine on questions of law. The Committee has considered solely whether, assuming that the proposal is legal, it is also permissible under the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"). The Committee likewise has not considered whether a prize offer would violate the Terms of Use of any particular social network. The Terms of Use are a matter of contract between the inquirer and the social networking sites and are not within the Committee's jurisdiction.

A. New York Rules of Professional Conduct Relevant to a Prize Offer

5. We begin by setting forth various provisions in the New York Rules of Professional Conduct that are relevant to the question posed.

6. New York Rule 7.1 ("Advertising") governs advertisements by lawyers and law firms. Rule 1.0(a) defines the term "advertisement":

> "Advertisement" means any public or private communication made by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm about that lawyer or law firm's services, the primary purpose of which is for the retention of the lawyer or law firm. It does not include communications to existing clients or other lawyers.

7. Rule 7.2 ("Payment for Referrals") governs various types of compensation for marketing. Rule 7.2(a) of provides as follows:

> A lawyer shall not compensate or give anything of value to a person or organization to recommend or obtain employment by a client, or as a reward for having made a recommendation resulting in employment by a client . . . .

8. Rule 7.3 ("Solicitation and Recommendation of Professional Employment") governs advertisements directed at particular potential clients. Rule 7.3(a) provides:

> A lawyer shall not engage in solicitation:
> (1) by in-person or telephone contact, or by real-time or interactive computer-accessed communication unless the recipient is a close friend, relative, former client or existing client . . . .

9. Rule 7.3(a)(1) uses the term "computer-accessed communication," which is defined in Rule 1.0(c) as follows:

> "Computer-accessed communication" means any communication made by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm that is disseminated through the use of a computer or related electronic device, including, but not limited to, web sites, weblogs, search engines, electronic mail, banner advertisements, pop-up and pop-under advertisements, chat rooms, list servers, instant messaging, or other internet presences, and any attachments or links related thereto.

10. Rule 7.3(b) defines "solicitation":

> For purposes of this Rule, "solicitation" means any advertisement initiated by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm that is directed to, or targeted at, a specific recipient or group of recipients, or their family members or legal representatives, the primary purpose of which is the retention of the lawyer or law firm, and a significant motive for which is pecuniary gain.

11. Finally, Rule 8.4 ("Misconduct") contains the general prohibition, in Rule 8.4(c), that a lawyer or law firm shall not "engage in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation."

B. Applying the Rules of Professional Conduct to the Prize Offer

12. A "solicitation" in Rule 7.3(b) is by definition an "advertisement" that meets additional criteria, so something cannot be a "solicitation" unless it is first found to be an "advertisement." See Rule 7.3, cmt. [1] ("Not all advertisements are solicitations. . . . All solicitations, however, are advertisements with certain additional characteristics."). If the proposed prize offer is not an advertisement as defined by the Rules, it will not fall under the strictures that apply to advertising or solicitation. Therefore, we must first determine whether the offer is an advertisement. If so, we must then determine if it is also a "solicitation" under Rule 7.3(b).

Is the prize offer an "advertisement"?

13. To fall within the definition of "advertisement," the communication offering the prize must be for the "primary purpose" of the inquirer's retention. The fact that business development might be the inquirer's ultimate goal in offering the prize would not trigger the Rules on advertising any more than it would trigger those Rules if, for example, the inquirer were to join a local Chamber of Commerce, Kiwanis Club, or bar association, or if the inquirer were to take other steps to expand the inquirer's personal social circle, with the aim of meeting potential new clients. As stated in Comment [6] to Rule 7.1:

> Not all communications made by lawyers about the lawyer or the law firm's services are advertising. Advertising by lawyers consists of communications made in any forum about the lawyer or the law firm's services, the primary purpose of which is retention of the lawyer or law firm for pecuniary gain as a result of the communication. . . .

See also Rule 7.1, cmts. [7] - [9] (regarding various communications that may or may not be advertisements, depending on the circumstances).

14. If the prize offer is merely posted on the inquirer's own social networking sites and people gain a chance to win the prize simply by connecting with the inquirer – not for retaining the inquirer – it is not likely to be an "advertisement" even if the site elsewhere identifies the inquirer as an attorney. If, however, the prize offer itself describes the inquirer as an attorney or describes the inquirer's legal services or law firm (or both), the prize offer would be an "advertisement" subject to all of the strictures of Rule 7.1, such as the mandatory use of the label "Attorney Advertising."

15. Whether or not the prize offer is an advertisement, the inquirer must be honest. As observed in Comment [6] to Rule 7.1:

> [A]ll communications by lawyers, whether subject to the special rules governing lawyer advertising or not, are governed by the general rule that lawyers may not engage in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation, or knowingly make a material false statement of fact or law. . . .

Is the prize offer a "solicitation"?

16. If posting the prize offer is considered an "advertisement," we must also ask whether it will also be considered a "solicitation" within the meaning of the Rules. Under Rule 7.3(b), the advertisement for a prize offer will be a solicitation if is "directed to, or targeted at, a specific recipient or group of recipients, or their family members or legal representatives" and a "significant motive" is "pecuniary gain." If the prize offer is a solicitation, it will be subject to the special requirements of Rule 7.3.

17. Of particular relevance in the social networking context is Rule 7.3(a), which prohibits solicitation by (inter alia) "real-time or interactive computer accessed communication" unless the recipient is "a close friend, relative, former client or existing client." (The inquirer has not suggested that those exceptions would apply to most recipients of the prize offer.) A "computer-accessed communication" is defined in Rule 1.0(c) as "any communication made by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm that is disseminated through the use of a computer or related electronic device . . . ." Communications by targeted electronic messages – e.g., posting the offer on a social networking site or sending it via email – would fall within the rubric of a "computer-accessed communication." However, the closing sentence of Comment [9] to Rule 7.3 states: "Ordinary email and websites are not considered to be real-time or interactive communication." Thus, if the inquirer merely posts the prize offer on his Facebook or other social networking site, or sends the offer to recipients by email, then the offer will not be considered a prohibited "real-time or interactive computer-accessed communication" under Rule 7.3(a)

18. The policy reasons underlying the general prohibition against in-person solicitation, telephone contact, and real-time or interactive computer-accessed communications are set out in Comment [9] to Rule 7.3, which provides:

> Paragraph (a) generally prohibits in-person solicitation, which has historically been disfavored by the bar because it poses serious dangers to potential clients. For example, in-person solicitation poses the risk that a lawyer, who is trained in the arts of advocacy and persuasion, may pressure a potential client to hire the lawyer without adequate consideration. These same risks are present in telephone contact or by real-time or interactive computer-accessed communication and are regulated in the same manner. . . .

19. In sum, the prize offer will be an "advertisement" and must comply with Rule 7.1 only if the inquirer's "primary purpose" is the "retention" of the inquirer or his law firm." Furthermore, the prize offer will be a "solicitation" only if it is an "advertisement" and is "directed to, or targeted at, a specific recipient or group of recipients" (whether the recipients are already part of the offeror's own social network contacts or are outside the offeror's social network contacts). If the prize offer is a "solicitation," it will be subject to the strictures of both Rules 7.1 and 7.3. No matter how the communication of the prize offer is labeled, it must be truthful per Rule 8.4(c).

20. Finally, the proposed prize offer does not violate Rule 7.2(a)'s ban against compensating or giving "anything of value" to a person "to recommend or obtain employment by a client, or as a reward for having made a recommendation resulting in employment by a client . . . ." The inquirer is offering the chance to win a prize merely for connecting to the inquirer on a social networking site, not for recommending or employing the inquirer as a lawyer.

CONCLUSION:

21. Offering a prize offer to join an attorney's social network is not prohibited by the Rules of Professional Conduct as long as the offer does not constitute illegal conduct. If the primary purpose of the prize offer is to promote retention of the attorney's legal services (which is a factual question), then it is an "advertisement" and is subject to Rule 7.1 and other Rules governing lawyer advertising. If it is an advertisement that also meets the definition of a "solicitation," then it is subject to Rule 7.3 as well. If the attorney communicates the prize offer by posting it on a social networking site or sending it by mail, and if the attorney does not communicate the offer in person, by telephone, or by a real-time or interactive computer-assisted communication (other than to recipients who are close friends, relatives, former clients, or existing clients), then the communications about the prize offer are not prohibited by Rule 7.3(a).

22. If the prize offer is not an advertisement, it also cannot be a solicitation and will therefore be subject neither to Rule 7.1 nor to Rule 7.3. However, like every communication by a lawyer – advertisement, solicitation, or neither – it will be subject to the general prohibition in Rule 8.4(c) against conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation.

OPINION 874 (07/20/2011)

TOPIC: Part-time prosecutor's representation of criminal defendants in town courts

DIGEST: An attorney who represents criminal defendants in a town court may not accept a position as a part-time prosecutor of vehicle and traffic offenses.

RULES: 1.7(a) and (b)

QUESTION:

1. May an attorney who represents criminal defendants in town courts accept a position as a part-time prosecutor with respect to vehicle and traffic matters in a local justice court in the same county?

OPINION:

2. The inquirer represents criminal defendants in town courts and asks whether he could accept a position as a part-time prosecutor with respect to vehicle and traffic matters in a local justice court in the same county. He notes that there are only a small number of traffic tickets (about five to seven a month) in the local justice court.

A. Is there a conflict of interest?

3. It has long been the opinion of this Committee that an attorney who has prosecutorial responsibilities as an incident of part-time employment by a local governmental unit is disqualified from the private practice of criminal law in all courts of the state. In N.Y. State 544 (1982), we observed that "a part-time local attorney, insofar as he prosecutes violations of local law, acts on behalf of the people of the state." Because a prosecutor represents the people of the state, it is improper for the attorney to represent any individual client whom the people of the state have charged with a criminal violation. "Acting as prosecutor on one case on one day, and appearing the next day even in a different court representing a private citizen who had been charged with a criminal act or violation of law, would give rise to an appearance of improper conflict of interest." N.Y. State 184 (1971).

4. In N.Y. State 544, at 5, we elaborated on the rule as follows:

> A part-time local attorney may undertake a criminal defense without conflict of interest or appearance of impropriety if (1) his statutory or other responsibility to prosecute criminal proceedings on behalf of the locality does not require him, in any case, to prosecute any crimes or offenses designated as such by the Penal Law or any other law enacted by the Legislature of the State of New York, (2) the defense does not require him to appear before a judicial or other official of the locality he publicly represents, (3) the local government unit by which he is employed, or a violation or a construction of one of its ordinances, is not involved, (4) the offense charged is unlike any of those which he prosecutes, and (5) the investigating officers and law enforcement personnel involved are not those with whom he associates as prosecutor.

5. Absent satisfaction of the foregoing five qualifications, the part-time prosecutor is forbidden to undertake a criminal defense case anywhere in the State of New York. N.Y. State 544 at 1.

6. In N.Y. State 544 and again in N.Y. State 657 (1993), we specifically considered whether the responsibility to prosecute vehicle and traffic infractions caused the attorney to fail to meet the first qualification (his "responsibility to prosecute criminal proceedings on behalf of the locality does not require him . . . to prosecute any crimes or offenses designated as such by . . . the Legislature of the State of New York") – and in both opinions we opined that the prosecutor failed that condition. In N.Y. State 657, which interpreted N.Y. State 544, we said that "if the lawyer's responsibilities . . . include prosecuting violations of the New York State Vehicle and Traffic Laws, the lawyer is precluded from representing, in criminal cases, a defendant in any court of the State." This prohibition is absolute.

7. The number of cases prosecuted each month is irrelevant. In fact, it is irrelevant whether a part-time prosecuting attorney actually prosecutes any offenses during the period in which he represents a criminal defendant so long as he has the responsibility to do so. As we said in N.Y. State 657, "The fact that the lawyer only negotiates settlements and is not permitted to do trial work does not avoid the prohibition . . . ." We have also noted that an "independent contractor" and other "local part time attorneys for municipalities, regardless of their title or actual responsibilities, may not undertake criminal defense cases pending before judicial officers of the same locality, notwithstanding their ability to handle such matters in other courts of the State." N.Y. State 657, citing N.Y. State 234 (1972) (as modified by N.Y. State 544). Thus, neither the attorney's job title nor the attorney's part-time status can overcome the absolute prohibition.

8. Furthermore an attorney's defense of the criminal defendant would require the attorney to appear in other town courts. Thus, the attorney would fail to satisfy the second qualification in N.Y. State 544 as well ("the defense does not require him to appear before a judicial or other official of the locality he publicly represents") because the attorney would be appearing before a judicial official of the locality the attorney publicly represents.

9. We recognize that the opinions we have discussed here were decided under DR 5-105 and DR 9-101 of the New York Lawyer's Code of Professional Responsibility, which was superseded by the New York Rules of Professional Conduct on April 1, 2009. Nevertheless, the result is the same today. Rule 1.7(a)(1) provides, in relevant part:

> (a) Except as provided in paragraph (b), a lawyer shall not represent a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that . . . :
> (1) the representation will involve the lawyer in representing differing interests. . . .

10. Rule 1.0(f), in turn, defines differing interests as follows:

> "Differing interests" include every interest that will adversely affect either the judgment or the loyalty of a lawyer to a client, whether it be a conflicting, inconsistent, diverse, or other interest.

11. Representing the state as a prosecutor and at the same time representing a criminal defendant, even in a totally unrelated case, would involve the attorney in representing "differing interests." Thus, the attorney has a conflict under Rule 1.7 unless it can be waived.

B. Can the conflict be waived?

12. Former DR 5-105(C) provided for a waiver of the conflict with the consent of the affected clients. Specifically, in 1993, it permitted a lawyer to represent multiple clients with "differing interests" if each consented to the representation after full disclosure of the possible effect of the representation on the exercise of the lawyer's independent professional judgment and if it was obvious that the lawyer could adequately represent the interests of each client. In N.Y. State 657, we concluded that the conflict addressed there, which involved a lawyer who prosecuted violations of Vehicle and Traffic Laws, could not be waived. "Because the role of the prosecutor and the defense lawyer are inherently incompatible and the prosecutor has special responsibilities to the public," we said, "consent cannot cure the conflict because it is not obvious that the lawyer can adequately represent the Town and the private client." That conclusion is also true under Rule 1.7(b), as we will now discuss.

13. Rule 1.7(b), like DR 5-105(C), provides for a waiver of a conflict. Rule 1.7(b) provides:

> (b) Notwithstanding the existence of a concurrent conflict of interest under paragraph (a), a lawyer may represent a client if:
>
> > (1) the lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client;
> >
> > (2) the representation is not prohibited by law;
> >
> > (3) the representation does not involve the assertion of a claim by one client against another client represented by the lawyer in the same litigation or other proceeding before a tribunal; and
> > (4) each affected client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing.

14. Despite the differences in language between DR 5-105(C) and Rule 1.7(b), we continue to believe that the role of the prosecutor and the criminal defense lawyer are "inherently incompatible." Therefore, a lawyer who is both a prosecutor and a criminal defense lawyer will not "be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client" as required by Rule 1.7(b)(1). Since that condition cannot be satisfied, the conflict is non-consentable. Client consent will not cure the conflict.

CONCLUSION:

15. An attorney who represents criminal defendants in a town court may not accept a position as a part-time prosecutor of vehicle and traffic offenses.

OPINION 875 (07/20/2011)

TOPIC: Non-testifying expert compensation; percentage of recovery

DIGEST: Lawyer may ethically agree to handle a case on a contingent fee basis even if the client already has separately retained a non-testifying expert on a contingent fee basis.

RULES: 1.5(a), 5.4(a)

QUESTION:

1. May a lawyer ethically agree to handle a case on a contingent fee basis if the client already has signed a retainer with a non-testifying expert providing that the expert is to be compensated based on a percentage of the recovery in the action?

OPINION:

2. An out-of-state lawyer (the "out-of-state lawyer") has asked a lawyer admitted to practice in New York State (the "New York lawyer") to handle a case in New York as co-counsel to the out-of-state lawyer. The out-of-state lawyer's client has already signed a contract with a non-testifying expert in the case. The contract calls for the expert to be compensated by a percentage of the recovery in the case (i.e., on a contingent fee basis). The out-of-state lawyer has signed a separate retainer agreement with the client by which the out-of-state lawyer is to be compensated at one-third of any recovery.

3. The proposed fee-splitting arrangements between the out-of-state lawyer and the New York lawyer have not been disclosed, but we assume that the New York lawyer's fee would also be contingent on recovery, and would either be a share of the out-of-state lawyer's fee or would be a separate fee that, when combined with the out-of-state lawyer's fee, would not to exceed one-third of the total recovery.

4. The role of the non-testifying expert is not specified in the inquiry, so we do not know whether and to what extent the role of that expert and services that expert is expected to provide overlap with the services to be provided by the lawyers.

5. There also is no indication that the engagement of the out-of-state lawyer was procured by the non-testifying expert. Nor is there any indication that the out-of-state lawyer will take a reduced fee to facilitate the client's payment of a separate contingent fee to the non-testifying expert (in a percentage matching the percentage by which the out-of-state reduced his fee) as a way of compensating the expert for a referral.

6. Because the New York lawyer is being retained by the client after the client has already entered into separate contingent fee engagements with the non-testifying expert and the out-of-state lawyer, we have no concern as to fee splitting with a non-lawyer, and we have no concern regarding the professional independence of the lawyer and the lawyer's duty of loyalty to the client.

7. This situation does not implicate Rule 5.4(a), which prohibits a lawyer from sharing legal fees with a nonlawyer (except in certain situations not applicable here). The purpose of Rule 5.4(a) is to promote the professional independence of the lawyer and help to ensure that the professional responsibility of the lawyer to the client is direct and not compromised by external influences. See Rule 5.4, cmt. [1]. These policies are not implicated here because the lawyer's relationship with the client remains direct, and the lawyer is not sharing fees with the non-testifying expert.

8. Nor does the present situation raise the concerns addressed in N.Y. State 698 (1998), which concluded that it would be improper for a lawyer to accept referral of a medical malpractice case on a contingent fee basis from a "medicolegal consulting service" that would also be paid on a contingent basis. That opinion noted the potential influence of the consultant on the lawyer, possibly compromising the lawyer's professional independence, and also recognized the risk that the combination of the contingent legal fee and contingent consulting fee could result in an excessive fee. An excessive fee would violate Rule 1.5(a) ("lawyer shall not make an agreement for, charge, or collect an excessive or illegal fee").

9. The present situation, unlike that in N.Y. State 698, does not create risk of confusion as to the respective responsibilities of the lawyer and the non-testifying expert. The New York lawyer is separately engaged by the client, and the attorney-client relationship is defined by the engagement letter between the client and the New York lawyer.

10. The concerns discussed in N.Y. State 727 (2000) also are not implicated in the present case. That opinion involved separate contingent fees charged by a lawyer and by an accounting firm that would refer cases to the lawyer. In effect, the lawyer there was splitting the lawyer's contingent fee with the accounting firm, which is improper.

CONCLUSION:

11. There is no ethical barrier to a lawyer entering into a contingent fee arrangement with a client where the client already has retained a non-testifying expert to work on the same case on a contingent fee basis.

OPINION 876 (09/09/2011)

TOPIC: Conflicts of interest when lawyers are associated with two or more firms

DIGEST: Conflicts of interest will be imputed to all lawyers in all firms with which a lawyer is associated as a partner, associate or of counsel, whether or not a screen is established.

RULES: 1.7, 1.9, 1.10(a) & (e)

QUESTION:

1. May lawyers associated as partners, associates or of counsel avoid the imputation of conflicts by creating a screen and limiting the practice of one of the firms?

FACTS:

2. The ABC law firm and the MNO law firm are separate law firms located in different cities over 200 miles apart. ABC and MNO do not share office space and have no common partners or associates. However, two partners of the ABC law firm and two partners of the MNO law firm intend to form a third law firm, the XYZ law firm. (Other partners of the ABC firm and the MNO firm will continue practicing with their respective firms but will not join the XYZ law firm.) The sole purpose of the XYZ law firm will be to write title opinions for mineral estates associated with real property. The XYZ firm will limit itself to that practice.

3. In an effort to avoid imputing any conflicts of interest from any of the three firms to any other firm, the common members of ABC, MNO and XYZ will enter into agreements prohibiting them from disclosing any proprietary, trade secret, confidential or privileged information of the XYZ law firm to anyone outside the firm. The XYZ firm plans to obtain the informed consent of the XYZ firm's clients to this arrangement.

4. The XYZ law firm will not have a separate physical office. Instead, the XYZ firm will maintain its files electronically and make them available only to the attorneys at the XYZ law firm. In addition, the XYZ firm's files will be maintained physically in file cabinets located at each of the ABC and MNO law firms, but those files will be separated from the general files of the ABC and MNO law firms, and locks on the file cabinets will prohibit non-XYZ attorneys from gaining access to the XYZ firm's files.

5. The essence of the question before us is whether screening is sufficient to avoid the imputation of conflicts of interest from one law firm to another. We conclude that it is not.

OPINION:

6. Effective April 1, 2009, the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") replaced the New York Code of Professional Responsibility (the "Code"). However, the Rules and the Code are similar or identical in substance regarding all relevant issues raised by this inquiry. Consequently, although the opinions and cases we cite in this opinion were decided under the Code, each would be decided in the same manner under the Rules because there are no substantive differences between the applicable Rules and the former Code provisions. Thus, our analysis and our answer under the Rules is the same as it would have been under the Code.

General Principles of Imputation

7. New York's general rule governing imputation of conflicts of interest is Rule 1.10(a), which is nearly identical to former DR 5-105(D). Rule 1.10(a) provides:

> (a) While lawyers are associated in a firm, none of them shall knowingly represent a client when any one of them practicing alone would be prohibited from doing so by Rule 1.7, 1.8 or 1.9, except as otherwise provided therein.

8. For decades, both this Committee and various New York courts have consistently stated that where a lawyer is "associated" with more than one law firm within the meaning of the imputation rule, all of the law firms with whom that lawyer is associated are treated as one law firm for purposes of conflicts of interest. Accordingly, under Rule 1.10(a), all conflicts in each firm are imputed to all lawyers in all of the firms associated with a common lawyer. See, e.g., N.Y. State 807 (2007) (lawyer working part-time at two firms); N.Y. State 794 (2006) (lawyer working at law firm and law school clinic); N.Y. State 793 (2006) (lawyer with "of counsel" relationship with two firms at the same time); N.Y. State 715 (1999) (contract lawyer for two firms); N.Y. State 388 (1975) (sole practitioner and member of partnership); N.Y. City 2000-4 (2000) (affiliated law firms); Cinema 5, Ltd. v. Cinerama, Inc., 528 F. 2d 1384 (2d Cir. 1976) (partner in two law firms).

9. Because multiple law firms that are associated with a common lawyer (or lawyers) are treated as if they were one firm for conflicts purposes, it follows that all law firms with a common lawyer must also be treated as a single unit for purposes of checking for conflicts under the Rules. In that regard, Rule 1.10(e), which includes language similar to former DR 5-105(E), requires law firms to implement and maintain a system for checking for conflicts of interest. As explained in Comment [9] to Rule 1.10: "Under paragraph (e), every law firm, no matter how large or small (including sole practitioners), is responsible for creating, implementing and maintaining a system to check proposed engagements against current and previous engagements and against new parties in pending matters."

Will Screening Avoid Imputation?

10. The opinions we have cited have not specifically addressed the issue of screening. The terms "screened" and "screening" are defined in Rule 1.0(t) as follows:

> (t) "Screened" or "screening" denotes the isolation of a lawyer from any participation in a matter through the timely imposition of procedures within a firm that are reasonably adequate under the circumstances to protect information that the isolated lawyer or the firm is obligated to protect under these Rules or other law.

11. Here, the XYZ law firm will attempt to screen its files and activities so that only the lawyers who make up the XYZ law firm will have access to the XYZ firm's client files, while the lawyers at the ABC and MNO firms will not. We may assume, without deciding, that these procedures would be "reasonably adequate under the circumstances to protect information that the isolated lawyer or the [XYZ] firm is obligated to protect under these Rules or other law," and would thus fall within the definition of "screening" in Rule 1.0(t). But that is irrelevant because a screen cannot avoid the imputation of conflicts between and among all three firms pursuant to Rule 1.10(a). The screen fails on at least two grounds.

12. First, in promulgating the new Rules, the Appellate Divisions rejected the recommendation of the New York State Bar Association that screening be permitted in appropriate circumstances as a substitute for client consent. Compare Proposed Rule 1.10(c) and Proposed Comments [5D] through [5H] of Rule 1.10 (Feb. 1, 2008) with Rule 1.10 as adopted effective April 1, 2009.[11]

13. Second, the proposed screening by the XYZ law firm does not permit ABC law firm or MNO law firm to fulfill its obligation under Rule 1.10(e) to implement "a system by which proposed engagements are checked against current and previous engagements" in the circumstances specified in Rule 1.10(e)(1)-(4). Thus, law firms ABC and MNO will be unable to determine whether either firm has a conflict under (inter alia) Rules 1.7(a) and 1.9(a)-(b), or whether any conflict arising under Rule 1.7(a) is nonconsentable under Rule 1.7(b)(1)-(3). Moreover, if either the ABC and/or the MNO firm could somehow determine (despite the XYZ screen) that it had a conflict of interest under Rule 1.7 or Rule 1.9, the firm would lack the information necessary to obtain "informed consent" to the conflict from each affected client.

14. The fact that the XYZ law firm intends to limit its practice to a discrete area of the law does not avoid these infirmities. Rule 1.10(a) and (e) do not depend on whether a law firm's practice areas are broad or narrow, diverse or discrete, isolated or integrated. Conflicts are imputed among all law firms that are associated with a common lawyer or lawyers, and those firms must check for conflicts of interest. The proposed screening measures do not avoid imputation of conflicts of interest and yet do not permit law firms ABC and MNO to check for conflicts with XYZ's current and previous engagements.

Can the Imputed Conflicts Be Waived?

15. Finally, we consider the effect of Rule 1.10(d), which allows an imputation to be waived under certain circumstances. Specifically, Rule 1.10(d) provides: "A disqualification prescribed by this Rule may be waived by the affected client or former client under the conditions stated in Rule 1.7." One of those stated conditions is Rule 1.7(b)(4), which requires that "each affected client gives informed consent" to the conflict. Here, that condition cannot be satisfied because the screening measures will prevent law firms ABC and MNO from learning the names of the XYZ firm's clients and the general nature of their matters. Lacking that information, law firms ABC and MNO will be unable to obtain informed consent to any conflicts that XYZ's practice may create. Thus, Rule 1.10(d) does not permit a waiver of the imputed conflicts at issue here.

11 The Proposed N.Y. Rules of Professional Conduct (February 1, 2008) are available on the State Bar's website at http://www.nysba.org/AM/Template.cfm?Section=Committee_on_Standards_of_Attorney_Conduct_Home&Template=/CM/ContentDisplay.cfm&ContentID=4786.

CONCLUSION:

16. When two law firms are both associated with lawyers at a third firm, the conflicts of each firm are imputed to the lawyers in all three firms as if they were a single law firm. Screening, no matter how elaborate, cannot avoid that imputation. Therefore, the three law firms must conduct interrelated conflict checks as if they were one firm. The screening measures proposed here would prevent two of the law firms (ABC and MNO) from checking for conflicts and would likewise deprive those two firms of the information necessary to obtain informed consent from clients to waive the imputation of any conflicts that might exist. Limiting the practice of the firm that will be screened does not change the analysis. Accordingly, lawyers associated as partners, associates or of counsel cannot avoid the imputation of conflicts by creating a screen or by limiting the practice of one of the firms.

OPINION 877 (09/12/2011)

TOPIC: Permissible information on a law firm website.

DIGEST: A lawyer may accurately list, on his firm's web site, his former positions in other firms. The web site may also accurately quote bona fide professional ratings or comments from any ratings publication if the ratings or comments are factually supportable when published, and the lawyer obtains and confirms in writing the client's informed consent to any testimonial or endorsement with respect to a matter still pending.

RULES: 7.1(a), (b), (d) & (e); 7.5(a) & (b).

QUESTIONS:

1. A lawyer has asked two questions about what information he may post on his firm's web site:

   A. May he list, in his web site biography, his former partnership positions in other firms?

   B. May he, on the web site, quote favorable comments about his work that were made in a publication that rates lawyers and law firms?

OPINION:

Question A: May a lawyer's web site biography list his former partnership positions in other firms?

2. Rule 7.5(a) expressly provides that a lawyer may use "internet web sites" that do not violate any statute or court rule and are in accordance with Rule 7.1. Within Rule 7.1, subparagraph (a)(1) prohibits a law firm from using or disseminating advertisements that are "false, deceptive or misleading." Rule 7.1(b)(1) expressly provides that advertisements may include (among other things) information as to "public offices and teaching positions held." Rule 7.1(b)(1) does not explicitly authorize inclusion of other kinds of experience (such as former partnership positions in other firms), but in the analogous context of professional announcement cards, Rule 7.5(a)(2) more broadly authorizes such cards to state "biographical data" that is in accordance with Rule 7.1.

3. We believe that the biographical data authorized for inclusion in professional announcement cards is authorized for inclusion on law firm internet web sites as well. Lawyer advertising serves legitimate purposes of attracting and assisting potential clients, so long as such advertising is not false, deceptive or misleading. See Rule 7.1, cmt. [3]. Accurate biographical data, such as identification of former partnership positions in other firms, can be useful in carrying out those legitimate purposes.

4. Of course, references to such former partnership positions would be prohibited if they were false, deceptive or misleading. For example, it would be impermissible for the reference to former partnership positions to imply that there is a continuing relationship with the former firm, or that the lawyer's current firm is a successor firm to the lawyer's former firm, if that is not a fact, and it would be impermissible for the biographical data to imply that the former partnership position lasted longer or ended for a different reason than was actually the case.

Question B: May Mr. Doe, on his web site, quote favorable comments about his work that were made in a publication that rates lawyers and law firms?

5. A lawyer's web site may include accurate quotations from a publication about the lawyer's work if the lawyer's web site and the quotations comply with all applicable requirements of Rules 7.1 and 7.5. Under Rule 7.1(a)(1), an advertisement may not contain statements or claims that are false, deceptive or misleading. This means not only that the web site must quote the publication accurately, but also that the quotations themselves must not be false, deceptive or misleading.

6. The Rules also contain more specific requirements relevant to quotations. For example, if a quotation is a paid endorsement, the lawyer must disclose that fact. See Rule 7.1(c)(1) (lawyer advertisement shall not "include a paid endorsement . . . about a lawyer or law firm without disclosing that the person is being compensated therefor").[12] If the quoted statements describe or characterize the "quality" of the lawyer's work, Rule 7.1(d)(4) and (e)(2)-(3) require that the statements "can be factually supported by the lawyer or law firm as of the date on which the advertisement is published or disseminated," and require that the statements be accompanied by the specific disclaimer that "prior results do not guarantee a similar outcome." See N.Y. State 834 (2009) (an advertisement that contains a client testimonial requires the disclaimer concerning results set out in Rule 7.1(e)(3)). If the comments from the publication contain "a testimonial or endorsement from a client with respect to a matter still pending," then under Rule 7.1(e)(4) – which the Appellate Divisions added to the New York Rules of Professional Conduct effective April 15, 2011 – the lawyer must also obtain the client's "informed consent confirmed in writing."

7. If the quotation is from a publication that rates lawyers and law firms, however, then Rule 7.1(b)(1) may temper the requirement that the statements "can be factually supported." The last clause of Rule 7.1(b)(1) provides that an otherwise compliant advertisement may include information as to "bona fide professional ratings." We do not opine as to whether the ratings in any particular publications qualify as bona fide, but for a rating to be bona fide and nondeceptive, it should at least be unbiased, nondiscriminatory and based on some defensible method. Those standards are further spelled out in Comment [13] to Rule 7.1. If the quotations from the rating publication comply with all applicable restrictions on advertising and lawyer web sites, it is permissible to include them.

CONCLUSION:

8. A lawyer may accurately list, in his web site biography, his former partnership positions in other firms. His web site may also accurately quote bona fide professional ratings, or comments from any ratings publication, if the comments were capable of factual support when published, the required disclaimer about prior results is included, and the lawyer obtains and confirms in writing the client's informed consent to any testimonial or endorsement with respect to a matter still pending.

12 Until April 15, 2011, the quoted provision was numbered Rule 7.1(c)(2). On April 15, 2011, the New York Appellate Divisions amended Rule 7.1(c) by deleting some provisions, amending some provisions, and renumbering various subparagraphs.

OPINION 878 (09/21/2011)

TOPIC: Lawyers as mediators

DIGEST: When a lawyer serves as a mediator, under some circumstances the lawyer must reveal his or her status as lawyer and explain the import of that status to participants in the mediation.

RULES: 2.4

QUESTION:

1. When a lawyer serves as a volunteer mediator under the auspices of a community mediation service, is the lawyer permitted or required to reveal his or her status as a lawyer to the parties in mediation?

OPINION:

2. Mediators working in certain programs of "community dispute resolution" are expected to take ethical guidance from the Standards of Conduct for New York State Community Dispute Resolution Center Mediators. Those Standards are interpreted by the Mediator Ethics Advisory Committee ("MEAC"), which issues advisory ethics opinions. In MEAC Opinion # 2010-02, MEAC apparently concluded that the Standards do not require disclosure by a lawyer-mediator of his or her status as a lawyer, and perhaps even discourage such disclosure.

3. This Committee is not authorized to second-guess or comment on MEAC Opinion # 2010-02 and has no jurisdiction to interpret the Standards of Conduct for New York State Community Dispute Resolution Center Mediators. We are charged only with construing the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"), which are binding on all New York lawyers, including lawyers serving as mediators.

4. One Rule of Professional Conduct – Rule 2.4 ("Lawyer Serving as Third-Party Neutral") – specifically governs lawyers who serve as mediators. Rule 2.4 was added to our ethical standards effective April 1, 2009 – it had no equivalent in the former Code of Professional Responsibility. Rule 2.4(a) provides as follows:

> (a) A lawyer serves as a "third-party neutral" when the lawyer assists two or more persons who are not clients of the lawyer to reach a resolution of a dispute or other matter that has arisen between them. Service as a third-party neutral may include service as an arbitrator, a mediator or in such other capacity as will enable the lawyer to assist the parties to resolve the matter. [Emphasis added.]

Thus, Rule 2.4 by its express terms applies to a lawyer who is serving as a mediator.

5. Rule 2.4(b), which is the operative part of Rule 2.4 for our purposes, provides as follows:

> (b) A lawyer serving as a third-party neutral shall inform unrepresented parties that the lawyer is not representing them. When the lawyer knows or reasonably should > know that a party does not understand the lawyer's role in the matter, the lawyer shall explain the difference between the lawyer's role as a third-party neutral and a lawyer's role as one who represents a client. [Emphasis added.]

6. While Rule 2.4(b) does not explicitly require a lawyer-mediator to reveal her status as a lawyer, Rule 2.4(b) makes plain that the lawyer-mediator is ethically obligated to avoid any party's confusion or misunderstanding regarding the lawyer's limited role in the mediation process. The precise content of the required conversation, and the exact information the lawyer-mediator will have to disclose to a party about the lawyer's role, may vary from one mediation to another. However, Comment [3] to Rule 2.4 makes clear some of the important differences between lawyers as mediators and nonlawyers as mediators. Comment [3] provides as follows:

> [3] Unlike nonlawyers who serve as third-party neutrals, lawyers serving in this role may experience unique problems as a result of differences between the role of a third-party neutral and a lawyer's service as a client representative. The potential for confusion is significant when the parties are unrepresented in the process. Thus, paragraph (b) requires a lawyer-neutral to inform unrepresented parties that the lawyer is not representing them. For some parties, particularly parties who frequently use dispute-resolution processes, this information will be sufficient. For others, particularly those who are using the process for the first time, more information will be required. Where appropriate, the lawyer should inform unrepresented parties of the important differences between the lawyer's role as a third-party neutral and as a client representative, including the inapplicability of the attorney-client evidentiary privilege. The extent of disclosure required under this paragraph will depend on the particular parties involved and the subject matter of the proceeding, as well as the particular features of the dispute-resolution process selected.

7. When a lawyer-mediator follows the mandate of Rule 2.4(b) by explaining to a confused or uninformed party "the difference between the lawyer's role as a third-party neutral and a lawyer's role as one who represents a client," the explanation will usually need to include a disclosure that the mediator is a lawyer. Similarly, if the lawyer-mediator considers it "appropriate" under Comment [3] to explain the "important differences" between the lawyer's roles as mediator and as a client representative, as well as "the inapplicability of the attorney-client evidentiary privilege," these explanations likewise will usually need to include disclosure that the mediator is a lawyer. Certainly nothing in Rule 2.4 or any other Rule prohibits a lawyer-mediator from disclosing her status as a lawyer.

8. Indeed, long before the Courts added Rule 2.4 to New York's ethics rules, this Committee addressed the role of a lawyer as mediator. In N.Y. State 678 (1996), while considering whether a lawyer serving as a divorce mediator is providing legal services, we said: "Participants in divorce mediation cannot be kept unaware of a mediator's professional qualification as a lawyer. They are entitled to know the mediator's professional qualifications, and it would be deceptive for a mediator who is a lawyer to withhold that fact."

9. Thus, unless all mediating parties are represented by counsel in the mediated matter, a lawyer-mediator must explain whatever needs to be explained to assure there is no confusion about the lawyer-mediator's role and the difference between a lawyer's role on behalf of a client and a mediator's role as a neutral. If this explanation requires revealing that the lawyer is a lawyer – as we think it most often will – then the lawyer is ethically obliged to do so. If the lawyer reveals that she is a lawyer, then she should also explain the significance of that fact. And if the mediator discloses his or her status as a lawyer to any party, then the mediator should disclose his or her status as a lawyer to all parties.

CONCLUSION:

10. A lawyer-mediator's obligations under Rule 2.4(b) will in certain circumstances require the lawyer to reveal to all parties that he or she is a lawyer and to explain the significance of that fact.

OPINION 879 (09/27/2011)

TOPIC: No-contact rule as applied to lawyer acting pro se and lawyer as represented party.

DIGEST: Lawyers, whether representing themselves or being represented by their own counsel, are subject to the "no-contact rule," Rule 4.2.

RULES: 4.2(a) & (b), 8.4(c)

QUESTIONS:

1. This opinion addresses two closely related questions:

   A. May a lawyer who is representing himself or herself communicate with another party if the lawyer knows that the other party is represented by counsel?

   B. Would the answer be the same if the lawyer were represented by his or her own counsel in the matter?

OPINION:

2. Communications with persons represented by counsel are governed by Rule 4.2 ("Communication with Person Represented by Counsel") of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"). Rule 4.2, sometimes called the "no-contact" rule or "anti-contact" rule, provides, in its entirety (with emphasis added) as follows:

> (a) In representing a client, a lawyer shall not communicate about the subject of the representation with a person the lawyer knows to be represented by another lawyer in the matter, unless the lawyer has the prior consent of the other lawyer or is authorized to do so by law.
> (b) Notwithstanding the prohibitions of paragraph (a), and unless otherwise prohibited by law, a lawyer may cause a client to communicate with a represented person unless the represented person is not legally competent, and may counsel the client with respect to those communications, provided the lawyer gives reasonable advance notice to the represented person's counsel that such communications will be taking place.

3. The introductory phrase in Rule 4.2(a) – "In representing a client" – is essentially a restatement of the introductory language contained in DR 7-104 of the former New York Lawyer's Code of Professional Responsibility (the "Code"), which began: "During the course of the representation of a client . . . ." There is no material difference. But the introductory phrase is problematic. If a lawyer is representing himself in a matter, the text of Rule 4.2 does not provide a clear basis for deciding whether a lawyer who communicates with a represented party to the matter is "representing a client" (himself) or is acting purely as a party (who happens to be a lawyer in his professional life). More troubling, a lawyer who is not representing himself but has instead retained his own counsel in a matter plainly is not "representing a client" when communicating with a represented party.

4. In the Code, the application of the no-contact rule to a lawyer who was a party to a litigation matter or transaction was addressed by EC 7-18, which stated, in relevant part:

> A lawyer who is a party or who is otherwise personally involved in a legal matter or transaction, whether appearing pro se or represented by counsel, may communicate with a represented person on the subject matter of the representation pursuant to the provisions of DR 7-104(A) and (B). [Emphasis added.]

5. EC 7-18 thus expressly supported the view that the no-contact rule, in all its aspects, applied both to a lawyer representing himself in a legal matter and to a lawyer who was involved in a matter as a party represented by counsel. Thus, under EC 7-18, neither a pro se lawyer nor a represented lawyer could communicate on the subject of the representation with another party the lawyer knew to be represented by counsel unless the lawyer (a) had the prior consent of the other party's counsel or was authorized by law to do so under DR 7-104(A), or (b) gave reasonable advance notice to the represented party's counsel under DR 7-104(B).

6. The view that DR 7-104 applied to a lawyer engaged in self-representation or participating in a matter as a represented party was further supported by our observation in N.Y. State 160 (1970) that DR 7-104(A) – then newly adopted in New York – was "substantially similar to former Canon 9" of the Canons of Professional Ethics, which the ABA originally adopted in 1908.[13] Canon 9 stated as follows:

> A lawyer should not in any way communicate upon the subject of controversy with a party represented by counsel; much less should he undertake to negotiate or compromise the matter with him, but should only deal with his counsel. . . . [14]

7. Thus, Canon 9 of the Canons of Professional Ethics lacked any qualifying introductory phrase similar to that of Rule 4.2 and DR 7-104. Canon 9's application did not depend on whether a lawyer was representing a client or not. Instead, Canon 9 focused on the professional status of the lawyer (i.e., the simple fact that the lawyer was a lawyer) rather than on the lawyer's role in a particular matter (i.e., representing a client). Canon 9 thus prohibited a lawyer from attempting to communicate with a party represented by counsel whether the lawyer was representing a client or representing himself. The substantial similarity between old Canon 9 and DR 7-104(A) that we noted in N.Y. State 160 made it clear that under the Code – despite the introductory phrase in DR 7-104(A) about "the representation of a client" – the no-contact rule applied with full force to a lawyer/party whether the lawyer was representing himself or was being represented by counsel in a matter.

13 Canon 9 of the old Canons of Professional Ethics is totally unrelated to and must not be confused with Canon 9 of the Code of Professional Responsibility ("A Lawyer Should Avoid Even the Appearance of Professional Impropriety"). In the Canons of Professional Ethics, each numbered standard was called a "Canon." In the Code of Professional Responsibility, the Canons were instead broad organizing principles, and only the Disciplinary Rules set forth binding standards. The Canons in the Canons of Professional Ethics were essentially equivalent to the Disciplinary Rules, not to the Code's axiomatic Canons.

14 The remaining portion of Canon 9 stated: "It is incumbent upon the lawyer most particularly to avoid everything that may tend to mislead a party not represented by counsel, and he should not undertake to advise him as to the law." (Emphasis added.) This language is substantially similar to DR 7-104(A)(2) ("During the course of the representation of a client a lawyer shall not . . . [g]ive advice to a party who is not represented by a lawyer, other than the advice to secure counsel, if the interests of such party are . . . in conflict with the interests of the lawyer's client"). Thus, both subparagraphs of DR 7-104(A) were based closely on old Canon 9, which reinforces our view that DR 7-104(A) and its successors – including Rule 4.2 – should be interpreted in light of Canon 9.

8. Accordingly, under the Code, neither a represented lawyer nor a pro se lawyer could communicate with a counterparty that the lawyer knew to be represented by counsel unless the lawyer either (a) was authorized by law or obtained the "prior consent" of the counterparty's counsel, per DR 7-104(A), or (b) gave "reasonable advance notice" to the counterparty's counsel of his intention to communicate with the counterparty, per DR 7-104(B). The minor change in wording between the introductory phrases of Rule 4.2(a) and its predecessor, DR 7-104 ("In representing a client" vs. "During the course of the representation of a client") did not change the scope of the no-contact rule or its applicability to lawyers as pro se or represented parties.

9. When the New York State Bar Association proposed the new Rules of Professional Conduct in 2008, the version of Rule 4.2(b) proposed by the State Bar would have omitted the requirement that a lawyer give "reasonable advance notice" to a represented party's counsel before the lawyer could cause a client to communicate directly with that represented party. As explained by the Reporter's Notes, the proposed omission of the "reasonable advance notice" requirement reflected the belief "that direct client-to-client communications are often helpful in resolving disputes, and that the 'reasonable advance notice' requirement . . . creates an unnecessary obstacle that might impede such communications."[15] However, the Administrative Board of the Courts rejected the proposed deletion and returned Rule 4.2(b) to the substance of former DR 7-104(B), including the requirement of reasonable advance notice.

10. Our understanding of the introductory phrase in Rule 4.2 also seems fully consistent with Comment [1] to Rule 4.2, which explains that Rule 4.2 "contributes to the proper functioning of the legal system by protecting a person who has chosen to be represented by a lawyer in a matter against possible overreaching by other lawyers who are participating in the matter, interference by those lawyers with the client-lawyer relationship, and uncounseled disclosure of information relating to the representation." (Emphasis added.) Those policy reasons apply with equal force whether a lawyer is

"participating in the matter" while representing himself pro se, while represented by his own counsel, or while "representing a client."[16]

11. In short, DR 7-104(A) traced its origins directly to Canon 9 of the old Canons of Professional Ethics; Rule 4.2 traces its origins directly to DR 7-104; and the Administrative Board of the Courts evidently intended that Rule 4.2 should preserve the operative substance of DR 7-104. We find no indication in the legislative history of New York Rule 4.2 that the drafters or the Courts intended to change its application to lawyers as parties, whether those lawyers were representing themselves or represented by other counsel. We conclude that Rule 4.2 should be applied in a manner consistent with DR 7-104 and the policies underlying DR 7-104, which equally underlie Rule 4.2.

12. Thus, all lawyers – whether they are pro se parties or represented parties or representatives of other parties in a matter – must (unless authorized by law) secure the "prior consent" of opposing counsel under Rule 4.2(a) or give "reasonable advance notice" to opposing counsel under Rule 4.2(b) before communicating with a counterparty known to be represented by counsel. Under this interpretation of Rule 4.2, the usual rights of nonlawyer parties to engage in direct communications are outweighed by the lawyer's professional obligations to the system of justice and the goal of protecting represented parties. Our view reflects the fact that lawyers, by virtue of their professional status, have a unique responsibility to the system of justice that requires them to subordinate their personal interest in having direct communications with represented individuals unless the exacting conditions stated in Rule 4.2 are satisfied.

13. Our conclusion is consistent with the opinions of most courts and ethics committees that have addressed this issue. The cases have overwhelmingly held that a lawyer engaged in self-representation is bound by the no-contact rule, reasoning that the policies served by the rule require the lawyer

16 In considering the significance of the introductory phrase in Rule 4.2, it is useful to look at Rule 4.1, which uses the same introductory phrase as Rule 4.2 ("In the course of representing a client, a lawyer shall not knowingly make a false statement of fact or law to a third person"). Another rule that prohibits false statements is Rule 8.4(c) ("A lawyer or law firm shall not . . . engage in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation"). However, Rule 8.4(c) has no introductory phrase about "representing a client" and thus applies even when the lawyer is not representing a client – and, indeed, even when the lawyer is not practicing law. Why do Rules 4.1 and 4.2 include introductory language about representing a client while Rule 8.4(c) does not? The introductory phrases in Rules 4.1 and 4.2 can best be understood in light of their common history. Both rules were derived from principles first expressed in the ABA's 1908 Canons of Professional Ethics, where their application was not limited to the representation of a client.

Decades later, when the 1908 Canons were superseded by the Code of Professional Responsibility, both the rule prohibiting dishonest conduct in litigation and the rule prohibiting communications with represented parties were placed under a newly crafted Canon 7, which provided: "A Lawyer Should Represent a Client Zealously Within the Bounds of the Law." The rules organized under Canon 7 generally explained ways in which a lawyer's zeal in representing a client should be tempered by the lawyer's professional obligations to the system of justice. Seen in this context, the introductory phrases about representing clients merely reflected the essential admonition of Canon 7 that a lawyer should act within the bounds of the law even when representing a client – and even when representing the client zealously. The introductory phrases were not intended to limit application of the rules, but rather reflected the tension between zealous representation and the bounds of the law that was the organizing principle of Canon 7.

When the adoption of the new Rules of Professional Conduct eliminated the organizational function of old Canon 7 in the Code of Professional Responsibility, the introductory phrases left over from Canon 7 could have been deleted. Their retention created the ambiguity that gives rise to the issue before us now. See, e.g., Matter of Haley, 126 P.3d 1262, 1271-72 (Wash. 2006) (concluding that Rule 4.2(a) prohibits a lawyer who is representing himself from contacting another party the lawyer knows to be represented by counsel, but applying this interpretation "prospectively only" because Rule 4.2(a) is "impermissibly vague" on this point). Our opinion today resolves that ambiguity by making clear that lawyers who are involved in a matter as parties are subject to the no-contact rule.

to be treated as a lawyer rather than as a nonlawyer party. For example, in In re Schaefer, 25 P.3d 191, 199 (Nev. 2001), the court said: "The lawyer still has an advantage over the average layperson, and the integrity of the relationship between the represented person and counsel is not entitled to less protection merely because the lawyer is appearing pro se. See also Runsvold v. Idaho State Bar, 925 P.2d 1118 (Idaho 1996) (the phrase "in representing a client" applies when an attorney is acting pro se "because this interpretation better effectuates the purpose" of Rule 4.2); In re Segall, 509 N.E.2d 988 (Ill. 1987) ("an attorney who is himself a party to the litigation represents himself when he contacts an opposing party"); Vickery v. Comm'n for Lawyer Discipline, 5 S.W.3d 241 (Tex. Ct. App. 1999) ("we hold that an attorney's designation of counsel of record does not . . . preclude the application of Rule 4.02(a) to his actions in contacting an opposing party"); Sandstrom v. Sandstrom, 880 P.2d 103 (Wyo. 1994) ("A party, having employed counsel to act as an intermediary between himself and opposing counsel, does not lose the protection of the rule merely because opposing counsel is also a party to the litigation"); In re Haley, 126 P.3d 1262 (Wash. 2006) (Rule 4.2 "prohibits a lawyer who is representing his own interests in a matter from contacting another party whom he knows to be represented by counsel").

14. Ethics opinions have likewise generally concluded that a lawyer engaged in self-representation is bound by the no-contact rule. See, e.g., D.C. Opinion 258 (1995); Hawaii Opinion 44 (2003); Illinois Opinion 96-09 (1997); Rhode Island Opinion 2002-04 (2002). See generally Stephen J. Langs, Note, Legal Ethics: The Question of Ex Parte Communications and Pro Se Lawyers Under Model Rule 4.2—Hey, Can We Talk?, 19 W. New Eng. L. Rev. 421 (1997).

15. Contrary authority is sparse. In New York, we are aware of only one ethics opinion, N.Y. City 81-8 (1981), that refused to apply the no-contact rule to a lawyer representing himself. That opinion, however, was decided before EC 7-18 was adopted, and the opinion was effectively overruled by N.Y. City 2011-1 (2011), which determined that a lawyer representing herself may not contact a former client to discuss the previous representation without obtaining the prior consent of successor counsel. Another contrary authority is the official "Discussion" following California Rule 2-100, which states that the no-contact rule does not apply to a self-represented lawyer because such a lawyer "has independent rights as a party which should not be abrogated because of his or her professional status." But California is alone in taking that position and we do not agree with it.

16. Regarding case law, we know of only one case disagreeing with our view. That case, Pinsky v. Statewide Grievance Committee, 578 A.2d 1075 (Conn. 1990), held that a lawyer acting on his own behalf is not "representing a client" and is therefore not subject to Rule 4.2(a). But Pinsky has not been followed elsewhere and was expressly rejected by the Supreme Court of North Dakota in In re Disciplinary Action Against Lucas, 789 N.W.2d 73 (N.D. 2010). The Lucas court, which reviewed the current state of the law, explained as follows:

> . . . Most courts have rejected Pinsky, reasoning "the policies underlying [Rule 4.2] are better served by extending the restriction to lawyers acting pro se." In re Haley, 156 Wash.2d 324, 126 P.3d 1262, 1267 (2006) (discussing prior authority); see also Runsvold v. Idaho State Bar, 129 Idaho 419, 925 P.2d 1118, 1120 (1996) ("We thus construe the phrase of Rule 4.2, 'in representing a client' to include the situation in which an attorney is acting pro se because this interpretation better effectuates the pur> pose of Rule 4.2."). We join the majority of courts in rejecting the rationale of the court in Pinsky.

> We conclude that the reasoning of courts in In re Haley and Runsvold is more persuasive than Pinsky. . . . We therefore adopt the hearing panel's conclusion that Rule 4.2 applies to attorneys representing themselves.

17. If a lawyer is discharged, the no-contact rule is similarly applicable to a lawyer's communications with the former client on the lawyer's own behalf once the client has engaged successor counsel. See N.Y. City 2011-1 (2011) (Rule 4.2 prohibits a lawyer from contacting a former client to discuss matters concerning the prior representation absent prior consent of successor counsel); Illinois Opinion 96-09 (discharged lawyer seeking fees from former client must comply with Rule 4.2); Rhode Island Opinion 2002-04 (after successor counsel writes to original lawyer asking for file and encloses signed request from client, original lawyer may not contact former client without successor counsel's permission).

18. Even when a lawyer is permitted to communicate with a counterparty (e.g., with the prior consent of opposing counsel or authorized by law to do so), the lawyer should keep in mind the broad goals underlying the no-contact rule, whose main purpose is to protect the represented party. See Rule 4.2, cmt. [1]. Thus, when communicating with a represented counterparty, a lawyer (a) must avoid overreaching and abusive, harassing, or unfair conduct toward the represented person, (b) must not undermine the counterparty's relationship with his or her counsel, and (c) must not delve into privileged communications or protected information. See Rule 4.2, cmts. [11] and [12].

19. Finally, the lawyer should be mindful that, as a member of the Bar, whether or not performing legal services and whether represented by another lawyer, representing himself, or representing a client, a lawyer dealing with a counterparty must not engage in "conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation." Rule 8.4(c).

CONCLUSION:

20. When a lawyer is representing himself pro se or is being represented by his own counsel with respect to a matter, the lawyer's direct communications with a counterparty are governed by the no-contact rule, Rule 4.2. Unless authorized by law, the lawyer must not engage in direct communications with a party the lawyer knows to be represented by counsel without securing the prior consent of the represented party's counsel under Rule 4.2(a) or providing opposing counsel with reasonable advance notice under Rule 4.2(b).

OPINION 880 (10/06/2011)

TOPIC: Prohibition of contingent fees in criminal matters; violations of the Vehicle and Traffic Law; refund of legal fees

DIGEST: Prohibition of contingent fees in criminal matters is inapplicable to simple traffic infractions which are expressly deemed noncriminal; violations of the Vehicle and Traffic Law which constitute misdemeanors or felonies are subject to the prohibition on contingent fees. In agreements to provide legal services for such violations and in advertising related thereto, it must be clear that contingent fees are not available with respect to misdemeanor or felony charges. In criminal matters, an agreement to refund a fee paid in advance upon the occurrence of a certain outcome may be deemed a prohibited contingent fee

RULES: 1.5(d)(1) and (c); 7.1(a)

QUESTION:

1. May a lawyer offer to refund all legal fees paid by a client in connection with proceedings for violations of the Vehicle and Traffic Law if the charges are not dismissed or reduced?

OPINION:

2. Rule 1.5(d) of the Rules of Professional Conduct states:

> "A lawyer shall not enter into an arrangement for, charge or collect:
> (1) a contingent fee for representing a defendant in a criminal matter . . . ."

3. The question posed requires us to interpret the terms "contingent fee" and "criminal matter" within the meaning of Rule 1.5(d).

4. As to the meaning of "contingent fee," the question is whether that term includes a fee received by a lawyer on an understanding that the client may be entitled to a refund of the fee if the charges are not dismissed or reduced. Of course in some circumstances, refund of fees is clearly contemplated by the rules. See Rule 1.16(e) (obligating lawyer to refund "any part of a fee paid in advance that has not been earned"). We believe that when entitlement to a refund depends on the outcome of the matter, then the arrangement must comply with the rules on contingency fees. To trigger those rules, it is not necessary that the stated contingency occur prior to payment of the fee. The common understanding of a contingent fee envisions payment at the conclusion of a matter. However, fees for criminal defense work are typically paid in advance. To construe the term to apply only to fees paid subsequent to the contingency would render the traditional prohibition too easily evaded and virtually meaningless in many cases.

5. Interpreting the term "criminal matter," we first turn to the New York State Vehicle and Traffic Law ("VTL") for guidance. The VTL proscribes a wide variety of conduct including traffic infractions, misdemeanors and felonies. See, e.g., VTL § 1193 (providing that driving while ability impaired is a traffic infraction or misdemeanor, and driving while intoxicated is a misdemeanor or felony, depending on factors including prior record). Simple "traffic infractions" (including most tickets for speeding) are expressly designated as noncriminal. VTL § 155 ("A traffic infraction is not a crime and the punishment imposed therefor shall not be deemed for any purpose a penal or criminal punishment").

6. Although the VTL applies throughout the State, local regulations provide for considerable variation in the type of conduct proscribed as well as the manner in which violations are prosecuted. Noncriminal traffic infractions are most commonly addressed by the local city, town or village courts, but in New York City, Buffalo, Rochester and the towns of Babylon, Brookhaven, Huntington, Islip and Smithtown in Suffolk County, they are heard by the Traffic Violations Bureau ("TVB") of the State's Department of Motor Vehicles. Violations heard by the TVB are purely civil administrative matters without the involvement of any local city, town or village court or the public prosecutor. Some local courts hearing simple traffic infractions are designated as "criminal courts" and may impose short periods of incarceration. In many local courts, plea bargains are usually negotiated by the issuing officer; however, where the issuing officer is a State Trooper, the plea is negotiated with a representative from the District Attorney's office who, if the negotiations fail, will proceed to trial.

7. The policy underlying Rule 1.5(d) reflects the profession's aversion to allowing defense counsel to have a financial interest in the outcome of a criminal case. See Former Code of Professional Responsibility DR 2-106(C)(1) (prohibiting a "contingent fee for representing a defendant in a criminal case"); see also, e.g., District of Columbia Opinion 262 (1995) (allowing contingent fee in coram nobis proceeding after defendant had been released, and reviewing various policy arguments underlying the traditional prohibition); Charles W. Wolfram, Modern Legal Ethics, § 9.4.1, at 526-28 (1986); Standards Relating to the Prosecution and Defense Function: The Defense Function § 3.3(e) (ABA 1971); Geoffrey C. Hazard, Jr. & Susan P. Koniak, The Law and Ethics of Lawyering at 508 (1990); Peter Lushing, The Fall and Rise of the Criminal Contingent Fee, 82 J. Crim. L. & Criminology at 498 (1991); Pamela S. Karlan, Contingent Fees and Criminal Cases, 93 Colum. L. Rev. 595 (April, 1993).

8. When a matter is essentially civil, albeit having some relation to the penal law or prior criminal proceedings, the authorities have long recognized that the ban on contingent fees is inapplicable. Thus it has been deemed permissible to agree that a lawyer's fee for representing the accused in defense of certain criminal charges will be satisfied by his or her contingent fee for representing that same client as the plaintiff in a related civil action seeking damages for false arrest. Illinois Opinion 84-9 (1985); see also, e.g., Indiana Opinion 4 (1991); N.Y. City 1986-3 (fee for defense of ancillary criminal case may be tied to success in negligence action).

9. Similarly, the ban on contingent fees in criminal matters has been held inapplicable to related administrative or civil proceedings. See, e.g., Connecticut Inf. Opinion 91-1 (1991) (license revocation proceeding following client's arrest for drunk driving); Kansas Opinion 96-10 (1997) (driver's license revocation proceeding); Pennsylvania Opinion 92-183 (1993) (habeas corpus petition to have client transferred to a different prison); Nassau County Opinion 90-12 (civil action for forfeiture of proceeds of crime); Michigan Inf. Opinion RI-269 (1996) (seizure of property by government); Virginia Opinion 1748 (2000) (civil forfeiture proceeding).

10. In light of the foregoing, we believe that when the VTL defines the initial charge as a noncriminal traffic infraction, the proceedings should not be deemed a "criminal matter" within the meaning of Rule 1.5(d). This result should obtain regardless of whether the venue is denominated a "criminal court," whether the District Attorney's office is involved in the proceedings, or whether the penalty may involve a period of incarceration. When the initial charge constitutes a misdemeanor or a felony, however, the proceedings should be deemed a "criminal matter" within the proscription of the Rule. In such cases, a contingent fee or refund is impermissible even if the lawyer may, or ultimately does, obtain a reduction to noncriminal charges.

11. We are aware of one recent ethics opinion which would apply the traditional ban to so-called "quasi-criminal matters" including traffic tickets. In New Jersey Opinion 717 (2010), the New Jersey Advisory Committee on Professional Ethics determined that its version of the rule should be interpreted to apply to "quasi-criminal matters in municipal court, including motor vehicle cases." In so holding, the Advisory Committee observed the procedural and jurisdictional similarities between clearly criminal matters and those before its municipal courts in hearing "non-indictable and motor vehicle offenses." The question before us concerns noncriminal violations charged under the New York VTL and the procedures for resolving such charges. In that context, for the reasons discussed above, we reach a different result. Moreover, we note that the Advisory Committee recognized that the potential conflict addressed by the prohibition on contingency fees "is not present in many municipal court matters and the [rule against contingency fees in criminal cases] may be fairly criticized as overbroad. Accordingly, the Committee has invited the Supreme Court, in its administrative capacity, to evaluate [that rule] and consider whether a revision would be appropriate." N.J. Opinion 717.

12. Rule 1.5(c) states: "A fee may be contingent on the outcome of the matter for which the service is rendered, except in a matter in which a contingent fee is prohibited by paragraph (d) or other law." But contingency fee arrangements must meet certain standards. For example, when the fee is contingent, Rule 1.5(c) further requires that the fee agreement be in writing and "clearly notify the client of any expenses for which the client will be liable regardless of whether the client is the prevailing party."

13. Rule 7.1(a) provides: "A lawyer or law firm shall not use or disseminate or participate in the use or dissemination of any advertisement that: (1) contains statements or claims that are false, deceptive or misleading; or (2) violates a Rule."

14. Together, Rules 1.5(c) and 7.1(a) require that in contingent-fee agreements to provide representation in connection with violations of the VTL, and in advertising relating thereto, it must be clear that contingent fees (or, as in the question posed, "refunds") are not available with respect to misdemeanor or felony charges.

CONCLUSION:

15. The prohibition on contingent fees in criminal matters is inapplicable to initial charges of simple traffic infractions which are expressly deemed noncriminal under the Vehicle and Traffic Law. Charged violations of the VTL which constitute misdemeanors or felonies are, however, subject to the prohibition. In agreements to provide legal services for violations of the VTL and in advertising related thereto, it must be clear that contingent fees are not available with respect to misdemeanor or felony charges. In a criminal matter, an agreement to refund a fee paid in advance depending on the outcome may be deemed a prohibited contingent fee.

OPINION 881 (10/06/2011)

TOPIC: Spouses sharing office facilities.

DIGEST: A sole practitioner may not use the address and telephone number of her spouse's law firm as contact information if the telephone is answered with the name of the spouse's firm unless steps are taken to avoid the misleading impression that the sole practitioner is part of the spouse's firm. However, the sole practitioner's occasional use of the conference room and telephone lines at her spouse's firm does not, by itself, render her "associated in" her spouse's law firm for purposes of conflicts of interest.

RULES: 1.0(h), 1.10(a), 7.1(a), 7.5(b)

QUESTION:

1. The inquirer is a sole practitioner in a small community. She practices law from home but occasionally uses the conference room and telephone lines at her spouse's law firm for convenience. She raises two questions:

2. A. May a sole practitioner use the address and telephone number of her spouse's law firm as her own contact information, on her letterhead and elsewhere, if the telephone is answered with the name of the spouse's firm?

   B. Will the sole practitioner's occasional use of her spouse's conference room and telephone lines cause her to be "associated with" her spouse's law firm for purposes of imputation of conflicts of interest?

OPINION

Question A: May the Sole Practitioner Use the Address and Telephone Number of Her Spouse's Law Firm?

3. In the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"), Rule 7.1(a) prohibits a lawyer from engaging in misleading public communications about the lawyer for the purpose of seeking retention by prospective clients, and Rule 7.5(b) prohibits a lawyer from practicing under a misleading firm name. We are told that the telephone at the spouse's firm is answered with the name of the spouse's firm. Thus, a client or prospective client calling the sole practitioner would be greeted with the name of the spouse's firm, not the name of the sole practitioner. If the firm's switchboard operator or the firm's automated answering message fails to clarify that the sole practitioner is not associated with the firm, but instead forwards the call to the sole practitioner, or takes a message for her, or simply states that the sole practitioner is unavailable, then the caller would likely be misled into believing that the sole practitioner is part of the spouse's firm. And if the sole practitioner's name is added to the name of the spouse's firm when the telephone is answered, that might violate Rule 7.5(c), which provides that lawyers "shall not hold themselves out as having a partnership with one or more other lawyers unless they are in fact partners."

4. The use of the firm address by itself would not necessarily create the same misleading perception, but it would be improper for the sole practitioner to use both the address and telephone number of the spouse's firm as if they were the inquiring lawyer's own when, in truth, they are not. We conclude that the inquirer's use of the spouse's phone number as contact information, without clarification, is misleading to clients and others. The spousal relationship in a small community could only compound the confusion, especially if the inquirer and the inquirer's spouse use the same last name. As a better practice, the inquirer should consider using a separate telephone number (rather than the spouse's telephone number) to avoid confusion.

5. If the sole practitioner lists the telephone number and address of her spouse's firm on her letterhead, that could present another issue for the inquirer. Rule 7.5(a), whose predecessor in the Code was DR 2-102(A), provides as follows:

> (a) A lawyer or law firm may use internet web sites, professional cards, professional announcement cards, office signs, letterheads or similar professional notices or devices, provided the same do not violate any statute or court rule and are in accordance with Rule 7.1 . . . .

6. In N.Y. State 546 (1982), we addressed the circumstances under which a law firm could list a "branch office" address for an office that was staffed only occasionally. Applying DR 2-101(A) and DR 2-102(A), we said:

> [W]e believe that a law firm listing an office on its letterhead must do more than staff that office from time to time unless that limitation on staffing is made clear. There is, we believe, an implied representation from such listing that the firm has made arrangements to respond in a timely fashion to all inquiries addressed to that office, to provide legal services from that office as the need may arise, and hold meetings there. If the firm has not made such arrangements, it cannot list its branch office without some appropriate disclaimer indicating the limited hours of its operation.

7. By listing the address and telephone number of her spouse's law firm on her letterhead, the sole practitioner is making an implied representation that she has made arrangements for her spouse's firm "to respond in a timely fashion to all inquiries [to the sole practitioner] addressed to that office," and that she herself will "provide legal services from that office as the need may arise" and "hold meetings there." We do not know whether the sole practitioner has made those arrangements and commitments. If she has, then she may use her spouse's office address and telephone number as her own, provided that the sole practitioner also arranges for the person or machine that answers the telephone at the spouse's law firm to clarify that the sole practitioner is not associated with the firm (or arranges for the phone to be answered with a neutral phrase such as "law offices" without any names, or takes other steps to avoid the misleading impression that the sole practitioner is part of the spouse's firm).

8. If the sole practitioner has not made such arrangements and commitments, however, then putting her spouse's law firm address and telephone number on her own letterhead would violate Rule 7.5(a) without some appropriate disclaimer indicating the limited availability of that office (e.g., saying "By appointment only" or listing specific hours when she is available at that address). Without such a disclaimer, listing the spouse's law office address would be misleading, and thus would not be "in accordance with Rule 7.1," which prohibits false, deceptive or misleading communications.

Question B: Is the Sole Practitioner "Associated With" Her Spouse's Law Firm for Purposes of Conflict Imputation?

9. Rule 1.10(a), New York's basic rule on the imputation of conflicts of interest, provides as follows:

> While lawyers are associated in a firm, none of them shall knowingly represent a client when any one of them practicing alone would be prohibited from doing so by Rule 1.7, 1.8 or 1.9, except as otherwise provided therein.

10. Whether a particular arrangement between lawyers, be it one for office sharing or some other form of coordination, makes those lawyers "associated in" a single "firm" for conflicts purposes is a fact-intensive inquiry. Rule 1.0(h), in the Terminology section of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct, provides that a "firm" or "law firm" "includes, but is not limited to, a lawyer or lawyers in a law partnership, professional corporation, sole proprietorship or other association authorized to practice law . . . ." (Emphasis added).

11. Comment [2] to Rule 1.0 elaborates by providing, in relevant part, as follows:

> [2] Whether two or more lawyers constitute a firm . . . will depend on the specific facts. For example, two practitioners who share office space and occasionally consult or assist each other ordinarily would not be regarded as constituting a firm. However, if they present themselves to the public in a way that suggests that they are a firm or conduct themselves as a firm, they should be regarded as a firm for purposes of the Rules. The terms of any formal agreement between associated lawyers are relevant in determining whether they are a firm, as is the fact that they have mutual access to information concerning the clients they serve. Furthermore, it is relevant in doubtful cases to consider the underlying purpose of the Rule that is involved. For example, a group of lawyers could be regarded as a firm for purposes of determining whether a conflict of interest exists but not for application of the advertising rules.

12. We do not believe that the sole practitioner's occasional use of her spouse's telephone lines or conference space by themselves render the inquirer "associated in" the spouse's firm for purposes of the conflicts imputation rule, Rule 1.10(a). See N.Y. State 715 (1999) (noting that "lawyers who share office space but are not in the same firm have been deemed to be 'associated' in a firm for purposes of the conflicts rules and vicarious disqualification rules," but also setting forth guidelines for avoiding the conflicts problem). However, our conclusion would be different if they "present themselves to the public in a way that suggests that they are a firm or conduct themselves as a firm," because in that case, per Comment [2], "they should be regarded as a firm for purposes of the Rules."

CONCLUSION

13. A lawyer who occasionally uses the conference room and telephone lines at her spouse's law firm may not use the address and telephone number of the spouse's law firm as contact information if the telephone is answered with the name of the spouse's firm, unless steps are taken to avoid the misleading impression that the sole practitioner is part of the spouse's firm. The sole practitioner's occasional use of her spouse's telephone lines or conference space does not, by itself, render the inquirer "associated in" the spouse's firm for purposes of the rule on imputation of conflicts.

OPINION 882 (10/14/2011)

TOPIC: Lawyer's participation in residential real estate transaction that includes both a "seller's concession" and an equivalent "gross-up" in the sales price

DIGEST: If the sales price in a residential real estate transaction has been "grossed-up" in exchange for a "seller's concession," all transaction documents containing the grossed-up sales price must disclose that the sales price has been increased by a sum equal to the seller's concession.

RULES: 8.4(c).

QUESTION:

1. May a lawyer ethically participate in a residential real estate transaction if the sales contract, the HUD-1 Settlement Statement, the transfer tax return, and any other documents that contain the sales price all disclose both that the amount of the sales price has been increased ("grossed-up") and that the amount of the increase equals the amount of a "seller's concession"?

FACTS:

2. Seller's attorney has been presented with a contract for the sale of a single-family home for $306,000, with a mortgage contingency clause for $290,700, representing 95% financing. The contract also contains a provision for a "seller's concession" (i.e., a reduction in the sales price)[17] of $6,000. The seller's concession on its face requires the seller to pay $6,000 of buyer's closing costs.

3. In reality, however, the seller will not pay the buyer's closing costs. Rather, the sales contract expressly states that the sales price has been increased ("grossed-up") by $6,000, a sum equal to the seller's concession regarding the buyer's closing costs. The contract thus clearly indicates that the net price the seller agreed to receive was $300,000. Similar disclosures, which show both the seller's concession and the equivalent gross-up in the sales price, are set forth in the HUD-1 Settlement Statement, the Real Property Transfer Tax Return, the Real Property Transfer Report and all other documents stating the sales price in connection with the sale of the real property. The inquiring lawyer wants to know whether it is ethical for a New York lawyer to participate in the transaction under these circumstances.

OPINION:

4. In N.Y. State 817 (2007) this Committee opined that a lawyer's participation in a residential real estate transaction that includes both a "seller's concession" and a "grossed up" (increased) sales price is ethically prohibited unless the gross-up is disclosed in the transaction documents. That opinion did not hold that a seller's concession or gross up was improper. Rather, the opinion held that full disclosure of the gross-up in the transaction documents was necessary to avoid a misrepresentation regarding the amount of the purchase price.

17 'The existing federal government policy regarding seller's concessions is found in U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development ("HUD") Handbook 4155.1, § 2.A.3 (available online at http://www.fhaoutreach.gov/FHAHandbook/prod/infomap.asp?address=4155-1.2.A.3), and in HUD Handbook 4155.2, § 4.8 (available online at http://www.fhaoutreach.gov/FHAHandbook/prod/infomap.asp?address=4155-2.4.8). HUD apparently has not adopted any provisions addressing the "gross-up" of the sales price in response to a seller's concession; the HUD regulations discussing sellers' concessions are silent as to gross-ups.

5. In essence, we concluded in N.Y. State 817 that it is a misrepresentation under DR 1-102(A)(4) (the predecessor to Rule 8.4(c)) for the transaction documents in a residential real estate transaction either to contain an untrue statement of a material fact or to omit a material fact where the untrue statement or the material omission makes the statements contained in the transaction documents materially misleading.

6. A statement may be literally true with respect to the facts stated, but may fail to include other facts necessary to prevent a false implication, and a "failure to disclose is generally considered as much a misrepresentation as a false affirmative statement." U.S. Express, Inc. v. Intercargo Ins. Co., 841 F. Supp. 1328, 1337 (E.D.N.Y. 1994). An assertion need not be fraudulent to be a misrepresentation. Disclosing a seller's concession without disclosing a matching gross-up in the sales price produces a half-truth, which is a form of misrepresentation within the meaning of Rule 8.4(c).

7. Our opinion in N.Y. State 817, at ¶ 14, makes this conclusion abundantly clear. We stated as follows:

> [A] lawyer may not ethically participate in such a "gross-up" of the actual purchase price and concomitant seller's concession unless there is neither deception nor misrepresentation at work in a transaction and its predictable consequences. At a minimum this means that the gross-up (and not merely the grossed-up purchase price) must be disclosed in the transaction documents. We are persuaded that merely reporting "a seller's concession" may imply either that the seller has agreed to reduce the purchase price he or she would otherwise have obtained or that the reported sales price is the actual price of the property, less certain costs the seller has agreed to pay. If neither of these is the case, then reporting a concession, without more, is misleading under DR 1-102 [now Rule 8.4].

8. In reaching this conclusion we were aware of New Jersey Opinion 710 (2006) and its December 22, 2006 clarification.[18] See N.Y. State 817 nn. 4 & 8. We are also aware that after we issued N.Y. State 817, a further clarification of New Jersey Opinion 710 was released.[19] Nothing contained in New Jersey Opinion 710 or the two subsequent clarifications is inconsistent with N.Y. State 817 or with this opinion.

9. We have been advised that, in the circumstances addressed in our opinion here, the mortgagee bank is generally furnished with copies of the following documents: (i) the contract of sale with its riders and addenda (if any), (ii) the HUD-1 Settlement Statement, (iii) the closing statement, (iv) the mortgage, (v) the note, (vi) a mortgage title policy, and (vii) the deed. We assume that the real property will be assessed based upon the $306,000 "disclosed" sales price, not the $300,000 actual price,

18 The December 22, 2006 clarification of N.J. Op. 710 (2006) is available at 187 N.J.L.J 42 (2007) and at http://www.judiciary.state.nj.us/notices/2006/n061222a.htm.

19 The further clarification of N.J. Advisory Op. 710 after we issued N.Y. State 817 is available at 193 N.J. 419, 939 A. 2d 794 (2008).

unless the documents make clear to the assessor that the true sales price was $300,000. See RP-5217 Real Property Transfer Report Instructions ¶ 13 (requiring that the seller's concession be deducted to reach the actual or full sales price).

10. The factual pattern described in this opinion is unlike the circumstance where the seller actually bears an economic cost equivalent to the concession. For example, if a building inspection discloses a defect in the structure (e.g., a leaky roof) that will require the buyer to expend $6,000 in remediation costs, the seller may reduce the sales price by $6,000. Thus, the initially agreed sales price of $300,000 would be reduced to $294,000 and would not be grossed-up by a like amount. This is a distinction with a difference. In the situation we address, in contrast, the "gross-up" in the sales price to offset the seller's supposed concession could well be characterized as a subterfuge. It does not change the economic result of the transaction for the seller. As stated in LaSalle Bank, N.A. v. Shearon, 23 Misc. 2d 959, 964-65, 881 N.Y.S. 599, 603 (Richmond Cty. Sup. Ct. 2009):

> The term seller's concession implies that at the time of closing the seller is conceding a certain amount of the purchase price to enable the purchaser to complete the purchase. Using the facts presented in this case, a seller could concede or reduce an amount of the purchase price in order to pay for a portion of the purchase price and/or the closing expenses. But a seller's concession, as it is utilized in this transaction, is a misnomer with no foundation in logic or mathematics because the seller concedes nothing to the purchasers. In this case, the sellers inflated the price of their home from $335,000 to $355,100 to allow the Shearons [the buyers] to borrow additional funds to close the transaction. The sellers conceded nothing other than to act as coconspirators to circumvent the Banking Law restrictions on the closing costs to mortgage ratios and to manipulate the public records of the true sales prices and market data.

11. The problem is not the seller's concession in the abstract. Many seller's concessions are legitimate. The problem here is the matching "gross up" of the sales price, which effectively wipes out the seller's concession. If a buyer has to pay $6,000 to get a $6,000 discount, then the true sales price has not changed. Thus, a gross up, if not expressly disclosed as such, is a misrepresentation and is proscribed by Rule 8.4(c). Consequently, if a lawyer participates in a real estate transaction in which the lawyer knows (or should know)[20] that the transaction documents containing the grossed-up sales price do not expressly disclose that the sales price was increased by the same amount as the seller's concession, the lawyer violates Rules 8.4(c). The fact that the practice may be widespread does not authorize an attorney to participate in the misrepresentation. The Rule is equally applicable to the buyer's attorney, the seller's attorney, and the lender's attorney.

Even where the seller's concession and matching gross-up are suggested by a mortgage broker, a loan officer, or some other employee at the mortgage bank, the lawyer is not relieved from making the necessary disclosures. Disclosure may be even more important in that situation because the lender's representative – the very person who might be expected to detect a misrepresentation (the supposedly increased sales price that is fully offset by an unexplained seller's concession) – is encouraging the misrepresentation. No function other than to misrepresent the purchase price can be ascribed to a gross–up equal to an unexplained seller's concession. A lawyer may not participate in that misrepresentation no matter who suggested it.

20 Rule 1.0(k) provides as follows:

> "Knowingly," "known," "know," or "knows" denotes actual knowledge of the fact in question. A person's knowledge may be inferred from circumstances.

A lawyer "should know" a fact when it can be readily inferred from the circumstances.

12. Essentially, the inquiry poses a simple question: are the Rules of Professional Conduct violated when a seller, buyer, lender, and their attorneys engage in the device of a seller's concession accompanied by a like increase in the purchase price that create a misrepresentation? We conclude that the Rules are violated. And the violation is not without consequences. The misrepresentation in the sales price (treating the grossed-up price as the true sales price) may mislead tax assessors, real estate appraisers, and mortgage investors. However, if all transaction documents disclose that the gross up is an increase in price equivalent to the seller's concession, then there is no misrepresentation – and no ethical violation – because everyone later in the chain of mortgage, title, or interest has the information at hand to understand the true sales price.

13. Applying these principles to the facts we have been given, we conclude that an attorney may ethically participate in a real estate transaction where the sales price is grossed-up by an amount equal to a corresponding seller's concession if the amount of the gross-up and the amount of the seller's concession are expressly and meaningfully disclosed in all documents that state the sales price, including but not limited to the contract of sale, the HUD-1 Settlement Statement, and all other documents that the attorneys prepare, review or approve.

14. A seller's concession is not per se inappropriate. The vice of the seller's concession here is the misrepresentation resulting from lack of disclosure that the buyer agreed to the grossed-up sales price solely in exchange for the seller's "concession." The misrepresentation would be canceled by meaningful express disclosure of the true nature of the transaction. Thus, where all documents that refer to the sales price also expressly state that the sales price has been increased by a sum equivalent to the seller's concession, the lawyer's ethical duty has been satisfied. For example, a lawyer could ethically participate in a residential real estate transaction where the sales contract, the HUD-1 Settlement Statement, the transfer tax return and any other documents that contain the sales price each contain the following statement (or a substantially similar statement): "The sales price has been increased by a sum equal to the seller's concession."

15. We are aware that when the transaction documents accurately disclose the connection between the gross-up of the sales price and the seller's concession, some banks or other lenders may be unwilling or unable to approve the amount of mortgage money a buyer needs. That does not change our opinion. Under Rule 8.4(c), lawyers may not engage in conduct involving misrepresentation. Whether lenders wish to participate in transactions where the transaction documents meaningfully disclose the connection between the gross-up and the seller's concession is a matter for the lenders and their regulators. Whether lawyers may participate in such transactions when the documents do not meaningfully disclose the connection between the gross-up and the seller's concession is a matter for the Rules of Professional Conduct.

CONCLUSION

16. We conclude that Rule 8.4(c) does not permit lawyers to participate in residential real estate transactions involving a grossed-up sales price that was exchanged for an equivalent seller's concession unless all documents stating the grossed-up sales price also disclose that the sales price has been increased by the amount of the seller's concession. Conversely, when a residential real estate transaction involves both a seller's concession and a grossed-up sales price, but each document stating the grossed-up sales price also discloses that the sales price has been increased by a sum equal to the seller's concession, there is no misrepresentation, and therefore no ethical violation.

DISSENT:

17. A minority of the Committee disagrees with the conclusion in this opinion that a disclosure of more than the fact of the seller's concession is necessary. The minority believes that the existence of the federal guidelines cited in footnote 17, which permit, within certain defined limits, seller's concessions that provide a benefit to buyers in connection with their financing without altering the required loan-to-value ratio, strongly indicates that the industry as a whole is familiar with the practice of financing a buyer's closing costs. There is no evidence that tax assessors, real estate appraisers or mortgage investors are misled where a seller's concession – inherently a reduction in the amount the seller receives – is disclosed in the various transaction documents. It makes no economic or ethical difference, in the minority's view, whether such a concession is agreed upon as part of the initial price discussion or as part of a later "gross-up" of the sales price.

OPINION 883 (10/27/2011)

TOPIC: Attorney advertisement; fictitious law firm

DIGEST: An attorney advertisement may include the portrayal of a fictitious law firm so long as it is not misleading as to the association of lawyers in the advertiser's firm.

RULES: 7.1(c).

QUESTION:

1. May an attorney advertisement include the portrayal of a fictitious law firm, such as the portrayal of an argument against fictitious opposing counsel?

OPINION:

2. Rule 7.1(c)(2) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") states that an attorney advertisement may not "include the portrayal of a fictitious law firm, the use of a fictitious name to refer to lawyers not associated together in a law firm, or otherwise imply that lawyers are associated in a law firm if that is not the case."

3. Strictly read, the rule would appear to bar portrayal of a fictitious law firm in any form, including, for example, an advertisement depicting the advertising lawyer opposing a fictitious adversary firm or in other situations where the depiction was not misleading as to the advertiser's practice. The word "otherwise" in the final clause of the rule, however, suggests a narrower reading: that portrayals of a fictitious law firm are prohibited only if they imply that lawyers are associated in a law firm with the advertising lawyer, or are part of the advertising law firm, if that is not the case. We believe this narrower reading best corresponds with the purpose of the rule, which is to bar advertising techniques that are misleading.

4. For example, a comment to the rule on advertising explains that the prohibition of certain attorney advertising techniques hinges on whether the result is misleading to the viewer. That Comment states, "Lawyers may therefore use advertising techniques intended to attract attention, such as music, sound effects, graphics and the like, so long as those techniques do not render the advertisement false, deceptive or misleading." Rule 7.1, Cmt. [4] (emphasis added). The portrayal of a fictitious law firm is not by its nature misleading – it may be used as a humorous attention-getting device, for example. Rule 7.1(c)(2) read as a whole indicates a limiting principle to the prohibition, which is that a portrayal of a fictitious law firm is barred only when it implies that the advertising lawyer is associated in a law firm with other lawyers when that is not the case.

5. This narrower reading is supported by an interpretation that the Attorney General offered, and the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit accepted, in the context of a challenge to the rule. Rule 7.1(c)(2) was among those challenged in Alexander v. Cahill, 598 F.3d 79 (2nd Cir. 2010), on the ground that it unconstitutionally prohibited non-misleading speech. In that case, an attorney, his law firm, and a consumer rights non-profit organization argued that the current rules regarding attorney advertising infringed their First Amendment rights by prohibiting "truthful, non-misleading communications that the state has no legitimate interest in regulating." Id. at 86. The Second Circuit agreed, affirming, with one exception, the District Court's conclusion that the content-based restrictions in the disputed provisions of the Rules impermissibly regulated commercial speech protected by the First Amendment. Id. at 89. The one exception was Rule 7.1(c)(2), the rule at issue in this opinion. In considering that rule, however, the court noted that the only categories of commercial speech "clearly exclude[d] from protection are speech that is false, deceptive, or misleading, and speech that concerns unlawful activities." Id. at 89 (citation omitted). The court accepted a narrowing interpretation that the State offered, apparently in order to avoid the constitutional question. The court wrote:

> The provision prohibiting advertisements including fictitious firms is susceptible to more than one interpretation. But we need not decide whether it would be constitutional to prohibit dramatizations in which an advertising law firm portrays itself arguing against a fictitious opposing counsel. At oral argument, the Attorney General, representing the Defendants, suggested a narrower interpretation of this regulation. He asked that we construe this legislation as applying only to situations in which lawyers from different firms give the misleading impression that they are from the same firm (i.e., "The Dream Team"). (Oral Arg. ~ 12:38:25) We accept this interpretation. So read, this portion of §1200.50(c)(3) addresses only attorney advertising techniques that are actually misleading (as to the existence or membership of a firm), and such advertising is not entitled to First Amendment protection. See Florida Bar, 515 U.S. at 623-24, 115 S.Ct. 2371. Accordingly, and subject to the above-mentioned construction, we reverse the District Court's invalidation of that portion of § 1200.50(c)(3) that prohibits advertisements that include fictitious firms.

Id. at 90.

6. In response to the Cahill decision, the Appellate Divisions of the New York Supreme Court amended the Rules, but left the text of what became Rule 7.1(c)(2) unchanged. Amendment of Rule, New York Rules of Professional Conduct, 33 N.Y. St. Reg. 92 (May 18, 2011) (to be codified at N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 22, § 1200 (2011)). The narrow interpretation of the rule accepted by the Second Circuit is thus not explicitly stated in its text. Nevertheless, in view of the final clause of the rule and the narrowing interpretation that the State offered in the face of a constitutional challenge, we believe that the language of the rule should be read in context to apply only where portrayal of the fictitious firm would be misleading as to the advertiser's practice. Cf. Ward v. Rock Against Racism, 491 U.S. 781, 795-796 (1989) (adopting New York City's "narrowing construction" of a noise ordinance so as to avoid unconstitutionality).

7. We note that any portrayal of a fictitious law firm must comply with other rules, which will reduce the risk of a portrayal of a fictitious firm misleading viewers or listeners. In particular, Rule 7.1(c)(3) states that an attorney advertisement shall not "use actors to portray a judge, the lawyer, members of the law firm, or clients, or utilize depictions of fictionalized events or scenes, without disclosure of same." In light of this disclosure requirement, where a fictionalized law firm is portrayed using actors or fictionalized events or scenes, viewers are unlikely to be misled as to the existence of a real law firm in an advertisement. The bar on portrayals of fictionalized law firms would, however, itself prevent the kind of "portrayal" of a law firm cited by the Attorney General in its argument to the Second Circuit – an advertisement that described a team of lawyers from different firms by an overarching description such as "The Dream Team" in such a way as to suggest that the lawyers were associated in a single firm.

CONCLUSION:

8. An attorney advertisement may include the portrayal of a fictitious law firm so long as the advertisement is not misleading as to the association of lawyers in the advertiser's law firm.

OPINION 884 (11/14/2011)

TOPIC: Communication in criminal matter with a witness who is the subject of a separate criminal indictment, in which he is represented by counsel.

DIGEST: Under Rule 4.2, a lawyer may not communicate about the subject of a criminal representation with a party the lawyer knows to be represented by another lawyer in the matter without the consent of the other lawyer. A non-party witness in a criminal matter is not protected by Rule 4.2. Consequently, a lawyer for a party may communicate with such witness without the consent of counsel who represents the witness in a related matter. This, however, does not prevent the witness' lawyer from advising his client not to speak with anyone about the facts of the case outside the presence of his lawyer. The conclusion of this opinion does not extend to civil matters.

RULES: Rule 1.0(k), Rule 4.2(a), Rule 3.4(a)(2), Rule 4.4, DR 7-104

QUESTION:

[1] May counsel for the defendant in a criminal case ("Defendant") interview the complaining witness ("Witness"), who is the subject of a separate criminal indictment, in which he is represented by counsel, without the consent of such counsel?

OPINION:

[2] Defendant has been charged with burglary and robbery. He allegedly entered the Witness's apartment holding a gun, robbed the Witness at gunpoint and took money from Witness. Witness is cooperating in the prosecution of the Defendant. Because the police who investigated the crime found drugs in the apartment of the Witness, they arrested Witness, who is represented by counsel in connection with the drug possession matter. Conviction of the Witness for drug possession would be a violation of his probation in a prior drug case. The prosecutor has informed Defendant's lawyer that Defendant's actions in the robbery may have been related to a former drug exchange between the Defendant and the Witness.

[3] Rule 4.2(a) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") states:

> (a) In representing a client, a lawyer shall not communicate or cause another to communicate about the subject of the representation with a party the lawyer knows to be represented by another lawyer in the matter, unless the lawyer has the prior consent of the other lawyer or is authorized to do so by law.

This rule, like DR 7-104, its predecessor in the former Code of Professional Responsibility (the "Prior Code"), is often called the "no-contact" rule.

[4] The purpose of the no-contact rule is explained in Comment [1] to the Rule:

> "This Rule contributes to the proper functioning of the legal system by protecting a person who has chosen to be represented by a lawyer in a matter against possible overreaching by other lawyers who are participating in the matter, interference by those > lawyers with the client-lawyer relationship, and uncounseled disclosure of information relating to the representation."

[5] In applying the facts of this hypothetical to Rule 4.2, two issues are raised – whether the Witness is a party to the matter, and whether the Witness is represented "in the matter."

[6] Although, by its terms, Rule 4.2 applies to a "party," Comment [2] to the Rule states that the Rule applies to communication with any person who is represented by counsel concerning the matter to which the communication relates. If the Comment were dispositive, the fact that Witness is not a co-defendant in the matter would be irrelevant as long as Witness's counsel represents Witness in the robbery matter, as well as the drug possession matter. However, the Comments are not dispositive. The comments were adopted by the New York State Bar Association to provide guidance for attorneys in complying with the Rule. They have not been adopted by the Appellate Divisions. Where a conflict exists between a Rule and a Comment, the Rule controls.

[7] The history of this provision in the former Code is instructive. The former Code had both a Disciplinary Rule – DR 7-104(A) – and an Ethical Consideration – EC 7-18 – which addressed contact with third parties. The disciplinary rule, like Rule 4.2, prohibited a lawyer from communicating with a "party" the lawyer knew to be represented by a lawyer in the matter. EC 7-18, on the other hand, was broader, applying to any person the lawyer knew to be represented in the matter by a lawyer. The rationale for the Ethical Consideration was set forth in its first sentence: "The legal system in its broadest sense functions best when persons in need of legal advice or assistance are represented by their own counsel." In 1999, a committee of the New York State Bar Association recommended that the term "party" in the Disciplinary Rule be changed to "person," following a similar change in the ABA Model Rules of Professional Conduct. Although the amendments adopted by the Administrative Board initially used the term "person" in DR 7-104(A), shortly thereafter, the Administrative Board issued an order changing "person" back to "party." See Simon's New York Code of Professional Responsibility Annotated (2007) at 1170. According to Professor Simon, the change was apparently made at the urging of prosecutors, who feared that the word "person" in the no-contact rule would require them, among other things, to obtain the consent of counsel to interview every non-party witness who was represented by counsel.

[8] The argument that "party" means an actual party to a transaction – at least in a criminal case – is supported by Grievance Committee for the Southern District of New York v. Simels, 48 F.3d 640 (2d Cir. 1995), in which the Second Circuit held that a criminal defense lawyer did not violate DR 7-104(A)(1) by interviewing a witness in a drug conspiracy matter even though the lawyer knew the witness was represented by counsel with respect to charges in a related matter. The court held that the related matter was not the same "matter," and the witness therefore was not a "party" in the same "matter." See United States v. Santiago-Lugo, 162 F.R.D. 11, 12 (D.P.R. 1995)(interpreting "party" in Rule 4.2 of the ABA Model Rules and holding that the word "party" should be interpreted restrictively.

[9] Although counsel for the Defendant may interview the complaining witness without the consent of the Witness' counsel, during such interview Defendant's counsel may not violate Rules 3.4(a)(1) or (2) or 8.4(b) or (d).

[10] This Committee has treated the application of the no-contact rule more broadly than the courts where the issue arose in a non-criminal context. While recognizing the holdings in various court cases applicable to prosecutors, we have declined to follow that rule in civil matters. For example, in N.Y. State 735 (2001), we stated "we do not understand that the decision to retain the term 'party' was intended to cut back on the long-standing, universal understanding concerning the scope" of the "no contact" rule in noncriminal cases." (emphasis added) See also N.Y. State 785 (2005)(The 'no contact' rule will bar unconsented communication with an insurance adjuster if the insurance company is known to be separately represented by counsel with respect to the matter.) In N.Y. State 463 (1977), we opined that a lawyer for the putative father in a paternity proceeding instituted by the Commissioner of Social Services was free to communicate with the mother, since the mother "could hardly be deemed a party," although we also considered it important that the mother was not represented by counsel. However, since the hypothetical discussed here involves a criminal proceeding, we need not address, in this opinion, whether Rule 4.2 applies to persons connected with civil proceedings who are not "parties."

[11] Although the history of Rule 4.2 indicates that the Administrative Board was concerned with the right of prosecutors to interview potential witnesses, we see no basis for reaching a different conclusion where the lawyer who wishes to have an unconsented communication with a potential witness in a criminal case represents the defendant rather than the People.

[12] We do not believe a prosecutor may avoid the application of the no-contact rule by dividing the same matter into separate matters, so that only one defendant is a "party" to a particular matter. However, in this case, the matters, although related, seem distinct, and the complaining witness is only a witness and not a co-conspirator.

[13] If Rule 4.2 applied to all "persons," rather than to "parties," then the question for counsel for the Defendant would be whether he "knows" that the Witness is represented in the robbery matter. The term "know" is defined in Rule 1.0(k). Although it is defined as denoting actual knowledge of the fact in question, it states that a person's knowledge may be inferred from circumstances. Since there is a relationship between the robbery proceeding and the Witness' drug possession proceeding, it might be logical to conclude that the Witness' lawyer in the drug possession proceeding also represents him as a witness in the robbery proceeding. Thus, any questions the Defendant's lawyer might ask would be about the subject matter of the representation. However, given our conclusion with respect to the meaning of the term "party," we need not reach those questions. Rule 4.2 by its terms is not applicable, and Defendant's lawyer need not obtain the permission of Witness' lawyer. Nevertheless, Defendant's lawyer should be mindful of Rule 4.4 (Respect for Rights of Third Persons) ("In representing a client, a lawyer shall not use methods of obtaining evidence that violate the legal rights of such a person.")

[14] Even though Rule 4.2 does not require the consent of the Witness' lawyer, this does not prevent the Witness' lawyer from advising his client not to speak with anyone about the facts of the case outside the presence of his lawyer. A lawyer may not advise or cause a person to hide or leave the jurisdiction of a tribunal for the purpose of making the person unavailable as a witness in the a matter. Rule 3.4(a)(2). But the Witness may insist on his right to the presence of counsel. See N.Y. State 463 ("Where the lawyer's intended informant refuses to divulge information unless and until he obtains legal advice, if the informant's interests are either presently or potentially adverse to those of the lawyer or his client, the lawyer must desist.")

CONCLUSION:

[15] Under Rule 4.2, a lawyer may not communicate about the subject of a criminal representation with a party the lawyer knows to be represented by another lawyer in the matter without the consent of the other lawyer. A non-party witness in such matter is not protected by Rule 4.2. Consequently, a lawyer for a party may communicate with the witness without the consent of counsel who represents the witness in a related matter, provided that during such interview the lawyer does not violate Rules 3.4(a)(1) or (2) or 8.4(b) or (d). This, however, does not prevent the witness' lawyer from advising his client not to speak with anyone about the facts of the case outside the presence of his lawyer. The conclusion of this opinion does not extend to civil matters.

OPINION 885 (11/14/2011)

TOPIC: Business relationship with non-attorney.

DIGEST: An attorney may not reduce fees as part of an arrangement to accept referrals from a non-attorney who provides services to clients seeking property tax reductions; an attorney may not be retained by a non-lawyer company to provide legal services to a client.

RULES: 5.4, 5.5, 5.8, 7.1, 7.3, and 8.4.

FACTS:

1. The inquirer handles tax certiorari proceedings in Supreme Court for the reduction of property assessments and is paid on a contingency basis, ordinarily receiving one-third of any tax refund clients receive. The inquirer has been approached by a non-attorney who owns a company that represents residential homeowners in Small Claims Assessment Review proceedings and who, in exchange for a referral fee, would refer commercial clients to the attorney. The non-lawyer would perform some services for the clients, including a preliminary valuation of the property.

QUESTIONS:

2. Is it ethically permissible for an attorney who receives referrals of potential clients from a non-lawyer to reduce the attorney's customary contingency fee, refunding the balance to the client with the understanding that the client would owe an amount to the non-attorney?

3. Alternatively, may the attorney be retained by the non-attorney's company, billing the company an hourly fee and returning any tax refund directly to the client?

4. May the attorney accept referrals of clients from the non-lawyer if the inquirer knows that the non-lawyer seeks new clients via direct solicitation?

OPINION:

5. Is it ethically permissible for an attorney who receives referrals of potential clients from a non-lawyer to reduce the attorney's customary contingency fee, refunding the balance to the client with the understanding that the client would owe an amount to the non-attorney?

6. Under the facts presented, the lawyer cannot agree to the arrangement with the non-lawyer company as the lawyer either would be impermissibly splitting fees with a non-attorney or entering into a cooperative business arrangement with a non-lawyer who is not a member of one of the professions with which attorneys can create such partnerships.

7. The New York Rules of Professional Conduct provide that an attorney may enter into a cooperative business arrangement with a non-lawyer only where the profession of the non-legal professional is included in a list jointly maintained by the Appellate Divisions. Rule 5.8(a). Tax reduction services are not such a profession. See N.Y. Admin. Code, tit. 22, § § 1205.3, 1205.5 (non-legal professions eligible to form cooperative business arrangements with lawyers).

8. Rule 5.4 provides that lawyers may not share legal fees with non-lawyers except in limited circumstances. Rule 5.4(b) prohibits lawyers from forming partnerships with non-lawyers "if any of the activities of the partnership consist of the practice of law." Rule 5.5 prohibits lawyers from aiding a non-lawyer in the unauthorized practice of law. See Suffolk County Op. 96-2 (1996) (opining that a referral arrangement between an attorney and a non-lawyer tax reduction firm was unethical because it involved the attorney in aiding a non-lawyer in the unauthorized practice of law). The attorney seeks to reduce the attorney's own fee, knowing that the amount of the reduction would be owed to the non-attorney company. Although the non-attorney company would perform some unspecified services (including perhaps a preliminary valuation of the property), there appears to be no relation between the funds to be received by the non-lawyer company and the value of the services actually performed for the client. In essence, the non-attorney company would find the clients and refer them to the lawyer, taking a fee from the tax reduction. See N.Y. State 705 (1997), at 3. The proposed arrangement would involve improper fee-splitting.

9. May an attorney be retained by the non-attorney's company, billing the company an hourly fee and returning any tax refund directly to the client?

10. The lawyer may not be retained by the non-attorney company to provide services to the property owner, as the furnishing of counsel and the rendering of legal services by non-attorneys is prohibited by statute. N.Y. Judic. L. § 495(d).[21]

11. May the attorney accept referrals of clients from the non-lawyer if the inquirer knows that the non-lawyer seeks new clients via direct solicitation?

12. Assuming that a referral from the non-attorney company is permissible and does not involve the splitting of fees or the payment of a referral fee, see Rule 7.2, a separate concern arises in that the company seeks new clients via direct solicitation.

13. An attorney may not solicit a client in person, by telephone, or by real-time computer interaction. Rule 7.3(a). While an attorney may solicit clients via advertising, there are restrictions on such advertising. Rule 7.1. "Solicitation means any advertisement initiated by or on behalf of a lawyer or

21 New York Judiciary Law §495 ("Corporations and voluntary associations not to practice law ") provides, in relevant part, that:

1. No corporation or voluntary association shall (a) practice or appear as an attorney-at-law for any person in any court in this state or before any judicial body, nor

(b) make it a business to practice as an attorney-at-law, for any person, in any of said courts, nor

(c) hold itself out to the public as being entitled to practice law, or to render legal services or advice, nor

(d) furnish attorneys or counsel, nor

(e) render legal services of any kind in actions or proceedings of any nature or in any other way or manner, nor

(f) assume in any other manner to be entitled to practice law, nor

(g) assume, use or advertise the title of lawyer or attorney, attorney-at-law, or equivalent terms in any language in such manner as to convey the impression that it is entitled to practice law or to furnish legal advice, services or counsel, nor

(h) advertise that either alone or together with or by or through any person whether or not a duly and regularly admitted attorney-at-law, it has, owns, conducts or maintains a law office or an office for the practice of law, or for furnishing legal advice, services or counsel.

law firm . . . the primary purpose of which is the retention of the lawyer or law firm, and significant motive for which is pecuniary gain." Rule 7.3(b).

14. Non-attorneys are not subject to the New York Rules of Professional Conduct, but a lawyer cannot circumvent either the solicitation or the advertising rules through the indirect use of the non-lawyer's communications. See Rule 8.4(a) ("A lawyer or law firm shall not violate or attempt to violate the Rules of Professional Conduct, knowingly assist or induce another to do so, or do so through the acts of another . . ." (Emphasis added.) For example, if the lawyer had control over the non-attorney or control over the solicitation or advertising, the lawyer might be said to be accomplishing through indirect means what the lawyer could not accomplish directly. The level of control the attorney has depends on many factors, including the amount of business the attorney conducts with the non-attorney and any other connections between the two.

CONCLUSION:

15. An attorney may not reduce fees as part of an arrangement to accept referrals from a non-attorney who provides services to clients seeking property tax reductions. The lawyer may not be retained by the non-attorney company to provide services to the property owner as the furnishing of counsel and the rendering of legal services by non-attorneys is prohibited by statute. If the relationship were permitted, the advertising (including direct solicitation) made by the non-lawyer would not be attributable to the attorney unless the attorney uses the non-lawyer to circumvent applicable rules on advertising (including the rules governing solicitation).

OPINION 886 (11/15/2011)

TOPIC: Ancillary business organizations; conflict of interest

DIGEST: A lawyer with a substantial investment in a closely held real estate brokerage firm is precluded from representing a party to a real estate transaction in which the brokerage firm is acting as broker

RULES: 1.7, 5.7

QUESTION:

1. May an attorney with a substantial passive investment in a closely held nonlegal business entity that offers real estate brokerage, asset management and property management services represent a buyer, seller or lender in a transaction in which that nonlegal entity is serving as a broker?

OPINION:

2. The inquirer seeks to establish a closely held nonlegal entity to provide brokerage, asset management and property management services to investors with a focus largely on multi-family apartment assets. The inquirer contemplates a substantial and significant investment in the nonlegal entity but does not contemplate taking an active role in the management or operation of the entity. Inquirer intends to offer legal services to clients of the entity, and particularly services in purchase, sale and lease transactions in which the affiliated nonlegal entity is serving as a broker. The inquirer's firm would be one of several law firms from which clients of the nonlegal entity would be free to choose. The legal services would be offered only after full written disclosure of the inquirer's interest in the nonlegal entity.

3. A lawyer or a law firm may provide nonlegal services, themselves or through a separate entity, to clients or other persons. New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") 5.7; see N.Y. State 752 (2002), N.Y. State 753 (2002) and N.Y. State 755 (2002). Whether the nonlegal services provided by the lawyer or law firm, or a separate entity in which they have an interest, are subject to the Rules depends upon whether such services are separate and distinct from any legal services that the lawyer or law firm may provide and, if so, whether the client "could [not] reasonably believe that such nonlegal services are the subject of a client-lawyer relationship." Id. The client will be presumed to believe that such nonlegal services are the subject of a client-lawyer relationship unless (i) the lawyer or law firm has advised the client in writing that such services are not legal services and that the protections associated with a client-attorney relationship do not obtain or (ii) the lawyer's or law firm's interest in the separate entity providing such services is de minimis. Id.

4. In all instances, however, the lawyer's services qua lawyer are subject to the Rules. In N.Y. State 752, we opined specifically that the application of the personal interest conflict rule found in DR 5-101(A), a precursor of Rule 1.7, to a lawyer seeking to serve in the dual roles of lawyer and broker, inter alia, survived the adoption of DR 1-106, the direct predecessor of Rule 5.7. We here reaffirm our opinion in N.Y. State 752 and hold further that, in our opinion, Rule 1.7 applies with undiminished force in circumstances where a lawyer's conflicting personal interest arises from a separate, nonlegal business or activity permitted by Rule 5.7.

5. Thus, absent informed consent, a lawyer may not provide legal representation to a person or entity if a substantial risk exists that the lawyer's personal interests arising from a permitted separate, nonlegal activity will affect the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of that person or entity. Rule 1.7. Informed consent is dependent upon, inter alia, the lawyer's reasonable belief that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation. Id.

6. As noted in N.Y. State 752, however, we have opined on a number of occasions over an extended period of time that, because of the strong financial interest of a lawyer who serves as a broker in the outcome of the brokerage effort, the roles of broker and lawyer in the same transaction are incompatible and not subject to consent by the client. N.Y. State 752 and Opinions cited therein. That a lawyer's or law firm's participation in a separate brokerage business is limited largely or wholly to that of investor, with little or no management or operational activity, does not alter that result. It is the personal financial interest arising from the investment that creates the personal interest conflict that is the subject of Rule 1.7.

CONCLUSION:

7. For the reasons stated, a lawyer with a substantial passive investment in a separate, closely held nonlegal entity that offers real estate brokerage, asset management and property management services may not represent a buyer, seller or lender in a transaction in which such separate nonlegal entity is serving as a broker.

OPINION 887 (11/15/2011)

TOPIC: Non-lawyer marketers; bonus compensation to non-lawyer based on new business

DIGEST: A lawyer or law firm may have a non-lawyer marketer who engages in only that advertising and solicitation in which the lawyer or law firm could engage. The lawyer or law firm may have a profit-sharing plan that pays bonus compensation to the non-lawyer marketer based on overall profits of the firm or on a percentage of the employee's base salary. However, the bonus compensation may not be based on referrals of particular matters and may not be based on the profitability of the firm or the department for which the employee markets if such profits are substantially related to the employee's marketing efforts.

RULES: Rule 1.0(a), 5.3(b), 5.4(a), 5.4(a)(3), 7.1, 7.2, 7.3(a)(1), 7.3(b), 8.4(a), 8.4(a(3).

QUESTION:

[1] May a law firm hire a non-attorney marketer to market to potential corporate or union clients the firm's pre-paid legal services plans and its services as a provider of pre-paid legal services? May a law firm marketer be paid more than a salary, e.g., a success fee for signing up pre-paid legal services plan sponsors?

OPINION:

[2] A lawyer may disseminate an advertisement[22] about the lawyer or his/her law firm and the lawyer's or law firm's services, including newspaper advertisements, letters and brochures. See generally Rule 7.1 of the N.Y. Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") and the comments thereto.

[3] The lawyer's ability to engage in in-person solicitation,[23] however, is far more limited. Rule 7.3(a)(1) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") prohibits a lawyer from engaging in solicitation "by in-person or telephone contact, or by real-time or interactive computer-accessed communication" unless the recipient is a close friend, relative, former client or existing client of the lawyer."

[4] Clearly, a lawyer may hire an employee ("Marketer") to engage in advertising and solicitation activities in which lawyers themselves could ethically engage. See Rule 7.2, cmt [1](a lawyer may "compensate employees, agents and vendors who are engaged to provide marketing or client development services"). Thus a Marketer, like a lawyer in the firm, could develop print or web-based marketing materials and could solicit business in person or by telephone from the law firm's existing and former clients. See also the definitions of advertisement and solicitation, each of which includes a communication made on behalf of a lawyer or law firm.

22 An advertisement is any public or private communication made by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm about the lawyer or law firm's services, the primary purpose of which is for the retention of the lawyer or law firm. It does not include communications to existing clients or other lawyers. Rule 1.0(a).

23 Solicitation means any advertisement initiated by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm that is directed to, or targeted at, a specific recipient or group of recipients, or their family members or legal representatives, the primary purpose of which is the retention of the lawyer or law firm, and a significant motive for which is pecuniary gain. It does not include a proposal or other writing prepared and delivered in response to a specific request of a prospective client. See Rule 7.3(b).

[5] A Marketer, however, is not permitted to engage in any activities that would be prohibited to the lawyer. See Rule 8.4(a) ("A lawyer or law firm shall not violate or attempt to violate the Rules of Professional Conduct through the acts of another"). Moreover, a lawyer is liable for compliance by his or her employees with the requirements of the Rules of Professional Conduct. See Rule 5.3(b)("A lawyer shall be responsible for the conduct of a nonlawyer employed or retained by or associated with the lawyer that would be a violation of these Rules if engaged in by a lawyer [under the circumstances specified in the Rule].")

[6] Consequently, if the Marketer would merely prepare written advertising materials for distribution to prospective clients or to the public, there would be no ethical issues, provided that they complied with Rule 7.1, including labeling it "attorney advertising", and the requirement for having it preapproved by the firm. This is so even if the written materials were directly addressed to particular persons. See Shapero v. Kentucky Bar Association, 486 U.S. 466 (1988) (letter targeted to clients that lawyer knew could use the lawyer's services.)

[7] However, the law firm could not authorize the Marketer to meet with or call prospective clients who are acquaintances of the Marketer in order to promote the firm's services, because doing so would violate Rule 7.3(a)(1) unless the prospects were close friends, clients or former clients of the law firm.

Employee Compensation Arrangements

[8] Rule 5.4(a) prohibits a lawyer or law firm from sharing legal fees with a non-lawyer, with limited exceptions. A significant exception is that Rule 5.4(a)(3) permits a lawyer to "compensate a nonlawyer employee . . . based in whole or in part on a profit sharing plan." Comment 1B explains:

> Paragraph (a)(3) permits limited fee sharing with a nonlawyer employee, where the employee's compensation or retirement plan is based in whole or in part on a profit-sharing arrangement. Such sharing of profits with a nonlawyer employee must be based on the total profitability of the law firm or a department within a law firm and may not be based on the fee resulting from a single case.

[9 Rule 5.4 (a)(3) is a limited exception to the prohibition against a lawyer or law firm sharing legal fees with a non-lawyer. However, it does not supersede Rule 7.2, which prohibits a lawyer from compensating a person to recommend the lawyer's employment or rewarding that person for a recommendation resulting in employment.

[10] In N.Y. State 733 (2000), we held that a lawyer may not pay a non-lawyer employee a percentage of fees attributable to matters referred by the employee as compensation for the referral. Although that opinion interpreted former DR 3-102(A)(3) under the Code of Professional Responsibility, the former disciplinary rule is the same as Rule 8.4(a)(3) except for punctuation, and we would reach the same result under the Rules.

[11] Rule 5.4(a)(3) clearly allows a lawyer to pay a bonus to a non-lawyer employee, including an employee engaged in marketing, that is not based on referrals of particular clients or matters, but rather is based on the profitability of the entire firm or a department within the firm. Although Comment 1B interprets this prohibition as prohibiting the profit-sharing arrangement from being based on the fee resulting from a single case, it does not rule out the success of marketing efforts from being a factor in the amount of the bonus. Nevertheless, if the profits of the firm or the employee's department are directly related to the success of the employee's marketing efforts, it is difficult to see how a law firm could pay a marketing employee a bonus based on the profits of the firm or the department for which the employee engages in marketing without the bonus being considered a direct sharing of legal fees. This, of course, would depend on the size of the department and the extent to which the profits of the department are based on clients resulting from the employee's marketing efforts. Such determinations are necessarily fact-specific. Accordingly, they are not amenable to general rules. Where profits of the firm or the department are not directly correlated with the employee's marketing efforts, a bonus plan based on a percentage of the employee's salary or a percentage of the overall profits of the firm would pass muster under the Rule.

CONCLUSION:

[12] A lawyer or law firm may have a non-lawyer marketer who engages in only that advertising and solicitation in which the lawyer or law firm could engage. The lawyer or law firm may have a profit-sharing plan that pays bonus compensation to the non-lawyer marketer based on the overall profits of the firm or on a percentage of the employee's base salary. However, the bonus compensation may not be based on referrals of particular matters and may not be based on the profitability of the firm or the department for which the employee markets if such profits are substantially related to the employee's marketing efforts.

OPINION 888 (11/15/2011)

TOPIC: Links on a lawyer's web site to other businesses.

DIGEST: A lawyer may include links to other businesses on the lawyer's web site provided neither the link nor the linked material involves misrepresentation or causes confusion.

RULES: 5.8(a), 7.1, 8.4

QUESTION:

1. Under what circumstances may a lawyer's web site include links to the web sites of other businesses?

OPINION:

2. The inquiring lawyer wishes to establish a law firm web site. He asks whether the web site may include links to the web sites of other businesses, particularly banks and real estate companies.

3. Whether or not a link on an attorney website is ethically permissible depends on the purpose of the link, the nature of the site to which a link is made, and the nature of the relationship between the attorney and the owner of the web site to which the link is made.

4. A web link need not be the subject of any agreement between the law firm and the site to which the link is made. Links can be made with or without the consent of the owner of the website to which the link is made. In fact, the owner of a website need not even be aware that the link has been made, much less give consent for the link.

5. A law firm web site may include informational links to third party web sites. Such links are not ethically barred if the lawyer ensures that neither the inclusion of the link nor the material to which the link is made will create confusion or misrepresentation. For example, a link to an official government web site that created the impression that the law firm had some government connection would be impermissible where the implied connection does not exist. NY Rule of Professional Conduct 8.4(c). The same is true for links to private web sites if the link is likely to create confusion or misrepresentation. In some circumstances, an appropriate disclaimer would be necessary.

6. No categorical ethical bar prohibits lawyers and third parties from agreeing to link to each other's web sites, but greater care must be exercised with reciprocal links. A reciprocal link (without revenue generated for the law firm and without any financial relationship between the entities) is permitted under similar conditions as an informational link.

7. Reciprocal links that constitute advertising must comply with all the requirements of Rule 7.1, including the mandate that advertising not include false, deceptive, or misleading claims. In addition, the home pages of the web sites with the reciprocal links may need to be labeled as attorney advertising. Rule 7.1(f).

8. If the link is part of a cooperative business arrangement between the lawyer and a non-legal professional, the lawyer must comply with Rule 5.8(a). A "cooperative business arrangement" is:

> a contractual relationship between a lawyer or law firm and a nonlegal professional or nonlegal professional service firm for the purpose of offering to the public, on a systematic and continuing basis, legal services performed by the lawyer or law firm, as well as other nonlegal professional services . . .

See 22 NYCRR 1205.2. Rule 5.8(a) specifically limits the non-legal professionals with whom a lawyer may contract. See 22 N.Y.C.R.R. § 1205.3 (list promulgated by the Appellate Divisions of professionals with whom lawyers may contract), § 1205.5. The rules permit contractual business relationships between lawyers and five other professions (public accountancy, land surveying, social work, architecture and professional engineering) but neither realtors nor bankers. Under Rule 5.8(a), a reciprocal exclusive referral agreement may include joint advertising and sharing of office space, but may not include sharing of any legal fees.

CONCLUSION:

9. A law firm web site can include informational links to other web sites, including those of banks and real estate companies. Neither the linked material nor the linkage itself may involve misrepresentation or create confusion. Reciprocal links are not inherently unethical. A simple reciprocal link (without revenue generated for the law firm and without any financial relationship between the entities) is permitted under similar conditions as an informational link.

OPINION 889 (11/15/2011)

TOPIC: Sharing legal fees and forming partnership with non-lawyer.

DIGEST: A lawyer who principally practices in a jurisdiction that allows partnership with a non-lawyer, and who is also admitted in New York, may ordinarily conduct New York litigation even if in a partnership that includes a non-lawyer who would benefit from the resulting fees; although the New York rules generally prohibit such arrangements, in this case the governing ethical provisions would be those of the other jurisdiction.

RULES: 5.4(a) & (b), 8.5(a) & (b)

FACTS:

[1] The inquirer is a lawyer admitted to practice in both New York and the District of Columbia. The lawyer's practice is based in the District of Columbia and the majority of his revenue is derived from cases and matters within that jurisdiction.

[2] The lawyer desires to form a District of Columbia partnership with a non-lawyer, a technical expert, who will assist the lawyer with prosecuting certain class action claims, at least one of which would be brought in the State of New York. For the purposes of this opinion, it is assumed that the District of Columbia permits lawyers to form a partnership with non-lawyers, and to share legal fees and profits as between them, if they comply with certain rules. See D.C. Opinion 322 (2004); D.C. Rule 5.4.

QUESTIONS:

[3] When the lawyer earns legal fees resulting from litigation commenced and prosecuted in New York, may he share those fees with his District of Columbia partnership, which would include a non-lawyer who has worked on that litigation? If the lawyer may not share the fees directly, may the firm hire the non-lawyer as an employee, to be compensated through a profit-sharing arrangement triggered by increases over the firm's current average profit?

OPINION:

[4] New York Rule 5.4(a) provides that, with exceptions not here pertinent, a lawyer or law firm shall not share legal fees with a non-lawyer. New York Rule 5.4(b) provides that "[a] lawyer shall not form a partnership with a nonlawyer if any of the activities of the partnership consist of the practice of law." While it is clear that the New York rules of legal ethics prohibit such a partnership and such fee sharing, the nuanced question here is whether a lawyer admitted in New York runs afoul of our ethics rules by litigating in New York as part of a partnership in the District of Columbia that is, and ethically may be, structured in the way the New York rules generally prohibit.

[5] Under New York Rule 8.5(a) a New York admitted lawyer is subject to the disciplinary authority of New York regardless where the conduct occurs, but we must determine whether the ethics rules to be applied are those of New York or those of the District of Columbia. To make this determination we look to the New York choice of law rules contained in New York Rule 8.5.

[6] Under New York Rule 8.5(b)(1), for "conduct in connection with a proceeding in a court before which a lawyer has been admitted to practice (either generally or for purposes of that proceeding), the rules to be applied shall be the rules of the jurisdiction in which the court sits, unless the rules of the court provide otherwise." Thus, the New York Rules of Professional Conduct apply to conduct in connection with proceedings in a New York court unless the rules of that court provide otherwise.

[7] Forming a District of Columbia partnership with a non-lawyer in the District of Columbia does not become subject to New York Rule 5.4 just because the partnership may undertake some New York litigation work. As we read the inquiry, there is no suggestion that undertaking the New York litigation would substantially shift the firm's focus. We assume that the firm, even if it undertook the New York litigation, would continue to be centered on cases and revenue within the District of Columbia. Under those circumstances, we believe that formation of the partnership cannot be said to be "conduct in connection with" the New York litigation. The same is true of distributing profits, including those generated from occasional legal fees in New York, according to the general terms of the District of Columbia partnership agreement.

[8] Under New York Rule 8.5(b)(2)(ii), for conduct not in connection with a proceeding in court, the rules to be applied shall be "the rules of the admitting jurisdiction in which the lawyer principally practices; provided, however, that if particular conduct clearly has its predominant effect in another jurisdiction in which the lawyer is licensed to practice, the rules of that jurisdiction shall be applied to that conduct." The inquirer principally practices in the District of Columbia. Unless the formation of the partnership or the division of compensation arising from New York litigation clearly have their predominant effect in New York, those matters are subject only to the District of Columbia ethics rules.

[9] Forming the District of Columbia partnership does not clearly have its predominant effect in New York just because the partnership may undertake some New York litigation work. Under the circumstances presented, neither does it clearly have a predominant effect in New York for the partnership to distribute its fees according to the general terms of the partnership agreement, even though this may include occasional fees from New York litigation.

[10] Accordingly, while the proposed distribution of legal fees may have to comply with relevant ethical rules in the District of Columbia, it is not subject to New York Rule 5.4. A contrary result, applying the New York Rules more broadly than their intended reach, could result in undue burdens for lawyers admitted in New York, but legitimately practicing in the District of Columbia through a partnership that includes a non-lawyer, who wish to participate in the occasional New York litigation matter.

[11] Our conclusion as to choice of law is premised on the particular facts of the inquiry. These include that the lawyer and the law firm, now and in the foreseeable future, have their principal place of business in the District of Columbia and that the bulk of their revenue is derived from matters unrelated to the State of New York. Different facts could lead to a different result. For example, if a major portion of the revenue of the lawyer or the law firm were derived from the practice of law in the State on New York, then, depending on the particular facts, Rule 8.5 could make applicable the prohibitions of New York Rule 5.4. Certainly if the partnership were created for the very purpose of litigation in New York, establishing it in the District of Columbia would be ineffective to circumvent the New York rules on fee sharing.

[12] Other jurisdictions have reached varying conclusions as to the choice of law that governs such situations. Compare Philadelphia Opinion 2010-7 (opining that a Pennsylvania lawyer could share fees with a non-Pennsylvania lawyer in the District of Columbia even though the DC firm had a non-lawyer partner) with ABA 91-360 (opining that lawyer practicing in a jurisdiction forbidding partnerships with non-lawyers would be subject to that prohibition even if a member of a DC firm), followed in Virginia Opinion 1584 (1994). It should be noted, however, that the ABA and Virginia opinions were based on codes without choice of law provisions similar to the current Rule 8.5 in New York.[24] We believe that the Philadelphia opinion is the more instructive precedent, and for the reasons stated above, we believe the New York choice of law rules support a similar conclusion.

[13] Alternatively, we are asked to address whether the lawyer could employ the non-lawyer technical expert, with the expert receiving compensation based upon a profit-sharing model based on increases from the firm's current average profit. In N. Y. State 733 (2000), we addressed whether a lawyer may share legal fees with non-lawyer employees. Under DR 3-102 [now Rule 5.4(a)], we held that "a lawyer may compensate non-lawyer employees based on profit sharing but may not tie remuneration to the success of specific efforts by employees to solicit business for lawyers or law firms." We specifically stated that any permissible profit sharing between lawyer and non-lawyers "may not be used to circumvent the specific prohibition on fee sharing reflected in Judiciary Law §491 and DR 2-103(B)." See also Rule 5.4, Cmt. [1B].

[14] As posed to this Committee by the inquirer, the profit-sharing with the non-lawyer employee would be based upon total profits above a significant minimum threshold. Although the non-lawyer would not be paid a percentage of fees from a given case, the non-lawyer's compensation under this profit-sharing model would correspond roughly to the amount by which his involvement increases the profit of the firm.

[15] We do not reach the question whether this proposed profit-sharing model would comport with the standards that would generally apply in New York. On the facts of this inquiry, and following the same analysis as set forth above with respect to partnership, we believe the propriety of the profit-sharing arrangements would be governed by the ethics rules of the District of Columbia. If the facts were different – for example, if New York litigation represented a significantly greater portion of the firm's caseload or revenues – then it would be necessary to consider whether the profit-sharing model would be consistent with New York ethical rules.

CONCLUSION:

[16] A lawyer who principally practices in another jurisdiction but is also admitted in New York may conduct occasional New York litigation, even if a non-lawyer would benefit from the resulting 24 The ABA opinion was issued at a time when ABA Rule 8.5 was limited to jurisdiction of the disciplinary authority without provision for choice of law. Amendments adopted by the ABA in 1993 broadened the rules to include choice of law provisions as are found in New York Rule 8.5(b) upon which we base our conclusion. At the time of the Virginia opinion, the applicable conflicts rule, Virginia DR 1-102(B), was limited in scope.

TOPIC: Disqualification of spouses practicing in different firms from appearing on opposite sides of a litigation.

DIGEST: Conflicts of spouses representing clients on opposite sides of the same litigation under Rule 1.10(h) are not automatically imputed to other lawyers in the disqualified lawyers' firms, but imputation may arise in the particular circumstances of any given case. At least in civil matters, even if the conflict is imputed to other lawyers in the spouses' firms, the resulting conflict may, depending on the facts of the particular case, be waived by the client or clients with their informed consent. If substitute counsel from outside the firm is engaged, th.e originally retained lawyer may share confidential information with the substitute counsel as long as the affected client gives his or her informed consent or the disclosure is impliedly authorized to serve the best interests of the client under Rule 1.6.

RULES: 1.0(j), 1.6(a), 1.7(b)(1), 1.10(a) & (h).

FACTS:

1. The inquirer and his wife are lawyers working in a small city. The inquirer is the managing attorney of a legal services office and his wife is in private practice at a local firm. Recently, a client engaged the inquirer's wife to bring an eviction. The respondent in that proceeding sought the assistance of the inquirer's office.

QUESTIONS:

2. Is the prohibition in Rule 1.10(h) that, absent a valid consent, precludes husband and wife from personally representing opposing parties in litigation imputed to other lawyers in their respective firms?

3. If the conflict is imputed, can consent cure the conflict, and, if so, is consent of one or both clients needed?

4. If the inquirer chooses to recommend that the client engage instead volunteer outside counsel, can the inquirer share with the outside counsel information derived from the legal services office's intake interview?

OPINION:

5. The inquirer recognizes that he cannot personally represent the client in litigation against an adversary represented by his wife. His concern is well founded. Under the terms of Rule 1.10(h), the prohibition on lawyers representing clients in any matter where the adversary is represented by the lawyer's spouse is subject to consent by the lawyer's client "after full disclosure" and only if "the lawyer concludes that the lawyer can adequately represent the interests of the client." While worded differently, this inquiry is the same as that set forth in Rule 1.7(b)(1), the general concurrent conflict rule: whether "the lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation" to the affected client or clients. Because both husband and wife are subject to the same prohibition, for both lawyers to remain on the case, both would have to conclude that they could adequately represent the interests of their clients, and both clients would have to consent. In the Committee's view, it would be a rare case in which spouses could reasonably conclude that they could adequately represent the interests of their respective clients in appearing personally as lead counsel on opposite sides of a litigation.

6. The prohibition set forth in Rule 1.10(h) is not, however, automatically imputed to other lawyers in the law offices of the husband and wife. Rule 1.10(a) provides for automatic imputation where the conflict arises under Rules 1.7, 1.8 or 1.9, but does not list conflicts arising under Rule 1.10(h). This Committee has previously observed that, under essentially identical provisions of the former New York Code of Professional Responsibility, even in cases involving criminal prosecutions, "disqualification of the district attorney's spouse in a particular case does not result in automatic disqualification of other lawyers in the spouse's firm under DR 5-105(D) [now Rule 1.10(a)]." N.Y. State 654 (1993); accord N.Y. State 660 (same as to lawyers in close dating relationship).

7. Nevertheless, the conflict may be imputed under the facts and circumstances of a given case, where the policies underlying the primary disqualification are also implicated by participation of other lawyers in the firm. N.Y. State 654 (1993); N.Y. State 638 (1992); N.Y. State 632 (1992). In N.Y. State 654, we enumerated certain factors that should be considered in determining whether a conflict was imputed in a given case:

> Relevant facts would include the size of the spouse's firm, the spouse's position in the firm, whether the spouse will derive direct or indirect financial or other benefit as a result of the defendant's employment of the firm, and whether the spouse played any role in the defendant's seeking representation by the firm.

In that opinion, we concluded that the conflict that prevented the spouse of a district attorney from representing a criminal defendant was imputed to the spouse's firm, and that consent of the criminal defendant would not cure the conflict. We rested heavily on the fact that the case was a criminal matter and the concern that the public might perceive favoritism in the district attorney's handling of the matter: "Since the firm of the district attorney's spouse is quite small, the public would be likely to see the potential for abuse whether the defendant were represented by the district attorney's spouse's partner or associate, or by the district attorney's spouse." N.Y. State 654.

8. This opinion, by contrast, involves a civil landlord-tenant case that does not implicate the public interests present in a criminal matter. In these circumstances, whether a colleague in the inquirer's office or a colleague in the wife's law firm, or both, could proceed with the representation in the eviction matter would depend primarily on whether, under all the facts, "there is a significant risk that the [litigating] lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own . . . personal interests" occasioned by that lawyer's relationship with one or the other spouse. Rule 1.7(a)(2). This is an objective test based on the particular circumstances: the lawyers involved, "acting reasonably," must "determine whether . . . the lawyer's judgment may be impaired or the lawyer's loyalty may be divided if the lawyer accepts or continues the representation." Rule 1.7, Cmt. [2]. The answer may depend on, among other things, whether both spouses withdraw from the affected representation or only one of them does. In the latter case in particular – where a colleague is litigating directly against one of the spouses – we believe it is quite likely, if the respective law offices are relatively small, that a significant risk of an adverse effect on the litigating lawyer's professional judgment would arise.

9. Even if there is such a significant risk, however, that conflict can be cured by consent of the affected clients as long as the lawyer involved reasonably believes that, notwithstanding that risk, he or she will in fact be able to provide competent and diligent representation to the affected client. Rule 1.7(b)(1). Any consent will often be conditioned on effective screening of the disqualified spouse from all contact with the matter.

10. Whether consent needs to be obtained from one client or both also depends on the circumstances. For example, a colleague in the inquirer's office, where the inquirer is managing attorney, might well conclude that he or she must obtain consent of the respondent in the eviction matter. Yet perhaps the colleague in the wife's firm, given facts such as the size of that office and the lawyer's role in it, might reach a different conclusion. It would always be most prudent for all the various lawyers involved to obtain consent from their clients, but whether that is required depends on the analysis above.

11. Information derived from the intake interview is confidential whether or not the lawyer assumes representation of the prospective client. See Rule 1.18(b). If the representation were taken over by a colleague in the inquirer's legal services office, the inquirer could discuss information from the intake interview with that colleague. See Rule 1.6 Cmt. [5] ("lawyers in a firm may, in the course of the firm's practice, disclose to each other information relating to a client of the firm, unless the client has instructed that particular information be confined to specified lawyers"). If outside counsel is retained to take over a representation, however, confidential information may be disclosed to the new lawyer only, under Rule 1.6(a)(1), with the "informed consent" of the respondent as that term is defined by Rule 1.0(j), or, under Rule 1.6(a)(2), if the disclosure is impliedly authorized to advance the best interests of the client and reasonable under the circumstances or customary in the professional community.[25] Assuming that the client is aware that the inquirer has undertaken to find replacement counsel, briefing new counsel is likely to be both reasonable and customary unless the information derived from the intake interview was adverse to the interests of the client.

CONCLUSION:

12. Conflicts under Rule 1.10(h) are not automatically imputed to other lawyers in the disqualified lawyers' firms, but imputation may arise in the particular circumstances of any given case. Even if the conflict is imputed to other lawyers in the spouses' firms, the resulting conflict may, depending on the facts of the particular case, be waived by the client or clients with their informed consent. If substitute counsel is engaged, the originally retained lawyer may share confidential information with the substitute counsel as long as the affected client gives his or her informed consent or the disclosure is impliedly authorized under rule 1.6(a)(2).

(40-11)

25 This is not a case in which the lawyer's contact with a prospective or former client is so remote as to call into question whether disclosure to serve the client's best interests could ever be reasonable or customary. To the contrary, the inquirer's involvement with the respondent is ongoing. Without trying to formulate general rules, we conclude on the present facts – where a lawyer has obtained confidential information from a prospective client and has undertaken, with permission, to hand the matter over to new counsel identified by the lawyer – that the lawyer may be impliedly authorized to disclose information to the new lawyer if doing so meets the tests set forth in Rule 1.6(a)(2).

OPINION 891 (11/17/2011)

TOPIC: Conflict of Interest; Referrals by attorney to a title abstract company or title company agent in which the attorney has a financial interest.

DIGEST: An attorney may refer a client to a title abstract company or title company agent in which the attorney has a financial interest in the limited case where the Company or Agent does only ministerial tasks. The attorney's personal interest conflict arising from the financial interest may preclude the attorney from representing that client in the same transaction that the title abstract company or title company agent is providing services in.

RULES: DR 1-106; 5-104(A); Rule 1.7; 1.8; 5.7

QUESTIONS:

1. May an attorney refer work to a title abstract company or title company agent in which the attorney has a financial interest? (A "title abstract company" and a "title company agent" being hereinafter collectively referred to as a "title company".)

2. May an attorney represent a client in a transaction where the title company in which the attorney has a financial interest is providing services to that client?

OPINION:

3. Both of the above questions were answered under the Code of Professional Responsibility by opinions of this Committee. See N.Y. State 595, 621, 738, 752, 753 and 755. The answers and reasoning set forth in those opinions are still valid under the NY Rules of Professional Conduct which replaced the Code of Professional Responsibility effective April 1st, 2009.

4. N.Y. State 595 held that an attorney could refer clients to an abstract company in which the attorney has an interest and continue to represent the client in the transaction, provided that the abstract company performs only ministerial tasks. If the abstract company were to perform non-ministerial tasks (such as title insurance or recommendations for title insurance), the resulting personal interest conflicts with the attorney's duty to the client in the transaction and is a non-consentable conflict.

5. N.Y. State 621 confirmed the result in N.Y. State 595 and distinguished N.Y. State 576 which allowed an attorney to refer a client in a transaction to a title company that paid a commission to the attorney, provided that, among other things, the attorney passed the commission on to the client and where exceptions to title were not negotiable.

6. N. Y. State 738 applied the prohibition where the attorney's spouse holds a financial interest.

7. N. Y. State 752 made clear that notwithstanding the adoption of DR 1-106 the prohibitions regarding title companies remained valid.

8. N. Y. State 753 reiterated that a lawyer's interest in a title abstract company providing insurance or making an insurance recommendation could not, even with client consent, represent the buyer, seller or lender in the transaction unless the abstract company performs only ministerial tasks.

9. Rule 5.7 is substantially the same as DR 1-106 and accordingly the same reasoning applies regarding the permissibility of referrals to title companies.

CONCLUSION:

11. An attorney may refer a client to a title company in which the attorney has a financial interest provided that the attorney may not represent the client in the transaction in which that title company will provide title services to the client unless the services are purely ministerial or if, among other things, the attorney passes the commission on to the client and where exceptions to title are not negotiable.

OPINION 892 (11/28/2011)

TOPIC: Lawyer's participation in residential real estate transaction that includes both a "seller's concession" and an equivalent "gross-up" in the sale price.

DIGEST: The fact that the sales price in a residential real estate transaction has been "grossed-up" must be expressly disclosed in the transaction documents containing the sales price in addition to the amount of the "seller's concession."

RULES: 8.4(c)

FACTS:

1. Seller's attorney presented a contract for the sale of a single family home to the mortgagee bank with provisions stating that "At the closing of title Seller shall pay $25,000.00 towards Purchasers' closing costs and points" and "Purchaser and Seller hereby and herewith acknowledge and understand that the sales price has been increased by the sum of $25,000.00 to allow and provide for the aforesaid Seller's Concession."

2. Although seller's attorney has been using substantially similar language without objection by lenders for numerous residential real estate transactions, the lender in this instance advised the seller's attorney that the "Contract states price increased due to Seller concession; increase for this reason is not allowed."

QUESTION:

3. May a lawyer ethically participate in a residential real estate transaction where the lender objects to the disclosure in the sales contract and the HUD-1 Settlement Statement showing that the amount of the sales price has been increased ("grossed-up") in an amount equivalent to the amount of the seller's concession?

OPINION:

4. Rule 8.4(c) prohibits a lawyer from engaging in conduct involving misconduct. Under the facts of this inquiry the failure to disclose the increase or "gross-up" of the purchase price would constitute misrepresentation. In N.Y. State 817 (2007) this Committee opined that a lawyer's participation in a residential real estate transaction that includes a "seller's concession" and a "grossed up" or increased sales price is ethically prohibited, unless the gross-up is disclosed in the transaction documents. That opinion did not hold that a seller's concession or gross up was improper. Rather, the opinion held a full disclosure of the gross-up in the transaction documents was necessary to avoid a misrepresentation regarding the amount of the purchase price.

5. In N.Y. State 882 (2011) we affirmed what we said in N.Y. State 817 and clarified in which documents the disclosure of the gross up was required to be made:

> The problem is not the seller's concession in the abstract. Many seller's concessions are legitimate. The problem here is the matching "gross up" of the selling price, which effec> tively wipes out the seller's concession. If a buyer has to pay $6,000 in order to get a $6,000 discount, then the true selling price has not changed. Thus, a gross up, if not expressly disclosed as such, is a misrepresentation and is proscribed by Rule 8.4(c). Consequently, if a lawyer participates in a real estate transaction in which the lawyer knows (or should know) that the transaction documents containing the grossed-up sales price do not expressly disclose that the sales price was increased by the same amount as the seller's concession, the lawyer violates Rules 8.4(c). The fact that the practice may be widespread does not authorize an attorney to participate in the misrepresentation. The Rule is equally applicable to the buyer's attorney, the seller's attorney, and the lender's attorney.

N.Y. State 882 ¶ 10.

Here because the mortgagee bank rejected the disclosure required by our ethical opinions, the attorneys for the buyer, seller and lender not only had reason to know that the documents with the deletion would contain a misrepresentation, they each had actual knowledge.[26]

6. N.Y. State 882 addressed the issue raised by the current inquiry.

> Even if the seller's concession and matching gross-up were suggested by a mortgage broker, a loan officer, or some other employee at the mortgage bank, the lawyer is not relieved from making the necessary disclosures. Disclosure may be even more important in that situation because the lender's representative – the very person who might be expected to detect a misrepresentation (the supposedly increased sales price that is fully offset by an unexplained seller's concession) – is encouraging the misrepresentation. No function other than to misrepresent the purchase price can be ascribed to a gross–up equal to an unexplained seller's concession. A lawyer may not participate in that misrepresentation no matter who suggested it.

Id. ¶ 11.

7. Under these circumstances, where the lender objects to the disclosure of the gross-up of the purchase price, none of the lawyers may ethically participate in the transaction. Their best course would be to advise the lender the "gross-up" is ethically prohibited unless disclosed in the documents that recite the purchase price and that if the lender will not agree to the disclosure, the lawyers for the buyer, seller and lender may not participate in the transaction.

CONCLUSION:

8. A lawyer may not ethically participate in a residential real estate transaction where the lender objects to the disclosure of the fact that there has been a gross-up of the purchase price equivalent to amount of the seller's concession.

26 Rule 1.0(k) provides as follows:

> "Knowingly," "known," "know," or "knows" denotes actual knowledge of the fact in question. A person's knowledge may be inferred from circumstances.

A lawyer "should know" a fact when it can be readily inferred from the circumstances.

OPINION 893 (12/01/2011)

TOPIC: Assistant District Attorney accepting appointment as foreclosure referee.

DIGEST: A full-time prosecutor may accept appointment to referee foreclosure panels, and may oversee foreclosure proceedings, provided there is no conflict.

RULES: 1.7, 1.12

QUESTION:

1. May a full-time Assistant District Attorney seek and accept appointment to a court-appointed referee foreclosure panel?

OPINION:

2. New York law permits courts to appoint referees from court-appointed referee panels to exercise a number of powers in connection with a foreclosure. N.Y. Civ. Prac. L & R. § 4301. Referees compute the value of foreclosed property and sell it at public auction. N.Y. Civ. Prac. L. & R. §1351(1). The statutory fee is $50 to compute the value of the property and $500 to sell the property, although the court can authorize a higher fee for property with a sales price that exceeds $50,000. N.Y. Civ. Prac. L & R. §8003(b).

3. Applicants to be referees complete a short form that includes the applicant's education and experience, prior court appointments, and the appointment requested. The Office of Court Administration does not conduct screening of those seeking appointment, and appointment of referees is left to the discretion of individual judges. Rules of the Unified Court System, pt. 36 Appointments; NYS Office of Court Administration, Report of the Commission on Fiduciary Appointments (Dec. 2001).

4. No per se rule in the New York Rules of Professional Conduct prohibits the Assistant District Attorney from accepting an appointment to a referee panel. We caution, however, that apart from the Rules of Professional Conduct, there could be other provisions – such as in county law or the ethics rules for a particular District Attorney's office – that could prohibit an Assistant District Attorney from accepting an appointment as a referee. This committee does not opine on questions of law, regulation or agency policy.

5. Moreover, although no per se provision in the Rules of Professional Conduct prohibits the Assistant District Attorney from accepting an appointment as a referee, the rules governing conflicts of interest may prohibit an Assistant District Attorney, in particular situations, from accepting appointment to the panel generally or overseeing a particular foreclosure:

> Except as provided in paragraph (b), a lawyer shall not represent a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that . . .
> > (2) there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests.

Rule 1.7(a); see also Rule 1.7(b) (setting forth an exception based on informed consent and other factors).

6. An Assistant District Attorney should avoid situations in which his or her interests in being a referee would create a conflict under Rule 1.7(a)(2). For example, given the discretion of a judge to make a referee appointment, the attorney should consider whether it is appropriate to accept a referee assignment from a judge before whom the attorney frequently appears or is currently appearing in the role of prosecutor, or to seek appointment to a panel that would routinely result in assignments from such a judge.

7. While it usually will be ethical for an attorney to accept an appointment to a referee panel, the Assistant District Attorney must also consider whether there may be a conflict under Rule 1.7(a)(2) with respect to an appointment to oversee any particular foreclosure. An attorney should not serve as a referee in a matter where one of the parties to the foreclosure is currently being prosecuted or is likely to be prosecuted by the District Attorney's office in which the Assistant District Attorney serves. The Assistant District Attorney should also consider whether it would be appropriate to serve as a referee in a proceeding in which he or she has previously participated in a criminal matter in which any party to the foreclosure was involved. Whether serving as a referee in such a situation would constitute a conflict under Rule 1.7(a)(2) might depend on the length of time that had passed since the criminal proceeding, the extent of the Assistant District Attorney's involvement in that matter, and the extent of the party's involvement in that matter (e.g., as a defendant, witness, juror, or complainant). Where the foreclosure involves law enforcement personnel with whom the Assistant District Attorney works as a prosecutor, the attorney should weigh whether these professional relationships might affect his or her professional judgment. See N.Y. State 544 (1982); N.Y. State 800 (1986).

8. We note also that should an Assistant District Attorney accept an appointment as a referee in a matter, he or she might thereafter be subject to various provisions of Rule 1.12, such as restrictions on subsequent employment, because a referee is an "adjudicative officer" and a "third-party neutral," which are two of the categories of lawyers covered by that Rule. See Rule 1.12, Cmt. [1]. The question before us is whether an Assistant District Attorney may accept appointment as a referee, not what restrictions may apply to him or her after accepting such appointment. But we urge an Assistant District Attorney in this situation to study Rule 1.12 carefully if and when he or she accepts an appointment as a referee.

CONCLUSION:

9. A full-time prosecutor may accept appointment to a referee foreclosure panel and may oversee foreclosure proceedings, provided there is no conflict under the Rules of Professional Conduct.

OPINION 894 (12/01/2011)

TOPIC: Communication with represented party; service of process

DIGEST: When authorized by statute, an attorney may personally serve process on a represented party and ask certain related questions, but may not go beyond service of process to communicate on the subject of the representation without the consent of such party's lawyer.

RULES: 1.0(l), 4.2

FACTS:

1. An attorney for a landlord, to commence a summary eviction proceeding, serves a petition and notice of petition. The tenant appears by counsel and challenges the service. Landlord's attorney wishes to effect new service by personally serving the notice and petition directly upon the tenant.

QUESTION:

2. May an attorney personally serve process on a party known to be represented?

OPINION:

3. The New York Rules of Professional Conduct provide:

> "In representing a client, a lawyer shall not communicate or cause another to communicate about the subject of the representation with a party that the lawyer knows to be represented by another lawyer in the matter, unless the lawyer has the prior consent of the other lawyer or is authorized to do so by law."

Rule 4.2(a).

4. Clearly the tenant is represented by a lawyer in the matter. The validity of the original service of process is irrelevant to this issue. See Rule 1.0(l)(defining "matter" to include a claim or controversy as well as a proceeding). Landlord's attorney therefore may not "communicate or cause another to communicate" with the tenant about the subject of the representation without the prior consent of the tenant's lawyer unless landlord's attorney is authorized to do so by law.

5. The purpose of Rule 4.2 is to promote the proper functioning of the legal system by protecting a person who has chosen to be represented by a lawyer in a matter against possible over-reaching by other lawyers who represent clients in the matter. See Rule 4.2, Cmt. [1]. Although the rule is popularly known as the "no-contact" rule, by its terms the rule prohibits contact without the opposing lawyer's consent only if (a) such contact involves communication, (b) the communication is about the subject of the representation, and (c) the communication is not authorized by law.

6. Rule 4.2 is not limited to oral communication. A letter mailed or handed to the represented tenant by the lawyer or the lawyer's agent, if it argued the landlord's position or offered a settlement of the matter, clearly would constitute a prohibited communication. Whether legal process that commences a court action also constitutes "communication about the subject of the representation" is a question we need not decide, because another clause of the Rule is sufficient to answer the inquiry.

7. Rule 4.2 allows a lawyer to communicate with an unrepresented person when "authorized to do so by law." The Real Property Actions and Proceedings Law provides for process to be personally served upon the respondent in the proceeding, without reference to whether the respondent is represented. "Service of the notice of petition and petition shall be made by personally delivering them to the respondent," or alternatively, by specified forms of mail to the respondent in addition to either delivering the papers to a person of suitable age and discretion at the property sought to be recovered, or else leaving the papers in a specified manner at the property. RPAPL § 735(1).

8. Under the Civil Practice Law and Rules, authorization to serve process and other papers is very broad and does not exclude lawyers. "Except where otherwise prescribed by law or order of court, papers may be served by any person not a party of the age of eighteen years or over." CPLR 2103. Articles 8 and 8-A of the New York General Business Law contain requirements with respect to process servers. Both specifically exempt attorneys from the definition of process servers who are required to maintain records (which clearly would not be necessary if attorneys could not personally serve process). GBL §§ 89-t, 89-bb. Although many lawyers use professional process servers, the CPLR does not require them to do so.[27] And if it would violate the Rule for the lawyer personally to effect service, then it would be equally violative for the lawyer to "cause another," such as a process server, to do so. There is no violation in either case, because service directly upon a respondent, even if represented, is authorized by law.

9. May a lawyer, when serving process on a represented person, engage in conversation with that person? It is permissible, whether or not advisable, to discuss matters wholly unrelated to the representation. Some more related communications are common in the course of serving process. For example, the server may have occasion to ask the prospective recipient whether he or she is the person named in the papers, or to ask the recipient to sign an acknowledgment of receipt of service.

10. We doubt that asking the tenant to confirm his or her identity, or to sign an acknowledgment of receipt, would be a communication "about the subject of the representation" within the meaning of Rule 4.2. In any event, we believe that communications such as these would fall within the legal authorization for making service directly upon the respondent. The CPLR anticipates that a person serving process may have occasion to engage in some such types of communication. See CPLR 306 (d) & (e) (allowing proof of service by means including "a signed acknowledgment of receipt of a summons and complaint" or a "writing admitting service by the person to be served").

11. However, a statute providing for service directly upon parties (including represented ones) does not constitute a general authorization of communication with such persons during the course of service. A lawyer serving process on a represented person must be careful not to exceed the scope of 27 In fact there can be legitimate reasons, not involving circumvention of Rule 4.2, for a lawyer personally to effect service. For example, the lawyer may wish to save the cost of a professional server or to be assured that service is timely and valid.

the authorization in any way that would violate the no-contact rule.[28] Conversation on the subject matter of the representation, if not included within the authorization for service of process, remains prohibited.

CONCLUSION:

12. An attorney may personally serve process on a represented party as authorized by statute. In the course of making service, the attorney may ask the represented party if he or she is the person named in the papers, and may request the represented party to sign an acknowledgment of receipt of process. The attorney may not, however, without the consent of that person's lawyer, go beyond service of process to elicit or participate in communications with that person about the subject of the representation.

28 We note the approach to this issue that has been taken by another State. In Florida, the analogue to our Rule 4.2 states no exception for communications authorized by law, so there is reason for it to include an explicit but limited exception for service of process:

> "In representing a client, a lawyer shall not communicate about the subject of the representation with a person the lawyer knows to be represented by another lawyer in the matter, unless the lawyer has the consent of the other lawyer. Notwithstanding the foregoing, an attorney may, without such prior consent, communicate with another's client in order to meet the requirements of any court rule, statute or contract requiring notice or service of process directly on an adverse party, in which event the communication shall be strictly restricted to that required by the court rule, statute or contract, and a copy shall be provided to the adverse party's attorney."

Fla. Rule 4-4.2(a).

TOPIC: Spousal conflicts of interest.

DIGEST: Absent informed consent confirmed in writing, a sole practitioner may not represent a client in a matter where the opposing party is represented by a lawyer in a five-lawyer firm in which her spouse is the senior partner. The lawyer in her spouse's firm representing the opposing party may also have a conflict, which would be imputed to all lawyers in the spouse's firm unless it can be and is cured by informed consent, confirmed in writing.

RULES: 1.0(h) & (j), 1.6(c), 1.7, 1.10(a), (d) & (h)

QUESTION:

1. A sole practitioner practices law from home in a small community, but occasionally uses the conference room and telephone lines in her spouse's law firm. The spouse's firm is a five-lawyer firm at which her spouse is the senior partner. May the sole practitioner and a lawyer from the spouse's firm (but not the spouse) serve as opposing counsel in a case in which the sole practitioner's client is a minor?

OPINION:

2. On April 1, 2009, the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") replaced the New York Code of Professional Responsibility (the "Code") but, as we show below, there is no substantive difference in the provisions governing the answers to these inquiries.

A. Does a conflict arise from the spousal relationship?

3. The essence of the question is whether a lawyer may represent a client if the opposing counsel is an attorney in the law firm where her spouse is the senior partner.

4. To analyze conflicts arising from a spousal relationship, we start with Rule 1.10(h), which provides as follows:

> A lawyer related to another lawyer as parent, child, sibling or spouse shall not represent in any matter a client whose interests differ from those of another party to the matter who the lawyer knows is represented by the other lawyer unless the client consents to the representation after full disclosure and the lawyer concludes that the lawyer can adequately represent the interests of the client. [Emphasis added.]

5. Thus, under Rule 1.10(h), a conflict of interest arises when spouses represent opposing parties in a matter. However, the facts indicate that the sole practitioner's spouse is not representing the opposing party, but rather another lawyer in the spouse's five-lawyer firm. Therefore, Rule 1.10(h) itself does not apply.

6. However, Rule 1.10(h) is essentially a more specific version of Rule 1.7(a)(2), the general rule on concurrent conflicts arising from a lawyer's personal interests. Under Rule 1.7(a)(2), unless a lawyer complies with Rule 1.7(b), "a lawyer shall not represent a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that . . . there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests." Rule 1.7(b)(1) allows a client to waive a conflict of interest if the lawyer reasonably concludes that she can competently and diligently represent the client, but Rule 1.7(b)(4) adds that consent must be both "informed" and "confirmed in writing." These conditions for waiver also apply to a conflict arising under Rule 1.10(h). See Rule 1.10(d) ("A disqualification prescribed by this Rule may be waived by the affected client . . . under the conditions stated in Rule 1.7.").

B. Is the conflict imputed to other lawyers in the spouse's firm?

7. Rule 1.10(a) imputes one lawyer's conflict of interest under Rule 1.7, Rule 1.8, or Rule 1.9 to all lawyers "associated in" the same firm, but Rule 1.10(a) does not explicitly impute a disqualification arising under Rule 1.10(h). "Unlike disqualifications under most other . . . Rules, disqualifications under DR 9-101(D) are not imputed to the rest of the disqualified lawyer's firm." ROY D. SIMON, SIMON'S NEW YORK CODE OF PROFESSIONAL RESPONSIBILITY ANNOTATED 1450 (ed. 2008). (Rule 1.10(h) is identical to former DR 9-101(D).) Rule 1.10(h) applies only when the spouses personally represent opposing sides. Here, the lawyer's spouse does not personally represent the opposing party – a partner in the spouse's firm does. Yet this does not end our analysis, because we must also consider whether the sole practitioner or the opposing counsel in her spouse's firm – or both – have a conflict under Rule 1.7(a)(2). If the lawyer in the spouse's firm has a conflict under Rule 1.7(a)(2), then pursuant to Rule 1.10(a) that conflict would be imputed to all other lawyers in the spouse's firm.

8. This Committee considered an issue similar to the one here in N.Y. State 654 (1993). That opinion addressed whether a district attorney could prosecute a defendant represented not by the D.A.'s spouse but by the other lawyer at the two-lawyer firm where the D.A.'s spouse worked. Despite the heightened emphasis on fairness and the appearance of fairness in criminal cases, this Committee stated that under DR 5-105(D) (predecessor to Rule 1.10(a)), "disqualification of the district attorney's spouse in a particular case does not result in automatic disqualification of other lawyers in the spouse's firm." But the Committee qualified this general statement by noting that "whether others in the firm are disqualified will turn on the particular facts and circumstances, including the basis of the primary disqualification and the underlying policies and interests to be served." The Committee listed several relevant factors for the attorney to consider, including (i) "the size of the spouse's firm," (ii) "the spouse's position in the firm," (iii) "whether the spouse will derive direct or indirect financial or other benefit as a result of the [representation]," and (iv) "whether the spouse played any role in the [client's] seeking representation by the firm."

9. Applying these factors to the district attorney's inquiry in N.Y. State 654, this Committee concluded that the spouse's entire firm was disqualified by imputation. Our determination was based largely on the size of the firm. Because the spouse was a partner in a two-partner firm, this Committee noted that "the public would be likely to see the potential for abuse whether the defendant were represented by the district attorney's spouse's partner or associate, or by the district attorney's spouse."

10. N.Y. State 654 shows that our analysis does not end simply because Rule 1.10(h) does not explicitly impute the conflict of interest to the spouse's entire firm. In accordance with Rule 1.7(a)(2), the inquiring sole practitioner here must ask whether a reasonable lawyer would conclude that there is a "significant risk" that the professional judgment of a lawyer in the inquirer's position (i.e., married to the senior partner of the opposing law firm) would be "adversely affected by the [inquiring] lawyer's financial, business, property or other personal interests." As in N.Y. State 654, factors relevant to assessing the risk of an adverse effect on the inquiring lawyer's professional judgment include the size of the spouse's firm, the spouse's position in the firm, whether the spouse would share in fees earned from the representation, and the spouse's involvement in the representation of party opposing the inquirer.

11. Here, the firm at which the inquirer's spouse works has only five lawyers. The inquirer's spouse is the senior partner in the firm, and therefore would presumably share in the fees generated in the matter in which the inquirer is adverse counsel. Moreover, as the senior partner, the spouse may well have a supervisory role in the matter. Accordingly, a favorable result for the sole practitioner's client would most likely be an unfavorable result for her spouse. Thus, a conflict arises under Rule 1.7(a)(2). (If the sole practitioner's spouse was personally working on the case, then the sole practitioner and her spouse would be representing opposing parties, which would trigger Rule 1.10(h) – but the facts indicate that the spouse is not working on the case.)

12. Because there is a conflict under Rule 1.7(a)(2), the sole practitioner may represent her minor client only if she complies with Rule 1.7(b). Specifically, the sole practitioner may represent the minor client only if she reasonably believes that she can provide competent and diligent representation and her client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing. See Rule 1.7(b)(1) and (4). (Another condition, set out in Rule 1.7(b)(2), is that the representation is not prohibited by law. That condition explicitly turns on a question of law on which we have no authority to offer an opinion, but we will assume for purposes of this opinion that the condition is met because very few representations are prohibited by law.)

13. To ensure that the client's consent under Rule 1.7(b)(4) is "informed," the inquirer must adequately explain to her client "the material risks of the proposed course of conduct and reasonably available alternatives." Rule 1.0(j) (defining "informed consent"). Comment [11] to Rule 1.7 suggests some of the material risks when closely-related lawyers are representing opposing clients in the same matter. Even though the inquiring lawyer and the spouse are not both representing clients in the same matter, we think the concerns in Comment [11] apply. Comment [11] provides, in relevant part, as follows:

> When lawyers representing different clients in the same matter or in substantially related matters are closely related, there may be a significant risk that client confidences will be revealed and that the lawyer's family relationship will interfere with both loyalty and professional judgment. As a result, each client is entitled to know of the existence and implications of the relationship between the lawyers, before the lawyer agrees to undertake the representation. . . .

14. We assume that the lawyer in the spouse's firm who is representing the opposing party is aware of this entire situation (i.e., knows that the senior partner is married to the sole practitioner). Therefore, the lawyer in the spouse's firm who is representing the opposing party has a mirror-image conflict under Rule 1.7(a)(2). Because the sole practitioner's spouse is a senior partner in that lawyer's firm, a reasonable lawyer would conclude that there is a significant risk of an adverse effect on the lawyer's professional judgment. For example, the sole practitioner's spouse may not want the lawyer opposing her to be too aggressive against the sole practitioner, or may want the sole practitioner to win a large money judgment and a corresponding large fee to add to the family coffers. Many different scenarios are possible. Thus, a conflict arises under Rule 1.7(a)(2), and Rule 1.7(b)(1) and (b)(4) require that the lawyer opposing the sole practitioner's client must take appropriate action to deal with his conflict of interest. Specifically, the lawyer in the spouse's firm may not undertake or continue to represent the opposing party here unless he reasonably believes that he can competently and diligently represent the interests of his client and, if so, the client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing.

C. May a minor consent to a conflict?

15. The requirement that the sole practitioner obtain her minor client's informed consent raises the issue of whether a minor acting alone can give informed consent. This issue has been addressed in a number of opinions. In three opinions decided under the old Code of Professional Responsibility – N.Y. State 256 (1972), N.Y. State 274 (1972), and N.Y. State 790 n.4 (2005) – this Committee determined that a minor by himself or herself could not consent to a conflict. Nothing in the Rules of Professional Conduct changes this conclusion.

16. However, those opinions did not address the ability of a representative of a minor (such as a parent, guardian ad litem, custodian, guardian, committee, trustee or court) to give the necessary consent. The ability of a minor's representative raises questions of law beyond the jurisdiction of the Committee to decide. See, e.g. General Obligations Law §2-102 (defining the term "minor") and §§3-101 et seq. (addressing the effect of status as a minor). Other provisions relating to minors are found in the Penal Law, Family Court Act, Surrogate's Court Procedure Act, Social Service Law, Estate, Powers and Trusts Law and Domestic Relations Law. The sole practitioner should examine those sources.

D. Do the shared office facilities create a conflict?

17. Independent of the spousal relationship between the lawyers, there is also a question whether the sole practitioner's occasional use of the conference room and telephone lines in her spouse's firm means that they are deemed to be in the same "firm" for purposes of the Rules. In N.Y. State 715 (1999), which addressed temporary lawyers, we said: that "lawyers who share office space but are not in the same firm have been deemed to be 'associated' in a firm for purposes of the conflicts rules and vicarious disqualification rules. See also Rule 1.0, cmt. [2] (stating that whether two lawyers constitute a "firm" will "depend on the specific facts," and giving some examples). If the inquirer's use of the spouse's office facilities makes the inquirer "associated in" the same "firm" as the spouse within the meaning of Rules 1.0(h) and 1.10(a), then the sole practitioner would be disqualified from representing the minor to the same extent as a partner or associate in the spouse's firm. See N.Y. State 437 (1976); N.Y. State 609 (1990).

18. Based upon the facts in the instant matter, however, we do not believe that the sole practitioner's occasional use of the spouse's conference room and telephones rises to the level of at which the sole practitioner is "associated in" her spouse's firm for conflicts purposes (but that could change if the office sharing relationship expands or becomes more than occasional). See N.Y. State 609 (1990).

19. Nevertheless, the office sharing arrangement is relevant to another aspect of conflict of interest analysis. As we have noted above, the sole practitioner has a conflict of interest under Rule 1.7(a)(2) because the opposing counsel works at her spouse's firm, so she must obtain informed consent under Rule 1.7(b)(4) before agreeing to represent the minor client. As part of obtaining informed consent, the sole practitioner should disclose to her minor client (or the minor client's representative) the facts regarding her occasional use of the office facilities at the opposing firm. Those facts – including the risks to the client's confidential information – are part of the "information adequate for the person to make an informed decision" as to whether to retain or continue using the lawyer, and part of an adequate explanation of "the material risks of the proposed course of conduct and reasonably available alternatives," both of which are elements in the definition of "informed consent." See Rule 1.0(j) (defining "informed consent"). Needless to say, the sole practitioner should also take every reasonable measure to protect her client's confidences when using the conference room or telephone lines at her spouse's firm. Cf. Rule 1.6(c) (requiring lawyer to "exercise reasonable care" to prevent others from disclosing a client's confidential information except as permitted by Rule 1.6).

20. Since we conclude that the sole practitioner and her spouse are not part of the same "firm" based on the sole practitioner's occasion use of her spouse's office facilities, we need not decide whether the sole practitioner and her spouse's firm would have a conflict of interest under Rule 1.7(b)(3), which provides that a conflict is waivable only if "the representation does not involve the assertion of a claim by one client against another client represented by the lawyer in the same litigation or other proceeding before a tribunal."

CONCLUSION:

21. Absent informed consent, confirmed in writing, a lawyer may not represent a client in a matter in which the opposing party is represented by a lawyer in a five-lawyer law firm where her spouse is the senior partner. The lawyer in her spouse's firm who is representing the opposing party may also have a conflict, which would be imputed to all lawyers in the spouse's firm unless it can be and is cured by informed consent, confirmed in writing.

OPINION 896 (12/12/2011)

TOPIC: Providing lien search services to clients.

DIGEST: A law firm may subcontract lien search work to a third party but may not bill the client more than the costs incurred by the law firm. A law firm may provide lien search services to a client through the law firm's own employees, but if the lien search services are "not distinct" from the legal services, then the law firm must comply with the Rules of Professional Conduct regarding both the legal and nonlegal services. A law firm may provide lien searches to a client through a lien search firm affiliated with the law firm, but the law firm must comply with the Rules regarding both the legal and nonlegal services unless the law firm has advised its client in writing that the services are not legal services and lack the protection of a client-lawyer relationship. Even then, the law firm must comply with Rule 1.7 because the law firm's financial interest in providing the nonlegal services through an affiliated entity creates a conflict.

RULES: 1.5(d), 1.7(a)-(b), 1.8(a), and 5.7(a)-(b).

BACKGROUND:

1. This opinion concerns lien search services. Lien searches are used to determine whether a title owner's interest in property is encumbered, to what extent it is encumbered, and – in the case of multiple encumbrances – the priority of the encumbrances. For example, a mortgage lender will conduct a lien search of real property records to determine if there are outstanding senior mortgage liens, tax liens, mechanic's liens or judgment liens affecting the property. A judgment creditor will conduct a UCC lien search to determine if personal property owned by the judgment debtor has been pledged to secured creditors who will have priority in the collateral. A car dealer will conduct a lien search of the Department of Motor Vehicles to assure that his new car customer has paid off the loan on the trade-in vehicle.

2. A lien search is a ministerial function and does not constitute the practice of law. Lien searches thus may be performed by nonlawyers. Lien search companies, like title abstract companies, examine the public record to identify encumbrances affecting real and personal property and provide their search results to lenders, title insurance companies, judgment creditors, and other interested parties. Lien search companies do not sell insurance.

3. Some lawyers and law firms undertake to perform lien searches for clients through their own employees, without engaging a third party lien search firm. Other law firms contract with a third party to perform lien searches. Sometimes the third party is independent of the law firm, but other times the third party is owned by or is otherwise affiliated with the law firm. Law firms that contract for third parties to perform lien searches sometimes pay the third party and then bill the client for those services, and other times instruct the third party to bill the client directly.

QUESTIONS:

4. This opinion addresses three related questions:

A. May a law firm subcontract lien search work to an unaffiliated third party and bill the client more than the law firm pays the third party for those services?

B. May a law firm provide lien search services to a client through the law firm's own employees and bill the client for such services?

C. May a law firm provide lien searches to a client through a lien search company owned in whole or in part by lawyers in the law firm, and bill the client for such services?

OPINION:

Question A: Providing Lien Searches Through an Independent Third Party

5. A law firm may subcontract with an independent (i.e., unaffiliated) third party to perform lien searches, and may bill clients for the cost of such services. However, a law firm may not pass on the expense of a third party lien search to clients under the pretense that the law firm itself performed the services. The law firm must accurately disclose both the fact that third party provided the services and the terms under which such services were provided.

6. Further, a law firm may not charge the client more than the third party search firm's charges unless the law firm incurs additional costs. Rule 1.5 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") addresses fees and expenses charged by lawyers. Rule 1.5(b) requires a lawyer to communicate to a client the scope of the representation and the basis or rate of the fees and expenses for which the client will be responsible. Rule 1.5(d)(3) provides that a lawyer "shall not enter into an arrangement for, charge or collect . . . a fee based on fraudulent billing." Comment [1A] to Rule 1.5 says that billing is fraudulent if it is "knowingly and intentionally based on false or inaccurate information." Comment [1A] also says that "where the client has agreed to pay the lawyer's cost of in-house services, such as for photocopying or telephone calls, it would be fraudulent knowingly and intentionally to charge a client more than the actual costs incurred." Accord, ABA 93-379 (1993) ("A lawyer may not charge a client more than her disbursements for services provided by third parties like court reporters, travel agents or expert witnesses, except to the extent that the lawyer incurs costs additional to the direct cost of the third-party services").

Question B: Providing Lien Searches Through the Law Firm's Own Employees

7. If the law firm itself provides lien search services through its own employees, the applicable rule is Rule 5.7 ("Responsibilities Regarding Nonlegal Services"), which covers a law firm's provision of both legal and nonlegal services. Rule 5.7(a) provides, in pertinent part:

> (1) A lawyer or law firm that provides nonlegal services to a person that are not distinct from legal services being provided to that person by the lawyer or law firm is subject to these Rules with respect to the provision of both legal and nonlegal services. [Emphasis added.]

8. Thus, if the legal and nonlegal services provided by the law firm are "not distinct" from each other – as when a law firm renders both legal services and lien search services related to the same transaction – the Rules of Professional Conduct apply both to the legal services and the nonlegal services. For example, the mandates of Rule 1.5 with respect to fees (see above), as well as the mandates of Rules 1.7 and 1.8 covering conflicts of interest, apply both to the legal services and the lien search services when those services are not distinct from each other.

9. Regarding conflicts, Comment [5] to Rule 5.7 notes that "the lawyer may have a financial interest in the nonlegal services that would constitute a conflict of interest under Rule 1.7(a)(2), which governs conflicts between a client and a lawyer's personal interests." In addition, Comment [5A] to Rule 5.7 notes that if the legal representation involves exercising judgment about whether to recommend nonlegal services and which provider to recommend, or if the representation involves overseeing the provision of the nonlegal services, then a conflict with the lawyer's own interests under Rule 1.7(a)(2) is likely to arise on that ground as well.

10. Under Rule 1.7(a)(2), a lawyer may not represent a client if "a reasonable lawyer would conclude that . . . there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property, or other personal interests" unless the lawyer complies with Rule 1.7(b). To comply with Rule 1.7(b), the lawyer must reasonably believe that the lawyer can provide competent and diligent legal representation despite the conflict, and the lawyer must obtain the client's informed consent, confirmed in writing. In obtaining the client's informed consent under Rule 1.7(b), the lawyer should disclose the advantages and risks of obtaining legal and nonlegal services from the same provider in a matter, including the effect of the lawyer's financial interest in providing the nonlegal services. For example, if the payment of legal fees is contingent upon closing the transaction, the lawyer may have an incentive not to perform an exhaustive lien search or not to reveal information that might prevent the closing from occurring.

11. A lawyer or law firm providing both legal and lien search services in the same matter must also comply with Rule 1.8(a), which governs business transactions between lawyers and their clients. See Rule 5.7, cmt. [5A]. As Comment [6] to Rule 5.7 explains, when a law firm provides both legal and nonlegal services to a client in the same matter (or in substantially related matters), Rule 1.8(a) requires that: (i) the nonlegal services be provided on terms that are "fair and reasonable" to the client, (ii) the terms on which the nonlegal services will be provided are fully disclosed to the client in writing in understandable form, (iii) the client is advised to seek the advice of independent counsel about the lawyer's provision of the nonlegal services, and (iv) the client gives informed consent, in a writing signed by the client, to the terms of the transaction in which the nonlegal services are provided and to the lawyer's inherent conflict of interest. If the lawyer provides nonlegal services on terms generally available to the public in the marketplace, Rule 1.8(a)'s "fair and reasonable" requirement is ordinarily met. But if the lawyer charges above-market prices for the nonlegal services, then the "fair and reasonable" requirement of Rule 1.8(a) might not be met. In addition, Comment [7] to Rule 5.7 notes that "in the context of providing legal and nonlegal services in the same transaction, Rule 1.8(a) requires a full disclosure of the nature and extent of the lawyer's financial interest or stake in the provision of the nonlegal services."

Question C: Providing Lien Searches Through an Affiliated Third Party

12. When a lawyer or law firm refers a client to a company owned in whole or in part by the lawyer or law firm, Rule 5.7(a)(3) and (4) are relevant. They provide as follows:

> (3) A lawyer or law firm that is an owner, controlling party or agent of, or that is otherwise affiliated with, an entity that the lawyer or law firm knows to be providing nonlegal services to a person is subject to these Rules with respect to the nonlegal services if the person receiving the services could reasonably believe that the nonlegal services are the subject of a client-lawyer relationship.
> (4) For purposes of paragraphs (a)(2) and (a)(3), it will be presumed that the person receiving nonlegal services believes the services to be the subject of a client-lawyer relationship unless the lawyer or law firm has advised the person receiving the services in writing that the services are not legal services and that the protection of a client-lawyer relationship does not exist with respect to the nonlegal services, or if the interest of the lawyer or law firm in the entity providing nonlegal services is de minimis.

13. Thus, Rule 5.7(a)(3) provides that the law firm is subject to the Rules with respect to the lien search services if the person receiving those services could reasonably believe that they are the subject of a client-lawyer relationship. If the law firm's interest in the affiliated entity is more than de minimis, Rule 5.7(a)(4) establishes a presumption that the person receiving nonlegal services believes the services to be the subject of a client-lawyer relationship unless the law firm advises the client in writing that the services are not legal services and lack the protection of an attorney-client relationship. Even if the law firm has informed the client in writing that the lien search services are not subject to the Rules of Professional Conduct and lack the protection of an attorney-client relationship, Rule 5.7(b) reminds the affiliated law firm not to allow the nonlegal entity to undermine the lawyer's independent professional judgment and not to compromise the lawyer's own duty of confidentiality. Rule 5.7(b) states:

> Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph (a), a lawyer or law firm that is an owner, controlling party, agent, or is otherwise affiliated with an entity that the lawyer or law firm knows is providing nonlegal services to a person shall not permit any nonlawyer providing such services or affiliated with that entity to direct or regulate the professional judgment of the lawyer or law firm in rendering legal services to any person, or to cause the lawyer or law firm to compromise its duty under Rule 1.6(a) and Rule 1.6(c) with respect to the confidential information of a client receiving legal services.

14. Providing lien search services to a client through a lien search company owned in whole or in part by the law firm or by lawyers in the firm also raises the same conflict of interest concerns under Rule 1.7(a)(2) that we discussed above in answering Question B. However, if the lawyer or law firm has advised the client in writing pursuant to Rule 5.7(a)(4) that the lien search services are not legal services and lack the protection of an attorney-client relationship, then referring a client to a lien search company wholly or partly owned by the lawyer or law firm does not constitute a business transaction with a client and Rule 1.8(a) does not apply. See N.Y. State 755 (2002) ("A lawyer owning or operating a separately incorporated or distinct non-legal business who adequately informs the client that the non-legal business is not subject to the protections of the attorney-client relationship . . . may refer clients to the non-legal business without complying with" the rule governing business transactions between lawyer and client).

CONCLUSION:

15. A law firm may subcontract lien search work to a third party but may not bill the client more than the law firm pays the third party for those services, except to the extent that the law firm incurs additional costs.

16. A law firm may provide lien search services to a client through the law firm's own employees, but if the lien search services are "not distinct" from the legal services the law firm is providing to the client, then the law firm must comply with the Rules of Professional Conduct – including Rule 1.5 (governing fees and expenses), Rule 1.7 (governing conflict of interest), and Rule 1.8(a) (governing business transactions with clients) – with respect to both the legal and nonlegal services.

17. A law firm may provide lien searches to a client through a lien search firm owned in whole or in part by the law firm or its lawyers, and bill the client at cost for such services, but the law firm must comply with the Rules of Professional Conduct with respect to both the legal and nonlegal services unless the law firm has advised the client in writing that the lien search services are not legal services and that the protection of a client-lawyer relationship does not exist with respect to the lien search services. Even then, the law firm must obtain the client's informed consent pursuant to Rule 1.7(b) because the law firm's financial interest in providing the nonlegal services through an affiliated entity creates a personal conflict of interest.

TOPIC: Marketing of legal services by use of a "deal of the day" or "group coupon" website.

DIGEST: Lawyer may market legal services on a "deal of the day" or "group coupon" website provided that the advertising is not misleading or deceptive and makes clear that no lawyer-client relationship will be formed until the lawyer can check for conflicts and competence to provide the services. If the lawyer is unable to provide the offered service due to a conflict or competence issue, the lawyer must give the coupon buyer a full refund. If the coupon buyer terminates the representation, the buyer is entitled to a refund subject to the lawyer's quantum meruit claim.

RULES: 1.1, 1.5, 1.10(e), 1.16(e), 7.1, 7.2(a), 7.3

FACTS:

1. A number of websites offer subscribers a "deal of the day" or "group coupon" which enables the subscribers to purchase specified goods or services at a discount. For example, such a website might invite consumers to purchase a coupon which can later be exchanged for a described good or service, such as a spa treatment or a restaurant meal. The consumer buys the coupon from the website for an amount which can be significantly less than the regular price for the item in question.

2. The website negotiates the discount with participating vendors, who agree to provide the described good or service in exchange for the coupon or voucher which was purchased at a discount price. The coupon offer may involve a number of conditions or restrictions. Many times the offer is valid only if a certain minimum number of subscribers buy the coupon. Generally the coupon is valid for a specified limited time period after which it expires and is of no further value.

3. The website collects the cost of the coupon via credit card from the consumers who purchase it. Upon the close of the "deal of the day," the website deducts a percentage of the gross receipts as its compensation and pays the balance to the participating vendor.

QUESTION:

4. May an attorney market legal services by participating in a "daily deal" or "group coupon" website?

OPINION:

5. A recent ethics opinion from South Carolina approves of lawyers' use of such websites, subject to various limitations and conditions. See South Carolina Opinion 11-05.

6. Although not all legal services are suited to this kind of discount marketing, at least some might be. For example, a participating lawyer might offer the preparation of a simple will, for which the lawyer normally charges $500, for $250.[29] Indeed, a lawyer could permissibly publish an equiva-

29 It has long been established that a lawyer may properly offer a particular legal service at a specified price, so long as the lawyer actually performs the service for that price. Bates v. State Bar of Arizona, 433 U.S. 350 at 372-73, 378-79 (1977).

lent discount coupon advertisement in the newspaper, see N.Y. State 563 (1984), subject to the rules governing advertising.[30]

7. The use of such a website as a means of marketing legal services raises a number of issues. These include:

A. Whether the arrangement is an improper payment for a referral, Rule 7.2(a);

B. Whether the amount received by the lawyer could, under certain circumstances, result in a prohibited excessive fee, Rule 1.5;

C. Whether any statements made by or on behalf of the lawyer are false or misleading or otherwise violative of the rules regarding lawyer advertising, Rule 7.1; and

D. Whether the logistical arrangement of payment in advance for a legal service, before the lawyer has had the opportunity to check for conflicts or determine whether the lawyer is competent to perform the service and whether the client needs the service, constitutes a premature and improper formation of a lawyer-client relationship, Rule 1.1, Rule 1.10(e).

Is the money retained by the website an improper payment for a referral?

8. Rule 7.2(a) provides: "A lawyer shall not compensate or give anything of value to a person or organization to recommend or obtain employment by a client, or as a reward for having made a recommendation resulting in employment by a client," with two exceptions that do not apply here.

9. Comment 1 to Rule 7.2 notes that Rule 7.2(a) "does not prohibit a lawyer from paying for advertising and communications permitted by these Rules . . . ."

10. The question then arises whether the money retained by the website is merely an appropriate payment for a novel form of advertising or is a compensation for the referral of a client.

11. South Carolina Op. 11-05 concluded that the money retained by the website was the payment for "the reasonable cost of advertisements."

12. We note that the website has no individual contact with the coupon buyers other than collecting the cost of the coupon. The website has not taken any action to refer a potential client to a particular lawyer – instead it has carried a particular lawyer's advertising message to interested consumers and has charged a fee for that service.

13. We are not privy to the percentage amount retained by these various websites, but assuming that it is a reasonable payment for this form of advertising, we conclude that there is no violation of

30 For example, N.Y. State 563 makes clear that an offer of a discount from a customary fee would be misleading if the customary fee were not "readily ascertainable."

Rule 7.2.[31] This conclusion rests on the facts and assumptions stated here. Different arrangements between the lawyer and the website could lead to the opposite conclusion, i.e., that the lawyer is paying for a referral in violation of Rule 7.2.

Excessive Fee

14. Some coupon buyers may not, for various reasons, receive all or any of the legal services to which the coupons entitle them. Rule 1.5 prohibits excessive legal fees as an ethical matter, and fee arrangements are also subject to other rules as a matter of law. Applying these rules requires consideration of the various reasons that the legal services may not be delivered.

15. As described above, the lawyer's portion of the gross amount of the website's coupon sales receipts is paid to the lawyer shortly after the offer closes and before the individual buyers receive services. In some cases, when the buyer comes to receive the service, the lawyer may determine that he or she is unable to render the described services, either because of a conflict of interest or because the lawyer is not able to deliver competent services that are appropriate for the client. In such a case, the lawyer cannot provide what the coupon buyer purchased, and must give the buyer a full refund.[32]

16. In other cases, the coupon buyer, having changed his or her mind about going forward with the representation, may discharge the lawyer. If that occurs, rules of ethics and law require the lawyer to give a full refund, subject to any quantum meruit claim for services rendered prior to the termination of the representation. See Rule 1.16(e) (providing that upon termination of representation, lawyer must promptly refund any part of a fee paid in advance that has not been earned); N.Y. State 599 (1989) (citing case law for proposition that a client "may always discharge his attorney, with or without cause, and in the absence of a contract providing otherwise an attorney discharged without cause is entitled to be compensated in quantum meruit").

17. Some buyers might purchase the coupon from the website and then never seek the discounted services from the lawyer. Other buyers might wait too long to use the coupon, which has a stated expiration date, and try to use it after that date. In either case, the lawyer is entitled to treat the advance payment received as an earned retainer for being available to perform the offered service in the given time frame.

Compliance With Rules Regulating Advertising

18. Like all lawyer advertising, the "daily deal" advertisement must not be false, deceptive or misleading, Rule 7.1(a)(1). The lawyer must comply with Rule 7.1(j), requiring the availability to the public of a written statement describing the scope of the service advertised for a fixed fee. Having offered a particular service for a fixed fee, the lawyer must provide the service for the advertised fee if

31 A useful comparison might be to an arrangement where the lawyer publishes an advertisement on, for example, a directory website. Clicking on the ad follows a link to the lawyer's website. Instead of paying a flat fee for the placement of the ad, the website's compensation (and the lawyer's cost of advertising) is determined by how many times the lawyer's ad is clicked. In this arrangement the lawyer is still paying the cost of advertising, but the calculation of the cost is different from the traditional arrangement customary in newspaper or television advertising.

32 In reaching this conclusion we have assumed that the original advertisement on the website did not include any contrary provision regarding refunds.

the coupon purchaser seeks that service within the specified time frame, Rule 1.7(l). The offered discount must not be illusory, but must represent an actual discount from an established fee for the named service. Otherwise the advertisement would be misleading. See N.Y. State 563 at n. 2. The advertisement must include the words "Attorney Advertising" on the web page and in the subject line of any related email, as required by Rule 7.1(f). If the specific language of the advertisement makes it "targeted," then the advertisement is a solicitation and must comply with Rule 7.3 as well.

Premature and Improper Formation of Lawyer-Client Relationship

19. Purchase of the coupon entitles the consumer to the described legal service. The danger is that the arrangement could be taken to establish a lawyer-client relationship before the lawyer has had any opportunity to check for conflicts, determine whether the described legal services are appropriate for the consumer, and whether the lawyer is competent to provide those services.

20. South Carolina Ethics Advisory Opinion 11-05 confronted this issue and concluded that the problem could be avoided with proper logistical arrangements and disclosures. We agree.

21. To avoid the premature and improper formation of a lawyer-client relationship, the lawyer's advertisement on a "deal of the day" website must make clear that the offer made on the website is subject to a number of conditions. These would include that before such a relationship is formed, the lawyer will check for conflicts and determine that the lawyer is competent to provide legal services that are appropriate to the consumer. If the lawyer determines that the lawyer-client relationship is untenable for these reasons, the lawyer must give the coupon buyer a full refund. This arrangement should be disclosed as part of the coupon offer on the website, along with any other information needed to avoid making the offer misleading in any way.

22. If the lawyer-client relationship is formed, the lawyer must promptly describe the scope of the services to be performed and the fee arrangement as required by Rule 1.5(b).

CONCLUSION:

23. A lawyer may properly market legal services on a "deal of the day" or "group coupon" website, provided that the advertisement is not false, deceptive or misleading, and that the advertisement clearly discloses that a lawyer-client relationship will not be created until after the lawyer has checked for conflicts and determined whether the lawyer is competent to perform a service appropriate to the client. If the offered service cannot be performed due to conflicts or competence reasons, the lawyer must give the coupon buyer a full refund. The website advertisement must comply with all of the Rules governing attorney advertising, and if the advertisement is targeted, it must also comply with Rule 7.3 regarding solicitation.

OPINION 898 (12/19/2011)

TOPIC: Legal advice to unrepresented person

DIGEST: A lawyer does not give legal advice to an unrepresented person in violation of Rule 4.3 merely by including in a letter a legally mandated notice regarding expiration of the statute of limitations on the subject claim.

RULES: Rule 4.3

BACKGROUND:

1. The debt collection industry, including law firms engaged in the collection of consumer debt, have come under greater regulation and scrutiny since Congress enacted the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act ("FDCPA"), 15 U.S.C. §§ 1692 et seq., in 1978. Many states and various local legislative bodies have followed with legislation modeled upon the FDCPA and, in certain instances, have expanded the obligations imposed upon collection law firms. In particular, the New York City Council has added obligations upon lawyers engaged in the collection of consumer debt within New York City. In this opinion we address New York City's requirement that lawyers who correspond with an alleged consumer debtor regarding a debt that is beyond the statute of limitations must include a notice that the legal time limit for suing upon the debt has expired.

2. New York City Administrative Code Section 20-490 requires every "debt collection agency" that deals with the consumer public to be licensed by the New York City Department of Consumer Affairs. Under Code Section 20-489(a), a lawyer comes within the definition of a debt collection agency if the lawyer "regularly engages in activities traditionally performed by debt collectors, including, but not limited to, contacting a debtor through the mail or via telephone with the purpose of collecting a debt."

3. Section 20-493.2(b) provides that a debt collection agency shall not "[c]ontact a consumer about or seek to collect a debt on which the statute of limitations for initiating legal action has expired unless such agency first provides the consumer such information about the consumer's legal rights as the [Commissioner of Consumer Affairs] prescribes by rule." The Commissioner has promulgated a rule providing that a debt collection agency (which, as seen above, may include a lawyer) is required to include the following statement in a communication when the agency is seeking to collect upon a debt beyond the statute of limitations:

> WE ARE REQUIRED BY LAW TO GIVE YOU THE FOLLOWING INFORMATION ABOUT THIS DEBT. The legal time limit (statute of limitations) for suing you to collect this debt has expired. However, if somebody sues you anyway to try to make you pay this debt, court rules REQUIRE YOU to tell the court that the statute of limitations has expired to prevent the creditor from obtaining a judgment. Even though the statute of limitations has expired, you may CHOOSE to make payments. However, BE AWARE: if you make a payment, the creditor's right to sue you to make you pay the entire debt may START AGAIN.

6 R.C.N.Y. § 2-191(a) (emphasis in original). If a lawyer were ethically barred from giving this notice, or other mandated notices,[33] it could impede the lawyer's ability to engage in debt collection work.

QUESTION:

4. May a lawyer ethically engage in debt collection activities in compliance with the Commissioner's rule requiring communications to include the above-quoted notice?

OPINION:

5. Under the New York Rules of Professional Conduct, communications between a lawyer and a person unrepresented by counsel are governed by Rule 4.3, which in relevant part provides: "The lawyer shall not give legal advice to an unrepresented person other than the advice to secure counsel if the lawyer knows or reasonably should know that the interests of such person are or have a reasonable possibility of being in conflict with the interests of the client."

6. When a lawyer's client is a creditor seeking to collect a debt, it should be clear that the interests of the debtor "are or have a reasonable possibility of being in conflict with the interests of the client" (the creditor) within the meaning of Rule 4.3. In addition, we assume for the purposes of this opinion that the debtor is unrepresented. Accordingly, the predicates of Rule 4.3 have apparently been met, and the lawyer is prohibited from giving the debtor "legal advice" within the meaning of the Rule, other than the advice to secure counsel.

7. The term "legal advice" is not defined by the Rules. Whether a particular communication constitutes legal advice may depend not only on the words used but also on the context of their use. See Rule 4.3, Cmt. [2] (whether a lawyer is giving impermissible advice may depend in part on "the setting in which the behavior and comments occur"). When the broadest possible reading of the term "legal advice" would not serve the Rule's purpose, then a more common-sense reading may be appropriate.[34]

33 For instance, every summons issued to a defendant on a consumer debt collection case requires the summons to include specified language to the unrepresented party. The language required in the New York City Civil Court on consumer credit transactions is as follows:

> THIS IS A COURT PAPER - A SUMMONS. DON'T THROW IT AWAY!! TALK TO A LAWYER RIGHT AWAY!! PART OF YOUR PAY MAY BE TAKEN FROM YOU (GARNISHEED). IF YOU DO NOT SEE A LAWYER, YOUR PROPERTY CAN BE TAKEN AND YOUR CREDIT RATING CAN BE HURT!! YOU MAY HAVE TO PAY OTHER COSTS TOO!! IF YOU CAN NOT PAY FOR YOUR OWN LAWYER BRING THESE PAPERS TO THIS COURT RIGHT AWAY!!

22 NYCRR §208.6(d) (emphasis in original).

34 See, e.g., Rule 4.3, Cmt. [2] (stating that in "negotiating the terms of a transaction or settling a dispute with an unrepresented person," if the lawyer has complied with other requirements of the Rule, the lawyer may explain "the lawyer's view of the underlying legal obligations"); N.Y. State 728 (2000) ("Although the disciplinary rule, by its terms, forbids a lawyer from giving any advice to a party whose interests conflict with those of the lawyer's client, other than the advice to secure counsel, the rule has been understood to allow a lawyer, additionally, to give certain non-controvertible information about the law to enable the other party to understand the need for independent counsel").

8. Taking into account the purpose of Rule 4.3 and the setting in which the mandated notice is given, we believe that merely providing that mandated notice to the debtor would not constitute giving legal advice within the meaning of the Rule.

9. The basis for the rule against giving legal advice to unrepresented parties is "the possibility that the lawyer will compromise the unrepresented person's interests." Rule 4.3, Cmt. [2]. In this case, the notice is designed not to compromise but rather to serve those interests. It is not the lawyer who has made that assessment of the debtor's interests; rather, the assessment was made in the course of a legislative and administrative process. Nor does the mandate allow the lawyer to vary the form of the notice in any way that could serve the debtor's interests less effectively. The exact words of the notice are prescribed.

10. Moreover, it is in the nature of giving legal advice that a lawyer exercises professional judgment to apply legal principles to particular facts, and to impart some particular advice rather than some other possible advice so as to help guide decisions of the recipient.[35] None of those features are present here. Far from exercising professional judgment or choosing between different possible forms of advice, the lawyer is doing no more than complying with the explicit requirements of a rule that applies to every debt collection agency. The nature of a mandated notice and the purpose of this particular notice lead us to conclude that a lawyer who gives it is not giving impermissible legal advice.[36]

CONCLUSION:

11. A lawyer's compliance with the New York City Rule requiring a specified notice as part of a communication to collect a debt beyond the statute of limitations does not constitute giving legal advice to an unrepresented person as prohibited by Rule 4.3.

(28-11)

35 As expressed in EC 3-5 of our former Code of Professional Responsibility: "The essence of the professional judgment of the lawyer is the educated ability to relate the general body and philosophy of law to a specific legal problem of a client . . . ."

36 Cf. Pennsylvania Inf. Opinion 93-139 (opining that lawyer representing a party in a divorce proceeding could ethically send an unrepresented party a letter and concurring affidavit because these materials in part reflected standard notices required by civil procedure rules, and to the extent the papers went beyond that, they constituted merely a recitation of the applicable legal principles and did not constitute legal advice).

TOPIC: Solicitation; answering legal questions on the Internet

DIGEST: A lawyer may provide general answers to legal questions from laymen on real-time or interactive Internet sites such as chat rooms, but the lawyer may not engage in "solicitation" in violation of Rule 7.3. If a person initiates a request on the site to retain the lawyer, the lawyer may respond with a private written proposal outside the site so that those who did not request it cannot see it.

RULES: 1.0(a) & (c), 7.1(a), (q) & (r), 7.3(a) & (b)

QUESTIONS:

1. May a lawyer answer legal questions in chat rooms or on other social media sites on the Internet?

2. If so, may the lawyer also offer his or her legal services in the course of answering questions?

OPINION:

3. A lawyer asks whether he may visit real-time interactive internet or social media sites on which individuals post legal questions and, if so, whether he may answer questions and advise individuals of his availability as a lawyer. For example, if a layperson in an Internet chat room asks how long a person can wait to sue a lawyer for legal malpractice, may the lawyer respond by saying, "The statute of limitations in New York is three years"? May the lawyer also say, "Please call me at the following number as soon as possible for a free evaluation of your case"?

General principles of advertising and solicitation by lawyers

4. Rule 7.1 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") governs attorney advertisements, and Rule 7.3 governs a special form of advertising called "solicitation." We begin our analysis with the definitions of "advertisement" and "solicitation."

5. An "advertisement" is defined under Rule 1.0(a) as "any public or private communication made by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm about that lawyer or law firm's services, the primary purpose of which is for the retention of the lawyer or law firm. It does not include communications to existing clients or other lawyers."

6. "Solicitation" is defined in Rule 7.3(b) as follows:

> For purposes of this Rule, "solicitation" means any advertisement initiated by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm that is directed to, or targeted at, a specific recipient or group of recipients, or their family members or legal representatives, the primary purpose of which is the retention of the lawyer or law firm, and a significant motive for which is pecuniary gain. It does not include a proposal or other writing prepared and delivered in response to a specific request of a prospective client.

7. Thus, Rule 7.3(a) excludes from solicitation a response in writing to a specific request of a potential client.

8. In general, Rule 7.1(a)(1) regulates the content of an advertisement by prohibiting any lawyer advertisement that "contains statements or claims that are false, deceptive or misleading." Rule 7.3(a)(1) regulates the manner of advertising by expressly prohibiting a lawyer from engaging in solicitation "by in-person or telephone contact or by real-time or interactive computer-accessed communication unless the recipient is a close friend, relative, former client or existing client . . ." (Emphasis added.)

9. The term "computer-accessed communication," which is used in Rule 7.3(a)(1), is defined in Rule 1.0(c) as follows:

> "Computer-accessed communication" means any communication made by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm that is disseminated through the use of a computer or related electronic device, including, but not limited to, web sites, weblogs, search engines, electronic mail, banner advertisements, pop-up and pop-under advertisements, chat rooms, list servers, instant messaging, or other internet presences, and any attachments or links related thereto.

10. Comment [9] to Rule 7.3 sets forth the rationale for prohibiting solicitation by in-person or telephone contact or by real-time or interactive computer-accessed communication:

> [I]n-person solicitation poses the risk that a lawyer, who is trained in the arts of advocacy and persuasion, may pressure a potential client to hire the lawyer without adequate consideration. These same risks are present in telephone contact or by real-time or interactive computer-accessed communication and are regulated in the same manner. . . .

11. Comment [9] also explains that "[o]rdinary email and web sites are not considered to be real-time and interactive communications," but "[i]nstant messaging, chat rooms, and other similar types of conversational computer-accessed communication are considered to be real-time or interactive communication." Thus, the lawyer must not engage in solicitation in those forums. With that background in place, we turn to the specific questions before us.

Question 1: May the lawyer answer legal questions in chat rooms?

12. The first question is whether the lawyer may answer legal questions posted by laymen in chat rooms or on other social media sites on the Internet. Answering questions on the Internet is analogous to writing for publication on legal topics. As set forth in Rule 7.1(r), a lawyer may write for publication on legal topics without affecting the right to accept employment, as long as the lawyer does not undertake to give individual advice.[37] Comment [9] to Rule 7.1 echoes Rule 7.1(r) by cautioning that, in the course of educating members of the public to recognize their legal problems a lawyer "should

37 We add that a lawyer who gives individual advice in a chat room or on a public social media site might also be establishing an attorney-client relationship without undertaking the conflict check required by Rule 1.10(e) and would be revealing privileged legal advice in a public place in violation of Rule 1.6(a).

carefully refrain from giving or appearing to give a general solution applicable to all apparently similar individual problems, because slight changes in fact situations may require a material variance in the applicable advice; otherwise, the public may be misled and misadvised." Comment [9] adds that talks and writings by a lawyer aimed at the public "should caution them not to attempt to solve individual problems" on the basis of the information conveyed by the lawyer. A lawyer who adheres to those guidelines may answer legal questions posted by laymen on the Internet.

13. Comment [9] to Rule 7.1 also says that lawyers "should encourage and participate in educational and public relations programs concerning the legal system, with particular reference to legal problems that frequently arise." A lawyer's participation in an educational program "is ordinarily not considered to be advertising because its primary purpose is to educate and inform rather than to attract clients." If a communication is not advertising, then it also cannot be solicitation – see Rule 7.3, cmt. [1]. But Comment [9] to Rule 7.1 also notes that an educational program "might be considered advertising if, in addition to its educational component, participants or recipients are expressly encouraged to hire the lawyer or law firm." In that case, the communications would have to comply with Rules 7.1 and 7.3. See, e.g., N.Y. State 830 (2009) (a lawyer may ethically contact lay organizations to inform them that he or she is available to speak on legal topics, but "must adhere to advertising and solicitation requirements under the Rules where the communication is made expressly to encourage participants to retain the lawyer or law firm"). We therefore turn to Question 2.

Question 2: May the lawyer offer his or her legal services in chat rooms?

14. The second question is whether the lawyer may offer his or her legal services in the course of answering legal questions on the Internet. As already noted, Rule 7.3(a) prohibits solicitation in chat rooms and other similar types of conversational computer-accessed sites because they are considered to be "real-time" or "interactive" communications. However, the definition of "solicitation" in Rule 7.3(b) expressly excludes "a proposal or other writing prepared and delivered in responds to a specific request of a prospective client." (Emphasis added.)

15. Standing alone, a legal question posted by a member of the public on real-time interactive Internet or social media sites cannot be construed as a "specific request" to retain the lawyer. Thus, encouraging a layperson to retain the lawyer in response to such a question is prohibited by Rule 7.3(a)(1). On the other hand, if a lawyer's primary purpose in answering a question is not to encourage his own retention but rather is to educate the public by providing general answers to legal questions, then Rule 7.3(a)(l) does not prohibit the lawyer's responses.

16. Moreover, Rule 7.1(q) generally allows a lawyer to accept employment resulting from educational activities. Rule 7.1(q) provides as follows:

> (q) A lawyer may accept employment that results from participation in activities designed to educate the public to recognize legal problems, to make intelligent selection of counsel or to utilize available legal services.

17. Thus, if a potential client initiates a specific request to retain the lawyer during the course of permissible real-time cyberspace communications, then the lawyer's response to that person does not constitute impermissible solicitation. Yet because the lawyer's response in a chat room or interactive social media site would constitute a solicitation to everyone on the site who did not specifically request the lawyer's services, the lawyer may not post a response that encourages everyone on the site to retain the lawyer. Therefore, if the person making the request includes contact information, the lawyer may respond only to that person.

18. If the person making the request does not include contact information, however, then the lawyer's response must be in two stages. The first stage is to ask the layperson to communicate directly with the lawyer off the site, by email, phone, or otherwise. For example, if the person whose question the lawyer answered in a chat room says, "Can you represent me in my case?" the lawyer may post a response such as, "My communications on this site are for the purpose of educating the general public about legal issues. If you are seeking an individual consultation, please visit my website at www.jones.com." Alternatively, the lawyer may provide an office phone number, email address, and/or mailing address, without giving any information about the lawyer's services. If the person who requested the lawyer's services then uses one of these methods to contact the lawyer directly outside the real-time or interactive site, then the lawyer will not violate the restrictions on solicitation by preparing and delivering a proposal or other writing that responds to the specific request made by that prospective client. (Because advertising includes both public and private communications for the purpose of seeking retention, these communications must comply with Rule 7.1.)

19. However, the lawyer may not post a proposal offering his or her legal services on the real-time interactive Internet or social media site, because posting that information would be a real-time and interactive computer-accessed solicitation to people who did not request it, in violation of Rule 7.3(a)(1).

20. This Committee cannot answer questions of law. Accordingly, we cannot determine whether private responses to a layperson's specific request on a real-time or interactive computer-accessed site would violate § 479 of the New York Judiciary Law, which prohibits solicitation by attorneys. Nor can we determine whether § 479 or the Rules regulating advertising and solicitation are constitutional in light of Bates v. State Bar of Arizona, 433 U.S. 350 (1977), and its progeny.

CONCLUSION:

21. A lawyer may provide general answers (not individual advice) in response to legal questions from laypersons on real-time or interactive social sites on the Internet, but the lawyer may not engage in "solicitation" absent compliance with Rule 7.3. If a person initiates a request on the site to retain the lawyer, the lawyer may respond with a private written proposal outside the site so that persons who did not request the proposal cannot see it.

OPINION 900 (12/28/2011)

TOPIC: Assistant County Attorney as mediator in Child Permanency Mediation

DIGEST: An Assistant County Attorney ("ACA") may agree to serve as a paid or unpaid mediator in Child Permanency Mediations in which the County Department of Social Services ("DSS") is represented by another ACA, but the mediator should disclose and explain his connection to the County Attorney's Office. An ACA who is representing DSS in the mediation may have a personal conflict of interest, and that conflict will be imputed to all ACAs in the same office unless the conflict can be and is cured by DSS's informed consent, confirmed in writing. If the County Attorney's Office begins or continues working on a matter in which the inquiring ACA is serving or has finished serving as the mediator, then the office must timely and effectively screen the mediator and consider whether the circumstances give rise to any appearance of impropriety.

RULES: 1.0(e), (h), (j) & (l), 1.7(a), 1.10(a), 1.11(d), 1.12(b), (d) & (d), 2.4(a) & (b)

FACTS:

1. While inquiring counsel ("Inquirer") was a paid employee of a Community Dispute Resolution Program ("CDRC"), he was trained as a Permanency Mediator for the New York State Unified Court System's Child Welfare Court Improvement Project ("CIP"). Inquirer then applied to be on the roster of Permanency Mediators for a county. After Inquirer filed his application to be on the roster but before his application was accepted, Inquirer became an Assistant County Attorney ("ACA") for the County Department of Law. After Inquirer became an ACA, his application to be a Permanency Mediator was accepted and he is now on the roster in the same county where he serves as an ACA.

2. Inquirer's inquiry states, by way of background, that (a) mediators must disclose to all mediation participants any relationship to any party that may impact the mediator's appearance of neutrality, and (b) if any participant objects to a mediator on such grounds, the mediator will not facilitate the case. Inquirer does not cite authority for these assertions, but we will accept them as true for purposes of this opinion.

3. Permanency cases may be referred to mediation by various individuals, including employees of DSS. In addition, DSS employees may be parties to the mediation process. DSS itself, as an agency, always has an interest in the outcome of the permanency mediation process and may choose to be a party to a permanency mediation. Inquirer personally does not represent the county Department of Social Services ("DSS") in any matters in his capacity as an ACA, but another ACA does represent DSS in various matters, including permanency mediations.

4. Mediators are usually paid at the rate of $75 per hour. In some cases roster mediators are asked to mediate in the course of their employment. In that case the hourly rate is paid to the employer, with no financial benefit inuring to the mediator. However, Inquirer also mediates other cases either on a volunteer basis or in the course of Inquirer's employment with the mediation program, and neither Inquirer nor his employer are paid for such cases.

QUESTIONS:

5. Question A. May Inquirer, who is employed as an Assistant County Attorney, ethically mediate a case, either on a paid or unpaid basis, if another Assistant County Attorney from the same county represents DSS in the mediation?

6. Question B. If Inquirer serves as the mediator in a matter in which another Assistant County Attorney represents the Department of Social Services, will Inquirer create a conflict of interest for the Assistant County Attorney representing DSS in the mediation and, by imputation, for other attorneys in the County Attorney's Office?

7. Question C. If Inquirer is currently serving as a mediator (or has completed service as a mediator) in a matter in which the County Attorney's Office represents DSS, must Inquirer be screened from other lawyers at the County Attorney's Office?

OPINION:

Additional background regarding Permanency Mediation

8. The Child Welfare Court Improvement Project, a federally-funded initiative, supports the New York State Family Court's mandate to promote the safety, permanence and well-being of abused and neglected children. Recognizing the integral role courts play in charting the course for children who are the subject proceedings for abuse, neglect, foster care, termination of parental rights and adoption, CIP provides resources and technical assistance to enhance and promote innovation in court operations and practices, especially alternative dispute resolution.

9. As part of the New York State Unified Court System's Community Dispute Resolution Centers Program ("CDRCP"), the Unified Court System partners with local non-profit organizations known as "CDRCs" to provide mediation, arbitration, and other dispute resolution options as an alternative to court. CDRCs serve as neutrals in (among other things) landlord/tenant disputes, consumer/merchant disputes, and – most relevant to this inquiry – Child Permanency Mediation ("CPM"). CPM mediates child protective proceedings where the Family Court has placed children in foster care due to alleged parental abuse or neglect. See, e.g., Cynthia A. Savage, Recommendations Regarding Establishment of a Mediation Clinic, 11 Cardozo J. Conflict Resol. 511, 546 (2010). Children and families referred to CPM are usually at a stage in the Family Court proceeding when a decision must be reached about the child's permanent home. "CPM" provides a forum where parents, attorneys, social service agency staff, and other interested parties can focus on resolving problems that pose barriers to permanency for the child. It is always conducted under the auspices of a court – there is no such thing as a "private" CPM.

10. We addressed child protective proceedings in N.Y. State 800 ¶ 3 (2006), where we said: "The local child protective service investigates allegations and the county attorneys present ('prosecute') the case in the Family Court. Family offense cases by their nature pose a great risk of criminal charges being brought." DSS and the parents are thus always adverse to one another in a Family Court child protective proceeding. In John M. Zenir, Litigating Neglect Cases in Nassau Family Court, 60 Nassau Lawyer No. 9, at 11 (May 2011), the author stresses the adversarial nature of these proceedings, and the consequent necessity for "aggressive advocacy."

11. The parents in permanency proceedings may be represented or unrepresented.[38] In the Child Permanency Mediations contemplated here, the parents are typically either unrepresented or represented by an appointed lawyer. The parents have allegedly committed abuse and/or neglect and are attempting to mediate a determination as to the permanent placement of their child. In that volatile context, Inquirer could be selected to serve as a neutral, and DSS or its employees could be represented at the mediation by an Assistant County Attorney who works in the same office as Inquirer. Against that background, we turn to Inquirer's three questions.

Question A: May Inquirer facilitate if another ACA represents DSS in the mediation?

12. The first question is whether Inquirer may ethically mediate a case, either on a paid or unpaid basis, if another Assistant County Attorney from the same county is representing DSS in the mediation. The provision in the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") most relevant to our analysis is Rule 2.4 ("Lawyer Serving as Third-Party Neutral"), which expressly addresses lawyers serving as mediators and other neutrals.

13. Before applying Rule 2.4, we pause briefly to consider whether Inquirer, as a lawyer in the County Attorney's Office, is deemed to represent not only the County itself but also the County's DSS. Inquirer has told us that he does not personally represent DSS in any matters, but that another ACA in the County Attorney's Office does. The identity of a government lawyer's client is a question of law – see N.Y. City 1999-6 – but for purposes of this opinion, we will accept Inquirer's statement that he does not represent DSS. We will also assume that Inquirer, when acting as a mediator, will not be representing DSS (or any other client) in the mediation. Rather, he will be serving only as a third-party neutral. Rule 2.4(a) defines a "third party neutral" as one who "assists two or more persons who are not clients of the lawyer to reach a resolution of a dispute or other matter that has arisen between them." (Emphasis added.) Rule 2.4 thus specifically contemplates that lawyers serving as third-party neutrals do not represent the parties. As noted in SIMON'S NEW YORK RULES OF PROFESSIONAL CONDUCT ANNOTATED 198-199 (West 2009), Rule 2.4(a) makes clear that a "third-party neutral" is not representing the parties.[39]

14. Nothing in Rule 2.4 (or any other Rule) prohibits an ACA from serving as a mediator, whether in a Child Permanency Mediation or any other type of mediation, paid or unpaid, even though another lawyer in the County Attorney's Office represents a party. But Rule 2.4(b) does impose special obligations on lawyer/mediators. Rule 2.4(b) provides as follows:

> A lawyer serving as a third-party neutral shall inform unrepresented parties that the lawyer is not representing them. When the lawyer knows or reasonably should know that a party does not understand the lawyer's role in the matter, the lawyer shall 38 Zenir, supra, reports that in Nassau County Family Court, "the overwhelming majority of respondents . . . usually parents or other custodial parties, are represented by assigned counsel, either by attorneys employed by the Legal Aid Society of Nassau County or by 18-B Attorneys . . . because they are indigent." However, N.Y. City 2009-2 n. 2 cited informal surveys revealing that approximately 75% of litigants in New York City Family Court appeared without a lawyer for critical types of cases, including those involving domestic violence, child custody, guardianship, visitation, support, and paternity.

39 Under Rule 1.7(a)(1), a lawyer generally "shall not represent a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that . . . the representation will involve the lawyer in representing differing interests." (Emphasis added.) Rule 1.7 will not apply to Inquirer because Inquirer will not "represent a client" in the mediation.

> explain the difference between the lawyer's role as a third-party neutral and a lawyer's role as one who represents a client.

15. The import of Rule 2.4(b) is examined in Comment [3] to Rule 2.4, which says:

> Unlike nonlawyers who serve as third-party neutrals, lawyers serving in this role may experience unique problems as a result of differences between the role of a third-party neutral and a lawyer's service as a client representative. The potential for confusion is significant when the parties are unrepresented in the process. . . . Where appropriate, the lawyer should inform unrepresented parties of the important differences between the lawyer's role as a third-party neutral and as a client representative. . . . The extent of disclosure required under this paragraph will depend on the particular parties involved and the subject matter of the proceeding, as well as the particular features of the dispute-resolution process selected.

16. Thus, while Rule 2.4 does not prohibit Inquirer from serving as a mediator when another ACA is participating in a Child Permanency Mediation, Rule 2.4(b) does require certain disclosures to unrepresented parties. At a minimum, Inquirer "shall inform unrepresented parties" that he "is not representing them." Further, when Inquirer knows (or reasonably should know) that a party does not understand the lawyer's role in the matter, Inquirer "shall explain the difference between the lawyer's role as a third-party neutral and a lawyer's role as one who represents a client." In nearly all instances where parents are unrepresented by counsel and inexperienced in mediation and other legal matters, Inquirer "reasonably should know" that the parents do not understand Inquirer's role, and Inquirer therefore should explain that difference.

17. In addition, if another ACA is participating in the mediation as counsel for DSS, Inquirer should disclose that (i) Inquirer is an Assistant County Attorney, (ii) another ACA from the same office will be participating in the mediation, and (iii) the parents have the right to object to Inquirer serving as facilitator. These disclosures may enable participants who object to Inquirer on those grounds to have a different mediator assigned to the case.

18. Our answer to Question A is the same whether Inquirer is a paid mediator or an unpaid mediator. Rule 2.4 makes no distinction between paid mediators and volunteer mediators. Nor would payment trigger an analysis under Rule 1.7(a)(2), which provides that a lawyer generally "shall not represent a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that . . . there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests." Rule 1.7 does not apply to Inquirer because a mediator does not "represent a client" in the mediation. As noted in Rule 2.4(a), the parties to a mediation "are not clients of the lawyer."

19. We do not know whether any court rules, mediation rules, or other guidelines outside the Rules of Professional Conduct would prohibit Inquirer from facilitating a case in which another lawyer from the County Attorney's Office represents a party or is otherwise participating in the mediation, or whether any such rules or guidelines would require more extensive disclosures by Inquirer than we have suggested. However, Comment [2] to Rule 2.4 expressly notes that a lawyer (as opposed to a nonlawyer) who serves as a third-party neutral – especially under court auspices – may be subject to rules and codes outside the Rules of Professional Conduct. Comment [2] says, in relevant part, as follows:

> [T]he lawyer may be subject to court rules or other law that applies either to third-party neutrals generally or to lawyers serving as third-party neutrals. Lawyer-neutrals may also be subject to various codes of ethics, such as . . . the Model Standards of Conduct for Mediators jointly prepared by the American Bar Association, the American Arbitration Association and the Society of Professionals in Dispute Resolution.

If any such rules, standards, or guidelines apply to Inquirer, we express no opinion on them because our jurisdiction is limited to interpreting the New York Rules of Professional Conduct. We therefore strongly suggest that Inquirer determine whether he is subject to any such authorities outside the Rules of Professional Conduct, that he also study the ethics codes and policies that govern the County Attorney's Office in which he works, and that he consult with the County Attorney (if he has not done so already) before agreeing to serve as a mediator in any matter.

Question B: Will Inquirer create a conflict of interest for the ACA representing DSS?

20. The second question is whether Inquirer's service as the mediator in a matter in which another Assistant County Attorney represents DSS will create a conflict of interest for the ACA representing DSS, and (by imputation) for all other ACAs in the same office. At this point, Rule 1.7(a)(2) becomes relevant – not for Inquirer (who, as in Question B, does not "represent a client") but for the ACA who represents DSS in the mediation. Rule 1.7(a)(2) applies to a lawyer representing a client if "there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests." A determination under Rule 1.7(a)(2) depends on all the facts and circumstances, but we believe that the presence of a fellow ACA as mediator will ordinarily create a "significant risk" of an adverse impact on the professional judgment of any ACA who represents DSS in that mediation. For example, the ACA representing DSS may want to please Inquirer by reaching a settlement even if the settlement is not in the best interests of DSS.

21. Furthermore, under Rule 1.10(a), the conflict of any one ACA will be imputed to all other ACAs in the same County Attorney's Office. Rule 1.10(a) provides: "While lawyers are associated in a firm, none of them shall knowingly represent a client when any one of them practicing alone would be prohibited from doing so by Rule 1.7 . . . ." (The County Attorney's Office is a "firm" because Rule 1.0(h) defines "firm" to include "a government law office . . . .") Thus, every ACA in the County Attorney's Office will typically have the same conflict, and the conflict cannot be cured by substituting one ACA for another to represent DSS in the mediation.

22. However, a conflict arising under Rule 1.7(a)(2) can usually be cured by complying with Rule 1.7(b), which provides as follows:

> (b) Notwithstanding the existence of a concurrent conflict of interest under paragraph (a), a lawyer may represent a client if:
>
> > (1) the lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client;
> > (2) the representation is not prohibited by law;

> (3) the representation does not involve the assertion of a claim by one client against another client represented by the lawyer in the same litigation or other proceeding before a tribunal; and
> (4) each affected client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing.

23. Accordingly, any individual ACA who represents DSS in a mediation facilitated by Inquirer will have to determine as a threshold matter whether she "reasonably believes" that she can "provide competent and diligent representation" to DSS (a question dependent on all of the facts and circumstances of the particular mediation), and whether the representation of DSS when another ACA is serving as the mediator is "not prohibited by law" (a question beyond this Committee's jurisdiction). If the tests under Rule 1.7(b)(1) and (b)(2) are satisfied, then the ACA may proceed to represent DSS despite the conflict if the ACA obtains DSS's "informed consent" as defined in Rule 1.0(j), and that consent is "confirmed in writing" as defined in Rule 1.0(e). (Rule 1.7(b)(3) is irrelevant here because Inquirer is not representing any client, and the County Attorney's Office therefore is not representing clients on both sides of the same mediation.) If the ACA obtains the requisite informed consent, confirmed in writing, then the conflict will be cured and will not be imputed to other ACAs under Rule 1.10(a).

24. If the ACA fails either or both tests (i.e., if the ACA does not reasonably believe she can competently and diligently represent DSS and/or if the representation is prohibited by law), then the ACA cannot proceed and consent from DSS cannot cure the conflict. Moreover, the conflict will be imputed to all other ACAs in the same office. However, this scenario may never occur, because as soon as the County Attorney's Office recognizes the conflict, it is likely to object to the inquiring ACA's participation as the mediator, requiring his withdrawal. Once he withdraws as the mediator, the conflict will evaporate.

Question C: Must the County Attorney's Office screen Inquirer?

25. The third question is whether the County Attorney's Office must screen Inquirer from other ACAs in the County Attorney's Office if that office begins or continues to participate in the matter after Inquirer has begun serving as the mediator in the matter. The relevant rule is Rule 1.12 ("Specific Conflicts of Interest for Former Judges, Arbitrators, Mediators or Other Third-Party Neutrals"). Rule 1.12(b) provides as follows:

> (b) [U]nless all parties to the proceeding give informed consent, confirmed in writing, a lawyer shall not represent anyone in connection with a matter in which the lawyer participated personally and substantially as:
> (1) an arbitrator, mediator or other third-party neutral. . . . [Emphasis added.] [40]

26. Plainly, Inquirer will have "participated personally and substantially as . . . mediator" in any matter in which Inquirer is currently serving (or has finished serving) as the sole mediator. Thus, once Inquirer has begun serving as a mediator in a particular matter, Inquirer is personally barred from 40 Rule 1.12(e), which concerns "an arbitrator selected as a partisan of a party in a multimember arbitration panel," creates an exception to Rule 1.12(b) that makes the consent of all parties unnecessary, but a Child Permanency Mediation involves neither a "multimember" panel nor an "arbitration," so the exception in Rule 1.12(e) is irrelevant here.

working on that matter as a lawyer "unless all parties give informed consent, confirmed in writing . . . ." If the County Attorney's Office does not seek such consent or cannot obtain it (and we doubt that any party would consent to let the current mediator work on the same matter as a lawyer for a party), then other lawyers in Inquirer's firm (the County Attorney's Office) cannot work on that matter unless Inquirer is timely and effectively screened from the matter. The screening condition derives from Rule 1.12(d), which provides as follows:

> (d) When a lawyer is disqualified from representation under this Rule, no lawyer in a firm with which that lawyer is associated may knowingly undertake or continue representation in such a matter unless:
> (1) the firm acts promptly and reasonably to:
> (i) notify, as appropriate, lawyers and nonlawyer personnel within the firm that the personally disqualified lawyer is prohibited from participating in the representation of the current client;
>
> (ii) implement effective screening procedures to prevent the flow of information about the matter between the personally disqualified lawyer and the others in the firm;
>
> (iii) ensure that the disqualified lawyer is apportioned no part of the fee therefrom; and
>
> (iv) give written notice to the parties and any appropriate tribunal to enable it to ascertain compliance with the provisions of this Rule; and
> (2) here are no other circumstances in the particular representation that create an appearance of impropriety.

27. The term "matter" is defined in Rule 1.0(l) to include "any litigation, judicial or administrative proceeding, case, claim, application, request for a ruling or other determination, contract, controversy, investigation, charge, accusation, arrest, negotiation, arbitration, mediation or any other representation involving a specific party or parties." (Emphasis added.) Thus, once Inquirer has commenced service as a mediator – whether or not the mediation is over – Inquirer must be effectively screened from any involvement with the ongoing Family Court case. Unless the County Attorney's Office effectively screens Inquirer from any participation in the Family Court matter from the moment he begins serving as the mediator in the Child Permanency Mediation, the parties and the public have no assurance that Inquirer has not (even inadvertently) shared the parents' confidential information with other ACAs, and that lack of assurance will usually (if not always) create an "appearance of impropriety" that should preclude the County Attorney's Office from representing DSS.

28. Furthermore, unless the County Attorney's Office screens Inquirer from participation in every Family Court matter that may ultimately result in a CPM in which Inquirer may serve as the facilitator, the public and the parties will have no assurance that Inquirer will not (intentionally or inadvertently) share DSS's confidential information with the parents during the mediation. This situation, too, will usually (if not always) create an "appearance of impropriety" that should preclude the County Attorney's Office from representing DSS. We offer no opinion as to whether the so-called "rule of necessity" embodied in Rule 1.11(d)(1) would, by analogy, permit the County Attorney's Office to continue representing DSS despite this appearance of impropriety. Rule 1.11(d)(1) provides that "[e]xcept as law may otherwise expressly provide, a lawyer currently serving as a public officer or employee shall not: (1) participate in a matter in which the lawyer participated personally and substantially while in private practice or nongovernmental employment, unless under applicable law no one is, or by lawful delegation may be, authorized to act in the lawyer's stead in the matter . . . ." (Emphasis added.) Thus, the rule of necessity presents questions of law beyond our jurisdiction. We note, however, that Rule 1.12 does not contain any equivalent rule of necessity.

CONCLUSION:

29. An Assistant County Attorney ("ACA") may agree to serve as a paid or unpaid mediator in Child Permanency Mediations in which the County Department of Social Services ("DSS") is represented by another ACA, but when serving as a mediator the Inquirer should disclose and explain to all parties his connection to the County Attorney's Office. The ACA who is representing DSS in the mediation may have a personal conflict of interest, and that conflict will be imputed to all ACAs in the same office unless the conflict can be and is cured by DSS's informed consent, confirmed in writing. If the County Attorney's Office begins or continues working on a matter in which the inquiring ACA is serving or has finished serving as the mediator, then the office must timely and effectively screen Inquirer and must consider whether the circumstances give rise to any appearance of impropriety.

OPINION 901 (12/28/2011)

TOPIC: Simultaneous representation of corporation and individual director, officer, or shareholder

DIGEST: Simultaneously representing both a corporation and a director, officer or shareholder of that corporation can create conflicts, but if the conflicts are consentable, then the conflicts can be cured by obtaining informed consent from each affected client, confirmed in writing.

RULES: 1.0(f) & (j), 1.7(a) & (b), 1.9(a) & (c), 1.13(a), (d) & (e)

QUESTIONS:

1. Question A. May an attorney who has in the past provided personal legal services to an individual officer, director, or shareholder of a closely-held corporation in matters relating to the corporation thereafter undertake to represent the corporation?

2. Question B. May an attorney who currently represents a corporation also represent an officer, director, or shareholder of the corporation in matters unrelated to the corporation?

BACKGROUND:

3. The inquiring attorney ("Attorney") has represented a client ("Officer") over the course of a few years in various legal matters involving transactions. One representation related to Officer's interest as a minority shareholder and officer of a private, closely-held corporation, X Corp. Attorney's representation of Officer's interests in X Corp included negotiations concerning Officer's employment relation with and part ownership of X Corp. Those negotiations involved both the CEO of X Corp and the attorneys retained by the CEO to represent X Corp.

4. After the negotiations involving Officer and X Corp ended, Officer informed Attorney that Officer had been discussing with X Corp's CEO the possibility of X Corp using Attorney as its attorney on future matters, in place of X Corp's previous counsel. The CEO followed up with a direct contact to Attorney to request that he represent X Corp. Officer advised Attorney of Officer's understanding that A would not be able to continue representing Officer in any future matters related to Officer's interest in X Corp if X Corp became one of A's clients. However, Officer informed Attorney that Officer would like to continue using Attorney's legal services in the future for matters unrelated to the affairs of X Corp, such as the purchase of a summer home.

OPINION

Question A: If Officer is Attorney's former client, may Attorney begin representing X Corp?

5. The facts that have been presented to us describe the past and contemplated representations of Officer and X Corp in general terms, so we cannot apply the applicable New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") with precision. Rather, our opinion sets out general principles that Attorney should consider in evaluating whether conflicts of interest exist and whether and how any such conflicts can be cured.

6. We begin by discussing conflicts with former clients. We assume that Attorney has completed all of his legal work for Officer and that Officer is only a former client of Attorney, not a current client, at the time X Corp asks Attorney to begin representing X Corp. The rule governing conflicts of interest with former clients is Rule 1.9(a), which provides as follows:

> A lawyer who has formerly represented a client in a matter shall not thereafter represent another person in the same or a substantially related matter in which that person's interests are materially adverse to the interests of the former client unless the former client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing.

7. Since Attorney formerly represented Officer in negotiations with X Corp, Attorney could not represent X Corp in the same or a "substantially related" matter, without informed consent from Officer, confirmed in writing. The key term is "substantially related." When are two matters substantially related? Comment [3] to Rule 1.9 explains the concept as follows:

> [3] Matters are "substantially related" . . . if they involve the same transaction or legal dispute or if, under the circumstances, a reasonable lawyer would conclude that there is otherwise a substantial risk that confidential factual information that would normally have been obtained in the prior representation would materially advance the client's position in the subsequent matter. For example, a lawyer who has represented a businessperson and learned extensive private financial information about that person may not then represent that person's spouse in seeking a divorce. Similarly, a lawyer who has previously represented a client in securing environmental permits to build a shopping center would be precluded from representing neighbors seeking to oppose rezoning of the property on the basis of environmental considerations. . . . [Emphasis added.]

8. Attorney should test each proposed engagement for X Corp against the principles in Comment [3]. If X Corp asks Attorney to represent it in a matter that is not substantially related to Attorney's prior legal work for Officer, Attorney may ethically undertake the new matter even if X Corp's interests are "materially adverse" to Officer's interests. But if X Corp asks Attorney to represent it in a matter that is substantially related to Attorney's prior legal work for Officer and materially adverse to Officer's interests, then Attorney may not ethically undertake the new matter on behalf of X Corp without obtaining informed consent, confirmed in writing, from Officer. According to Rule 1.0(j), the term "informed consent" requires, among other things, that the lawyer adequately explain to each person "the material risks of the proposed course of conduct and reasonably available alternatives." The requirements for confirming informed consent in writing are set forth in Rule 1.0(e).

9. If Officer gives informed consent (confirmed in writing) for Attorney to represent X Corp against him in a substantially related matter, that consent does not automatically allow him to use Officer's confidential against Officer.[41] Absent Officer's consent to use Officer's confidential information to Officer's disadvantage, Attorney must still take one more step – Attorney must determine whether he has a conflict of interest under Rule 1.7(a), either because he cannot avoid using Officer's confidential information while representing X Corp or because Attorney's possession of Officer's confidential information would adversely affect Attorney's independent professional judgment in representing X Corp. See N.Y. City 2005-2 (addressing conflicts arising solely from possession of confidential information of another client). If Attorney has no such confidential information, then there is no conflict under Rule 1.7(a).[42] If Attorney does have such confidential information, then Attorney must determine whether he nevertheless "reasonably believes" that he can "provide competent and diligent representation" to X Corp within the meaning of Rule 1.7(b)(1) despite his continuing duty of confidentiality to Officer under Rule 1.9(c).

41 Consent to oppose the former client in a substantially related matter would be sought under Rule 1.9(a), but consent to use the former client's confidential information to the former client's disadvantage would be sought under Rule 1.6(a), which is incorporated by reference into Rule 1.9(c). Consent under Rule 1.9(a) does not imply consent under Rule 1.9(c), and vice versa. A lawyer who desires both to oppose a former client in a substantially related matter and to use the former client's confidential information to the former client's disadvantage must obtain consent under both provisions.

10. If Attorney does reasonably believe that he can provide competent and diligent representation to X Corp despite his continuing duty of confidentiality to Officer, then Attorney must obtain X Corp's informed consent, confirmed in writing. In obtaining X Corp's informed consent, however, Attorney must not disclose Officer's confidential information that is at the root of the conflict. If Attorney cannot disclose sufficient information to obtain X Corp's informed consent, or if Attorney believes that his continuing duty of confidentiality to Officer will prevent him from providing competent and diligent representation to X Corp, then the conflict is non-consentable.

Question B: If Officer is or becomes Attorney's current client, may Attorney concurrently represent both Officer and X Corp?

11. The second question is whether Attorney may concurrently represent both Officer and X Corp. The first sentence of Rule 1.13(d) –which had no equivalent in our former Code of Professional Responsibility – specifically addresses this situation, stating: "A lawyer representing an organization may also represent any of its directors, officers, employees, members, shareholders or other constituents, subject to the provisions of Rule 1.7." Therefore, Rule 1.13(d) directs us to analyze the second question under Rule 1.7, which provides as follows:

> Rule 1.7. Conflict of Interest: Current Clients
> (a) Except as provided in paragraph (b), a lawyer shall not represent a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that either:
>
> (1) the representation will involve the lawyer in representing differing interests; or
> (2) there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests.
> (b) Notwithstanding the existence of a concurrent conflict of interest under paragraph (a), a lawyer may represent a client if:

42 The "substantially related" test assumes that Attorney acquired confidential information from the former client, see Rule 1.9, cmt. [3], but that assumption should not carry over to Rule 1.7(a). If Attorney did not in fact acquire any confidential information that he needs to use on X Corp's behalf against Officer, then no conflict arises under Rule 1.7(a) because Attorney's representation of X Corp against Officer will not be impaired in any way.

> (2) the representation is not prohibited by law;
>
> (3) The representation does not involve the assertion of a claim by one client against another client represented by the lawyer in the same litigation or other proceeding before a tribunal; and
> (4) each affected client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing.

11. The term "differing interests" in Rule 1.7(a)(1) is broadly defined in Rule 1.0(f) to include "every interest that will adversely affect either the judgment or the loyalty of a lawyer to a client, whether it be a conflicting, inconsistent, diverse, or other interest."

12. To apply Rule 1.7, we need to evaluate whether Attorney's representation of X Corp would conflict with Attorney's continuing or renewed representation of Officer by creating "differing interests" under Rule 1.7(a)(1).[43] To make that evaluation, we need to know what legal work Attorney will be doing for Officer and what legal work Attorney will be doing for X Corp. The inquiry stated that Officer understands that Attorney cannot represent Officer in any future matters related to Officer's interest in X Corp, so we will assume that Attorney will not do so.

13. As Attorney's inquiry also gave the purchase of a summer home as an example of the kinds of legal work Officer might want Attorney to perform in the future, so we will assume that Attorney is engaged in representing Officer in buying a summer home at the time X Corp asks Attorney to take on a new matter for X Corp. We will further assume that X Corp has no interest of any kind in Officer's purchase of a summer home, and that Officer's purchase of a summer home therefore does not involve the Attorney in representing "differing interests" under Rule 1.7(a)(1). With all of those assumptions in place, we will analyze several hypothetical examples to illustrate different types of matters that Attorney might be asked to undertake for the X Corp.

14. Hypothetical # 1. As a first hypothetical, suppose X Corp asks Attorney to represent it in the defense of a personal injury claim in which Officer is not involved and has no interests, differing or otherwise. Because there are no "differing interests" between X Corp and Officer regarding the personal injury claim, a reasonable attorney could conclude that no conflict exists. If no conflict exists, then informed consent pursuant to Rule 1.7(b)(4) is not necessary.

15. Hypothetical # 2. As a second hypothetical – at the opposite extreme – suppose X Corp asks Attorney to represent X Corp in a dispute directly adverse to Officer (e.g., asserting a claim against Officer for usurping a corporate opportunity, or defending X Corp against a breach of contract action

43 Attorney's representation of X Corp could also, in theory, create conflicts under Rule 1.7(a)(2), which prohibits a representation when a reasonable lawyer would conclude that "there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests." However, nothing in the facts suggests that such personal interest conflicts are more likely here than in any other context, so we will not address Rule 1.7(a)(2).

brought by Officer).[44] Representing X Corp in a suit by or against Officer obviously will "involve the lawyer in representing differing interests," so Rule 1.7(a)(1) prohibits Attorney from representing X Corp against Officer unless Attorney "reasonably believes" he can "provide competent and diligent representation" per Rule 1.7(b)(1) to "each affected client" (X Corp and Officer). The aim of Rule 1.7(b)(1) is to ensure that Attorney's loyalty to Officer does not impair his competence and diligence on behalf of X Corp, and that Attorney's loyalty to X Corp does not impair his competence and diligence on behalf of Officer. The "reasonably believes" test in Rule 1.7(b)(4) depends on all of the circumstances. For example, it might be easier to meet in a minor breach of contract suit than in a fraud suit. If Attorney satisfies the "reasonably believes" test, then he must obtain informed consent, confirmed in writing, from both Officer and X Corp, per to Rule 1.7(b)(4), before undertaking the representation of X Corp.[45]

16. Hypothetical # 3. As a third hypothetical, suppose X Corp were to ask Attorney to advise the corporation concerning its by-laws, corporate compliance manual, compensation system, management structure, or the like. Those matters would potentially affect the rights and obligations of Officer, who is a shareholder and officer of X Corp. In some situations, a reasonable lawyer could conclude that Attorney's simultaneous representation of Officer and X Corp "will involve the lawyer in representing differing interests," which would create a conflict under Rule 1.7(a)(1). For example, Attorney might be reluctant to give advice to X Corp that, if followed, could adversely affect Officer's compensation or power at X Corp. Accordingly, Attorney could not undertake such a representation without obtaining informed consent, confirmed in writing, from both Officer individually and X Corp as an entity.[46]

17. Finally, whether Officer is a current client or a former client, he continues to be an officer and shareholder of X Corp. Consequently, when Attorney is acting on behalf of X Corp, Attorney should take steps to avoid any misunderstanding by Officer (or other X Corp personnel) about Attorney's role. As stated by Rule 1.13(a), when the organization's interests "may differ from those of the constituents with whom the lawyer is dealing, the lawyer shall explain that the lawyer is the lawyer for the organization and not for any of the constituents."

CONCLUSION:

19. Simultaneously representing both a corporation and a director, officer or shareholder of that same corporation can create conflicts, but if the conflicts are consentable, then the conflicts can be cured by obtaining informed consent from each affected client, confirmed in writing. (79-09)

---

44 We assume that Attorney is not representing Officer against X Corp. Nor could Attorney represent Officer and X Corp against each other in the same litigation matter even if both X Corp and client Officer gave their informed consent, because such a conflict would be non-consentable. Under Rule 1.7(b)(3), a lawyer may never handle both sides of the same litigation before a tribunal. That is a per se conflict and cannot be cured by consent.

45 In the facts here, Officer was the one who first suggested that X Corp retain Attorney as its counsel, which implies that Officer has already give his consent (express or implied) for Attorney to represent X Corp. However, Officer's consent was not necessarily informed consent. Each time Attorney A considers taking on a new matter for X Corp, he needs to make sure, per Rule 1.0(j), that Officer understands the material risks, advantages, and alternatives, and give Officer the opportunity to withhold consent in light of that explanation. Alternatively, Attorney may seek an advance waiver from Officer (and from X Corp) waiving conflicts before they arise, obviating the need to obtain a waiver for each new matter – see Rule 1.7, cmts. [22] and [22A] (headed "Consent to Future Conflict").

46 Whenever Rule 1.7 requires X Corp's consent to a conflict between X Corp and Officer, Rule 1.13(d) demands that "the consent shall be given by an appropriate official of the organization other than the individual who is to be represented, or by the shareholders." Thus, someone other than Officer will have to consent on behalf of X Corp, because Officer may consent to the conflict on his own behalf but not on behalf of the corporation.

OPINION 902 (01/13/2012)

TOPIC: Payment for marketing services based on contacts developed.

DIGEST: A lawyer may not base compensation to a marketing firm on the number of potential or actual clients the firm introduces to the lawyer.

RULES: 7.2

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a collection attorney who proposes to enter into a contract with a marketing firm. The firm would introduce the attorney to its network of doctors so that the attorney could seek collection work from those doctors. The attorney would prefer not to pay the firm a monthly fee, but rather to base the fee arrangements on "benchmarks and results."

QUESTIONS:

2. Can the attorney pay the marketing company a fixed fee each time the company makes an introduction and sets up a meeting with a doctor?

3. Can the attorney pay an additional fee to the marketing company if and when the doctor retains the attorney in a certain number of collection cases?

OPINION:

4. Lawyers may engage in marketing activities subject to various restrictions in the Rules of Professional Conduct. A lawyer who contracts with a firm to perform such services may not arrange for it to engage in activities that the lawyer would be ethically prohibited from undertaking directly.[1]

5. Here, the inquiring attorney would be contracting for advertising services governed by Rule 7.1. Moreover, those services could include forms of advertising targeted at specific recipients so as to constitute solicitation under Rule 7.3(b). In that case the attorney would also need to be mindful of the requirements of Rule 7.3, such as the limitations on solicitations made in person, by telephone, or by interactive computer-accessed communication.

6. Assuming that the services sought by the inquiring attorney would be compliant with the rules on advertising and solicitation, we turn to the questions posed, concerning permissible fee structures.

1 See Rule 8.4(a); Rule 7.3(b) (defining solicitation to include certain advertisements initiated by "or on behalf of" a lawyer); Rule 7.2, Cmt [1] (recognizing that a lawyer may compensate vendors engaged to provide marketing services, but citing Rule 5.3 for the duties of lawyers "with respect to the conduct of nonlawyers who prepare marketing materials for them"); N.Y. State 887 (2011); Florida Opinion 89-4.

7. Rule 7.2(a) provides: "A lawyer shall not compensate or give anything of value to a person or organization to recommend or obtain employment by a client, or as a reward for having made a recommendation resulting in employment by a client," except in two situations not relevant to this inquiry. Comment [1] to Rule 7.2 acknowledges that the rule allows a lawyer "to pay for advertising and communications permitted by these Rules," but states that lawyers "are not permitted to pay others for channeling professional work."

8. In several of our prior opinions we have applied this rule, or its virtually identical predecessor under the Code of Professional Responsibility, and have disapproved arrangements involving the exchange of money or other value for referrals.[2]

9. The proposed fee arrangements are inconsistent with the text of Rule 7.2(a) and with our prior opinions. Payment of a fee to the marketing firm for an introduction and meeting with a potential doctor client would be a payment to recommend or obtain employment by a prospective client. Paying the firm an additional fee if and when the doctor retains the attorney in a certain number of collection cases would violate the prohibition of rewards for having made a recommendation resulting in employment by a client.

CONCLUSION:

10. A lawyer who contracts with a marketing firm to introduce the lawyer to its network of doctors as prospective clients may not compensate the firm with a fee for each introduction and meeting with one of the doctors, nor with a fee if and when a doctor retains the attorney in a certain number of collection cases.

State 779 (2004) (improper for attorney to pay marketing organization for bundles of "leads" to potential clients); N.Y. State 565 (1984) ("any compensation in the form of a commission or percentage based upon the volume of business developed would be clearly improper[,] . . . would tend to give the marketing firm a pecuniary interest in the success of the solicitation, and may lead to the use of hard-sell tactics or other improprieties").

TOPIC: Revocation of consent to conflict

DIGEST: When a lawyer jointly represents two co-defendants pursuant to a validly obtained consent to the dual representation and to any future conflicts that might arise between the clients, and one of the clients later revokes consent, whether the lawyer may continue to represent the non-revoking client depends upon the circumstances, unless an advance agreement specifies what happens upon revocation of consent.

RULES: 1.7(a) & (b), 1.9(a) & (c), 1.10(a), 1.16(b), (d) & (e)

QUESTION:

1. When a lawyer jointly represents co-defendants in litigation pursuant to a validly obtained consent to the dual representation and to any future conflicts that might arise between the clients, and one client later revokes consent, may the lawyer continue to represent the non-revoking client?

BACKGROUND:

2. The inquiring lawyer ("Lawyer") has two clients named Alpha and Beta, who were both named as defendants in the same lawsuit. At the outset of the lawsuit, Alpha and Beta each gave their informed consent in writing for Lawyer to represent both of them in the litigation. At the time of the consent, Alpha and Beta had no differing interests and did not believe that any differing interests would develop later. Nevertheless, given the potential for conflicts between co-defendants, Alpha and Beta agreed to waive in advance any conflict that might eventually emerge between them. We assume for purposes of this opinion that the written consent executed by both Alpha and Beta complied with the definition of "informed consent" contained in Rule 1.0(j) and complied with the principles governing consent to future conflicts of interest, see Rule 1.7, cmts. [22]-[22A]. However, the consent did not address how the parties or Lawyer would proceed if either client later changed its mind and revoked consent.

3. Two years later, after substantial discovery in the litigation, Alpha determined that its interests differed significantly from Beta's interests, and Alpha revoked its consent to Lawyer's simultaneous representation of Beta. Lawyer is now uncertain whether he may continue representing Beta in the litigation without Alpha's consent.

OPINION:

4. Before we analyze the facts presented to us here, we note that an advance agreement can avoid many uncertainties surrounding a client's revocation of consent to a multiple representation. For example, an advance agreement could specify whether a lawyer may continue to represent either client after consent is revoked, and whether the lawyer may use or reveal confidential information obtained from the client who has revoked consent during the representation. Unfortunately, the consent at hand did not cover those matters. Accordingly, we must analyze the issues based solely on the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules").

5. We do not question the validity of the initial waivers given by Alpha and Beta. We focus only on Lawyer's duties and responsibilities now that Alpha has revoked its consent to the dual representation. Of course, a client has the right to discharge its lawyer at any time for virtually any reason, and under Rule 1.16(b)(3) a lawyer must withdraw from a representation when discharged, unless the tribunal's permission for withdrawal is required and the tribunal denies permission to withdraw, in which case Rule 1.16(d) requires the lawyer to continue the representation. Thus, Alpha has the right to terminate Lawyer (subject to the tribunal's approval) – but Alpha does not have the right to terminate the attorney-client relationship between Lawyer and Beta. Whether Lawyer must cease representing Beta depends on the Rules of Professional Conduct.

A. Common representation and revocation

6. The basic rule governing concurrent conflicts between two or more clients is Rule 1.7(a)(1), which provides as follows:

> Rule 1.7 Conflict of Interest: Current Clients
>
> (a) Except as provided in paragraph (b), a lawyer shall not represent a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that either:
>
> (1) the representation will involve the lawyer in representing differing interests . . . .
>
> (b) Notwithstanding the existence of a concurrent conflict of interest under paragraph (a), a lawyer may represent a client if:
>
> (1) the lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client;
>
> (2) the representation is not prohibited by law;
>
> (3) the representation does not involve the assertion of a claim by one client against another client represented by the lawyer in the same litigation or other proceeding before a tribunal; and
> (4) each affected client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing.

7. Here, even though Alpha and Beta had no "differing interests" at the outset of the litigation, Lawyer obtained informed consent from each of them, in writing, to their joint representation, including a waiver of any conflict of interest that might later develop between them. After discovery in the lawsuit revealed significant differing interests between Alpha and Beta, Alpha revoked its consent to the dual representation and revoked its advance conflict waiver. Lawyer apparently desires to withdraw from representing Alpha and continue representing Beta.

8. Comments [4] and [5] to Rule 1.7 address this situation as follows:

> [4] If a conflict arises after representation has been undertaken, the lawyer ordinarily must withdraw from the representation unless the lawyer has obtained the informed > consent of the client under the conditions of paragraph (b). See Rule 1.16(b)(1). Where more than one client is involved, whether the lawyer may continue to represent any of the clients is determined both by the lawyer's ability to comply with duties owed to the former client and by the lawyer's ability to represent adequately the remaining client or clients, given the lawyer's duties to the former client. See Rule 1.9; see also Comments [5], [29A].

> [5] Unforeseeable developments . . . might create conflicts in the midst of a representation. . . . Depending on the circumstances, the lawyer may have the option to withdraw from one of the representations in order to avoid the conflict. The lawyer must seek court approval where necessary and take steps to minimize harm to the clients. See Rules 1.16(d) and (e). The lawyer must continue to protect the confidences of the client from whose representation the lawyer has withdrawn. See Rule 1.9(c). [Emphasis added.]

9. Comment [21] to Rule 1.7, which is directly on point here, focuses on a lawyer's ethical options and obligations when a client revokes a previously given consent:

> [21] A client who has given consent to a conflict may revoke the consent and, like any other client, may terminate the lawyer's representation at any time. Whether revoking consent to the client's own representation precludes the lawyer from continuing to represent other clients depends on the circumstances, including the nature of the conflict, whether the client revoked consent because of a material change in circumstances, the reasonable expectations of the other clients, and whether material detriment to the other clients or the lawyer would result. [Emphasis added.]

10. Here, the "nature of the conflict" (a factor identified in Comment [21]) is a dual or "common" representation of co-defendants in litigation. Comment [29A] to Rule 1.7 explains what typically happens when a common representation fails due to conflicts: "Ordinarily, absent the informed consent of all clients, the lawyer will be forced to withdraw from representing all of the clients if the common representation fails. See Rule 1.9(a). . . "

B. The Effect of Rule 1.9

11. The cited rule, Rule 1.9(a), provides as follows:

> (a) A lawyer who has formerly represented a client in a matter shall not thereafter represent another person in the same or a substantially related matter in which that person's interests are materially adverse to the interests of the former client unless the former client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing.

12. Applying Rule 1.9(a) to the facts here, the Lawyer has formerly represented Alpha and is thus barred from thereafter representing another person (here, Beta) in the same matter if that other person's interests are "materially adverse" to the former client's interests, unless the former client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing. Because Alpha and Beta have developed differing interests, Lawyer's continued representation of Beta in the litigation would be materially adverse to Alpha. And because Alpha has revoked its consent to the dual representation, we infer that Alpha would not consent to Lawyer's continued representation of Beta, which has become materially adverse to Alpha. We also assume that Beta wants the Lawyer's continued representation and does not plan to find a new attorney in the Lawyer's place.

13. Thus, when differing interests arise during a common representation and prohibit a lawyer from continuing to represent both clients absent the informed consent of both clients, Rule 1.9(a) will prohibit the lawyer from opposing either client in the same matter, and the lawyer therefore must ordinarily drop both clients. But where a client elects to revoke a consent previously given and relied upon in undertaking a conflicting or potentially conflicting representation, whether the revocation prevents the lawyer from continuing the other representation depends, as Comment [21] says, on the circumstances, including (i) "the nature of the conflict," (ii) "whether the client revoked consent because of a material change in circumstances," (iii) "the reasonable expectations of the other clients," and (iv) "whether material detriment to the other clients or the lawyer would result."

14. The RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF THE LAW GOVERNING LAWYERS §122, comment f also directly addresses revocation. Comment f provides, in pertinent part, as follows:

> f. Revocation of consent . . . A client who has given informed consent to an otherwise conflicted representation may at any time revoke the consent. Revoking consent to the client's own representation, however, does not necessarily prevent the lawyer from continuing to represent other clients who had been jointly represented along with the revoking client. Whether the lawyer may continue the other representation depends on whether the client was justified in revoking the consent . . . and whether material detriment to the other client would result. . . .
> A material change in the factual basis on which the client originally gave informed consent can justify a client in withdrawing consent. . . . [T]he consent of a client to be represented concurrently with another normally presupposes that the client-clients will not develop seriously antagonistic positions. If such antagonism develops, it might warrant revoking consent. . . . If the conflict is subject to informed consent, the lawyer must thereupon obtain renewed informed consent of the clients, now adequately informed of the change of circumstances. If . . . the lawyer cannot obtain informed consent from the other client . . . the lawyer must withdraw from representing all affected clients adverse to any former client in the matter. . . . [Emphasis added; citations omitted.]

15. On the other hand, Comment f to the Restatement also says that if the revoking client lacks valid reasons for the revocation of consent, then whether the lawyer may continue representing a nonrevoking client "depends on whether material detriment to the other client or lawyer would result and, accordingly, whether the reasonable expectations of those persons would be defeated."

16. If Alpha gives informed consent pursuant to Rule 1.9(a) (confirmed in writing) for Lawyer to continue representing Beta in the litigation, that consent does not automatically allow Lawyer to use Alpha's confidential information to Alpha's disadvantage. See Rules 1.6(a)(1) and 1.9(c) (prohibiting use of confidential information to disadvantage of clients or former clients absent their informed consent). Absent Alpha's consent to use Alpha's confidential information to Alpha's disadvantage, Lawyer must determine whether he has a conflict of interest under Rule 1.7(a)(2), either because he cannot avoid using Alpha's confidential information while representing Beta or because there is a significant risk that Lawyer's possession of Alpha's confidential information would adversely affect Lawyer's independent professional judgment in representing Beta. See N.Y. City 2005-2 (addressing conflicts arising solely from possession of confidential information of another client).

17. In sum, taking into account the Comments to Rule 1.7 and Comment f to the RESTATEMENT, when a lawyer is considering whether to continue to represent a non-revoking client after a co-client has revoked consent to a common representation, the lawyer should consider a wide variety of factors. We lack sufficient facts to evaluate all of these factors, but the inquiring Lawyer should do so carefully. Our views generally agree with D.C. Bar Op. 317 (2002) and N.C. State Bar Op. 2007-11 (2007).

CONCLUSION:

18. When a lawyer jointly represents two co-defendants pursuant to a validly obtained consent to the dual representation and to any future conflicts that might arise between the joint clients, and one of the clients later revokes consent, whether the lawyer may continue to represent the non-revoking client depends upon the circumstances, unless an advance agreement specifies what happens upon revocation of consent.

OPINION 904 (01/30/2012)

TOPIC: Communication with subject of investigation known to be represented by counsel.

DIGEST: Under New York Rule 4.2(a), a lawyer representing the victim of an alleged crime for purposes of seeking restitution may not communicate with the subject of a criminal investigation into the same facts if the victim's lawyer knows that the subject is represented by counsel with respect to the criminal investigation unless the victim's attorney has the prior consent of that counsel, is authorized by law to communicate with the subject directly, or the criminal defense attorney, upon inquiry, disavows representation with respect to the restitution claim.

RULES: 1.0(k) & (l), 4.2(a)

QUESTION:

1. When an attorney is seeking restitution for a client who is the victim of an alleged financial crime, may the attorney communicate with the subject of a criminal investigation into the same conduct, if the attorney knows that the subject is represented by counsel with respect to that criminal investigation, without the prior consent of that counsel?

OPINION:

2. The inquiring attorney is representing an investor (the "Investor") who lost money in a particular investment. The Investor believes that the investment manager (the "Subject") caused the loss by engaging in criminal conduct. The Investor complained to authorities, who commenced a criminal investigation of the Subject. The Subject has not yet been indicted or arrested, but public news reports indicate that the Subject is represented by legal counsel in the criminal investigation. The inquirer does not question these reports, so we assume the inquirer "knows" the Subject is represented by counsel – at least in the criminal investigation – within the meaning of Rule 1.0(k) (defining "knows" to denote actual knowledge, but adding that knowledge "may be inferred from circumstances").

3. The Investor has asked the inquiring attorney to contact the Subject directly – not through the Subject's counsel in the criminal matter – in an attempt, outside the criminal process, to secure restitution of the Investor's losses. May the Investor's lawyer communicate with the Subject outside the presence of and without the prior consent of the Subject's counsel?

A. Rule 4.2(a) (the "no-contact" rule)

4. The relevant provision in the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") is Rule 4.2 ("Communication with Person Represented by Counsel"), commonly called the "no-contact" rule. Rule 4.2(a) provides as follows:

> In representing a client, a lawyer shall not communicate or cause another to communicate about the subject of the representation with a party the lawyer knows to be represented by another lawyer in the matter, unless the lawyer has the prior consent of the other lawyer or is authorized to do so by law.

5. Thus, under Rule 4.2(a), if a lawyer "knows" that a person is a represented "party" in the same "matter" on which the lawyer represents a client, then communicating with that person about that matter (i.e., communicating about the "subject of the representation") is prohibited unless the lawyer either (i) has the prior consent of the represented party's counsel or (ii) the communication is authorized by law. Neither exception applies here.

B. Is the Subject known to be represented "in the matter"?

6. In applying Rule 4.2(a), the first question is whether the inquirer's direct communication with the Subject of the criminal investigation to discuss possible restitution would be about the same "matter" in which the Subject is represented by counsel. At a minimum, the Investor knows that the Subject is represented in the criminal investigation. If the question of civil restitution were deemed the same matter as the criminal investigation, then discussing that matter with the Subject would be prohibited by Rule 4.2(a).

7. The term "matter" is defined in Rule 1.0(l) as follows:

> "Matter" includes any litigation, judicial or administrative proceeding, case, claim, application, request for a ruling or other determination, contract, controversy, investigation, charge, accusation, arrest, negotiation, arbitration, mediation or any other representation involving a specific party or parties. [Emphasis added.]

8. Thus, the term "matter" expressly includes an "investigation" and a "claim." Here, the prosecutor's criminal investigation and the inquiring attorney's civil claim for restitution are inextricably intertwined.[3] Yet they also differ in some ways because the criminal investigation involves parties, processes and issues peculiar to determinations of criminal responsibility. For example, the prosecutor is a party to the criminal but not the civil matter while the Investor is a party to the civil but not the criminal matter. Because the two matters are not the same, and for the reasons discussed in paragraph 12 below, the criminal investigation and the civil restitution claim should be considered two related matters rather than a single unitary matter.

9. Given that the civil and criminal matters are distinct, the next question is whether the Subject's attorney in the criminal investigation also represents him in the civil restitution matter. (The public news reports mentioned above apparently do not address that question, and even the discussions that gave rise to the attorney-client relationship between the Subject and his attorney may not have addressed it.) The inquiring attorney has strong reason to believe that – if the question were presented to the Subject and his attorney – the scope of the representation would include both the criminal matter and the civil restitution matter. As noted above, the civil and criminal aspects are closely related. Perhaps most important, the Subject's chosen approach to the civil restitution matter could, in various ways, substantially affect his prospects in the criminal matter. For example, if the Subject makes substantial restitution, he may be less likely to be prosecuted on criminal charges. On the other hand, if he is prosecuted despite making restitution, his conduct or words in the course of making restitution might be used against him in the criminal matter.

3 The criminal investigation and the civil restitution claim are closely related in several ways. First, they arise out of the same facts and have one party in common (the Subject). Second, the Investor is both a claimant seeking civil restitution and the complaining witness whose report led to the criminal investigation. Third, the question of restitution to the Investor may arise in the potential criminal case as well as in any private discussions between the inquiring attorney and the Subject.

10. Given the close relationship between the matters and the strong possibility that the scope of representation by the criminal attorney also includes the civil restitution matter, the inquiring attorney may not ignore the no-contact rule or assume it to be inapplicable. Our prior opinions make clear that "when a lawyer has a reasonable basis to believe that a party may be represented by counsel, then the lawyer has a duty of inquiry to ascertain whether that party is in fact represented by counsel in connection with a particular matter. The necessary extent of such an inquiry will depend on the circumstances of a particular matter." N.Y. State 768 (2003) (citing N.Y. State 735 (2001), N.Y. State 728 (2000), and N.Y. State 663 (1994)). One of the precedents – N.Y. State 728 – is particularly apposite, given the similarity between its facts and those presented by the current inquiry.

11. When the lawyer not only has a reasonable basis to believe that the party is represented by counsel, but also has a way of ascertaining the name of that counsel, then ordinarily the inquiry must be to the other party's putative counsel rather than to the party directly.[4] That is the case here. The inquiring attorney should initially contact the Subject's criminal defense attorney, not the Subject. If the criminal defense attorney says he does not represent the Subject on the civil matter, then Rule 4.2 does not apply and the inquiring attorney may contact the Subject directly regarding the restitution matter. But if the criminal defense attorney says he does represent the Subject as to the question of civil restitution, then Rule 4.2 would apply. Our conclusion is supported by the policy underlying the no-contact rule, because the Subject could suffer significant harm in the criminal investigation if he were to make unguarded statements or admissions to the Investor's lawyer about the underlying facts.

12. The fact that the scope of criminal defense counsel's representation may or may not include the civil matter is one reason for our conclusion that the civil and criminal matters, while closely related, should be deemed two distinct matters for purposes of Rule 4.2. If they were considered the same matter, and yet the criminal attorney did not represent the subject as to civil restitution, then it might be impossible for the Investor's attorney to engage in any discussion with the Subject about civil restitution – even if desired by the Subject – because to comply with Rule 4.2(a) the inquiring attorney would have to seek "prior consent" from an attorney who lacked authority to provide it. Of course the Subject may not wish to have such discussions with the inquiring attorney, but the rules of legal ethics should leave that choice in the hands of the Subject and his counsel (if any) in the restitution matter.

C. Is the Subject a "party" within the meaning of Rule 4.2?

13. The remaining question in applying Rule 4.2(a) is whether the Subject of the criminal investigation is a "party," within the meaning of Rule 4.2, to the civil restitution matter about which the Investor's attorney seeks to communicate. In the narrowest sense, the term "party" means a plaintiff

4 See N.Y. County Lawyers 708 (1995) (where inquiring attorney knew that plaintiff had previously been represented by counsel in the matter, inquirer had an "independent duty" under the no-contact rule "to verify that plaintiff was no longer represented. It would not have been sufficient to rely on the word of plaintiff alone"); Matter of Searer, 950 F. Supp. 811 (W.D. Mich. 1996) (lawyer was disciplined for meeting with criminal defendant based on defendant's statement that his lawyer consented to the meeting when in fact his lawyer had not consented); N.Y. City 2009-1 ("while consent may be inferred from the conduct or acquiescence of the represented person's lawyer, a lawyer communicating with a represented person without securing the other lawyer's express consent runs the risk of violating the no-contact rule").

or defendant (or the equivalent) in pending litigation. But this Committee has never read the term "party" so narrowly. Rather, in civil matters, the definition of "party" as used in Rule 4.2 – and in the definition of "matter" in Rule 1.0(l) – is not limited to formal parties to litigation. In N.Y. State 735 (2001), which addressed "noncriminal matters," we stated that the no-contact rule "applies to one who retains counsel in connection with a dispute even prior to the filing of a lawsuit; and during a civil lawsuit it applies to represented witnesses, potential witnesses and others with an interest or right at stake, although they are not nominal parties to the lawsuit."

14. In N.Y. State 607 (1990), we made clear that formal commencement of an adversarial proceeding in a civil matter is not necessary to trigger an attorney's ethical duties under Rule 4.2. There, the inquirer represented a party injured in a car accident. The inquirer wished to write a letter about the accident to the driver that collided with his client, but did not know if the driver was represented by counsel at that pre-litigation stage. We opined that the term "party" encompassed a potential litigant and that "the absence of a formal commencement of adversarial proceedings did not vitiate" the no-contact rule. The Third Department echoed this view and cited N.Y. State 607 in McHugh ex rel. Kurtz v. Fitzgerald, 719 N.Y.S.2d 785 (3d Dep't 2001), which stated that "commencement of the litigation is not the criteria for determining whether communication with an adverse party is in derogation of" the no-contact rule. Rather, the McHugh court expressly stated that a lawyer can violate the no-contact rule even where litigation has not commenced. In light of these authorities, we conclude that the Subject is a "party" to the restitution matter for purposes of Rule 4.2(a) whether or not formal litigation seeking restitution has commenced.

15. Our opinion does not address the conduct of prosecutors and criminal defense counsel and in particular does not decide who qualifies as a "party" in criminal matters. Our opinion addresses only lawyers representing clients in civil matters.

CONCLUSION:

16. An attorney representing the victim of an alleged crime for purposes of seeking restitution may not contact the subject of a criminal investigation into the same facts if the attorney for the victim knows that the subject is represented by counsel with respect to the criminal investigation unless (a) the attorney for the victim has the prior consent of that counsel; (b) the attorney is authorized by law to communicate with the subject directly; or (c) the criminal defense attorney, upon inquiry, disavows representation with respect to the restitution claim.

OPINION 905 (01/30/2012)

Modifies N.Y. State 503 (1979)

TOPIC: Paralegal or Legal Assistant Who Becomes Lawyer; Obligations of Lawyer and Hiring Firm

DIGEST: Rules 1.9 and 1.10 do not apply to a lawyer who acquired confidential information while acting solely as a paralegal or legal assistant. A law firm that hires a lawyer who acquired confidential information while acting as a paralegal or legal assistant has an obligation to make reasonable efforts to ensure that the lawyer does not reveal the confidential information. A law firm should instruct the newly hired lawyer not to divulge confidential information. The firm should also perform a conflicts check reasonable under the circumstances. If the lawyer acquired confidential information in a matter while working as a paralegal or legal assistant, the lawyer ordinarily must be screened from any personal participation in the matter to avoid communication to others in the firm of confidential information that the firm has a duty to protect.

RULES: Rule 1.6(c), Rule 1.9(b), Rule 1.10(a), (c), Rule 5.1(a), Rule 5.3(a), Comment 4 to Rule 1.10.

QUESTION:

1. What are a law firm's supervisory responsibilities upon hiring a newly-admitted lawyer who previously worked as a paralegal or legal assistant at a firm representing a party adverse to a client of the hiring law firm? Must the hiring law firm check for conflicts of interest and implement screening measures?

OPINION:

2. The inquirer is an attorney at a law firm ("Law Firm A"), which would like to hire a law school graduate who has passed the bar, but has not yet been admitted to practice. While in law school, this prospective lawyer worked as a paralegal at another law firm ("Law Firm B") and continues to work in that capacity.[5] While working at Law Firm B, the prospective lawyer may have gained confidential information in a matter ("Matter X") in which Law Firm B represents the plaintiff in an ongoing litigation against a client of Law Firm A. Law Firm A does not know the specific content of the confidential information, if any, but does know that the prospective lawyer's "contact in the case" was limited to an undefined "research project."

3. The inquirer notes that when the prospective lawyer begins to practice at Law Firm A, "he will have no contact with [Law Firm A's] client" in Matter X. He will work exclusively in the Law Firm A's Insurance Defense Practice Group "with little contact with the attorneys who practice with [the] client" in Matter X. Law Firm A's client in Matter X has contact only with the Health Care Practice

5 This Opinion addresses the obligations of a law firm that hires a paralegal or other similarly denominated person, such as a law assistant or law clerk. It does not address the hiring of a law school graduate who has passed the bar and is pursuing admission while at another firm, as that person's responsibilities and exposure to client confidences are typically greater than those of an ordinary paralegal or legal assistant.

Group. The firm's Insurance Defense Practice Group and its Health Care Practice Group "are completely independent practices with no cross over between attorneys."

4. The inquirer asks whether screening the prospective lawyer after he is admitted and joins the firm is a proper course of action. If not, the inquirer asks what steps should be taken to avoid violation of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct "and/or disqualification from the case."

5. The essence of this inquiry is whether the prospective lawyer would have a conflict of interest that will be imputed to other lawyers in Firm A under Rule 1.10 ("IMPUTATION OF CONFLICTS OF INTEREST") of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct. Rule 1.10(a) provides, among other things, that when a lawyer in a firm is prohibited from representing a client adverse to a former client under the dictates in Rule 1.9 ("DUTIES TO FORMER CLIENTS"), that conflict is imputed to all other lawyers in the firm. Rule 1.9(b) states that "[u]nless the former client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing, a lawyer shall not knowingly represent a person in the same. . . matter in which a firm with which the lawyer formerly was associated had previously represented a client: (1) whose interests are materially adverse to that person; and (2) about whom the lawyer had acquired information protected by Rule[ ] 1.6 . . . that is material to the matter." (emphasis added). Additionally, Rule 1.10 (c) provides that "[w]hen a lawyer becomes associated with a firm, the firm may not knowingly represent a client in a matter that is the same as . . . a matter in which the newly associated lawyer, or a firm with which that lawyer was associated, formerly represented a client whose interests are materially adverse to the . . . current client unless the newly associated lawyer did not acquire any information protected by Rule 1.6 or Rule 1.9(c) that is material to the current matter." (emphasis added).

6. Assuming that, in the course of his work as a paralegal at Law Firm B, the prospective attorney acquired confidential information protected by Rule 1.6(a) that is material to the plaintiff in Matter X, a broad reading of Rules 1.9 and 1.10 would preclude Law Firm A from continuing to represent its client in Matter X if it hires the prospective lawyer and he is admitted to practice. See Michigan Formal Opinion RI-285 (1996) (interpreting provision similar to New York's Rule 1.9[b], opinion notes that "inquirer likely 'acquired protected information' in the former employment, whether the acquisition was as a lawyer or as a paralegal").

7. We interpret Rules 1.9 and 1.10 in a more limited manner. While the prospective lawyer was certainly employed by Law Firm B, he was not "associated" with that firm during his tenure as a paralegal. As used in Rules 1.9 and 1.10, the term "associated" denotes a more significant relationship, such as holding a position as partner, associate, or of counsel at the former law firm. While the prospective lawyer may have gained material confidential information pertaining to Matter X in his work as a paralegal or legal assistant while at Law Firm B, he did not obtain it while "associated" with Firm B as an attorney. Nor can it be said that the prospective attorney "formerly represented" the client in Matter X while working at Law Firm B as a paralegal. See Rule 1.10 (c). Therefore, Rules 1.9 and 1.10 do not govern this inquiry.

8. Comment 4 to Rule 1.10 supports this conclusion. It notes, in pertinent part, that "[t]he rule in paragraph (a) also does not prohibit representation by others in the law firm where the person prohibited from involvement in a matter is a nonlawyer, such as a paralegal or legal secretary."

9. While Rules 1.9 and 1.10 do not apply here, there are other provisions that guide our resolution of this inquiry. Rule 1.6 ("Confidentiality of Information"), the centerpiece of the Rules of Professional Conduct, addresses a lawyer's duty to maintain confidential information. Rule 1.6(c) requires that "[a] lawyer . . . exercise reasonable care to prevent the lawyer's employees, associates, and others whose services are utilized by the lawyer from disclosing or using confidential information of a client . . . ." See Rule 1.6, cmt. 16.

10. Rule 5.3 ("RESPONSIBILITY FOR CONDUCT OF NONLAWYERS") mandates that "[a] law firm . . . ensure that the work of nonlawyers who work for the firm is adequately supervised, as appropriate." Rule 5.3(a). Comment 2 to Rule 5.3 acknowledges the reality that "[l]awyers generally employ assistants in their practice, including secretaries, investigators, law student interns and paraprofessionals." These nonlawyers "act for the lawyer in rendition of the lawyer's professional services." Rule 5.3, cmt. 2. While these "nonlawyers . . . are not themselves subject to these Rules, the purpose of the supervision is to give reasonable assurance that the conduct of all nonlawyers employed by or retained by or associated with the law firm is compatible with the professional obligations of the lawyers and firm." Id.; see N. Y. State 774(2004) (addressing supervisory duties of firm hiring paralegal or other nonlawyer). Furthermore, a lawyer may not order, direct, or permit a nonlawyer to engage in any conduct that, if engaged in by the lawyer, would subject the lawyer to discipline. Rule 5.3(b).

11. Based on Rules 1.6 and 5.3, Law Firm B, which currently employs the prospective lawyer, has an obligation to ensure that he preserves any confidential information he acquires regarding the plaintiff in Matter X. Law Firm A must similarly ensure that the plaintiff's confidential information is preserved. Cf. N.Y. State 774 (2004) (addressing duties of law firm hiring a paralegal or other nonlawyer and opining that law firm that "hires a nonlawyer who has previously worked at another law firm . . . must, as part of its supervisory responsibilities under [Rules 1.6 and 5.3], exercise adequate supervision to ensure that the nonlawyer does not reveal any confidences or secrets that the nonlawyer acquired while working at the other law firm."); N.Y. State 700 (1998) (opining, under a distinct set of facts, that an attorney "may not exploit the willingness of [a] former employee [of an adversary's law firm] to undermine the confidentiality rule."); N. Y. State 503 (1979) (a lawyer cannot undertake to cause another's employee to divulge confidential information); Rule 4.4(a) ("In representing a client, a lawyer shall not . . . use methods of obtaining evidence that violate the legal rights of [a third] person.").

12. Law Firm A also has an obligation to "make reasonable efforts to ensure that all lawyers in the firm conform to the [] Rules." Rule 5.1(a). Once the prospective lawyer is admitted to practice and hired by Law Firm A, it too has an independent obligation to ensure that he does not reveal any confidential information learned while employed at Firm B.

13. As to the scope of the "reasonable efforts" that must be undertaken by Law Firm A upon hiring the prospective lawyer, we are informed by our analysis in NY State 774, where we examined a law firm's supervisory responsibilities upon hiring a secretary, paralegal or other nonlawyer who previously worked at another law firm. Based on that Opinion, it is advisable that Law Firm A remind the prospective lawyer to preserve the confidentiality of information obtained concerning clients of Law Firm B. See N.Y. State 422 (1975)(opining that an "attorney may employ the terminating secretary who has confidential information as to pending adversarial matters, provided he cautions the secretary not to divulge any confidential information and will not permit the secretary to do so."). Law Firm A should also instruct the prospective lawyer not to accept any work assignment involving a matter on which he worked while at Law Firm B, including Matter X. See In re Columbia Valley Healthcare System, L.P., 320 S.W.3d 819 (Supreme Court of Texas 2010)

14. It is also advisable for Law Firm A, upon hiring the prospective lawyer, to perform a conflicts check reasonable under the circumstances. Cf. N.Y. State 720 (1999) (discussing required procedures for performing conflicts checks when hiring lateral attorney). If the prospective attorney played more than a ministerial role in the matter at Law Firm B, which appears to be the case in Matter X, screening of the prospective attorney may be required under Rule 5.1(a) to prevent the misuse of confidential information and to implement the "reasonable efforts" that must be undertaken under that provision to ensure that all lawyers conform to the Rules. See Rule 1.10, Comment 4 (a nonlawyer paralegal who has acquired confidential information "ordinarily must be screened from any personal participation in the matter to avoid communication to others in the firm of confidential information that both the nonlawyers and the firm have a legal duty to protect. See Rules 1.0(t), 5.3."); In re Columbia Valley Healthcare System, L.P., 320 S.W.3d 819 (Supreme Court of Texas 2010) ("we conclude that a simple informal admonition to a nonlawyer employee not to work on a matter on which the employee previously worked for opposing counsel, even if repeated twice and with threat of termination, does not satisfy the 'other reasonable measures' a firm must take to properly shield an employee from the litigation. Instead the other reasonable measures must include, at a minimum, formal, institutionalized screening measures that render the possibility of the nonlawyer having contact with the file less likely"); see also S.E.C. v. Ryan, 747 F.Supp.2d 355, (N.D.N.Y. 2010) (in the face of an alleged conflict of interest caused by a firm's hiring of a paralegal who previously worked at the adverse party's firm, the court noted that screening "procedures are prudent under these circumstances and should remain in effect" and noted that "[e]ven a small law firm can erect appropriate and adequate isolation to protect the sharing of confidential information, as long as the firm exercises special care and vigilance").

15. In sum, the measures required to be taken by Law Firm A to preserve confidential information will vary depending on the circumstances. As noted generally in the Rules, "the degree of supervision required [by a law firm] is that which is reasonable under the circumstances, taking into account factors such as the experience of the person whose work is being supervised, the amount of work involved in a particular matter, and the likelihood that ethical problems might arise in the course of working on the matter." Rule 5.1(c).

16. In N.Y. State 503, we recognized several of the principles enunciated above. In that Opinion, a lawyer was previously employed as a paralegal at another firm and gained confidential information regarding a client of his former firm. We concluded that the lawyer, who became an associate at a second firm, could not work on a matter involving the client of the former firm wherein the information he obtained as a paralegal might be of some relevance. In addition, we opined that the lawyer's conflict was imputed to all other lawyers at his firm, effectively disqualifying the entire firm from the proposed representation. We did not, however, address whether appropriate measures, such as screening, could avoid an imputed disqualification in these circumstances. We conclude today that if appropriate measures are taken to preserve the confidential information of the client of the former firm gained while the lawyer is a paralegal, imputed disqualification of the lawyer's entire firm under Rule 1.10(a) is not mandated.

17. If the prospective lawyer is admitted to practice and continues to work at Law Firm B before Law Firm A hires him, the resolution of this matter may be different. If the attorney, after being admitted to practice, acquires material confidential information about plaintiff while "associated" with Law Firm B, the newly admitted lawyer and Law Firm B would, of course, be subject to Rules 1.9 and 1.10. In these circumstances, screening could not prevent a conflict arising under Rule 1.9 or 1.10. See District of Columbia Opinion No. 227 (1992).

18. Under any scenario, whether a court will disqualify Law Firm A from representing its client in Matter X after it hires the prospective attorney is a question of law beyond the scope of this Committee's jurisdiction. See, e.g., Glover Bottled Gas Corp. v. Circle M. Beverage Barn, Inc., 129 A.D.2d 678, 514 N.Y.S.2d 440 (2d Dep't 1987) (defendants' attorneys, who had hired paralegal who had previously been employed by the plaintiff's counsel and had worked on the litigation pending between the parties and had interviewed the plaintiff's manager concerning the facts of this case, were properly disqualified); Riddell Sports, Inc. v. Brooks, 1994 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 2290 (S.D.N.Y. 1994) (Leisure, J.) (denying a motion to disqualify where a large firm had terminated a paralegal upon learning that the paralegal had worked on a case still pending between the firms, even though the paralegal had no role in that case at the firm).

CONCLUSION:

19. Rules 1.9 and 1.10 do not apply to a lawyer who acquired confidential information while acting solely as a paralegal or legal assistant. A law firm that hires a lawyer who acquired confidential information while acting as a paralegal or legal assistant has an obligation to make reasonable efforts to ensure that the lawyer does not reveal the confidential information. A law firm should instruct the newly hired lawyer not to divulge confidential information. The firm should also perform a conflicts check reasonable under the circumstances. If the lawyer acquired confidential information in a matter while working as a paralegal or legal assistant, the lawyer ordinarily must be screened from any personal participation in the matter to avoid communication to others in the firm of confidential information that the firm has a duty to protect.

OPINION 906 (01/31/2012)

TOPIC: Sharing of legal fees by an attorney with a non-profit organization that is not a law firm.

DIGEST: Sharing of legal fees by an attorney with a not-for-profit organization that is not a law firm is prohibited by Rule 5.4.

RULES: Rule 5.4.

QUESTION:

1. Can an attorney employed by a not-for-profit organization that is not a law firm share legal fees with the not-for-profit organization? The American Bar Association's ("ABA") Model Rules of Professional Conduct specifically allow this sort of fee sharing under Model Rule 5.4(a) (4). However, New York State did not adopt this standard.

OPINION:

2. When the proposed Rules of Professional Conduct were submitted by the New York State Bar Association ("NYSBA") to the Presiding Justices of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of the State of New York, on February 1, 2008, the Reporters' Notes accompanying proposed Rule 5.4, which included ABA Model Rule 5.4(a)(4), contained the following observation, at pp. 177-178:

> Rule 5.4(a)(4), which has no equivalent in the existing Disciplinary Rules, permits a lawyer to share court-awarded fees from a particular matter with a non-profit public-interest organization that procured the lawyer's employment in the matter. This is a change from existing DR 3-102 [22 N.Y.C.R.R. § 1200.17], which would prohibit such sharing. The reason for the change is to make it easier for lawyers to provide financial support to public-interest groups that sponsor or engage in litigation to advance the public interest. The change recognizes the importance of public-interest work and should increase financial support for groups that perform such work. Because the Rule is limited to court-awarded fees, and because fee sharing is permitted only with non-profit public-interest organizations, the potential for abuse is low. Furthermore, Rule 5.4(a)(4) does not permit such sharing where "prohibited by court rule or other law." Currently, section 491 of the Judiciary Law appears to prohibit such fee sharing, so the Rule probably would have no effect without an amendment of that statute. The NYSBA supports such an amendment to Judiciary Law § 491 and believes that an ethics rule should be in place in the event the Legislature enacts such an amendment. The NYSBA also believes that judicial approval of fee sharing with public-interest groups would remove a potential impediment to legislative action amending section 491.

3. The Administrative Board of the New York State Courts, when adopting the New York Rules of Professional Conduct to supersede the prior New York Code of Professional Responsibility, rejected the NYSBA's proposed Rule 5.4(a)(4). The Administrative Board included only Rule 5.4(a)(1)-(3). As summarized by Professor Roy Simon, Simon's New York Rules of Professional Conduct Annotated (2009 ed.) (West), at p. 269:

> Section (a) is identical to DR 3-102. It states the basic rule that a lawyer may not divide legal fees with a non-lawyer. This basic rule is followed by three subdivisions, each stating an exception. The first two exceptions relate to deceased lawyers, and the third exception relates to retirement plans.

4. Thus, the exception contained in the Model Rule is not in effect in New York, having been explicitly rejected.

5. We do not address the situation in which the non-profit organization which employs the attorney is itself a "law firm." See, e.g., Rodriguez v. City of New York, 721 F. Supp.2d 148, 154 (E.D.N.Y. 2010) (Cogan, J.) ("[S]everal courts have found that where the legal fees awarded are to be deposited into a separate fund controlled exclusively by lawyers and used solely for legal work, the ethical concerns associated with fee splitting are no longer present. . . .") Neither do we address the question – because it is a question of law – as to whether there is a First Amendment right, which would trump the regulations at issue, to share legal fees with a non-profit organization which is not a law firm. See, e.g., Roy D. Simon, Jr., Fee Sharing Between Lawyers and Public Interest Groups, 98 Yale L.J. 1069, 1126-1132 (1989).

CONCLUSION:

6. Sharing of legal fees by an attorney with a non-profit organization that is not a law firm is prohibited by Rule 5.4.

OPINION 907 (02/02/2012)

TOPIC: Protecting anonymity of client

DIGEST: An attorney may agree to make an anonymous donation on behalf of a client, and must protect the confidentiality of the identity of a client when asked by the client to do so, provided the request does not involve the lawyer in prohibited conduct.

RULES: 1.4, 1.6(a)(3), 1.6(b)(6), 1.15(a), (b), (c), 4.1, 8.4(a),(b), (c)

QUESTION:

1. May an attorney may make a charitable donation on behalf of a client and maintain the client's anonymity at the client's request, and may the attorney use the attorney's escrow account to make the donation?

FACTS:

2. The inquirer is an attorney whose client seeks to make an anonymous donation to a charity. The client would like to place the money in an escrow account under the attorney's control, and then have the attorney forward the payment of the donation to the recipient. The client has instructed the attorney not to reveal the client's identity so that the client may remain anonymous.

OPINION:

3. Rule 1.6 bars lawyers from revealing confidential information without client consent unless otherwise authorized by the Rule. "Confidential Information" is defined in Rule 1.6(a)(3) as follows:

> "Confidential information" consists of information gained during or relating to the representation of a client, whatever its source, that is (a) protected by the attorney-client privilege, (b) likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed, or (c) information that the client has requested be kept confidential. "Confidential information" does not ordinarily include (i) a lawyer's legal knowledge or legal research or (ii) information that is generally known in the local community or in the trade, field or profession to which the information relates. (Emphasis added.)

4. The attorney has a duty under Rule 1.6(a) (3)(c) to follow the client's direction because the client's identity in making an anonymous donation is "information that the client has requested be kept confidential." The attorney must therefore maintain the confidentiality of the information unless authorized or required to disclose it.

5. That protecting the identity of a client who has not consented to disclosure is an attorney's duty has previously arisen before for this Committee, under the Code of Professional Responsibility in effect prior to April 1, 2009. In N.Y. State 645(1993), this Committee addressed the conflict between legally mandated disclosure obligations and the attorney's duty to protect a client's identity. Specifically, N.Y. State 645 "discusses the obligations of a lawyer who contemplates accepting a position that might involve the disclosure of certain information about the lawyer's clients — the name of the client and, implicitly, the fact of the representation . . . .” The Committee applied DR 4-101(B) requiring an attorney to protect “confidences” and “secrets.”
