7. Because circumstances may arise that require the attorney to make a disclosure of the client’s identity, the attorney should make sure that the client understands that the attorney may not be able to keep his identity secret and that the client still wants to go ahead with the donation knowing the risk. See Rule 1.4(b) (“A lawyer shall explain a matter to the extent reasonably necessary to permit the client to make informed decisions regarding the representation”).

8. Whether the attorney may use his escrow account in connection with the proposed anonymous donation invokes Rules 1.15(a) and (b). Rule 1.15 provides for a trust account holding “funds belonging to another person incident to the lawyer’s practice of law . . .”. In view of the use of the word client in this question we assume that the making of the donation is incident to the practice of law. (If that were not the case, it may be necessary for the attorney to set up a separate account to receive the funds and make the donation. See Comment [5] to Rule 1.15.) In general, the attorney must receive the client’s funds into an attorney trust or escrow account and not commingle the funds with the attorney’s own funds or the funds of any other client. Rule 1.15(c) requires the attorney to provide the client a receipt and to maintain appropriate books and records. As discussed above, to avoid misleading the recipient, the lawyer must make sure that the recipient knows that the donation is anonymous, and not actually from the lawyer.

CONCLUSION:

9. A lawyer has a duty to maintain the confidentiality of a client’s identity at the request of the client, and provided the lawyer does not knowingly make any false statement and segregates the client funds in a properly documented attorney escrow account, the lawyer may use the lawyer's escrow account for the purpose of making an anonymous charitable donation on behalf of the client, provided the lawyer has satisfied himself that the contemplated donation is not illegal or otherwise prohibited by law.

OPINION 908 (02/28/2012)

TOPIC: Advertising in internet directory

DIGEST: (a) It is permissible for an attorney to be listed on a local bar association website directory, if the attorney is a member of the association, and the information about the attorney contained in the listing complies with the requirements of Rule 7.1.

(b) It is permissible for an attorney to appear as a "featured attorney" on the home page of the website of a local bar association of which the attorney is a member, only if there is an appropriate disclaimer on the home page that the featured attorney is selected at random and is neither being endorsed nor recommended by the association over any other attorney.

RULES: 1.0(a); 7.1; 7.2; 7.3

FACTS:

1. A local bar association proposes to provide on its internet website a directory listing of its dues paying members, listing each attorney's name, address, phone number, e-mail, website link (if any), years of practice, areas of practice, picture and Google maps link. This listing will be accessible by members of the public. Before accessing these "profiles" a person will be required to accept a posted disclaimer noting that legal advice is not being given, that the list of attorneys may not be a complete list of all attorneys in the area, that the listing is not an endorsement of the searched attorney over another, that the listing is part of the membership fee of each attorney listed in alphabetical order, and does not mean that the attorney listed has had any special training.

2. The local bar association also proposes to provide a "Featured Attorney" spotlight, noting the picture of the attorney, years of practice, fields of practice with a link to the attorney's profile in the directory referred to above. The spotlight attorney will be selected at random and change each week so that over an extended period, each attorney member of the association will be featured in the spotlight. There will be an asterisk after the Featured Attorney referring to a disclaimer noting that legal advice is not being given, and that the association does not endorse the Featured Attorney over another. Each visitor to the website, before being able to access the directory of information on the Featured Attorney, will have to acknowledge understanding of the disclaimer by clicking on a Notice and OK acceptance box that will pop up before the visitor can proceed further.

QUESTION:

3. (a) May an attorney member of the local bar association grant permission to be listed in the profiles portion of the association's website?

4. (b) May an attorney member of the local bar association grant permission to be featured in the "Featured Attorney" spotlight portion of that association's website?

OPINION:

5. Rule 1.0(a) defines "advertisement" as "any public or private communication made by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm about the lawyer or law firm's services, the primary purpose of which is for the retention of the lawyer or law firm. It does not include communications to existing clients or other lawyers."

6. The listing by a lawyer in a directory or listing available to the public indicates that it is a communication the primary purpose of which is the retention of the lawyer by members of the public. We therefore view the listing as an "advertisement" since it is a public communication made by or on behalf of a lawyer the primary purpose of which is the retention of the lawyer.

7. While the Rules do not specifically authorize advertising in a directory, Rule 7.1(f) does exclude advertising in a directory from the requirement that it be labeled "Attorney Advertising". We conclude, therefore, that advertising in a directory (here a bar association list of attorneys) is permissible advertising as long as it complies with the relevant provisions of Rule 7.1. The profile listing on the website directory therefore is advertising that must otherwise comply with the requirements of Rule 7.1 but need not be labeled "Attorney Advertising".

8. Because the advertising is not directed to, or targeted at, a specific recipient or group of recipients, it is not a solicitation under Rule 7.3, and because the local bar association does not direct any specific member of the public to a specific attorney the listing of dues paying members is not a referral for payment subject to the provisions of Rule 7.2.

9. The featured attorney spotlight is different from the profile listing of all members. Since it does not appear in a directory, it has to be labeled "Attorney Advertising" as provided by Rule 7.1(f) in addition to complying with the other applicable requirements of Rule 7.1. The disclaimer with respect to non-endorsement of the Featured attorney should also state that the association is not recommending the Featured Attorney over any other attorney and that the selection by lot is a means of merely permitting each member to be displayed on the website home page. The appropriate disclaimer by the association on the page with the featured attorney spotlight, stating that the association was not endorsing or recommending the featured attorney over any other attorney and that the featured attorney is drawn by lot and changes every week as a means of merely permitting each member to be displayed on the association's website homepage, would remove Rule 7.2 considerations.

CONCLUSION:

10. (a) It is permissible for an attorney to be listed on a local bar association website directory if the attorney is a member of the association and the information about the attorney contained in the listing complies with the requirements of Rule 7.1.

(b) It is permissible for a member attorney to appear as a "featured attorney" on the home page of the website of the local bar association only if there is an appropriate disclaimer on the home page stating that the featured attorney is neither being endorsed nor recommended by the association over any other attorney and that the featured attorney is drawn by lot and changes every week so that every member of the association has a chance to appear as a featured attorney. OPINION 909 (02/28/2012)

TOPIC: Imputation of conflicts of member of town board

DIGEST: Where a member of a town board is barred from representing clients in certain matters in town Justice Court because the board has salary or budget control over the Court or the police department, other lawyers in the member's law firm are not disqualified unless there are particular facts that would likely give rise to public suspicions of improper influence or to a conflict of interest between the private client and the member's duties to the town.

RULES: 1.7(a)(2), 1.10, 8.4(d), 8.4(e).

QUESTION:

1. Where an associate in a law firm serves on a town board that has control over the budget of the town Justice Court, the salary of the town justice and the budget for the town police department, can other lawyers in the firm appear on civil and criminal matters in that Court?

OPINION:

2. This inquiry is largely governed by two lines of this Committee's prior opinions. One holds that lawyer-members of a local legislative body are not barred from appearing before a judge whose salary is set by the legislative body but may be barred from certain types of cases. That line of opinions does not address imputation of the proscription to other lawyers in the member's firm. The second line of opinions holds that lawyer-members are barred in the particular setting of criminal cases from appearing adverse to law enforcement authorities over whom the legislative body has budgetary control. We have addressed imputation in the latter situation and found that the prohibitions are not generally imputed, but may be in certain circumstances.

3. In the first line of opinions, of which N.Y. State 226 (1972) and N.Y. State 435 (1976) are representative, this Committee opined that a lawyer who served as member of city council or county legislature that set the salary of the town justice was not barred from appearing before the court:

> [T]he mere possibility that a judge may be influenced by the lure or fear of a councilman's vote on the salaries of judges of his court does not pose so evident a threat to the impartial administration of justice as to warrant barring the councilman from practicing law in his court . . . .

N.Y. State 226. The Committee's reasoning rested on DR 8-101, now Rule 8.4(e), which bars a lawyer who holds public office from using his or her public position to influence or attempt to influence a tribunal to act in favor of a client.

4. In those opinions, however, we noted certain limitations on this general proposition. The legislator or board member would be barred from appearing (i) before a judge who was appointed or subject to confirmation by the legislative body or board, (ii) in matters in which the town or county, or a town or county agency, was a contesting party, or (iii) in matters in which the interpretation or validity of a town or county ordinance or regulation was at issue. N.Y. State 226; N.Y. State 435. Accord Nassau County 93-20 (City Council member could not "appear before the specific judge appointed by the Council, could not challenge acts of the City and could not oppose the City Attorney in court"). The opinions based these limitations both on DR 8-101 and on the rules dealing with conflicts of interest, principally DR 5-101, now Rule 1.7(a)(2) – that is, the conflict or apparent conflict between the lawyer's personal duty as a legislator or board member to advance the interests of the city or county and the lawyer's duty to his or her client to advance the client's interests in the particular matter. We did not address the extent to which these prohibitions would be imputed to the legislator's or board member's law firm (and neither did the Nassau County ethics opinion).

5. In the second line of opinions, this Committee held that a lawyer-legislator could not represent clients adverse to law enforcement authorities over which the legislature has budgetary control or influence. N.Y. State 692 (1997); N.Y. State 798 (2006).

> [I]f the lawyer/legislator would be adverse to law enforcement authorities (e.g., because he or she would have to cross-examine them) or prosecutors over whom the legislature has budgetary control or influence, we believe that the lawyer/legislator should be disqualified because of the possibility that the law enforcement officers or prosecutors would exercise undue caution in handling the case.

N.Y. State 798 ¶ 3.

6. We addressed the imputation of this latter prohibition in N.Y. State 798. We concluded that the prohibition on appearing adverse to law enforcement authorities was not automatically imputed to other lawyers in the lawyer-legislator's firm. Id. ¶ 9. We reasoned that this prohibition derived from the bans on conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice then contained in DR 1-102(A)(5), and now contained in Rule 8.4(d), and rules relating to improper influence contained in DR 8-101(A), now Rule 8.5(e).[7] The automatic imputation rule in Rule 1.10 (then DR 5-105(D)) applies only to disqualification under Rules 1.7, 1.8 and 1.9, not to these other rules. N.Y. State 798 ¶¶ 9, 11.

7. We noted, however, that "[a] representation by another lawyer in the firm may involve facts and circumstances in which the lawyer/legislator's disqualification should be imputed to everyone in the firm." Id. ¶ 11.

> Because the purpose of disqualifying the lawyer/legislator is to avoid the public perception that the lawyer/legislator is misusing his or her influence over police and prosecutors, the circumstances in which others in the firm should be disqualified are those in which the public is likely to suspect that the lawyer/legislator's influence will still have an effect. This is most likely to occur where the lawyer/legislator is particularly prominent, e.g., a party leader, or where the case is particularly prominent, even if the lawyer/legislator is not personally working on the case.

Id. ¶ 12. Cf. N.Y. State 773 (2004) (partner or associate of a member of municipal board is not automatically barred from appearing before board, but may be barred depending on the particular facts and circumstances); N.Y. State 632 (1992) (same as to lawyers in same firm with part-time judge who was barred from appearing before municipal zoning board of appeals or planning board).

7 We also referred to the injunction in former Canon 9 that lawyers should avoid even the "appearance of impropriety." N.Y. State 789 ¶ 9. The disciplinary rules that appeared under that Canon in the former Code are now distributed in various Rules, principally Rules 1.11, 1.12(a) and 8.4(e)(1).

8. Combining these two lines of opinions takes us a long way in answering this inquiry. First, neither the associate nor the firm is barred from appearing in town Justice Court by the mere fact that the town board has control over the budget of the Justice Court or the salary of the town justice. Second, while the associate is barred from representing clients adverse to the town police department, other lawyers in the firm generally will not be. The firm may, however, be barred in particular circumstances implicating the public perception of favoritism, as when the case or the associate are particularly prominent. Third, the associate may be barred from appearing in certain matters that our prior opinions have suggested raise particular concerns either with respect to public perceptions of favoritism or conflicts of interest, namely, appearing (i) before a judge who was appointed or subject to confirmation by the legislative body or board, (ii) in matters in which the town or county, or a town or county agency, is a contesting party, or (iii) in matters in which the interpretation or validity of a town or county ordinance or regulation is at issue.

9. Our prior opinions have not addressed the extent to which this last set of restrictions is imputed to the firm. The answer, as our reasoning in N.Y. State 798 suggests, depends on the source of the prohibition. If the prohibition arises out of the public perception of favoritism, the prohibition is not imputed automatically to the firm but may be in certain circumstances. If the prohibition arises out of the rules governing personal conflicts of interest, the prohibition is imputed to the firm. But conflicts under Rule 1.7 are generally waivable by the affected client with informed consent. See N.Y. State 773 (where certain prohibitions on practice of a municipal board member arise out of conflicts rules they are imputed to lawyers in the member's firm but "the private client may be able to give effective consent"); N.Y. State 692 (1997) (same). Thus, where the associate would be barred from representing a private client because of a conflict between his duties to advance the interests of the town and duty to advance the interests of the private client, that prohibition will generally be imputed to other lawyers in the firm, but also may be waivable with the informed consent of the client.[8] As these determinations are highly fact intensive, we do not in this opinion attempt to delineate how the rules would apply to any particular set of facts.

CONCLUSION:

10. Except where the facts and circumstances make it likely that the public will suspect undue influence, the partners and associates of a member of a town board may appear in town Justice Court, even though the board has control over the salaries and budget of that Court and of the police department that may be the adversary in certain matters. There may be particular cases, however, in which a representation would present the town board member with a conflict of interest that would prevent the member from representing the private client without the informed consent of the private client, and that prohibition will be imputed to the other lawyers in the member's firm. (50-11)

8 As indicated by its language, Rule 1.7(a)(2), like its predecessor, DR 5-101(A), is concerned with protecting the exercise of "the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client," and not with protecting the lawyer's judgment in other roles the lawyer may undertake. Thus a conflict under that rule can generally be waived by the private client, as long as the lawyer can competently and diligently represent that client. N.Y. State 773 at n.3. As discussed in N.Y. State 773, the town board's own rules may affect whether the associate can take on representations that touch on matters that also come before the town board and whether, for example, the associate must recuse himself from certain votes.

TOPIC: Attorneys fees; likelihood of payment as basis for increasing hourly rate; seeking security interest and confession of judgment; amending fee agreement.

DIGEST: In a matrimonial matter, the likelihood of nonpayment of the legal fee does not alone justify charging a multiple of the Firm's normal hourly rates. The lawyer may obtain a confession of judgment from the client for legal fees already earned or take a security interest in property of the client to secure fees and expenses, under the conditions described in the opinion. The lawyer may request a client to amend a retainer agreement. Whether such amendment must meet the requirements for fee agreements under Rule 1.5 or for business transactions between the lawyer and client under Rule 1.8(i) depends on the circumstances.

RULES: 1.5(a), 1.5(b), 1.5(d), 1.8(i),

FACTS:

1. A law firm ("Firm") represents a client ("Client") who is the wife in a domestic relations matter. The Client has a balance due to the firm for services performed to date, and the Firm believes it is unlikely that the Client will be able to pay the balance until she receives a final judgment of support. The Firm has consulted an actuary, which determined that to compensate for the risk of non-payment, the Firm needs to charge the Client three times the original rate – $735 per hour rather than $245 per hour.

QUESTION:

2. May the Firm renegotiate its retainer arrangement with a matrimonial client as follows: (1) increase the hourly fee from $245 to $735, (2) have the client agree to file confessions of judgment with the appropriate court as the fees accumulate, and (3) secure the client's payment obligation with the client's share of the marital property?

OPINION:

3. This opinion first discusses whether each of the new terms would be appropriate in an original retainer agreement in a matrimonial matter and then discusses the issues surrounding renegotiation of an attorney's retainer agreement.

A. Charging three times the normal rate to compensate for the risk of non-payment

4. Rule 1.5 of the Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") prohibits a lawyer from making an agreement for or charging an excessive or illegal fee. It provides that a fee is excessive when "a reasonable lawyer would be left with a definite and firm conviction that the fee is excessive." It also sets forth a list of eight factors to be considered in determining whether the fee is excessive. These include the time and labor involved, the fee customarily charged in the locality for similar legal services, the experience, reputation and ability of the lawyer providing the services, the results obtained and whether the fee is fixed or contingent. They do not include the risk that the client will be unable to pay the fee.

5. To be sure, the list of factors is not exclusive. The Rule states that the factors to be considered include the listed factors. However, it is significant that ability to pay was not included in the listed factors (either in justifying a higher fee or in encouraging a lower fee).

6. Under Rule 1.5(a)(8), a lawyer may charge a larger fee if the fee is contingent rather than fixed. However, under Rule 1.5(d)(5), a lawyer may not charge a contingent fee in a domestic relations matter if the fee is contingent upon securing a divorce or is determined by reference to the amount of equitable distribution or property settlement. Even if there were no such prohibition, we believe a contingent fee under the Rules is one where the payment of which depends on a successful outcome of the matter, and not on the law firm's likely success in collection of the fee.

7. Therefore, the reasonableness of the hourly fee of $725 per hour depends on the factors set forth in Rule 1.5, particularly the fee customarily charged in the locality for similar legal services [Rule 1.5(a)(3)] and the experience, reputation and ability of the lawyer or lawyers performing the services [Rule 1.5(a)(7)].

8. One consideration in determining the reasonableness of the fee arrangement with the Client is the fact that New York law makes provision to assist the less monied spouse in a matrimonial case. Section 237 of the New York Domestic Relations Law provides that, in many matrimonial proceedings, the court has the discretion to direct either spouse to pay counsel fees directly to the attorney of the other spouse to enable the other spouse to carry on or defend the action. The court will consider the circumstances of the case and of the respective parties, including (1) the nature of the marital property involved; (2) any difficulties involved in identifying and evaluating the marital property; (3) the lawyer's services rendered and an estimate of the time involved; and (4) the applicant's financial status. There is a rebuttable presumption that counsel fees should be awarded to the less monied spouse. Section 237 allows an application for the award of fees and expenses at any time or times prior to final judgment, upon the filing of an affidavit with the court detailing the financial agreement between the party and the attorney, which includes the amount of any retainer, the amounts paid and still owing thereunder, the hourly amount charged by the attorney, and any additional costs, disbursements or expenses. This Domestic Relations Law provision allows the court to determine the reasonableness of the fee arrangements.

9. In our opinion, the likelihood of nonpayment does not alone justify charging a multiple of the Firm's normal hourly rates. If the Client cannot pay the Firm's normal rates, he or she is unlikely to be able to pay three times those rates. However, if a security interest in the Client's share of the marital property and/or support payments will cover the attorneys' fees, and the lawyer has a lien or security interest in such property, then the lawyer will eventually collect the agreed-upon fee.

10. If the Client's share of the marital property or support payments is unlikely to cover the attorney's fee, and the tripling of the attorney's fee is thus an attempt to obtain a larger share of the recovery, we believe it is more likely to meet the requirements for an excessive fee.

11. Whether an hourly rate that is three times the lawyer's normal rate could ever be reasonable depends on a number of factors, including whether the lawyer's normal rate is significantly below the fee customarily charged in the locality for similar legal services and whether the lawyer has applied to the court for an award of fees and expenses. Absent unusual factors, it seems likely that a three-fold increase in fees would produce a fee that is excessive.

B. Confession of Judgment and Security Interest in Client Property

Confessions of Judgment

12. A confession of judgment is a writing in which a debtor permits judgment against him or her to be entered by the creditor without the institution of legal proceedings. Under New York law, confessions of judgment may be for the purpose of paying a debt, or for securing a debt. See CPLR 3218. Although Rule 3218 of the CPLR authorizes a confession of judgment for amounts to become due, and authorizes confessions of judgment either as a payment device or as security, both ethics opinions and case make clear that a confession of judgment to secure attorneys fees may be taken only as a form of security and not of payment, and that it may be taken only to secure payment for services previously rendered. See N.Y. County 430 (1950) (confession of judgment against realty as security for fees and not as payment of the fee); N.Y. State 474 (1977) (without passing on the legal effect of an affidavit confessing judgment that was signed prior to performance of legal services, an attorney should not obtain such an affidavit until after having rendered services); Katlowitz v. Halberstam, 284 A.D.2d 306, 284 N.Y.S.2d 438 (2001) (an attorney's use of a confession for unearned and prospective fees is impermissible [citing N.Y. State 474]).

13. In N.Y. State 474, we stated that a confession of judgment was not unethical, as long as (1) the lawyer obtained it after having rendered the services, (2) the lawyer complied with the requirements of applicable law, including CPLR 3218, (3) the amount of the confession is commensurate with the value of the services rendered, and (4) the client clearly understands the character, effect and purpose of the confession of judgment. This includes the potential effect of a confession of judgment on the client's credit standing and employment opportunities. The opinion is based on EC 5-7 and DR 5-103(A) (1), the prohibitions on lawyers acquiring a proprietary interest in the client's cause of action, and the predecessors to Rule 1.8 (i).

14. Methods of securing payment of fees that involve court action, such as a confession of judgment, have been given special scrutiny because of the admonition in lawyer codes, formerly in EC 2-23 and now in Comment 9 to Rule 1.5, which provides, "A lawyer should seek to avoid controversies over fees with clients and should attempt to resolve amicably any differences on the subject."

15. In addition, Rule 1.5(d)(5)(iii) contains specific provisions with respect to confessions of judgment or security interests in a matrimonial matter. It prohibits a lawyer from charging a fee in a domestic relations matter if, "(iii) the written retainer agreement includes a security interest, confession of judgment or other lien without prior notice being provided to the client in a signed retainer agreement and approval from a tribunal after notice to the adversary." The requirements of this rule are similar to those of the applicable court rules.[9]

Security Interests

16. Rule 1.8(i) authorizes a lawyer to acquire a lien "authorized by law" to secure the lawyer's fee or expenses. As noted in Comment 16, this provision includes liens granted by statute, liens originating in common law and liens acquired by contract with the client. One such lien granted by statute is the "charging lien," granted by Section 475 of the Judiciary Law, which attaches to funds created by the attorney's efforts.[10] The question raised in this opinion involves a charging lien. However, while such a lien would appear to be authorized implicitly by Rule 1.8(i), as noted above, Rule 1.5(d)(5)(iii) prohibits a lawyer from entering into a retainer agreement containing a security interest or other lien without approval from a tribunal after notice to the adversary. If the proposed lien did not involve the property created by the attorney's efforts in the representation, but rather involved a contractual security interest in other property, then the acquisition of such lien would be a business or financial transaction with a client governed by the requirements of paragraph 1.8(a). See Rule 1.8, Cmt 16.

C. Amending a Fee Arrangement

17. The Rules stress the importance of fee agreements between the lawyer and client. Rule 1.5(b) provides:

> A lawyer shall communicate to a client the scope of the representation and the basis or rate of the fee and expenses for which the client will be responsible This information shall be communicated to the client before or within a reasonable time after commencement of the representation and shall be in writing where required by statute or court rule.

See also 22 N.Y.C.R.R. Part 1215 (court rule requiring engagement letters).

18. The court rules governing matrimonial actions require that fee agreements in such actions be in writing, and signed by both the client and the attorney. See 22 NYCRR 1400.3 ("Part 1400.3"). In actions in Supreme Court, a copy of the signed agreement must be filed with the court within 15 days of execution, along with the statement of net worth. Part 1400.3 sets forth the information that must

9 Section 202.16 of the Uniform Rules of the Supreme Court and County Court – the rule governing matrimonial actions – contains a special procedure for obtaining a security interest in a matrimonial action. ("An attorney seeking to obtain an interest in any property of his or her client to secure payment of the attorney's fee shall make application to the court for approval of said interest on notice to the client and his or her adversary. The application may be granted only after the court reviews the finances of the parties and an application for attorney's fees.") Similarly, Section 1400.5 of the Joint Rules of the Supreme Court, Appellate Division, 22 NYCRR Section 1400.5, contains the procedure for obtaining a confession of judgment or security interest ("An attorney may obtain a confession of judgment or promissory note, take a lien on real property or otherwise obtain a security interest to secure his or her fee only where: (1) the retainer agreement provides for a security interest, (2) notice is given to the other spouse, (3) the court grants approval after submission of an application for counsel fees.") These rules are designed to ensure that the court is involved in approving a security interest or confession of judgment, with input from all relevant parties and due regard to the financial condition of the parties and whether a grant of legal fees from the spouse is appropriate.

10 Under Section 475, the attorney who appears for a party has a lien upon his client's cause of action, claim or counterclaim, which attaches to a verdict, report, determination, decision, judgment or final order in the client's favor, and the proceeds thereof in whatever hands they may come.

be included in the fee agreement, which includes (1) the hourly rate of each person whose time may be charged to the client; (2) whether and under what circumstances the attorney might seek a security interest from the client, which can be obtained only upon court approval and on notice to the adversary; and (3) under what circumstances the attorney might seek to withdraw from the case for nonpayment of fees, and the attorney's right to seek a charging lien from the court.

19. As a comment to Rule 1.8 states, ordinary fee arrangements between the lawyer and client reached at the inception of the client-lawyer relationship are governed by Rule 1.5. See Rule 1.8, Comment [4C]. Retainer agreements, like all contracts, may be amended with the agreement of the lawyer and client. However, such an amendment raises ethical concerns, because lawyer is often in a position to take unfair advantage of the client. The client may expect the lawyer to exercise professional judgment on his or her behalf, and may believe that any proposed amendment is designed to be in the client's best interest. Moreover, the client is dependent upon the continued participation of the lawyer to achieve the goals of the representation and often has considerable sunk costs at the time an amendment is proposed. Therefore, the client may feel undue pressure to accede to the lawyer's wishes. The Rules consider certain amendments to be normal fee negotiations between the lawyer and client, which are subject to Rule 1.5, while others are considered a "business transaction with a client" that are subject to Rule 1.8.[11]

20. A number of factors will determine whether the higher scrutiny of Rule 1.8 is warranted. Since the lawyer is the drafter of the contract and should be expected to anticipate most changes in the representation, the first consideration is whether there has been a material change in circumstances. A related factor is the length of time since the contract was entered into, which will affect the reasonableness of the lawyer's failure to anticipate the changed circumstances in the original contract. For example, if the representation was expected to be completed within a year, and the contract therefore did not make provision for the law firm's customary annual increases in billable rates, an amendment a year later would be tested under Rule 1.5, and not Rule 1.8.

21. The sophistication of the client must also be considered. If client is a frequent user of legal services, he or she may be in a much better position to determine the reasonableness of the proposed amendment. See N.Y. State 599 (1989) (retainer agreement with a client of limited education or experience).

22. Another factor is whether the amendment benefits the client. (New York case law often applies higher scrutiny to modifications of retainer agreements that "are beneficial to the attorney".) See, e.g. Baye v. Grindlinger, 78 A.D.2d 60, 432 N.Y.S.2d 624 (2d Dep't 1989), Naiman v. N.Y. Univ. Hosps Ctr., 351 F. Supp.2d 257, 264 (S.D.N.Y. 2005). For example, where the client is no longer able to pay an agreed-upon hourly rate, and the contract is amended to provide for a contingent fee, such an amendment has been held to be subject to Rule 1.5 rather than Rule 1.8. ABA Formal Opin. 11-458 (2011).

11 Courts reviewing the reasonableness of fees may give extra scrutiny to amended fee arrangements where they believe the circumstances gave the client little choice but to agree. This extra scrutiny is different from the higher standards under Rule 1.8, although the outcome may be the same. See, e.g. Baye v. Grindlinger, 78 A.D.2d 60, 432 N.Y.S.2d 624 (2d Dep't 1989) (where amendment was on eve of trial, court requires attorney to show that the terms are fair and reasonable and fully understood by the client).

23. The circumstances in which the amendment is requested may also be significant. For example, a change requested on the eve of trial puts extraordinary pressure on the client to accede. See Baye v. Grindlinger, supra, N.Y. State 719 (1999) and cases cited therein (amendment after threat of withdrawal).

24. Yet another factor is whether the client has deliberately disregarded an agreement or obligation to the lawyer as to fees or expenses, or otherwise taken action that would authorize the lawyer to withdraw from the representation. See N.Y. State 783 (2005) (where the client deliberately disregards an agreement to pay legal fees, even though the retainer agreement is silent as to interest on delinquent charges, the lawyer may condition continued representation on the client's agreement to prospectively pay interest on past due balances for future services, in compliance with the predecessor to Rule 1.5). The opinion notes that amending the retainer to provide for interest is more beneficial to the client than withdrawal by the lawyer and does not suggest that the predecessor to Rule 1.8(i) is applicable. N.Y. State 598 (1988) (discusses when a failure to pay a legal fee is "deliberate").

25. Part 1400.3 requires that any changes in the lawyer's hourly rate or fees be incorporated into a written agreement constituting an amendment to the original agreement, which must be signed by the client before it may take effect. Thus, it clearly anticipates that the fee agreement may be amended.

26. Certain amendments to a retainer agreement are considered business transactions with the client. For example, Comment 16 to Rule 1.8 provides that, when a lawyer negotiates a contractual security interest in property other than that recovered through the lawyer's efforts in the litigation, the acquisition of the security interest is a business or financial transaction with a client that is governed by the requirements of Rule 1.8(a). See also ABA 11-458 (2011) (changes in existing fee arrangements that involve a lawyer's acquiring an interest in the client's business, real estate or other nonmonetary property normally will require compliance with Rule 1.8(a)), ABA 02-472 (the client must be afforded the protections of Rule 1.8(a) in the structuring of a secured obligation); N.Y. City 1988-7; N.Y. City 1988-4 (1987); Pa. Eth. Op. 91-08 (1991) (asking a client to sign a promissory note containing a confession of judgment invokes Rule 1.8).

27. If Section 1.8(a) is applicable, the following requirements apply:

> (1) the transaction must be fair and reasonable to the client and the terms of the transaction must be fully disclosed and transmitted in writing in a manner that can be reasonably understood by the client;
> (2) the client must be advised in writing of the desirability of seeking, and be given a reasonable opportunity to seek, the advice of independent legal counsel on the transaction; and
> (3) the client must give informed consent, in a writing signed by the client, to the essential terms of the transaction and the lawyer's role in the transaction, including whether the lawyer is representing the client in the transaction.

28. The lawyer has the burden of demonstrating that the terms of the amendment are fair and reasonable. Although Rule 1.8(a) requires that the client be given a reasonable opportunity to seek the advice of independent legal counsel in the negotiation of a business transaction with the lawyer, it is not clear whether a client who cannot afford to pay Firm 1 will have a meaningful opportunity to employ a second law firm. However, since an amendment to a retainer agreement in a matrimonial action must be approved by the court on notice to the adversary, we believe that the interests of the client are subject to sufficient independent scrutiny.

29. In addition, it goes without saying that the lawyer must explain the lawyer's proposed modification of a fee arrangement, and advise the client that he or she need not agree to pay the modified fee to have the lawyer continue the representation. This disclosure is necessary to enable the client to make an informed decision about the client's ability and willingness to pay the modified fee for continued representation.

CONCLUSION:

30. The likelihood of nonpayment of the legal fee does not alone justify charging a multiple of the Firm's normal hourly rates. A law firm in a matrimonial matter may obtain one or more confessions of judgment from the client for legal fees already earned provided that the lawyer has explained the character of the confession of judgment and the effect on the client's credit standing, and the firm may obtain a statutory or contractual security interest in property of the client to secure legal fees and expenses. In either case, the confession of judgment or security interest must be provided for in a written retainer agreement signed by the client and must be approved by the tribunal after notice to the adversary. A lawyer may request a client to amend a retainer agreement. Whether such an amendment must meet the requirements for fee agreements under Rule 1.5 or for business transactions between the lawyer and client under Rule 1.8(i) depends on the circumstances in which the amendment is requested and the nature of the amendment. Any amendment of a retainer agreement in a matrimonial matter must comply with Rule 1.5(d)(5) and applicable court rule.

OPINION 911 (03/14/2012)

TOPIC: Sharing legal fees and undertaking employment with an out-of-state entity that includes non-lawyer owners and managers DIGEST: A New York lawyer may not practice law principally in New York as an employee of an out-of-state entity that has non-lawyer owners or managers.

RULES: 5.4(a) & (d); 8.5(b)

QUESTION:

[1] Lawyers admitted to practice in New York ask whether they may enter into a business relationship with a United Kingdom ("UK") entity under the following circumstances. The UK entity would be formed as an Alternative Business Structure under the UK's Legal Services Act, which permits entities with non-lawyer supervisors and owners to render legal services. The entity would include UK non-lawyers in supervisory and ownership positions, raise capital in private equity financing, and have a professional management team. The New York lawyers would establish a New York office, where they would represent New York clients. They would be employees of the UK entity and would hold stock options and, in some cases, vested shares in the UK entity. Lawyers in the New York office would adhere to confidentiality rules and would not share confidences with UK non-lawyer managers. The entity would adhere to UK rules as well.

OPINION:

[2] The inquiry is governed by Rule 5.4(a), which forbids a lawyer from sharing fees with a non-lawyer, and Rule 5.4(d), which forbids a lawyer from practicing law for profit with an entity that includes a non-lawyer owner or member. These provisions would clearly be violated by the proposed arrangement.

[3] As we discussed in N.Y. State 889 (2011), these provisions would not necessarily apply to New York-admitted lawyers who principally practice law in another jurisdiction in which they are also licensed to practice. Rule 8.5(b) provides that the New York Rules govern the conduct of lawyers who are licensed only in New York, but that lawyers admitted in a second jurisdiction are generally subject to the rules of the particular jurisdiction in which they principally practice. Therefore, we concluded, a lawyer admitted in both New York and the District of Columbia but who maintains an office and principally practices in the District of Columbia would be governed by the more liberal provisions of the District of Columbia, even if the lawyer undertakes occasional litigation in New York.

[4] Under the proposed arrangement, in contrast, New York's Rules, including Rule 5.4, would govern the propriety of the arrangement with the UK entity. Even if the lawyers in question are also licensed in the UK, the predominant effect of their conduct, in practicing law from a New York office on behalf of New York clients, would be in New York.

CONCLUSION:

[5] A New York lawyer may not practice law principally in New York as an employee of an out-of-state entity that has non-lawyer owners or managers. (3-12)

OPINION 912 (03/15/2012)

TOPIC: Publishing criticism of other attorneys

DIGEST: The Rules of Professional Conduct do not prohibit a lawyer from hosting or participating in a blog dedicated to publishing factually accurate criticism of another lawyer's professional conduct.

RULES: 8.2, 8.3, 8.4

QUESTION:

1. May a lawyer host or participate in an internet blog established as a forum for lawyers to recount their experiences in dealing with an adversary whose past professional conduct is considered by them to have been unethical, harassing or abusive?

OPINION:

2. Although Rule 8.2 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") expressly addresses lawyer criticism of judges ("A lawyer shall not knowingly make a false statement of fact concerning the qualifications, conduct or integrity of a judge or other adjudicatory officer or of a candidate for election or appointment to judicial office"), there is no comparable provision that specifically addresses public criticism of a lawyer by a lawyer. Therefore, any ethical restraint on such expression would, under the Rules, necessarily derive from the more general provisions of Rule 8.4(c), prohibiting a lawyer from engaging in conduct "involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentations", or Rule 8.4 (d), prohibiting a lawyer from engaging in conduct that is "prejudicial to the administration of justice."

3. Assuming that the blog criticism is sufficiently accurate and in context not to run afoul of Rule 8.4(c), the question is whether there are any limitations arising from Rule 8.4(d) on a lawyer's factually sustainable public criticism of another lawyer. We believe there are none. Still, we add two observations:

4. First, the "Standards of Civility" adopted for the Uniform Court System provide: "Whether orally or in writing, lawyers should avoid vulgar language, disparaging personal remarks or acrimony towards other counsel, parties or witnesses." 22 NYCRR part 1200, App. A, I(B). Although these standards are aspirational, and not intended as rules to be enforced by sanction or disciplinary action, they nonetheless elaborate a norm of acceptable behavior that excludes gratuitous vulgarity, disparagement and vituperation. We also urge the inquirer "to avoid petty criticisms, and to make critical statements only when motivated by a desire to improve the quality of . . . the legal system in general, and then to present his [or her] views only in a temperate, dignified manner." Cf. N.Y. City 1996-1 (holding a lawyer may write an article containing well-founded criticisms of a sitting judge for abusive and intemperate trial conduct, notwithstanding that New York State Commission on Judicial Conduct found no cause for pursuing an investigation into the same allegations of misconduct).

5. Second, Rule 8.3(a) imposes a reporting requirement upon a lawyer who "knows that another lawyer has committed a violation of the Rules . . . that raises a substantial question as to that lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness as a lawyer." To the extent that the negative information to be published about an attorney's professional conduct is both significant and truthful, Rule 8.3(a) may require reporting such misconduct to a "tribunal or other authority empowered to investigate or act upon such violation."

CONCLUSION:

6. The Rules of Professional Conduct do not prohibit a lawyer from hosting or participating in a blog dedicated to publishing factually accurate criticism of another lawyer's professional conduct.

OPINION 913 (03/22/2012)

TOPIC: Acceptance of Securities as a Legal Fee

DIGEST: A lawyer may accept an equity interest in a client if the lawyer complies with the Rule of Professional Conduct governing business transactions with clients and the acceptance does not otherwise create a conflict for the lawyer or result in an excessive fee.

RULES: 1.5(a), 1.7(a), 1.7(b), 1.8(a)

QUESTION:

[1] The inquiring lawyer asks whether a lawyer may accept as compensation for legal services a hybrid fee combining a reduction in the lawyer's customary hourly time charges with an equity interest in the client or the client's company. Subject to the caveats below, we conclude that the Rules of Professional Conduct do not invariably proscribe such a fee arrangement.

OPINION:

[2] The Rules of Professional Conduct do not confine a lawyer to charging a legal fee based on an hourly rate or other time-based metric. The principal general limit on a lawyer's compensation for legal services is that, under Rule 1.5(a), a lawyer may not accept a fee the amount of which, upon review of the facts, would leave a reasonable lawyer "with a definite and firm conviction that the fee is excessive." Among the facts that Rule 1.5(a) identifies as relevant are the time, labor, and skill required; the novelty and difficulty of the services requested; the lawyer's inability, by reason of the representation, to represent other clients; the amount at stake and the results the lawyer achieves; the fee typically charged for comparable services in the locality where the lawyer practices; the time period in which the lawyer must complete the assignment; the lawyer's experience and reputation; and whether the fee is fixed or contingent. It follows from Rule 1.5(a) that any or all of these factors may properly influence the fee a lawyer charges for legal services. ABA 11-458.

[3] The inquiry poses the question whether Rule 1.5 alone governs when the lawyer's fee consists, in whole or in part, of an equity interest in the client or client's company. Whether a lawyer's acceptance of securities as a legal fee implicates issues under federal or state securities laws or other statutory regimes is a question beyond the scope of this Committee's charter. If a lawyer's acceptance of such consideration as a fee is legally permissible, then in our view it is necessary to go beyond Rule 1.5. The starting point for analysis is found in Rule 1.8(a), which provides:

A lawyer shall not enter into a business transaction with a client if they have differing interests therein and if the client expects the lawyer to exercise professional judgment therein for the protection of the client, unless:

> (1) the transaction is fair and reasonable to the client and the terms of the transaction are fully disclosed and transmitted in writing in a manner that can be reasonably understood by the client;

> (2) the client is advised in writing of the desirability of seeking, and is given a reasonable opportunity to seek, the advice of independent legal counsel on the transaction; and
> (3) the client gives informed consent, in a writing signed by the client, to the essential terms of the transaction and the lawyer's role in the transaction, including whether the lawyer is representing the client in the transaction.

[4] Rule 1.8(a) invites a twofold inquiry. The first is whether the transaction itself is one in which the lawyer and client have differing interests and in which the client expects the lawyer to exercise the lawyer's independent professional judgment on the client's behalf. If the answers are yes, then, as a second step, the lawyer must assure that the terms are fair and reasonable to the client and fully disclosed in a writing that includes not only the deal's essential terms and the lawyer's role in shaping them, but also the desirability of the client seeking independent legal advice.

[5] The applicability of Rule 1.8(a) to fee arrangements in which a lawyer accepts an equity interest in the client is not self-evident. Every fee arrangement with a client is in a literal sense a business transaction with that client. At the outset of the representation, a prospective client and a lawyer obviously have "differing interests" in negotiating the lawyer's fee. But the second threshold condition of Rule 1.8(a) is less obvious. The language in the New York version of Rule 1.8(a), as in its predecessor DR 5-104, makes its application contingent on the client's expectation that the lawyer is exercising independent professional judgment on the prospective client's behalf in negotiating the lawyer's fee arrangement. For this reason, some authorities opined that Rule 1.8(a)'s predecessor in the Code of Professional Responsibility was not meant to apply to fee arrangements formed at the start of the representation, that is, before an attorney-client relationship formally exists. C. Wolfram, Modern Legal Ethics § 8.11.1 at 481-82 (1986) (fiduciary standard arises only after relationship is formed); N.Y. City 88-7 (1988) (establishing the attorney-client relationship is not a business transaction under Code).

[6] Nevertheless, we conclude that Rule 1.8(a) applies to negotiation of a fee in which a lawyer is to receive an equity interest in a client or the client's company. Comment [4C] accompanying Rule 1.8(a) says in relevant part:

> This Rule also does not apply to ordinary fee arrangements between client and lawyer reached at the inception of the client-lawyer relationship, which are governed by Rule 1.5. The requirements of the Rule ordinarily must be met, however, when the lawyer accepts an interest in the client's business or other nonmonetary property as payment of all or part of the lawyer's fee. For example, the requirements of paragraph (a) must ordinarily be met if a lawyer agrees to take stock (or stock options) in the client in lieu of cash fees. Such an exchange creates a risk that the lawyer's judgment will be skewed in favor of closing a transaction to such an extent that the lawyer may fail to exercise professional judgment as to whether it is in the client's best interest for the transaction to close. This may occur where the client expects the lawyer to provide professional advice in structuring a securities-for-services exchange. If the lawyer is expected to play any role in advising the client regarding the securities-for-services exchange, especially if the client lacks sophistication, the requirements of fairness, full disclosure and written consent set forth in paragraph (a) must be met.

[7] In the common situation involving the offer of an equity interest as a legal fee, of which the inquirer is an example, the client is a nascent venture lacking a public market and offering consideration of indeterminate value and liquidity in lieu of cash. In these instances, it is not at all unreasonable to suppose that the client looks to the lawyer for independent judgment. In contrast to the improbable scenario of a sophisticated public-company client offering its openly-traded stock for a fee, the more characteristic offeror is a cash-poor entrepreneur in quest of capital to launch a business. Acceptance of stock as a fee enables the entrepreneur to obtain legal advice for the venture and exhibits the lawyer's confidence in the client's chances. The client may be looking to the lawyer for independent judgment on forming the enterprise with an eye toward an eventual public offering. These are the circumstances in which Rule 1.8(a) plays an important role. But see Rule 1.8(a) Cmt. [4B] (the Rule does not apply to "standard commercial transactions between the lawyer and the client for products or services that the client generally markets to others," for instance a lawyer obtaining a mortgage from a bank the lawyer represents on other matters).

[8] Neither the Model Rules of Professional Conduct nor the Rules as adopted in the majority of jurisdictions prefaces the application of Rule 1.8(a) as explicitly as does New York's to those circumstances in which the client expects the lawyer to exercise independent professional judgment on the client's behalf. Still, it matters that every recent opinion to consider the question has said that Rule 1.8(a) or its predecessor, with or without New York's preamble, applies to transactions in which a lawyer accepts an equity interest as part or all of a legal fee. E.g., ABA 00-418; D.C. Opinion 300 (2000); N.Y. City 2000-3 (with some qualification and calling it the "prudent" course in all events); Pennsylvania Opinion 2001-100; Utah Opinion 98-13; see II RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF THE LAW GOVERNING LAWYERS § 126 cmt. A, at 323 (2000) (more restrictive rules "when a lawyer takes an interest in the client's business as payment of all or part of a legal fee"); I G. Hazard & W. Hodes, The Law of Lawyering § 12.5 at 12-15 (2005-2 Supp.) (both Rules 1.5 and 1.8 "are applicable when a lawyer contracts to receive all or part of her fee in the form of an interest in the client's venture"); MODEL RULES OF PROFESSIONAL CONDUCT 1.8, cmt. a.; cf. Iowa Supreme Court Attorney Disciplinary Board v. Kaiser, 736 N.W.2d 544, 2007 Iowa Sup. LEXIS 93 (2007) (suspending lawyer for acquiring equity interest in client without compliance with DR 5-104 as written in New York).

[9] A recent decision of the Appellate Division in the First Department supports this conclusion. In Matter of Ioannou¸ 2011 NY Slip Op 7942, 2011 N.Y. App Div. LEXIS 7792 (Nov. 10, 2011), the Court suspended a lawyer for three months for borrowing money from a former client without heed to the requirements of DR 5-104(a), of which Rule 1.8(a) is a copy. There, the lawyer had represented the client in obtaining a very favorable settlement of a personal injury action. A year later, the onetime client asked the lawyer for some advice about an aspect of the settlement. Two weeks after giving this advice, the lawyer solicited and obtained an interest-free loan from the onetime client. While stressing that DR 5-104(a) (and thus presumably Rule 1.8(a)) does not necessarily "apply to every transaction with a former client," the Court ruled that the "former client's relative lack of sophistication in business matters, the personal nature of the former professional relationship, the importance to the former client of the matter in which the [lawyer] represented him, and the fact that the former client had sought [the lawyer's] advice on a matter related to the former representation only about two weeks before [the lawyer] proposed the transaction" created a reasonable expectation on the former client that the lawyer would be exercising independent professional judgment for the lender in the transaction. See Schlanger v. Flaton, 218 A.D.2d 597 (1st Dep't 1995) (granting summary judgment for client rescinding equity interests and shareholder agreements that lawyer obtained in violation of DR 5-104(A)).

[10] We therefore join other ethics committees and authorities in concluding that a lawyer who wishes to accept an equity interest in a client must comply with the provisions of Rule 1.8(a). This means that the terms of the transaction must be fair and reasonable to the client, fully disclosed and transmitted in writing in a manner that can be reasonably understood by the client, with the client being advised of the desirability of seeking independent legal advice and given a reasonable chance to do so, and the client signing a writing that describes the transaction and the lawyer's role in the deal, including whether the lawyer was acting for the client in the matter.

[11] Whether particular terms are "fair and reasonable" to the client is a fact-specific inquiry for which general rules are of limited aid. If there is a market for the stock, be it public or private, the market may offer a fair and reasonable measure. In some instances, comparisons may offer guidance if other professionals are providing so-called "sweat equity." In the absence of some third-party yardstick, some of the criteria set forth by the Utah Ethics Committee, in its Opinion 98-13, may usefully influence the fairness and reasonableness of the transaction, among them the liquidity of the stock or the risks that the stock may remain illiquid for the foreseeable future; the present and anticipated value of the stock, including the value of any intellectual property that the enterprise may own or control and the risks of adverse regulatory or judicial rulings affecting those values; any restrictions placed on the securities by law or contract; the percentage ownership of the enterprise that the securities now or in the future (e.g., if the currency is warrants or options) may represent; and, as a related matter, whether the lawyer's stake in the company is passive, the opportunities for control or participation in management, and the structural restrictions on such matters. To these must be added the factors, listed above, identified in Rule 1.5(a).

[12] Whether a transaction in securities may be deemed "fair and reasonable" under Rule 1.8(a) is analytically distinct from whether the fee may be "excessive" under Rule 1.5(a), see Rule 1.8(a) Cmt. [4F], though in the end the relevant considerations are substantially similar. Unless some obvious metric exists to assess the fairness and reasonableness of a securities transaction as a legal fee, the resolution of that issue is unlikely to be amenable to any fixed determination. We agree with the ABA that, "[f]or purposes of judging the fairness and reasonableness of the transaction and its terms," the controlling consideration should be "the circumstances reasonably ascertainable at the time of the transaction." ABA 00-418. The same is true of any assessment of whether the fee may be considered "excessive" under Rule 1.5(a). "An equity stake in a corporation that turns out to be successful might seem excessive in relation to the services rendered if the value is determined only after the success is achieved." N.Y. City 2000-3. "But to make the evaluation at that end point – and with the wisdom of hindsight – would not value the fee that the client agreed to pay or the lawyer accepted, because it would eliminate the risk that the lawyer undertook that the venture would fail and the securities, i.e., the fee, would have little or no value." Id. For this reason, we believe that whether a fee is excessive under Rule 1.5(a) is an assessment about the value of the fee at the time the fee is set. Accord I RESTATEMENT § 34 cmt. c at 250; id. § 126 cmt a.

[13] Another separate but very important question is whether the business transaction involving the acceptance of an equity interest as a legal fee occasions a conflict of interest between the lawyer and the client. Rule 1.7(a) prohibits a lawyer from undertaking an engagement if "a reasonable lawyer would conclude" that there is a "significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests." Rule 1.7(b) qualifies this prohibition by allowing to proceed if the "lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation." See Rule 1.8(a) Cmt. [4D] (explaining reasons for concern about conflicts arising from equity interests). Rule 1.7(b) requires also that the lawyer obtain the client's informed consent, which may involve information beyond that required by Rule 1.8(a). See Rule 1.8(a), Cmt. [4E].

[14] Subject to this proviso, if the lawyer concludes that the lawyer may competently and diligently represent the client in the matter, then the lawyer may do so upon the client's fully informed consent. We believe that this informed consent requires disclosure of, among other things, the risks inherent in the representation of a client by a lawyer with a personal financial stake at risk, including the chance that the financial interests could affect the lawyer's judgment; the conflicts that could emerge from the possible tension between lawyer as counselor and lawyer as stockholder; and the risks that privileges could be in jeopardy unless the communications between the two concern confidential legal advice.[12]

CONCLUSION:

[15] In sum, a lawyer may accept an equity interest in a client or a client's company if the terms and conditions of the business transaction are fair and reasonable to the client, fully disclosed to the client in a writing the client may readily understand that advises the client of the desirability of seeking, and gives the client the reasonable chance to seek, independent professional counsel, and the client consents in a writing signed by the client that fully discloses the terms of the transaction and the lawyer's role in the matter.

12 The foregoing analysis is intended to apply only to the negotiation of the fee arrangement at the outset of the representation. There may be other considerations that must be brought to bear in negotiations over the modification of a prior arrangement during the course of the representation. The current inquiry does not raise these issues. See N.Y. State 910 (2011).

TOPIC: Conflicts among members of a Legal Aid Conflicts Panel

DIGEST: Members of a panel of lawyers established to provide legal assistance to indigent clients when the Legal Aid Society has a conflict are not members of the same firm for purpose of conflict analysis as long as the panel members are independently engaged by, and independently render legal services to, their indigent clients.

RULES: 1.0(h), 1.6(a), (b), 1.7, 1.8(f), 10

FACTS:

1. The inquirer practices in a county that has an agreement with the Legal Aid Society to provide legal assistance to indigent clients in criminal and Family Court matters. The lawyer is a member of a Legal Aid Conflicts Panel, an entity formed to provide legal representation to indigents when the Legal Aid Society has a conflict preventing the Society from having one of its staff attorneys undertake the representation.

QUESTION:

2. Is a conflict that disqualifies a member of the Conflicts Panel imputed to, and thereby disqualify, all members of the Panel?

OPINION:

3. When acting as a "qualified legal assistance organization," the Legal Aid Society falls within the definition of "law firm" under the Rules of Professional Conduct. As a result, absent some exception, a conflict infecting any one attorney-employee of the Legal Aid Society is imputed to all others in the same office. Rules 1.0(h), 1.7, 1.10. To meet the needs of indigent clients when the Legal Aid Society has a conflict, the county has established a Legal Aid Conflicts Panel comprised of "supervising attorneys as well as additional contract attorneys." The contract attorneys are paid a set salary to handle all representations in particular courts.

4. The issue here is whether the Legal Aid Conflicts Panel constitutes a "law firm" under the Rules. Rule 1.0(h) defines "law firm" to include, but not to be limited to, "a lawyer or lawyers in a law partnership, professional corporation, sole proprietorship or other association authorized to practice law; or lawyers employed in a qualified legal assistance organization, a government law office, or the legal department of a corporation or other organization." We do not think that Legal Aid Conflicts Panels, as we understand their composition, share the characteristics of these other affiliations that prompt the Rules to treat the latter as one for conflicts purposes.

5. The characteristics of conventional law firms, government and corporate legal departments, qualified legal organizations, and the like are several. All the lawyers practicing together in such entities are ordinarily thought to represent the client(s) that each lawyer in the group represents. The client has an attorney-client relationship not just with an individual lawyer but with the partnership, office, or organization of which the individual lawyer is a part. Each lawyer in the firm owes the same fiduciary duty to the entity's client(s) as any other lawyer. The sharing of a client's confidential information within the partnership, office, or organization is presumed. The lawyers typically work together in one or more common locations, in which client files are maintained. These factors, among others, are strong indicia that lawyers practicing together comprise a "law firm."

6. We understand Legal Aid Conflicts Panels to operate very differently. In N.Y. State 643 (1993), we addressed a series of questions about Legal Aid Conflicts Panels, including the propriety of establishing them, the rules on insuring them, and the maintenance of their files. In that instance, the county had a contract with the local bar association to provide counsel for indigent clients in conjunction with a qualified legal assistance organization. This joint project formed a Conflicts Panel to handle representations when the project had a conflict. We described our understanding of the Panels this way:

> In representing eligible clients referred to them, conflicts panel lawyers would represent their clients independently from the project and its lawyers. Conflicts panel lawyers would not discuss client confidences or secrets with the project's lawyers, see DR 4-101(B), although conflicts panel lawyers would convey anonymous statistical information about the referred matters to the project to satisfy the project's reporting requirements. See ABA 334 ¶ 3 (1974); EC 4-3. Neither the project nor its lawyers would exercise any supervision or control over the legal services provided by conflicts panel volunteers. See DR 5-107(B). The assigned conflicts panel lawyer would keep the file pertaining to the representation in the lawyer's own office so long as the matter is active; when the representation is completed, the file would be stored at the bar association headquarters.

7. Although the citations to the old Code of Professional Responsibility are now stale, the principles remain the same in the Rules of Professional Conduct. Conflicts Panel lawyers represent their clients independently from the Legal Aid Society and its lawyers. Conflicts Panel lawyers may not discuss client confidences or secrets with the Society's lawyers, see Rule 1.6(a), although Conflicts Panel lawyers may convey anonymous statistical information about the referred matters to the Society to satisfy the Society's reporting requirements. See ABA 334 ¶ 3 (1974); Rule 1.6(b)(6). Neither the Society nor its lawyers may exercise any supervision or control over the legal services provided by Conflicts Panel lawyers. See Rule 1.8(f). The assigned Conflicts Panel lawyer should keep the file pertaining to the representation in the lawyer's own office so long as the matter is active, and provide for secure storage thereafter.

8. Based on these circumstances, we concluded in N.Y. State 643 that, "so long as conflicts panel volunteers are independently engaged by, and independently render legal services to, their indigent clients, there is no reason to regard conflicts panel lawyers as being part of the same law firm either with one another or with the project itself for conflict of interest purposes." (Emphasis added.)

9. The only difference between the facts set out in N.Y. State 643 and those presented here is that the former referred to Panel members as "volunteers" – suggesting that they were not paid – whereas in the inquiry the Panel members are under a contract that pays them a salary. This difference does not matter as long as the Panel lawyers act independently of the Society (and the county) in keeping with Rule 1.8(f). The Rule provides that a lawyer may not accept compensation for representing a client from one other than the client unless (a) the client consents, (b) there is no interference with the exercise of the lawyer's independent professional judgment on the client's behalf, and (c) the lawyer maintains the confidentiality of the client's confidential information. This same Rule governs the day-to-day workings of the Legal Aid Society employees, who are usually salaried employees representing indigent clients under government contract. We see no reason why paying the conflicts counsel should alter the analysis that they are independent contractors who do not become a "law firm" within the meaning of the Rules merely by serving on the Conflicts Panel.

CONCLUSION:

10. As long as members of a Legal Aid Conflicts Panel act as independent counsel to their assigned indigents, the Panel does not qualify as a "law firm" within the meaning of Rule 1.0(h), and hence a conflict disabling one member of the Panel would not be imputed to other Panel members for conflicts purposes.

OPINION 915 (03/27/2012)

TOPIC: Links to and from a Law Firm's Website

DIGEST: Assuming relevant advertising rules are adhered to, a law firm's website may link to the website of a nonlegal entity, and vice versa.

RULES: 1.0(a), 1.0 (c), 7.1

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a member of a law firm that has formed a separate consulting entity that performs nonlegal services. He inquires whether the websites of the law firm and the separate consulting entity can link to each other.

QUESTIONS:

2. May a law firm's website contain links to a website of a nonlegal consulting entity formed by the law firm? May the nonlegal consulting entity's website contain links to the law firm's website?

OPINION:

3. As a general matter, it is ethically permissible for a lawyer to link the lawyer's website to a third party's website, and vice versa. It should be noted, however, that the New York Rules of Professional Conduct broadly define "advertisement" to include "any public or private communication made by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm about that lawyer or law firm's services, the primary purpose of which is for the retention of the lawyer or law firm." See Rule 1.0(a). Furthermore, a subcategory of "communications," called a "computer-accessed communication," specifically includes weblinks. See Rule 1.0(c). Therefore, if the primary purpose of a particular link is to facilitate the retention of the services of a lawyer or law firm, the link and the related text are "advertisements" under the Rules.

4. An attorney is prohibited from participating in the use or dissemination of any advertisement that (1) contains statements or claims that are false, deceptive, or misleading, or (2) violates any Rule, including, but not limited to, the rules on lawyer advertising. See Rule 7.1. The relevant rules include, for example, a provision requiring that advertisements be pre-approved by the attorney and retained by the attorney for a specified period. Rule 7.1(k). In addition, assuming both links are advertisements, the home pages of the websites of the law firm and the nonlegal consulting entity must be labeled "Attorney Advertising." Rule 7.1(f); see also Rule 8.4(a) (a lawyer shall not violate the Rules "through the acts of another").

5. If a link's primary purpose is not to facilitate the retention of a lawyer or law firm, it would not be an "advertisement" under the Rules. See Rule 1.0(a), supra. This could be the case where, for example, the link on the nonlegal consulting entity's website is created primarily to provide biographical information concerning the entity's constituents, or to provide access to a document contained on the law firm's website.

6. It must be noted, however, that Rule 5.7 contains various rules relating to nonlegal services provided by lawyers. Rule 5.7(a)(1) and (2) apply if an attorney is providing both legal and nonlegal services to clients. Under Rule 5.7(a)(1), if the nonlegal services are "not distinct" from the legal services provided by the lawyer to the client, then the New York Rules of Professional Conduct ("Rules") apply to the provision of both legal and the nonlegal services. Under Rule 5.7(a)(2), if the nonlegal services and the legal services provided by the lawyer to the client are "distinct" from each other, then the Rules apply to the provision of legal and nonlegal services only "if the person receiving the services could reasonably believe that the nonlegal services are the subject of an attorney-client relationship." In this case however, because the lawyer owns or controls the non-legal entity the test is not distinctness. Rule 5.7(a)(3), which applies when "a lawyer or law firm . . . is an owner, controlling party or agent of, or . . . is otherwise affiliated with, an entity that the lawyer or law firm knows to be providing nonlegal services to a person," states that the lawyer or law firm is subject to the Rules with respect to the nonlegal services "if the person receiving the services could reasonably believe that the nonlegal services are the subject of a client-lawyer relationship." Since Rule 5.7(a)(4) creates the presumption that a person receiving nonlegal services "believes the services to be the subject of a lawyer-client relationship", here the advertising rules will apply, as an effective notice to a person receiving the services as contemplated by Rule 5.7(a)(4) cannot be given in the advertising context where the person is unknown.

7. If any of the above subdivisions to Rule 5.7 pertain to the provision of services by a nonlegal consulting entity, the Rules, including those pertaining to advertising, would apply to the website of the nonlegal consulting entity. See N.Y. State 832 (2009).

CONCLUSION:

8. A law firm's website may contain links to a website of a nonlegal consulting entity formed by the law firm. Furthermore, the nonlegal consulting entity's website may contain links to the law firm's website. If the particular link and the related text are "advertisements" under the Rules, the relevant advertising rules must be adhered to. Furthermore, if the provisions in Rule 5.7(a)(1), (2), or (3) pertain to the provision of nonlegal services, the Rules, including those pertaining to advertising, would apply to the website of the nonlegal consulting entity.

TOPIC: Lawyer's provision of free legal services when lawyer is also broker in a real estate transaction.

DIGEST: A lawyer may not offer free legal services as an add-on bonus to a party to a real estate transaction in which the lawyer is acting as broker, even if the lawyer advises the party that the party may retain separate counsel.

RULES: 1.7(a)

QUESTION:

1. The inquiring lawyer asks whether a lawyer may serve as a real estate broker in a transaction, and be paid for that service, while also offering free legal services on contract and other legal matters in the same transaction with the disclosure that the client is free, if the client so chooses, to retain a separate attorney to represent the client in the transaction. For the reasons set forth below, our answer is no.

OPINION:

2. In N.Y. State 752 (2003), we wrote:

> "In a number of opinions that this committee has issued over the years, we have opined that in certain circumstances a lawyer also engaged in a nonlegal business cannot provide both legal and nonlegal services in the same transaction even with the consent of the client. Brokerage businesses are a salient example. We held in N.Y. State 208 (1971), N.Y. State 291 (1973), N.Y. State 340 (1974), and N.Y. State 493 (1978), that a lawyer could not act as a lawyer in the same transaction in which the lawyer or his or her spouse acted as a real estate broker "because of the possible conflict between his client's and his own personal interest." N.Y. State 208 (1971). Accord N.Y. County 685 (1991); see also N.Y. State 694 (1997) (impermissible to participate in broker-run home buyer's program because of resulting strong interest in broker's success)."

3. The rationale of these opinions is that the broker's personal and financial interest in closing the transaction interferes with the lawyer's ability to render independent advice with respect to the transaction consistent with the principles now embodied in Rule of Professional Conduct 1.7(a). Otherwise put, the problem primarily stems not from the fee the lawyer receives from rendering purely legal advice, but from the separate and independent financial interest of the lawyer/broker arising from compensation for the non-legal services. In our judgment, that financial interest would create an influence that informed consent cannot relieve. We have reached similar conclusions with respect to insurance brokers and securities brokers. N.Y. State 536 (1981); N.Y. State 619 (1991). See also N.Y. State 595 (1988); N.Y. State 621 (1991); N.Y. State 738 (2001) (dual role of lawyer for real estate client and abstract title examiner impermissible because of possible need to negotiate exceptions to title).

4. Accordingly, an offer of free legal services on top of the non-legal services a lawyer proposes to render does not remedy the ill at the heart of our prior opinions. A client's natural attraction to the cost-saving involved in the lawyer's proposal only fortifies our concern. A lawyer rendering free legal services, whether pro bono publico or as an appendage to non-legal services the lawyer is also providing, owes the client a duty of rendering independent professional judgment. That duty does not allow the lawyer to represent the client when a reasonable lawyer would find a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment would be adversely affected by the lawyer's personal financial interests. The more likely a client is to want or need legal services free of charge, the more important is the protection of assuring the exercise of independent professional judgment unburdened by conflicting personal interests. Advising the client that the client could hire another lawyer – the functional equivalent of an effort at consent that we have found wanting in these circumstances – does not eliminate the problem animating our opinions.

CONCLUSION:

5. A lawyer may not offer to provide free legal services in a real estate transaction in which the lawyer is acting and being paid as the broker, even if the lawyer/broker advises that the client has the option to retain separate counsel.

OPINION 917 (03/27/2012)

TOPIC: Non-lawyer marketers; bonus compensation to non-lawyer based on number of clients.

DIGEST: A law firm may ethically pay a bonus to a nonlawyer employee engaged in marketing based on the number of clients obtained through advertising provided the amount paid is not calculated with respect to fees paid by the clients. The law firm may not pay a fee for the referral or recommendation of a specific client.

RULES: 5.4, 7.2, 7.3

QUESTION:

1. May a law firm ethically pay a bonus to a nonlawyer employee marketer based on either (1) the number of clients brought in, without regard to the fee paid or recovery awarded to the client, or (2) the actual number of clients over a certain minimum threshold.?

OPINION:

2. A lawyer or law firm may utilize a non-lawyer marketer to engage in advertising and solicitation in which the lawyer or law firm could engage. See Rule 7.2, Cmt [1] (a lawyer may "compensate employees, agents and vendors who are engaged to provide marketing or client development services"). Such marketer, however, may only engage in such advertising or solicitation that the lawyer or law firm itself could ethically engage. N.Y. State 887 (2011). Thus a marketer could prepare print or web-based marketing materials and advertisements and could solicit business in person or by telephone from the law firm's existing and former clients.

3. A marketer, however, may not engage in any activities that would be prohibited if undertaken by a lawyer. Rule 7.3 (a)(1) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct provides that a "lawyer shall not engage in solicitation by in-person or telephone contact, or by real-time or interactive computer-accessed communication unless the recipient is a close friend, relative, former client or existing client." Thus the law firm could not authorize a nonlawyer employee to engage in in-person solicitation on its behalf, unless the person being solicited is a close friend, relative, former or existing client. See N.Y. State 887 ¶ 8.

4. Furthermore, Rule 7.2(a) provides a "lawyer shall not compensate or give anything of value to a person or organization to recommend or obtain employment by a client, or as a reward for having made a recommendation resulting in employment by a client." Thus the law firm could not pay a bonus to an employee-marketer that is based on the referral or recommendation of specific clients. In N.Y. State 902 (2012), the Committee opined that a lawyer could not compensate a marketing firm to introduce the lawyer to its network of doctors and may not compensate the marketing firm for each introduction and meeting with one of the doctors. In addition, the law firm could not pay an additional fee to the marketer if the doctor retained the attorney in a fixed number of collection cases. Id. at ¶ 10.

5. If, however, the marketing by the nonlawyer employee is advertising and does not constitute solicitation, it would be permissible to pay the marketing employee based on the number of clients obtained so long as that payment does not relate to fees earned from those clients. Rule 5.4(a) prohibits a lawyer or law firm from sharing legal fees with a nonlawyer, with limited exceptions. A significant exception is that Rule 5.4(a)(3) permits a lawyer to "compensate a nonlawyer employee . . . based in whole or in part on a profit sharing plan." Comment [1B] explains:

> Paragraph (a)(3) permits limited fee sharing with a nonlawyer employee, where the employee's compensation or retirement plan is based in whole or in part on a profit-sharing arrangement. Such sharing of profits with a nonlawyer employee must be based on the total profitability of the law firm or a department within a law firm and may not be based on the fee resulting from a single case.

6. In N.Y. State 887 (2011) the Committee opined that a lawyer or law firm may have a profit-sharing plan that pays bonus compensation to a non-lawyer marketer based on the overall profits of the firm or on a percentage of the employee's base salary. However, the bonus compensation may not be based on referrals of particular matters and may not be based on the profitability of the firm or the department for which the employee markets if such profits are substantially related to the employee's marketing efforts. Thus, the employee-marketer might be paid a bonus based solely on the number of clients obtained from the advertising, but that bonus could not be calculated with respect to the fees paid by those clients.

CONCLUSION:

7. A law firm may ethically pay a bonus to a nonlawyer employee engaged in marketing based on the number of clients obtained through advertising provided the amount paid is not calculated with respect to fees paid by the clients. The law firm may not pay a fee for the referral or recommendation of a specific client.

TOPIC: Solicitation; advertising; public education for laypersons.

DIGEST: A lawyer may ethically produce and post an internet video designed to educate lay individuals about a legal subject, and may distribute flyers to members of the public inviting them to view the video. However, the lawyer must adhere to advertising and solicitation requirements under the Rules if the video or the flyers encourage participants to retain the lawyer.

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a private practitioner who wishes to produce and post on the internet a video designed to educate lay individuals about what to do if they are sued in a collection matter. The video would be general in nature and not specific to any case. The inquirer plans to include her name and firm contact information at the end of the video, but the video will not urge viewers to contact her. Additionally, the inquirer would like to distribute flyers to members of the public, inviting them to view the video.

QUESTION:

2. May a lawyer ethically distribute flyers to members of the public inviting them to view the lawyer's internet video designed to educate lay individuals about a legal subject?

OPINION:

3. This Committee has explained that, under both the current Rules of Professional Conduct and the prior Code of Professional Responsibility,[13] lawyers may participate in legal seminars designed for non-lawyers. See N.Y. State 830 (2009) (opining under current Rules that a lawyer may contact a lay organization to inform it of the lawyer's availability as a public speaker on legal topics); N.Y. State 508 (1979) (opining under prior Code that law firm may organize a legal seminar designed for non-lawyers). Indeed, participation in such programs is not only permitted but encouraged: "The legal professional should help the public to recognize legal problems because such problems may not be self-revealing and might not be timely noticed. Therefore, lawyers should encourage and participate in educational and public-relations programs concerning the legal system, with particular reference to legal problems that frequently arise." Rule 7.1, Cmt. [9]. This Committee has also concluded that lawyers may promote these educational opportunities by mail. N.Y. State 508.

4. Advertisements and solicitations are subject to certain restrictions in the Rules. An "advertisement" is defined by Rule 1.0(a) as follows:

> "'Advertisement' means any public or private communication made by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm about that lawyer or law firm's services, the primary purpose of > which is for the retention of the lawyer or law firm. It does not include communications to existing clients or other lawyers."

13 The Code was substantially revised in 1978 in light of Bates v. State Bar of Arizona, 433 U.S. 350 (1977), which held that categorical prohibitions against attorney advertising violate the First Amendment.

5. The comments address application of the primary-purpose test to educational programs:

> "A lawyer's participation in an educational program is ordinarily not considered to be advertising because its primary purpose is to educate and inform rather than to attract clients. Such a program might be considered advertising if, in addition to its educational component, participants or recipients are expressly encouraged to hire the lawyer or law firm."

Rule 7.1, Cmt. [9]. Accordingly, if a program goes beyond education to discuss the lawyer's skills or reputation, or give other reasons to hire that lawyer, then the lawyer may need to comply with the rules on advertising. But absent the inclusion of some such hiring pitch, a legal seminar will generally not be considered advertising as long as it is a bona fide educational program.

6. Rule 7.3(a)(1) prohibits a lawyer from engaging in solicitation by certain specified means including "by in-person or telephone contact, or by real-time or interactive computer-accessed communication unless the recipient is a close friend, relative, former client or existing client." Under the definition in Rule 7.3(b), some but not all advertisements constitute solicitations:

> "For purposes of this Rule, 'solicitation' means any advertisement initiated by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm that is directed to, or targeted at, a specific recipient or group of recipients, or their family members or legal representatives, the primary purpose of which is the retention of the lawyer or law firm, and a significant motive for which is pecuniary gain. It does not include a proposal or other writing prepared and delivered in response to a specific request of a prospective client."

7. Applying the above opinions and Rules, as elucidated by the comments, to the present inquiry, we conclude that the inquirer's proposed course of action does not violate the Rules. The inquirer proposes a legal education program governed by the general principle that such programs are not only permitted but encouraged. The format of the presentation – a video published on the internet – does not change the analysis. See Rule 7.1, Cmt. [7] (recognizing dissemination of non-advertising legal information by another form of internet content – the blog); see also ABA 10-457 (noting that lawyer websites "can assist the public in understanding the law and in identifying when and how to obtain legal services") (footnote omitted).

8. The proposed video is a form of legal education for lay individuals that would not usually be categorized as advertising. The primary purpose of such communications is deemed to be one of educating the public rather than attracting clients. See Rule 7.1 Cmt. [9]. The inquirer's planned inclusion of her firm contact information at the end of the video is a reasonable and appropriate way of identifying the source of the educational program, and it does not, in and of itself, transform the video into an advertisement. Cf. Rule 7.1 Cmt. [7] (explaining that items such as legal pads containing law firm name and contact information do not constitute advertisements if their primary purpose is "general awareness and branding" rather than retention of law firm for a particular matter).

9. As long as the video does not go beyond a bona fide educational presentation, an inquiry into the existence of additional motivations for preparing that presentation is not required. But if the video contains statements or suggestions that the viewers should retain the preparer of the video to represent them, then it may appear that the primary purpose of the video is one of attracting clients. In that case, the video will be subject to Rule 7.1 and the other provisions in the Rules that govern advertising.

10. A similar analysis applies to the flyers (and to other forms of publicity such as mass mailings or emails). If the flyers serve merely to publicize a video which itself does not constitute advertising, then they too would be deemed to have a primarily educational purpose. If the flyers go beyond that to include reasons to hire the inquiring lawyer, then their primary purpose may be deemed one of attracting clients, in which case they would be subject to the advertising rules. If the video and the flyers do not constitute advertising, then they would also not implicate the rules governing solicitation.

11. If, on the other hand, the video includes reasons to hire the inquiring lawyer and constitutes advertising (or if the flyers themselves encourage the public to retain the preparer of the video), then use of the flyers would have to comply with the rules governing solicitation. For example, the flyers generally could not be distributed in person to members of the public. See Rule 7.3(a)(1).[14]

12. Additionally, "all communications by lawyers, whether subject to the special rules governing lawyer advertising or not, are governed by the general rule that lawyers may not engage in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation, or knowingly make a material false statement of fact or law." Rule 7.1, Cmt [6].

CONCLUSION:

13. A lawyer, having produced and posted an internet video designed to educate lay individuals about a legal subject, may ethically distribute flyers to members of the public inviting them to view that video. However, the lawyer may be subject to the advertising and solicitation requirements under the Rules if the video or the flyers include statements or suggestions that the viewers should hire the creator of the video.

14 As the Committee lacks jurisdiction to determine matters of law, we do not opine on whether the inquirer's planned communications are permitted under the anti-solicitation provisions of Judiciary Law §479.

OPINION 919 (04/13/2012)

TOPIC: Dual Practice; Conflict of Interest

DIGEST: A lawyer may not act as an attorney for any party to a real estate transaction in which the lawyer is acting as a broker. A lawyer who is employed part time by a real estate office as a broker may be able to serve as a party's attorney even if a member of that real estate office is acting as a broker for one of the parties, but the lawyer must comply with Rule 1.7. If the lawyer will materially benefit from the closing based on his employment at the broker's office or is personally involved with the transaction at that office, then his representation of a party to the transaction is per se prohibited.

RULES: Rule 1.7(a) & (b)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a practicing attorney licensed in New York State. In addition, he is a "part-time associate broker with a small office of a nationally recognized real estate office." Neither the inquirer nor any of his family members have any ownership interest in the real estate company.

QUESTION:

2. The inquirer poses two related questions:

A. May a lawyer serve as a real estate broker for the buyer or seller and also serve as that party's attorney at the closing?

B. May a lawyer serve as a party's attorney at a real estate closing if the lawyer is asked to handle the closing by a member of the lawyer's real estate office who is serving as broker for one of the parties?

OPINION:

Question A: Serving as attorney and broker in the same transaction

3. The answer to the first question is no. A lawyer may not act as an attorney on behalf of any party to a real estate transaction in which the lawyer or the lawyer's spouse is acting as a broker, because the dual role creates a conflict between the interests of the client and the interests of the lawyer. See, e.g., N.Y. State 493 (1978); N.Y. State 340 (1974); N.Y. State 291 (1973); N.Y. State 244 (1972); N.Y. State 208 (1971). The conflict is nonconsentable (i.e., non-waivable), meaning that the prohibition cannot be overcome through disclosure and client consent. See N.Y. State 208.

4. "The rationale for these opinions is that a lawyer should not have a personal stake in the advice rendered, and a broker who is paid only if the transaction closes cannot be fully independent in advising the client as a lawyer." N.Y. State 753 (2002). We continue to adhere to that view under the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"). See Rule 1.7(a)(2), (b)(1); N.Y. State 845 (2010) (opining that "under Rule 1.7 it remains a nonconsentable conflict for an attorney to act as both a lawyer and broker in the same transaction").

5. We reached the same result in N.Y. State 244, where the real estate broker was not the lawyer personally but rather was the lawyer's spouse, because of the "intimate relationship, including financial" between husband and wife. See also N.Y. State 291 ("Even though the lawyer personally does not own or have an interest in the real estate agency but his spouse owns or has such interest, it would be improper . . . for the lawyer to receive a legal fee in such circumstances").

Question B: Attorney works for broker but is not serving as broker in the transaction

6. The answer to the second question is more complex, and we have not precisely addressed it before. In N.Y. State 340 (1974), we concluded that the per se prohibition against serving as lawyer and broker in the same transaction applied where the attorney's spouse was a salesperson, rather than an owner, in the brokerage agency. We reasoned that the "intimate relationship and economic interests of husband and wife are inseparable; the acts of one directly affecting the other." Thus, we opined that a lawyer could not represent a party to a real estate transaction in which the lawyer's spouse participated as a broker, even with the client's consent after full disclosure. We noted, however, that there would not be "any impropriety in the attorney representing customers of the brokerage firm which employs the spouse where the spouse has not participated in and will not benefit from the transaction" (emphasis added).

7. Our analysis in N.Y. State 340 is relevant here, but the inquirer's scenario is slightly different. We analyze it under the current Rules. The most relevant provision is Rule 1.7(a)(2), which governs personal conflicts of interest. Unless a lawyer satisfies the elements of the exception in Rule 1.7(b), Rule 1.7(a)(2) prohibits a lawyer from representing a client "if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that . . . there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests."

8. Thus, if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that there is a significant risk that the inquirer's professional judgment in representing a client in a real estate transaction would be adversely affected by the inquirer's personal interest in maintaining a favorable employment relationship with the real estate office – or by any other personal interest arising out of the inquirer's employment at that office – then the inquirer may not represent that client unless permitted by the exception in Rule 1.7(b).

9. Under Rule 1.7(b), a lawyer who has a conflict under Rule 1.7(a) may nonetheless represent the client in the matter when certain conditions are met, including these:

> "(1) the lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client; . . . and
> "(4) each affected client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing."

10. Here, the inquirer has no ownership interest in the real estate company that is serving as a broker in the transaction at issue, but he is employed there. Consequently, the success of the real estate company in closing real estate transactions in which the inquirer represents a party may affect the inquirer's own economic interests. For example, the salary or bonus that the inquirer receives from the real estate office may increase based on an annual measure such as profitability or the number of closings completed. Furthermore, the legal advice that the inquirer provides to his client in a transaction in which his employer is involved will almost certainly have a direct impact on the economic interests of the real estate company because the company will not receive a commission unless the sale closes.

11. These risks are magnified if the real estate company repeatedly refers matters to the inquirer. See N.Y. State 467 (1977) (noting that "the position of the lawyer who accepts repeated referrals may be somewhat more fraught with temptation to avoid the strictures of the Code than one who does not"). The inquirer is asking about matters that would be referred by brokers in his office, so this inquiry involves those magnified risks. The risks also increase as the size and importance of the transaction increases, because a larger deal results in a larger commission to the broker's office.

12. Thus, a lawyer may have a personal stake in the legal advice rendered to a client who is represented by a broker of the real estate company, and in some cases the lawyer may benefit materially from advising the client to close the transaction. If the lawyer will materially benefit from the closing, or is personally involved with the transaction at the broker's office, then the situation is analogous to that in N.Y. State 340. In such a case, the lawyer could not reasonably believe that he could be able to provide competent and diligent representation to his client, so a per se prohibition would apply. The fact that a lawyer personally (instead of his spouse) would benefit makes the conflict even more perilous than the conflict in N.Y. State 340.

13. Even if the lawyer himself will not materially benefit, the totality of the lawyer's personal interests might still pose a "significant risk" that his judgment in representing the client at the closing will be "adversely affected" within the meaning of Rule 1.7(a)(2). In this case, however, we know little about the inquirer's relationship with the real estate company, and we know nothing about the size or importance of the transactions at issue. We are not in a position to determine the level of risk.

14. The inquirer must determine, in light of all of the facts and circumstances, whether there is a significant risk that his professional judgment will be adversely affected by his own interests as an employee of the real estate company that is serving as broker for the inquirer's client in the transaction. If so, then the inquirer may not represent a client in that transaction unless the conditions in Rule 1.7(b) are satisfied. The threshold question under Rule 1.7(b)(1) is whether the inquirer reasonably believes that despite the conflict, he can provide competent and diligent legal representation to the client in the real estate matter. If so, then he must obtain the client's informed consent to the conflict, confirmed in writing, per Rule 1.7(b)(4). If he does not reasonably believe that he can provide competent and diligent legal representation to the client, or if the client refuses to consent, then the inquirer must decline the representation.

15. Thus there are three possibilities. If there is no significant risk that the inquirer's professional judgment in representing a client in a real estate transaction would be adversely affected by his personal interests, then Rule 1.7(a)(2) does not apply and the inquirer may accept the representation without obtaining the client's consent. If such a significant risk is present, then Rule 1.7(a)(2) does apply and the inquirer must comply with Rule 1.7(b). However, if the inquirer will materially benefit from the closing or is personally involved with the transaction at the real estate office, then there is a per se non-waivable conflict.

CONCLUSION:

16. A lawyer may not act as an attorney on behalf of any party to a real estate transaction in which the lawyer is acting as a broker. That conflict is nonconsentable.

17. A lawyer who is employed by a real estate office as a broker may be able to serve as a party's attorney at a closing even if another member of his real estate office is acting as a broker for one of the parties, provided that the lawyer is not involved with the sale of the property at the broker's office and will not materially benefit from the transaction based on his employment at that office. If the lawyer is involved as a broker or will materially benefit, then the representation is per se prohibited. If the lawyer will not materially benefit based on his employment at the broker's office but there is a significant risk that his personal interests will adversely affect his professional judgment on behalf of the client, the lawyer may not represent the client unless he complies with Rule 1.7(b).

TOPIC: Law Firm Name

DIGEST: A lawyer may not practice under a law firm name that consists only of the lawyer's initials.

RULES: 7.5(b)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is the only lawyer and only employee of a new law firm. Since the lawyer believes that his last name is long [John Doesmith-Roesmith], he wishes to call the law firm by his initials [JDR Law].

QUESTION:

2. Can a lawyer ethically practice under a law firm name that consists only of the lawyer's initials?

OPINION:

3. Rule 7.5(b) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct provides that a "lawyer in private practice shall not practice under a trade name. . ." This rule serves to protect the public from being deceived as to the identity, responsibility or status of those who use the firm name. See N.Y. State 732 (2000) (applying trade name prohibition in former Code of Professional Responsibility).

4. In N.Y. State 740 (2001) the Committee opined that "[u]sing a name that is not the legal name of one or more partners or former partners in the law firm constitutes the use of a trade name" within the meaning of the prohibition in the Code of Professional Responsibility. As the Committee noted in N.Y. State 869 (2011):

> "The prohibition against trade names is broad, permitting use of little beyond the names of lawyers presently or previously associated with the firm. As an indication of this breadth, other parts of Rule 7.5(b) create exceptions allowing a firm name to include the names of deceased or retired partners or requiring firms to add terms such as 'PC,' 'LLC,' or 'LLP' only in specified circumstances, suggesting that absent those circumstances, such names or terms might create impermissible trade names."

In N.Y. State 861 (2011) the Committee opined that the New York office of an out-of-state firm could not use the firm name XYZ Firm where X, Y, and Z were the first letters of the firm's practice areas even if the firm name was ethical in the other state.

5. Because the lawyer's initials do not constitute the lawyer's legal name, they would constitute a trade name, and therefore the lawyer is prohibited from practicing under that name. Accord Arizona Opinion 91-09 (1991).

6. We note, however, that language or a name that is impermissible as a trade name may be permissible as a firm "motto." See In re von Wiegen, 63 N.Y.2d 163, 176-77 (1984) (finding that "The Country Lawyer" used underneath the firm name was a permissible motto rather than an impermissible trade name); N.Y. State 636 (1992) (permitting the name "The Will Store" as a motto in conjunction with the name or names of one or more lawyer principals but not standing alone).

CONCLUSION:

7. A lawyer may not practice under a law firm name that consists only of the lawyer's initials.

OPINION 921 (04/26/2012)

TOPIC: Attorney advertising

DIGEST: An advertisement that an attorney can "stop" a foreclosure proceeding is prohibited as false, misleading and deceptive. If the advertisement were modified to make it accurate, it would have to be accompanied by a disclaimer that prior results do not guarantee a similar outcome.

RULE: 7.1

QUESTION:

1. May an attorney market his services to persons facing foreclosure of their homes with an advertisement that states, "We will stop your foreclosure"?

OPINION:

2. Rule 7.1(a) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct provides: "A lawyer or law firm shall not use or disseminate or participate in the use or dissemination of any advertisement that . . . contains statements or claims that are false, deceptive, or misleading . . . ."

3. Comment 3 to Rule 7.1 provides in pertinent part:

> "Truthful statements that are misleading are prohibited by this Rule. A truthful statement is misleading if it omits a fact necessary to make the lawyer's communication, considered as a whole, not materially misleading. A truthful statement is also misleading if there is a substantial likelihood that it will lead a reasonable person to formulate a specific conclusion about the lawyer or the lawyer's services, or about the results a lawyer can achieve, for which there is no reasonable factual foundation."

4. Here, the inquiring attorney justifies the representation that he can "stop" a foreclosure with reference to the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act. He maintains that, under the Act, he can make a motion that will "stop" the proceeding until the debt collector verifies the debt. "Then," continues the inquirer, "other motions can be filed in order to create leverage for the client to negotiate a successful loan modification."[15]

5. In N.Y. State 487 (1978), we addressed an advertisement in which a lawyer stated he had "[a specified number of] years' experience representing licensees, applicants, ABC Boards, SLA, Federal Alcohol Bureau, Judicial Review." We noted that "while it should be obvious to other members of the Bar that the lawyer in question means to say that he has represented licensees and applicants before the enumerated agencies, an unsophisticated reader of the proposed advertisement could reasonably assume that the lawyer had represented the agencies themselves." Accordingly, we counseled a modification of the advertisement to "cure this ambiguity," observing that "[t]he need for careful drafts-

15 This inquiry does not ask, and we do not opine, about the permissibility of any underlying litigation tactics. The inquiry concerns only the related advertising.

manship cannot be over emphasized. Even the slightest ambiguity may tend to mislead the uninformed."

6. In our view, the current inquiry presents an analogous situation. Perhaps an attorney experienced in this area of law might understand the inquiring lawyer to mean merely that he can delay the progress of a foreclosure action so as to allow time for other efforts. But a layperson, especially one who is unsophisticated or inexperienced in such matters, would likely interpret the statement quite differently. The layperson, rather than understanding that the advertisement refers merely to delaying the progress of the foreclosure action in order to achieve a negotiated settlement, may well believe that "stop" means "stop," and that the foreclosure proceeding, through the efforts of retained counsel, will simply cease and terminate.

7. This reasonable inference from the proposed advertisement – that the foreclosure proceeding will cease and terminate – is likely to give rise to the type of "false hope" that we have previously associated with false, deceptive and misleading advertisements. See N.Y. State 614 (1990) (applying former DR 2-101(A), the predecessor to Rule 7.1(a)(1), which contained similar prohibitory language) ("we hold improper those client endorsements describing prior results that are potentially misleading in the various ways described herein, e.g., statements of 'overblown assurances of client satisfaction', statements that create unjustified expectations or 'false hopes' or statements that fail to contain sufficient information, thus rendering the statement false, deceptive or misleading").

8. Thus, to be permissible, the proposed advertisement would have to be re-worded so that it would no longer be ambiguous and misleading. It would have to provide enough information about the proposed legal services and their role in foreclosure litigation so that the advertisement would not create the kind of false hopes discussed above. Finally, to the extent that the advertisement would be "reasonably likely to create an expectation about results the lawyer can achieve," it would have to be "accompanied by the following disclaimer: 'Prior results do not guarantee a similar outcome.'" Rule 7.1(d)(1) & (e)(3); N.Y. State 848 (2010) (holding that required disclosure must be made in exactly the language set forth in the Rule).

CONCLUSION:

9. A statement made in any attorney advertisement, without more, that the attorney can "stop" a foreclosure proceeding is prohibited under Rule 7.1.(a)(1) as false, misleading and deceptive. Even if the advertisement were modified so as not to give false hope that the attorney could guarantee a termination of the foreclosure proceeding, an accompanying Rule 7.1(e)(3) disclaimer would be required.

TOPIC: Conflicts arising from previous representation

DIGEST: Lawyer may represent prospective client in litigation that could involve impleading former clients if current litigation is not substantially related to the matters on which the lawyer represented those former clients. However, in the impleader action, lawyer may not be able to reveal or use certain information relating to the former clients.

RULES: Rule 1.6(a) & (b), 1.9(a) & (c)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer has represented a condominium homeowners' association (the "HOA") from time to time in various matters. Recently, the inquirer was asked to undertake the defense of the HOA in an action, brought against it by the city in which the condominium is located, for alleged nonpayment of the condominium's water bill. The inquirer anticipates that in defending the HOA, it will be appropriate to implead "certain unit owners," some of whom the inquirer represented in the acquisition of their units. The inquirer no longer represents any of the unit owners in any capacity. The inquirer asks whether, in these circumstances, the inquirer may ethically undertake the defense of the HOA in the water bill action.

QUESTION:

2. May a lawyer ethically defend a condominium homeowners' association in an action brought by the city for nonpayment of a bill even though the lawyer might have occasion to implead unit owners whom the lawyer represented when they acquired their units?

OPINION:

3. Rule 1.9(a) of the Rules of Professional Conduct precludes a lawyer who has formerly represented a person (the former client) in a matter from representing another person (the prospective client) in the same or a "substantially related" matter in which the prospective client's interests are "materially adverse" to the former client's interests unless the former client "gives informed consent, confirmed in writing." In other words, the former client's informed consent is required only when (a) the prospective and former clients' interests in the new matter are materially adverse, and (b) the matters are the same or substantially related.

4. In this inquiry, the inquirer proposes to represent the HOA (the prospective client) in the water bill action (the new matter) that may be adverse to one or more unit owners (the former clients) whom the inquirer previously represented in their acquisition of their units (the former matters). Would Rule 1.9(a) preclude representation of the prospective client?

5. The "material adversity" element of Rule 1.9(a) is clearly met. Impleading the former clients would create material adversity in the new matter because if a money judgment were rendered against the HOA, the impleader, if successful, would make the unit owners liable to the HOA for at least portions of that judgment.

6. Since the interests of the inquirer's prospective client in the water bill action are materially adverse to those of the inquirer's former clients, the question turns on whether the water bill action is "substantially related" to the former matters in which the lawyer previously represented any of the unit owners who might be impleaded in the new matter.

7. Matters are "substantially related" for purposes of this rule "if they involve the same transaction or legal dispute or if, under the circumstances, a reasonable lawyer would conclude that there is otherwise a substantial risk that confidential factual information that would normally have been obtained in the prior representation would materially advance the client's position in the subsequent matter." Rule 1.9, Cmt. [3]. A fortiori, matters are also substantially related if the lawyer in question actually and knowingly obtained (and now possesses) confidential factual information that would materially advance the prospective client's position in the subsequent matter.

8. Without trying to list all the circumstances that could bear on the question of substantial relation, we note some examples.

a. The lawyer should consider whether it is likely that the construction or validity of any of the terms of the unit purchase and sale agreements would be put in issue in the present matter. If so, the presence of a transaction common to both matters would make them substantially related, and each former client's informed consent to the lawyer's representation of the HOA (confirmed in writing) would be required. Cf. Rule 1.9, Cmt. [1] ("a lawyer could not properly seek to rescind on behalf of a new client a contract drafted on behalf of a former client").

b. The lawyer should consider the effect of confidential information that does not bear directly upon the merits of the water bill action but nevertheless could affect its outcome. If one of the former clients were likely to be an important witness in a trial of the new matter, and the lawyer had damaging information bearing on the credibility of that witness, such information could materially advance the position of the HOA in the water bill action. Similarly, information concerning a former client's financial status, health or other possible vulnerabilities could be relevant to ability to withstand protracted litigation. These kinds of confidential information would often not be so significant as to materially advance the prospective client's position – indeed, on the facts presented, this inquiry does not present any Rule 1.9(a) problem based on confidential information – but it is another area of potential conflict for the lawyer to consider.

9. These examples illustrate the fact-specific nature of analyzing whether matters are substantially related. The inquirer has indicated that the prior representations of unit owners and the contemplated representation of the HOA are "completely separate and unrelated." We lack sufficient facts to confirm that determination, but if the inquirer has taken into account the kinds of considerations discussed above, and has correctly concluded that the present and former matters are not substantially related, then the inquirer may represent the HOA in the water bill action without obtaining consent of the former clients.

10. Even in that situation, however, there could be certain constraints on the inquirer's representation of the HOA.[16] The inquirer may possess confidential information of the previously represented unit owners that is not significant enough to make the current and former matters substantially related but nevertheless might be of some use in the impleader matter. In that event, absent consent or some other exception to Rule 1.6, the inquirer would not be able in the new litigation to disclose the confidential information of the former clients or use it to their disadvantage. See Rules 1.9(c), 1.6(a) and 1.6(b). Moreover, while the inability to use such information does not automatically preclude undertaking the new representation, it may do so in certain circumstances.[17]

CONCLUSION:

11. A lawyer may represent a client in litigation that could involve impleading some of the lawyer's former clients if the current litigation is not substantially related to the matters on which the lawyer represented those former clients. Even if the lawyer may and does undertake the representation, however, the lawyer may not use confidential information of those former clients in the current litigation unless a specific exception to the confidentiality rules applies.

16 These constraints could also apply when the former and new matters are substantially related and the Rule 1.9(a) conflict is cured by consent, because consent to represent an adverse party in related new litigation does not automatically include consent to use confidential information. N.Y. State 903 ¶ 16 (2012); N.Y. State 901 ¶ 9 & n.1 (2011).

17 See N.Y. State 903 ¶ 16 (2012) (absent former client's consent to use confidential information, attorney must determine whether having that information creates Rule 1.7(a) conflict, either because the lawyer could not avoid using the confidential information or because of significant risk that having the information would adversely affect the lawyer's professional judgment); N.Y. State 901 ¶ 9 (2011) (same); N.Y. City 2005-02 (applying prior Code of Professional Responsibility) ("The fact that a lawyer possesses confidences or secrets that might be relevant to a matter the lawyer is handling for another client but the lawyer cannot use or disclose does not without more create a conflict of interest barring the dual representation").

TOPIC: Disclosure of information obtained from purported client

DIGEST: An individual whose purpose in communicating with an attorney is to defraud that attorney rather than to obtain legal services is not a client or prospective client entitled to confidentiality, and it would not violate any ethical rules for the attorney to disclose relevant information to investigators.

RULES: 1.6(a); 1.9(c); 1.18(a) & (b)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is an attorney who received a client referral from a real estate agent. The would-be client held himself out to be a Japanese investor who was interested in purchasing a coop apartment.

2. The inquirer and the purported investor exchanged several emails discussing legal fees and details concerning the transaction. The purported investor suggested that he would send a check to be deposited into the inquirer's escrow account, from which the inquirer could close on the purchase and pay all required fees including the inquirer's own legal fee. The inquirer was skeptical about the proposed arrangement and did not enter into a retainer agreement with the investor. However, the inquirer says that the emails on their face "would lead one to believe that the investor would have a reasonable expectation that an attorney-client relationship may be formed."

3. The inquirer then received a letter from a third party enclosing a $300,000 check on behalf of the purported investor. The inquirer called that third party, and the conversation made the inquirer even more skeptical. The inquirer then called the bank on which the check was drawn. A bank employee told the inquirer that the check was fraudulent and asked for a copy of it, which the inquirer supplied. In another conversation, the inquirer told a bank employee the name of the third party, and the employee said the bank had received other fraudulent checks involving that person. The inquirer has since been told by another attorney that the name of the purported investor was used in a scam involving ads placed by brokers in the newspaper. Based on the available information, the inquirer has concluded that the check was counterfeit and sent to him as part of a fraudulent scheme.

4. The bank then asked for the original check, the cover letter, the envelope received by the inquirer, and any related correspondence, if the inquirer is "legally able" to provide it.

5. The inquirer asks whether it is permissible to provide the bank with (a) the original check; (b) the cover letter and envelope from the third party; and (c) the emails with the purported investor. The inquirer "would like to give all possible assistance so that this fraud can be properly investigated" but does not wish to "breach any . . . ethical obligations."

QUESTION:

6. May an attorney cooperate with a bank or law enforcement authorities by providing information obtained from someone purporting to be an investor seeking representation, when in fact the purported investor was trying to defraud the attorney rather than to obtain legal services?

OPINION:

The Scam

7. This inquiry relates to a scam that has become common in recent years. There are many variations, but a typical one is that a supposed client asks a lawyer to close a real estate transaction, and the client or a third party then sends the lawyer a check and instructs the lawyer to deposit the check and wire the funds (minus the lawyer's legal fees) to an overseas bank account (said to be the account of a participant in the real estate transaction). The lawyer complies with those instructions, but after the funds have been wired, the bank discovers that the check is counterfeit. Since the scam artists cannot be located, the lawyer is charged with the shortfall.

8. The FBI recently reported that its Internet Crime Complaint Center "continues to receive reports of counterfeit check schemes targeting U.S. law firms,"[18] and the prevalence of such schemes has also been noted in bar publications.[19]

9. As noted above, the inquirer has concluded that the check was counterfeit and sent to him as part of a fraudulent scheme rather than in any actual effort to obtain legal advice or other legal services. Given all the evidence before him, we cannot say that the inquirer's conclusion was unreasonable.

Confidentiality Rules

10. The New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") afford protections of confidentiality to actual clients and also to prospective clients.

11. Under Rule 1.6(a), a lawyer may not knowingly reveal confidential information or use such information to the disadvantage of a client or for the advantage of the lawyer or a third person, subject to certain exceptions.

12. Rule 1.18(a) says that "[a] person who discusses with a lawyer the possibility of forming a client-lawyer relationship is a 'prospective client.'" Rule 1.18(b) sets forth an attorney's duties of confidentiality to prospective clients: "Even when no client-lawyer relationship ensues, a lawyer who has had discussions with a prospective client shall not use or reveal information learned in the consultation, except as Rule 1.9 would permit with respect to information of a former client."

13. Rule 1.9(c) provides in relevant part as follows:

"A lawyer who has formerly represented a client in a matter . . . shall not thereafter:

These publications describe the scams in greater detail, offer lawyers advice on how to avoid them, and consider the ethical responsibilities of victimized lawyers.

> "(1) use confidential information of the former client protected by Rule 1.6 to the disadvantage of the former client, except as these Rules would permit or require with respect to a current client or when the information has become generally known; or
> "(2) reveal confidential information of the former client protected by Rule 1.6 except as these Rules would permit or require with respect to a current client."

14. The application of these rules depends on whether the information in question is confidential as defined in Rule 1.6(a):

> "'Confidential information' consists of information gained during or relating to the representation of a client, whatever its source, that is (a) protected by the attorney-client privilege, (b) likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed, or (c) information that the client has requested be kept confidential. 'Confidential information' does not ordinarily include (i) a lawyer's legal knowledge or legal research or (ii) information that is generally known in the local community or in the trade, field or profession to which the information relates."

Analysis

15. To determine whether and how the above confidentiality rules apply to the current inquiry, we first consider the nature of the information.

16. The communications with the third party would not appear to be protected as privileged communications between attorney and client. Moreover, if the communications, whether with the third party or with the purported investor, were made in furtherance of a criminal or fraudulent scheme, then they would appear not to be privileged for that reason as well.[20]

17. Privilege, however, is not the only way in which information becomes confidential under the Rules. As seen above, information gained during the representation of a client can also be confidential if "likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed." In all likelihood it would be embarrassing and detrimental to the purported investor if there were disclosure of communications and documents indicating that he had engaged in a fraudulent scheme involving a counterfeit check. The remaining question, to which we now turn, has to do with the relationship between the inquiring attorney and the purported investor. There is a duty of confidentiality under Rule 1.6(a)[21] only if the purported investor was a client and the information in question was gained during his representation by the inquirer.

18. Whether an attorney-client relationship exists is not for us to say because it is not a question of ethics, though ethical consequences turn on it. As noted in material prefatory to the Rules, "for purposes of determining the lawyer's authority and responsibility, principles of substantive law external to these Rules determine whether a client-lawyer relationship exists.. . . . Whether a client-lawyer relationship exists for any specific purpose can depend on the circumstances and may be a question of fact." Rules, Scope ¶ [9]. We will review some relevant factors because they will shed light on our analysis, but we will then base that analysis on the inquirer's own determination of the crucial question of fact.

20 See, e.g., Clark v. United States, 289 U.S. 1 (1933); United States v. Jacobs, 117 F.3d 82 (2d Cir. 1997); Superintendent of Insurance v. Chase Manhattan Bank, 43 A.D.2d 514 (3d Dept. 2007); Ulico Casualty Co. v. Wilson, Elser, Moskowitz, Edelman & Dicker, 1 A.D.3d 223 (1st Dept. 2003).

19. The inquiry mentions various facts relevant to whether an attorney-client relationship has been formed. The absence of a written retainer agreement would not preclude an attorney-client relationship, but the contents of the emails, and the reasonable expectations that they seem to reflect, would ordinarily be an important factor. See, e.g., Restatement (Third) of the Law Governing Lawyers §14 & cmt. c (relationship does not require written contract but does require manifestation of "person's intent that the lawyer provide legal services for the person"). In this case, however, the emails may not be what they seem, so a different factor – having to do with the purported investor's intent – may override all the others.

20. If the purported investor's aim was perpetrate a scam on the inquiring attorney, then he was not making a bona fide attempt to obtain legal advice or other legal services. We believe that in that case, there would be no representation and consequently no duty of confidentiality under Rule 1.6. This view finds support in a number of sources.

21. The issue has been addressed in California. "Generally speaking, . . . assuming the scammer never in fact intended to form an attorney-client relationship, but rather acted to perpetrate a fraud on the attorney, it is possible that no attorney-client relationship even has been formed." State Bar of California Committee on Professional Responsibility and Conduct, Ethics Hotliner at 3 n. 8 (Jan. 2011).

22. The same issue has also arisen (though in a different context) in South Carolina. A law firm had fallen prey to a counterfeit check scheme similar to the one at issue here. The defrauded bank asserted claims against the firm, which then sought defense and indemnification from its professional liability insurer. The insurer argued that the policy did not apply because (inter alia) there had been no attorney-client relationship. The court agreed, finding a lack of evidence that the purported client ever sought the firm's assistance with a view to employing it professionally. Instead, the court said, the "only reasonable inference" was that scammer contacted the firm "and purported to seek representation . . . solely for the purpose of perpetuating a fraud." Because South Carolina law requires that both parties to an attorney-client relationship intend that legal advice be provided and received, the court concluded that "there was no attorney-client relationship formed."[22]

23. An informal analysis advanced by the ethics counsel of the Virginia State Bar, addressing scams like the one at issue here, is to a similar effect:

> "Some lawyers ask if it is ethical to report the scam after they have agreed to undertake representation, citing the duty to keep client information confidential. Although a for> mal opinion from the Standing Committee on Legal Ethics has not addressed this issue, the communications by and between the Internet scammer and lawyer are not protected as confidential. The initial uninvited e-mail communication from the scammer and the communications that follow are not for the purpose of obtaining any legal advice or legal representation. The scammer does not have any 'reasonable expectation of confidentiality' in the communications used to obtain the lawyer's money under false pretenses. Therefore, reporting such information to the appropriate law enforcement authorities is not a breach of the lawyer's duty of confidentiality."

Attorneys Liability Protection Society, Inc.*, 2010 WL 4225907, slip op. at 5 (U.S.D.C., D.S.C. 2010). See also Lombardi, Walsh, Wakeman, Harrison, Amodeo & Davenport, P.C. v. American Guarantee and Liability Ins. Co., 85 A.D.3d 1291 (3d Dept. 2011) (on similar facts finding coverage by a policy, "[r]egardless of whether the imposter qualified as a 'client,'" because "the policy does not require an actual 'client'; the policy only requires that plaintiff 'render Legal Services for others' and the imposter fell within that broad category").

James McCauley, Virginia State Bar News at 2-3 (Mar. 28, 2011); cf. Rule 1.18 (excluding from definition of prospective client those who communicate information unilaterally to a lawyer without reasonable expectation that lawyer is willing to discuss possibility of forming an attorney-client relationship).

24. As seen above, whether an attorney-client relationship arises in a given case can be a mixed question of fact and law. While this Committee does not independently opine on such questions or make the necessary findings of fact, we note the implications of the inquirer's own factual determination. The inquirer has concluded – reasonably, we believe – that the purported investor was not actually seeking legal services. It follows from that conclusion that no attorney-client relationship was formed. However, that does not end the inquiry as to whether the inquirer owes any duties of confidentiality. As noted above, confidentiality protections are not limited to actual clients – they also extend to prospective clients, defined in Rule 1.18(a) as persons who have "discuss[ed] with a lawyer the possibility of forming a client-lawyer relationship with respect to a matter."

25. It follows from the inquirer's conclusion about the purposes of the consultation that the purported investor was not a "prospective client" within the meaning of Rule 1.18(a). If the purported client was not actually seeking legal services, then he did not, in reality, discuss with the inquirer the possibility of forming a client-lawyer relationship, but merely pretended to do so. If from the beginning, the purported investor's aim was to perpetrate a fraud on the inquirer rather than to obtain legal services, then the purported investor never became even a prospective client within the meaning of the Rules, much less an actual one, and is therefore not entitled to the protection of the confidentiality rules.

26. We note two important caveats. First, in the inquiry at hand there was abundant evidence to support the inquirer's conclusion that the purported investor was engaged in a scam, but in other cases the motive of a purported prospective client may not be so clear. A person who seems to communicate with a lawyer about the possibility of forming an attorney-client relationship is presumptively a "prospective client" and is therefore presumptively entitled to the protection of Rule 1.18. A lawyer should exercise diligence and great care before concluding that a purported prospective client is making a bogus inquiry and is therefore not entitled to the confidentiality enjoyed by genuine prospective clients. The presumption of confidentiality gives way only if and when the lawyer reasonably concludes that the purported client was not actually seeking legal services. Only then is it permissible to make such disclosures as the lawyer considers appropriate to the circumstances.

27. Second, even when a lawyer reasonably concludes at some point that a purported client is seeking to defraud the lawyer, that conclusion by itself may not be dispositive. If a person who contacts a lawyer was, at the outset of the relationship, actually seeking legal services, then that person may be entitled to those confidentiality protections enjoyed by prospective clients, or, depending on how the relationship develops, the protections enjoyed by actual clients. The fact that the actual or prospective client, then or later, also may have sought to defraud the lawyer does not necessarily undercut those protections. In such a case, it would be necessary to analyze the exceptions to confidentiality to see if any of them would allow the lawyer to report the scheme.[23] For the present inquiry, we did not need to reach any question of possible exceptions, because the inquirer reasonably concluded that the motives of the purported investor were unmixed from the start and involved no desire to obtain legal services.

CONCLUSION:

28. A person who communicates with a lawyer seemingly for the purpose of forming a relationship to obtain legal services is presumptively a "prospective client" entitled to protections of confidentiality under the Rules. However, if the purported prospective client is actually seeking to defraud the lawyer rather than to obtain legal services, then the person is neither an actual nor a prospective client and is not entitled to those confidentiality protections. In that case, the inquiring attorney may report the scheme to affected banks or law enforcement authorities, and may supply information and documents to those investigating the scheme, without violating any duty of confidentiality that would be owed to persons genuinely seeking legal services.

TOPIC: Attorney as referee in mortgage foreclosure proceeding

DIGEST: An attorney may accept appointment as a referee in a mortgage foreclosure proceeding where a client of the attorney holds a judgment on the mortgaged property, provided that the attorney complies with obligations of disclosure, recusal, and the revelation or use of information relating to the client.

RULES: 1.6(a); 1.7; 1.8(b); 1.9; 22 NYCRR §§ 100.6(A), 100.3(E)(1).

FACTS:

1. The inquirer has been offered appointment as a referee in a mortgage foreclosure proceeding. A credit union client of the inquirer holds a judgment on the property being foreclosed. The inquirer did not represent the credit union in obtaining the judgment and does not now represent the credit union in connection with that judgment. Inquirer does represent the credit union in connection with mortgage loans made by the credit union. The credit union is not the holder of the mortgage being foreclosed in the proceeding in which the inquirer has been offered appointment as a referee.

QUESTION:

2. May the inquirer accept appointment as a referee in a mortgage foreclosure proceeding in which a client of the inquirer is a judgment creditor of record, but not the holder of the mortgage being foreclosed?

OPINION:

3. The inquirer's proposed service is subject to constraints on the use of client-related information and also to conflict-of-interest rules.

4. All lawyers, including those serving as referees, must comply with confidentiality requirements of the Rules of Professional Conduct (the Rules). One rule provides (subject to certain exceptions including informed consent by the client): "A lawyer shall not knowingly reveal confidential information, as defined in this Rule, or use such information to the disadvantage of a client or for the advantage of the lawyer or a third person . . . ." Rule 1.6(a). Another provides: "A lawyer shall not use information relating to representation of a client to the disadvantage of the client unless the client gives informed consent, except as permitted or required by these Rules." Rule 1.8(b)[24]. See also Rule 1.9(c) (similar rules as to confidential information of former clients).

5. The inquirer may well possess confidential information of the credit union client, or other information relating to representation of that client. The rules quoted above would limit the inquirer's revelation or use of such information while serving as a referee, unless the credit union were to give informed consent. Limitations on the revelation or use of information would not automatically preclude service as a referee. However, if for some reason the inquirer determined that possessing such information and complying with the resulting restrictions would make it impossible to perform the duties of a referee fully and faithfully, then the inquirer would be bound to decline the appointment unless the credit union client consented to the necessary revelation or use of the information.

24 Although the heading of Rule 1.8 categorizes it as a conflict-of-interest rule, we are concerned with the portion relating to use of information and accordingly treat the rule here rather than in the following section on conflicts of interest.

6. There are conflict-of-interest rules that limit a lawyer's ability to represent certain clients. See Rule 1.7(a) ("a lawyer shall not represent a client" under specified conditions); Rule 1.9(a) & (b). In serving as a referee in a foreclosure proceeding, the inquirer would not be representing a client, but rather would be performing duties on behalf of the appointing Court. Thus the provisions of Rules 1.7 and 1.9 dealing with conflicts of interest when representing a client are not applicable to the inquirer's proposed service as a referee.[25]

7. There is also a conflict provision, however, in the rules of judicial ethics. Those rules are found in Part 100 of the Rules of the Chief Administrative Judge, 22 NYCRR Part 100.[26] Their application is not limited to judges: "All other persons . . . who perform judicial functions within the judicial system shall comply with such rules in the performance of their judicial functions and otherwise shall so far as practical and appropriate use such rules as guides to their conduct." 22 NYCRR §100.6(A). It would seem that a person serving as a referee in a mortgage foreclosure proceeding is performing judicial functions and therefore subject to Part 100 in the performance of those functions.[27]

8. Section 100.3(E)(1) requires a judge to "disqualify himself or herself in a proceeding in which the judge's impartiality might reasonably be questioned." This requirement is followed by a list of such circumstances. None of the listed circumstances appears to apply to the facts of this inquiry, but the list is not exhaustive. See §100.3(E)(1) ("including but not limited to" listed circumstances); Code of Judicial Conduct Canon 3(E)1, Cmt. [3.21] ("regardless whether any of the specific rules in Section 3E(1) apply").

9. Thus the inquirer, in determining whether he may accept the appointment in question, should determine whether his impartiality might reasonably be questioned. In making that determination, the inquirer will need to consider the scope of the appointment. For example, there may be some discretion for a referee to compute amounts, but less discretion for the referee in conducting a sale, and there may be more reason to question impartiality where there is discretion.

25 There are also conflict-of-interest provisions that do not limit a lawyer's ability to represent certain clients but rather limit the lawyer's relations with existing clients. See Rule 1.8. However, except for Rule 1.8(b) as noted above, these provisions are not implicated by the facts submitted.

26 The Rules in Part 100 are available online at http://www.nycourts.gov/rules/chiefadmin/100.shtml#01. These rules of judicial ethics are similar (though not identical) to those in the New York State Bar Association Code of Judicial Conduct (adopted April 13, 1996), which does not have the force of law, and is available online at http://www.nysba.org/Content/NavigationMenu16/CodeofJudicialConduct/CJC.pdf. In 2011, the State Bar's House of Delegates recommended amendments to the judicial ethics rules, but those amendments are still pending before the Courts and will not take effect unless and until the Courts approve them.

27 See Advisory Committee on Judicial Ethics Opinion 10-50 (noting that court attorney referees "are subject to the Rules Governing Judicial Conduct in the performance of their judicial functions"); cf. ABA Model Code of Judicial Conduct, "Application" I (B) (defining "judge" within meaning of that Code as "anyone who is authorized to perform judicial functions, including an officer such as a justice of the peace, magistrate, court commissioner, special master, referee, or member of the administrative law judiciary").

10. Thus the inquirer should consider whether there is any dispute as to the amount of the mortgage debt that will be incorporated into the judgment of foreclosure and whether the referee will have any role in resolving that dispute. That is, does the reference include determining the unpaid mortgage principal, the default or penalty interest due to the mortgagee, and any additional expenses that the mortgagee may be entitled to recover and, if so, will the referee be performing a ministerial and undisputed calculation or will he be resolving disputed issues of fact? This issue is relevant because, to the extent that the amount of the mortgage debt (and therefore, the "upset price") is lowered, the possibility of surplus funds being secured at the foreclosure sale – funds that will be available to all judgment creditors on a pro rata basis – is increased.

11. Another related issue is the amount of the credit union judgment in relation to the likely amount of surplus funds and the number and amount of competing claims to those funds by lienors, taxing authorities, and other judgment creditors. For example, if the credit union judgment is nominal, if there are numerous substantial claims of other lienors and judgment creditors, if the delinquent real property taxes are substantial, and if the underlying mortgage debt is clearly greater than the market value of the property to be foreclosed, the likelihood of the credit union securing anything of value from the foreclosure sale would be remote. In that case it seems doubtful that any reasonable basis for questioning the impartiality of the referee would exist. Even when there is a greater chance of securing value from the sale, there may be little basis for questioning the referee's impartiality if the appointment involves only ministerial tasks of selling the property.

12. If the inquirer determines upon consideration of such factors that disqualification is not required, then he may accept the appointment, but he may still have a disclosure obligation. "A judge should disclose on the record information that the judge believes the parties or their lawyers might consider relevant to the question of disqualification, even if the judge believes there is no real basis for disqualification." Code of Judicial Conduct Canon 3(E)1, Cmt. [3.22]. The inquirer should consider whether he needs to advise the Court or the parties to the proceeding that he has represented, and continues to represent, the credit union judgment creditor in matters unrelated to the judgment or the mortgage being foreclosed. Comment [3.22] refers to disclosure "on the record," but if there are no proceedings on the record then the disclosure might have to be made by some other means such as a letter to the judge or the parties as appropriate.

CONCLUSION:

13. An attorney may accept appointment as a referee in a mortgage foreclosure proceeding where a client of the attorney holds a judgment on the mortgaged property, provided that: (a) the attorney makes any necessary disclosures; (b) the circumstances are not such that his impartiality might reasonably be questioned; and (c) in acting as referee, absent client consent, the attorney does not reveal or use any confidential information of the client and does not use to the disadvantage of the client any information relating to the representation.

OPINION 925 (08/02/2012)

TOPIC: Conflicts of interest arising from business relationships between defense counsel and prosecutors and imputation of the conflict to partners of defense counsel.

DIGEST: Criminal defense counsel may continue representation of a client being prosecuted by a part-time assistant district attorney even if his law partner is in a business relationship with another part-time assistant district attorney of the same county.

RULES: 1.7(a)(2), 1.7(b), 1.10(a), 1.10(d)

FACTS:

[1] The attorney making this inquiry (the "Inquirer") works as a criminal defense lawyer and now is a partner in a firm (the "Firm") with two other lawyers. The Inquirer works in one office, and the other two partners work in the other office. The offices are in different counties. Before joining the Firm, the Inquirer represented a defendant (the "Client") in a criminal case brought in a third county (the "County"), and has continued the representation since joining the Firm.

[2] One of the Inquirer's partners (the "Partner") in the Firm has a business relationship with a part-time assistant district attorney (the "A.D.A.") working in the County where the charges are pending against the Client. Specifically, the Partner and the A.D.A. are members in two limited liability companies that operate a real estate business and restaurant venture. The Inquirer knows little about the business between the Partner and the A.D.A., such as whether it has more than one property, whether it has income or losses, whether it has obtained financing or commitments to build the restaurant, whether there are other investors are involved, who manages the investment, and so forth. The A.D.A. has a private law office in the same town and county as the Partner, but the A.D.A. does not practice criminal defense law anywhere. The Partner and the A.D.A. have separate law offices, do not share any office, and do not discuss criminal matters.

[3] After his business relationship with the A.D.A. arose, the Partner gave the County's District Attorney his assurance that the Partner would not practice criminal defense in the County. This assurance has been observed by the Firm's other partner as well. The Inquirer, upon learning of this assurance, wrote to the District Attorney to advise of her handling of the Client's case as well as her understanding that the Firm she joined was "unable to handle DWI and criminal cases, due to a potential conflict." Whether this understanding is correct is the issue that has been referred to us to address.

[4] A different assistant district attorney (the "Prosecutor") is prosecuting the Client, and raised a question at the Client's trial as to whether the Inquirer is prevented from representing the Client because of the potential conflict (the Partner's relationship with the A.D.A.) The trial court allowed the Inquirer to proceed to trial on behalf of the Client, and charges were dismissed that day for procedural reasons. The accusatory instrument has been re-filed, and the Inquirer represented the Client at arraignment, when the Prosecutor again raised the potential conflict.

[5] The Client has been informed of all the foregoing facts, and is prepared to give his consent to the representation. However the Prosecutor objects, believing that the District Attorney's office must also consent but is unable to consent to a "dual representation," citing N.Y. State 603 (1989), 482

(1978), and 143 (1970). The judge hearing the matter directed the Inquirer and Prosecutor to seek the view of this Committee as to whether there is a conflict of interest, and if so whether the Client may consent to the representation.

QUESTION:

[6] Does a business relationship between a lawyer's partner and a part-time assistant district attorney prevent the lawyer from representing a defendant on criminal charges brought by another prosecutor in the office of the part-time district attorney?

OPINION:

[7] The inquiry deals with conflicts of interest due to the "personal interest" of a lawyer,[28] as contained in Rule 1.7(a)(2):

> (a) Except as provided in paragraph (b), a lawyer shall not represent a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that . . .
> > (2) there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests.

[8] This Rule serves to ensure that "[t]he lawyer's own financial, property, business or other personal interests should not be permitted to have an adverse effect on representation of a client." Comment 10 to Rule 1.7. This Rule aims to prevent the risk that the lawyer will not "give a client detached advice," that a lawyer's personal relationship would "materially limit the lawyer's representation of the client" or would "affect representation, for example, by referring clients to an enterprise in which the lawyer has an undisclosed financial interest." Id. The risks also include "the risk that client confidences will be revealed" and that the lawyer's relationship will "interfere with both loyalty and professional judgment." Comment 11 to Rule 1.7.

[9] This inquiry presents a question of first impression for our Committee. We have addressed business relationships between criminal defense counsel and prosecutors in two of our prior opinions, but both examined the duties of the prosecuting lawyer, whereas here we examine the interests of the defense counsel.

[10] In N.Y. State 413 (1975), an assistant district attorney sought to enter into a business unrelated to the practice of law with an attorney who defends criminal defendants in a county where the assistant district attorney is employed. The nature of the business and extent of the relationship was not described in our opinion. We held that the assistant district attorney could not enter into a business relationship with a criminal defense attorney in the same jurisdiction because it violated two requirements of the former Code of Professional Responsibility (in effect before April 1, 2009). First, we stated that it violated Canon 5 and Ethical Consideration ("E.C.") 5-2, which provided that:

28 This case does not involve a "dual representation" of the kind covered by Rule 1.7(a)(1) because the Firm has only one "representation" (that of the Client). The Partner's business interest is a personal interest, not a competing representation. It also does not involve a law firm business between the assistant district attorney and a criminal defense attorney.

> A lawyer should not accept proffered employment if the lawyer's personal interests or desires will, or there is a reasonable probability that they will, affect adversely the advice to be given or services to be rendered the prospective client. After accepting the employment, a lawyer carefully should refrain from acquiring a property right or assuming a position that would tend to make his or her judgment less protective of the interests of the client. (Italicized emphasis added.)

[11] E.C. 5-2, related to Canon 5's Disciplinary Rule ("D.R.") 5-101(A), was the forerunner of Rule 1.7(a) (2)). However, Rule 1.7(a)(2) does not contain an equivalent to the concept that a lawyer should decline a representation because of a "reasonable probability" that the lawyer's personal interests will affect the lawyer's advice or interests that "would tend" to make the lawyer's judgment less protective of the client.

[12] Importantly, we also noted that an assistant district attorney could not obtain consent to the conflict from his client because the "People" may not waive conflicts of interest. Even the assistant district attorney's agreement to remove himself from all cases which involved his business partner did not change the result.

[13] We also relied upon Canon 9, the former requirement of the Code of Professional Responsibility to avoid the "appearance of impropriety," specifically Ethical Considerations 9-2, 9-3, and 9-6. The Rules do not carry forward this "appearance of impropriety" concept.

[14] In N.Y. State 583 (1987), an assistant district attorney who was starting a business to advise prospective college students and their families with the college selection and admission process sought to rent office space for the business from an assistant public defender, and to employ the spouse of a criminal defense attorney practicing in the same jurisdiction as an employee in the business. Unlike the business relationship in N.Y. State 413, we declined to rule out these proposed arrangements, construing D.R. 5-101(A) (the predecessor to Rule 1.7(a)(2)).

[15] First, we concluded that the facts determine the outcome in each case, that is, "the nature and extent of the particular involvement, e.g., the size of the investment, both relatively and absolutely, the degree of influence, etc., will determine whether the relationship is barred." The lawyer's personal interests "could come into conflict with his or her duty to exercise professional judgment solely in the interests of his or her clients" because, "depending on the financial arrangements and other business and personal circumstances, a rented office situation might involve relatively little danger that professional judgment would be improperly influenced or, on the other hand, substantial danger." Accordingly, "we perceive[d] no per se prohibition" but at the same time we cautioned the lawyer to "avoid financial or other business or personal interests, including rentals that will or could reasonably affect the lawyer's exercise of professional judgment solely on behalf of his or her client."

[16] N.Y. State 583 is the better guide for our decision involving the criminal defense counsel and the Firm here. We construe Rule 1.7(a)(2) (and Rule 1.7(b)), the successor version of D.R. 5-101(A) and E.C. 5-2, but not the additional standard of "appearance of impropriety," which was not carried over from the Code to the Rules of Professional Conduct.

[17] We analyze the personal interest conflict from the point of view of the Partner because Rule 1.10 imputes the Rule 1.7(a)(2) "personal interest" of the Partner to the Inquirer and all attorneys associated in a firm. We must assess whether there is "a significant risk" that the Partner's "professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected" by the Partner/A.D.A. business relationship. N.Y. State 583 teaches that this is a function of the magnitude or extent of that relationship and of its connection to the Partner's professional judgment on behalf the Client.

[18] As Prof. Roy D. Simon wrote, a "significant" risk is "more than a possibility but less than a certainty." Simon's N.Y. Rules of Professional Conduct at 271 (2012 ed.). Nevertheless, we consider the possibilities. Like the Inquirer, we do not know if the Partner's sense of loyalty to or solidarity with his business partner, the A.D.A., is great, or if their financial inter-dependence is significant. Even if it were, it is difficult on the information we have been supplied to conclude that the Partner's business relationship with the A.D.A. will motivate the Partner to alter or diminish his professional judgment for his Client, or leak confidential information, or give less than detached advice. It is significant here that the prosecution is handled by the Prosecutor, a different assistant district attorney, whose win or loss probably has little effect on the fortunes of the A.D.A. business partner. A bad outcome for the Client (a "win" for the Prosecutor) would not redound to the benefit of the A.D.A. business partner or benefit the A.D.A.'s real estate and restaurant business with the Partner. A good outcome for the Client (a "loss" for the Prosecutor) is not a loss by the A.D.A., and probably would not harm any interest of the A.D.A. business partner of the Partner. Accordingly, we cannot conclude on the limited facts supplied in the inquiry that there is a "significant" risk that there "will" be a breach of confidential information, from Partner to A.D.A. to Prosecutor, or any disloyalty to the Client by the Partner.

[19] We are not a fact-finding body, however, and it would alter our opinion if the court here were to be supplied additional facts that showed that, due to the business relationship with the A.D.A., there is a significant risk that the Partner will not "give a client detached advice;" that the relationship will "materially limit the lawyer's representation of the client" or "affect representation, for example, by referring clients to an enterprise in which the lawyer has an undisclosed financial interest;" "that client confidences will be revealed;" or that the lawyer's relationship will "interfere with both loyalty and professional judgment."

[20] It may or may not be significant that the Partner has given his assurance to the District Attorney that he will not take on criminal matters in that County, and that another partner in the Firm observes this assurance as well. Both the Prosecutor and the Inquirer have perceived this assurance to reflect a concern for a "potential" conflict of interest. An actual conflict of interest, however, is what is relevant, and that is determined by the language of Rule 1.7(a)(2), which, as we said above, is shown by the magnitude and extent of the business relationship and its impact on the Partner's professional judgment on behalf of the Client.

[21] Even if an actual personal conflict were established, it does not end the inquiry. The question would turn to whether the Inquirer and the Client could conclude that the representation may proceed. Rule 1.10 provides that the imputed conflict may be waived:

> (d) A disqualification prescribed by this Rule may be waived by the affected client or former client under the conditions stated in Rule 1.7.

[22] Rule 1.7(b), in turn, permits waiver of the conflict of interest and consent to the representation under four conditions:

> (1) the lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client;
> (2) the representation is not prohibited by law;
> (3) the representation does not involve the assertion of a claim by one client against another client represented by the lawyer in the same litigation or other proceeding before a tribunal; and
> (4) each affected client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing.

[23] We assume that the representation is not prohibited by law, and does not involve the assertion of a claim by one client of a lawyer or firm against another client. We turn, therefore, to conditions (1) and (4). We cannot rule out the possibility that both of these conditions may be satisfied.

[24] As to the first condition of Rule 1.7(b), the Partner may be able to reasonably conclude, on the facts we have been supplied, that the Partner would provide competent and diligent representation of the Client because (for the reasons stated above) we cannot say that there is a "significant risk" the outcome of the Client's case "will" bear on the Partner's business ventures with the A.D.A. and therefore diminish the competence or diligence of the Partner's representation.

[25] If the Partner could provide a competent and diligent representation, then likewise the Inquirer could do so. The Inquirer does not have any business relationship with the A.D.A. or any interest in the relationship between the Partner and the A.D.A. The Inquirer stands to gain or lose nothing depending upon the fortunes of the Partner's business venture with the A.D.A. In addition, the A.D.A. is not the assistant district attorney charging the Client, so it is difficult to imagine how even a bad outcome for the Client (a "win" for the Prosecutor) could have any impact on the fortunes of the A.D.A.'s real estate and restaurant business venture(s). There are additional factors present here. The Inquirer has represented the Client since before joining the Firm. The Inquirer has little information about and no interest in the Partner's business venture with the A.D.A. The Inquirer has an office and maintains client files in a different office and in a different county from the Prosecutor, the A.D.A., the Partner, and the business ventures. Overall, on these facts, we see enough to conclude that the Inquirer can reasonably believe that the Inquirer can provide competent and diligent representation to the Client.

[26] As to the fourth condition of Rule 1.7(b), informed consent by the Client may be possible on the facts presented. Rule 1.1(j) defines "Informed consent" as "the agreement by a person to a proposed course of conduct after the lawyer has communicated information adequate for the person to make an informed decision, and after the lawyer has adequately explained to the person the material risks of the proposed course of conduct and reasonably available alternatives." As Comment 6 to Rule 1.7 points out, it is a flexible concept, depending upon the sophistication of the Client, the information to be supplied, and whether separate counsel should be recommended to advise the Client about the risks and benefits of giving consent. The Client sets the terms of the consent; if, as we believe, the Inquirer can reasonably conclude that the Inquirer will provide competent and diligent representation, it makes even more sense to respect the consent of a Client to choose to be represented by the Inquirer, who is free of any relationship to the A.D.A. or Prosecutor.

[27] Finally, Rule 1.10(d) requires consent from all "affected clients," that is, those who are affected by the personal interest conflict. Here, unlike N.Y. State. 413, we analyze the duties of the Partner, Inquirer, and their Firm, which are criminal defense counsel. They represent the Client and the only client affected by the Partner's personal interest is the Client, not the "People." The Partner (and the Inquirer) have never represented the People. Cf N.Y. State 862 (2011) ("If the conflict arises under Rule 1.7(a)(2) because of the conflicted Assistant Public Defender's personal interests, then consent is required only from the inquirer's own assigned client, because no other client is affected.") Therefore, the fact that the District Attorney's office is unable to give consent on behalf of the "People" is of no consequence to the duties of the criminal defense counsel.

CONCLUSION:

[28] We conclude on the inquiry presented, limited to the facts supplied, that a lawyer may continue a criminal defense representation of a client after joining a firm which includes a partner who has a business relationship with a part-time assistant district attorney working in the same office where another part-time assistant district attorney is prosecuting the lawyer's client.

OPINION 926 (07/31/2012)

TOPIC: Union-sponsored legal fee reimbursement plan; conflicts of interest

DIGEST: A lawyer who belongs to a union (1) may be a lawyer on the panel of a union-sponsored plan that reimburses legal fees, and (2) may represent a fellow employee in a real estate transaction where the client will ask the plan to reimburse the employee for the lawyer's fees.

RULES: 1.0(j); 1.7(a) & (b); 1.8(f)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a practicing attorney licensed in New York State who is also an employee of a municipal corporation and member of its union. The union provides a benefit to its members in the form of reimbursement up to a maximum fixed amount for legal fees incurred by the member in connection with the purchase or sale of real estate. Reimbursement is made only if the member retains a lawyer from a panel of approved lawyers. The inquirer has applied to join the panel, but the union panel administrators asked the inquirer to obtain this Committee's opinion regarding any conflicts that might arise from the inquirer's service on the panel. The members of the panel have no control over admission to the panel; selection is made by a group including union and employer representatives.

QUESTION:

2. This inquiry presents two related questions:

A. May a lawyer who belongs to a union be a panel member of a legal fee reimbursement plan sponsored by the union for fellow employees?

B. May a lawyer who belongs to a union represent another union member (i.e., a co-worker) in a real estate transaction covered by the reimbursement plan?

OPINION:

Question A: May the Inquirer Serve as a Panel Member?

3. This Committee has long recognized that payment of legal fees by third parties is a common practice. For example, in N.Y. State 825 (2008) we opined that no ethical bar exists to a lawyer providing legal services to a client referred and paid by an employee assistance plan.

4. Rule 1.8(f), however, sets three conditions on a lawyer's receipt of payment from a third party. First, the client must give informed consent; second, there must be no interference with the lawyer's independent professional judgment or with the lawyer-client relationship; third, the client's confidential information must be protected as required by Rule 1.6. In addition, while Rule 1.8(f) does not mention it, we recommend that the client's consent be confirmed in writing.

5. The reimbursement plan at issue here differs slightly from the plan at issue in Opinion 825. There the recommendation and fee arrangement were made at the outset of the lawyer-client relationship. Here, the client selects and pays a lawyer but is eligible for reimbursement only if that lawyer is on the approved panel. But this difference is not significant and only makes compliance with Rule 1.8(f) simpler. The likelihood of compromising confidential information or undermining professional independence is reduced in the reimbursement model presented here because the representation takes place and is concluded before the client applies for reimbursement. Consequently, the union may not even be aware of the attorney-client relationship during the representation, and will thus have little or no opportunity to interfere with the relationship or to ask for confidential information.

6. Nevertheless, Rule 1.8(f)(1)'s requirement of "informed consent" raises special concerns. The term "informed consent" is defined in Rule 1.0(j) as follows:

> "Informed consent" denotes the agreement by a person to a proposed course of conduct after the lawyer has communicated information adequate for the person to make an informed decision, and after the lawyer has adequately explained to the person the material risks and reasonably available alternatives.

7. To obtain a client's informed consent in the context of the union-sponsored reimbursement plan before us here may require the lawyer to discuss the amount of fees, how the lawyer will charge for fees (e.g., flat, hourly, or percentage), the client's responsibility to pay the fees whether or not the plan approves reimbursement, and whether the lawyer will represent the client if any dispute arises with the union over the client's entitlement to reimbursement under the plan. The "material risks" would appear to be that the plan may for some reason decide not to reimburse the inquirer's fees (or may reimburse only part of them), and that the plan may take a long time to reimburse whatever portion of the fees it approves. The "reasonably available alternatives" would include hiring a lawyer outside the plan (with no chance for reimbursement) or not hiring a lawyer for the real estate deal at all.

8. The considerations in the preceding paragraph exist whether or not the lawyer providing services is a fellow employee and member of the union. Since the members of the panel have no say in the designation of new panel members, it is unnecessary to discuss any ethical implications that might arise if members of the panel had the right to exclude members.

Question B: May the Inquirer Represent a Fellow Employee and Union Member?

9. Rule 1.7(a)(2) governs personal conflicts of interest. Unless a lawyer satisfies the exceptions in Rule 1.7(b), Rule 1.7(a)(2) prohibits a lawyer from representing a client "if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that . . . there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests." The facts necessary for a reasonable lawyer to determine whether there is (or is not) a significant risk of an adverse effect on the lawyer's professional judgment in representing a fellow employee in a real estate transaction are not presented in this inquiry. Such facts might include the inquirer's personal interest in maintaining a favorable employment relationship with the employer. For example, whether a "significant risk" exists might depend on (i) whether the client is in the lawyer's direct reporting structure (and, if so, whether the client is above or below the lawyer in rank), (ii) the likelihood that the lawyer will want the client's favorable recommendation for the lawyer's promotion or advancement, and (iii) the strength of the lawyer's desire to maintain membership on the union approved panel. If these or any other personal interests arising out of the lawyer's employment for their mutual employer raise a significant risk of adversely affecting the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a fellow employee, then the inquirer must comply with the requirements in Rule 1.7(b).

10. Rule 1.7(b), permits a lawyer whose personal interests might affect the lawyer's professional judgment under Rule 1.7(a) to represent the client in the matter if the lawyer meets two main conditions:

> (1) the lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client; . . . and
> (4) each affected client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing.

11. While we lack sufficient facts to determine whether the inquirer "reasonably believes" she can provide "competent and diligent representation" to the fellow employee, or whether the employee has given informed consent, confirmed in writing, we have drawn attention to some issues the lawyer may wish to address before accepting or continuing to represent a fellow employee who intends to seek reimbursement for the lawyer's fees under the union-sponsored reimbursement plan. If, after exploring these and any other relevant personal interests, the lawyer concludes that there is no significant risk to the lawyer's independent professional judgment in representing a fellow employee in a real estate transaction, then Rule 1.7(a) (2) does not apply and the inquirer may accept the representation without obtaining the client's consent. If the lawyer concludes there is a significant risk, then the lawyer may not accept or continue the representation absent compliance with Rule 1.7(b).

CONCLUSION:

12. A lawyer who belongs to a union (1) may be a lawyer on the panel of a union-sponsored plan that reimburses legal fees, and (2) may represent a fellow employee in a real estate transaction where the client will ask the plan to reimburse the employee for the lawyer's fees.

TOPIC: Referrals by Non-Lawyer; Attorney Fees Paid by Third Party

DIGEST: Lawyer may not ethically enter into arrangement with a non-lawyer to accept referrals for a fixed monthly fee for each case referred where case has been obtained by telephonic solicitation.

RULES: 1.0(j),1.5(a) and (b), 1.8(f), 5.3(b), 5.4(a), 7.2(b), 7.3(a)(1), 8.4(a)

QUESTION:

[1] May a lawyer enter into an arrangement to (a) accept referrals of mortgage foreclosure cases from a non-lawyer who will pay the lawyer a monthly fee and (b) have the lawyer's legal fees paid by a third party that referred the client to the lawyer?

FACTS:

[2] A corporation (the "Corporation") that is not a law firm intends on a non-exclusive basis to refer clients to the lawyer which clients are in the process of having their residences in New York foreclosed. The legal services would include matters related to loan defaults, mortgage foreclosures and bankruptcies. The lawyer will bill the Corporation a flat fee of $300 each month for each referral regardless of how many or how few hours the lawyer must devote to the matter. The Corporation will pay the lawyer from funds paid to the Corporation each month by the Client. Upon conclusion of the matter the Corporation will retain the balance of the funds for its role in obtaining the Client. The Corporation has no obligation to refer any clients to the lawyer and the lawyer has no obligation to accept any client. Before accepting any client the lawyer will run a conflict check. The Corporation obtained the potential clients by checking public records and contacting the individuals by telephone. The clients enter into an agreement with the Corporation to pay something each month in excess of the amount paid to the lawyer. The lawyer is not advised how much in excess is paid by the client to the Corporation. The Corporation promises prospective clients that it has lawyers in the client's geographical area that are competent to handle the matter and refers their matter to such lawyer. The agreement is between the client and the Corporation, not between the client and the lawyer.

[3] The lawyer has not and will not pay the Corporation anything of value for the referrals.

APPLICABLE RULES:

[4] The answer to the question based upon the facts implicates a number of provisions of the Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") including the following:

(a) Rule 1.5(a) prohibits a lawyer from charging an excessive or illegal fee.

(b) Rule 1.5(b) and 22 N.Y.C.R.R §1215.1 require a lawyer to furnish a client with an engagement letter or retainer agreement at the outset of the representation.

(c) Rule 1.8(f) prohibits third party payment of legal fees unless the client gives informed consent.

(d) Rule 5.3(b) makes a lawyer responsible for conduct of a non-lawyer associated with the lawyer that would be a violation of the Rules if engaged in by the lawyer.

(e) Rule 5.4(a) prohibits a lawyer from sharing a legal fee with a non-lawyer.

(f) Rule 7.2 (b) provides that a lawyer may be recommended, employed or paid by a legal aid office, a public defender office or a bar association sponsored lawyer referral service.

(g) Rule 7.3(a)(1) prohibits a lawyer from solicitation by in-person or telephone contact.

(h) Rule 8.4((a) prohibits a lawyer from violating a Rule through the acts of another.

OPINION:

Question of Law

[5] This inquiry raises a substantial question of law which is beyond the jurisdiction of this Committee to resolve. Would the Corporation by solicitation of clients from public records of current foreclosures and referring the matter to an attorney be engaged in actions in violation of Judiciary Law §479 (soliciting business on behalf of an attorney), §482 (employment by attorney of person to aid, assist or abet in the solicitation of business or the procurement through solicitation of a retainer to perform legal services) or §495(1)(d) (prohibiting corporations from furnishing attorneys)? Apart from the law, the proposed arrangement is ethically flawed in numerous respects and accordingly, a New York lawyer should not enter into the proposal.

Fee Not to be Excessive

[6] While flat or fixed fees are not prohibited by Rule 1.5(a) as such, Simon's New York Rules of Professional Conduct 111 (2012 ed.), the fee cannot be excessive. Rule 1.5(a); Restatement Third, The Law Governing Lawyers §34 (2000). This is so even though the parties agreed to the fee. Restatement Third, The Law Governing Lawyers §34, com. a (2000). Here there is to be a charge by the lawyer of $300 each month for the entire length of the matter whether or not legal services are performed that month. This is more akin to a monthly retainer which, depending upon the circumstances, may be permissible. N.Y. State 599 (1989). For the purposes of this opinion we need not distinguish between the classical or general retainer, advance refundable payment, minimum non-refundable payment or fixed fee. Whether or not the fee described in the proposed arrangement would be excessive cannot be determined based upon the facts given in this inquiry; but there is a rebuttable presumption that a flat or fixed fee unrelated to the service performed for a lengthy period at some point becomes excessive. Retainer or fixed fees agreed to by unsophisticated clients should be more closely scrutinized to ensure that they are no greater than is reasonable. On top of the fee charged by the lawyer, the Corporation here adds its monthly fee. The two combined are presumptively excessive for lack of a stated justification.

[7] As stated in N.Y. State 599 (1989), paralleling the Code (now the Rules) provisions are legal standards applicable to a lawyer's fee. "[A]s a matter of public policy, courts pay particular attention to fee arrangements between attorneys and their clients. . . . An attorney has the burden of showing that a fee contract is fair, reasonable, and fully known and understood by the client. . . ." Jacobson v. Sassower, 66 N.Y.2d 991, 993 (1985). "A client may always discharge his attorney, with or without cause, and in the absence of a contract providing otherwise an attorney discharged without cause is entitled to be compensated in quantum meruit." Id. citing Martin v. Camp, 219 N.Y. 170 (1916); see also,e.g.,Rubenstein v. Rubenstein, 137 A.D.2d 514 (2d Dep't 1988) (fairness and reasonableness of fee); J.M. Heinike Associates v. Liberty National Bank, 142 A.D. 2d 929, 930 (4th Dep't 1988) (unconscionability of retaining prepaid fee following withdrawal from employment in absence of good cause). Cf., Brickman & Cunningham, Nonrefundable Retainers: Impermissible Under Fiduciary, Statutory and Contract Law, 57 Fordham L.Rev. 149 (1988).

Notice to Client

[8] Both the Rules [Rule 1.5(b)] and the law where the fees are expected to exceed $3,000 (22 N.Y.C.R.R. §1215.1) require that the lawyer at the commencement of the representation or a reasonable time thereafter advise the client the scope of the representation and the basis or rate of the fee unless the client has been regularly represented and the services are of the same general kind as previously rendered. Under the facts of the matter before us, this was not done. The proposed arrangement thus does not comply with the Rule and possibly the regulation.

Telephone Solicitation

[9] The Corporation's telephonic solicitation of the client if done by the lawyer would be in violation of Rule 7.3(a)(1) and its predecessor DR 2-103 (A) of the Code of Professional Responsibility (the "Code") prohibiting such solicitation. Because Rule 5.3(a) and its predecessor DR 1-104(D)(1) of the Code makes a lawyer responsible for conduct of a non-lawyer associated with the lawyer that would be a violation of the Rules if engaged in by the lawyer, the lawyer would be in violation of the Rules as the lawyer is associated with the Corporation in the proposed arrangement. N.Y. State 694 (1997); N.Y. State 828 (2009). We do not address First Amendment considerations discussed in *Ohralik v. Ohio State Bar Assn.,*436 U.S. 447 (1978) upholding a ban on in person solicitation, Shapero v. Kentucky Bar Assn., 486 U.S. 466 (1988) permitting direct mail solicitation, In re von Wiegen, 63 N.Y. 2d 163 (1984) permitting direct mail solicitation or Florida Bar v. Went for It, Inc., 515 U.S. 618 (1995) upholding a ban on mail solicitation to accident victims as these are questions of law beyond the jurisdiction of this Committee.

Division of Legal Fees

[10] It has long been established in New York that a lawyer may not share a legal fee with a non-lawyer. Rule 5.4(a) and its predecessors, DR 3-102 of the Code and Canon 34 of the Canons of Professional Ethics; N.Y. State 889 (2011); N.Y. State 906 (2012); N.Y. State 911 (2012). Here the fee paid by the client to the Corporation includes the lawyer's fee for legal services. In substance the lawyer is sharing a legal fee with a non-lawyer. This is no different than the lawyer billing the client and remitting a portion of the fee to the Corporation. The lawyer cannot do indirectly what the lawyer cannot do directly. Rule 8.4(a). N.Y. State 860 (2011). The arrangement would violate these Rules.

[11] Notwithstanding the foregoing, we recognize that it may be ethically possible for a client separately to engage the services of the lawyer and the non-lawyer at the same time and that the non-lawyer may be paid directly by the client and the lawyer also be paid directly by the client. See Blumenberg v. Neubecker, 12 N.Y.2d 456 (1963). Notably, Blumenberg centered around the anti-fee splitting with non-lawyers prohibition contained in Judiciary Law §491 and did not address the ethical issues of fee splitting with non-lawyers contained in Canons 34 of the Canons of Professional Ethics in effect at the time of the decision. The application of Judiciary Law §491 is a question of law beyond the jurisdiction of this Committee. Without reference to Blumenberg or to Judiciary Law §491 this Committee concluded in N.Y. State 875 (2011) that there "is no ethical barrier to a lawyer entering into a contingent fee arrangement with a client where the client already has retained a non-testifying expert to work on the same case on a contingent fee basis." That is not the case here. Here the client pays a single fee directly to the non-lawyer, a portion of which is then paid to the lawyer. What is happening is that the non-lawyer Corporation is acting as a referral agent for a fee. However, the Corporation is not one of the entities permitted to be a referral agent under Rule 7.2(b). N.Y. State 597 (1989). Accordingly, these Rules would be violated.

Third Party Payor of Legal Fees

[12] There is nothing per se ethically improper if a third party pays the lawyer's legal fee provided that the client is fully informed of the arrangement, including the amount to be paid to the lawyer, and the client gives informed consent as defined by Rule 1.0(j) and provided the third party does not interfere with the representation. Rule 1.8(f); N.Y. State 825 (2008); Restatement Third, The Law Governing Lawyers §134(1) and com. c (2000). In the arrangement described in the facts there is no indication that the client has fully been informed of the arrangement and has given informed consent. Thus, the arrangement would also violate these provisions of the Rules.

CONCLUSION:

[13] A lawyer may not ethically enter an arrangement with a non-lawyer to accept referrals for a fixed monthly fee for each case referred by the non-lawyer where the client has been obtained by the non-lawyer by telephonic solicitation and receives a fee from the client that includes the lawyer's fee.

OPINION 928 (08/09/2012)

TOPIC: Use of the term "Project" or "Law Center" in the name of a qualified legal assistance organization.

DIGEST: A qualified legal assistance organization can use the terms "Project" and "Law Center" in its name as long as, in the case of the term "Project," the term is associated with words indicating the organization's law-related activity.

RULES: 1.0(p), 7.5(b)

FACTS:

[1] The inquirer is interested in starting a non-profit legal services organization and has asked if the terms "Project" and "Law Center" could be used in its name.

QUESTION:

[2] The inquirer has asked two related questions:

> A: Can the word "Project" be used in the organization's name, even if the term "legal" or "law" is not?
> B: Does the use of the phrase "Law Center" comply with the Rules of Professional Conduct?

OPINION:

[3] This question is governed by Rule 7.5(b) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct, which provides in part that:

> A lawyer in private practice shall not practice under a trade name [or] a name that is misleading as to the identity of the lawyer or lawyers practicing under such name. . . . Such terms as "legal clinic," "legal aid," "legal service office," "legal assistance office," "defender office" and the like may be used only by qualified legal assistance organizations, except that the term "legal clinic" may be used by any lawyer or law firm provided the name of a participating lawyer or firm is incorporated therein.

[4] Rule 1.0(p) states that the term "'[q]ualified legal assistance organization' means an office or organization of one of the four types listed in Rule 7.2(b)(1)-(4) that meets all of the requirements thereof." The four types, each with its own requirements, include "a legal aid office or public defender office" operated or sponsored by, among others, a bona fide, non-profit community organization, and a "bona fide organization that recommends, furnishes or pays for legal services to its members or beneficiaries." We will assume that the contemplated organization would comply with relevant aspects of Rule 7.2(b) and so would be a "qualified legal assistance organization." This opinion does not apply to private law firms that are not "qualified legal assistance organizations," and they are governed by entirely different considerations.[29]

[5] In our view, a qualified legal assistance organization would be able to use the name "Project," provided that the name, like all the other terms set forth in Rule 7.5(b), were to indicate in some way the law-related nature of the group's activity (and provided the name was not otherwise misleading). In Paskowski v. DiBenedetto, 184 Misc. 2d 34, 38, 705 N.Y.S.2d 521, 524-25 (Fam. Ct. Rockland Co. 2000), the court found that the term "Domestic Violence Law Project" was "sufficiently similar to the listed terms to be covered by the reference in the Disciplinary Rule [DR 2-102(B), which was identical to current Rule 7.5(b)] to 'and the like.'" We agree. We do not think that the only permissible ways to indicate the law-related nature of the work are use of the terms "legal" or "law." One of the terms listed in the Rule is, for example, "defender office." But in our view a term such as "Poverty Project" would not, without more, be sufficiently similar to the terms listed in Rule 7.5(b) to qualify.

[6] The term "Law Center" can be used by a qualified legal assistance program, provided it is not otherwise misleading, as it is, in our view, similar to terms such as "Legal Clinic" or "Legal Service Office."

CONCLUSION:

[7] A qualified legal assistance organization may use the term "Project" or "Law Center" in its name, provided that the name is not otherwise misleading and provided, in the case of the term "Project," that the name otherwise indicates the law-related nature of the group's activity.

State 445 (1976) ("Community Law Office" would be unacceptably misleading for a private law office).

TOPIC: Designation of Patent Attorney on Business Card; Inactive Status and Designation of Specialty

DIGEST: An attorney whose registration/admission status before the United States Patent and Trademark Office is "inactive" may not use the designation patent attorney on his business card unless he notes that he is on administrative leave and as such is unable to prosecute matters for others before the USPTO.

RULES: Rule 7.1 a and b, 7.4(b), 7.5 (a), and 8.4(c)

FACTS:

[1] The Inquirer, who is admitted to practice in patent matters before the United States Patent and Trademark Office ("USPTO"), has accepted a position as a patent examiner for the USPTO. Once the Inquirer begins working as a patent examiner for the USPTO, the inquirer's name will remain on the official USPTO register, but his registration status will be changed to "on administrative leave."

[2] During the period of his employment with the USPTO, the Inquirer will not be able to represent, or prosecute patent applications, for others or otherwise engage in patent practice before the USPTO.

[3] The Inquirer has advised that as a federal government employee he is prohibited from practicing as an attorney for others before any federal agency.

QUESTION:

[4] May an attorney, who is admitted to practice before the USPTO continue to use the designation "Patent Attorney" on his business cards when his USPTO admission status changes to "administrative leave"?

[5] According to Federal Law, an attorney who has fulfilled the requirements for admission to practice before the USPTO is deemed to be registered as a patent attorney. A patent attorney is able to represent applicants in the preparation and prosecution of patent applications and to practice before the USPTO in patent matters. See 37 C.F.R. §§ 11.5, 11.6 (a) (1).

[6] Rule 7.4 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") instructs lawyers who wish to identify themselves and their practices in terms of their respective specialties. According to Comment [2] of Rule 7.4, "Paragraph (b) recognizes the long-established policy of the Patent and Trademark Office for the designation of lawyers practicing before the Office."

[7] Rule 7.4 (b) states as follows:

> (b) A lawyer admitted to engage in patent practice before the United States Patent and Trademark Office may use the designation "Patent Attorney" or substantially similar designation.

[8] Rule 7.5 addresses attorneys' use of professional cards and professional announcement cards, and permits an attorney to use such cards. Rule 7.5 provides:

> (a) A lawyer or law firm may use internet web sites, professional cards, professional announcement cards, office signs, letterheads or similar professional notices or devices, provided the same do not violate any statute or court rule and are in accordance with Rule 7.1, including the following:
> > (1) a professional card of a lawyer identifying the lawyer by name and as a lawyer, and giving addresses, telephone numbers, the name of the law firm, and any information permitted under Rule 7.1(b) or Rule 7.4.

[9] In the instant situation, the Inquirer has advised that while serving as a patent examiner for the USPTO, he will be an employee of the Federal Government. Federal Government employees may not accept private clients or represent clients other than their agency before the USPTO. See 18 U.S.C. § 205; 37 CFR § 11.10(d) and (e) (an employee of the USPTO is prohibited "from prosecuting or aiding in any manner in the prosecution of a patent application for another"). In the instant matter, the Inquirer may not represent others before the USPTO.

[10] In the instant scenario because the Inquirer is unable to represent others before the USPTO while employed by the USPTO, Rule 7.1 is instructive in determining what information the Inquirer may include on his business card.

[11] Rule 7.1 (b) states in part:

> (b) Subject to the provisions of paragraph (a), an advertisement may include information as to:
> > (1) legal and non-legal education, degrees and other scholastic distinctions, dates of admission to any bar; areas or the law in which the lawyer or law firm practices, as authorized by these Rules; public offices and teaching positions held; publications or law related matters authored by the lawyer; memberships in bar associations or others professional societies or organizations, including offices and committee assignments therein; foreign language fluency; and bona fide professional ratings;"

[12] Rule 7.1(a) (1) and (2) prohibits a lawyer from using or disseminating any advertisement that "contains statements or claims that are false, deceptive or misleading; or violates a Rule."

[13] Comment [6] of Rule 7.1 states ". . . all communications by lawyers, whether subject to the special rules governing lawyer advertising or not are governed by the general rule that lawyers not engage in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation, or knowingly make a material false statement of fact or law."

[14] In addition the lawyer must comply with Rule 8.4(c), which provides that a lawyer shall not "engage in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation."

[15] Therefore, it would be misleading for the Inquirer, without further explanation, to maintain the designation "patent attorney" on his business card when the attorney is currently unable to represent others or prepare/prosecute patent applications for submission to and/or presented before the USPTO.

[16] The Inquirer may attempt to prevent any ethical issues from arising when including the patent attorney designation on his business cards by also inserting language that notes that he is currently on administrative leave and is unable to represent others in patent matters before the USPTO.

[17] This conclusion is consistent with prior opinions concerning information to be disclosed on attorneys' business cards.

[18] In N.Y. State 704 (1998), we concluded that business cards must fairly disclose jurisdictional limitations on practice of named attorneys. In that opinion, we also remarked on the purpose of the contents on letterhead and business cards and noted that "the contents of letterhead and business cards should enhance the public's ability to recognize the need for counsel and to choose the most appropriate counsel, and should not contain any statement or representation that is false, deceptive or misleading" and the "contents should not violate any statute or court rule."

[19] In N.Y. State 863 (2011) we concluded that a lawyer not admitted to practice in New York, who is engaged in immigration matters in New York, should "note on . . . her business cards that she is admitted to practice only in Texas and her practice in New York is limited solely to immigration matters."

[20] Similarly, in the present inquiry, once the attorney becomes administratively inactive and is unable to practice before the USPTO, it would be misleading to use the designation patent attorney on business cards because it implies that he is able to prosecute patent applications and/or otherwise represent others before the USPTO, when in fact, he is not.

CONCLUSION:

[21] It is misleading for an attorney employed as a patent examiner, whose registration status before the USPTO is administratively inactive, to use the designation patent attorney on his business cards during the leave period without inclusion of his status on the USPTO register. The attorney should include on his business card that he is on administrative leave and/or inactive status before the USPTO and is unable to prosecute patent applications and/or otherwise represent others before the USPTO.

OPINION 930 (08/08/2012)

TOPIC: Arrangement between Law Firm and Non-Legal Service Provider

DIGEST: A lawyer may not enter into a contractual arrangement with an insurance agency whereby the agency would offer its customers both legal and nonlegal services, even if the agency and lawyer are separately paid and do not share in each other's fees.

RULES: 1.7, 5.7, 5.8(a), 5.8(c), 7.1, 7.2, 7.3

QUESTION:

[1] The inquiring lawyer asks whether a lawyer may enter into an exclusive arrangement with an insurance agency whereby the agency would offer its clients a service requiring legal review, and, as part of the same offer, would recommend that its clients use the legal services of the inquiring lawyer.

BACKGROUND:

[2] Federal law – specifically the Employee Retirement Income Security Act, or "ERISA," 29 U.S.C. 1002, et seq. – requires administrators of benefit plans to provide plan participants in writing the most important facts they need to know about their retirement and health benefits. These facts include plan rules, financial information, and documents on the operation and management of the plan. Some of these facts must be automatically provided by plan administrators; others must be available on request. Among the documents that plan administrators must always supply all plan participants is a summary of the plan, widely called a Summary Plan Description, or "SPD." See http://www.dol.gov/dol/topic/health-plans/planinformation.htm.

[3] The inquirer concentrates in employment and labor law, including benefit plans that ERISA regulates. According to the inquirer, both insurance companies and insurance agents commonly charge a fee for preparing an SPD for their customers, the plan administrators. The inquirer proposes to enter into an arrangement whereby an insurance agency will offer the agency's services, together with the inquiring lawyer's services, to the agency's customers to prepare an SPD. The lawyer does not pay the insurance agency for this arrangement, nor does one share in the fees payable to the other.

[4] In a proposed communication with its customer plan administrators, the insurance agency would indicate that the agency will provide an SPD for a lump sum price that includes both the agency's documentation of the SPD plus the inquiring lawyer's review. Of the lump sum price, 87% would be paid directly to the lawyer by the client plan administrator pursuant to a written engagement letter between the plan administrator and the lawyer; the balance would be paid directly to the insurance agency. The proposed communication notes that other providers of this service charge a fee higher than the proposed lump sum while disclaiming liability for legal review of the SPD. The proposed communication also contains a flattering description of the inquiring lawyer's abilities in employee benefit matters.

[5] The inquiring lawyer states that the inquirer is prepared to conduct the legal review of the SPD for a flat or fixed fee. The lawyer estimates that such review will typically consume X number of hours, and that 87% of the lump sum price equates to X times the lawyer's customary hourly rate. The lawyer (or the lawyer's firm) would be the exclusive legal service provider that the insurance agency would offer to its plan administrator customers under the arrangement for preparing SPDs.

OPINION:

[6] We conclude that Rule 5.8 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") prohibits the arrangement as the inquirer proposes to structure it, because the structure would constitute an improper multidisciplinary practice. The term "multidisciplinary practice" means a venture that offers both legal and non-legal services to the public. In April 2000, the New York State Bar Association Special Committee on the Law Governing Structure and Operation released the "MacCrate Report," officially titled Preserving the Core Values of the American Legal Profession: The Place of Multidisciplinary Practice in the Law Governing Lawyers. "On July 23, 2001, the Appellate Divisions adopted new rules on multidisciplinary practice, effective November 1, 2001." N.Y. 755 (2002). There were two new Disciplinary Rules: DR 1-106 and DR 1-107 of the Code of Professional Responsibility (which was then in effect in New York). Each new DR substantially implemented the recommendations of the MacCrate Report. DR 1-106 concerned ancillary non-legal businesses that a law firm owned or controlled; DR 1-107 concerned business relationships between law firms and third-party non-legal service providers. In 2009, when the Appellate Divisions adopted the format of the Model Rules of Professional Conduct, DR 1-106 and DR 1-107 became, respectively, Rules 5.7 and 5.8 of the Rules, with the language unchanged.

[7] The MacCrate Report, and the rules the Appellate Divisions adopted in its wake, embraced a more cautious view of multidisciplinary practice than some other jurisdictions. See, e.g., D.C. Rule. 5.4(b) (permitting non-lawyer equity interests in law firms). New York's Rule 5.8(a) begins with a preamble on the core values of the legal profession, declaring that "[m]ulti-disciplinary practice between lawyers and non-lawyers is incompatible with the core values of the legal profession and, therefore, a strict division between services provided by lawyers and those provided by non-lawyers is essential to protect those values."

[8] The proposed arrangement here is a species of multidisciplinary practice, in this instance implicating Rule 5.8 as a business relationship between a lawyer and a third-party non-lawyer service provider. The proposed conduct consists of an exclusive contractual arrangement between a lawyer and non-legal professional service provider offering to the public, on a systematic and ongoing basis, both legal services (by the inquiring lawyer) and services by a non-legal professional service provider (an insurance agency). The proposed arrangement contemplates that the agency and the lawyer will regularly offer to the agency's clients the service of drafting SPDs and reviewing them for compatibility with ERISA and other applicable laws.

[9] Rule 5.8(a) says that a lawyer may form an ongoing business relationship with a non-lawyer service provider if each of three requirements set forth there is met. The first of these, set out in Rule 5.8(a)(1), provides that a lawyer or a law firm (with our emphasis) > may enter into and maintain a contractual relationship with a nonlegal professional or nonlegal professional service firm for the purpose of offering to the public, on a systematic and continuing basis, legal services performed by the lawyer or law firm as well as other nonlegal professional services, notwithstanding the provisions of Rule 1.7(a) [requiring advance client consent], provided that:

> (1) the profession of the nonlegal professional or nonlegal professional service firm is included in a list jointly established and maintained by the Appellate Divisions pursuant to Section 1205.3 of the Joint Appellate Division Rules; . . .

[10] We may aptly stop there, because the proposed arrangement does not satisfy the first of the three requirements of Rule 5.8(a), each of which the Rule mandates for systematic and ongoing cooperative arrangements offering both legal and non-legal services. Insurance agencies are not among the types of non-legal professional service providers firms listed pursuant to Section 1205.3. See 22 NYCRR §§ 1205.3, 1205.5; see N.Y. State 885 (2011) (lawyer may not enter into agreement with a tax reduction service). Accordingly, the proposed cooperative arrangement is impermissible under Rule 5.8(a)(1). There may be permissible ways for inquirer to structure a relationship with an insurance agency, cf. Rule 5.8(c) (rule on cooperative business arrangements does not apply to "relationships consisting solely of non-exclusive reciprocal referral arrangements"), but we address only the structure outlined in the inquiry before us.

[11] In so opining, we necessarily conclude that the language of rule 5.8(a) is mandatory, not permissive. Thus, only those non-legal professional service providers that the Appellate Divisions lists in § 1205 may be parties to an ongoing cooperative practice arrangement. In our view, the plain language of the Rule so indicates. The Rule says that a lawyer "may" enter into such an arrangement "provided" that the lawyer satisfies the three requirements in Rule 5.8(a), the first of which is appearance on the Appellate Divisions' list. We read this language to mean that a lawyer may not enter into such an arrangement unless each of the requirements is met. See Webster's Unabridged Dictionary 1450 (2^{d} ed. 1979) (defining "provided" as "on condition; this being understood; conceded, or established; if").

[12] Comment [5] accompanying Rule 5.8 supports this result. The Comment says, in relevant part:

> [5] To ensure that only appropriate professional services are involved, a contractual relationship for the provision of services is permitted under paragraph (a) only if the nonlegal party thereto is a professional or professional service firm meeting appropriate standards regarding ethics, education, training and licensing. The Appellate Divisions maintain a public list of eligible professions at 22 NYCRR § 1205.5. . . . [Emphasis added.]

On at least three prior occasions, we have expressly said as much, two of them within the past year. See N.Y. State 888 (2011) ("Rule 5.8(a) specifically limits the non-legal professionals with whom a lawyer may contract) (emphasis added); N.Y. State 885 (2011) ("attorney may enter into a cooperative business arrangement only where the profession of the non-legal professional is included in a list jointly maintained by the Appellate Divisions") (emphasis added); N.Y. 765 (2003) (DR 1-107(A), the forerunner of Rule 5.8(a), "limits the professions with which lawyers can so contract to those professions on a list designated by the Appellate Divisions") (emphasis added). Others uniformly agree. N.Y. County 733 (2004) ("Since financial advisors are not Designated Professionals [on the § 1205 list], an attorney may not enter into a contractual relationship with a financial advisor that would offer continuous and systematic services to the public.); Roy Simon, Simon's New York Rules of Professional Conduct Annotated 993 (2012 ed.) ("lawyers are permitted to enter into a full-fledged contractual relationship with nonlegal professionals only if the nonlegal professionals are on the special list of approved professions established and maintained by the Appellate Divisions") (emphasis added).

[13] In our view, these comments and opinions keep faith with the origins of Rule 5.8(a). In advancing the language of its forerunner DR 1-107(a), which the Appellate Divisions adopted not once but twice, the MacCrate Report said (footnotes omitted and emphasis added):

> . . . [T]he Committee is concerned that lawyers and law firms not be permitted to join alliances with non-lawyers whose standards of ethics and professionalism could dilute the lawyers duties to clients. . . . Accordingly, the determination whether lawyers should be permitted to enter into systematic and continuous inter-professional arrangements is best determined on a profession-by-profession basis, taking into account the intrinsic nature of each profession and assuring that affiliation with it will not impair lawyer professional standards to any extent.

[14] Based on these considerations, the MacCrate Report recommended that the courts retain control over the types of professions with which a lawyer may properly form an ongoing cooperative business arrangement. The Appellate Divisions' enactment of the MacCrate Report's recommendations evinces the courts' determination to maintain control over this form of multidisciplinary practice in New York.

[15] Thus, the plain language of Rule 5.8(a), the comments accompanying it, the prior views of this and other committees and commentators, and the history animating the Rule, potently support the conclusion that the intention of Rule 5.8(a) is to limit this type of multidisciplinary practice to combinations with professionals that the Appellate Divisions have blessed in § 1205.

[16] That the lawyer and the agency intend separately to bill for the services does not alter this conclusion. The focus of our attention is the arrangement between the lawyer and the non-lawyer service provider, and the continuing and systematic offer of their services to the public. The inquirer and the insurance agency are engaged in what amounts to a joint venture to provide a service for the public. This falls squarely within the ambit of multidisciplinary practice governed by Rule 5.8(a).

[17] Even if the arrangement were permissible, the proposed announcement of the arrangement, which promotes the inquiring lawyer's qualities and is directed to a specific group of recipients, could well be considered both lawyer advertising and solicitation, and hence subject to Rules 7.1 and 7.3. Without resolving the matter on this inquiry, we note, too, that the proposed arrangement could raise issues under Rule 7.2, which regulates payments for referrals. Although the inquirer is not compensating the agency for including the lawyer in its promotion, and is apparently prepared to accept a flat fee for the service being rendered to the agency's clients, a serious question could arise if the inquirer is providing a benefit to the agency – and therefore consideration for a referral – if the lawyer charges a higher rate to review SPDs to the firm clients that retain the firm outside the context of the insurance agency's promotion. That would be the functional equivalent of the discount that troubled this Committee in N.Y. State 885.

[18] Finally, the lawyer must consider the edicts of Rule 1.7(a)(2), as qualified by Rule 1.7(b), to determine whether the lawyer's personal and financial interest in the arrangement complicates the inquirer's representation of the insurance agency's clients. These same considerations animated the MacCrate Report's recommendations ("[T]he current Code does not adequately deal with . . . the risk that the non-lawyer professional service firm may be the dominant participant in the alliance and may possess – and, by possessing, exert – economic influence of a kind not adequately anticipated or prevented by DR 5-101(A)," the forerunner of Rule 1.7(a)(2)) and prompted the Appellate Divisions to adopt Rule 5.8.

CONCLUSION

[19] A lawyer may not enter into and maintain a contractual arrangement with an insurance agency in which agency offers both legal and nonlegal services on an ongoing basis to the agency's customers.

OPINION 931 (09/07/2012)

TOPIC: Law firm names

DIGEST: Law firm of solo practitioner cannot include "and Associates" based on employment of paralegal

RULES: 7.5(b), 7.5(c), 8.4(c)

FACTS:

[1] A solo practitioner employs a paralegal. He would like to name his firm "Smith [assumed name] and Associates" because he feels it would give a more positive impression of his firm's capabilities, but seeks assurance that such name complies with professional ethics.

QUESTION:

[2] Would the law firm name "Smith and Associates" comply with the Rules of Professional Conduct where "Smith" is a solo practitioner, and Smith's law firm also employs a paralegal?

OPINION:

[3] Rule 7.5(b) provides that "a lawyer in private practice shall not practice under a trade name" or "a name that is misleading as to the identity of the lawyer or lawyers practicing under such name . . ."

[4] Rule 7.5(b) also provides that "A lawyer or law firm may not include the name of a nonlawyer in its firm name."

[5] Rule 7.5 (c) provides that "Lawyers shall not hold themselves out as having a partnership with one or more other lawyers unless they are in fact partners."

[6] Comment 1 to Rule 7.5 states that "to avoid the possibility of misleading persons with whom a lawyer deals, a lawyer should be scrupulous in the representation of professional status."

[7] Rule 8.4(c) provides that "A lawyer or law firm shall not . . . (c) engage in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation."

[8] The inquirer asks whether he ethically can use the name "Smith and Associates" as the name of his law firm name where he does not have any partners and employs no other lawyers, and the "and Associates" aspect of the proposed name is based on the presence of a paralegal employed by the firm. Thus he asks whether the term "Associates" properly can refer to a paralegal.

[9] N.Y. State 869 (2011), which dealt in part with whether a solo practitioner could practice under a name containing the word "Firm," notes that law firm names are subject to more stringent requirements than general lawyer advertising, and that a law firm may not practice under a trade name or any other name that is misleading. The opinion explains that this requirement "serves to protect the public from being deceived as to the identity, responsibility or status of those who use the firm name."

[10] Use of the words "and Associates" does not comply with Rule 7.5(b) where the firm only has one lawyer. In that context, the term "and Associates" could only refer to a paralegal or other nonlawyer, since Smith is the only lawyer and Smith's firm employs a paralegal. The firm name "Smith and Associates" would give the false impression to the public, including potential clients, that Smith is practicing with other lawyer colleagues. This is particularly true where "associate" has a long-established meaning in the context of lawyers in private practice, as a lawyer admitted to practice and employed by the law firm, but is not a partner.

[11] On the present facts, the term "and Associates" is misleading, and violates Rule 8.4(c). Based on its literal meaning, it can deceive the public because it suggests that the firm includes at least three lawyers: Smith and two others.

[12] N.Y. State 732 (2000) authorizes the use of the word "group" in a law firm name using the name of a particular lawyer where that lawyer practices with other associates (presumably lawyers). Its reasoning assumes that a name suggesting that the firm's practice includes other associates is not misleading. By negative inference, using "and associates" in a law firm name where the firm consists of only one lawyer would be misleading.

[13] N.Y. State 286 (1973), similarly allows the use of the firm name "and associates" in a situation where "the associates" unquestionably refers to lawyers.

[14] Rule 7.5(c) also supports the negative answer to the inquiry because of its blanket prohibition against lawyers creating the impression that they are partners where that is not correct.

CONCLUSION:

[15] A solo practitioner whose law firm employs no other lawyers, but does employ a paralegal, may not ethically use the name "Smith and Associates" because that would risk misleading the public as to the number of lawyers at the firm.

OPINION 932 (09/07/2012)

TOPIC: Lawyers' business cards; recommendation of services.

DIGEST: A lawyer's photograph may be on the lawyer's business card. A lawyer may recommend other service providers provided that there is an appropriate disclaimer.

RULES: 7.5(a)(i); 5.4; 7.2; 7.1(c) (3)).

QUESTION:

[1] We have been asked if an attorney's business card may include a photograph of the attorney and whether the attorney may include on the back of the card, or on a separate sheet of paper, lists of other service providers such as a plumber, realtor, mortgage loan officer, or accountant, which may be useful to the attorney's clients during a real estate transaction and which are recommended by the attorney based on past personal experience with the provider.

OPINION:

[2] Rule 7.5(a)(i) provides a non-exclusive list of the content of a lawyer's professional or business card. It provides that the card may contain the following:

- The lawyer's name
- Identification that the person is a lawyer such as "J.D.", "Esq.", "Attorney-at-law" or "lawyer"
- Address or addresses
- Telephone Numbers
- The name of the lawyer's firm
- Any information permitted under Rule 7.4 relating to area of practice
- Name of members and associates of the firm.

[3] Nothing contained in the Rules prohibits the use of a photograph or "headshot" of a lawyer. However, a lawyer may not use an actor to portray a lawyer in the photograph without disclosing that fact. (Rule 7.1(c) (3). A lawyer may not include anything in the business card which would be false, misleading or deceptive. Rules 7.5(a) and 7.1(a).

[4] The rules clearly contemplate that lawyers may refer their clients to other service providers and that others may refer clients to lawyers. See, e.g., Rules 5.4 and 7.2. The lawyer must be mindful that referrals are managed in such a way that the lawyer must always maintain professional independence in order that the client always receives the lawyer's best professional judgment free of any undue or inappropriate influence. Thus, exclusive reciprocal referral arrangements are prohibited. See Rule 7.2, Cmt. [4]. Furthermore, the lawyer must not have such an interest in a steady stream of referrals that it undermines the lawyer's professional judgment for the client. Rule 7.2, Cmt. [4] and N.Y. State 765 (2003). Nonexclusive agreements are permissible provided that the client is informed of the agreement. To this end, the list of referrals, whether on the back of a business card or separate, should contain a disclaimer making it clear that the lawyer does not have an agreement with those on the list. While many formulations are possible, the following would be sufficient: "Note: These professionals are not affiliated with the Law Offices of _____ and may not be appropriate choices in every matter."

[5] We do not opine on the constitutionality of the advertising rules.

CONCLUSION:

[6] A lawyer's photograph may be on the lawyer's business card. A lawyer may recommend other service providers provided that there is an appropriate disclaimer.

TOPIC: Dual practice; real estate broker; law office.

DIGEST: A lawyer may conduct a law practice and a real estate brokerage business in the same office, and may advertise them together provided that the advertising is neither false nor misleading, but may not act as lawyer and broker in the same transaction.

CODE: Rules 1.6 (a) and (c) 5.7, 5.8, 7.1, 1.7(a),

QUESTIONS:

[1] May a lawyer ethically practice law and conduct a real estate brokerage business in the same premises?

[2] May a lawyer who is also engaged in a real estate brokerage business conduct a joint mailing of greeting cards, business cards, refrigerator magnets and the like to a combined list of law clients, brokerage clients, general business contacts and other names without differentiation of the source.

FACTS:

[3] Inquirer is an attorney practicing alone in his residence, from which he also conducts a real estate brokerage business in the form of a limited liability company of which inquirer is the sole member but not the sole employee. The brokerage entity does not pay any rent to the inquirer.

OPINION:

[4] In a departure from prior opinions and due to the decision of the United States Supreme Court in Bates v. State Bar of Arizona, 433 U.S. 350 (1977), this committee opined in N.Y. State 493 (1978) (i.e., under the Code of Professional Responsibility) that "a lawyer may conduct his law practice and a real estate brokerage business from the same office . . . ." In Bates, the Supreme Court held that lawyer advertising enjoys a First Amendment protection, thereby effectively eliminating many traditional prohibitions of lawyer advertising. Prior opinions of this Committee that a lawyer could not ethically conduct a law practice from the same office in which the lawyer or the lawyer's spouse conducted a real estate brokerage had been premised on the perceived impropriety of lawyer advertising. Id. In the light of Bates, this Committee overruled those prior opinions to the extent that they held to the contrary.

[5] Nothing in Rule 5.7 of the Rules of Professional Conduct, which governs the provision of non-legal services by a lawyer or law firm directly or through an entity that the lawyer or law firm owns or controls or with which the lawyer or law firm is otherwise affiliated, and which, therefore, governs the inquirer's situation, suggests a different conclusion.

[6] On the same basis, we see no ethical objection to inclusion in the same mailing envelope a greeting card, business card, refrigerator magnet or other token of that sort that indicates that the sender is both a lawyer and a licensed real estate broker, or two of whatever the lawyer may send, one from the lawyer as lawyer and one as proprietor of the brokerage, provided that the information is truthful and is neither deceptive nor misleading. See Rule 7.1; N.Y. State 493, supra; New York State 487 (1978). See also, Ibanez v. Florida Dep't of Business and Professional Regulation, 512 U.S. 136 (1994).

[7] Three cautionary reminders are in order. First, while a lawyer may conduct a legal practice and a brokerage business from the same premises, a lawyer may not ethically serve both as lawyer for a party to a real estate transaction and also as broker in the same real estate transaction. Rule 1.7(a) states in pertinent part that "a lawyer shall not represent a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that . . . (2) there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests." In many circumstances, fully informed client consent may enable a lawyer to proceed with a representation, notwithstanding a personal conflict. This Committee has opined repeatedly, however, most recently in N.Y. State 919 (2012) and in N.Y. State 752 (2002) following the adoption of the rules addressing the responsibilities of lawyers and law firms providing non-legal services to clients or other persons (then DR 1-106 and now Rule 5.7), that the personal interest of a lawyer-real estate broker in the brokerage fee that will be generated by a closing of a real estate transaction so conflicts with the lawyer's responsibility to provide independent legal judgment with respect to that transaction as to preclude the dual roles and to make the conflict non-consentable by the client.

[8] Second, we note the provisions of Rule 5.7, which are applicable to brokerage services provided by a lawyer. If the brokerage services provided to a particular brokerage client are not distinct from legal services provided to that same client, albeit in different matters, or could be perceived by that client to be the subject of a client-lawyer relationship, those brokerage services will be subject to the Rules of Professional Conduct. Moreover, "it will be presumed that the person receiving [the brokerage] services believes" them to be the subject of a client-lawyer relationship "unless the lawyer or law firm has advised the person receiving the services in writing that the services are not legal services and that the protection of a client-lawyer relationship does not exist with respect to the nonlegal services . . . ." Id.

[9] Finally, paragraph b of Rule 5.7 enjoins a lawyer not to allow any non-lawyer with whom the lawyer is associated in a brokerage business to "direct or regulate" the lawyer's professional judgment in rendering legal services" or to cause the lawyer "to compromise [the lawyer's] duty under Rule 1.6(a) and (c) with respect to the confidential information of a client receiving legal services."

CONCLUSION:

[10] For the reasons stated, and subject to the cautions hereinabove set forth, the questions posed are answered in the affirmative.

OPINION 934 (09/07/2012)

TOPIC: Compensation of lawyer by law firm; third-party payments

DIGEST: A law firm may compensate a partner, associate or counsel by making a payment directly to the lawyer or to a professional services corporation as described in Article 15 of the New York General Business Law. A professional services corporation for the practice of law may not have non-lawyer shareholders. Consequently, a law firm may not pay a lawyer's compensation to a subchapter S corporation with non-lawyer shareholders. A law firm may make payments to a third party at the direction of the lawyer, as long as it does not treat such payment as payment for legal services. Thus, the firm may make payments to a Subchapter S corporation with non-lawyer shareholders, but neither the law firm nor the Subchapter S corporation may mischaracterize the payments as compensation for legal services.

RULES: Rules 1.0(h), 1.5(g), 5.4(a) and (d), 8.4(c).

QUESTION:

[1] May a lawyer who has withdrawn as a partner in a firm, and who remains of counsel to the firm, receive compensation for the lawyer's legal services by check from the firm to a subchapter S corporation[30] in which the lawyer's spouse is a shareholder?

DISCUSSION:

[2] Under Article 15 of the N.Y. Business Corporation Law, N.Y. Bus. Corp. Law § 1503, a New York lawyer, whether practicing as a sole practitioner or in a law firm, may practice law as a professional services corporation.[31] See also Rule 1.0(h)(defining "firm" or "law firm" to include a professional corporation).

[3] Under § 1503 of the Business Corporation Law, however, a non-lawyer may not own any interest in a professional services corporation authorized to practice law. Thus the subchapter S corporation in this inquiry is not a professional services corporation authorized to practice law. See also Rule 5.4(d)(lawyer shall not practice with or in the form of an entity authorized to practice law for profit, if a nonlawyer owns any interest therein.)

30 A subchapter S corporation is a creature of the Internal Revenue Code. In general, S corporations do not pay any federal income taxes. Rather, the corporation's income or losses are divided among and passed through to its shareholders. The shareholders must then report the income or loss on their own individual income tax returns.

31 BCL § 1503 provides, in pertinent part, as follows:

> (a) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, one or more individuals duly authorized by law to render the same professional service within the state may organize, or cause to be organized, a professional service corporation for pecuniary profit under this article for the purpose of rendering the same professional service . . .
> (b) The certificate of incorporation of a professional service corporation . . . (ii) shall have attached thereto a certificate or certificates issued by the licensing authority certifying that each of the proposed shareholders, directors and officers is authorized by law to practice a profession which the corporation is being organized to practice . . . .

Similarly, BCL § 1507 limits the issuance of shares by a professional services corporation to those individuals who are authorized by law to practice the profession that the corporation is authorized to practice.

[4] The law firm in this case may have occasion to pay the "of counsel" lawyer either as compensation for legal services rendered or as a return of the lawyer's capital contribution. If the law firm is willing to make payments to a third party at the direction of an employee – for example to a creditor of the employee or, in this case, to the subchapter S corporation – such a payment would not be prohibited by the Rules. The Rules do not prohibit a law firm from making payments to third parties, as long as they are accounted for properly, and as long as the payment does not constitute an impermissible sharing of a legal fee.[32] Third party payments effectively are the same as payments by the firm to the lawyer with a second payment from the lawyer to the subchapter S corporation.

[5] The law firm's books and records may not mischaracterize the nature of the payments made – that is, as compensation to the lawyer (not the Subchapter S corporation) for services rendered or return of the lawyer's capital contribution. Similarly, the lawyer, as a shareholder of the subchapter S corporation, may not mischaracterize the nature of the payments to the subchapter S corporation as compensation for legal services. See Rule 8.4(c) (a lawyer or law firm shall not engage in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation). A payment for legal services would need to be made to the lawyer or a professional services corporation authorized to practice law in which the lawyer practices.

CONCLUSION:

[8] A law firm may compensate a lawyer who is a partner, associate or counsel to the firm by making a payment directly to the lawyer or to a professional services corporation as described in Article 15 of the New York Business Corporation Law. Because a professional services corporation authorized to practice law may not have non-lawyer shareholders, the law firm may not treat as compensation a payment that it makes to a Subchapter S corporation in which a non-lawyer is a shareholder. The lawyer may direct the law firm to pay over the lawyer's compensation to a third party, including a Subchapter S corporation with non-lawyer shareholders, but neither the law firm nor the third party may mischaracterize such payment as a fee for legal services.

32 The opinions of this committee have long recognized that a law firm may employ outside service providers. See, e.g. N.Y. State 95 (accounting service/data processor). However, the subchapter S corporation cannot provide legal services because of its non-lawyer ownership. And a lawyer may not share legal fees with a nonlawyer, with certain exceptions not relevant here. See Rule 5.4(a) ("A lawyer or law firm shall not share legal fees with a nonlawyer . . ."). Moreover, a lawyer may not share legal fees with a lawyer outside the lawyer's own law firm, unless the relationship complies with Rule 1.5(g).

TOPIC: Public Defender; private practice

DIGEST: A Public Defender or Assistant Public Defender can represent private clients as part of a separate private practice in the same Criminal Court in which he or she appears in a public defender capacity.

RULES: 1.11

FACTS:

1. An appointed county Public Defender has a staff that includes part-time and full-time assistants. He has created a practice policy for both the part-time and full-time attorneys, including himself, that permits them to practice law privately in criminal or civil cases within and outside the county as long as no conflict of interest is involved. The full-time attorneys must do their private case work outside of normal business hours.

2. The Public Defender seeks guidance on whether his attorneys can represent private clients in the same Criminal Court in which they appear in their public defender capacity.

QUESTION:

3. May a Public Defender or Assistant Public Defender represent private clients as part of a separate private practice in the same Criminal Court in which he or she appears as a member of the Public Defender's Office?

OPINION:

4. No rule expressly prohibits a Public Defender or Assistant Public Defender from separately representing private clients. Indeed, in the past this Committee has issued opinions, under both the current Rules and the prior Code of Professional Responsibility, addressing specific questions involving scenarios where a public defender undertakes to represent a private client, and in none of those opinions did we suggest that there is any per se prohibition against a public defender separately representing private clients. See, e.g., N.Y. State 862 (2011) (imputing conflict of interest in Public Defender Office to Assistant Public Defender acting in private practice capacity); N.Y. State 587 (1987) (concluding that it is proper for part-time Public Defender to represent, privately, individual found ineligible for Public Defender's assistance where individual unable to find other retained counsel and stating that "a part-time Public Defender may engage in private criminal defense work, at least when 'the client had never requested the services of the public defender's office'"); N.Y. State 518 (1980) (concluding that part-time Public Defender can represent private clients in litigation against county by which he is employed).

5. Other than Rule 3.8, which addresses the conduct of prosecutors and other government lawyers acting in a prosecutorial capacity, only Rule 1.11 establishes special obligations for former and current government officers and employees. The title of this rule refers to special conflicts of interest for former and current government officers and employees. Parts of the rule address how traditional kinds of conflicts can arise for such lawyers. See Rule 1.11 (a)(1), (b), (c). This aspect of Rule 1.11 has no bearing on the inquirer's question because the inquirer has acknowledged that his attorneys will abide by conflict-of-interest rules in determining whether to accept a retained case.

6. Rule 1.11 also limits a former government lawyer's ability to represent a private client in a matter in which the lawyer participated substantially as a public officer or employee. See Rule 1.11(a)(2). This rule, although it literally applies to "former" government lawyers, would limit a Public Defender's ability to successively represent a client on a single matter first as a public employee and subsequently – for example, because of a change in financial circumstances of the client – as a private lawyer. Under the prior Code of Professional Responsibility, this Committee expressed the concern that "the office of Public Defender not be perceived as a feeder in building a private law practice," N.Y. State 587, and closely circumscribed the situations in which an individual who contacts a Public Defender Office for representation can end up represented privately by a lawyer in that office. Compare N.Y. State 165 (1970) (prohibiting private retainer of part-time Public Defender whose office had previously been contacted by client for assigned representation) with N.Y. State 587 (modifying N.Y. State 165 to allow for limited exceptions). But there is no suggestion here that the inquirer permits his lawyers to direct potential public defender clients to their private practice, or that any of those lawyers would otherwise represent clients in violation of Rule 1.11(a)(2). Accordingly, Rule 1.11(a)(2) does not control this inquiry.

7. Finally, Rule 1.11 also prohibits lawyers who hold public office from improperly using the influence that their office carries. Rule 1.11(f)(2) specifically prohibits lawyers who hold public office from using their public office "to influence, or attempt to influence, a tribunal to act in favor of the lawyer or of a client." It is this rule that comes closest to bearing on Public Defenders' appearances in a private capacity in the same tribunal where they appear in a public capacity. It is difficult, however, to discern how Public Defenders acting in a private capacity would use their public position to influence a tribunal. In both private and public capacities, the lawyer who is also a Public Defender is typically seeking to accomplish the same legitimate purpose – effective client representation. There is nothing attendant to the Office of Public Defender that carries with it the power to exert influence over a tribunal in which the Public Defender appears other than by means of appropriate and effective advocacy. Accordingly, Rule 1.11(f) does not prohibit the inquirer's practice model.

8. Our position with respect to Public Defenders contrasts with our opinions on part-time prosecutors. We have long held that the rules against representation of differing interests prevent a part-time prosecutor from representing criminal defendants in New York State courts or in suing the governmental entity that employs them and that these conflicts are not waivable. N.Y. State 788 (2005); N.Y. State 657 (1993); N.Y. State 544 (1982); N.Y. State 218 (1971). In N.Y. State 544, we held that a part-time municipal attorney should not permit himself to represent an interest adverse to that of the locality. He should, therefore, not undertake a matter that would require him to appear before a judicial official of the locality or with respect to a violation of one of its ordinances. In that opinion, we explained that

> "A part-time local attorney may undertake a criminal defense without conflict of interest . . . if (1) his statutory or other responsibility to prosecute criminal proceedings on behalf of the locality does not require him, in any case, to prosecute any crimes or offenses designated as such by the Penal Law or any other law enacted by the Legisla> ture of the State of New York, (2) the defense does not require him to appear before a judicial or other official of the locality he publicly represents, (3) the local government unit by which he is employed, or a violation or a construction of one of its ordinances, is not involved, (4) the offense charged is unlike any of those which he prosecutes, and (5) the investigating officers and law enforcement personnel involved are not those with whom he associates as prosecutor."

Notably, we have treated Public Defenders differently than prosecutors and other municipal attorneys, reasoning that a Public Defenders' true clients are "indigents accused of crime rather than the county" for which they work. N.Y. State 518.

9. Of course, in carrying out the inquirer's practice model, the lawyers must, as noted above, comply with all relevant ethical considerations such as conflict-of-interest rules. Because shouldering a full-time Public Defender position and a separate private practice may be burdensome, special attention must be paid to Rule 1.3's requirement that a lawyer act with diligence and promptness in representing a client. See Rule 1.3(a). Such lawyer must give diligent and equal priority to both private and public clients. See N.Y. State 260 (1987) (Public Defender must "exercise great care not to permit his personal or professional interests to appear to influence his judgment with respect to the priority to be assigned as between his public defender and private matters.").

CONCLUSION:

10. A Public Defender or Assistant Public Defender can represent private clients as part of a separate private practice in the same Criminal Court in which he or she appears in a public defender capacity.

OPINION 936 (09/21/2012)

TOPIC: Designation of departing former name partner, who is taking an in-house counsel position, as "Special Counsel" on letterhead.

DIGEST: Whether a law firm may designate a departing name partner as "Special Counsel" after removing his name from the firm name depends on the level of his continuing involvement with the firm and its clients.

RULES: 1.10(a) & (e), 7.1(a), 7.5(a)

FACTS:

1. One of the founding name members of the inquiring lawyer's firm recently left to take a position as in-house counsel to a regional hospital center. The firm has changed its name by eliminating the name of the departing attorney. The firm would, however, like to list the departing attorney's name on the firm's letterhead. The inquirer states that the departing attorney's relationship to the firm remains "sufficiently robust and close to justify including him on the letterhead with an appropriate footnote."

2. Specifically, the inquirer states that the departing attorney will continue to do meaningful, substantive work through the firm, but only for certain firm clients with whom he had developed a close relationship during his tenure as a member of the firm, and only at their request for his involvement. The departing attorney will not provide legal services through the firm in any other cases. Thus, he will not provide legal services through the firm to clients with whom he did not develop a close relationship, and will not provide legal services to a firm client with whom he did develop a close relationship unless that client has requested his involvement.

3. When the departing attorney provides legal services through the firm, he will consult directly with the client and bill for his services through the firm. The firm will retain 10% of the amount billed for the departing attorney's time, and the remainder will be paid to the departing attorney. The departing attorney (1) will not have access to firm files for any clients other than those with whom he had a prior close relationship and who request his further involvement, (2) will not have an office at the firm, and (3) will not participate in firm management decisions.

4. The inquiry claims that an "Of Counsel" relationship "is a close, regular, personal relationship implying broader access to general firm files, general availability of the attorney to firm clients, and more involvement in day-to-day affairs of the firm than will be present here." Thus the firm will not designate the departing partner as being "Of Counsel," but instead proposes to designate him as "Special Counsel" with a further explanation.

QUESTION:

5. May the inquirer's firm designate the departing partner as "Special Counsel" on its letterhead and include one of the following two explanations in a footnote:

Alternative 1: [John Doe], Special Counsel (with a footnote stating, "Mr. [Doe] consults through the firm with certain clients with whom he worked closely while a member of the firm.")

Alternative 2: [John Doe], Special Counsel (with a footnote stating, "Mr. [Doe] consults through the firm with certain clients with whom he worked closely while a member of the firm. He is currently General Counsel for [Name of institution] Hospital Health Center.")

OPINION:

6. The New York Rules of Professional Conduct (Rules) do not explicitly address use of the term "Special Counsel," but do address use of the term "Of Counsel." Rule 7.5(a) provides in pertinent part:

> "A lawyer or law firm may use . . . letterheads . . . provided the same do not violate any statute or court rule and are in accordance with Rule 7.1, including the following: . . .
> > "(4) . . . A lawyer or law firm may be designated 'Of Counsel' on a letterhead if there is a continuing relationship with a lawyer or law firm, other than as a partner or associate."

7. While Rule 7.5(a)(4) on its face broadly includes any "continuing relationship," this term has been interpreted to require a certain threshold level of involvement. "An of counsel relationship is one in which the of counsel lawyer is available to the firm for consultation and advice on a regular and continuing basis." N.Y. State 853 (2011) (citation and internal quotes omitted); N.Y. State 793 (2006); N.Y. City 1995-8 (noting that term "continuing relationship" has been characterized for purposes of this provision as a "close, regular, personal relationship" other than that of partner or associate).

8. Several variations of the term "Of Counsel," including "Special Counsel," have come into use by law firms.[33] The meanings of these various terms are similar and for practical purposes may be indistinguishable. One ethics committee has opined that while there may be "connotative differences evoked by these variants of the title 'counsel,' they all share the central, and defining, characteristic of the relationship that is denoted by the term 'of counsel,'" which is "a close, regular, personal relationship" which is neither that of a partner nor that of an associate. ABA 90-357. One treatise indicates that "counsel" and "of counsel" are terms that "should be considered synonymous," and 'special counsel' may also mean about the same thing, though sometimes it refers to a lawyer who is associated with the firm only for a particular type of matter." Simon's New York Rules of Professional Conduct Annotated 1205 (2012 ed.).

9. "Of counsel" and other designations of professional status must not be used in misleading ways. Rule 7.5(a) explicitly provides that use of such designations is subject to Rule 7.1. A provision in the latter rule prohibits a lawyer or law firm from disseminating advertising that contains statements or claims that are false, deceptive or misleading. Rule 7.1(a)(1).

33 "[A]lthough 'of counsel' appears to be the most frequently used among the various titles employing the term 'counsel,' it is by no means the only use of that term to indicate a relationship between a lawyer and a law firm. Other such titles include the single word 'counsel,' and the terms 'special counsel,' 'tax [or other specialty] counsel,' and 'senior counsel.'" ABA 90-357.

10. Rule 7.1 would apply to this inquiry only when letterhead is used in a communication that constitutes an "advertisement" as defined by Rule 1.0(a). But there are also more general rules governing use of misleading statements.[34] Although Rule 7.5(a) is written in the permissive terms of a safe harbor, we do not believe it serves to allow professional designations that would otherwise violate these more general rules just because the designations are not used in advertising. Ethics committees have set forth criteria for use of particular designations such as "of counsel" so as to avoid the risk of misleading the public.[35] There is no apparent reason to limit that purpose and those criteria to the context of advertising. See Rule 7.5, Cmt. [1] ("In order to avoid the possibility of misleading persons with whom a lawyer deals, a lawyer should be scrupulous in the representation of professional status").

11. The inquiry before us posits that the departing lawyer's ongoing new relationship to the firm "is sufficiently robust and close" to justify including him on the letterhead as a "Special Counsel," but not so extensive as to allow his designation as "Of Counsel." More particularly, the inquiry points to three factors claimed to be essential to an Of Counsel relationship. The inquiry argues that this terminology implies "[1] broader access to general firm files, [2] general availability of the attorney to firm clients, and [3] more involvement in day-to-day affairs of the firm than will be present here." We do not adopt this analysis, as it does not completely follow the established principles set forth above.[36]

12. What is essential is that the Of Counsel lawyer be available to the firm for consultation and advice on a regular and continuing basis. This standard is necessarily a matter of degree.

See N.Y. State 853 ¶¶ 8-9 (2011) (opining that lawyer who "minimizes" his participation in a firm would not qualify as Of Counsel if he works "full time" as in-house lawyer at a corporation). As applied to the current inquiry, the standard will turn in part on how many clients use the services of the departing lawyer, and to what extent.

13. If the departing lawyer is expected to, and ultimately does, represent a number of former clients in multiple matters on an ongoing basis, that might well justify designating him, on letterhead and otherwise, as Of Counsel (or if the firm wishes, Special Counsel, with or without an explanatory footnote). On the other hand, if the departing lawyer is expected to, and ultimately does, represent only a few former clients in a small number of matters or in very limited ways, then designation as Special Counsel could well be impermissibly misleading. See N.Y. State 853 (2011); N.Y. State 262 (1972) (if relationship only existed for one particular case, "of counsel" designation on letterhead would be misleading "even though the case might be of great importance and over an extended period of time"). To give an extreme example, it would be misleading for the departing lawyer to maintain a

34 See Rule 4.1 (in course of representing a client, lawyer shall not make a false statement of fact to a third person) & Cmt. [1] (a misleading statement or omission can constitute a misrepresentation); Rule 8.4(c) (lawyer shall not "engage in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation").

35 Such criteria protect against misleading marketing. "Otherwise, law firms could raise the price of their stock (so to speak) by listing a famous lawyer or retired judge or public official as 'of counsel' even though the 'of counsel' lawyer had little or nothing to do with the firm." Simon's New York Rules of Professional Conduct Annotated 1204 (2012 ed.).

36 The inquirer's analysis purports to distinguish between terms that are extremely close, if not identical, in meaning. We believe that a relationship close enough to justify a "Special Counsel" designation would generally also justify a designation that the lawyer is "Of Counsel." Moreover, we doubt that any fixed set of a few factors will answer the question whether a relationship is sufficiently close, regular and personal as to justify any form of "counsel" designation.

"counsel" designation if, during the first year of the arrangement, no clients at all used his services and his relationship with the firm were purely theoretical.[37]

14. Accordingly, the term "Special Counsel" is permissible only if the departing lawyer's actual practice includes the regular and continuing level of consultation and advice for the firm and its clients that is necessary to justify a "counsel" designation. This conclusion does not depend on compensation arrangements, see ABA 90-357, or on whether the firm explains the departing lawyer's relationship to the firm in a footnote. If the departing lawyer meets "counsel" standards, then the firm may use the "Special Counsel" designation and may explain his relationship in an accurate footnote if it wishes, but if he does not meet those standards, an explanatory footnote will not make such a designation permissible.

15. Finally, although the inquiry does not raise the question of imputed conflicts, we believe the issue merits discussion. When a lawyer would be prohibited from representing a client by virtue of certain kinds of conflicts, the prohibition also applies to other lawyers who are "associated in a firm" with the lawyer subject to the conflict.[38] The term "associated" is not defined in the Rules, and it does not apply to all lawyers who are in any way connected or related to the firm. N.Y. State 853 (2011). However, a lawyer with close enough connections to be Of Counsel to a firm is "associated" with that firm for purposes of the imputation rule. See N.Y. State 853 (2011); N.Y. State 793 (2006); N.Y. State 773 (1993); ABA 90-357; N.Y. City 1995-8; Restatement (Third), The Law Governing Lawyers § 123 cmt. c(ii).

16. Moreover, a lawyer who is held out to the public with the term "counsel" or one of its variants – whatever the level of the lawyer's actual involvement – is "associated" with the firm for purposes of the imputation rule. See N.Y. State 793 (2006) (recognizing imputation when lawyer holds self out as having Of Counsel relationship and thus "conveys to the public that the lawyer has a continuing relationship with a firm that is close and regular"); cf. N.Y. State 807 (2007) ("A law firm may not denominate a lawyer as an associate and then take the position that the lawyer is not an associate for the purpose of imputation of conflicts of interest"). Because variants of the "counsel" formulation are essentially synonymous for ethical purposes, calling the attorney "Special Counsel" as opposed to "Of Counsel" does not change the effect of the designation in imputing conflicts.

17. When two law firms are associated with the same lawyer, they are considered the same firm for conflicts purposes. The legal department of a corporation is considered a law firm, see Rule 1.0(h), and is therefore subject to this rule like any other firm. Accordingly, "the conflicts of the Firm and the legal department will generally be shared and must become part of both of their conflict-checking systems under Rule 1.10(e)." N.Y. State 853 (2011).

18. In some circumstances, conflicts that would personally disqualify an "of counsel" lawyer from undertaking or continuing a particular representation would not necessarily result in disqualification of the entire law firm from litigation. See Hempstead Video, Inc. v. Incorporated Village of Val-

37 We understand that the number of matters handled may vary over time, and we are not suggesting that a firm is required to reevaluate a "counsel" designation every week or month. The firm may rely on its long-term expectations, but may not indefinitely maintain a designation based on expectations not borne out in actual practice.

38 Rule 1.10(a) states: "While lawyers are associated in a firm, none of them shall knowingly represent a client when any one of them practicing alone would be prohibited from doing so by Rule 1.7, 1.8 or 1.9, except as otherwise provided therein."

ley Stream, 409 F.3d 127 (2d Cir. 2005). In that opinion, after noting ethics opinions suggesting a per se rule imputing conflicts between law firms and their Of Counsel attorneys, the Second Circuit rejected such a per se rule for disqualification purposes. For those purposes it adopted a more flexible standard that had been applied in a different context by N.Y. State 715 (imputation of conflicts for contract lawyers "depends on the facts and circumstances of the employment"). This approach to disqualification has been followed in other cases as well.[39]

19. Judicial reluctance to disqualify an entire firm based on imputation of an Of Counsel lawyer's conflict of interest, however, is not inconsistent with our view that such a lawyer's conflicts are always imputed to an entire firm under Rule 1.10(a). Courts considering disqualification motions may have reason to consider whether a conflict violates the Rules, but they may also have reason to consider other factors such as delay, public confidence, increased expense, fairness to the parties, entitlement to choose counsel and the prospect of abusive disqualification motions. Given the availability of procedures for professional discipline, courts have found no need to deal with all ethical violations "in the very litigation in which they surface." Board of Education v. Nyquist, 590 F.2d 1241, 1246 (2d Cir. 1979). Under this approach, while decisions on disqualification motions may benefit from "general guidance" offered by state disciplinary rules, "not every violation of a disciplinary rule will necessarily lead to disqualification" unless it "tends to taint the underlying trial." Hempstead Video, 590 F.2d at 132 (quoting Nyquist). Accordingly, under this approach, a conflict that does not warrant disqualification may nonetheless constitute a violation of the Rules.

20. Thus, an Of Counsel (or Special Counsel) relationship between a lawyer with a conflict and a firm may not always justify the firm's disqualification by imputation in litigation, but as a matter of legal ethics, imputation is required when the lawyer's conflict is one of the kinds specified in Rule 1.10(a). As a corollary, pursuant to Rule 1.10(e), a law firm that maintains a "counsel" relationship with a lawyer must check for conflicts with that lawyer and that lawyer's firm, and vice versa.

CONCLUSION:

21. If the departing lawyer's continuing work for the firm rises to the level that the lawyer is available to the firm for consultation and advice on a regular and continuing basis, then the lawyer may be designated as Special Counsel on letterhead. In that case, the lawyer would be "associated" with the firm for purposes of imputation of conflicts of interest.

TOPIC: Promotional gifts branded with a law firm's logo

DIGEST: A law firm may cooperate with a local hospital to include promotional gifts branded with the law firm's logo in a welcome package distributed to all patients.

RULES: 7.1,7.3(a)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer wants to cooperate with a local hospital to provide a promotional gift (i.e., calendar, pen, etc.), branded with the law firm logo, in a welcoming informational package given to all hospital patients.

QUESTION:

2. May a law firm provide a promotional gift with its logo in a welcoming informational package provided to all patients at a local hospital?

OPINION:

3. In our view, nothing in the New York Rules of Professional Conduct prevents the proposed distribution of branded promotional gifts to hospital patients. Such items are not "advertising" within the meaning of the Rules, so that many of the restrictions on advertising and solicitation (a form of advertising) do not apply. An "advertisement" is defined as "any public or private communication made by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm about that lawyer or law firm's services, the primary purpose of which is the retention of the lawyer or law firm," other than communications to existing clients or other lawyers.[40]

4. As the State Bar's Comments to the Rules make clear, there are many communications that have the general aim of increasing a lawyer's business and yet are not deemed advertising. For example, topical newsletters intended to educate recipients about new developments in the law are generally not considered advertising. Rule 7.1 Cmt. [7]. Of particular significance here, the same is true of certain communications intended to raise brand awareness:

> "Some communications by a law firm that may constitute marketing or branding are not necessarily advertisements. For example, pencils, legal pads, greeting cards, coffee mugs, T-shirts or the like with the law firm name, logo and contact information printed on them do not constitute 'advertisements' within the definition of this Rule if their primary purpose is general brand awareness and branding, rather than the retention of the law firm for a particular matter."

40 Rule 1.0(a). "Solicitation" is defined to include "any advertisement initiated by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm that is directed to, or targeted at, a specific recipient or group of recipients, or their family members or legal representatives, the primary purpose of which is the retention of the lawyer or law firm, and a significant motive for which is pecuniary gain," other than a proposal or other writing prepared and delivered in response to a specific request of a prospective client. Rule 7.3(b).

Rule 7.1, Cmt. [8]. In other words, when the intent of a communication is to educate recipients about legal developments or to raise general brand awareness, that intent will be considered its primary purpose. Thus, even if such communications are more fundamentally motivated by the aim of increasing a lawyer's business, they are not advertising within the meaning of the Rules.

5. With that understanding, it seems clear that the primary purpose of giving incoming hospital patients a calendar or pen marked only with the inquirer's name and contact information is to raise general awareness of the inquirer's firm. As a consequence, numerous rules that apply to advertising, such as the requirement that all advertisements include the principal law office address and telephone number of the lawyer or law firm being advertised, Rule 7.1(h), do not apply to the distribution of the promotional gifts at issue here. We note, however, that if the pen or calendar were marked with more than the firm logo – if for example they included slogans or more information about the firm – then the conclusion we reach here might change.

6. We recognize that the distribution of law-firm-branded materials to hospital patients might seem in tension with the policy expressed in Rule 7.3(a)(2)(iv), which provides that solicitation is barred when "the lawyer knows or reasonably should know that the age or the physical, emotional or mental state of the recipient makes it unlikely that the recipient will be able to exercise reasonable judgment in retaining a lawyer." But we think it unlikely that a mere branded pen or calendar would overwhelm the judgment of even a frail hospital patient or his or her family.

7. In any event, the proposed distribution of gifts would not violate the terms of Rule 7.3(a)(2)(iv). Indeed, this would be true even if the pen or calendar, by including more than the firm logo, were to constitute advertising. The fact that some recipients of the gifts might be expected to be in a frail physical, emotional or mental state does not mean that otherwise permissible distributions to the hospital-patient population as a whole would be barred. Distributions to any broad segment of the population would be expected to reach some persons who are covered by Rule 7.3(a)(2)(iv), but that does not mean that the entire distribution is prohibited. Of course under the actual inquiry, the items would be marked only with the firm logo. Because the proposed distribution of promotional gifts would therefore not constitute advertising, it also would not constitute solicitation and could not violate the rule against solicitation of frail recipients.

8. Nor would the proposed distribution violate Rule 7.3(a)(1), which bars in-person solicitation. Again supposing that the items were to include enough information so as to constitute advertising, their distribution, without any accompanying oral communication about the firm, would not be the kind of in-person contact barred by the rule.[41] And again returning to the actual inquiry, because there would be no advertising, there could be no violation of the rule against in-person solicitation.

CONCLUSION:

9. A law firm may cooperate with a local hospital to include promotional gifts branded with the law firm's logo in a welcome package distributed to all patients. (43-12)

41 In N.Y. State 659 (1994), this Committee opined that including a law firm advertisement in an "information package" that would be distributed by a car dealer to car buyers, without discussion, would not constitute in-person solicitation. We subsequently opined that even a lawyer's paid paralegal employee could deliver a solicitation to neighboring buildings provided the paralegal "simply [left] a name-change announcement at a residence . . . [and had] no personal contact with the recipients." N.Y. State 857 (2011).

TOPIC: Law firm ownership of business that provides nonlegal services and pays for "leads"

DIGEST: Law firm that owns an entity providing nonlegal SSDI services is not subject to legal ethics rules as to those services, and no ethical violation would arise from entity's purchase of leads to market those services, if the entity includes no lawyers, operates separately from the law firm, and disclaims the provision of legal services.

RULES: 5.7, 7.2(a)

FACTS:

1. The lawyers in inquiring attorney's law firm contemplate forming a separate entity (the "SSDI Entity") for the purpose of providing services to persons with respect to Social Security Disability Insurance claims ("SSDI services"). The inquirer states that while "lawyers can handle these cases, one does not have to be a lawyer to do so"[42] and notes that "Licensed Hearing Representative" is the term used to describe a nonlawyer authorized to handle such cases. The SSDI Entity would have a different name from the firm, would be housed in a different facility and would have its own letterhead, business cards, phone number and employees, including a nonlawyer Licensed Hearing Representative.

2. No employee of the SSDI Entity would be a lawyer.[43] The SSDI Entity would advise customers and potential customers, in writing, that the SSDI services "are not legal services and do not come within any attorney-client relationship."

QUESTION:

May the SSDI Entity, if established and owned by inquirer and his colleagues, purchase SSDI leads from a marketing organization? The organization, which advertises heavily on the internet, would forward to the SSDI Entity the information of people who respond to its website if the SSDI Entity agrees to pay for a certain number of leads in a certain geographic area each month.

OPINION:

3. Rule 7.2(a) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct states that a lawyer "shall not compensate or give anything of value to a person or organization to recommend or obtain employment by a client" with exceptions not relevant here. The inquirer notes our opinion N.Y. State 779 (2004) in which we relied upon Disciplinary Rule 2-103(B), the predecessor to Rule 7.2(a), in concluding that it is improper for an attorney to pay money to a marketing organization in return for "leads" to potential clients. The inquirer recognizes that his law firm would not be permitted to purchase leads for its law practice but seeks to clarify whether the SSDI Entity, because of its separate nature, could purchase leads without giving rise to an ethical violation by the lawyers in the firm.

42 The inquirer cites 42 U.S.C. 406 §206(a)(1): "The Commissioner of Social Security may prescribe rules and regulations governing the recognition of agents or other persons, other than attorneys . . . representing claimants before the Commissioner of Social Security . . . ."

43 Different questions would arise if a lawyer (whether one from the firm or one newly employed by the SSDI entity) were to participate in providing SSDI services, for example by meeting with customers or editing documents drafted by a Licensed Hearing Representative. This opinion does not address such scenarios.

4. Rule 5.7, entitled "Responsibilities Regarding Nonlegal Services", is the key Rule to consider. Rule 5.7(c) defines "nonlegal services" to mean "those services that lawyers may lawfully provide and that are not prohibited as an unauthorized practice of law when provided by a nonlawyer." We assume, based on assertions in the inquiry, that nonlawyer Licensed Hearing Representatives are permitted by federal law to provide (and accordingly are not prohibited by New York law from providing) the contemplated services. Thus the services qualify as "nonlegal services" for purposes of the Rule.

5. Because there will be no "lawyer or law firm that provides" any SSDI services, Rules 5.7(a)(1) and 5.7(a)(2) do not apply. The relevant provision, Rule 5.7(a)(3), says:

> "A lawyer or law firm that is an owner, controlling party or agent of, or that is otherwise affiliated with, an entity that the lawyer or law firm knows to be providing nonlegal services to a person is subject to these Rules with respect to the nonlegal services if the person receiving the services could reasonably believe that the nonlegal services are the subject of a client-lawyer relationship."

6. The question, then, is whether recipients of the SSDI services could reasonably believe that those services are the subject of a client-lawyer relationship. We first consider the way the SSDI Entity will present itself to prospective and actual customers. Although the SSDI Entity will be affiliated with the law firm through common ownership, in its outwardly visible aspects it will be separate and distinct from that firm, it will intentionally eschew any reference to the affiliation between them, and it will explicitly disclaim any attorney-client relationship. Unless there are further relevant facts not mentioned in the inquiry (such as perceptible connections between the two entities, or forms of advertising tending to create an impression of legal services), there would be no apparent basis on which customers could reasonably believe they were receiving legal representation.

7. We must, however, consider another relevant provision. Rule 5.7(a)(4) states that for purposes of Rule 5.7(a)(3), "it will be presumed that the person receiving nonlegal services believes the services to be the subject of a client-lawyer relationship" unless one of two conditions are met. One of those conditions, and the only one available to the inquirer, is that "the lawyer or law firm has advised the person receiving the services in writing that the services are not legal services and that the protection of a client-lawyer relationship does not exist with respect to the nonlegal services." Here, the inquirer proposes to do just that. The written disclaimer must be made at a time and in a manner "sufficient to ensure that the person understands the significance of the communication." Rule 5.7, Cmt. [3]. If it is, then the presumption set forth in Rule 5.7(a)(4) would not apply.

8. Because the law firm would not be subject to the Rules with respect to services provided by the SSDI Entity, Rule 7.2(a) would not preclude the purchase of leads as contemplated. However, the lawyers in the firm should be mindful that they always remain subject to some other Rules, such as those prohibiting lawyers from engaging in illegal or deceptive conduct, including when they engage in conduct incidental to ownership of the SSDI Entity. See Rule 5.7, Cmt. [4].

CONCLUSION:

9. Members of a law firm who establish and own an entity to provide nonlegal SSDI services are not subject to the Rules with respect to those services if the entity includes no lawyers, operates wholly separately from the law firm, and disclaims the provision of legal services. Under those circumstances, no ethical violation would arise if the entity purchases leads for the purpose of marketing the SSDI services.

DIGEST: Independent lawyers sharing office space may share computer for client-related information if they exercise reasonable care to assure that confidential information is not disclosed

RULES: 1.6(a) & (c)

FACTS:

1. Two private lawyers share space, but are not partners or otherwise practicing as one firm. They share one computer, as to which they have separate administrative passwords not known to each other. They maintain separate paper files.

QUESTION:

2. May private lawyers who share space also share a computer for confidential, client-related information where they have separate administrative passwords to the computer that are not known to each other?

OPINION:

3. Rule 1.6(a) of the Rules of Professional Conduct states: "A lawyer shall not knowingly reveal confidential information," with exceptions not relevant to the issue presented. Rule 1.6(c) provides, also subject to an exception not relevant here: "A lawyer shall exercise reasonable care to prevent the lawyer's employees, associates, and others whose services are utilized by the lawyer from disclosing or using confidential information of a client . . . ."

4. A lawyer's duty of reasonable care is not limited to overseeing the conduct of others. The lawyer must also take reasonable care to avoid improper disclosure by the lawyer himself or herself.[44] In addition to whatever support for that broader duty may be found in the text of Rule 1.6, support from other sources has been cited by some ethics opinions. See A.B.A. 11-459 (citing Rule 1.1(a), which calls for a lawyer to provide competent representation to a client, and stating that "a lawyer must act competently to protect the confidentiality of clients' information"); N.Y. City 1994-11 (stating that a duty to preserve client confidences and secrets "inheres in the fiduciary relationship between lawyer and client").

5. When a lawyer uses a particular technology to store or transmit confidential information, the degree of care that is required may depend on factors such as the security of that technology and the sensitivity of the information. If the technology, taking into account legal as well as technological safeguards, does not provide a reasonable expectation that confidentiality will be protected; if circumstances put the lawyer on notice of a heightened risk that confidentiality may be compromised; or if the information is extraordinarily sensitive, then further security measures may be required. See Rule 1.6 Cmt. [17]; N.Y. State 842; N.Y. State 709; A.B.A. 11-459. The lawyer, upon considering such factors, must take reasonable precautions to ensure privacy.

44 Rule 1.6, Cmt. [17] (when transmitting a communication relating to representation of a client, "the lawyer must take reasonable precautions to prevent the information from coming into the hands of unintended recipients"); N.Y. State 842 ¶4 (2010) (a lawyer must "take reasonable care to affirmatively protect a client's confidential information"); N.Y. State 709 (1998) ("an attorney has a duty to use reasonable care to protect client confidences and secrets"); N.Y. County 733 (2004) (attorney "must diligently preserve the client's confidences"); N.Y. City 1994-11 (lawyer who possesses client confidences and secrets must take reasonable steps to secure the information against misuse or inappropriate disclosure).

6. The facts provided by the inquirer are insufficient to resolve whether the proposed shared computer can be used for client-related information without violating the duty of reasonable care to protect confidentiality. The fact that the lawyers have separate computer passwords is certainly an appropriate precaution. Whether it is sufficient would depend on further factors. Some password systems may be more resistant to unauthorized access than others. Protection of the password is also important; for example, a password kept on a piece of paper stuck to the computer and readily visible to any user does not provide much protection. On the other hand, if a robust password system provides a degree of protection similar to that of locked file cabinets, then its proper and consistent use may well constitute reasonable care. Admittedly there could be some risk of extraordinary efforts to hack into even a well-secured computer, or to steal it from the premises for more leisurely hacking, just as there could be a risk that file cabinets could be broken into or removed. The lawyer's obligation, however, is not to guarantee preservation of confidentiality at all costs; it is to protect confidentiality by taking reasonable care.

CONCLUSION:

7. Lawyers practicing as sole practitioners but sharing space may share a computer to store and process client confidential information, but only if, under the actual circumstances relating to the computer, including its software and passwords and their use, the lawyers take reasonable precautions to ensure that the privacy of the confidential information is protected.

TOPIC: Use of off-site backup tapes to store a client's confidential information; retention of files in original paper form

DIGEST: Lawyer may store confidential information on off-site backup tapes if lawyer takes reasonable care to ensure adequacy of systems to protect confidentiality. When records must be retained, nature of the records determines whether lawyer (i) must maintain originals, (ii) may discard originals and maintain electronic copies in particular formats, or (iii) may maintain electronic copies in any format.

RULES: 1.6(a) & (c), 1.15(d)

FACTS:

1. The inquiring attorney's firm scans all documents and makes them part of an electronic case management system. The electronic data is backed up daily on tapes, and the tapes are stored outside of the firm's office. Thus, in the event of a catastrophic loss to the office building or server, no more than a single day's data would be lost. The inquiry does not describe the entity that will handle the off-premise storage of the backup tapes, but it is presumably a commercial service provider rather than the firm itself.

QUESTIONS:

2. May an attorney use a tape backup system to store a client's confidential information away from the firm's premises?

3. When the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") obligate an attorney to maintain certain records, may the attorney satisfy that obligation by keeping electronic copies such as backup tapes, or is the attorney required to keep the paper originals?

OPINION:

A. Tape Backup Systems

4. The Rules address not only intentional disclosures of confidential information by a lawyer but also the exercise of reasonable care to avoid such disclosures by others. Rule 1.6(a) provides that, subject to certain exceptions, a lawyer "shall not knowingly reveal confidential information." Rule 1.6(c) provides that a lawyer "shall exercise reasonable care to prevent the lawyer's employees, associates, and others whose services are utilized by the lawyer from disclosing or using confidential information of a client," except for certain disclosures authorized by the rule. [45]

5. We previously addressed a related inquiry. The question in N.Y. State 842 (2010) was whether a lawyer could use internet server ("cloud") storage to store and back up confidential information. In that opinion, the Committee opined that such use is permissible "provided that the lawyer takes reasonable care to ensure that the system is secure and that client confidentiality will be maintained." The opinion gave several examples of steps that a lawyer might take to exercise such care.

45 Some opinions also address whether a duty of reasonable care to protect confidential information applies to a lawyer's conduct in general. See, e.g., N.Y. State 842 (2010) ¶4 (citing opinions); N.Y. State 709 (1998). We need not address that topic here, because the inquiring lawyer will be entrusting the tapes to others rather than maintaining them personally.

6. We believe the principles governing use of a "cloud" storage system would also govern use of backup tapes maintained away from the firm's premises. A lawyer may use such backup tapes to store client information if the lawyer exercises reasonable care to protect the confidentiality of that information.[46]

7. Opinion 842's examples of conduct bearing on reasonable care are also relevant to use of backup tapes. Thus, for example, it may be appropriate for the lawyer to:

> A. Ensure that the provider maintaining the backup tapes "has an enforceable obligation to preserve confidentiality and security, and that the provider will notify the lawyer if served with process requiring the production of client information"; and
> B. Investigate the provider's "data storage security measures, policies, recoverability methods, and other procedures to determine if they are adequate under the circumstances."

N.Y. State 842.

B. May a Lawyer Satisfy Retention Requirements With Electronic Copies?

8. In asking the second question, the inquirer references the ethical requirement that certain kinds of records be maintained "for seven years after the events that they record." This includes, for example, records of certain bank accounts, copies of retainer agreements, copies of bills to clients, copies of closing statements, and all checkbooks and bank statements. Rule 1.15(d)(1).

9. For most kinds of records listed in Rule 1.15(d)(1), it suffices under the terms of that Rule to keep "copies" of those records. However, for the records listed in Rule 1.15(d)(1)(viii) – namely, "checkbooks and check stubs, bank statements, prenumbered canceled checks and duplicate deposit slips" – it is necessary to maintain the records in their original form for the required seven years. This does not mean, however, that a lawyer must use a bank that routinely returns paper copies of cancelled checks, or must pay an extra charge to obtain paper copies. In N.Y. State 758 (2002), we said:

> "If these items are returned to the lawyer in paper form by the lawyer's bank in the ordinary course of business, the lawyer should retain them in that form. However, the lawyer is not required to undertake extraordinary effort or incur extra expense to obtain these items in paper form."

10. Thus, lawyers need not obtain original cancelled checks just to satisfy the retention rule. Rather, lawyers must preserve cancelled checks and the other items listed in Rule 1.15(d)(1) in whatever form the law firm receives or initially maintains these items in the ordinary course of business. See generally Roy D. Simon, Simon's New York Rules of Professional Conduct Annotated 617-18 (2012 ed.).

46 Indeed, given proper safeguards, use of an off-site backup system may be not just permissible but advisable for those lawyers who choose to maintain their records in electronic form. The primary, on-site storage system may have vulnerabilities that a backup system could help mitigate. See Roy D. Simon, Simon's New York Rules of Professional Conduct Annotated 619 (2012 ed.) ("Disciplinary authorities are not likely to be sympathetic if records disappear because of a computer malfunction.").

11. For the documents that may be kept as copies, the Rule provides further guidance. Requirements of maintaining copies are satisfied by maintaining "original records, photocopies, microfilm, optical imaging, and any other medium that preserves an image of the document that cannot be altered without detection." Rule 1.15(d)(3). Whether a particular storage format meets this standard may not be obvious, in which case consultation with an information technology specialist may be appropriate. See Simon's New York Rules of Professional Conduct Annotated 619 (2012 ed.).

12. The answer to the inquirer's question thus depends on the kinds of record involved. It will not suffice to keep electronic copies of certain paper records like checkbooks, bank statements, and deposit slips when they are originally received or maintained by the law firm in paper form. Those must be kept in their original paper form. As to other kinds of records, for which Rule 1.15(d)(1) requires only the keeping of copies, those copies may be kept electronically, but only in a format that preserves an image that cannot be altered without detection, per Rule 1.15(d)(3).

13. A lawyer may also be ethically obligated to preserve various records other than those records subject to the seven-year retention requirement imposed by Rule 1.15. See, e.g., N.Y. State 623 (1991) (opining that documents in closed files may be destroyed unless there are legal preservation requirements or "extraordinary circumstances manifesting a client's clear and present need"); N.Y. State 460 (1977) (opining that absent legal requirement to preserve records or specific instructions from client, retention period may be determined on basis of client's foreseeable need); N.Y. City 2010-1. Other obligations may be imposed by law or court rule. See, e.g., N.Y. State 460 (1977); N.Y. City 2010-1; 22 NYCRR § 603.7 (1st Dep't rule requiring lawyers to preserve specified records in personal injury cases). Whether retention of electronic copies would satisfy these various obligations outside Rule 1.15 will again depend on the kind of record involved.

14. For example, it may be necessary to preserve the originals of documents such as wills, deeds, contracts, and promissory notes. See N.Y. City 2010-1. For other kinds of documents subject to preservation obligations, it may suffice to keep copies if "the legal effect or evidentiary value of such records is not thereby impaired," because, for example, the copies "may be introduced into evidence or otherwise used in place of the originals" if the need should arise. See N.Y. State 460 (1977); N.Y. County 624 (1974). In still other cases, there may an obligation to keep records based on foreseeable client need, yet that need would be only for the information in those records, and not for the records themselves. In such a case there would be no ethical constraints on the form in which electronic copies are kept.

CONCLUSION:

15. A lawyer may use off-site backup tapes to store confidential client information if the lawyer takes reasonable care to ensure that the storage system, and the arrangements for its use, adequately protect the confidentiality of such information.

16. For certain kinds of records, the Rules require that original paper documents be kept if the lawyer receives or initially maintains paper originals in the ordinary course of business. For certain other kinds of records, the Rules require retention but permit a lawyer to keep electronic copies in lieu of paper originals if the electronic copies are in a format that preserves an image not subject to alteration without detection. For yet other kinds of records that must be retained, the Rules permit electronic copies to be kept in lieu of paper originals without restriction. (4-12)

TOPIC: Conflict of interest involving an attorney's spouse

DIGEST: A lawyer on a county panel of the Attorneys for Children Program may serve as "attorney for the child" even though another party in the proceeding is represented by the lawyer's spouse (an Assistant Public Defender) or by another lawyer who works in the same office as the lawyer's spouse, unless (i) the circumstances create a conflict of interest under Rule 1.7(a)(2) or Rule 1.10(h), and (ii) the child has no legal representative who can and does consent to the conflict on the child's behalf.

RULES: 1.0(h), 1.7(a) & (b), 1.10(a), (d) & (h)

QUESTION:

1. May a lawyer on a county panel of the Attorneys for Children Program serve as attorney for the child in court proceedings if the petitioner or respondent is represented by the lawyer's spouse (who is an Assistant Public Defender) or by another lawyer who works in the same office as the lawyer's spouse?

BACKGROUND:

2. Under New York Law, children (minors) in many kinds of court proceedings (including juvenile delinquency matters, custody and visitation disputes, and child protective proceedings) are entitled to be represented by counsel in Family Court, Supreme Court, Surrogate's Court, and appellate courts. A governmental office entitled the Attorneys for Children Program ("AFC Program") maintains a list or "panel" of attorneys qualified to represent children, and assigns an attorney from the panel to children involved in the judicial system who qualify by law for an appointed attorney.

3. When an AFC Program panel member is assigned to a case, the panel member plays the role of "attorney for the child," and functions as the child's lawyer. An attorney for the child is generally responsible for representing and advocating the child's wishes in the proceeding, which may or not be in the "best interests" of the child.[47]

47 According to a Fourth Department publication entitled Ethics for Attorneys for Children (Aug. 2011):

> [T]he role of the attorney for the child is very different from that of a guardian ad litem. A guardian ad litem, who need not be an attorney, is appointed as an arm of the Court to protect the best interests of a person under a legal disability. In contrast, the role of the attorney for the child is to serve as a child's lawyer.

The publication is available at http://www.nycourts.gov/courts/ad4/AFC/AFC-ethics.pdf.

4. The AFC Program operates under the supervision of the Appellate Division in each judicial department, and is governed by §7.2 of the Rules of the Chief Judge. [48] That section, entitled "Function of the attorney for the child," provides that the attorney for the child "is subject to the ethical requirements applicable to all lawyers, including but not limited to constraints on . . . conflicts of interest . . . ."

5. The inquirer, Attorney X, is on the panel of the Attorneys for Children Program in a particular county. Attorney X's spouse is an Assistant Public Defender in the same county. When Attorney X represents a child in a proceeding, the petitioner or respondent is often represented by an attorney from the same Public Defender's Office in which Attorney X's spouse works. Attorney X does not directly oppose the petitioner or respondent in those proceedings, but rather represents the child.

OPINION:

Rule 1.10(h): Spouse v. Spouse

6. In the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"), only one provision directly addresses conflicts between spouses. Rule 1.10(h) provides:

> A lawyer related to another lawyer as parent, child, sibling or spouse shall not represent in any matter a client whose interests differ from those of another party to the matter who the lawyer knows is represented by the other lawyer unless the client consents to the representation after full disclosure and the lawyer concludes that the lawyer can adequately represent the interests of the client.

7. If Attorney X is assigned to represent a child in a proceeding in which Attorney X's spouse is representing another party to the matter whose interests differ from the child's interests, then Attorney X must decline or withdraw from the representation of the child per Rule 1.16(b) (lawyer "shall withdraw" from representing a client if the lawyer "knows . . . that the representation will result in violation of these Rules or of law") unless, per Rule 1.10(h), the child (Attorney X's client) "consents to 48 22 N.Y.C.R.R. §7.2. Rule 7.2(c) and (d) help to understand the role of an attorney for the child. They provide as follows:

> (c) In juvenile delinquency and person in need of supervision proceedings, where the child is the respondent, the attorney for the child must zealously defend the child.
> (d) In other types of proceedings, where the child is the subject, the attorney for the child must zealously advocate the child's position.
> (1) In ascertaining the child's position, the attorney for the child must consult with and advise the child to the extent and in a manner consistent with the child's capacities, and have a thorough knowledge of the child's circumstances.
> (2) If the child is capable of knowing, voluntary and considered judgment, the attorney for the child should be directed by the wishes of the child, even if the attorney for the child believes that what the child wants is not in the child's best interests. The attorney should explain fully the options available to the child, and may recommend to the child a course of action that in the attorney's view would best promote the child's interests.
> (3) When the attorney for the child is convinced either that the child lacks the capacity for knowing, voluntary and considered judgment, or that following the child's wishes is likely to result in a substantial risk of imminent, serious harm to the child, the attorney for the child would be justified in advocating a position that is contrary to the child's wishes. In these circumstances, the attorney for the child must inform the court of the child's articulated wishes if the child wants the attorney to do so, notwithstanding the attorney's position.

the representation after full disclosure and the lawyer concludes that the lawyer can adequately represent the interests of the client."[49]

8. However, a client who is a child may be incapable of consenting to the conflict under Rule 1.10(h). In a prior opinion involving a minor client, we cited three opinions decided under the old Code of Professional Responsibility – N.Y. State 256 (1972), N.Y. State 274 (1972), and N.Y. State 790 n.4 (2005) – in which "this Committee determined that a minor by himself or herself could not consent to a conflict," and we added that "[n]othing in the Rules of Professional Conduct changes this conclusion." N.Y. State 895 (2011) ¶15. Although a child acting alone lacks capacity to consent to a conflict, consent may be possible if the child has a separate law guardian or other representative who has power to consent on the child's behalf. Whether a representative does have such power is a question of law that we cannot answer. See N.Y. State 895 ¶ 16 (2011). (Nor do we know whether any of the children Attorney X will represent will have a law guardian or other legal representative.)

Rule 1.7(a)(2): Personal Interest Conflicts

9. Attorney X, even if not barred from the representation by Rule 1.10(h), must also consider another Rule when another party in the proceeding is represented by Attorney X's spouse or another Assistant Public Defender. Spousal conflicts may arise not only under Rule 1.10(h), but also under New York's more general rules on conflicts of interest. In particular, Rule 1.7(a)(2) provides that a lawyer generally may not represent a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client would be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial business, property or other personal interests. Even in such cases, however, the lawyer may represent the client if each of four conditions is met. Among these are the conditions that "the lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client," and that "each affected client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing." Rule 1.7 (b).

10. We lack sufficient facts to determine whether there is a "significant risk" that the professional judgment of the attorney for the child will be thrown off course ("adversely affected") by the lawyer's "personal interests" in the success of the spouse's employer (here, the Public Defender). The fear, stated in the abstract, is that when an Assistant Public Defender represents another party, Attorney X will somehow pull punches or represent the child-client less diligently than if the spouse did not work at the Public Defender's Office. Whether that abstract fear would become a reality may depend on multiple factors such as (a) the position the spouse holds at the Public Defender's Office, (b) how secure the spouse's job is at that office, (c) the relationship between the spouse and the Assistant Public Defender involved in the case, (d) whether the interests of the child and of the party represented by the Assistant Public Defender are aligned or antagonistic, and (e) whether the case is attracting attention from the press or from politicians. Those are just illustrative factors, not an exhaustive list. When the Assistant Public Defender involved in the case is actually Attorney X's spouse, then – even if there were not differing interests creating a Rule 1.10(h) conflict – there would be a heightened likelihood of a personal interest conflict.[50] Each matter will turn on its own circumstances, and Attorney X must exercise his or her own best judgment in identifying and weighing the relevant factors. See, e.g., N.Y. State 895 ¶ 11 (2011) (applying various factors to analyze a potential conflict with a spouse's law firm).

49 In contrast to Rules 1.7(b)(4), 1.9(a), and various other rules, Rule 1.10(h) does not expressly require that the client's consent be "confirmed in writing." However, in N.Y. State 895 (2011), we pointed out that a client's consent to a Rule 1.10(h) conflict must be confirmed in writing because Rule 1.10(d) says: "A disqualification prescribed by this Rule may be waived by the affected client . . . under the conditions stated in Rule 1.7." The conditions stated in Rule 1.7 include informed consent, confirmed in writing. In any event, confirming a client's consent to a conflict in writing is a wise policy because it impresses on the client the importance of that consent, and avoids later confusion about whether consent was given.

Rule 1.10(a): Imputed Conflicts

11. If Rule 1.7(a)(2) disqualifies Attorney X from representing a child in a particular matter, then Rule 1.10(a) ordinarily imputes that conflict to every other lawyer who is associated in the same "firm." We must therefore determine whether the AFC Program is a "law firm" within the meaning of Rule 1.0(h), which provides as follows:

> (h) "Firm" or "law firm" includes, but is not limited to, a lawyer or lawyers in a law partnership, professional corporation, sole proprietorship or other association authorized to practice law; or lawyers employed in a qualified legal assistance organization, a government law office, or the legal department of a corporation or other organization.

12. As we understand the AFC Program, it falls outside that definition. Nor are the attorneys on the panel of the AFC Program automatically deemed to belong to a single firm for conflict of interest purposes, such as sometimes happens when attorneys share offices in a way that gives each other access to the confidential information possessed by other attorneys in the office-sharing arrangement. See, e.g., N.Y. City 80-63 (1980) (two firms that shared offices could not represent opposing parties in litigation because of the "strong likelihood" that the separate law firms could not maintain the confidences and secrets of their respective clients); N.Y. County 680 (1990) ("Even though lawyers who share office space are not partners, they may be treated as if they were partners for some purposes" if they share confidential information.)

13. Rather, the only connection between the attorneys on the panel, aside from a common purpose, is that they obtain assignments and seek reimbursement from the same administrator. This does not transform them into a law firm. Compare Rosenblum v. Great Neck Teachers Ass'n Benefit Trust Fund, 36 Misc. 3d 1203(A) (Nassau County Sup. Ct. 2012) ("organization that makes referrals to a panel of lawyers" falls outside the definition of "law firm" under Rule 1.0(h)) with N.Y. State 804 (2006) (independent private practitioners who formed a "qualified legal services corporation" to represent indigent clients, and who each received a pro rata share of the fees paid by the county to the corporation, constituted a "law firm" for conflicts purposes). Because the AFC Program is not a law firm within the meaning of the Rules, a conflict for Attorney X will not be imputed to other lawyers in the AFC program (but if Attorney X is associated with other lawyers in some firm, a Rule 1.7 conflict will be imputed to them).

50 "When lawyers representing different clients in the same matter or in substantially related matters are closely related, there may be a significant risk that client confidences will be revealed and that the lawyer's family relationship will interfere with both loyalty and professional judgment. As a result, each client is entitled to know of the existence and implications of the relationship between the lawyers, before the lawyer agrees to undertake the representation. Thus, a lawyer who has a significant intimate or close family relationship with another lawyer ordinarily may not represent a client in a matter where that other lawyer is representing another party, unless each client gives informed consent, as defined in Rule 1.0(j)." Rule 1.7, Cmt. [11].

14. The Public Defender's Office, however, is a law firm, assuming it either is a "government law office" or comes within the definition of a qualified legal assistance organization under Rules 1.0(p) and 7.2(b)(1). See N.Y. State 862 (2011) (finding that Public Defender's Office was a firm). Thus its lawyers, unlike those of the AFC Program, are subject under Rule 1.10(a) to mutual imputation of personal-interest conflicts.[51]

15. We note – as we did in N.Y. State 895 at ¶ 14 – that an Assistant Public Defender who works in the same office as Attorney X's spouse may have a "mirror-image conflict under Rule 1.7(a)(2)." Whether such a conflict arises will depend on the kinds of factors discussed in paragraph 10 above. If it does arise, then under Rule 1.10(a), the conflict will be imputed to every lawyer "associated in" the Public Defender's Office who knowingly undertakes a representation despite the conflict. However, if the client of the Public Defender's Office has the capacity to give informed consent to a conflict, then that client's consent may cure the imputed conflict. See Rule 1.10(d) (clients may waive imputed conflicts "under the conditions stated in Rule 1.7"). But the consent of the Assistant Public Defender's client will not cure any conflict that Attorney X may have in representing the child-client.

16. Finally, we point out that whenever Attorney X is called upon to serve as attorney for a child, he should heed the mandate of Rule 1.14(a) by seeking, "as far as reasonably possible, [to] maintain a conventional relationship with the client."

CONCLUSION:

17. A lawyer on a county panel of the Attorneys for Children Program may serve as attorney for the child even though another party in the proceeding is represented either by the lawyer's spouse, who is an Assistant Public Defender, or by another lawyer who works in the same office as the lawyer's spouse, unless (i) the circumstances create a conflict under Rule 1.7(a)(2) or Rule 1.10(h), and (ii) the child has no legal representative who can and does consent to the conflict on the child's behalf.

(54-12)

51 Spousal conflicts under Rule 1.10(h), on the other hand, are not among those listed as requiring imputation under Rule 1.10(a).

OPINION 942 (11/02/2012)

TOPIC: Referrals of clients; notice to clients as to legal fees

DIGEST: Lawyer may not ethically enter into arrangement with a non-lawyer firm to accept referrals of clients whose legal fees, in an amount not disclosed to the client, would be taken from the fee paid by the client to the non-lawyer firm.

RULES: 1.5(a) & (b), 1.8(f), 5.4(a), 5.5(b), 7.2(a), 8.4(b)

QUESTION:

1. May a lawyer enter into an arrangement in which a non-lawyer firm, whose customers are hedge fund managers, refers some of those customers for legal services, and the non-lawyer firm will pay the lawyer an undisclosed portion of a flat fee that it collects from those customers?

FACTS:

2. A non-lawyer firm ("NL Firm") sells logo, website and marketing services to hedge fund managers. Along with these services, NL Firm sells template legal documents such as limited partnership agreements to provide fund managers with a cost effective "do it yourself" option. The customers pay NL Firm a flat fee for these services and templates. NL Firm states in its materials that it is not a law firm and that the customer should consult a lawyer.

3. NL also proposes to offer to its customers, for a higher flat fee, an option that would include, in addition to the above services and templates, a referral to an outside attorney with expertise in hedge funds and securities law. The outside attorney would provide the client with "standard hedge fund legal services." The attorney would provide an engagement letter to the client. However, the attorney's fee for legal services would be paid by the NL firm, out of the flat fee it receives from its customer, on the basis of a separate agreement between NL Firm and the lawyer. The engagement letter would not state the amount of the fee to be paid by NL Firm to the lawyer, and it appears that the client would not otherwise be so advised.

OPINION:

4. As a preliminary matter, the inquiry raises some questions of law. Would NL Firm, by selling templates of legal documents to its customers, be engaged in the unauthorized practice of law? See Judiciary Law §§ 478, 484. Would NL Firm, by its arrangements with the inquiring attorney, be improperly involved in legal practice? See Judiciary Law § 495(1) (d), (e) & (h) (no corporation shall furnish attorneys, render legal services, nor advertise that either alone or with an admitted attorney, it has an office for the practice of law or the furnishing of counsel). Would NL Firm be engaged in unlawful solicitation of business on behalf of an attorney? See Judiciary Law § 479 (unlawful to solicit legal business, or to solicit a retainer authorizing an attorney to perform or render legal services). All such questions of law are beyond the jurisdiction of this Committee to resolve.

5. We note, however, that the answers to these legal questions may have consequences under the Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"). If the sale of legal templates constitutes unauthorized practice of law, then under Rule 5.5(b), the lawyer would be prohibited from aiding NL Firm in such unauthorized practice. More generally, the lawyer's involvement with NL Firm could be unethical if the proposed arrangements were to violate any of the Judiciary Law provisions cited above. See Rule 8.4(b) (a lawyer shall not "engage in illegal conduct that adversely reflects on the lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness as a lawyer").

6. Whatever may be the answers to the above legal questions, the proposed arrangement violates the ethical requirement that a lawyer communicate fee information to a client. Rule 1.5(b) requires, subject to an exception not applicable here, as follows:

> A lawyer shall communicate to a client . . . the basis or rate of the fee and expenses for which the client will be responsible. This information shall be communicated to the client before or within a reasonable time after commencement of the representation and shall be in writing where required by statute or court rule.

The information must be in writing when the fee to be charged is expected to be $3,000 or more. See 22 N.Y.C.R.R. §§ 1215.1, 1215.2.

7. Under the proposed arrangement, the written engagement letter would be silent as to the legal fee. The lawyer could provide fee information other than in writing if the legal fee were expected to be less than $3,000, but it appears from the inquiry that information about the legal fee will not be provided to the client even orally. The proposed arrangement would thus violate Rule 1.5(b).

8. There are other ethical rules that could also be violated by the proposed arrangement, but the inquiry does not provide enough information to make that determination. One of these is Rule 5.4(a), which provides, subject to exceptions inapplicable here, that a lawyer "shall not share legal fees with a nonlawyer." NL Firm charges a lower amount to those customers who do not seek legal services, and a higher amount to those who do. The difference between the lower and higher amounts is, in effect, what the customer is paying for the legal services. The inquiry does not reveal how that enhancement of the customer's fee relates to the fee paid by NL Firm to the attorney. If the increased amount paid by the customer were more than the amount paid to the lawyer, then NL Firm would be retaining part of what the customer is paying for legal services, which would violate Rule 5.4(a).[52]

9. Also relevant is the rule against payment for referrals. Rule 7.2(a) provides, subject to certain exceptions: "A lawyer shall not compensate or give anything of value to a person or organization to recommend or obtain employment by a client, or as a reward for having made a recommendation resulting in employment by a client."[53] It would violate this rule if the inquiring lawyer would be giving something of value to NL Firm in exchange for client referrals. For example, if the lawyer had a standard fee for "standard hedge fund legal services," and if it were to charge NL Firm less than that standard fee, then the discount would appear to be an impermissible payment for referrals. The inquiry does not include enough information to determine whether the lawyer would be in violation of this rule.

52 On the other hand, if the increased amount paid by the customer were less than the amount paid to the lawyer, then NL Firm would be paying part of the legal fee from its own assets. This possibility underlines the importance of considering Rule 1.8(f), which we discuss in paragraph 10.

53 The exceptions to Rule 7.2(a) are inapplicable here. One of them allows payment of usual and reasonable fees charged by a qualified legal assistance organization, Rule 7.2(a)(2), but NL Firm is not such an organization. More broadly, various restrictions discussed in this opinion may not apply to certain other kinds of organizations specified in the Rules, but again, NL Firm does not fit within any of these categories. See Rule 7.2(b) (allowing lawyer to be recommended and paid, and cooperate with, certain legal aid or public defender offices, a military legal assistance office, certain lawyer referral services, and certain bona fide organizations with legal services plans for their members or beneficiaries).

10. Given the NL Firm's role in providing the fee to the lawyer, another relevant rule is the one governing payment of legal fees by third parties. A third party may pay legal fees, but only if the client gives informed consent, the third party does not interfere with the lawyer's independent professional judgment or with the client-lawyer relationship, and the client's confidential information is appropriately protected. Rule 1.8(f). Informed consent can occur only after the lawyer has adequately explained the risks and provided enough information for the client to make an informed decision. Rule 1.0(j). That standard may not be satisfied here, given the apparent limits to the planned disclosure to the client, who will not be told even the amount of the fixed legal fee to be paid by NL Firm.

11. Finally, we note that as always, a lawyer's fee cannot be excessive. Rule 1.5(a). It appears that NL Firm is to pay a fixed amount for a standard set of legal services. A flat rate fee is not necessarily excessive, but neither is it necessarily reasonable. See Simon's New York Rules of Professional Conduct Annotated 111 (2012 ed.). Whether or not the fee described in the proposed arrangement would be excessive cannot be determined based upon the facts given in this inquiry.

CONCLUSION:

12. A lawyer may not ethically enter into an arrangement with a non-lawyer firm to accept referrals of clients whose legal fees, in an amount not disclosed to the client, would be taken from the fee paid by the client to the non-lawyer firm.

OPINION 943 (11/02/2012)

TOPIC: Law firm business card of non-attorney; title of non-attorney law school graduate DIGEST: The law firm business card of a firm employee who is a law school graduate but is not admitted to practice may not list the employee's J.D. degree or use the title "legal project manager" without making clear that the individual is not admitted to practice law.

RULES: 5.3, 7.1(a), 8.4(c)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a New York law firm that employs a law school graduate who is not admitted to practice law in any jurisdiction and who works as an "account/project manager" and client liaison for a major client of the firm. The firm would like to order business cards for her but wants the information on the card to comply with all applicable ethical requirements. The firm proposes to include the following information on this employee's business card:

> [Employee's name], J.D., M.I.P.
> Legal Project Manager

The "M.I.P." is a master of laws degree relating to intellectual property.

QUESTION:

2. May the law firm business card of a firm employee who is not admitted to practice law list the employee's law degrees or use the title "Legal Project Manager?"

OPINION:

3. This committee has previously concluded that a lawyer is responsible for ensuring that the content of business cards of the lawyer's non-attorney employees meet the same standards as those applicable to lawyer advertising. N.Y. State 640 (1992). That opinion was based on the Code of Professional Responsibility, but the current Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") include provisions that support a similar conclusion.[54] An ethical responsibility for such oversight applies not only to individual lawyers, but also to the entire law firm that employs the non-attorney employees.[55]

4. A paramount concern of the rules on advertising is the prohibition against the use of statements that are "false, deceptive or misleading," and even beyond the context of advertising, it is pro-

54 See Rule 5.3(a) (providing that a lawyer with direct supervisory authority over a nonlawyer "shall adequately supervise the work of the nonlawyer"); Rule 5.3(b) (providing that a lawyer is responsible for conduct of an employed nonlawyer that would violate Rules if the lawyer has supervisory authority over the nonlawyer and either timely knew of the conduct but failed to take reasonable remedial action or should have known of the conduct so that such action could have been timely taken).

55 See Rule 5.3(a) (providing that a law firm "shall ensure that the work of nonlawyers who work for the firm is adequately supervised" as appropriate); N.Y. State 704 (1997) (stating that cited Code provisions "apply with the same force to the law firm as to its individual attorneys").

hibited for a lawyer or law firm to engage in any conduct involving dishonesty or deceit. Rule 7.1(a)(1); Rule 8.4(c).

5. In N.Y. State 640 (1992), focusing on the potential to mislead, we considered which of several proposed titles for a paralegal could be used on a law firm business card. We approved the use of the title "Senior Paralegal" because it "unambiguously conveys that the employee is a paralegal." We rejected certain other titles as being likely to confuse the public. For example, we found the title "Paralegal Coordinator" ambiguous, in that it could refer to an attorney coordinating the firm's paralegals, and thus impermissible unless the business card made clear that the employee did not practice law.

6. In N.Y. State 704 (1997), we considered whether a lawyer not admitted in New York (but admitted in other jurisdictions) could be listed as a lawyer on the letterhead or business card of a law firm's New York office. We concluded that such a listing needed to disclose the jurisdictional limitations of the lawyer. "The governing principle is that the principal office address on the letterhead implies that each attorney whose name is shown on the letterhead has been admitted to practice in the jurisdiction in which that address is located. If the implication is untrue, then it should be clarified with language sufficient to the task in order to avoid misleading the reader." Id.

7. The holdings of Opinions 704 and 640 govern this inquiry. Just as listing a lawyer on law firm letterhead with a New York principal address may imply that the lawyer is admitted to practice in New York, listing "J.D." next to an employee's name on a law firm business card may imply to the public that the employee is an attorney. Similarly, use of the title "Legal Project Manager" on a law firm business card – like use of the title "Paralegal Coordinator" – may lead others to that same incorrect conclusion. Thus, the proposed title and degree information may be listed on a law firm business card (or its equivalent, including a digital "vCard") only if the card expressly discloses that the employee is not admitted to practice law.

CONCLUSION:

8. The law firm business card of a firm employee who is a law school graduate but does not practice law and is not admitted to practice law may not list the employee's law degrees or use the title "Legal Project Manager" without expressly indicating that the individual is not admitted to practice law.

OPINION 944 (11/08/2012)

TOPIC: Joint venture between PLLCs

DIGEST: On the facts given, it is permissible for two PLLCs to create a joint venture functioning as a law firm.

RULES: Rule 1.0(h), Rule 7.1(a), Rule 7.5(a), Rule 7.5(d)

QUESTION:

1. Inquiring counsel inquires as follows:

> May two solo practitioners, each of whom has practiced as a professional Limited Liability Corporation (e.g., "John Smith, Attorney At Law, PLLC") form a law firm without a partnership by creating a joint venture of their PLLCs for the purpose of collaborating on cases and sharing profits, using the firm name "Smith and Jones," to be followed by the notation "A Joint Venture of John Smith, Attorney At Law, PLLC and Jane Jones, Attorney At Law, PLLC"?

OPINION:

2. In N.Y. State 861 (2011), this Committee determined, inter alia, that "[t]he New York office of a law firm operating as a PLLC may have as one of its owners another PLLC . . . ."

3. Thus, the fact that two PLLCs would be the "owners" or participants in the contemplated entity is permissible.

4. In Florida Opinion 93-6, the Florida State Bar Association Committee on Professional Ethics, while expressing caution that a joint venture arrangement not be utilized to evade fee splitting restrictions or other regulatory purposes, opined:

> Initially it must be noted that neither the Rules Regulating The Florida Bar nor opinions issued by the Professional Ethics Committee of The Florida Bar contemplate joint venture arrangements between law firms. This does not mean, however, that an attorney is ethically precluded from practicing simultaneously in two bona fide law firms. See Florida Ethics Opinion 76-7; ABA Informal Opinions 83-1499 and 1253.

5. In South Carolina Opinion 05-102, the South Carolina Bar Ethics Advisory Committee determined that a Georgia law firm and a South Carolina attorney entering into a joint venture would not be a prohibited legal referral service precisely because the advertising that it would be doing was being performed as a joint venture.

6. In Pennsylvania Opinion 90-21, the Pennsylvania Bar Association Committee on Legal Ethics and Professional Responsibility, in an informal opinion, approved the formation of a similar joint venture to that being proposed here, and specifically opined:

> Your letterhead must reflect the true nature of the relationship between the two firms. Reading the first sentence of Rule 7.5(a) with Rule 7.1(a), I believe that each firm must disclose that it is practicing in a joint venture with the other, and Rule 7.5(d) mandates that the true nature of the relationship be disclosed.

7. What the Pennsylvania Bar opinion mandated is precisely what the inquiring attorney here proposes.

8. New York Rule of Professional Conduct 1.0(h) provides:

> "Firm" or "law firm" includes, but is not limited to, a lawyer or lawyers in a law partnership, professional corporation, sole proprietorship or other association authorized to practice law; or lawyers employed in a qualified legal assistance organization, a government law office, or the legal department of a corporation or other organization.

9. As observed in Simon's New York Rules of Professional Conduct Annotated (2012 ed.) (West), in Rule 1.0(h), "firm" or "law firm" is "defined a bit more broadly than it was in the Definitions section of the old Code," and "is not meant to be exhaustive." Simon continues, "[T]he word 'firm,' has a chameleon quality and changes with the context."

10. As further observed therein (at p. 29):

> Rule 1.10(a), the main rule regarding imputation of conflicts, imputes conflicts arising under Rules 1.7, 1.8, and 1.9 to all lawyers who [are] "associated in a firm." Thus, the definition of "firm" is crucial for conflicts of interest analysis.

11. In Pennsylvania Opinion 2005-90, the Pennsylvania Bar Association Committee on Legal Ethics and Professional Responsibility, after reaching the same conclusion as Florida Opinion 93-6, supra, and South Carolina Opinion 05-102, supra, regarding the permissibility of practice via the same sort of joint venture proposed by the current inquiring counsel, determined:

> Although your inquiry does not recite the legal structure of the "joint venture", nothing in your inquiry overcomes the conclusion that the joint venture will constitute a "firm" as defined in Rule 1.0(c).

12. In the instant situation, the inquiry acknowledges that the two solo practitioners would be "forming a law firm" by entering into this joint venture, with all of the attendant consequences.

CONCLUSION:

13. The proposal is answered in the affirmative, with the caveat noted above, and solely insofar as the New York Rules of Professional Conduct are concerned. This Committee does not address legal issues, including those regarding the effect which the proposed mode of organization might have upon the member PLLCs or the individual attorneys.

OPINION 945 (11/07/2012)

TOPIC: Disclosure of client wrongdoing.

DIGEST: A lawyer may not disclose that the client has been reading the opposing party's client-lawyer e-mails, although not communicating the e-mails or their contents to the lawyer, unless (1) the lawyer knows that the client is committing a crime or fraud and no other remedial measures will prevent harm to the opposing party, or (2) governing judicial decisions or other law require disclosure.

RULES: 1.6, 3.3, 4.4(b), 8.4(d).

QUESTION:

1. A lawyer represents a client in a matrimonial litigation. The client has disclosed that the client has access to, and has been reading, the spouse's e-mails, including e-mails with counsel. Although the client has not provided the spouse's lawyer-client e-mails or disclosed their contents to the lawyer, the client may be using knowledge of their contents in making decisions about the litigation. Must the lawyer disclose the client's conduct?

OPINION:

2. A lawyer's knowledge that the client is reading the spouse's client-lawyer e-mails is "confidential information" subject to the lawyer's confidentiality duty under Rule 1.6(a). The lawyer should admonish the client to refrain from this conduct. However, absent an exception to the general duty to preserve a client's confidential information, the lawyer may not disclose the client's conduct to the court or opposing counsel.

3. One arguable source of a disclosure obligation in this situation is Rule 4.4(b), which requires a lawyer who "receives" an "inadvertently sent" document to notify the sender. By its terms, this rule is not applicable, however, since the lawyer has not "received" the e-mails from the opposing party or counsel or from anyone else. Further, even if the lawyer had received the e-mails from the lawyer's client, it is uncertain whether the rule would apply. At least in the view of the ABA ethics committee, the rule would be inapplicable because the e-mails, although wrongly obtained by the lawyer's client, have not been "inadvertently sent." See ABA Formal Op. 11-460 (2011); ABA Formal Op. 06-440 (2006). The Comment accompanying Rule 4.4(b) is consistent with the ABA's interpretation. See Rule 4.4(b), Cmt. [2] ("this rule does not address the legal duties of a lawyer who receives a document that the lawyer knows or reasonably should know may have been wrongly obtained by the sending person").

4. It might also be argued that notification is required by Rule 8.4(d), which forbids a lawyer from engaging "in conduct that is prejudicial to the administration of justice." N.Y. City 1989-1 supports this argument. The opinion considered the obligations of a lawyer whose client intercepted written communications between her spouse and her spouse's counsel and provided the communications to her lawyer. The opinion concluded that even if the lawyer did not intend to use the communications, the lawyer "must disclose (or call upon his client to disclose) his possession of the documents and return the documents or provide copies." The opinion reasoned that the receipt of the information, which is likely to be privileged and in any event was obtained outside normal discovery procedures, gives the lawyer and his client "an advantage that, however slight, they are not entitled to have," and that retaining that advantage without the opposing party's awareness would be prejudicial to the administration of justice.

5. Opinion 1989-1 must be distinguished from the inquiry we address here, however, because the inquirer has not received the e-mails and is not in a position to use them. Although the client may have engaged in conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice, the lawyer has not done so. Additionally, this Committee has doubts whether Opinion 1989-1, if correct at the time it was issued, remains correct. Compare Arizona Op. 01-04 (2001) (where client wrongly procures former employer's privileged or confidential documents from a current employee, the ethics rules "prohibit the lawyer from notifying the ex-employer or its counsel of the documents' receipt without first obtaining client consent"). The New York judiciary's adoption of Rule 4.4(b), effective 2009, appears to reflect a judgment that the handling of improperly obtained documents should be left to case law and other law. That is the import of the accompanying Comment, quoted above.

6. One must also consider whether the inquirer has a disclosure obligation under Rules 3.3(b) & (c). Rule 3.3(b) provides that "[a] lawyer who represents a client before a tribunal and who knows that a person . . . has engaged in criminal or fraudulent conduct related to the proceeding shall take reasonable remedial measures, including, if necessary, disclosure to the tribunal." Rule 3.3(c) provides that this duty applies even if compliance requires disclosure of confidential information. The purpose of Rule 3.3(b) is "to protect a tribunal against criminal or fraudulent conduct that undermines the integrity of the adjudicative process." Rule 3.3, Cmt. [12].

7. Rule 3.3(b) is inapplicable unless the lawyer knows that the client's conduct in question is "criminal or fraudulent." Because this Committee interprets only the Rules of Professional Conduct and not other law, we do not express an opinion whether the client's conduct in reading the spouse's lawyer-client e-mail communications rises to the level of a crime or fraud. If it does, the lawyer's duty is to "take reasonable remedial measures," which do not necessarily include disclosure of client confidences. Since the lawyer has not gained access to the e-mails or their contents, it may be a sufficient remedial measure for the lawyer to persuade the client to cease the misconduct. If that is enough to avert harm to the client's spouse, then the rule would not require disclosure. However, disclosure must be made to the court or opposing counsel if the client's conduct is "criminal or fraudulent" and no other measures provide an adequate remedy.

8. Finally, Rule 1.6(b)(6) permits a lawyer to reveal confidential information "to the extent the lawyer reasonably believes necessary . . . when permitted or required under these Rules or to comply with other law or court order." Under this provision, when the law governing potential disclosure is unclear, a lawyer need not risk violating a legal or ethical obligation, but may disclose client confidences to the extent the lawyer reasonably believes it is necessary to do so to comply with the relevant law, even if the legal obligation is not free from doubt. See ABA 11-460 (2011).

9. Judicial decisions, without reference to the disciplinary rules, have found that lawyers have a notification obligation in some circumstances where clients wrongly procure the opposing party's documents. See, e.g., Parnes v. Parnes, 80 A.D.3d 948, 915 N.Y.S.2d 345 (3d Dep't 2011) (where the wife in a divorce action wrongly downloaded her husband's e-mails and provided them to her attorney, the intermediate appellate court observed: "we certainly do not condone the failure of plaintiff's counsel to promptly notify defendant's counsel that she had obtained the e-mails or her tactic of surprising defendant at his deposition by questioning him regarding those privileged documents"); Lipin v. Bender, 193 A.D.2d 424, 597 N.Y.S.2d 340 (1993), aff'd, 664 N.E.2d 1300 (N.Y. 1994) (where the plaintiff in an employment action removed and copied the opposing lawyer's internal memos while the lawyers were out of the room and provided the copies to her own lawyer, the plaintiff's lawyer should either have returned the documents or sought direction from the court rather than attempting to exploit the documents in settlement discussions); Forward v. Foschi, 27 Misc. 3d 1224A, 911 N.Y.S.2d 392, 2010 N.Y. Misc. LEXIS 1066 (N.Y. Sup. Ct., May 18, 2010) ("when he realized . . . his client had turned over to him communications between [the opposing party] and her attorneys, [the lawyer] should have disclosed his receipt of such communications and attempted to mitigate the circumstances, especially, if, as he asserts, the communications were of little value"). These decisions may be intended to impose obligations, pursuant to the courts' supervisory authority, that are independent of the ethics rules and that go beyond the disclosure obligations of Rule 3.3(b) and other rules. The extent of any court-established disclosure obligations and whether they apply to the inquirer's situation is a question of law that this Committee lacks jurisdiction to answer. If the inquirer reasonably believes that disclosure is necessary to comply with applicable judicial decisions, such disclosure is permitted by Rule 1.6(b)(6).

CONCLUSION:

10. A lawyer may not disclose that the client has been reading the opposing party's client-lawyer e-mails, although not communicating the e-mails or their contents to the lawyer, unless (1) the lawyer knows that the client is committing a crime or fraud and no remedial measures other than disclosure will prevent harm to the opposing party, or (2) governing judicial decisions or other law require disclosure.

OPINION 946 (11/07/2012)

TOPIC: Payments from lawyer's trust account to third parties at direction of client.

DIGEST: The Rules of Professional Conduct do not prevent a lawyer from distributing settlement proceeds to a third person at the request of the lawyer's client.

RULES: 1.0(e); 1.2(a); 1.15 (c)(4)

FACTS:

In this inquiry, a lawyer has settled a personal injury action on behalf of his client and after paying all fees, disbursements, liens and expenses, plans to distribute to the client the net proceeds which the client is entitled to receive. However, the client is incarcerated, does not have a checking account and is not able to open one. The lawyer proposes to issue the net proceeds by check payable to the client or the third party ("John Client or Mary Friend").

QUESTION:

1. May a lawyer distribute settlement proceeds from a personal injury action to a person other than the client who is the party to the action, at the request of the client?

OPINION:

2. Rule 1.15 (c)(4) requires a lawyer to "promptly pay or deliver to the client or third person as requested by the client or third person the funds, securities, or other properties in the possession of the lawyer that the client or third person is entitled to receive."

3. The focus of this subsection of the Rule is at its opening phrase. The Rule requires prompt action by the lawyer. Failure to act promptly has been a factor in several disciplinary matters under DR 9-102(c)(4), the predecessor to Rule 1.15(c)(4). (see, Matter of Jebb, 46 A.D. 3d 167 (4th Dept. 2007); Matter of King, 36 A.D.3d (4th Dept. 2006)).

4. The inquiry is then answered by the next phrase which directs the lawyer to "pay or deliver to the client or third person as requested by the client or third person . . . ." The request has been made by the client to make the proceeds check payable to the client or a third person. Thus Rule 1.15 (c)(4) does not prevent the distribution to "John Client or Mary Friend". The lawyer should advise the client that when the funds are paid to the third party that person will have full control over the funds.

5. The inquiry raises the concern whether the closing language of Rule 1.15(c)(4), "entitled to receive the funds", restricts the lawyer's ability to follow the client's instruction. Under Rule 1.2(a), a lawyer "shall abide by a client's decisions regarding the objectives of the representation . . . ." If a client instructs the lawyer to deliver funds to a third party, then that third person is entitled to receive to funds within the meaning of Rule 1.15(c)(4).

6. In NY State 717 (1999) we construed the phrase, "entitled to receive the funds", to include medical providers who have valid assignments or liens against proceeds but exclude other unsecured provider creditors about whom the client has objected. This opinion implies that if the client had authorized payment to an unsecured provider, that payment would fall within the permissive language of Rule 1.15(c)(4).

7. This opinion, of course, is based on the clear authorization from the client to the lawyer directing payment to the third party. While not ethically required, it might be prudent for the lawyer receiving these instructions to follow the guidance of Rule 1.0(e) and have that authorization "confirmed in writing".

CONCLUSION:

8. Upon receiving clear instruction from a client to distribute settlement proceeds to the client or a named third person, a lawyer may follow the request of the client to distribute the funds in a certain manner.

TOPIC: Purchase of mailing list names for use in connection with offer to receive email educational newsletter.

DIGEST: It is ethically permissible for an attorney or law firm to purchase a list of names to whom emails from the firm will be sent offering each recipient the opportunity to join the law firm's email newsletter distribution system, which offers information about current legal topics and invitations to attend educational seminars provided by the firm, provided there is no solicitation for utilization of the firm's legal services.

RULES: 7.1, 7.1 (comments 1, 7 and 9); 7.2, 7.2 (comment 1); 7.3.

FACTS:

1. The inquiring law firm proposes to purchase a list of names for the purpose of sending emails to those on the list, offering them an opportunity to "opt in" to the firm's email newsletter distribution system, through which the recipient would receive information about current legal topics and invitations to seminars provided by the firm. There will be no solicitation for utilization of the firm's legal services in the e-mails or at the seminars.

QUESTION:

2. Is it ethically permissible for an attorney or law firm to purchase a list of names to whom emails will be sent, offering each recipient the opportunity to join the law firm's email newsletter distribution system, which offers information about current legal topics and invitations to attend educational seminars provided by the firm, provided there is no solicitation for utilization of the firm's legal services?

OPINION:

3. The public's need for legal services is met only if people recognize their legal problems, appreciate the importance of seeking assistance, and have available the services of competent legal counsel. Attorneys are, therefore, encouraged "to educate people to recognize their problems to facilitate the process of intelligent selection of lawyers, and to assist in making legal services fully available." Rule 7.1 Comment 1. In addition, attorneys are urged to "participate in educational and public relations programs concerning the legal system with particular reference to legal problems that frequently arise." Rule 7.1 Comment 9.

4. Thus, the maintenance of a program to educate the public such as that proposed by the inquiring attorney is a laudable exercise, and as long as the information disseminated is not "primarily about the lawyer or law firm (for example, the lawyer or law firm's cases, personnel, clients or achievements)" the program and its elements (e.g. email newsletters and seminars) are not considered advertising. Rule 7.1 Comment 9. "A lawyer's participation in an educational program is ordinarily not considered advertising because its primary purpose is to educate and inform rather than to attract clients." Rule 7.1 Comment 9. See also, N.Y. State 830 (2009).

5. Because educational newsletters and seminars from law firms are not "advertisements" under Rule 7.1(a), and because a solicitation is by definition a subset of advertisements under Rule 7.3(b), the offering of a subscription to such newsletters and/or seminars is therefore not a solicitation and thus is not subject to Rule 7.3.

6. We find no Rule that prohibits a lawyer or firm from purchasing a list of names and addresses for the purpose of offering the lawyer's or firm's newsletter and/or educational seminars. Comment 1 to Rule 7.2 (which prohibits payment for referrals of clients) provides that the Rule "does not prohibit a lawyer from paying for advertising and communications permitted by these Rules, including the costs of print directory listings, online directory listings, newspaper ads, television and radio airtime, domain name registrations, sponsorship fees, banner ads and group advertising. A lawyer may also compensate employees, agents and vendors who are engaged to provide marketing or client development services, such as publicists, public relations personnel, marketing personnel and website designers."

CONCLUSION:

7. It is ethically permissible for an attorney or law firm to purchase a list of names to whom emails from the firm will be sent, offering each recipient the opportunity to join the law firm's email newsletter distribution, which offers information about current legal topics and invitations to attend educational seminars provided by the firm, provided there is no solicitation for utilization of the firm's legal services.

OPINION 948 (12/03/2012)

TOPIC: Firm names; advertising

DIGEST: Law firm name may not include a lawyer's initials conjoined with an abbreviation of the lawyer's surname. Firm name may not include the phrase "The Business Dispute Clinic," but use of the phrase as a motto separate from the firm name may be permissible.

RULES: 7.1, 7.5(b)

FACTS:

1. An individual lawyer who is growing her practice seeks to change her firm's name. The lawyer's surname is hyphenated, as in "Ann Bonnie-Doe" (not her real name), and she seeks to use the name "AbDoe Law, The Business Dispute Clinic."

QUESTION:

2. May a lawyer ethically practice under a firm name that consists of a combination of (a) the lawyer's first initial, and the first initial and second name of a hyphenated surname, all conjoined, plus (b) the word "Law," plus (c) the motto "The Business Dispute Clinic"?

OPINION:

3. Rule 7.5(b) contains (subject to exceptions not applicable here) three prohibitions on firm names:

> "A lawyer in private practice shall not practice under [1] a trade name, [2] a name that is misleading as to the identity of the lawyer or lawyers practicing under such name, or [3] a firm name containing names other than those of one or more of the lawyers in the firm . . . ."

While "trade name" is not defined by the Rules, there are opinions that provide guidance. "The prohibition against trade names is broad, permitting use of little beyond the names of lawyers presently or previously associated with the firm." N.Y. State 869 (2011) (firm name may not include practice area); see N.Y. State 920 (2012) (firm name may not consist only of lawyer's initials); N.Y. State 861 (2011) (firm name may not include initials of practice areas); N.Y. State 740 (2001) (arbitrary letter may not be used as or appended to firm name, because trade names are prohibited even if not misleading as to identity of lawyers in the firm); N.Y. County 677 (1990) (firm name may not include first name of one partner and contraction of surname of another partner, as such a name would violate requirement that lawyers practice only under names of lawyers in the firm).

4. Some variations on names may deviate so slightly from the original as not to offend Rule 7.5(b). See N.Y State 872 (2011) (permissible to use English translation of foreign first name in informal communications, and on business cards and website, if not misleading and if compliant with statutes and court rules). Here, the first portion of the proposed firm name –the conjoined and abbreviated form AbDoe – deviates more substantially from the lawyer's actual name, and in that respect is similar to firm names found impermissible in opinions cited above. A firm name starting with AbDoe would therefore constitute a prohibited trade name.

5. The last portion of the proposed firm name – the phrase "The Business Dispute Clinic" – is also impermissible. Rule 7.5(b) permits a firm name to include the term "legal clinic" if the name of a participating lawyer or firm is incorporated therein, and it allows certain other similar terms to be used by a qualified legal assistance organization. The inquiring lawyer's firm, however, is not such an organization, and in any event, the provisions in question do not authorize the use of other terms such as "The Business Dispute Clinic."

6. However, advertising that includes "The Business Dispute Clinic" as a motto in addition to a proper firm name may be permissible. When a lawyer used the phrase "The Country Lawyer" as a motto in advertising, following his name, the Court of Appeals held that the phrase was neither a trade name nor deceptive. In re Von Wiegen, 63 N.Y.2d 163, 176-77 (1984). Under Rule 7.1(a)(1), however, advertising may not be misleading. Accordingly, the motto would be impermissible if, for example, the firm lacked competence or willingness to address business disputes.

CONCLUSION:

7. A law firm name may not include a variant on the lawyer's name that is created by conjoining the lawyer's initials with an abbreviation of the lawyer's surname. Nor may the firm name include the phrase "The Business Dispute Clinic," although use of such a phrase as a motto accompanying a proper firm name may be permissible advertising if not misleading.

TOPIC: Obligations of standby counsel

DIGEST: The ethical responsibilities of "standby counsel" vary depending on the degree to which standby counsel assumes representational obligations. If standby counsel remains on the sidelines, the pro se party should be treated like a prospective client. If the pro se party invites standby counsel's participation on a limited basis, standby counsel may limit the scope of representation. If the pro se party makes demands on standby counsel that are irrelevant to the case and beyond the scope of matters for which counsel has assumed responsibility, standby counsel should reiterate the scope of representation and explain which requests and demands are beyond that scope.

RULES: 1.2, 1.3, 1.4(a), 1.14, 1.18, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a private practitioner appointed by a New York State Supreme Court Justice to represent in a pending retention hearing a patient currently subject to involuntary civil commitment in a state mental hygiene facility.[56] The patient was confined following his acquittal of a crime by reason of mental disease or defect. See Penal Law §40.15. The inquirer describes him as an intelligent, litigious individual who has brought many actions against the state and has filed numerous complaints against actors in the court system, including the inquirer. The patient has a history of frequently compiling lengthy legal documents and demands.

2. The patient requested that the inquirer be relieved as counsel, but the court denied that request. Then the court granted the patient's request to proceed pro se, but appointed the inquirer as "standby counsel." Since the court has not defined his role as standby counsel, the inquirer seeks general guidance from us as to the scope and limits of his ethical obligations. He has also voiced specific concern about assisting the pro se party in bringing demands or claims that have no merit. The inquirer wishes to act diligently and professionally, but he does not want his practice to be overwhelmed by the demands of this case.

QUESTION:

3. What are the ethical obligations of standby counsel?

OPINION:

A The Role of Standby Counsel

4. The Supreme Court, while recognizing a criminal defendant's right to self-representation, has cautioned that this right does not excuse compliance with "relevant rules of procedural and substantive law." Faretta v. California, 422 U.S. 806, 834 n.46 (1975). The Court indicated that "a State may – even over objection by the accused – appoint a 'standby counsel' to aid the accused if and when the accused requests help, and to be available to represent the accused in the event that termination of the defendant's self-representation is necessary." Id.; accord People v. Sawyer, 57 N.Y.2d 12, 22 (1982).

56 A retention hearing is a hearing to determine whether a person who has been involuntarily committed to a state mental hygiene facility should be retained in the facility. See Mental Hyg. Law §9.33.

5. The role of standby counsel as expressed in case law may seem to vary somewhat from jurisdiction to jurisdiction.[57] However, that apparent variation may in part reflect that standby counsel can have different roles in different circumstances. As the discussion in Faretta makes evident, those roles can range from inactivated bystander (if the pro se party does not request help) to full-fledged counsel (if self-representation is terminated). Indeed, the relevant ABA Criminal Justice Standard sets out two different standby models, one active and one conditioned on a pro se party's invitation:

> "When standby counsel is appointed to provide assistance to the pro se accused only when requested, the trial judge should ensure that counsel not actively participate in the conduct of the defense unless requested by the accused or directed to do so by the court. When standby counsel is appointed to actively assist the pro se accused, the trial judge should ensure that the accused is permitted to make the final decisions on all matters, including strategic and tactical matters relating to the conduct of the case."

6. A criminal defendant has a right to representation and a right to proceed pro se, but has no right to "hybrid representation" in which the defendant proceeds pro se and is simultaneously represented by an attorney. See People v. Mirenda, 57 N.Y.2d 261 (1982). If, however, a trial court chooses to appoint standby counsel, the court is typically afforded broad discretion to set forth the parameters of the standby counsel's obligations. See People v. Ivery, 80 A.D.3d 874 (2d Dept. 2011) (trial court permissibly defined role of standby counsel as giving "legal advice as to how to frame motions and frame questions" and giving procedural advice); People v. Golden, 270 A.D.2d 136 (1st Dept. 2000) (trial court permitted to impose limitations on role of standby counsel). However the trial court exercises that discretion, it should notify lawyers and the pro se party of their roles and responsibilities. See ABA Criminal Justice Standard 6-3.7(b) (trial judge "should clearly notify both the defendant and standby counsel of their respective roles and duties").

7. Within the parameters set by the trial court, it is often up to the pro se party to determine the degree to which to "activate" standby counsel. See, e.g., People v. Hilts, 46 A.D.3d 947 (3d Dept. 2007) (standby counsel to assist pro se party only when requested). Counsel, however, has some say in the matter – courts have recognized that standby counsel may refuse to run errands or perform legal research as an assistant to the pro se party. See, e.g., State v. Silva, 27 P.3d 663 (Wash. Ct. App. 2001) (citing authorities in which "the role contemplated is one in which counsel acts as an advisor to the accused when requested, but does not in any respect act as an errand runner"); State v. Fernandez, 758 A.2d 842 (Conn. 2000) ("standby counsel serves as a legal resource to pro se defendants," but "does not . . . have any obligation to perform legal research for the defendant").

57 See, e.g., United States v. Schmidt, 105 F.3d 82, 90 (2d Cir. 1997) ("a standby counsel's duties are considerably more limited than the obligations of retained or appointed counsel"); United States v. McDermott, 64 F.3d 1448, 1453 (10th Cir. 1995) (standby counsel may "consult, make some objections, help with the admission and admissibility of exhibits, and make some motions"); United States v. Mullen, 32 F.3d 891, 894 (4th Cir. 1994) (court appointed standby counsel to sit in first row to be available for consultation, and not to offer advice unless asked).

8. As the above discussion illustrates, questions about the role of standby counsel in a given jurisdiction and in a given case are, to a great extent, questions of law rather than ethics. The answers to such questions must take into account broad judicial discretion, the pro se party's reasonable preferences, and standby counsel's willingness to perform services. This Committee does not answer legal questions, but it is within our purview to opine on the ethical duties attached to the different incarnations of standby counsel.[58] With the above legal background in place, we turn to an analysis of those ethical duties.

B. Standby Counsel and the Rules of Professional Conduct

9. While the Rules of Professional Conduct do not expressly address the ethical obligations of standby counsel, the Rules as a whole are best read to support the conclusion that the ethical duties of standby counsel vary significantly depending on the role that standby counsel assumes, or is assigned or asked to perform, in a given case.

The "inactive" end of the standby spectrum

10. When the pro se party does not involve counsel in the case and the court does not independently assign other duties to counsel, then the lawyer-client relationship remains inchoate and does not trigger the full panoply of ethical duties. The ABA, in addressing the obligations of a lawyer appointed to represent someone who declines representation, has commented that some ethical rules "defining the lawyer's obligations to a client . . . make sense only after a client has accepted the client-lawyer relationship." ABA 07-448. Specifically addressing the situation in which a pro se party does not accept representation by standby counsel, the ABA concluded that "[t]here is no client-lawyer relationship unless and until the defendant accepts representation." Id. This Committee agrees.

11. In our view, a pro se party who has not yet activated standby counsel is the functional equivalent of a "prospective client" to whom counsel owes some, but limited, ethical duties. Under Rule 1.18(b), even when no client-lawyer relationship ensues, "a lawyer who has had discussions with a prospective client shall not use or reveal information learned in the consultation, except as Rule 1.9 would permit with respect to information of a former client." Thus, even in the minimal version of standby representation, a pro se party's confidential information is subject to protection.

12. Additionally, even though a full lawyer-client relationship has not begun in this situation, it would be untenable for a standby lawyer, who can be called upon at any moment to play a more active role, to represent simultaneously a party whose interests differ from those of the pro se party. Accordingly, the concurrent conflict-of-interest standards of Rule 1.7 apply even to "inactive" standby counsel.

13. At the inactive extreme of standby representation, Rule 3.3 ("Conduct Before a Tribunal") is typically not triggered because (i) standby counsel is not the one taking action in the proceedings and (ii) a client-lawyer relationship has not been formed. See Rule 3.3, Cmt. [1] ("This Rule governs the conduct of a lawyer who is representing a client in the proceedings of a tribunal."). Of course, as discussed in ¶17 below, once standby counsel takes actions in the proceedings, those actions will be governed by Rule 3.3.

14. Rules 1.2(d) and 1.4(a)(5), which are not limited to conduct before a tribunal, apply even at the passive end of the standby spectrum. Rule 1.2(d) states that a lawyer "shall not counsel a client to engage, or assist a client, in conduct that the lawyer knows is illegal or fraudulent," but it permits a lawyer to "discuss the legal consequences of any proposed course of conduct with a client." Rule 1.4(a)(5) indicates that a lawyer shall "consult with the client about any relevant limitation on the lawyer's conduct when the lawyer knows that the client expects assistance not permitted by these Rules or other law."

The middle of the standby spectrum

15. In the middle of the representational spectrum are situations in which standby counsel assumes specific responsibilities on behalf of the pro se party. The pro se party's activation of counsel consummates a client lawyer relationship. See ABA 07-488 (when pro se party "turns to appointed counsel and seeks advice or representation, the defendant may be found to have consented to and thereby to have created a client-lawyer relationship under the Rules").

16. In these situations, Rule 1.2(c) best defines the scope of standby counsel's representation. That rule provides that a lawyer "may limit the scope of representation if the limitation is reasonable under the circumstances, the client gives informed consent and where necessary notice is provided to the tribunal and/or opposing counsel." This rule requires that standby counsel communicate to the pro se party his understanding of the specific duties he is assuming so that the pro se party understands the scope of the standby representation. Because standby counsel's duties may evolve during the course of the litigation, it is important that standby counsel explain any changes in the scope of his involvement to the client (and to the court, if required) as the litigation progresses.

17. As standby counsel assumes representational responsibilities, the obligations of Rule 3.3 will be triggered as to those aspects of the litigation in which standby counsel is involved.[59] Similarly, while a pro se party is generally entitled to direct his own litigation, standby counsel may not advance or assist in advancing non-meritorious claims, or claims that are designed merely to harass another or to delay the proceedings. See Rule 3.1 ("Non-Meritorious Claims and Contentions"); Rule 3.2 ("Delay of Litigation"). If, however, standby counsel's assistance or participation is limited to a specific issue, counsel does not assume responsibility for those aspects of the litigation in which he or she remains completely uninvolved.

The "full representation" end of the standby spectrum

18. Of course, when standby counsel steps in to assume full representation or to take on so many representational responsibilities as to be standby counsel in name only, the full panoply of ethical obligations contained in the Rules apply to counsel's conduct.

59 Although the current inquiry relates to a civil retention proceeding, the appointment of standby counsel most commonly occurs in the context of a criminal proceeding. In that situation, "[t]he lawyer's ethical duties under paragraphs (a) and (b) [of Rule 3.3] may be qualified by judicial decisions interpreting the constitutional rights to due process and to counsel in criminal cases." Rule 3.3, Cmt. [7].

19. The inquirer has affirmed his desire to act diligently and professionally but has expressed his concern that the demands of the pro se party may overwhelm his practice. Rule 1.3(a) provides that a lawyer "shall act with reasonable diligence and promptness in representing a client," and Comment [1] to that rule explains that a lawyer must "act with commitment and dedication to the interests of the client and in advocacy upon the client's behalf." But, as discussed above, the lawyer-client relationship between standby counsel is typically either limited in scope or provisional. Counsel's obligations under the Rules track the scope of his representational involvement. See Rule 1.2, Cmt. [7] ("Although an agreement for a limited representation does not exempt a lawyer from the duty to provide competent representation, the limitation is a factor to be considered when determining the legal knowledge, skill, thoroughness and preparation reasonably necessary for the representation."). Thus, if the pro se party has invoked standby counsel's participation only on specific issues, standby counsel is not responsible for involving himself in any of the pro se party's legal affairs that are unrelated to the case or outside the defined scope of standby counsel's involvement. And, as noted, Rule 3.2 prohibits standby counsel from assisting the pro se party in advancing frivolous or vexatious claims. Moreover, a lawyer's obligation to comply with client requests for information applies only to "reasonable" requests. Rule 1.4(a)(4). Thus, if a pro se party asks standby counsel to review prolix documents, or makes demands that are irrelevant to the matters for which counsel has assumed responsibility, standby counsel need simply reiterate the scope of his representation and explain which requests and demands are beyond that scope.

20. Given the history and circumstances of the particular pro se party to which the inquirer has been assigned as standby counsel, the inquirer should be continually alert to the relevance of Rule 1.14 ("Client with Diminished Capacity"). Rule 1.14(a) provides that a lawyer shall, "as far as reasonably possible, maintain a conventional relationship with" a client with diminished capacity, but Rule 1.14(b) authorizes counsel to take "reasonably necessary protective action" when the lawyer reasonably believes that the client (1) has diminished capacity, (2) is at risk of substantial harm unless action is taken, and (3) cannot adequately act in his or her interest. "In taking any protective action, the lawyer should be guided by such factors as the wishes and values of the client to the extent known, the client's best interest, and the goals of minimizing intrusion into the client's decision-making autonomy and maximizing respect for the client's family and social connections." Rule 1.14, Cmt. [5].

CONCLUSION:

21. The ethical responsibilities of standby counsel vary depending on the degree to which standby counsel assumes representational obligations: when standby counsel remains on the sidelines, the pro se party should be treated in the same manner as a prospective client under Rule 1.18; when the pro se party invites standby counsel's participation on a limited basis, standby counsel can limit the scope of representation pursuant to Rule 1.2(c); and if a pro se party makes lengthy demands on standby counsel that are irrelevant to the case or relate to matters for which counsel has not assumed responsibility, standby counsel should reiterate the scope of his representation and explain which requests and demands are beyond that scope.

TOPIC: Saving law firm mail in paper or electronic form

DIGEST: Law firm that retains electronic copies of mail may destroy the original paper mail, except when it finds that particular items must be retained in paper form, if it follows reliable procedures to identify and retain those particular items.

RULES: 1.6, 1.15(d)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a legal services agency that provides services to members of a union. The Agency is located within the headquarters of the Union.

2. Mail received by either the Agency or the Union is received and processed by a third party vendor. The Agency has confidentiality agreements with the personnel of the Vendor who receive and process mail.

3. The Agency proposes to have the Vendor scan all mail and email it to the appropriate attorneys or other legal service personnel. Also, in some cases, the original "hard copy" of the mail would "automatically" be sent to the addressee. According to the inquiry, this would include documents "for which an original is required," such as "motions, deeds, all client original signature documents, checks, transcripts, title documents [and] all escrow account statements and related documents."

4. In other cases, the Vendor would retain the hard copy of the mail for one month. During that time, lawyers or other legal staff who receive the emailed scan of the mail may click on the item and thereby cause the Vendor to deliver the hard copy of that mail item to the addressee. After one month, if no legal staff has requested retention, the Vendor would destroy the hard copy of the mail in a secure manner, but the scanned copy would be maintained on a secure server indefinitely.

QUESTIONS:

5. May the Agency ethically implement a plan to destroy the hard copy originals of certain items of mail, and retain only electronic copies, when legal staff has not requested that the hard copies of those particular items be delivered so as to allow retention?

OPINION:

6. Before considering the question asked, we note briefly the issue of confidentiality. "A fundamental principle in the client-lawyer relationship" is that, in the absence of the client's informed consent or except as permitted or required by the Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"), "the lawyer must not knowingly reveal information gained during and related to the representation, whatever its source." Rule 1.6, Cmt. [2]. The attorney not only has an obligation to refrain from revealing such information, but also must exercise reasonable care to prevent its disclosure or use by "the lawyer's employees, associates, and others whose services are utilized by the lawyer." Rule 1.6(c); see also Rule 5.3(b) (specifying when a lawyer is responsible for conduct of an associated nonlawyer that would be a violation of the Rules if engaged in by a lawyer).

7. The employees of the Vendor will have access to confidential client information. We have not been given the details of the Agency's confidentiality agreements with personnel of the Vendor. We may point out, however, that those agreements, and the Agency's oversight over the Vendor's adherence to them, must be sufficient to constitute reasonable care in protecting confidential information.

8. The inquiry also does not provide details about the servers on which electronic copies of mail will be kept, and in particular does not indicate whether those servers would be maintained by the Vendor or the Agency. In any event, the Agency must exercise "reasonable care to ensure that the system is secure and that client confidentiality will be maintained," N.Y. State 842 (2010), and some of our opinions provide guidance as to how such care might be exercised.[60]

9. We now turn to the question about destroying hard copies of mail items. In a recent opinion, we discussed ethical requirements to retain documents in their original form. N.Y. State 940 (2012). That opinion was not focused on items of mail; it related to records in general, and we think its principles apply in the more specific context presented here.

Items that must be retained in their original form

10. The inquirer has recognized that certain mail items need to be retained in their original hard copy form. This includes certain items specifically listed in the Rules, such as bank statements, when those items were received as paper copies in the first place. Rule 1.15(d)(1)(viii). It includes other kinds of documents as well, such as promissory notes and deeds. See N.Y. State 940 ¶¶ 9 – 10 & 13 – 14 (2012) (noting that whether records must be maintained in their original form will depend on the kind of record involved, and giving examples of documents in this category).

11. The proposed system includes two mechanisms for ensuring that mail is retained in hard copy when necessary. First, the Vendor would "automatically" send relevant legal staff hard copies of mail "for which an original is required." Second, if the Vendor fails to identify such a document, there would be another opportunity to do so when the relevant legal staff reviews the email with the scanned document.

12. The adequacy of these two mechanisms would depend on the details of their design and implementation. It is unclear from the inquiry how the Vendor will identify mail for which an original is required. To the extent possible, the Agency should have a clear and reliable protocol that the Vendor can readily apply, but the inquiry does not describe any such protocol.

60 For example, the opinion cited above states in the context of internet server ("cloud") storage that reasonable care to protect a client's confidential information against unauthorized disclosure may include consideration of the following steps: "Ensuring that the online data storage provider has an enforceable obligation to preserve confidentiality and security, and that the provider will notify the lawyer if served with process requiring the production of client information"; "Investigating the online data storage provider's security measures, policies, recoverability methods, and other procedures to determine if they are adequate under the circumstances"; and "Employing available technology to guard against reasonably foreseeable attempts to infiltrate the data that is stored." N.Y. State 842 ¶9 (2010); see also N.Y. State 709 (1998).

13. The inquiry also does not provide full details about the thirty-day opportunity for review by legal staff. It does not indicate, for example, whether there would be any mechanism for extension of the period, or review by another lawyer, when an assigned lawyer is on vacation or fully occupied with some other matter. In the absence of more information about the two mechanisms and their reliability, we cannot opine on the proposed system's adequacy.

Items for which at least copies must be retained

14. As to some other mail items, there will be no ethical requirement to maintain the items in their original paper form, but the inquirer will be ethically required to retain at least copies. N.Y. State 940 ¶¶ 11 – 14 (2012). The proposed system, which includes a plan to keep electronic copies of all mail on a secure server indefinitely, should satisfy this requirement. In some cases, however, there may be constraints on the kind of electronic storage used.[61]

CONCLUSION:

15. A system for retaining hard copies of mail when necessary, and keeping only electronic copies in other cases, may be permissible if the firm implements a reliable method for identifying those items that it is ethically required to be maintained in hard copy.

61 For example, in particular cases, the electronic copies might have to meet standards for future admissibility in evidence, see N.Y. State 940 ¶14. And when the item is one listed in Rule 1.15(d), copies must be maintained in a "medium that preserves an image of the document that cannot be altered without detection." Rule 1.15(d)(3).

TOPIC: Offering letter writing services through website.

DIGEST: A lawyer may not offer a web-based letter writing service on a broad range of topics unless it is clear that no legal services are rendered and the lawyer prominently disclaims the existence of a client-lawyer relationship on the website.

RULES: 5.7(a) & (c).

FACTS:

1. The inquiring lawyer contemplates offering an online letter drafting service; the lawyer would charge a flat fee for the preparation of letters in the following categories: Fund-raising, Commercial/ Business, Personal, Acceptance, College, Commendation, Condolence, Congratulations, Cover, Demand, E-mail, Introductory, Letters of intent, Marketing, Notification, Promotional, Reference, Rejection, Resignation, Request, Response, Resume, Application, Sales, Sympathy and Thank-you letters. The draft letters would be prepared by a lawyer and delivered to the client by electronic mail for execution and mailing. The lawyer proposes adding a disclaimer to the website that would advise that he is not dispensing legal advice, no legal representation exists, no attorney-client relationship is formed and the attorney is being hired only for his skills as a writer.

QUESTION:

2. May a lawyer offer a letter-writing service which does not dispense legal advice through a website he owns? May the website advertise the fact that the letters are written by an attorney?

OPINION:

3. Rule 5.7, entitled "Responsibilities Regarding Nonlegal Services" defines "nonlegal services" to "mean those services that lawyers may lawfully provide and that are not prohibited as an unauthorized practice of law when provided by a nonlawyer." Clearly letters on many of the topics raised by the Inquirer are non-legal, such as Condolence, Sympathy and Thank-you letters. However, the context and content of other letters may address legal rights and responsibilities. For example, a demand letter may be necessary to declare a default under a contract, a letter of intent may create legal obligations or a resignation may have to be addressed in a certain manner to be effective. Therefore whether the letter writing services qualify as "nonlegal services" for purposes of the Rule will require an examination of each request for a letter.

4. Our concern here is that the inquirer proposes to identify himself as an attorney, and that the letters, including those that could be written by a non-lawyer, will be written by an attorney.

5. Section (a)(1) of Rule 5.7 states that the Rules of Professional Conduct apply if the lawyer or law firm provides nonlegal services to a person that are not distinct from legal services being provided by the lawyer or firm. This test requires an examination of the subject of each letter and its context to determine whether the writing constitutes "nonlegal services" that are "distinct from legal services"

6. Comment [1] to Rule 5.7 places the onus on the lawyer to be clear about the nature of the services and the lawyer's role. It is likely that a client of the letter writing service, knowing that the writer is a lawyer, may expect legal advice.

7. In N.Y. State 832 (2009) we addressed an inquiry involving the sale of shelf corporations (a non-legal service); in paragraph 10 we stated that "[e]ven if the attorney merely identifies himself as a lawyer when selling shelf corporations but does not promise or provide legal services, the risk of confusion is great and purchasers could reasonably believe that they had an attorney-client relationship with the seller." In N.Y. State 557 (1984) we noted that "[w]hile there are many services that may properly be undertaken by lawyers and non-lawyers alike, especially in the fields of taxation and tax planning, when such services are performed by a lawyer who holds himself out as a lawyer, they constitute the practice of law and the lawyer, in performing them is governed by the Code."

8. Rule 5.7 (a)(2) and (a)(3) provide that the Rules apply even if the nonlegal services are distinct if the person receiving the services could reasonably believe that the services are the subject of a client lawyer relationship.

9. Rule 5.7 (a)(4) states that for these purposes "it will be presumed that the person receiving nonlegal services believes the services to be the subject of a client-lawyer relationship unless the lawyer or law firm has advised the person receiving the services in writing that the services are not legal services and that the protection of a client-lawyer relationship does not exist with respect to the nonlawyer services. . . ."

10. Here, the inquirer proposes to advise users of the service that no legal advice is being dispensed, that the lawyer is not acting in a representative capacity, that no attorney-client relationship is formed and that the attorney is being hired only for his skill as a writer. Thus, the presumptions under (a)(2) and (3) may be rebutted effectively if the services are clearly non-legal services.

11. However, this analysis does not address the delivery of services which are arguably legal in nature, such as the acceptance letter, the letter of intent, a demand or resignation. Where those examples could raise questions of the legal effect of the document, N.Y. State 832 would control this analysis. As stated in that Opinion: "even if the lawyer provides the disclaimer specified in Rule 5.7(a)(4), it would not be effective if the lawyer actually provided legal advice or other legal services to the customer of the nonlegal business."

12. We believe that a lawyer may offer the services proposed in this inquiry but by identifying him or her as a lawyer, the inquirer creates a substantial risk of confusion in the mind of the client about the legal effect of many of these letters. This likelihood is great enough that the safe harbor provided by (a)(4) would not be effective. Whether the writing of each letter is a legal or non-legal service will require a close look at the circumstances of each letter.

CONCLUSION:

13. A lawyer may not provide letter-writing services unless it is clear that the subject matter of the letters do not implicate legal rights, no legal services are rendered and the lawyer prominently disclaims the existence of a client-lawyer relationship on the website. (51-12)

TOPIC: Concurrent representation of lender and buyer in residential real estate closing; payment of buyer's legal fees by lender

DIGEST: Lawyer may not represent both lender and buyer in residential real estate transaction if part of a series of such transactions in which lawyer regularly represents that lender and lender regularly pays the buyer's legal fees.

RULES: 1.7(a), 1.7(b), 1.8(f)

FACTS:

1. A lawyer regularly represents a certain lender in residential real estate transactions. In each transaction, the lawyer charges the lender a fee of $450 for closing services. The lawyer also typically offers to represent the buyer (the borrower of the mortgage loan) on written consent of both clients, charging the buyer a fee of $275 for that service. The lender has proposed, as a promotion, to provide legal representation to potential borrowers as to closing services in such transactions for a $25 fee. The lender would run newspaper and radio advertisements to promote that offer, and the advertisements would not mention the lawyer or the lawyer's law firm by name. The buyer would pay the lender $25 toward the legal fee, and the lender would add $250 of its own and give the total of $275 – the usual fee for representing the buyer – to the lawyer. The lender would also pay the lawyer's $450 fee for representing the lender.

QUESTION:

2. On the above facts, may the lawyer ethically represent both the lender and the buyer and accept payment from the lender for the $275 in legal fees the lawyer otherwise would have charged the buyer, with the buyer having paid only $25 to the lender for such services?

OPINION:

3. The first question is whether it would violate ethical rules for the lawyer to represent both the lender and the buyer in connection with the closing of the residential real estate transactions at issue.

4. Rule 1.7(a)(1) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct provides that "a lawyer shall not represent a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that . . . the representation will involve the lawyer in representing differing interests." Rule 1.7(a)(2) precludes representation where "there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests."

5. Rule 1.7(b) provides, however, that notwithstanding the existence of a concurrent conflict of interest under paragraph (a), a lawyer may represent a client if four conditions are met. Two of the conditions are that the lawyer "reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client" and that "each affected client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing." (The other two conditions would not be at issue in the context of this inquiry.) The quoted provisions of Rule 1.7 include defined terms.[62]

6. In a typical residential real estate transaction, the interests of the lender and the buyer, who also is the borrower from the lender, overlap in important ways. Both are interested in obtaining good title and protecting the buyer's interests as against the seller. Moreover, the terms of a loan may not be effectively negotiable in the setting of a residential real estate transaction. Thus, representation of the buyer and the lender may often be less problematic than representation of those two parties in the setting of a highly negotiable commercial real estate deal.

7. To say that interests overlap, however, is not to say that they coincide. The lawyer who represents a residential buyer and lender is representing differing interests if only because the buyer is executing a note and a mortgage in favor of the bank. Moreover, while the scope of negotiation between buyer and lender may be limited, those parties may have different interests as to issues to be negotiated between buyer and seller. The buyer may have a greater interest in the way such issues are resolved, while the lender's interest may be simply to close the transaction. We have long seen representation of buyer and lender as raising a conflict, even if sometimes a consentable one. See, e.g., N.Y. State 753 (2002) (lawyer may not represent buyer and lender when negotiation may be needed, but otherwise dual representation may be permissible upon fully disclosing risks and obtaining knowing consent) (citing opinions).

8. On the facts of this case, we believe that a conflict would arise for a second reason as well. The inquiring lawyer regularly represents the lender and may well be eager to maintain that relationship and income stream. The lawyer would thus have a personal business interest in advancing the lender's cause, which would seem to create a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the buyer would be adversely affected by that personal business interest. See N.Y. State 867 at n.2 (2011) (similar consideration when representing lender and seller).

9. It appears that the proposed joint representation would, therefore, give rise to a conflict of interest both under Rule 1.7(a)(1), because of the prospect of representing different interests, and under Rule 1.7(a)(2), given the risk that the lawyer's personal interests would cause him to favor one client over another.

10. The next question is whether this concurrent conflict of interest may be waived with informed consent under Rule 1.7(b). Under one condition of the waiver provision quoted in paragraph 5 above:

> "Consentability is typically determined by considering whether the interests of the clients will be adequately protected if the clients consent to representation burdened by a conflict of interest. Thus, under paragraph (b)(1), notwithstanding client consent, such a representation is prohibited if, in the circumstances, the lawyer cannot reasonably > conclude that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation."

62 Rule 1.0(f) defines "differing interests" to include "every interest that will adversely affect either the judgment or the loyalty of a lawyer to a client . . . ." Rule 1.0(q) defines "reasonable lawyer" in this context as "a lawyer acting from the perspective of a reasonably prudent and competent lawyer who is personally disinterested in commencing or continuing the representation." Rule 1.0(r) provides that a lawyer "reasonably believes" some matter when "the lawyer believes the matter in question" and "the circumstances are such that the belief is reasonable."

Rule 1.7, Cmt. [15]. Here, waiver is available only if the lawyer reasonably believes that he or she could competently and diligently represent both lender and buyer concurrently.

11. Some of our precedents have recognized the possibility of representing a mortgagor and mortgagee, in appropriate circumstances, on consent of both. N.Y. State 438 (1976) (under prior Code of Professional Responsibility, attorney for lender could "represent both the mortgagee and the mortgagor only if the requirements of DR 5-105(C) are met"); N.Y. State 199 (1971) (under Code, consentable "only if it is obvious that [the lawyer] can adequately represent the interest of each"); see also ABA Inf. 643 (1963). These opinions, however, reveal little about what would constitute appropriate circumstances in which a lawyer could reasonably expect to represent both lender and buyer adequately.

12. One of our precedents, after noting generally that a lawyer may "sometimes" represent more than one party to a real estate transaction, goes on to consider the case of two lawyers at the same firm representing lender and seller. On the question of consentability, the opinion notes:

> "The typical seller in a residential real estate transaction is relatively unsophisticated when compared to the institutional lender who, by its size, power, and business potential to the law firm, may have an inherently stronger relationship with the lawyer. This imbalance could interfere with the lawyer's ability to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client, implicating Rule 1.7(b)(1)."

N.Y. State 867 ¶10 (2011) (citation and footnote omitted).

13. The typical buyer in a residential real estate transaction, like the typical seller, would likely be relatively unsophisticated when compared to the institutional lender. This consideration is a factor weighing against the consentability of the conflict in representing lender and buyer, just as it weighed against the consentability of representing lender and seller in N.Y. State 867.

14. The current inquiry presents even stronger factors against consentability. It would be an understatement to say that the lender carries a greater "business potential" for the inquiring lawyer. It is clear from the inquiry that the inquiring lawyer intends to represent the lender on a regular basis, and hopes to gain far more in fees from that lender than from any individual buyer. Even in an individual transaction, the inquiring lawyer's fee for services to the lender is substantially larger than the fee for services to the buyer. Moreover, the lender proposes to pay not only its own fee, but also most of the fee for the services to the buyer, and it proposes to tout this arrangement in a promotional campaign so as to attract buyers in larger numbers. Each of these features could only increase the lender's importance as a client to the inquiring lawyer.

15. Given the proposed arrangements, a lawyer could not reasonably believe that he or she could competently and diligently represent both the lender and the buyer in the transaction. The conflict is therefore nonconsentable.[63]

16. The inquiry also addresses the permissibility of the proposed arrangements for payment of the lawyer's fees. Rule 1.8(f) governs the circumstances in which lawyer who represents a client may accept compensation from a third party. Such arrangements are permissible only if they meet certain conditions including informed consent and freedom from interference with the lawyer's independent professional judgment. The proposed arrangement could raise questions under this rule for reasons similar to those that lead to our conclusion of a nonconsentable conflict. Additional questions yet may arise from the proposal to have the buyer pay the legal fee not to the lawyer, but rather to the lender, which will "provide" representation. See N.Y. Jud. Law § 495 (corporations may not furnish attorneys or counsel or render legal services). We need not reach any of these questions, however, in light of our conclusion that under the circumstances of the inquiry, the lawyer may not represent both buyer and lender.

CONCLUSION:

17. In a series of residential real estate transactions involving the same lender, which generates business by paying most of the buyers' legal fees as well as its own, it would be a nonconsentable conflict of interest for a lawyer, who regularly represents the lender in these transactions, also to represent the buyers.

63 Another ethics committee, having occasion to consider a similar question under the prior Code of Professional Responsibility, reached a similar conclusion:

> "The differing interests of a purchaser and a lender in the same real estate transaction typically cannot be adequately represented by the same attorney. As in situations where an attorney acts as both a real estate broker and an attorney, an inherent conflict of interest arises when the attorney's fee depends upon the closing of the transaction. An attorney representing a lender and a purchaser cannot best serve the interest of the purchaser if the attorney's judgment is tainted by his incentive to earn a fee from the lender, which is often contingent on closing.. . . . It is also readily apparent that the lender and the purchaser may sometimes have significantly differing interests in the details and structure of the transaction. As a result, the lawyer's loyalty will be divided, affecting his independent judgment on behalf of the purchaser client or lender client . . . ."

Nassau County 98-10 (citations omitted). The committee found that the differing interests of the two clients "cannot be readily reconciled" and that in a typical real estate transaction, the conflict is not consentable. We do not reach that general question, but address only the facts presented by this inquiry.

TOPIC: Bar Association soliciting members for contributions and members making such contributions to pay for portraits of retiring but still serving judges, which will hang in the courthouse to honor such judges.

DIGEST: It is permissible for a Bar Association to solicit contributions and for its members to make contributions for the purpose of defraying the costs of commissioning portraits of retiring judges who will still serve on the bench, where the portraits are a means of honoring the judges and the actual gift is made to the court, not to an individual judge.

RULES OF PROFESSIONAL CONDUCT: 3.5(a) and 8.4

CODE OF JUDICIAL CONDUCT: § 100.4(D)(5)

QUESTION:

1. The inquiring attorney is a member of a local bar association. The bar association wishes to honor a retiring Supreme Court Justice by commissioning a portrait of the Justice which would hang in the courthouse. Despite retirement, the retiring Justice would be likely to continue to serve through certification. The Bar Association would like to solicit its members for contributions to defray the costs of the portrait. May the members properly make such contributions?

FACTS:

2. As described above, the bar association would like to ask its members to contribute to the costs of commissioning and hanging portraits of retiring but still serving Supreme Court Justices as a way of honoring the Justices for their service. The portraits would be a gift to the court, not to any individual judge. Each member would determine whether and how much to contribute, with anticipated donations being in the range of $50 to $150. Contributing members would be recognized by announcement in an Association newsletter and/or at a Bar Association function.

OPINION:

3. Rule 3.5(a)(1) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") states:

> A lawyer shall not: (1) seek to or cause another person to influence a judge, official or employee of a tribunal by means prohibited by law or give or lend anything of value to such judge, official, or employee of a tribunal when the recipient is prohibited from accepting the gift or loan . . . [Emphasis added.]

4. Rule 8.4(d) & (f) state:

A lawyer or law firm shall not:

(d) engage in conduct that is prejudicial to the administration of justice;

(f) knowingly assist a judge or judicial officer in conduct that is a violation of applicable rules of judicial conduct or other law. . . . [Emphasis added.]

5. The starting point of our analysis, therefore, is to ask what restrictions on accepting gifts are placed on judges by the Code of Judicial Conduct. Section 100.4 (D)(5) of the Rules of the Chief Administrative Judge (often referred to as the "Code of Judicial Conduct") provides:

(5) A judge shall not accept, and shall urge members of the judge's family residing in the judge's household not to accept, a gift, bequest, favor or loan from anyone except:

(a) a gift incident to a public testimonial, books, tapes and other resource materials supplied by publishers on a complimentary basis for official use, or an invitation to the judge and the judge's spouse or guest to attend a bar-related function or an activity devoted to the improvement of the law, the legal system or the administration of justice;

(b) a gift, award or benefit incident to the business, profession or other separate activity of a spouse or other family member of a judge residing in the judge's household, including gifts, awards and benefits for the use of both the spouse or other family member and the judge (as spouse or family member), provided the gift, award or benefit could not reasonably be perceived as intended to influence the judge in the performance of judicial duties;

(c) ordinary social hospitality;

(d) a gift from a relative or friend, for a special occasion such as a wedding, anniversary or birthday, if the gift is fairly commensurate with the occasion and the relationship;

(e) a gift, bequest, favor or loan from a relative or close personal friend whose appearance or interest in a case would in any event require disqualification under section 100.3(E);

(f) a loan from a lending institution in its regular course of business on the same terms generally available to persons who are not judges;

(g) a scholarship or fellowship awarded on the same terms and based on the same criteria applied to other applicants; or

(h) any other gift, bequest, favor or loan, only if: the donor is not a party or other person who has come or is likely to come or whose interests have come or are likely to come before the judge; and if its value exceeds $150.00, the judge reports it in the same manner as the judge reports compensation in Section 100.4(H).

6. First, we note that under the facts described in the inquiry, no tangible gift at all is being made to any judge. An Association member who contributes to the Association to defray expenses for a portrait is making a gift to the Association, not to any individual judge. The Association, in turn, donates the portrait to the courthouse, thus making a tangible gift to the court. That gift is in honor of a retiring judge, but is not made to the judge. All the retiring judge receives is the honor of having the portrait painted and hung in the courthouse. We doubt that such an honor is a "thing of value" within the meaning of Rule 3.5(a)(1). If the portrait is not a "thing of value" to the judge, then contributing funds to help pay for the portrait does not violate Rule 3.5(a)(1).

7. An examination of a series of Advisory Opinions issued by the New York Advisory Committee on Judicial Ethics leads to the conclusion that a retiring Judge would not violate the Code of Judicial Conduct by accepting such an honor. NY Jud. Adv. Op. 06-67 points out that a judge may not solicit gifts, but here there is no solicitation by or on behalf of the retiring Justice.

8. NY Jud. Adv. Op. 91-50 opines that the Code of Judicial Conduct does not prohibit a judge from accepting a gift of "nominal" value, made as a token of appreciation from a high school student for the judge's efforts in explaining the law to the student during the course of an extended school sponsored visit to the court.

9. NY Jud. Adv. Op. 06-171 concludes that a judge may properly accept a free membership from a bar association, citing the exception in §100.4 D)(5)(a) for "a gift incident to a public testimonial, books, tapes and other resource materials supplied by publishers on a complimentary basis for official use, or an invitation to the judge and the judge's spouse or guest to attend a bar-related function or an activity devoted to the improvement of the law, the legal system or the administration of justice." Here, the hanging of the judge's portrait in the courthouse, if it is a gift to the judge, is "nominal" within the meaning of NY Jud. Adv. Op. 91-50, and it is "incident to a public testimonial" within the meaning of §100.4 D)(5)(a).

10. NY Jud. Adv. Op. 93-42 approves of a town justice accepting a recording system from the district attorney for use in the courtroom. Here, as in that situation, the gift is to the court and not to the judge personally.

11. The Preamble to Part 100 of the Rules of the Chief Administrative Judge states that "[t]he rules governing judicial conduct are rules of reason." That statement, combined with (and illustrated by) the reasoning of the cited opinions from the Commission on Judicial Conduct, leads us to conclude that hanging a retiring judge's portrait in the courthouse would not implicate any improper conduct by the judge being honored with the portrait. Therefore, a lawyer could properly make a contribution to the Bar Association for purposes of defraying the expenses of the portrait without violating Rule 3.5(a)(1).

12. Furthermore, we believe that a gift made to the court rather than to the individual judge, "in connection with a public testimonial," could not reasonably be expected to influence a judge or interfere with the administration of justice. Accordingly, we conclude there is no impropriety in the Association soliciting the described contributions from its members and no ethical violation by a lawyer who makes such a contribution.

CONCLUSION:

13. Lawyers who belong to a Bar Association may contribute to the Association for the purpose of defraying the costs of commissioning portraits of retiring judges who will still serve on the bench, where the portraits are a means of honoring the judges and the actual gift (the portrait) is made to the court, not to an individual judge.

TOPIC: Law firm succession planning, fee-sharing, offering services to other lawyers.

DIGEST: A firm's offering of succession/contingent planning services to other lawyers is neither an "advertisement" nor "solicitation" under the Rules. One attorney's agreement to refer a matter to another attorney in the event of becoming unable to practice, would not create an association between the two attorneys for purposes of the fee-sharing rule either at the time such agreement is executed or triggered, unless and until the amount of work being transitioned to the second attorney becomes significant. An attorney's successful efforts to cultivate a client relationship are not "services" under the fee-sharing Rule and thus not a legitimate basis for dividing fees proportionately.

RULES: 1.0(a) and (h), 1.5(g), 7.3(b).

FACTS:

1. A law firm proposes to offer the following service to solo practitioner "Planning Attorneys": assist them in implementing a contingency, continuity and succession "Plan" in which the planning attorney contracts with an "Assisting Attorney" to perform certain functions for the Planning Attorney in the event of the Planning Attorney's inability to practice.

2. The firm further proposes to target communications regarding the services at attorneys likely to be interested in the planning services.

QUESTION:

3. The inquiring firm asks whether each proposed communication would be regulated as an "advertisement" under the Rules, and if so, whether it would be regulated as a "solicitation." If a solicitation, the firm also asks whether it would nevertheless be permissible in certain alternative forms such as in-person, phone or mail.

4. The firm also asks whether the execution of a Plan would thereby create an association between the Planning and Assistant Attorneys so that Rule 1.5(g) is not implicated, or, if not, whether such association would arise if/when the Planning Attorney becomes unable to practice and the Assisting Attorney steps in to assist the client.

5. Finally, the firm asks whether an attorney's successful efforts to "cultivate" a client relationship qualify as "services" under Rule 1.5(g)(1) and are thus a legitimate basis for dividing fees so that the "proportion" takes into account such cultivation efforts.

OPINION:

6. Rule 1.0(a), the definition of "advertisement", states that it "does not include communications to existing clients or other lawyers." (Emphasis added). Because the contemplated communications would be solely to other lawyers, they would not constitute "advertisements." Rule 7.3(b) states that a "solicitation" is "any advertisement" that meets certain criteria; in other words, it is a communication that not only meets the criteria for being an "advertisement" but also certain additional criteria." By definition, a communication that is not an advertisement is not a solicitation." Rule 7.3, Cmt. [1].

7. Because Rule 1.5(g) provides that "A lawyer shall not divide a fee for legal services with another lawyer who is not associated in the same law firm" the following question arises: would the Planning and Assisting Attorney become "associated in a law firm" for purposes of Rule 1.5(g), upon execution of a Plan or, if not, would they later become "associated in a law firm" when the Assisting Attorney, pursuant to the Plan, takes over a client matter for the Planning Attorney? We conclude that neither scenario, on its own, would give rise to association for purposes of Rule 1.5(g).

8. As we noted in N.Y. State 715 (1999), the term "associated" is not defined. N.Y. City 2007-2 opined that "the touchstones for determining association" for conflict imputation purposes are the nature of the relationship, and, significantly, access to client confidential information. It seems clear that neither a referral, nor an agreement to refer, on its own gives rise to association because such acts do not create a level of affiliation or information access that could reasonably be construed as a "law firm" under Rule 1.0(h). However, if the Planning Attorney and Assisting Attorney were to hold themselves out to the public as a "firm" or were to share each other's client files generally (whether electronically or in paper form), they would more likely be construed as associated for the purpose of Rule 1.5(g). So if the Planning Attorney's inability to practice were to trigger in the Plan a comprehensive merger of the Planning Attorney's firm and the Assisting Attorney's firm, then the two attorneys would become "associated" for purposes of the Rule. Overall, the more time the Assisting Attorney is called upon to assist the Planning Attorney, and the greater the volume of work the Assisting Attorney receives from the Planning Attorney, the higher the likelihood that the two attorneys will become "associated" for purposes of Rule 1.5(g).

9. Finally, regarding an attorney's efforts to "cultivate" a relationship, we conclude that such efforts do not qualify as "services performed by" such lawyer for the purpose of determining a proportional division of fees. It seems clear that the intent of Rule 1.5(g)(1) is, in the event fee-sharing lawyers decide to qualify for fee-sharing through a proportional division, that the division be based on services performed for the client's benefit.

10. We note a Kansas Supreme Court case on the issue of fee-sharing, in which that court, construing Model Code of Professional Responsibility Disciplinary Rule 2-107(A), stated that "We are convinced that merely to recommend another lawyer or to refer a case to another lawyer and to do nothing further in the handling of the case cannot be construed as performing a legal service. . . The service and responsibility referred to in DR 2-107 before a lawyer is entitled to a division of fees, must relate to actual participation in or handling of the case. The rule would be meaningless if this were not so." Palmer v. Breyfogle, 535 P.2d 955, 967 (Kan. 1975).

CONCLUSION:

11. A firm's offering of succession/contingent planning services to other lawyers is neither an "advertisement" nor "solicitation" under the Rules. A Planning Attorney's agreement to refer a matter to an Assisting Attorney in the event of becoming unable to practice, would not create an association between the two attorneys for purposes of Rule 1.5(g) either at the time the Plan is ex*ecuted or triggered*, unless and until the firms truly merged. One attorney's efforts to "cultivate" a relationship leading to retaining a client are not "services" under Rule 1.5(g)(1) and thus not a legitimate basis for dividing fees proportionately.

TOPIC: Of counsel relationship with out-of-state lawyer; reference on letterhead and website

DIGEST: A law firm may have an "of counsel" relationship with a non-New York lawyer admitted in another jurisdiction and must disclose any jurisdictional limitations on the ability of any lawyer associated with the firm to practice law in this State. The form of such disclosure may be either "not admitted in New York", or "admitted only in XX State."

RULES: 5.1; 7.1; 7.5(a) (4); 7.5(d)

FACTS:

1. The inquiring law firm has its main presence in New York State and maintains a smaller office in another state. The out-of-state office is managed by a lawyer admitted in that state and not admitted in New York who has an "of counsel" relationship with the firm. The firm's existing website discloses the admitting jurisdictions of all lawyers in the firm in the positive (e.g., "Admitted in New York", or "Admitted in XX").

QUESTION:

2. May a New York law firm have an "of counsel" relationship with a lawyer who is not admitted in New York?

3. If so, how should the relationship and the jurisdictional limitations be disclosed on the letterhead and websites of the law firm?

OPINION:

4. The fundamental responsibility imposed on all lawyers when engaging in public communication about the nature of their practice is found in Rule 7.1, mandating that lawyers refrain from making, or participating in the use of, any statements that are false, deceptive or misleading. Letterheads (primarily governed by Rule 7.5) and websites used by lawyers must comply with this Rule. Information that may be set forth is enumerated in Rule 7.1(b); this list is "suggestive of the type of information that may but need not in all cases be included." N.Y. State 704 (1998).

5. A New York law firm may consist of a sole practitioner and may have more than one office. N.Y. State 814 (2007). A lawyer or law firm may also have partners based in offices outside New York. Opinion 814 reminds lawyers of the obligation contained in Rule 5.1(a); the New York based lawyer must adequately supervise the work of all lawyers in the firm and make sure procedures are in place to insure the practice is conducted in a professional and ethical manner.

6. The range of relationships among lawyers practicing under a firm is broad and has grown in variety over the years. The Rules do not discuss each of the possibilities but do contain a limitation on the use of the "of counsel" designation. Rule 7.5(a)(4) states in part, "A lawyer or law firm may be designated "Of Counsel" on a letterhead if there is a continuing relationship with a lawyer or law firm, other than as a partner or associate." Whether the relationship meets the "continuing relationship" test is fact-specific and no additional information is provided in this inquiry. Thus, as long as the inquiring firm is satisfied that the "continuing relationship" test is met, it may have an "of counsel" relationship with a lawyer.

7. Our prior opinions have recognized that a New York law firm may include lawyers not admitted to practice in New York. In N.Y. State 704, we held that a law firm with New York and non-New York lawyers could practice in New York without violating New York ethical obligations. N.Y. State 814 also permitted a partnership with a lawyer admitted in another jurisdiction. That Opinion also stated, "[n]othing in the Code, however, states that partnership is the only permissible professional relationship between a New York lawyer and an out-of-state lawyer or firm." Also, in N.Y. State. 864 (2011), we recognized that a New York lawyer could affiliate and share fees with a lawyer not admitted in New York. Based on these Opinions the answer to the first question is yes; a New York law firm may have an "of counsel" relationship with a lawyer not admitted in New York.

8. The second question raised by this inquiry is also addressed by Opinion 814. Beginning again with the fundamental principle – that none of the information or lack of it, be false, deceptive or misleading – the New York firm's letterhead and website does not need to disclose the precise nature of the relationship of the out-of-state lawyer to the New York firm. However Rule 7.5(d) does prohibit a relationship "among lawyers licensed in different jurisdictions unless all enumerations of the members and associates of the firm on its letterhead and in other permissible listings make clear the jurisdictional limitations on those members and associates of the firm not licensed to practice in all listed jurisdictions." As noted in Opinion 814, this Rule "does not state expressly, however, how such limitations shall be expressed."

9. This inquiry posits that the New York firm has its main office in New York and a much smaller one in XX State. Thus it would be sufficiently clear to use either statement of limitation, "admitted only in XX" or "not admitted in New York" N.Y. Opinion 434 (1976). To comply with Rule 7.5(d), it is important to use such limiting terminology as "not admitted" or "admitted only". Either phrasing is sufficient to convey the jurisdictional limitations on the lawyers in, or associated with the New York firm.

CONCLUSION:

10. A law firm may have an "of counsel" relationship with a lawyer admitted only in a jurisdiction other than New York but does not need to disclose the precise nature of that relationship on its letterhead or websites.

11. The law firm must disclose any jurisdictional limitations on the ability of any lawyer associated with the firm to practice law in New York State. The form of such disclosure may be either "not admitted in New York", or "admitted only in XX State."

OPINION 956 (01/14/2013)

TOPIC: Communication with unrepresented party; taking deposition of unrepresented party; deceptive and/or fraudulent conduct at client's request.

DIGEST: It would be misleading for a lawyer to depose an unrepresented party to a lawsuit, who is not aware of the lawsuit without disclosing that the lawyer's client's interests are adverse to the unrepresented party. The lawyer cannot provide advice to the unrepresented party but is required to tell the party to obtain counsel.

RULES: 1.0(i), 1.2(d), 1.4 (a), 1.16(c), 4.2, 4.3, 8.4(a)(c)(d)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is an attorney who commenced a lawsuit on behalf of his client. The lawsuit names two parties as defendants, Party A and Party B. Party A has been served with the lawsuit; Party B has not been served, nor is Party B aware of the pending lawsuit.

2. The client has asked the inquirer to depose Party B before serving the complaint. In order to facilitate this, the client will bring Party B to the inquirer's office. The inquirer believes that since Party B is unaware of the lawsuit Party B may testify to Party B's disadvantage.

3. The inquirer asks whether it is ethically permissible to take Party B's deposition when in fact Party B is not aware that Party B is a named defendant to the lawsuit.

4. The inquirer also asks whether taking the deposition under the circumstances suggested by his client would render Party B's testimony inadmissible.

QUESTION:

5. Do the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") prohibit an attorney from deposing, at his client's request, a party who is unaware that the party is a named defendant in a pending lawsuit?

OPINION:

6. The question of whether the lawyer is permitted to conduct a deposition under the above described circumstances requires a two-step analysis: 1) whether the communications between the inquirer and the party to be deposed could lead to a misunderstanding and 2) whether the interests of Party B, the prospective deponent, are adverse to the client. As part of that analysis, the Rules' prohibition against a lawyer's engaging in conduct that involves "dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation" must also be considered.

7. This Committee does not opine on questions of law, and therefore will not opine on whether any deposition testimony taken of Party B would be admissible in court.

8. Apparently, in order to gain some sort of advantage the client has asked the inquirer to depose Party B without disclosing to Party B the existence of a pending lawsuit against Party B. Clearly the conduct requested by the inquirer's client could lead to a misunderstanding on Party B's part about the purpose of the deposition.

9. The Rules contemplate the possibility that lawyers may have communications with persons with interests adverse to their clients, both those represented by counsel as well as unrepresented persons.

10. Rule 4.3 sets forth the rule for lawyers communicating with unrepresented persons and provides as follows:

> "In communicating on behalf of a client with a person who is not represented by counsel, a lawyer shall not state or imply that the lawyer is disinterested. When the lawyer knows or reasonably should know that the unrepresented person misunderstands the lawyer's role in the matter, the lawyer shall make reasonable efforts to correct the misunderstanding. The lawyer shall not give legal advice to an unrepresented person other than the advice to secure counsel if the lawyer knows or reasonably should know that the interests of such person are or have a reasonable possibility of being in conflict with the interests of the client."

11. Comment [1] of Rule 4.3 further states:

> "An unrepresented person might assume that a lawyer is disinterested in loyalties or is a disinterested authority on the law even when the lawyer represents a client. In order to avoid a misunderstanding, a lawyer will typically need to identify the lawyer's client, and where necessary, explain that the client has interests opposed to those of the unrepresented person."

12. In this instance, in accordance with Rule 4.3, the lawyer must explain the lawyer's role to the unrepresented person. Specifically, that the lawyer represents the client and that Party B's interests are adverse to the client's interests. Further, because the inquirer also knows that Party B's interests are adverse to the client the lawyer should advise the unrepresented Party B to obtain independent counsel.

13. This conclusion is consistent with prior ethics opinions concerning what information a lawyer may communicate to an unrepresented party. In some cases, in order to be sure that the unrepresented party understands the need for counsel, lawyers have been directed "to give non-controvertible information about the law to enable the other party to understand the need for independent counsel." N.Y. State 728 (2000). See also N.Y. State 477 (1977), N.Y. City Bar Op. 2009-02 (2009).

14. In the above analysis we have assumed that Party B is unrepresented. If in fact, Party B is represented by counsel, and the inquirer is aware of the representation, then Rule 4.2 would dictate the inquirer's communications with her.

15. Rule 4.2(a) states:

> "In representing a client, a lawyer shall not communicate or cause another to communicate about the subject of the representation with a party the lawyer knows to be represented by another lawyer in the matter, unless the lawyer has the prior consent of the other lawyer or is authorized to do so by law."

16. As such, if the inquirer knows that Party B is represented by a lawyer, then the inquirer is prohibited from communicating with Party B, including taking her deposition, without her lawyer's consent.

17. The inquiry, however, adds another dimension to the attorney's obligation because the inquirer's client seems to be asking the inquirer to depose Party B under false pretenses and the inquirer must also be mindful to avoid engaging in deceptive or fraudulent conduct.

18. The inquirer has indicated that the client will ask Party B to come to the inquirer lawyer's office under the false pretense that Party B will be assisting the client when in fact such assistance will be provided at Party B's expense as the client obtains information to build a case in support of the client and against Party B.

19. Pursuant to Rule 8.4(c) of the Rules of Professional Conduct, a lawyer is prohibited from engaging in conduct that involves "dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation." Accordingly, the proposed conduct without the above-mentioned disclosure would be prohibited by Rule 8.4(c) as it involves deceit and misrepresentation.

20. Further, the inquirer's actions in conducting such a deposition under the suggested pretense would also violate Rule 8.4(a) if the lawyer knowingly aids or assists his client in violating or attempting to violate the Rules. Specifically Rule 8.4(a) provides that a lawyer shall not "violate or attempt to violate the Rules of Professional Conduct, knowingly assist or induce another to do so, or do so through acts of another."

21. Rule 1.4(a)(5) states: "A lawyer shall consult with the client about any relevant limitation on the lawyer's conduct when the lawyer knows that the client expects assistance not permitted by these Rules or other law."

22. We are not privy to what the client would tell Party B to bring Party B to the inquirer's office to be deposed or even if the client would tell Party B about the proposed deposition. Whether or not the proposed conduct rises to the level of fraud is a question of fact beyond the scope of this committee; however, we believe it is prudent to alert the inquirer to the definition of fraud in Rule 1.0(i) and the prohibition against assisting a client in conduct the lawyer knows is fraudulent.

23. Rule 1.2 (d) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") states that:

> A lawyer shall not counsel a client to engage, or assist a client, in conduct that the lawyer knows is illegal or fraudulent, except that the lawyer may discuss the legal consequences of any proposed course of conduct with a client.

24. The lawyer must advise his client that the proposed conduct, without the aforementioned disclosure, would be in violation of the Rules. The inquirer should advise the client that the inquirer will have to disclose to Party B, as stated above, the lawyer's role in the matter and will need to advise Party B to retain counsel.

25. If the client persists in demanding that the lawyer proceed with a proposed course of conduct that is fraudulent, the inquirer must exercise his right to withdraw from representing the client pursuant to Rule 1.16(c)(13), which provides that "a lawyer may withdraw from representing a client when the client insists that the lawyer pursue a course of conduct which is illegal or prohibited under these Rules." See also Rule 1.16(b)(1) (requiring withdrawal when lawyer knows or reasonably should know that the representation will result in a violation of the Rules or of law).

CONCLUSION:

26. It would be misleading for the inquirer to depose Party B, an unrepresented party, without disclosing that the lawyer is not neutral and that Party B's interests are adverse to the inquirer's client. In addition, because Party B's interests are adverse to the interests of the inquirer's client, the inquirer would be required to inform Party B of the right to obtain counsel. The Rules also require that the inquirer advise his client that taking the deposition without the above disclosures to Party B would be prohibited by the Rules.

TOPIC: Nonprofit organization offering legal services and seeking grants to subsidize the legal services programs

DIGEST: A lawyer for a bona fide nonprofit organization may furnish legal services to beneficiaries of the organization as part of the organization's programs as long as the agency is complying with Judiciary Law § 495. However, the lawyer must obtain each client's consent for him to be compensated by the agency, the lawyer must not permit the organization to direct, regulate, or otherwise interfere with the lawyer's independent professional judgment in rendering legal services for clients, and the lawyer must protect the clients' confidential information. As long as the programs satisfy these criteria, the lawyer may assist the agency in seeking grants to support the agency's legal services programs.

RULES: 1.8(f), 5.4(c) & (d), 5.5(b), and 7.2(b)

FACTS:

1. The inquiring attorney is a salaried employee of a bona fide nonprofit credit counseling agency that is not a law firm. He has inquired whether he may ethically participate in two legal services programs that his employer would like to offer: (1) filing for bankruptcy protection for clients who are unable to do so outside of the agency because of their financial situation, and (2) advising seniors concerning whether they should join supplemental needs pooled income trusts previously established by a separate 501(c)(3) agency under the applicable provisions of the New York State Social Services Law by entering into "joinder" agreements.

2. The credit counseling agency presently advises debtors on whether they will benefit from payment plans with the debtors' creditors. The agency would like to add legal services to enhance the agency's role in providing financial solutions, primarily to assist the elderly or others in need of social security assistance. Since this market is underserved, the agency intends to assist individuals with Representative Payee services as well as to form a bill pay service for those who are incapable of handling their own finances or who lack assistance of others. The agency has not established any fee arrangement for the proposed services. However, in light of the agency's mission, the agency plans to keep fees to a minimum so that it can serve those who cannot afford private representation but are not sufficiently indigent to qualify for free legal aid. The agency plans to seek grant funding opportunities to assist it in subsidizing the legal services programs.

3. If the proposed programs are implemented, the inquiring lawyer will furnish legal services to the agency's clients. Each client for whom legal services are provided will sign an engagement letter that specifies that the agency itself will not give legal advice or represent clients and that the client-lawyer relationship is only between the client and the attorney. The agency's board of directors will adopt a policy prohibiting the agency from controlling the lawyer's representation of clients.

QUESTIONS:

4. May a lawyer employed by a nonprofit credit counseling agency assist the agency in offering legal services programs?

5. May a lawyer employed by a nonprofit credit counseling agency assist the agency in seeking grants to support the agency's legal services programs?

OPINION:

Legal Services Offered by a Nonprofit Organization

6. Rule 5.4(d) prohibits a lawyer from practicing with or in the form of an entity authorized to practice law for profit if a nonlawyer owns any interest in the entity, is a member, corporate director or officer of the entity, or has the right to direct or control the professional judgment of the lawyer. However, Rule 5.4(d) does not extend to nonprofit organizations.

7. New York Judiciary Law § 495 prohibits corporations from practicing law, but New York Judiciary Law § 495(7) carves out exceptions for (1) organizations that offer prepaid legal services, (2) nonprofit organizations that furnish legal services as an "incidental activity" in furtherance of some other "primary purpose," and (3) organizations whose primary purpose is to furnish legal services to indigent persons. Judiciary Law § 496 requires organizations exempt under § 495(7) to report and annually update the following information to the Appellate Division: a statement describing the nature and purposes of the organization, composition of the governing body, type of legal services offered, and names and addresses of any attorneys employed by the organization.

8. Therefore, nonprofit organizations authorized to practice law under Judiciary Law §§ 495(7) and 496 and organizations that offer prepaid legal services and furnish legal services to the indigent are not subject to Rule 5.4(d)'s prohibition against lawyers working at an entity where a nonlawyer is "a member, corporate director or officer thereof."

9. The credit counseling agency is a nonprofit organization operated primarily to provide financial counseling to those in need of assistance. Its services include credit counseling, budget planning, debt management plans, bankruptcy counseling and advocacy of pooled income trusts established by others. In furtherance of these activities, the agency proposes to furnish legal services to help clients seek bankruptcy protection and to review joinder agreements that will enable seniors to join existing pooled income trusts. If the agency's legal services constitute "incidental activities" in furtherance of some other "primary purpose," the agency is exempt from the prohibitions of Judiciary Law § 495 by virtue of subdivision (7). In Paskowski v. DiBenedetto, 184 Misc.2d 34, 705 N.Y.S.2d 521 (Family Court, Rockland County, 2000), the court held that a legal services program established by a nonprofit community organization to provide emergency housing and outreach programs to victims of domestic violence is exempt under Judiciary Law § 495(7) because it offers legal counseling to those who use the shelter's services.

10. Similarly, the credit counseling agency that employs the inquiring attorney wishes to offer legal solutions that follow from their other services: representation of a client in a bankruptcy proceeding and in reviewing and advising the client concerning the joinder agreements that they must sign to join existing pooled income supplemental needs trusts. This Committee does not render opinions on questions of law such as the interpretation and application of Judiciary Law § 495, but for purposes of this opinion we will assume that the agency that employs the inquiring attorney is not violating § 495. If the agency is violating § 495, then the inquiring attorney may not assist the agency in offering or providing legal services because he would be assisting a nonlawyer (the agency) in the unauthorized practice of law, in violation of Rule 5.5(b) ("A lawyer shall not aid a nonlawyer in the unauthorized practice of law").

11. Even if a nonprofit organization is in compliance with Judiciary Law § 495, however, lawyers working for the organization are still required to comply with the applicable Rules of Professional Conduct. Three rules are especially relevant here. Rule 1.8(f) provides that a lawyer shall not accept compensation (or anything else of value) from a third party for representing a client unless "(1) the client gives informed consent; (2) there is no interference with the lawyer's independent professional judgment or with the client-lawyer relationship; and (3) the client's confidential information is protected as required by Rule 1.6." Rule 5.4(c) prohibits a lawyer from permitting a person who recommends, employs or pays the lawyer to render legal service for another to direct or regulate the lawyer's professional judgment in rendering such legal services. And Rule 7.2(b)(4) permits a lawyer to be employed or paid by a "bona fide" organization to furnish legal services to others, so long as (inter alia) there is no interference with the lawyer's exercise of independent professional judgment.

12. The Code predecessors of Rule 1.6 and 5.4(c) were applied in N.Y. City 1997-2, which concluded that a lawyer employed by a social services agency to represent clients must provide independent and competent representation and preserve client confidences in accordance with the ethics rules, without allowing it to direct or regulate the lawyer's independent professional judgment. We agree with that aspect of Opinion 1997-2.

Seeking Grant Funding Opportunities

13. The agency proposes to seek grant funding opportunities to assist it in paying for the legal services programs. As noted above, Rule 1.8(f) prohibits a lawyer from accepting compensation for representing a client from one other than the client unless the client gives informed consent, there is no interference with the lawyer's independent professional judgment or with the client-lawyer relationship, and the client's confidential information is protected as required by Rule 1.6. Rule 1.8(f) does not prohibit the agency from seeking grants to support the proposed legal services programs as long as the grants are not tied to any particular client's legal services, the grantors do not interfere with the lawyer's exercise of professional judgment, and neither the lawyer nor the agency reveal client confidential information in the grant applications or in any communications regarding how the grant money is being used.

CONCLUSION:

14. A lawyer for a bona fide nonprofit organization may furnish legal services to beneficiaries of the organization as part of the organization's programs as long as the agency is complying with Judiciary Law § 495. However, the lawyer must obtain each client's consent for him to be compensated by the agency, the lawyer must not permit the organization to direct, regulate, or otherwise interfere with the lawyer's independent professional judgment in rendering legal services for clients, and the lawyer must protect the clients' confidential information. As long as the programs satisfy these criteria, the lawyer may assist the agency in seeking grants to support the agency's legal services programs.

TOPIC: Lawyer's Acceptance of a Finder's Fee for Introducing Clients to Other Clients

DIGEST: A lawyer may accept a finder's fee for introducing clients and prospective clients to prospective investors, whether clients or not, provided that, in doing so, the lawyer complies with the Rules of Professional Conduct, including those governing protection of confidential information, avoidance of conflicts, business transactions with clients, competent advice on the applicability of privileges in the course of performing the non-legal services, and adherence to the rules on excessive fees.

RULES: 1.0(j), 1.1(a), 1.4(a), 1.4(b), 1.5(a), 1.5(b), 1.5(c), 1.5(e), 1.6(a), 1.7(a), 1.7(b), 1.8(a), 1.9(a), 1.18(b), 5.7(a), 5.7(c)

QUESTION:

1. The inquiring lawyer asks whether a lawyer may accept a "finder's fee" for introducing potential investors (including existing, former or prospective clients) to a client or prospective client seeking capital for a start-up business.

FACTS:

2. It is not uncommon for lawyers to introduce current, former, and prospective clients to each other in the ordinary course of business, for both general and specific purposes, in intimate gatherings and large ones. Such networking is part of the commerce of the law, and yet important ethical issues hover over the practice. Asking for separate compensation for the practice sharpens these issues.

OPINION:

3. We start with Rule 5.7, which governs a lawyer's responsibilities regarding non-legal services. Rule 5.7(c) says that, for purposes of the Rule, "nonlegal services" shall mean those services "that lawyers may lawfully provide and that are not prohibited as an unauthorized practice of law when provided by a nonlawyer." We do not opine either on the legality of match-making exercises – investment advisors and brokers who engage in similar activities are usually subject to regulatory systems – or on what constitutes the unauthorized practice of law. Nevertheless, common experience teaches that the act of introducing one client to another for a purely business purpose is not a "legal service" in the classic understanding of that phrase, but instead a "nonlegal service" that lawyers commonly perform, and that nonlawyers do so too, without fear of sanction for want of a law license. Subject to the caveats below, we conclude that the Rules of Professional Conduct permit such an arrangement.

4. Rule 5.7(a) says that, when a lawyer provides non-legal services to clients or other persons, then the lawyer is subject to the Rules of Professional Conduct if (1) the non-legal services are not "distinct" from the legal services the lawyer otherwise provides to the client or prospective client, or (2), even if distinct, the recipient of the services "could reasonably believe that the nonlegal services are subject to the attorney-client relationship." Rule 5.7(a) (1)-(2); see N.Y. State 860 (2011). The main difference between the two is that, if the non-legal services are distinct from the legal services but susceptive of client confusion about the existence of an attorney-client relationship, then the lawyer must explain in writing that the services are not legal services and hence not subject to the protections attaching to an attorney-client relationship. Rule 5.7(a) (4). The latter is true whether or not the lawyer intends to perform the non-legal services through the lawyer's firm, as appears to be the inquirer's situation, or through a separate entity that the lawyer owns or controls. Id.; see Rule 5.7(a)(3).

5. The inquiring lawyer intends to offer legal services to start-up enterprises seeking venture capital which the lawyer hopes to represent. The introductions for which the lawyer would be paid a finder's fee are therefore part and parcel of the lawyer's business plan. This is not uncommon. "Providing legal representation to a client who wishes to buy or sell a business entity may naturally lend itself to assistance by the law firm in helping to locate a seller or a buyer for the client. Through social, business, or professional connections, a lawyer may know of a potential buyer or seller to introduce to a law firm client. Assistance by a law firm in locating a buyer or seller of a business entity for a law firm client is a service related to the lawyer's representation of the client." Ohio 2003-1 (2003).

6. In such circumstances, the lawyer is providing both legal and non-legal services to clients and prospective clients, but services inextricably intertwined with the lawyer's legal practice. The lawyer hopes that, by matching a client to a prospective investor, the introduction will lead to a transaction in which the lawyer will earn a legal fee. This factor, together with the fact that the lawyer intends to act through the lawyer's firm and presumably law office, relieves us of the need to tarry on the question whether the non-legal services are "distinct" or not. The match-making services are clearly not distinct, and so the Rules of Professional Conduct fully apply to the activities. In our view, at least five of those Rules are of special importance to the inquirer's proposed course of action.

7. The first is the duty of confidentiality owed to clients, former clients, and prospective clients under, respectively, Rules 1.6(a), 1.9(a), and 1.18(b). In introducing a current, former, or prospective client to another client, the lawyer presumably must disclose confidential information about each that the lawyer is ordinarily bound to protect. The lawyer may not do so without the informed consent of the party who owns the information. This tutorial must start with the client in search of investors, and then, separately, must be repeated to any prospective, existing or former client the lawyer intends to approach. The lawyer must take care to explain to all the full ramifications of disclosing this information to another party, see Rule 1.0(j) (defining "informed consent"); Rule 1.4(b) (requiring a lawyer to explain a matter to the extent reasonable to allow the client to make an informed decision), and must exercise independent professional judgment on the protections, if any, needed to safeguard the information, see Rule 1.1(a) (lawyer must represent a client competently). Although not typically required for the disclosure of confidential information, a writing explaining the implications may advisably be included in the other written disclosures likely to be required in these circumstances.

8. The more acute considerations arise under a second set of Rules, those governing conflicts of interests. In its Opinion 98-03, the Illinois State Bar Association articulated the conflicts confronting a patent lawyer who, in that inquiry, proposed to pair client-inventors with client-investors/promoters. The Committee noted that the "firm's choices of individual investors to match with particular promoters could be influenced by the firm's own interest in maximizing its return on a transaction. Further, once a suggested match is made the firm will probably be involved in negotiating the ultimate business arrangement and drafting the necessary documents, which would involve the firm in representing two clients whose interests are adverse. Finally, if the firm will have a financial stake in the transaction as its fee for services [i.e., the finder's fee], the firm's interests could conflict with one or both clients." While warning that "it will not be possible for a lawyer to 'reasonably' believe that" every multiple representation is appropriate, the Committee nevertheless concluded that a lawyer could proceed if the lawyer met, among other things, the requirements of Rule 1.7(a).

9. The conflicts concerns will vary with the circumstances, all the permutations of which are beyond the scope of this opinion to address. One obvious possibility is that the lawyer enters into the finder's fee arrangement with the client seeking capital (say, Client A), which is the only client the lawyer intends to represent in any ensuing transaction. In this instance, the first step is to obtain the consent of both Client A and the proposed investor (Client B), confirmed in writing, if Client B is an existing client or a former or prospective client from which consent is required under the applicable Rule. This consent must make clear that the lawyer's duty of loyalty in the transaction is owed only to Client A, accompanied by such disclosures as may be necessary to obtain informed consent, among them the extent of the lawyer's relationships with Clients A and B, and terms and conditions of the lawyer's interest in the finder's fee, including whether payment of the fee is contingent upon closing of a transaction.

10. If the lawyer obtains informed consent from each, then the principal concern is Rule 1.7(a)(2). That Rule asks whether a "reasonable lawyer would conclude" that a "significant risk" exists that the lawyer's "own financial, business, property or other personal interests" – namely, the payment of the finder's fee – will adversely affect the lawyer's independent professional judgment. If, for example, the payment of a finder's fee is contingent upon the consummation of a transaction, this creates a personal and financial interest for the lawyer to close the deal apart from the payment of the lawyer's legal fee. Depending on the relationship between the amounts of the two fees at stake, the finder's fee could create a risk that the lawyer, in negotiating the transaction for Client A, will sacrifice independent professional judgment on the client's behalf in protecting Client A's legal interests in the deal. This scenario does not materially differ from a fee arrangement, permissible under the Rules in civil matters, providing for a success fee or premium in the event the transaction is successfully completed, one at times payable in equity or as a percentage of the transaction price. If a reasonable lawyer would conclude that, as in the success fee or premium scenario, no such significant risk exists that the lawyer will elevate personal interests over professional ones, then the lawyer may undertake the representation subject to the other requirements set forth below.

11. A considerably more problematic possibility is that the lawyer proposes to introduce the capital-seeking Client A to another of the lawyer's clients, Client B, and to represent both Clients A and B in the transaction. In this scenario, the lawyer not only has a personal interest conflict, but a competing and ongoing loyalty conflict as well. The amount of the fee, the payer of the fee, and the circumstances in which the fee is payable are all among the factors relevant to whether a reasonable lawyer would conclude that a single lawyer could competently and diligently represent each party. In negotiating a transaction the successful conclusion of which determines whether the lawyer will receive the finder's fee, for instance, it may well be that the lawyer's personal financial interest in consummating any transaction may unduly influence the lawyer's professional duty to discharge independent judgment on behalf of both clients. In a predecessor to its Opinion 98-03, the Illinois State Bar Association expressed grave doubt that a lawyer could ever reasonably conclude that these various competing interests could be reconciled. Illinois Opinion 94-21. We share this skepticism, and also have serious questions about the prudence of such a course of action, but we do not foreclose the possibility that highly sophisticated clients, particularly those accustomed to negotiating the major deal terms between principals in which the lawyer's role is akin to a scrivener, could provide informed consent to an arrangement in which a lawyer entitled to a finder's fee could represent each party in drafting the documents effecting the transaction. Cf. N.Y. State 438 (1976) (allowing joint representation of lender and borrower with their informed consent if a disinterested lawyer would believe the lawyer can competently represent both); N.Y. County 615 (1973) (allowing representation, with informed consent, of buyer and seller who had already agreed upon the principal terms and conditions of sale); N.Y. State 162 (1970) (allowing lawyer to represent both buyer and seller with their consent if their interests are not actually or potentially differing); N.Y. State 38 (1966) (representation of buyer and seller "should be practiced sparingly and only when it is clear that neither party will suffer any disadvantage from it"); Connecticut Inf. Opinion 91-14 (1991) (lawyer may draft sales contract between two longstanding clients when each side agrees and lawyer does not negotiate material terms). But see Florida Opinion 97-2 (1997) (unwaivable conflict to represent both sides in closing of a transaction); Maine Opinion 106 (1990) (under prior rules, not "obvious" that lawyer could represent both sides in a transaction).

12. In addition to the concurrent client conflict issues, a third Rule of importance here is Rule 1.8(a), for we consider the agreement between the lawyer and the client for a finder's fee to be a business transaction with the client to which the regulations of that Rule fully apply. Rule 1.8(a) requires a twofold inquiry. The first is whether the transaction itself is one in which the lawyer and client have differing interests and in which the client expects the lawyer to exercise the lawyer's independent professional judgment on the client's behalf. Here, the answers to those questions are likely to be evident: the lawyer and client plainly have differing interests in the size and payment terms of the finder's fee, and, because both contemplate that the lawyer will represent the client in the transaction to which the fee appends, the client is likely to expect that the lawyer will be mindful of the client's interests in addressing the terms of the finder's fee. Consequently, under Rule 1.8(a), the lawyer must assure that the terms are fair and reasonable to the client and fully disclosed in a writing that includes not only the deal's essential terms and the lawyer's role in shaping them, but also the desirability of the client seeking independent legal advice on the finder's fee arrangement. N.Y. State 913 (2012)

13. A fourth concern is that, because the match-making activity of the lawyer, though a non-legal service, is plainly not "distinct" from the lawyer's legal services, the provisions of Rule 5.7(a)(4) do not apply. These provisions require a written instrument to the client explaining that the protection of the lawyer-client relationship does not exist with respect to the rendition of non-legal services. Nevertheless, no assurance exists that a court would grant the protections of the attorney-client relationship to the purely non-legal activity of introducing one client to another solely for business purposes. Rules 1.1(a) and 1.4(a) & (b) require a lawyer to represent a client competently and to advise the client of considerations relevant to the client's decision-making about the representation. These Rules mandate that the lawyer alert the client to the risks that the lawyer's prospecting activities and attendant discussions may not enjoy the full protections of the attorney-client relationship. Such disclosure may well accompany the writing that Rule 1.8(a) requires in connection with business transactions with a client.

14. A fifth Rule that the finder's fee arrangement implicates is Rule 1.5(a) governing legal fees. Whether a finder's fee transaction may be deemed "fair and reasonable" under Rule 1.8(a) is analytically distinct from whether the fee may be "excessive" under Rule 1.5(a), though in the end the relevant considerations are substantially similar. We recognize that a fee for a non-legal service such as introducing clients to each other is not the intended object of Rule 1.5(a), but at least when those non-legal services are manifestly not distinct from the lawyer's legal services, we conclude that the lawyer's overall compensation for a particular transaction should fall within the scope of Rule 1.5(a). The principal general limit on a lawyer's compensation in that Rule is that a lawyer may not accept a fee the amount of which, upon review of the facts, would leave a reasonable lawyer "with a definite and firm conviction that the fee is excessive." Among the facts that Rule 1.5(a) identifies as relevant are the time, labor, and skill required; the novelty and difficulty of the services requested; the lawyer's inability, by reason of the representation, to represent other clients; the amount at stake and the results the lawyer achieves; the fee typically charged for comparable services in the locality where the lawyer practices; the time period in which the lawyer must complete the assignment; the lawyer's experience and reputation; and whether the fee is fixed or contingent. In considering whether a lawyer's fee in a transaction is excessive, the lawyer must take account of the totality of the transaction, including the finder's fee, in assessing whether the lawyer's compensation in the matter is excessive.

15. We reach these conclusions with little aid from opinions in other jurisdictions. Apart from the Illinois opinions cited above, which address a situation closest to the inquiry before us and reach a similar result, Opinion 2003-1 of the Ohio Supreme Court's Board of Commissioners and Discipline focused on a fact pattern akin to ours. There, the issue, among others, was whether a lawyer who introduces either a buyer or a seller of a business to a client may represent that client in the deal and be paid a fee based on a percentage of the transaction price, to our mind a proxy for a finder's fee. With some of the caveats we listed above, the Board concluded that the arrangement was permissible as long as the fee was payable by the initial client – that is, the lawyer could make the arrangement with a buyer/client or a seller/client, but could not receive such a fee from, for example, an investment/buyer group while also representing the seller in the same transaction. In this latter instance, under the now-abandoned "obviousness" standard of DR 5-105(C), the Board, which considered the relationship with the investment/buyer group as indistinguishable from a lawyer-client relationship, joined with other jurisdictions cited above that, no matter informed consent, a lawyer may not properly represent both the buyer and the seller in the same transaction.

16. Our research has uncovered other jurisdictions that proscribe the receipt of a "finder's fee" in situations very different from those before us. In each of these opinions, the committees addressed whether a lawyer may receive a fee from a non-lawyer third party for referring clients to that party to perform non-legal services. Thus, in South Dakota Opinion 96-6 (1996), the committee opined that a lawyer could not receive a fee for referring the lawyer's clients to an asset management firm. In Iowa Opinion 98-6 (1998), the committee held that a lawyer could not receive a fee from an investment advisory firm for referring clients to that firm. In North Carolina Opinions 2000-3 and 2006-2, the committee believed that a lawyer could not receive a fee for referring clients to a financing company. In Florida Opinion 70-13, the committee said that a lawyer could not accept fees from a bank for encouraging clients to deposit money there. To be sure, these opinions raise the concern we outline above concerning the impact of the lawyer's personal financial interest in a transaction on the lawyer's independent professional judgment, but to be paid by a non-client to refer clients for such services is not comparable to the receipt by a lawyer of a fee from a client to perform a service for that client closely related to the lawyer's rendition of legal services for that client. Cf. N.Y. State 845

(2010) (lawyer/broker may share broker's commission with lawyer who referred matter provided lawyer/broker does not represent party to transaction).

17. In the wake of the adoption of Rule 5.7 expressly permitting a lawyer to perform both legal and non-legal services, this Committee has consistently opined that "Rule 1.7 applies with undiminished force in circumstances where a lawyer's conflicting personal interest arises from a separate, nonlegal business or activity permitted by Rule 5.7." N.Y. State 886 (2011); accord N.Y. State 891 (2011). Nothing in this opinion is intended to alter that conviction; indeed, we stress that a lawyer entering into a finder's fee arrangement must fully comply with the dictates of Rule 1.7 as we elaborate above. In so concluding, we are fully mindful of earlier opinions of this Committee, many of them described in our Opinion 752 (2002), that categorically prohibit a lawyer from performing certain non-legal services and legal services for the same client in the same matter. As we said there:

> In a number of opinions that this committee has issued over the years, we have opined that in certain circumstances a lawyer also engaged in a nonlegal business cannot provide both legal and nonlegal services in the same transaction even with the consent of the client. Brokerage businesses are a salient example. We held in N.Y. State 208 (1971), N.Y. State 291 (1973), N.Y. State 340 (1974), and N.Y. State 493 (1978), that a lawyer could not act as a lawyer in the same transaction in which the lawyer or his or her spouse acted as a real estate broker "because of the possible conflict between his client's and his own personal interest." N.Y. State 208 (1971). Accord N.Y. County 685 (1991); see also N.Y. State 694 (1997) (impermissible to participate in broker-run home buyer's program because of resulting strong interest in broker's success). The rationale is that the broker's interest in closing the transaction interferes with the lawyer's ability to render independent advice with respect to the transaction. We have reached similar conclusions with respect to insurance brokers and securities brokers. N.Y. State 536 (1981). . . . N.Y. State 619 (1991). See also N.Y. State 595 (1988), N.Y. State 621 (1991), N.Y. State 738 (2001) (dual role of lawyer for real estate client and abstract title examiner impermissible because of possible need to negotiate exceptions to title).

18. We remain committed to this view. As Opinion 752 recognized, however, certain non-legal services rendered in connection with legal services do not merit such categorical treatment, such as those discussed in N.Y. State 687 (1997) (lawyer-broker can sell insurance to a client where advice about the purchase of insurance products is "merely tangential" to the legal representation); N.Y. State 711 (1998) (same); see also NY State 832 (2009) (activity incidental to the rendition of legal services). The non-legal services that we have previously deemed incompatible with the simultaneous rendition of legal services even with informed consent – the real estate broker, the insurance broker, abstract title examiner – are incontestably "distinct" from the provision of legal services, and activities to which the Rules of Professional Conduct do not neatly conform. Such is not the case here. The current inquiry does not require us to determine whether informed consent is curative of a lawyer performing every conceivable non-legal service that is not "distinct" from the legal services the lawyer plans to render in the same transaction. Here, we address only the matter before us. We do not believe that, under Rule 1.7, a client's payment of a finder's fee to a lawyer representing that client in a transaction – a transaction brought about by the lawyer's introductions to the client in the course of rendering legal services – invariably creates such an insurmountable personal financial conflict that informed consent, together with the other limitations we have set forth, can never allow the lawyer to proceed with the arrangement. Accordingly, we conclude that, in the context of non-legal services that plainly are not meaningfully distinct from the legal services the lawyer renders in the same transaction, but instead are incidental to the rendition of those legal services, a lawyer may permissibly accept a fee for introducing a client or prospective client to someone interested in making an investment in that person's (or entity's) business venture.

CONCLUSION:

19. A lawyer may accept a finder's fee for introducing current, former or prospective clients to prospective investors, whether current, former or prospective clients or not, provided that, in doing so, the lawyer complies with the Rules of Professional Conduct, including those governing protection of confidential information, avoidance of conflicts, business transactions with clients, competent advice on the applicability of privileges in the course of performing the non-legal services, and the limits on excessive fees.

OPINION 959 (02/21/2013)

TOPIC: Contacting formerly represented party to determine if he or she has new counsel.

DIGEST: A lawyer who knows that an adverse party's lawyer has withdrawn from the representation or resigned from the bar may contact the adverse party to determine if he or she has retained new counsel or plans to represent himself or herself.

RULES: 4.2, 4.3

FACTS:

1. The inquiring lawyer represents a client in a litigated matter. The inquirer states that he knows that an adverse party's lawyer has withdrawn from the representation and has withdrawn from the bar as a result of a pending investigation.

QUESTION:

2. May a lawyer who knows that an adverse party's lawyer has withdrawn from the representation contact the adverse party to determine if he or she has retained new counsel or plans to act pro se?

OPINION:

3. Rule 4.2 of the Rules of Professional Conduct, also known as the "no contact" rule, prohibits a lawyer from communicating about the subject of the representation with a party the lawyer knows to be represented by another lawyer in the matter, without the prior consent of the other lawyer. Rule 4.3, on the other hand, allows a lawyer to communicate on behalf of a client with a person who is not represented by counsel, as long as the lawyer does not state or imply that the lawyer is disinterested and, if the unrepresented person has interests that could reasonably be in conflict with the interests of the lawyer's client, the lawyer does not give legal advice to the unrepresented person, other than the advice to secure counsel.

4. Rule 4.2 does not authorize contact with the opposing party if the lawyer "knows" that the opposing party is represented by counsel. In N.Y. State 663 (1994) we discussed when the lawyer "knows" that a client who previously was represented by counsel, or a client who states that he is represented by counsel, is no longer so represented. In that case, the actions of the opposing party and his putative counsel cast doubt on the existence of an attorney-client relationship. Consequently, we suggested that the lawyer must undertake a "complete and thorough inquiry" to determine the ultimate fact of existing or continuing representation, which might include contacting the putative lawyer to determine the status of the representation. Where the lawyer knows that the opposing party's counsel has resigned from the representation or is no longer a member of the bar, the lawyer has reason to believe that the opposing party is not represented by counsel. Rule 4.3 thus authorizes the lawyer to communicate with the opposing party to ascertain whether he or she has obtained new counsel, or plans to represent himself or herself. Consistent with Rule 4.3, in any such communication with the opposing party, the lawyer should take care not to give legal advice.

CONCLUSION:

5. A lawyer who knows that an adverse party's lawyer has withdrawn from the representation or resigned from the bar may contact the adverse party to determine if he or she has retained new counsel or plans to represent himself or herself.

OPINION 960 (02/26/2013)

TOPIC: Conflict of Interest; Prospective Clients

DIGEST: Lawyer may ethically represent a client seeking payment of fees for repair services rendered to a prior prospective client, who had earlier sought advice from the lawyer regarding the damage that was subsequently repaired by the client, unless the lawyer learned confidential information from the prospective client that would be significantly harmful to the prospective client.

RULES: 1.6, 1.9, 1.18

QUESTION:

1. After a homeowner has consulted with a lawyer about potential claims against the seller of a home that turned out to need substantial repairs, but the homeowner has not retained the lawyer, may the lawyer represent a contractor in an action against the homeowner to recover the unpaid balance for the repair services?

FACTS:

2. A homeowner (the "homeowner") visited an attorney who is a sole practitioner to discuss potential claims against the person who sold the homeowner his home. The homeowner told the attorney that, after the closing, the homeowner discovered substantial structural damage throughout the home, which required repairs by a contractor. The homeowner did not discuss anything concerning the contractor who performed the repair work. The attorney advised the homeowner concerning potential claims against the seller of the home, but the homeowner never retained the attorney and never contacted the attorney again. The attorney did not bill for the homeowner's visit.

3. Over a year later, the attorney was approached by a contractor (the "contractor"). During the initial interview, the attorney learned that this was the contractor who had repaired the structural damage at the homeowner's residence. The contractor told the attorney that the homeowner did not fully pay the contractor. The contractor desires to retain the attorney and file a lawsuit against the homeowner for the balance due.

APPLICABLE RULES:

4. Our analysis begins with Rule 1.18(c) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"), which prohibits a lawyer who possesses confidential information learned during a consultation with a prospective client from representing a party with interests materially adverse to those of a prospective client in the same or a substantially related matter if the attorney received information from the prospective client that could be significantly harmful to that person in the matter, unless either (i) the attorney obtains informed consent from both parties (i.e., both the new client and the former prospective client), confirmed in writing, or (ii) adequate screening procedures are implemented pursuant to Rule 1.18(d).

OPINION:

Confidential Information

5. The protection afforded to prospective clients under Rule 1.18(c) is contingent upon the lawyer's receipt of confidential information. N.Y. City 2006-2. Under Rule 1.18(b), a lawyer may not use or reveal a prospective client's information unless Rule 1.6 or other Rules permit the lawyer's use or disclosure or the information has become generally known. Rule 1.18(b); Rule 1.9(c); Restatement Third The Law Governing Lawyers, § 15(1) (a) (2000); Simon's New York Rules of Professional Conduct Annotated 688 (2012 ed.). Rule 1.6(a) protects "information gained during or relating to the representation of a client, whatever its source," "including information that is protected by the attorney-client privilege and information that could reasonably lead to the discovery of confidential information". See also Rule 1.6, Cmt. [4A] which states that information relates to the representation "if it has any possible relevance to the representation", N.Y. State 723 (1999) (indicating that a lawyer may not be disqualified due to possession of general information concerning a former client's "financial exposure, corporate or financial structure, workplace rules, settlement policies, and the like, . . .unless there are peculiar aspects of the current representation making such information particularly relevant"). Furthermore, information is not generally known just "because others come to learn that information." N.Y. City 2005-3.

6. In the consultation with the homeowner, the lawyer likely obtained confidential information protected by Rule 1.6, and thus Rule 1.18(b), because the homeowner disclosed information regarding the nature and extent of internal damage to the residence and the homeowner's personal knowledge thereof. Information regarding the homeowner's knowledge of the damage to the residence and the extent thereof could be relevant in an action to recover fees for repair of such damage, particularly in determining the nature of the services rendered and the value thereof.

Materially Adverse

7. The homeowner and the contractor's interests are materially adverse because the contractor seeks recovery directly from the homeowner for the balance due for repairing the residence. See N.Y. State 761 (2003).

Substantially Related

8. Matters are "'substantially related' if they involve the same transaction or legal dispute or, if under the circumstances a reasonable lawyer would conclude that there is otherwise a substantial risk that confidential factual information that would normally have been obtained in the prior representation would materially advance the client's position in the subsequent matter." Rule 1.9, Cmt. [3]. This includes "knowledge of specific facts gained in a prior representation that are relevant to the matter in question," Rule 1.9, Cmt. [3]; N.Y. State 628 (1992), and confidential information "that would be useful against the former client in the present representation." Simon's New York Rules of Professional Conduct Annotated 419 (2012 ed.). We have recognized that even where different facts are implicated, the matters are substantially related where both matters involve the same issues. N.Y. State 761 (2003); N.Y. State 723 (1999). As stated in N.Y. State 723 (1999), there likely is a substantial relationship between matters "where the issue in controversy in the second matter arose out of a transaction in which the lawyer represented the former client," and where the lawyer obtained confidential information "that should be used against the former client in the current representation." Conversely, we have stated that where there is no likely use of previously obtained confidential information in the new matter, no substantial relationship exists. N.Y. State 628 (1992) (finding no substantial relationship between matters regarding a theft in a restaurant parking lot and a slip and fall in the restaurant because confidential information learned regarding former client's financial exposure or corporate structure not relevant in the subsequent matter).

9. The facts presented do not enable the Committee to determine whether any confidences received from the homeowner are relevant to the contractor's claim for non-payment or to any potential counterclaim by the homeowner against the contractor.

Significantly Harmful

10. Even if confidential information is obtained and it is only somewhat harmful, the information does not disqualify the lawyer from representation against the prospective client. Simon's New York Rules of Professional Conduct Annotated 690 (2012 ed.). This additional qualification is distinct from the automatic prohibition under Rule 1.9 regarding actual former clients. N.Y. City 2006-2 (stating that "[t]he 'significantly harmful' test sets the bar lower than in the case of a lawyer opposing a former client"). Thus, if the information imparted to the lawyer by the homeowner would not be significantly harmful to the homeowner, the lawyer could undertake the matter for the contractor.

Written Informed Consent or Screening Mechanisms

11. The prohibition under Rule 1.18 regarding prospective clients is not absolute. The lawyer or firm may be able to represent a subsequent client if the lawyer (i) obtains informed written consent from both the prospective client and the subsequent client, or (ii) establishes adequate screening mechanisms. Rule 1.18(d). However, there can be no screening here as the lawyer is a sole practitioner.

12. To waive the conflict under Rule 1.18, the lawyer must satisfy the requirements for "informed consent" and "confirmed in writing," as defined by Rule 1.0(j) and Rule 1.0(e), respectively. To the extent such consents are obtained, the lawyer may represent the contractor in an action against the homeowner.

CONCLUSION:

13. A lawyer may ethically represent a contractor seeking payment due from a homeowner who previously sought the lawyer's advice regarding potential claims against a third party for damage that the contractor subsequently repaired, unless the information imparted to the lawyer by the homeowner would be significantly harmful to the homeowner in the contemplated action by the contractor and informed written consent is not obtained from both the homeowner and the contractor.

OPINION 961 (03/13/2013)

TOPIC: Can a retiring attorney sell a law practice and retain the right to receive a portion of fees for legal services that will be provided after the sale date?

DIGEST: A retiring lawyer may sell his or her law practice contingent upon receipt of a percentage of legal fees collected by the purchaser for services provided after the sale where the payment is in proportion to the services performed by the selling lawyer prior to the sale or fairly represents the value of the "goodwill" of the retiring lawyer. A provision requiring payment of fees for business that the selling lawyer refers to the buying lawyer after the sale is not permitted.

RULES: 1.5(g); 1.5(h); 1.17; 5.4; 7.2.

QUESTIONS:

1. May a retiring lawyer sell his or her law practice contingent on receiving a percentage of the legal fees earned for legal services provided after the date of sale with respect to each of the following categories of client matters:

    a. Existing clients with pending actions and a retainer agreement that provides for a contingent fee upon amounts collected;

    b. Existing clients with claims contemplated in future years after the date of sale of the law practice and a retainer agreement that provides for a contingent fee upon amounts collected;

    c. New clients who retain the purchasing attorney after the date of the sale, where the new client is a separate entity but has common principals with existing clients of the selling attorney as of the date of sale and a retainer agreement that provides for a contingent fee upon amounts collected; and

    d. New clients who retain the purchasing attorney after the date of the sale, with no common principals with selling attorney's existing clients, but where the new client is referred to the selling attorney by other attorneys and in turn referred by the selling attorney to the purchasing attorney?

OPINION:

2. This inquiry requires us to address a tension between two rules in New York's Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"): Rules 1.5(g) (Fees and Division of Fees) and 1.17 (Sale of Law Practice). Rule 1.5(g) provides, in relevant part, that "[a] lawyer shall not divide a fee for legal services with another lawyer who is not associated in the same law firm unless (1) the division is in proportion to the services performed by each lawyer or, by a writing given to the client, each lawyer assumes joint responsibility for the representation."[1] Rule 1.17 (a) provides that "[a] lawyer retiring from the private practice of law . . . may sell a law practice, including goodwill, to one or more lawyers or law firms, who may purchase the practice." The tension arises from the phrase "including goodwill" in Rule 1.17(a). "Goodwill" is the intangible asset of an enterprise that arises from the reputation of a business and its relations with its customers.[2] In a law firm context, goodwill reflects, among other things, "the likelihood that satisfied existing clients will use the firm again when new matters arise" and "the likelihood that new clients will come to the lawyer or firm because of the firm's reputation." Roy Simon, Simon's New York Rules of Professional Conduct Annotated ("Simon's") 764 (2013 ed.).

1 The remaining requirements of Rule 1.5(g) are: "(2) the client agrees to employment of the other lawyer after a full disclosure that a division of fees will be made, including the share each lawyer will receive, and the client's agreement is confirmed in writing; and (3) the total fee is not excessive."

3. By its nature, the inclusion of "goodwill" in a sale of a law practice entails a payment on account of legal fees that the buyer is expected to receive in the future. There is no question that the parties to the sale could attempt to assign a present value to that flow of fees and include that value in a lump-sum purchase price. That kind of indirect link between legal fees to be earned by a lawyer and the payment to another lawyer is not prohibited by Rule 1.5(g). But it can be very difficult to assign a present value to an on-going book of business of a law practice, and even more difficult to estimate what value will flow from new business that may come to the law practice on account of the reputation and contacts built up by the selling lawyer over time. And young lawyers who are the typical buyers of law practices often do not have access to capital to provide upfront payments for goodwill in any case. The question presented is the extent to which lawyers can structure the payment for the law practice as a payout over time measured by the actual fees earned by the practice after the sale.

4. We conclude that Rule 1.17 must be viewed as an exception to Rule 1.5(g) – that is, that the payment for "goodwill" that is explicitly permitted by Rule 1.17 permits a payment that is made in the future after the fees that reflect "goodwill" are earned. We reach this conclusion for several reasons. First, we think that Rule 1.17 should be viewed as the more specific of the two rules – targeted as it is to a particular setting in which lawyers might wish to share fees – and thus subject to the interpretive principle favoring the more specific rule over the more general. Second, a lump-sum payment for goodwill is intended to be economically identical to the present value of the actual fees earned over time. The rules should be as transparent and rational as possible, so in the absence of a strong reason to the contrary, parties to a sale of a law practice should be able to use a method of payment that is the economic equivalent of one that is clearly permitted.

5. Third, we note that Rule 1.5 itself contemplates payments of fees over time in the closely analogous setting of a lawyer who leaves or retires from a law firm and receives a payment for his or her interest in the firm in the form of a separation agreement or retirement package. Rule 1.5(h) states, without qualification, "Rule 1.5(g) does not prohibit payment to a lawyer formerly associated in a law firm pursuant to a separation or retirement agreement." Likewise, Rule 5.4(a)(1) permits law firms to agree with lawyers in the firm to share legal fees with the estate of a lawyer in the firm, or with anyone else, "over a reasonable period of time after the lawyer's death." If a lawyer leaving a law firm, or the lawyer's estate, may receive a portion of future fees earned on account of the goodwill of the firm that the lawyer helped to build up, we see little reason why a lawyer retiring from a solo practice should be barred from structuring a payment similarly. Comment [1] to Rule 1.17 fortifies this anal-

2 Collins Dictionary ("an intangible asset taken into account in assessing the value of an enterprise and reflecting its commercial reputation, customer connections, etc."); Oxford Dictionary (US English) ("the established reputation of a business regarded as a quantifiable asset, e.g., as represented by the excess of the price paid at a takeover for a company over its fair market value"); Dictionary.com ("an intangible, saleable asset arising from the reputation of a business and its relations with its customers, distinct from the value of its stock and other tangible assets").

ogy. It states, "Pursuant to this Rule, when a lawyer or an entire firm ceases to practice, and other lawyers or firms take over the representation, the selling lawyer or firm may obtain compensation for the reasonable value of the practice, as may withdrawing partners of law firms." (Emphasis added.) Indeed, equalizing the treatment of retiring members of law firms and retiring sole practitioners was the principal purpose of the Rule permitting sales of law firms.[3] One of the impetuses for adopting Rule 1.17 was the previous practice of "quickie partnerships," whereby a solo practitioner would take on a junior partner for a short period before retiring under a retirement package that provided for an extended payout.[4]

6. Fourth, we note that the possibility that "goodwill" could be measured either by a lump sum payment or by a payout of a portion of future fees was well recognized in ethics opinions predating the adoption of versions of Rule 1.17 around the country. See, e.g., ABA 266 (1945) (barring sale of "good will" "whether by payment of a lump sum or by an agreement to pay a stated percentage of the future receipts, gross or net, from his clients"); N.J. Opinion 48 (1964) (advising that a sale of "good will" was prohibited whether measured by a lump sum approximating the selling lawyer's net income for one year or by paying one third of all net profits from pending cases and any other work for former clients of the retiring lawyer for three years). There is thus good reason to conclude that when Rule 1.17 was adopted, it embodied an understanding that the sale of goodwill that was to be permitted could be accomplished by either means.

7. We recognize that there are counter-arguments to these points. One could conclude that the express exception for fees paid as part of a separation or retirement agreement, when there is not one for sale of a law practice, means that fees may not be shared in the latter context. We are not persuaded by that counter-argument, however, because, as noted above, we perceive no reason for making that distinction, particularly in light of the policy underlying the Rule to equalize the treatment of retirements from law firms and sales of law practices.

3 The initial report of the Special Committee to Review the Code of Professional Responsibility, proposing adoption of what became Rule 1.17, stated that the amendment was > "designed principally to address the disparate treatment of sole practitioners and members of law firms with respect to the 'good will' of their respective law practices. Under existing legal and ethical principles, retiring members of law firms and estates of deceased law firm members have been able to receive benefits, including an allotment for that lawyer's share of the firm's good will, while sole practitioners and their estates cannot obtain the same benefit. The proposed amendments will eliminate this inequality . . . ."

4 Simon's, supra, at 761 ("Once the partnership was formed, the retiring lawyer could ethically introduce his new young partner to all of the clients, and could enter into a partnership agreement under which the retiring lawyer would receive a generous portion of future fees."); Dennis A. Rendleman, "The Evolving Ethics of Selling a Law Practice," 29 GP Solo no. 4 (July/Aug. 2012) (available at http://www.americanbar.org/publications/gp_solo/2012/july_august/evolving_ethics_selling_law_practice.html) ("Thereafter, Old Practitioner might become 'of counsel' or withdraw from practice entirely, while the name remains a part of the firm and a continuing financial benefit flows to Old Practitioner."). See also ABA 1990 Report at 4 ("In order to ensure that unfinished client matters would be taken care of and to avoid losing compensation for the 'good will' of the law practice, some solo practitioners entered into 'quickie' partnerships prior to leaving the practice. Often, clients do not benefit from such hastily assembled arrangements.").

8. We also recognize that the purposes of the prohibition on fee sharing are implicated, at least in part, by any provision for fee sharing after sale. For example, one purpose of the prohibition is to limit the risk of outside influences on a lawyer's independent judgment. A lawyer with an economic interest in a matter who is not sufficiently involved in the work and does not take responsibility for it may press the lawyer handling the matter to cut corners or settle too early. E.g., Simon's at 165 (noting risk that even under Rule 1.5(g), a referring lawyer might "pressur[e] the working lawyer to settle or to go to trial or to skimp on costs and expenses to avoid reducing the ultimate fee"). But these policies have often been tempered by other considerations, as demonstrated by the exceptions for retirement plans, separation agreements and agreements for sharing fees with the estate of a lawyer in a law firm.[5]

9. We are also aware that Comment [11] to Rule 1.17 states, "Lawyers participating in the sale or purchase of a law practice are subject to the ethical standards applicable to involving another lawyer in the representation of a client." That could be taken to refer to the rule on division of fees, Rule 1.5(g). But we note that the Comment then lists several "[e]xamples" of such Rules – Rules 1.1 (competence), 1.7 (conflicts), and 1.6 and 1.9 (confidentiality) – but not Rule 1.5(g). We note that other states have expressly referred to that Rule in their comments to their analogous rule. E.g., Florida Bar Rule 4-1.17 Comment (concluding that the fee-division rule will not apply to fees from matters pending at time of sale but must be satisfied with respect to fees from matters that arise subsequent to the sale).

10. We note as well that ethics opinions in two other states with broadly similar rules concluded that payments for goodwill may not be formulated as payments of a portion of future fees unless the requirements of the fee-splitting rule are satisfied. Iowa Opinion 96-05 (1996) (structuring payment for purchase of law practice as a percent of revenues from services rendered by purchasing attorney held improper under Iowa analogue of Rule 1.5(g)); Philadelphia. Opinion 96-1 & Supp. Opinion 96-1 (purchaser may pay seller a percentage of revenue over a five-year period if requirements of Pennsylvania analogue of Rule 1.5(g), requiring notice to clients of fee splitting, are satisfied). Neither opinion contains an analysis of the issue. But see Kansas Opinion 93-14 (concluding, in the absence of a rule analogous to Rule 1.17, that Kansas rule permitting referral fees permits selling lawyer to receive a portion of future fees even if selling lawyer does not work on the matter).[6]

11. While we approve in concept that goodwill in a sale of a law practice under Rule 1.17 may be measured by future fees as actually earned, we believe that there are necessarily limits to such arrangements. The extent of fee sharing must bear a reasonable and bona fide relationship to the value of the "goodwill" involved. Even the most well-known lawyer's reputation and connections fade over time. Any provision for fee sharing must therefore be limited in amount and in time. The parties might agree, for example, that the selling lawyer will receive 20% of the seller's net income for three years. If that is a reasonable estimate of the value of the "goodwill" of the practice, then Rule 1.17 permits it.

5 Rule 5.4(a)(3) provides an additional exception, permitting sharing of fees with nonlawyer employees pursuant to compensation or retirement agreements based in whole or in part on a profit-sharing arrangement.

6 Our Committee has once before considered whether a retiring lawyer could receive a stream of fees from future business. We concluded that the lawyer could not do so, but in that case the lawyer was moving to the judiciary and we based our conclusion entirely on the Code of Judicial Conduct. We said that the arrangement "would provide an inducement to the judge to assist the acquiring firm in retaining the favor of former clients" in violation of Canons prohibiting the appearance of impropriety and certain financial and business transactions with lawyers likely to come before the court. N.Y. State 699 (1997). We did not mention the rule against fee splitting.

12. Turning to the types of provisions suggested by the inquirer, we have no hesitation in concluding that a portion of the fees earned from matters pending at the time of the sale (beyond those fees attributable to the work the selling lawyer did on the matter before the sale),[7] and (b) new matters for the seller's existing clients, can fairly be said to reflect the selling lawyer's reputation and client connections. Provision (c) would require fee sharing as to matters for entity clients that retain the purchasing lawyer after the date of the sale where the entity is controlled by "common principals" of existing clients. Because the relevant question is the effect of the selling lawyer's reputation on the minds of the persons making the decision which lawyer to retain, these nominally "new" clients should be treated like new matters for existing clients that are the subject of scenario (b).

13. Provision (d) would require fee sharing with respect to new clients who have been referred by the selling lawyer. While the fact that a new client may have approached the selling lawyer after the sale may be due to the lawyer's reputation, we are concerned that permitting sharing of fees if the selling lawyer refers the business to the buying lawyer implicates the different set of policies barring payments for referrals under Rule 7.2. A retired lawyer should not be given a monetary incentive to refer new business to the buying lawyer in particular without consideration of which lawyers would be the best for the job. Restatement (Third) of the Law Governing Lawyers § 10 Comment d (2000). Put another way, we do not see a payment for business referred after the sale as simply a convenient method of measuring the value of the goodwill of the practice, but rather more as a payment for the new service of making the referral, and such a payment is barred.

14. One further point to address, although we do not definitively decide it, is whether a retired lawyer could receive fees from matters handled by the buying lawyer not as payment for work done prior to the sale under the first clause of Rule 1.5(g)(1), and not as payment for "goodwill" under Rule 1.17(a), but by assuming joint responsibility for the representation in a signed writing to the client under the second clause of Rule 1.5(g)(1).[8] A Comment to this Rule says, "'Joint responsibility' for the representation entails financial and ethical responsibility for the representation as if the lawyers were associated in a partnership. See Rule 5.1 [referring to the obligations of partners and other lawyers in a firm to supervise other lawyers in the firm]." Rule 1.5, Cmt. [7]. The question is whether a retired lawyer can ever take "joint responsibility" for a matter.

15. The Comment's citation of Rule 5.1, and its reference to "ethical responsibility . . . as if the lawyers were associated in a partnership," suggest that the selling lawyer would need to supervise, at least to some extent, the work of the buying lawyer. But see N.Y. County 715 (1996) (concluding, prior to adoption of Comment [7], that the joint responsibility required by the predecessor rule "is financial and does not create an ethical obligation of the referring lawyer to supervise the activities of the receiving lawyer"); Aiello v. Adar, 750 N.Y.S.2d 457 (Sup. Ct. Bronx Cty. 2002) ("the rule does not create an ethical obligation to supervise the receiving attorney's work"). There is at least a question whether such supervision would be consistent with retirement for purposes of Rule 1.17. The term "retirement" contemplates that the attorney will completely cease practicing law for compensation. Nassau County 2-12 (2012).[9] But we do not resolve this issue in response to the present inquiry, because the inquirer (presumably as would be the case for many retiring lawyers) does not seek to take joint responsibility for the work of the buying lawyer. We do not foreclose the possibility that, under some factual circumstances, a retiring lawyer could meet those requirements. See Rule 5.1(c) ("the degree of supervision required is that which is reasonable under the circumstances").

7 Fees for work done prior to the sale are not for goodwill, but simply for services delivered by the selling lawyer. That sharing of fees is expressly permitted by Rule 1.5(g).

8 Note that when proceeding under either portion of Rule 1.5(g)(1), the lawyer must disclose to the client that a division of fees will be made, including the share that each lawyer will receive; the client must have agreed to the division of fees in an agreement confirmed in writing; and the total fee must not be excessive. Rule 1.5(g)(2), (3).

CONCLUSION:

16. Under Rule 1.17, a retiring lawyer selling a law practice may collect fees (above the fees in proportion to the services performed by the selling lawyer before the sale), as described in provisions (a) to (c) raised by the inquirer, if those fees fairly reflect the value of the selling lawyer's "goodwill." The retiring lawyer may not condition future referrals on payment of a portion of the fees earned from the referred matters (provision (d)).

9 In the context of lawyers' biennial registration requirements, 22 N.Y.C.R.R. § 118.1(g) defines "retired" as follows: "An attorney is 'retired' from the practice of law when, other than the performance of legal services without compensation, he or she does not practice law in any respect and does not intend ever to engage in acts that constitute the practice of law." In turn, the regulation defines "practice of law" as "the giving of legal advice or counsel to, or providing legal representation for, a particular body or individual in a particular situation in either the public or private sector in the State of New York or elsewhere."

OPINION 962 (03/18/2013)

TOPIC: Payments to a witness for travel expenses and attorney's fees

DIGEST: A lawyer may arrange a client's payment of reasonable travel expenses and legal fees of a witness if such payment is not prohibited by law and is not contingent on the witness's testimony or the outcome of the case.

RULE: 3.4(b)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer represents the proponent of a will who seeks the testimony of a witness to authenticate that will. Although the witness lives within the state, the witness resides several hours from the courthouse of the county where the probate proceeding is pending. In addition, the witness has requested that her counsel be present during the testimony.

QUESTIONS:

2. May the lawyer for the proponent of a will ethically arrange the client's payment of travel expenses (air fare and hotel accommodations) for an in-state witness who has been asked to testify on behalf of the proponent?

3. May the lawyer for the proponent of a will ethically arrange for the client's payment of the legal fees of the in-state witness who has requested that her attorney be present for the examination?

OPINION:

A. Payment of travel expenses

4. The Surrogate's Court Procedure Act §1404(5) states that the testator's estate shall ordinarily pay for the costs of the initial production and examination of the first two attesting witnesses within the state and, if necessary, a witness without the state who is closest to the county in which the probate proceeding is pending.

5. The Civil Practice Law and Rules ("CPLR") contains provisions on witness compensation. CPLR §8001(a) ("Any person whose attendance is compelled by a subpoena, whether or not actual testimony is taken, shall receive for each day's attendance fifteen dollars for attendance fees and twenty-three cents as travel expenses for each mile to the place of attendance from the place where he or she was served, and return. There shall be no mileage fee for travel wholly within a city."); CPLR §8001(b), (c) (additional fees in certain circumstances); CPLR §2303 ("Any person subpoenaed shall be paid or tendered in advance authorized traveling expenses and one day's witness fee.").

6. Rule 3.4 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") is instructive in this matter. It states in part as follows:

> "A lawyer shall not: . . .

> "(b) offer an inducement to a witness that is prohibited by law or pay, offer to pay or acquiesce in the payment of compensation to a witness contingent upon the witness's testimony or the outcome of the matter. A lawyer may advance, guarantee or acquiesce in the payment of:
> > "(1) reasonable compensation to a witness for the loss of time in attending, testifying, preparing to testify or otherwise assisting counsel, and reasonable related expenses; or
> > "(2) a reasonable fee for the professional services of an expert witness and reasonable related expenses."

7. Comment [3] to Rule 3.4 states that the above-quoted proscription "applies generally to any inducement to a witness that is prohibited by law. It is not improper to pay a witness's reasonable expenses or to compensate an expert witness on terms permitted by law. However, any fee contingent upon the content of a witness' testimony or the outcome of the case is prohibited."

8. Prior opinions set forth the rationale underlying the predecessor to Rule 3.4(b), which was "to prevent compensation that would have a tendency to lead to the 'production of fraudulent evidence and to the giving of falsely colored testimony as well as to [the prevention of] outright perjury.'" N.Y. State 668 (1994) (citing N.Y. State 547 (1982)), cited in Caldwell v. Cablevision Sys. Corp., __ N.Y.3d __, 2013 WL 451322 (2013). "We must attempt to draw the line between compensation that enhances the truth seeking process by easing the burden of testifying witnesses, and compensation that serves to hinder the truth seeking process because it tends to 'influence' witnesses to 'remember' things in a way favorable to the side paying them." N.Y. State 668 (1994).

9. Rule 3.4 proscribes witness inducements that are "prohibited by law." While we do not opine on legal questions, we note case law indicating that "the fee set forth in CPLR 8001(a) is a minimum fee," Caldwell v. Cablevision Sys. Corp., __ N.Y.3d __, 2013 WL 451322 (2013) (citing commentary that "payment of more than the $15 daily fee is not precluded under either the law or code of ethics," but holding that in some circumstances high fees may warrant a jury charge); In re Feinberg, 2012 WL 4748323 (Sur. Ct. Queens Co. 2012) ("Although a witness need not be paid more than the statutory attendance fee and mileage, there is nothing that expressly prohibits voluntary payments in excess thereof").

10. The only other prohibition in Rule 3.4(b) applies to payments contingent upon testimony or outcome. See N.Y. State 714 (1999) ("What is reasonable, and therefore permitted, should first be considered in terms of what is expressly forbidden under the [predecessor rule], namely, the payment of compensation to a witness contingent upon the content of his testimony or the outcome of the case."). No such contingency is intended or explicit under the terms of the inquiry made to us, nor do we think that any implicit contingency may be inferred from the terms of that inquiry.

11. The ABA ethics committee concluded that under Model Rule 3.4, a lawyer is permitted to "compensate a non-expert witness for time spent in attending a deposition or trial or in meeting with the lawyer preparatory to such testimony, provided that the payment is not conditioned on the content of the testimony and provided further that the payment does not violate the law of the jurisdiction." ABA 96-402. The opinion also indicates that the lawyer should explain the basis of compensation, stating that such compensation would not violate the Model Rules "[a]s long as it is made clear to the witness that the payment is not being made for the substance or efficacy of the witness's testimony, and is being made solely for the purpose of compensating the witness for the time the witness has lost in order to give testimony," id., or to reimburse "travel expenses, including lodging when an overnight stay is required," id. n.3. Finally, the "amount of such compensation must be reasonable, so as to avoid affecting, even unintentionally, the content of a witness's testimony." Id.; see Caldwell v. Cablevision Sys. Corp., __ N.Y.3d __, 2013 WL 451322 (2013) (although statutory fee "is only the minimum that must be paid to a subpoenaed fact witness, that does not mean that an attorney may pay a witness whatever fee is demanded, however exorbitant it might be").

12. We agree with the implication of ABA 96-402 that reasonable payment for travel expenses can, consistently with the policy of the rule, ease the burden of testifying witnesses without tending to influence their testimony. Such amounts should be considered "reasonable related expenses" within the meaning of Rule 3.4(b)(1). Accordingly, a lawyer's payment of such expenses on behalf of a client, though in excess of statutory fees, is not improper.

13. Although we cannot provide a bright line amount that on its face would be deemed to be an unreasonable payment to the witness, we can find some guidance: "As long as the reimbursement does not exceed the witness's actual out-of-pocket expenses and does not fall outside the standard types of expenses (e.g., travel, lodging, meals), it should generally be considered reasonable." Roy Simon, Simon's New York Rules of Professional Conduct Annotated 892 (2013 ed.); cf. Caldwell v. Cablevision Sys. Corp., 86 A.D.3d at 52 (as to distinction between paying for lost time and paying for testimony, noting that payments that "are unreasonably high or disproportionate to the value of the time actually spent testifying can give rise to an inference that the payment was actually a fee for testifying, which carries with it the possibility that the witness will be unconsciously inclined to give testimony favorable to the party who has paid him or her"), aff'd, Caldwell v. Cablevision Sys. Corp., __ N.Y.3d __, 2013 WL 451322 (2013).

B. Payment of legal fees

14. The witness has requested that her counsel be present during her examination. In order to determine whether the inquirer may arrange payment of the witness's legal fees, we again must consider whether, under Rule 3.4(b) and its policies, such payment should be considered compensation for reasonable expenses related to attending, testifying, preparing to testify or otherwise assisting counsel.

15. Another ethics committee, interpreting the predecessor to Rule 3.4, has addressed the question whether a lawyer could advance legal fees to a witness for purposes of an informal interview of that witness. The opinion pointed out that there are "a number of reasons why a witness may wish to be represented by counsel in an interview or in formal discovery proceedings," and saw "little risk that the presence of counsel to a witness will interfere with or hinder the truth seeking process." N.Y. County 729 (2000). In particular, the committee opined that the payment of counsel fees could not reasonably be expected to influence the witness's testimony, because such a payment "is of no use to the witness outside of the litigation." The opinion concluded that the legal fees were (in the words of the predecessor rule) "[e]xpenses reasonably incurred in attending or testifying," and that the lawyer could properly advance such expenses. Id.

16. We believe that although N.Y. County 729 was interpreting a predecessor rule, its reasoning and result are equally applicable to the very similar text and policies of Rule 3.4(b). Reasonable payment for legal fees should, like payment of travel expenses, ease the burden of testifying witnesses without tending to influence their testimony. Accordingly, reasonable legal fees may be "reasonable related expenses," payment of which is permitted by Rule 3.4(b)(1).

CONCLUSION:

It is ethically permissible for an attorney, on behalf of the proponent of a will, to pay a witness's reasonable expenses related to testimony, including reasonable travel expenses such as air fare and accommodations, and also the witness's reasonable legal fees, as long as such payments are not contingent upon the witness's testimony or the outcome of the matter.

OPINION 963 (03/19/2013)

TOPIC: Duty to report false evidence offered by, and apparent criminal conduct by, actual or prospective client

DIGEST: A civil legal services attorney is not required to report to a tribunal (a) inaccuracies in an application filled out by an actual or prospective client and contained in the record of an administrative tribunal, or (b) the actual or prospective client's apparent criminal failure to register his current address as a sex offender.

RULES: Rules 1.6(a), (b)(2); 1.9(c); 1.18; 3.3(a), (b)

FACTS:

1. A person contacted a civil legal services agency for representation on an unspecified administrative law matter and met with an employee of the legal services agency. The person gave the legal services agency a written consent to view the administrative record.

2. The legal services agency supplied the administrative tribunal with the person's written authorization for the legal services agency to review the administrative record, and the inquiring attorney reviewed the administrative record.

3. The administrative record contains the person's signed written application. The application contains the following statement:

> "You declare under penalty of perjury that all the information on this summary is true and correct to the best of your knowledge. Anyone who knowingly gives a false or misleading statement about a material fact in an application . . . commits a crime and may be sent to prison or may face other penalties, or both."

4. On the application, the person admitted having been convicted of a felony, and gave an address at which he stated he had resided for ten years.

5. During a telephone conversation between the inquiring attorney and the person, the person revealed that he had served time in the New York State prison system for rape. However, the legal services attorney was unable to find the person's name in the New York State Department of Corrections and Community Supervision ("DOCCS") information database. The attorney then conducted an internet search for the person's name, which showed that the person is also known by a name different from the one on his application. The newly discovered name yielded a hit on both the DOCCS site and the New York State sex offender registry. The latter indicated that the person is a level-three sex offender (indicating a high risk of repeat offense and a threat to public safety), with ongoing reporting responsibilities. The person's photo on the sex offender website, dated approximately one year ago, has been positively identified by the legal services agency employee who initially met with the person.

6. The address given to the legal services agency by the person is in a different county than the address contained in the sex offender registry (which the website says is up to date.) An offender is required to report a new address within ten days of moving, check in every ninety days, and report his whereabouts to local law enforcement after any move. Failure to report is a felony.

7. After the person failed to appear at the legal services agency for two appointments and failed to return telephone calls, the agency determined not to represent him going forward, and it never filed an appearance on behalf of the person before the administrative tribunal. However, the administrative matter remains pending.

QUESTION:

8. Does the legal services attorney have an ethical obligation to report to the administrative tribunal the conflicting information about the name and address of the person who sought representation?

9. Does the legal services attorney have an ethical obligation to alert local police or the sex offender registry as to the whereabouts of the person who sought representation?

OPINION:

10. The duties of an attorney to a particular person may vary depending on whether the attorney formed an attorney-client relationship with the person. The person who sought representation from the legal services agency was at least a "prospective client," defined in Rule 1.18(a) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") as a "person who discusses with a lawyer the possibility of forming a client-lawyer relationship with respect to a matter." The person may eventually have become a client. Whether the prospective client relationship blossomed into a full-fledged attorney-client relationship is a matter of substantive New York contract law, see, Toussaint v. James, 2003 WL 21738974, at *8 (S.D.N.Y. 2003); Gottlieb, Rackman & Reisman, P.C. v. Marusya, Inc., 2004 WL 3188074, at *1 (Civ. Ct. N.Y. Co. 2004); Rules Scope ¶ [9] ("principles of substantive law external to these Rules determine whether an client-lawyer relationship exists"). This Committee does not have jurisdiction to opine on questions of substantive law.

11. If an actual attorney-client relationship developed, then the person is now a former client because the legal services agency has declined to represent him any further. An attorney owes a duty of confidentiality to a former client under Rule 1.9(c), which in turn cites to Rule 1.6. Rule 1.6(a) prohibits the attorney from knowingly revealing confidential information unless a countervailing obligation or exception requires or permits the disclosure. Rule 1.6(a) defines confidential information as follows:

> "'Confidential information' consists of information gained during or relating to the representation of a client, whatever its source, that is (a) protected by the attorney-client privilege, (b) likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed, or (c) information that the client has requested be kept confidential. . . ."

12. The information learned about the person in question here was "gained during or relating to the representation" and would "likely be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed." It is therefore "confidential information" under Rule 1.6(a).

13. Even if the interactions never blossomed into an attorney-client relationship, the person in question was nevertheless a "prospective client" within the meaning of Rule 1.18(a) because the person contacted the legal services agency seeking representation, met with an agency employee to discuss the possible representation, and spoke about it with the inquiring attorney by telephone. (Rule 1.18(e) excludes certain categories of people from the definition of prospective clients, but those exceptions are not relevant here.) Accordingly, the inquiring attorney owes some degree of confidentiality to the person because Rule 1.18(b) provides as follows:

> "Even when no client-lawyer relationship ensues, a lawyer who has had discussions with a prospective client shall not use or reveal information learned in the consultation, except as Rule 1.9 would permit with respect to information of a former client."

14. The inquiry raises interesting questions about the duty of confidentiality to a prospective client where no actual attorney-client relationship develops, including whether the inquiring attorney is permitted to disclose the person's other name to the administrative tribunal, or is permitted to alert local police or the sex offender registry as to the person's current address. But we do not address those questions because the inquiring attorney has not asked us whether he is permitted to disclose that information – he has asked only whether he is mandated to disclose that information. We therefore analyze the questions of mandatory disclosure, and do not reach questions relating to permissive disclosure. As we now explain, the inquiring attorney has no mandatory disclosure duty.

A. Is there a duty to disclose to the administrative tribunal?

15. The only provisions in the New York Rules of Professional Conduct that require a lawyer to disclose confidential information are found in Rule 3.3 ("Conduct Before a Tribunal"). The relevant sections provide as follows:

> "(a) A lawyer shall not knowingly:
> > "(1) make a false statement of fact or law to a tribunal or fail to correct a false statement of material fact or law previously made to the tribunal by the lawyer; . . .
> > "(3) offer or use evidence that the lawyer knows to be false. If a lawyer, the lawyer's client, or a witness called by the lawyer has offered material evidence and the lawyer comes to know of its falsity, the lawyer shall take reasonable remedial measures, including, if necessary, disclosure to the tribunal. . . .
> "(b) A lawyer who represents a client before a tribunal and who knows that a person intends to engage, is engaging or has engaged in criminal or fraudulent conduct related to the proceeding shall take reasonable remedial measures, including, if necessary, disclosure to the tribunal.
> "(c) The duties stated in paragraphs (a) and (b) apply even if compliance requires disclosure of information otherwise protected by Rule 1.6."

16. For purposes of this inquiry, we assume that the information given by the actual or prospective client to the administrative tribunal, as to his true name and address history, was false.

17. Rule 3.3(a)(1) does not apply here. It applies to a false statement of material fact or law previously made to the tribunal "by the lawyer." Here, the false statements were made not by the lawyer, but rather by the client or prospective client. Rule 3.3(a)(1) therefore does not require the inquiring attorney to correct the false statements.

18. Rule 3.3(a)(3) likewise does not apply. The main thrust of Rule 3.3(a)(3) is to prohibit an attorney, in conduct before a tribunal, from offering or using evidence that the lawyer knows to be false. Here, although the lawyer made some preliminary inquiries as to the administrative matter, he never filed an appearance in that matter. Because the lawyer did not and will not represent the person before the tribunal, he did not and will not "offer or use" the false information on the person's application.

19. At first glance, the second sentence of Rule 3.3(a)(3), taken in isolation, might appear to apply. It says that "[i]f . . . the lawyer's client . . . has offered material evidence and the lawyer comes to know of its falsity, the lawyer shall take reasonable remedial measures, including, if necessary, disclosure to the tribunal." But this sentence cannot be read in isolation. It must be read together with the opening clause of Rule 3.3(a)(3), and it clarifies that a lawyer's duties under the rule apply even when the lawyer has offered the false evidence through a client or witness, and even when the lawyer learns of the falsity subsequent to the admission of that evidence. Here, the lawyer has not offered false evidence in any of these ways. It would not make sense to require a lawyer to take reasonable remedial measures regarding proceedings before a tribunal in which the lawyer has never appeared on behalf of the client.

20. There is a second reason that Rule 3.3(a)(3) may not apply. This provision is triggered when a client has offered material "evidence" which the lawyer comes to learn is false. The term "evidence" presumably refers to documents and testimony submitted to a tribunal to persuade it to reach a decision on the merits. In some contexts, therefore, an "application" may not constitute evidence, within the meaning of this Rule, unless and until it were offered to the tribunal as part of formal proceedings. We do not opine on this in the present context, however, as the inquiry does not reveal the nature of the application or the administrative proceeding.

21. Rule 3.3(a)(1) and (3) therefore place no obligation upon the attorney.

22. Similarly, Rule 3.3(b) requires corrective action by an attorney who learns of a client's intended or past criminal or fraudulent conduct even where the attorney has had no active role in the misconduct, but only if the lawyer "represents a client before [the] tribunal." Here, the legal services agency has declined to represent (or to continue to represent) the person, and it never filed a notice of appearance. Because the inquiring attorney has not represented the client before the administrative tribunal, Rule 3.3(b) is inapplicable as well.

B. Does the attorney have a duty to disclose to the police or the sex offenders registry?

23. The inquiring attorney has learned that the client has apparently committed the felony of failing to report a new address within ten days of moving, as is required of sex offenders. Rule 1.6(b)(2) permits an attorney to reveal or use confidential information to the extent that the lawyer reasonably believes necessary to prevent the client from committing a crime, but as explained by this Committee in N.Y. State 866 at ¶26 (2011):

> "Rule 1.6(b)(2) does not permit disclosure of confidential information concerning a completed or past crime; it applies only to confidential information necessary to prevent a continuing or otherwise future crime."

24. Whether the alleged crime is a continuing or future crime is a question of law, see, e.g., Willette v. Fischer, 508 F.3d 117 (2d Cir. 2007) (rejecting State's contention that "the change-of-address violation was a 'continuing violation, with each day potentially giving rise to a new charge'"). We do not opine on such legal questions. N.Y. State 866 at ¶26 (2011) ("Whether the [client] has committed a crime . . . , and whether that crime is a continuing one, are questions of law beyond the jurisdiction of this Committee.").

25. In any event, Rule 1.6(b)(2) is strictly permissive – it does not require a lawyer to disclose anything. Thus, the inquiring attorney has no duty to disclose address information to the police or to the sex offender registry.[10]

CONCLUSION:

26. The attorney has no mandatory disclosure obligations.

(36-12)

10 This reasoning also applies to the actual or prospective client's false statements on the application to the tribunal. Even if submission or use of that false application were to constitute a crime, neither Rule 1.6(b)(2) nor any other Rule requires a lawyer to disclose a client's intention to commit a crime, much less the client's commission of a past crime.

TOPIC: Virtual law office; office address; advertising, business cards and letterhead

DIGEST: Advertising for legal services may not identify a mail drop as the sole address, and must include the street address of the lawyer's principal office; a lawyer's business cards and letterhead may use a mail drop as the sole address, provided they are not being used as advertising and use of the address is not misleading.

RULES: 1.0(a); 7.1(h); 7.5(a); 8.4(c)

FACTS:

1. Inquirer conducts a general practice, with an emphasis on immigration law, primarily on-line or by other electronic means of communication. Inquirer meets with clients and others only by appointment, usually by telephone or Skype or at the client's or other person's location and only rarely at her home, where her files, communications tools and desk are located. Inquirer does not wish to receive mail or drop-in clients or third parties at her home. She plans to use a commercial mailbox service address as her mail address and would prefer not to identify her home address in any advertising she may undertake or on her business cards and letterhead, using instead only her mailbox address.

QUESTIONS:

2. May a lawyer use a commercial mailbox service address as the only office address listed in advertisements, omitting the address of her physical office?

3. May a lawyer use a commercial mailbox service address as the only office address listed on business cards and letterhead, omitting the address of her physical office?

OPINION:

A. May lawyer advertising include a mailbox service address instead of an office address?

4. Rule 7.1(h) provides, in pertinent part, that "[a]ll advertisements shall include . . . the principal law office address . . . of the lawyer or law firm whose services are being offered." This seems unambiguously to require a physical office address. Moreover, this understanding of the requirement is consistent with prior interpretation and the history of the Rule.

5. In 2002, when the Code of Professional Responsibility was in force, this Committee construed the term "office address" in DR 2-101(k), the precursor of Rule 7.1(h), to mean a physical street address at which the principal office of the lawyer or firm is located. The Committee noted that this was the accepted meaning of the term prior to advent of the Internet, and reasoned that the requirement of an office address continued to serve several useful purposes that would not be similarly served by electronic addresses.[11]

11 These purposes included facilitation of "a prospective client's ability to make an intelligent selection of a lawyer"; of contact by the lawyer's "clients, adversaries and other interested parties"; of a client's ability to find and meet with the lawyer "at a known physical location"; and of "the personal service or delivery of legal papers and other correspondence where that mode of delivery is elected." N.Y. State 756 (2002).

The Committee concluded that advertising for legal services "may not list a website or email address as the sole address, but must also include the street address of the lawyer's office." N.Y. State 756 (2002).

6. In the advertising rules adopted by the Appellate Divisions in 2007, DR 2-101(k) was carried forward as DR 2-101(h) with the modification of "office address" to read "principal law office address," as the corresponding Rule 7.1(h) reads today. We think this 2007 modification served to underscore the intent of the Appellate Divisions that all lawyer advertisements were to disclose the address of an office where the lawyers were present and available for contact, and where personal service or delivery of legal papers could be effected.

7. That the same language was carried forward in haec verba in the Rules of Professional Conduct adopted by the Appellate Divisions in 2008, effective April 1, 2009, despite the fact that the requirement was not in the rules proposed by the New York State Bar Association, reinforces our view that the Appellate Divisions intended no change in the prior mandate, and that the current Rule 7.1(h) still requires that advertising include the street address of a principal law office.

B. May business cards and letterheads include a mailbox service address instead of an office address?

8. Lawyers are explicitly permitted to use business card and letterheads giving "addresses," which of course includes the traditional kind of office street address. Rule 7.5(a)(1) (business cards); Rule 7.5(a)(4) (letterhead). The inquiry poses the question whether lawyers are required to include such office addresses on any cards and letterheads that they may use.

9. Rule 7.5 provides that a lawyer or law firm may use "professional cards" (i.e., business cards) and letterheads "provided the same do not violate any statute or court rule and are in accordance with Rule 7.1" on advertising. As noted above, Rule 7.1(h) requires that advertisements include the physical address of the lawyer's principal office. We see no exception from the mandate of Rule 7.1(h) for advertisements that are in the form of business cards or letterhead. If a business card or letterhead were to constitute an advertisement, it would be required to include the lawyer's principal office address.

10. "Advertisement" is defined as "any public or private communication made by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm about that lawyer or law firm's services, the primary purpose of which is for the retention of the lawyer or law firm," though not including "communications to existing clients or other lawyers." Rule 1.0(a). "Not all communications made by lawyers about the lawyer or the law firm's services are advertising." Rule 7.1, Cmt. [6].

11. When a business or professional card or letterhead is used in the ordinary course of professional practice or social intercourse without primary intent to secure retention – e.g., simply to identify the lawyer – it does not constitute advertising.[12]

12 See N.Y. State 936 (2012) (applying Rule 7.1 to letterhead only when the letterhead is used in a communication that constitutes an advertisement); cf. Rule 7.1, Cmt. [8] (communications for marketing or branding are not necessarily advertisements, and items like legal pads or coffee mugs printed with firm contact information are not advertisements within rule "if their primary purpose is general awareness and branding, rather than the retention of the law firm for a particular matter"); N.Y. State 937 (2012) (communications intended to raise general brand awareness are not advertising even if there is an underlying motivation to increase a lawyer's business).

12. In that circumstance, Rule 7.1(h) imposes no burden on the lawyer to include her principal law office address or, for that matter, any address. See N.Y. State 936 (2012). Nor would Rule 7.5 impose any such requirement, because as noted above, its provisions are entirely permissive as to the use of professional cards and letterhead that give addresses; in contrast to Rule 7.1(h), they do not require the inclusion of a lawyer's or law firm's principal law office address or any address.

13. Of course it is also possible that a lawyer could design or use cards or letterhead in atypical ways. If such cards or letterhead were given or sent to someone other than an existing client or another lawyer, and primarily in furtherance of an effort to secure retention of the lawyer or law firm, then the card or letterhead would constitute advertising.[13] In that case, Rule 7.1(h) would require it to include a principal law office street address.[14]

14. To say that the more customary uses of cards and letterhead do not constitute advertising does not end the inquiry, because there are ethical constraints other than those that apply to advertising. A lawyer may not use a mailbox service address (or any other content of a card or letterhead) to mislead.[15] For example, a mailing address that is in a community other than the one in which the lawyer's physical office is located, or that appears to be a physical address when it is in fact only a mail drop, could be misleading if not adequately explained.[16] If use of a business card or letterhead were to constitute "conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation," it would be prohibited under Rule 8.4(c).

CONCLUSION:

15. Advertising for legal services may not identify a mail drop as the sole address, but must also include the street address of the lawyer's principal office.

16. A lawyer's business or professional cards and letterhead may use a mail drop as the sole address, provided they are not being used as advertising and use of the mail address is not misleading.

13 Cf. N.Y. State 937 (2012) (cautioning that if promotional items "were marked with more than the firm logo – if for example they included slogans or more information about the firm" – then they could constitute advertising subject to Rule 7.1).

14 Alternatively, the letterhead might not itself constitute advertising but could appear on a letter with advertising in its text. In that case as well, the advertisement (though not necessarily the letterhead) would be required to include the lawyer's office address.

15 While Rule 7.1(a)'s proscription of misleading statements in advertising may not apply to traditional business and professional cards that are not advertisements, "there are also other more general rules governing use of misleading statements." N.Y. State 936, supra (citing Rules 4.1 and 8.4(c)).

16 See N.Y. State 881 (2011) (opining that listing spouse's law firm address on letterhead, without appropriate arrangements or disclaimers, would be misleading); N.Y. State 546 (1982) (opining that letterhead may list a branch office open only several days per month, if accompanied by appropriate disclaimer indicating limited hours, but noting that it would be deceptive and misleading "to list a 'mail drop' as a branch office . . . without some appropriate explanation").

TOPIC: Conflicts of interest

DIGEST: A Town attorney who has given a Town building inspector legal advice about issuance of a certificate of occupancy for a building may, ordinarily, appear for the Town Zoning Board of Appeals in an Article 78 proceeding involving issuance of a building permit for that building. If there were unusual circumstances that would involve the attorney in representing differing interests, then the attorney could not represent the Board absent appropriate client consent.

RULES: 1.7; 1.13(a), (d)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer was retained by a Town to provide services as Town Attorney. In that capacity, the inquirer provided legal advice to the Town building inspector concerning issuance of a certificate of occupancy for a building to be constructed by Property Owner A pursuant to a building permit issued by the Town. Property Owner B, a neighbor of Property Owner A, had objected to issuance of the building permit to Property Owner A and appealed that issuance to the Town Zoning Board of Appeals, which denied the appeal. Property Owner B has commenced an Article 78 proceeding against the Zoning Board of Appeals. The Zoning Board of Appeals wants the inquiring attorney to appear for it in the Article 78 proceeding.

QUESTION:

2. May an attorney appear for a Town Zoning Board of Appeals in an Article 78 proceeding involving issuance of a building permit, although the attorney has given a Town building inspector legal advice concerning issuance of a certificate of occupancy for the building in question?

OPINION:

3. A lawyer for a governmental organization, like a lawyer for a private organization, represents the organization as an entity and does not thereby automatically represent any of its constituent individuals. See New York Rules of Professional Conduct ("Rules"), Rule 1.13(a) & Cmt. [9]. However, the lawyer may be engaged to represent one or more such constituents as well, subject to the provisions of Rule 1.7 on conflicts of interest. See Rule 1.13(d).

4. Thus, a lawyer providing services to constituents of a governmental entity does not necessarily represent those constituents in their own right, but rather may be providing the services solely in the course of representing the entity. In particular, a Town attorney may provide legal services to constituents like a building inspector and a Zoning Board of Appeals,[17] but such services may nonetheless be rendered in the course of representing the town rather than those constituents.[18] Whether in a given case the attorney for an entity represents only that entity or also some of its constituents "can depend on the circumstances and may be a question of fact," and it will ultimately depend on legal considerations beyond the scope of the Rules. Rules Scope ¶ 9; see Rule 1.13, Cmt. [9] (referring specifically to government entities). Such matters are not within our jurisdiction, and we do not opine on them.

17 "The zoning board of appeals is an agency of the town and the assistant town attorneys are generally obliged to act in a manner consistent with the broad scope of the duties impressed upon the office of the town attorney. Those duties include rendering legal advice to the town's zoning board of appeals." N.Y. State 501 (1979) (citing 21 Op. State Compt. 322 (1965) (duties of town attorney include acting as legal advisor to all town officers) and 1973 Atty. Gen. (Inf.) 208 (interpreting Town Law§ 20[2] to require town attorney to render legal advice to all town boards)).

5. Rule 1.7(a)(1) provides that except when allowed by appropriate client consent, "a lawyer shall not represent a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that . . . the representation will involve the lawyer in representing differing interests . . . ."

6. Insofar as the lawyer provides services to various constituents in the course of representing the Town as an entity, there will be no representation of differing interests, but only a representation of the interests of the Town. A lawyer may represent a single client in multiple matters without risk of representing differing interests. See Roy Simon, Simon's New York Rules of Professional Conduct Annotated 266 (2013 ed.) (Rule 1.7(a)(1) can create conflicts for any lawyer or law firm "that has more than one client").

7. We also consider the situation that would arise if the inquirer's proposed appearance in the Article 78 proceeding were to involve a representation of the Zoning Board of Appeals in its own right. In that case, there could theoretically be representation of differing interests, but that is not to say that such differing interests would actually exist.

8. When we previously considered such a situation, we found the existence of differing interests unlikely. We opined that "the duties owed to the town board by the office of the town attorney, as well as the preeminent authority of that board, usually will be of no ethical relevance to the assistant's service as counsel to the zoning board of appeals; and, under normal circumstances, there would be no impropriety in an assistant town attorney accepting assignment to act as counsel to the zoning board of appeals." N.Y. State 501 (1979). That opinion was decided under the prior Code of Professional Responsibility, but we perceive no difference in the current Rules of Professional Conduct that would lead to a different result.

9. On the other hand, if in fact there were differing interests, then the attorney could not represent the Zoning Board of Appeals absent appropriate client consent under Rule 1.7(b). Situations in which differing interests could arise are conceivable. Indeed, N.Y. State 501 concerned an Article 78 proceeding brought against a zoning board of appeals not by a property owner but by the Town Board. We noted that when "the relationship between the two boards has become antagonistic to the point where one seeks to institute suit against the other, the theoretical harmony of their relationship must give way to the reality of their conflicting interests," and we concluded that "counsel fully independent from the office of the town attorney should be retained to represent the zoning board of appeals."

18 See 21 Op. State Compt. 322 (1965) (duties of a town attorney include acting as legal advisor to all town officers "in their official capacities"); cf. N.Y. City 2004-03 ("unless circumstances indicate otherwise, a government lawyer representing an official named solely in his or her official capacity would still, in effect, be representing the client agency alone, and, unless circumstances indicated otherwise, the government lawyer would deal with the named official as a constituent of the agency rather than as someone personally represented by the government lawyer").

See also Rule 1.7(b)(3) (conflict may not be cured by client consent when attorney represents two clients before a tribunal where one is asserting a claim against the other).

10. The current inquiry, however, does not involve any proceeding brought by the Town against the Zoning Board of Appeals. Nor is there any other respect in which the facts of the inquiry contain any suggestion of differing interests that could take this situation out of the ordinary rule.

CONCLUSION:

11. Under the facts of the inquiry, an attorney who gave legal advice to the Town Building Inspector as to issuance of the certificate of occupancy for a building may appear for the Town Zoning Board of Appeals in an Article 78 proceeding involving issuance of a building permit for that building.

TOPIC: Private practice of law by town court clerk

DIGEST: A town clerk wishing to represent a private client in a matter pending in another town court may be limited by law and court rules, but is not automatically prohibited from such representation by the rules of legal ethics even if the client also has a matter pending before the clerk's court. If the clerk has substantive responsibilities for the pending matter and is thus in a position to influence the tribunal, then the representation may be prohibited by Rule 1.11(f)(2) unless the clerk informs the judge of the relationship so that the judge may take appropriate action. If the clerk does not participate in the pending matter or has solely ministerial duties, then the clerk would be able to represent the client, if not barred by any personal-interest conflict, but may not use the clerk's public office to try to influence either of the town courts in favor of the client.

RULES: 1.7(a), 1.11(d), 1.11(f)

FACTS:

1. The inquiring lawyer, a court clerk in a town court ("Town Court A"), would like to represent a client who has a matter pending in another town court ("Town Court B"), when the same individual has a matter pending in Town Court A. The court clerk does not represent the client in the matter pending in Town Court A.

QUESTION:

2. May a lawyer who is a court clerk in Town Court A represent a client who has a matter pending in Town Court B, when the same individual has a matter pending in Town Court A?

OPINION:

3. There may be legal provisions governing government officers, and court rules, that govern conflicts of interest of court clerks arising from outside activities.[19] The Committee provides guidance only on the application of the Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"). The application of legal provisions and rules of court is beyond the Committee's jurisdiction, and we do not address those regulatory schemes. Rather, we assume for purposes of this opinion that all relevant court rules allow the lawyer/clerk to represent private clients as contemplated, and that the representation is not prohibited by law, such as local government ethics codes. We also assume that the client's matters in Town Court A and Town Court B are not related.

4. As an ethical matter, a lawyer in the position of the inquirer must, when engaging in private practice, avoid any impermissible conflicts with the lawyer's duties as a court clerk. We consider the Rules that delineate such conflicts.

19 See Rule 1.11, Cmt. [1] (lawyer currently serving as a public officer or employee "may be subject to statutes and government regulations regarding conflicts of interest"). For example, the Chief Judge has adopted "Rules Governing Conduct of Nonjudicial Court Employees," 22 N.Y.C.R.R. §§ 50.1 - 50.6. See, e.g., id. §50.1 ("Code of ethics for nonjudicial employees of the Unified Court System"); § 50.6(a) (practice of law by full-time employees); §50.6(d) (practice of law by part-time employees). However, we do not address the applicability or import of those provisions in the circumstances of this inquiry.

5. We believe the Rule most likely to be implicated is Rule 1.11(f)(2), which provides: "A lawyer who holds public office shall not . . . use the public position to influence, or attempt to influence, a tribunal to act in favor of . . . a client." While the term "public office" is not defined, we believe, based on the Rule's text and underlying principles, that it would apply to court clerks. Cf. Rule 1.11, Cmt. [4] (applying to situation in which lawyer represents a government agency and another client successively):

> "A lawyer should not be in a position where benefit to the other client might affect performance of the lawyer's professional functions on behalf of the government. Also, unfair advantage could accrue to the other client by reason of access to confidential government information about the client's adversary obtainable only through the lawyer's government service."

Although the comment relates to a government employee who at times represents the government as well as a private client, the same concerns would apply where the lawyer does not represent the government, but is a court clerk who might be in a position to assist a private client. See Roy Simon, Simon's New York Rules of Professional Conduct Annotated 610 (2013 ed.) (stating that Rule 1.11(f) covers lawyers who are not serving as lawyers during their government service).

6. The applicability of Rule 1.11(f)(2) does not mean that in all cases, the inquirer would be precluded from representing the private client in Town Court B. If the inquirer's duties as a court clerk would not include any duties in connection with the client's matter before Town Court A (and if the inquirer did not seek in any way other than the performance of assigned duties to influence Town Court A), then the Rule would not prohibit representation of the private client in the matter before Town Court B.

7. Moreover, that representation may be permissible even if the inquirer had very limited duties in connection with the client's matter before Town Court A. If the inquiring clerk's duties are solely ministerial, such as assigning docket numbers to cases, then we believe the clerk would generally not be in a position to influence the tribunal in Town Court A to act in favor of the client represented by the clerk in Town Court B.

8. However, if the clerk's responsibilities include providing research or advice, or otherwise assisting the judge handling the matter, then the clerk may well be in a position to influence the tribunal, implicating Rule 1.11(f)(2).[20] In such a circumstance, we believe the representation of the client before Town Court B would be prohibited unless the clerk were to inform the judge in Town Court A before whom the client's matter is pending of the clerk's proposed relationship with the client, so that the judge may take appropriate action, including ensuring that the clerk does not participate in the case and is not in a position to exert any influence.

20 Moreover, if the clerk's personal involvement were "substantial," another provision could be implicated. Under Rule 1.11(d)(2), a lawyer currently serving as public officer or employee may not negotiate for private employment with any person who is involved as a party in a matter in which the lawyer is participating personally and substantially, except as may otherwise be expressly provided by law. If negotiating to be retained constitutes negotiating "for private employment" under this Rule – a question we need not reach in light of our analysis above – then this Rule would be relevant as well.

9. We note two further restrictions that would apply even when the inquirer's representation of the client in Town Court B would be permissible under the analysis above. First, Rule 1.11(f)(2) would prohibit the clerk not only from using his or her public office to try to influence Town Court A, but also from using it to try to influence Town Court B.

10. Second, Rule 1.7(a)(2), which governs personal-interest conflicts, applies to lawyers in government.[21] Although the facts as submitted do not suggest such a conflict, the inquirer should be mindful of this rule. The inquirer could not represent the client in Town Court B, except with that client's informed consent, when a reasonable lawyer would conclude that there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client would be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests, including, in this case, the lawyer's government employment.

CONCLUSION:

11. The lawyer's ability to represent private clients may be limited by law or court rules, such as the Chief Judge's Rules Governing Conduct of Nonjudicial Court Employees. We do not opine on the applicability or import of any such restrictions.

12. No ethical rule invariably prohibits a town court clerk who is a lawyer from accepting a private client in a matter pending in another town court, even if the client also has a matter pending before the clerk's court. The clerk may represent the client if the clerk does not participate in that matter pending before the clerk's court, or participates in ways that are solely ministerial. If the clerk has substantive responsibilities for such matters and is thus in a position to influence the tribunal, then the clerk may not represent the private client unless he or she informs the judge of the relationship with the client, so that the judge may take appropriate action, including ensuring that the clerk does not participate in the case and is not in a position to exert any influence. In any event, the clerk may not represent the client if barred by a personal-interest conflict, and may not use his or her public office to try to influence either town court to act in favor of the client.

TOPIC: Lawyer advertising

DIGEST: A blog written by an attorney, the primary purpose of which is not retention of the attorney, is not an advertisement.

RULES: 1.0(a) & (c), 7.1(k)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a columnist who is also an attorney licensed in New York. The inquirer has become an employee of a corporation that promotes work-life balance. In that capacity the inquirer will write a blog that will be titled "The [Inquirer's Name] Esq. Blog." The blog will not address legal topics but will include posts about work-life balance.[22]

QUESTION:

2. Is the inquirer's blog an advertisement and thus subject to the retention and preservation requirements of the attorney advertising rules?

OPINION:

3. Rule 7.1 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct contains extensive requirements relating to advertising by attorneys. Rule 7.1(k) provides: "Any advertisement contained in a computer-accessed communication shall be retained for a period of not less than one year. A copy of the contents of any web site covered by this Rule shall be preserved" at specified times.

4. Rule 1.0(c) defines "computer-accessed communication" as "any communication made by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm that is disseminated through the use of a computer or related electronic device, including, but not limited to, web sites, weblogs, search engines, electronic mail, banner advertisements, pop-up and pop-under advertisements, chat rooms, list servers, instant messaging, or other internet presences, and any attachments or links related thereto." A blog disseminated over the internet is clearly a "computer-accessed communication" as defined in Rule 1.0(c).

5. However, the restrictions in Rule 7.1 apply only to "advertisements" as defined in the Rules, and in particular, Rule 7.1(k) applies only to those computer-accessed communications that constitute or contain such advertisements. Rule 1.0(a) broadly defines "advertisement" as "any public or private communication made by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm about that lawyer or law firm's services, the primary purpose of which is for the retention of the lawyer or law firm." In this instance there is no question that the blog is a public communication made by a lawyer. Another element of the definition is that the communication be "about that lawyer."[23] It seems reasonable to assume that some of the 22 For purposes of this opinion we have slightly changed the facts of the inquiry.

23 Alternatively, if the correct reading of Rule 1.0(a) is that communications otherwise within the definition are advertisements if they are made by a lawyer or law firm "about that lawyer['s] or law firm's services," then there would be an additional reason, beyond those in the body of this opinion, to conclude that the blog is not an advertisement.

posts will be about the blog's author, so we assume for purposes of this inquiry that this test is also met. The remaining question is whether the primary purpose of the blog "is for the retention of the lawyer."

6. The Comments to Rule 7.1 indicate that not all communications by and relating to a lawyer constitute an advertisement. For example, marketing and branding items such as pencils or legal pads with a firm name do not constitute advertisements if their primary purpose is general awareness and branding, rather than the retention of the law firm for a particular matter. Cmt. [8]. Sponsorship of cultural or sporting events, with dissemination of information about the lawyer limited to specified narrow categories, is also not considered advertising. Cmt. [10]. In an opinion on whether a lawyer could offer a prize to join the lawyer's social network, this Committee noted:

> "To fall within the definition of 'advertisement,' the communication offering the prize must be for the 'primary purpose' of the inquirer's retention. The fact that business development might be the inquirer's ultimate goal in offering the prize would not trigger the Rules on advertising any more than it would trigger those Rules if, for example, the inquirer were to join a local Chamber of Commerce, Kiwanis Club, or bar association, or if the inquirer were to take other steps to expand the inquirer's personal social circle, with the aim of meeting potential new clients."

N.Y. State 873 (2011). Even when communications from lawyers contain information about the law, they are not necessarily advertising.[24]

7. Since the inquirer's blog will not discuss legal matters and it appears that the inquirer does not intend to solicit clients for a law practice, the blog will not be considered an advertisement even though its name indicates that the author is an attorney.

8. We note, however, that "all communications by lawyers, whether subject to the special rules governing lawyer advertising or not, are governed by the general rule that lawyers may not engage in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation, or knowingly make a material false statement of fact or law." Rule 7.1, Cmt. [6].

CONCLUSION:

9. A blog written by an attorney that does not discuss legal topics and whose primary purpose is not the retention of the lawyer is not an advertisement, and would thus not be subject to the retention and preservation rules for lawyer advertising, even though the title of the blog makes clear that the author is an attorney.

(24-13)

24 For example, "[t]opical newsletters . . . or blogs intended to educate recipients about new developments in the law are generally not considered advertising." Rule 7.1, Cmt. [7]; see also, e.g., N.Y. State 918 (2012) (educational legal video that does not encourage viewers to retain the law firm is not an advertisement because the primary purpose is not retention of the law firm); N.Y. State 899 (2011) (providing general answers to questions in a legal chat room, without more, does not constitute advertising).

TOPIC: Conflicts of interest for government lawyer; government lawyer pursuing personal claims against employer; government lawyer representing agency against claim that could also be asserted by the lawyer

DIGEST: A federal government lawyer subject to a mandatory furlough may bring a challenge to the furlough in an administrative tribunal if consistent with the lawyer's other ethical obligations. If the inquiring lawyer does so, however, the lawyer may not represent the agency in opposition to challenges to the furlough by other employees, unless permitted by a rule of necessity applicable if no other lawyer can defend the agency. If the inquiring lawyer does not pursue such a challenge, the lawyer may represent the agency in opposition to such challenges by others if the agency gives informed consent and the other requisites for conflict waiver are met. Other lawyers in the office may also defend the agency against such challenges if there is appropriate waiver of the conflict and those other lawyers do not pursue their own challenges.

RULES: 1.0(h); 1.1(c); 1.7; 1.10(a), (d); 1.11(d); 8.5

QUESTIONS:

1. May a lawyer who is employed by a Federal government agency and is subject to employment furloughs of up to 22 days resulting from "sequestration":

   a. exercise the lawyer's statutory right to challenge his or her own sequestration furlough before the Merit Systems Protection Board, an administrative tribunal established to hear appeals by Federal government employees from "adverse employment actions"; or

   b. represent the agency before the MSPB in actions brought by other agency employees, or otherwise advise the agency regarding implementation of the furlough?

OPINION:

2. The Committee has received several inquiries from civilian lawyers who are admitted in New York and are employed by Federal government agencies concerning possible conflicts arising out of potential employment furloughs resulting from the ongoing Federal government "sequestration." As a result of the sequestration (a Congressionally-mandated across-the-board budget cut), many Federal employees – including attorneys – may be subjected to employment furloughs of up to 22 days. Federal employees – again, including attorneys – have the statutory right to challenge such furloughs before the Merit Systems Protection Board ("MSPB").

3. The inquirers have raised questions concerning (i) whether the inquirers may pursue their own challenge before the MSPB against their employer, and (ii) whether the fact that the inquirers are themselves subject to sequestration furloughs would present a conflict of interest if the lawyers are asked to represent their agency in appeals of the furlough brought by other agency employees, or asked to advise the agency in implementation of the furlough. We understand that the challenges to the furlough will raise issues common to all or many persons affected by it, such as the adequacy of notice under governing statutes and rules, and whether the furlough otherwise meets statutory and constitutional requirements for such job actions.

Choice of Ethics Rules

4. We address first whether New York's Rules of Professional Conduct apply at all. Each of the inquirers is admitted in New York but practices in the District of Columbia or Virginia. Each assumes that New York's ethics rules apply.

5. Rule 8.5(b) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct is a choice-of-law rule for legal ethics. It provides that "[f]or conduct in connection with a proceeding in a court before which a lawyer has been admitted to practice . . . , the rules to be applied shall be the rules of the jurisdiction in which the court sits, unless the rules of the court provide otherwise." Rule 8.5(b)(1). For other conduct, the rules to be applied are New York's rules if the lawyer is admitted only in New York. Rule 8.5(b)(2)(i). If the lawyer is licensed to practice in New York and some other jurisdiction, the rules to be applied are those of the "admitting jurisdiction in which the lawyer principally practices," unless "the particular conduct clearly has its predominant effect in another" admitting jurisdiction, in which case the rules of that jurisdiction apply. Rule 8.5(b)(2)(ii).

6. As the inquirers are asking in part about conduct in connection with a proceeding before an administrative tribunal, the question arises whether such an administrative tribunal is a "court" within the meaning of Rule 8.5(b)(1). The Rules contain a definition of "tribunal," which includes both a "court" and an "administrative agency or other body acting in an adjudicative capacity." Rule 1.0(w). In adopting Rule 8.5, the New York Appellate Divisions declined to adopt a version of Rule 8.5 proposed by the New York State Bar Association that substituted the word "tribunal" for the word "court" in the prior version of this rule.[25] (The proposal would have adopted the usage in the ABA Model Rules of Professional Conduct.) Thus, while there may be policy reasons for treating administrative tribunals as courts, see Roy Simon, Simon's New York Rules of Professional Conduct Annotated ("Simon's") 1626 (2013 ed.) (noting desirability of a uniform rule for practice before a particular administrative tribunal), we do not believe we are free to read "court" in Rule 8.5(b)(1) to include administrative tribunals such as the MSPB.[26]

7. The rules to be applied, therefore, are not necessarily those of the jurisdiction in which the MSPB sits. Rule 8.5(b)(2) provides that if the lawyer is admitted in multiple jurisdictions including New York, then the conduct will be subject to the rules of either New York or one of the other admitting jurisdictions (depending on where the lawyer principally practices and possibly on the predominant effect of the conduct). If the lawyer is admitted only in New York, then New York's rules will

26 We do not need to address in this opinion the question of what would happen if the rules of an administrative tribunal presented ethical requirements that conflicted with New York's rules, because the MSPB rules do not appear to impose such conflicting obligations. The MSPB permits parties to be represented by anyone of their choosing subject to relatively general rules permitting another party to challenge an adverse representative on grounds of "conflict of interest" and permitting a judge to limit a representative's participation for conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice. 5 C.F.R. §§ 1201.31(b), 1201.43(d) (2012); see also Standards of Ethical Conduct for Employees of the Executive Branch, id. Part 2635 (2013) (general conflict of interest and other standards).

apply.[27] We are informed that at least one of the inquirers is admitted to practice only in New York.[28] We therefore will proceed to analyze the questions under New York's Rules of Professional Conduct.

MSPB Appeal Filed by Government Lawyer

8. One of the inquiries asks whether a government lawyer who is subject to a sequestration furlough as a government employee may file an MSPB appeal on his or her own behalf against the lawyer's employer. Rule 1.1(c)(2) provides that a lawyer "shall not intentionally . . . prejudice or damage the client during the course of the representation except as permitted or required by these Rules." We assume for purposes of this opinion that the inquirer's client is the agency that employs him or her.[29]

9. Professor Simon opines that the phrase "during the course of the representation" includes both a temporal aspect – making clear that the duty applies only to current clients – and also a substantive limitation – "that the duty not to prejudice or damage a client applies only in ways related to the 'representation'" and does not apply to lawyer conduct "outside the scope of the representation." Simon's, supra, at 73 (emphasis in original); accord Nassau County 05-1 (lawyer may give testimony against current client in matter unrelated to legal services being rendered). Even if this interpretation is accepted, it is unclear whether the action contemplated here – a claim by in-house counsel relating to the terms of his or her employment as counsel – is outside the scope of the representation of the agency, which presumably extends to all the work the lawyer does while employed by the agency.

10. While Rule 1.1(c)(2) is relatively unusual – it is not part of the ABA Model Rules of Professional Conduct – it captures part of the common law duty of loyalty. It is helpful to consider the courts' consideration of that common law right in delineating the scope of the Rule. Courts have generally allowed an in-house or government lawyer to assert his or her own statutory or contractual rights against the lawyer's employer where doing so would not violate a specific ethical duty.

27 This conclusion would also apply to representing the agency in connection with implementation of the furlough, which would not be conduct in connection with a proceeding in a court. We note that decisions by the MSPB are appealable to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, which is of course a "court" within the meaning of Rule 8.5(b)(1). So, if an MSPB decision were appealed to the Court of Appeals, conduct in connection with that appeal would be subject to "the rules of the jurisdiction in which the court sits, unless the rules of the court provide otherwise." Rule 8.5(b)(1).

28 We express no view on whether the inquirers' practice is permitted under the rules governing unauthorized practice in Virginia and the District of Columbia. Cf. Sperry v. Florida ex rel. Florida Bar, 373 U.S. 379, 401 (1963) (allowing petitioner to practice federal patent law in a state in which he was not admitted to practice law because the Patent and Trademark Office had issued rules on practice before it and "[t]he rights conferred by the issuance of letters patent are federal rights").

29 We recognize that identification of a government lawyer's client is not always straightforward. See Rule 1.13, Cmt. [9] ("Defining precisely the identity of the client and prescribing the resulting obligations of such lawyers may be more difficult in the government context."); Restatement (Third) of the Law Governing Lawyers §97, Cmt. c (2000) ("No universal definition of the client of a governmental lawyer is possible."); Roger Cramton, The Lawyer as Whistleblower: Confidentiality and the Government Lawyer, 5 Geo. J. Legal Ethics 291, 296 (1991) (noting possibilities that government lawyer's client could be the public, the government as a whole, the branch of government in which the lawyer is employed, the particular agency or department in which the lawyer works, and the responsible officers who make decisions for the agency). We do not strive to address or resolve such issues in this opinion. See Rule 1.13, Cmt. [9] ("Defining or identifying the client of a lawyer representing a government entity depends on applicable federal, state and local law and is a matter beyond the scope of these Rules."); N.Y. City 2004-03 ("Ultimately, the question of who is the government lawyer's client is a question of law and not of ethics, and one to which the government lawyer must give careful consideration in each case."). A prevailing approach, however, and the one we follow here, is that (apart from cases like Attorneys Generals' Offices or prosecution agencies), the employing agency is treated as the presumptive client. See, e.g., N.Y. City 2004-03 (assuming generally "that the government agency is for practical purposes the 'client agency'"); Restatement §97, Cmt. c ("For many purposes, the preferable approach on the question presented is to regard the respective agencies as the clients . . ."); Cramton, supra, at 298 ("For day-to-day operating purposes, the government lawyer may properly view as his or her client the particular agency by which the lawyer is employed.").

11. In Santa Clara County Counsel Attorneys Assn. v. Woodside, 7 Cal. 4th 525, 869 P.2d 1142 (Cal. 1994), an association of attorneys in the office of the Santa Clara County Counsel's office sought a declaration from the Supreme Court of California that attorneys in the association would not violate their ethical obligations by bringing a lawsuit against the county counsel's office seeking to enforce statutory collective bargaining rights. Relying on ABA informal opinions concerning the right of in-house lawyers to participate in unions and union job actions, the court recognized a need for a "realistic accommodation between an attorney's professional obligations and the rights he or she may have as an employee." Id. at 551, 869 P.2d at 1157. Accordingly, the court found that:

> "[I]n determining whether an action taken by an attorney or employee association violates the attorney's ethical obligations, we look not to whether the action creates antagonism between the attorney/employee and the client/employer, since such antagonism in the labor relations context is unfortunately commonplace; rather, we seek to ascertain whether an attorney has permitted that antagonism to overstep the boundaries of the employer/employee bargaining relationship and has actually compromised client representation."

Id. at 552, 869 P.2d at 1157. The court distinguished cases in which lawyers had been barred from pursuing claims where prosecution of the lawsuit would make use of confidential information, Balla v. Gambro, 145 Ill. 2d 492, 584 N.E.2d 104 (1991), or where the lawyer's claims impaired the lawyer's ability to defend the client in closely related claims that were assigned to the lawyer, Jones v. Flagship Int'l, 793 F.2d 714 (5th Cir. 1987). Under this analysis, the California court held, "The only realistic accommodation between the enforcement of statutory guaranties under [California labor law] and the enforcement of the Attorneys' professional obligations . . . is to permit [the Attorneys' lawsuit], as would be permitted to other public employees, while at the same time holding the Attorneys to a professional standard that ensures that their actual representation of their client/employer is not compromised." Id. at 553, 869 P.2d at 1157 (emphasis in original).

12. A similar result was reached in a Minnesota case brought by a lawyer alleging retaliatory discharge. Nordling v. Northern State Power Co., 478 N.W.2d 498 (Minn. 1991). While by the time the suit was brought the lawyer was no longer employed by the client, the court's analysis addressed the effect of permitting the suit on the client's usual right to fire a lawyer at any time – an aspect of the current-client relationship. The Minnesota Supreme Court held, "It seems to us . . . that in-house counsel should not be precluded from maintaining an action for breach of a contractual provision in an employee handbook, provided, however, that the essentials of the attorney-client relationship are not compromised." Id. at 502. The court analyzed the particular claim at issue and concluded that it did not "appear to implicate company confidences or secrets" and, while there was a loss of trust between the lawyer and his direct superior, "this is not a loss of trust that necessarily impairs Nordling's attorney-client relationships with the constituencies of the corporate organization." Id. at 502-3; see also Verney v. Pennsylvania Turnpike Comm'n, 903 F. Supp. 826, 832 (M.D. Pa. 1995) (upholding attorney's right to bring retaliatory discharge claim for filing gender discrimination lawsuit where action did not "'so interfere[] with [Plaintiff's] performance of [her] job that it renders [her] ineffective in the position for which [she] was employed'") (citation omitted); Parker v. M&T Chemicals, Inc., 566 A.2d 215, 236 N.J. Super. 451 (App. Div. 1989) (upholding in-house attorney's right to sue former employer for damages under the New Jersey Whistleblowers Act where lawyer complained that he was mistreated and constructively discharged for refusing to join illegal scheme).

13. Ethics committees in this State have considered analogous questions and reached similar conclusions. In N.Y. State 578 (1986), this Committee concluded that lawyers may join a union as long as they comply with all disciplinary rules. "If a conflict arises between union membership and a lawyer's ethical obligations under the Code, the lawyer must withdraw from the union or from the representation, or, if it is obvious that he or she can adequately represent the client . . . must obtain the informed consent of the client to continue the representation."[30] This Committee relied on the ABA ethics opinions upon which the California Supreme Court later relied in concluding that, by analogy, lawyers could sue their current employer as long as the "actual representation of their client/employer was not compromised." Accord N.Y. City 79-55 (1980) (if at any time membership of a lawyer in a union affects or reasonably may affect his or her professional judgment, the lawyer must choose between continuing the union membership and continuing to represent the client affected, unless the informed consent of the client is obtained): N.Y. City 82-75 (1983) (ethical obligations of attorneys employed by Legal Aid Society when their union calls a strike).

14. Similarly, in N.Y. City 1994-1, the ethics committee of the Association of the Bar of the City of New York concluded that a lawyer might sue his former employer for racially discriminatory discharge, as long as care was exercised to avoid disclosing confidential information of the former client. The Committee relied on, inter alia, the wrongful discharge cases discussed above.[31]

15. Based on the foregoing, we conclude that a lawyer who is subject to a sequestration furlough would not violate Rule 1.1(c)(2) merely by exercising his or her statutory right to file an appeal of that furlough on the lawyer's own behalf, but should consider whether doing so would affect his or her representation of the employer-client in violation of any other ethical rules. However, it does not appear likely that the challenges to the furlough would, for example, implicate confidential information, because those challenges would likely be based on considerations of notice and due process common to many employees.

Representation of Agency in MSPB Appeals

16. We turn next to the question of whether a lawyer who is subject to a sequestration furlough may represent the lawyer's employer-client either in connection with MSPB appeals filed by other government employees within the lawyer's agency or in implementation of the furlough generally. Rule 1.7(a)(2) prohibits a lawyer from representing a client where "there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests." As Professor Simon wrote, a "significant" risk is "more than a possibility but less than a certainty." Simon's, supra, at 306.

30 The provisions of the former Code of Professional Responsibility referred to in the Committee's opinion were identical or similar to provisions of the current Rules of Professional Conduct. The text of Rule 1.1(c)(2) closely followed that of DR 7-101(A)(3). See Simon's, supra, at 73.

31 N.Y. City 1994-1 (citing Parker and Nordling). The committee raised a question whether a claim based on the common law, as opposed to statute or an employee handbook, would be permitted, citing the cases, among others, that the California Supreme Court had characterized as ones in which the attorney's suit would violate a separate ethics prohibition. We do not consider such issues here, because we understand that the furlough challenge would be based on statutory and constitutional claims.

17. Here, the risk is that a lawyer's personal interest as an employee subject to a sequestration furlough would alter the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the employer-client when asked to defend the same sequestration furlough or to implement the furlough. This is readily seen with respect to defending a challenge to the furlough: A good outcome for the employer client – that is, upholding the sequestration furlough, particularly as applied to employees at the lawyer's agency – would tend to harm the interests of the lawyer in the lawyer's capacity as an employee of the same agency. Conversely, a bad outcome for the employer-client – overturning the furlough – would tend to benefit the lawyer's personal and financial interests as an employee of the agency. We suspect that the same would be true for at least some of the advice that the lawyer may be asked to provide in connection with implementation of the furlough. The potential furlough could affect a substantial portion of the lawyer's annual income – up to 22 days, or approximately 8.5% of an employee's annual salary. Given this, we conclude that, in the usual case, there is a "significant risk" that a government lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the lawyer's agency would be adversely affected by the lawyer's personal and financial interests in avoiding sequestration cuts as an employee of the same agency. Cf. N.Y. State 578 (1986) (State-employee lawyer who is covered by collective bargaining agreement has a conflict in representing the State in disciplinary proceedings against State employees under the agreement).[32]

18. This conflict is imputed to other lawyers in the same law office. Under Rule 1.10(a), "While lawyers are associated in a firm, none of them shall knowingly represent a client when any one of them practicing alone would be prohibited from doing so by Rule 1.7, 1.8 or 1.9, except as otherwise provided therein."

19. A "firm" is defined to include "a government law office." Rule 1.0(h). Despite that definition, there may possibly be circumstances in which a government law office is not subject to particular rules that apply to firms generally. Comment [3] to Rule 1.0 notes, "Whether lawyers in a government agency or department constitute a firm may depend upon the issue involved or be governed by other law." But in the context of this inquiry and the imputation rule, we are not aware of any governing law or other circumstances that would warrant reading "firm" any more narrowly than its definition. Cf. N.Y. State 900 ¶ 21 (2011) (a County Attorney's office is a "firm" under imputation rule). Our conclusion is reinforced by the Rule's history. Some jurisdictions have adopted versions or interpretations of imputation rules that do not apply to government law offices.[33] The New York State Bar Association endorsed that approach by proposing an amendment that would have made imputation under Rule 1.10(a) inapplicable to government law offices. NYSBA Proposed Rules of Professional Conduct 68 (Feb. 1, 2008) (proposing version of Rule 1.10(e) providing that "[t]he disqualification of lawyers associated in a firm with former or current government lawyers is governed by Rule 1.11"). That proposal, however, was not adopted by the courts.

32 This conclusion may vary with the facts of individual cases, however. Some employees may not view the furlough as a negative development, where, for example, they can replace the lost income from other sources or would welcome the opportunity to devote time to other activities. One inquirer, for example, states that he is indifferent to whether he is furloughed, because he would devote the time to paid service in the military reserve.

33 E.g., ABA Model Rule 1.10(d); ABA Model Rule 1.11, Cmt. [2]; Humphrey v. McLaren, 402 N.W.2d 535 (Minn. 1987); State v. Fitzpatrick, 464 So. 2d 1185 (Fla. 1985); Anderson v. Commissioner of Correction, 15 A.3d 658 (Conn. App. Ct. 2011); ABA Formal 342 (1975) (construing broad imputation rule of DR 5-105 as not applicable to government law offices and citing policy reasons in support).

20. As applied to this inquiry, Rule 1.10 imputes a personal-interest conflict of a lawyer in the government law office to any other lawyer in that office who knows of the conflict. More particularly, it means that if any lawyer in the relevant government law office is subject to the furlough, all lawyers in that law office who know that fact would have a conflict in defending the agency against a challenge to the furlough by any employee of the agency.

21. The existence of a conflict under Rule 1.7(a), however, does not end the inquiry. Under Rule 1.7(b), a lawyer who has a conflict under Rule 1.7(a) may nevertheless represent a client in the matter when certain criteria are met, namely that:

> "(1) the lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client;
> "(2) the representation is not prohibited by law;
> "(3) the representation does not involve the assertion of a claim by one client against another client represented by the lawyer in the same litigation or other proceeding before a tribunal; and
> "(4) each affected client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing."

22. We have held that a public agency can give informed consent, N.Y. State 629 (1992), and we will assume that there are no laws prohibiting the representation. The remaining questions are whether a lawyer subject to the furlough can reasonably conclude that he or she will be able to provide "competent and diligent representation" to the employer's agency, and whether the representation would "involve the assertion of a claim by one client against another client represented by the lawyer in the same litigation or other proceeding before a tribunal." Rule 1.7(b)(1), (3).

23. On the first question, we believe that a lawyer who has not challenged the furlough could well reach a reasonable conclusion that he or she could set aside the effect on himself or herself, and competently and diligently represent the agency in defending a challenge or advising on implementation of the furlough. This is particularly the case because of the nature of the issues likely to arise in the challenge cases, which go to statutory and constitutional issues and not questions of deeply personal choice or belief.

24. Where a lawyer does file his or her own appeal against the sequestration furlough, however, we doubt that the lawyer could reasonably reach the conclusion that he or she could competently and diligently defend the agency against a similar appeal by another employee, at least where, as is likely to be the case, the issues in the lawyer's own case and those of the defense are the same. It is not just that the lawyer could profit personally from losing the argument. As a matter of common experience, a litigant frequently has or acquires a deeply held belief in the justness of his or her cause, and the merits of the arguments advanced in support, so as to make it difficult to pursue the contrary position wholeheartedly. A recent opinion by the ethics committee of the District of Columbia Bar reaches the same conclusion under the identical language of D.C. Bar Rule 1.7(c)(2):

> "In our view, the reasonable belief requirement of Rule 1.7(c)(2) is a difficult obstacle to surmount if the lawyer is asked to defend the agency against a furlough complaint > with allegations that are substantially similar to the allegations she has raised in her own furlough complaint against the agency. The level of difficulty increases with the similarity of the allegations in the complaints."

District of Columbia Opinion 365 (2013).[34]

25. We do not believe that this condition of nonconsentability extends to all lawyers in the agency, however. Rule 1.10(d) contains a specific provision for consent to imputed disqualification: "A disqualification prescribed by this Rule may be waived by the affected client or former client under the conditions stated in Rule 1.7." Thus, if the lawyer pursuing the appeal is Lawyer A and the lawyer to whom the conflict would be imputed is Lawyer B, the conflict imputed to Lawyer B can be waived under the conditions in Rule 1.7. Under our analysis above, Lawyer B (if not pursuing his or her own appeal) may reasonably conclude that he or she "will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client" within the meaning of Rule 1.7(b)(1), so that the conflict imputed to Lawyer B can be waived by the client agency. In other words, in deciding whether an imputed conflict (in the language of Rule 1.10(d), the "disqualification prescribed by this Rule") can be waived, it is necessary to apply the standards set forth in Rule 1.7(b) to the lawyer to whom the conflict is imputed.

26. In many kinds of cases, a conclusion that Lawyer A has a nonconsentable conflict will likewise apply to Lawyer B. For example, in a private law firm setting, if Lawyer A's nonconsentable conflict arises from the fact that Lawyer A cannot give enough information to one of Lawyer A's clients in order to obtain informed consent to take on representation of another client (e.g., because the matter to be handled for the new client involves a still-secret hostile action to be taken against the other client), that condition would affect all lawyers in Lawyer A's firm. But where the nonconsentable nature of Lawyer A's conflict is personal to Lawyer A, the circumstances may well allow the client to consent to representation by Lawyer B.

27. To be clear, this is not to suggest that the conflict is not imputed in the first place. Nothing about Rule 1.10(d), which deals only with consent to waive an imputed conflict, alters the basic rule that all conflicts under Rules 1.7, 1.8 and 1.9 – whether derived from representation of another client or from personal circumstances of one lawyer in the law firm – are imputed to all lawyers in the firm under the standards set forth in Rule 1.10(a).

28. There is one form of nonconsentable conflict that presents a different problem, and that is the situation presented by Rule 1.7(b)(3), which bars a lawyer from representing clients on both sides of the same litigation or other proceeding before a tribunal. Lawyer A cannot appear on both sides of a litigation, but can Lawyer A appear adverse to Lawyer B from the same law firm in that litigation? We think that such a situation would be governed by different considerations because litigation involves the interests not just of the affected client or clients but also of the public and the judiciary. For example, where a matter is in litigation, the appearance of lawyers from the same firm may deprive the 34 Whether the lawyer could represent the agency in advising on implementation of the furlough would depend, as the D.C. Bar opinion concluded, on how close the questions on which advice is sought are to the lawyer's claims in the challenge to the furlough. The Philadelphia Bar Association ethics committee concluded that the conflict presented by the furlough is waivable, even if the lawyer might later file an appeal of his or her own, but did not expressly discuss the question of a lawyer defending the agency while at the same time pursuing an appeal. Phila. 2013-3.

judiciary and the public of the confidence that the adversary system, on which the development of the law depends, will function as it should. But we do not address that question with finality here, as the issue is not presented.[35]

29. Finally, we note that other provisions of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct, and our previous opinions, provide for a "rule of necessity," which allows lawyers – in particular, government lawyers – to engage in an otherwise impermissible representation in cases where there is no one else who can act. See, e.g., Rule 1.11(d)(1) (permitting a government attorney to participate in a matter in which the lawyer "participated personally and substantially while in private practice or nongovernmental employment" in cases where "under applicable law no one is, or by lawful designation may be, authorized to act in the lawyer's stead in the matter"); N.Y. State 638 (1992) ("The rule of necessity thus recognizes that, as a matter of ethics, Lawyer should not be disciplined for undertaking a prosecution that the law requires and a court directs Lawyer to undertake, even if Lawyer personally and substantially participated in the matter while in private practice."); cf. N.Y. State 675 (1995) ("[I]n recognizing that a prosecuting attorney seeking reelection is not bound by the same limitations on his conduct as otherwise attach when he is not a candidate for reelection, we do so not for ethical reasons but under a notion of necessity in deference to the realities of the political elective process."). Ordinarily, if outside counsel, or counsel from another agency, could lawfully represent the agency, that would obviate the need to invoke any rule of necessity. N.Y. State 638 ("The disqualification created by DR 9-101(B)(3)(a) [now Rule 1.11(d)(1)] depends on the availability as a matter of law of a special prosecutor."). We have insufficient facts to determine whether a rule of necessity would apply to the inquiries before us.

CONCLUSION:

30. For the reasons stated, and subject to the qualifications set forth above, a lawyer who is employed by a government agency and is subject to employment furloughs resulting from "sequestration" may exercise his or her statutory right to appeal the sequestration furlough before the MSPB, so long as the dispute does not impermissibly affect his or her representation of the employing agency. A government lawyer who is subject to a sequestration furlough, or knows that another lawyer in the same government law office is subject to such a furlough, may only represent the employee's agency before the MSPB in actions brought by other agency employees if (i) the agency gives informed consent, confirmed in writing, prior to the lawyer engaging in such representation and (ii) the lawyer does not file his or her own appeal with the MSPB.

(16-13)

35 None of the inquirers proposes to represent the agency adverse to a lawyer from the same government agency. Rule 1.7(b)(3) by its terms only applies when lawyers are representing clients on both sides of the case. Here, the appealing lawyer would be the client, or would be proceeding pro se, and would not be representing a client (other than him- or herself). Even so, however, other lawyers in the office could have a personal conflict of interest that would prevent them from competently and diligently representing the agency (even with consent) against a colleague working in the same office.

TOPIC: Limiting an attorney's liability

DIGEST: A lawyer may ethically ask a client to indemnify the lawyer against potential malpractice or other claims by a third-party addressee of an opinion letter to the client.

RULES: 1.8(h)

FACTS:

1. A client has requested that an opinion letter to be written by the inquirer be addressed not only to the client but also to the client's lessee.

QUESTION:

2. May the attorney ethically request prospectively that the client indemnify the attorney against a lawsuit brought by the third-party lessee?

OPINION:

3. Rule 1.8(h)(1) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct provides that a lawyer shall not "make an agreement prospectively limiting the lawyer's liability to a client for malpractice." Comment [14] to this Rule notes: "Agreements prospectively limiting a lawyer's liability for malpractice are prohibited because they are likely to undermine competent and diligent representation." Thus, it is clear that the attorney could not prospectively enter into an agreement with the client that would require the client to indemnify the lawyer against a judgment in favor of the client, or otherwise hold the lawyer harmless for any liability to the client, arising from legal malpractice.

4. In the instant case, however, the lawyer seeks indemnity against any malpractice or other claims that might be brought by a non-client, that is, the client's lessee who is the third-party addressee on the opinion letter. The Rules contemplate that a lawyer at the request of a client may provide an opinion that will be provided to a third party: "A lawyer may provide an evaluation of a matter affecting a client for the use of someone other than the client if the lawyer reasonably believes that making the evaluation is compatible with other aspects of the lawyer's relationship with the client." Rule 2.3(a). As Comment [3] notes, a legal duty to the third party "may or may not arise," and that is a question of law. See, e.g., Prudential Ins. Co. of America v. Dewey, Ballantine, Bushby, Palmer & Wood, 80 N.Y. 2d 377, 605 N.E.2d 318, 590 N.Y.S.2d 831 (1992). Whether or not a legal duty to the third party arises, however, the third party, absent other facts, is not a client of the attorney.

5. Given that the prohibition of Rule 1.8(h) applies only to prospective agreements limiting liability to the lawyer's client, we conclude that a lawyer may prospectively request indemnity against potential malpractice or other claims that could be asserted by a third party. See Report of the ABA Business Law Section Task Force on Delivery of Document Review Reports to Third Parties, 67 Bus. Law. 99 (2011) ("While professional ethics rules normally prohibit lawyers from prospectively limiting their liability to clients, these prohibitions do not apply to non-clients."); Michigan Opinion RI-

258 (1996) (lawyer serving as guardian ad litem may negotiate for release of liability from families and other interested persons because the lawyer's duty is to the child only).

6. We note that the potential harm expressed in Comment [14] to Rule 1.8 does not arise where the client agrees to indemnify the lawyer against a malpractice judgment or other claims arising from harm to the third party. Such indemnification seems unlikely to undermine competent and diligent representation of the client, because the lawyer may not prospectively enter into an agreement limiting malpractice liability to such client.

CONCLUSION:

7. A lawyer may ethically ask a client to indemnify the lawyer against potential malpractice or other claims by a third-party addressee of an opinion letter to the client.

OPINION 970 (06/21/2013)

TOPIC: Disclosure of deceased client's file

DIGEST: If an executrix of a decedent's estate who seeks files possessed by the decedent's former attorney is legally entitled to the same access that the decedent had when alive, then the former attorney should ordinarily provide the executrix access to all those files. If, on the other hand, her status as executrix does not confer on her the same legal right as the decedent possessed, then the contents of a deceased client's file will generally not be disclosable to the executrix unless (1) the information disclosed is not "confidential information" or (2) the lawyer has grounds to conclude that release of the information is impliedly authorized.

RULES: 1.6(a), 1.9(c), 1.15(c), 1.16(e)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer represented a client who is now deceased. The executrix of the former client's estate has requested the client's file. The inquirer wants to know his obligations regarding this request.

QUESTION:

2. What are a lawyer's obligations regarding a request for a former client's file from the executrix or executor of that former client's estate?

OPINION:

This inquiry turns on a threshold legal question: does an executrix of an estate stand in the shoes of a decedent to such a degree that the executrix is entitled to access the decedent's confidential information?[36] Matters of law, however, are beyond the purview of this Committee. Accordingly, we do not

36 The answer to this legal question may be yes, no, or "it depends on the circumstances." In the context of litigation brought on behalf of an estate against an estate planning attorney, the Court of Appeals, recognizing the special legal relationship between a personal representative and a decedent, concluded that "privity, or a relationship sufficiently approaching privity, exists between the personal representative of an estate and the estate planning attorney." Estate of Schneider v. Finmann, 15 N.Y.3d 306, 309 (2010). Moreover, there is considerable support for the proposition that, at least in certain circumstances, an executrix is authorized to waive the attorney-client privilege of the decedent. See Mayorga v. Tate, 302 A.D.2d 11, 11-12 (2d Dept. 2002) (concluding that an executor may waive the privilege "in the interest of the deceased client's estate"); accord In re Colby, 723 N.Y.S.2d 631 (N.Y. Co. Sur. Ct. 2001). There is, however, at least in older cases, some support for the view that an executor cannot waive a decedent's attorney-client privilege. See, e.g., Westover v. Aetna Life Ins. Co., 99 N.Y. 56 (1885) (presenting question of doctor-patient privilege, though opinion also addresses attorney-client privilege) ("An executor or administrator does not represent the deceased for the purpose of making such a waiver."); Matter of Beiny, 129 A.D.2d 126, 517 N.Y.S.2d 474, 479 (1st Dep't 1987) ("While it is questionable whether even a duly appointed executor would have had the power to waive the decedent's attorney-client privilege . . . , it is quite certain that one merely named as executor in an unprobated will would have had no authority whatsoever to do so."); Matter of Alexander, 130 N.Y.S.2d 648 (Sur. Ct. Suff. Co. 1954) ("it should be borne in mind that the power to waive the privilege arising out of the relationship of attorney and client ended with the death of the client so that no one can now waive it"); cf. CPLR §4504(c) (allowing personal representative to waive doctor-patient privilege of deceased client except as to "information which would tend to disgrace the memory of the decedent"). It is worth noting, additionally, that the duty of confidentiality is broader than the attorney-client privilege. See Comment [3] to Rule 1.6 ("The confidentiality duty applies not only to matters communicated in confidence to the client, which are protected by the attorney-client privilege, but also to all information gained during and relating to representation, whatever its source.").

opine on this threshold question. Instead we consider the implications of the alternative answers under the Rules of Professional Conduct (the Rules).

3. In any circumstances in which the answer to the legal question is yes, this inquiry is straightforwardly controlled by N.Y. State 766 (2003), which concluded that a former client is presumptively entitled to access to all his files possessed by his former attorney. The opinion was influenced by Sage Realty Corp. v. Proskauer Rose Goetz & Mendelson, 91 N.Y.2d 30, 34 (1997), which adopted the majority rule that upon termination of an attorney-client relationship, a client is "presumptively accord[ed] . . . full access to the entire attorney's file on a represented matter with narrow exceptions."[37]

4. N.Y. State 766 was based on two provisions in the Code of Professional Responsibility, DRs 9-102(c) and 2-110(A)(2), which are now comparably set forth in Rules 1.15(c)(4) and 1.16(e). Rule 1.15(c)(4) provides that "a lawyer shall . . . promptly pay or deliver to the client or third person the funds, securities, or other properties in the possession of the lawyer that the client or third person is entitled to receive." Rule 1.16(e), which addresses termination of representation, provides, in relevant part:

> "A lawyer shall take steps, to the extent reasonably practicable, to avoid foreseeable prejudice to the rights of the client, including . . . delivering to the client all papers and property to which the client is entitled . . . ."

These provisions of the current Rules support our conclusion in N.Y. State 766 just as did the corresponding provisions of the prior Code.

5. Thus if, as a matter of law, an executrix stands in the shoes of a decedent for these purposes, then the executrix is presumptively entitled to access to the decedent's files possessed by the inquirer, subject only to the inquirer's ability, as to particular materials, to make a substantial showing of good cause to refuse client access.

6. If, on the other hand, an executrix's legal status does not confer on her a general right of access to the decedent's confidential information (and the rest of this opinion is based on that assumption), then the inquirer's professional responsibilities are more complicated. Rule 1.9(c)(2) addresses a lawyer's obligation to refrain from revealing confidential information of a former client.

7. Rule 1.9(c)(2) provides that "[a] lawyer who has formerly represented a client in a matter or whose present or former firm has formerly represented a client in a matter shall not thereafter . . . reveal confidential information of the former client protected by Rule 1.6 except as these Rules would permit or require with respect to a current client." The protections of Rule 1.6, as applied through 37 Exceptions arise when the attorney can make "a substantial showing . . . of good cause to refuse client access." For example, the attorney "should not be required to disclose documents which might violate a duty of nondisclosure owed to a third party, or otherwise imposed by law," or "firm documents intended for internal law office review and use." 91 N.Y.2d at 37.

Rule 1.9(c)(2), are not limited to former clients who are still alive; those protections continue to apply as to a deceased former client.[38]

8. Rule 1.6 defines "confidential information" as consisting of

> "information gained during or relating to the representation of a client, whatever its source, that is (a) protected by the attorney-client privilege, (b) likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed, or (c) information that the client has requested to be kept confidential. 'Confidential information' does not ordinarily include (i) a lawyer's knowledge of legal research or (ii) information that is generally known in the local community or in the trade, field or profession to which the information relates."

A lawyer is, of course, permitted to provide those contents of a deceased client's file that do not fall within Rule 1.6's definition of confidential information. See D.C. Opinion 324 (2004) (attorney whose client is deceased may turn over information that is not a confidence or secret to client's spouse who is executor of client's estate).

9. As to confidential information, Rule 1.6(a)(2) allows for disclosure that is "impliedly authorized to advance the best interests of the client and is either reasonable under the circumstances or customary in the professional community." Comment [5] to Rule 1.6 notes, for example, that in some situations, "a disclosure that facilitates a satisfactory conclusion to a matter" may be impliedly authorized. Indeed, we believe that implied authorization will comfortably cover many disclosures that an attorney would contemplate making to a former client's executor. See D.C. Opinion 324 (2004) ("In the ordinary case, release of information an executor requests would be authorized under" D.C.'s comparable Rule 1.6); Disciplinary Board of the Hawaii Opinion 38 (1999) (attorney disclosure to executor of former client's estate "is impliedly authorized in order to carry out the representation"); North Carolina Opinion 206 (1995) (a lawyer may reveal a client's confidential information to the personal representative of the client's estate, unless the disclosure would be contrary to the goals of the original representation or would be contrary to the client's instructions to the lawyer).

10. A lawyer in the inquirer's situation needs to consider whether the circumstances meet the standards for implied authorization, taking into account factors including what is known about the deceased client's wishes. For example, disclosure of information pertinent to the settlement of an estate may often be appropriate where the lawyer provided trusts and estates representation to the deceased client and such disclosure would facilitate the client's testamentary disposition in a way that

38 See, e.g., D.C. Opinion 324 (2004); Philadelphia Opinion 2007-6 (following American College of Trust and Estate Counsel commentary on Rule 1.6 that in general, "the lawyer's duty of confidentiality continues after the death of a client"); South Carolina Opinion 05-09 (effect of Rule 1.6 "continues after the representation has ended . . . , and many, if not most, jurisdictions that have issued ethics opinions believe the rule extends after the death of the client"); cf. Swidler & Berlin v. United States, 524 U.S. 399 (1998) (recognizing prevailing common-law rule that despite death of a client, material that had been protected by attorney-client privilege remains so unless subject to an exception) (citing cases including People v. Modzelewski, 203 A.D.2d 594 (2d Dept. 1994)); Mayorga v. Tate, 302 A.D.2d at 11-12 (asserting that "the attorney-client privilege . . . survives the death of the client for whose benefit the privilege exists" and citing cases); People v. Vespucci, 745 N.Y.S.2d 391 (Nassau Co. Ct. 2002) (surveying five approaches to issue of whether privilege survives, and finding support in New York law for two of the five approaches, both involving survival of the privilege, when privilege belonged to an deceased individual rather than an "expired corporation").

the client would have favored. See D.C. Opinion 324 (disclosure to executor permitted where release of information would further the interests of former client in settling estate).[39]

11. Even where the lawyer prepared the client's will, however, there may be confidential information in the client's file that would not facilitate the settling of the client's estate or for other reasons may not advance the best interests of the client. In that case the material must remain undisclosed. See Nassau County 03-4 (2003) (attorney who represented client who died before divorce action was commenced could not provide itemized billing to spouse-executor where information sought would reveal information that client wanted to keep secret); D.C. Opinion 324 (2004) (citing ethics opinions and concluding that an attorney "who reasonably believes that she knows what her client would have wanted, on the basis of either what the client told her or the best available evidence of what the client's instructions would have been, should carry out her client's wishes").

CONCLUSION:

12. When the executrix of an estate seeks files possessed by the decedent's former attorney, the ethical obligations of that attorney turn on the legal rights of the executrix. If the executrix is legally entitled to the same access that the decedent had when alive, then the former attorney should ordinarily provide the executrix access to all the files, except when there is good cause to refuse access to particular materials.

13. If, on the other hand, her status as executrix does not confer on her the same legal right of access as the decedent possessed, then the contents of a deceased client's file will generally not be disclosable to the executrix unless (1) the information disclosed is not "confidential information" or (2) the lawyer has grounds to conclude that release of the information is impliedly authorized under the Rules.

39 If an executor can waive a decedent's attorney-client privilege when it is "in the best interest of the deceased's estate," Mayorga v. Tate, 302 A.D.2d 11-12, the applicable waiver analysis in that situation will often be comparable to the analysis employed under the implied authorization doctrine.

Overrules N.Y. State 524

TOPIC: Solicitation; auction of legal services by charity

DIGEST: Subject to disclosure requirements and limitations, a lawyer may donate legal services to a charitable organization for auction as a fund-raising device.

RULES: 1.1(b), 1.2(c), 1.7, 1.9, 7.1, 7.2(a)

FACTS:

1. In N.Y. State 524 (1980), this Committee concluded that it is improper for a lawyer to donate legal services to a charitable organization for auction as a fund-raising device. The inquirer asks whether this remains the Committee's opinion under the New York Rules of Professional Conduct.

QUESTION:

2. May a lawyer donate legal services to a charitable organization for auction as a fund-raising device?

OPINION:

3. N.Y. State 524 concluded that a lawyer may not donate legal services to a charitable organization for a fund-raising auction. The principal reasoning was as follows:

> [A] lawyer who has committed his services to be auctioned is unable to exercise the professional judgment and discretion that must be brought to bear in deciding to accept a client. The Code specifies a number of factors relating to the client and the legal matter that a lawyer must consider prior to undertaking representation. . . . For example, and most obviously, a lawyer "should accept employment only in matters which he is or intends to become competent to handle." EC 6-1. In the context of a charitable auction, the lawyer has agreed to represent the successful bidder without knowing whether the employment will involve him in a matter beyond his competence.

Additionally, the Committee expressed concern that "[t]he practice of donating legal services to a charitable organization to be auctioned as a fundraising device may also be deemed improper under DR 2-103(B), which prohibits the lawyer from giving anything of value to a third party for recommending or obtaining the lawyer's employment." Finally, the Committee expressed a concern that "the offering of legal services as a fundraising device does not appear to be an appropriate means of publicizing the lawyer whose services are being offered," because the Committee believed that such devices "tend to confuse the process of intelligent selection of counsel with the objectives of the fund-raising organization."

4. Most other ethics committees that considered the question at around the same time reached a similar conclusion. See, e.g., ABA Inf. 1250 (1972) (advertising the auction of the lawyer's services by a charitable organization would contravene the spirit of the advertising and solicitation rules and be undignified); Kentucky Opinion E-239 (1981) (the auction does not facilitate an informed decision whether to retain the lawyer "but merely forces a particular person(s) to go to a particular lawyer"); New Jersey Opinion 319 (1975) ("this arrangement puts the charity in the position of recommending [the] attorney and then being remunerated by him for the introduction"); San Diego County Opinion 1974-19 (1974) ("An attorney may not offer free legal services to a charitable organization because such would be a solicitation of business."). But see California Opinion 1982-65 (auctioning legal services in a charitable fund raiser is not forbidden, and "the benefits that flow from an attorney's donation of legal services" outweigh "the remote likelihood of abuse of fundamental public policies," but the lawyer must comport with limitations established by the advertising, competence and conflict rules).

5. The language of the rules applicable to this inquiry has not meaningfully changed since 1980, when this Committee issued Opinion 524. The restriction on undertaking work for which the lawyer is unqualified is codified in Rule 1.1(b), which generally provides: "A lawyer shall not handle a legal matter that the lawyer knows or should know that the lawyer is not competent to handle . . . ." The earlier solicitation rule against compensating others for recommending the lawyer's services has been carried over into Rule 7.2(a), which provides, subject to exceptions inapplicable here, that: "A lawyer shall not compensate or give anything of value to recommend or obtain employment by a client . . . ."

6. Nonetheless, the courts' approach and, accordingly, this Committee's approach to interpreting rules on lawyers' advertising and solicitation has become less restrictive since 1980, particularly in light of evolving constitutional case law under the First Amendment recognizing the right of lawyers and other professionals to engage in commercial speech.[40] Where once this Committee interpreted advertising and solicitation rules sweepingly to prevent deceit and the other harms against which the rules protect, the Committee now interprets the rules more cautiously. Our objective is to effectuate the rules' language and purpose consistently with the public interest in access to information about lawyers' services, and lawyers' legitimate interest in marketing their services. See, e.g., N.Y. State 897 (2011) (concluding that "[l]awyer may market legal services on a 'deal of the day' or 'group coupon' website provided that the advertising is not misleading or deceptive and makes clear that no lawyer-client relationship will be formed until the lawyer can check for conflicts and competence to provide the services").

7. Since the mid-1980s, perhaps influenced by the courts' evolving approach to lawyers' advertising and solicitation, many more ethics committees have concluded, contrary to Opinion 524, that subject to certain restrictions, lawyers may donate legal services to a charitable organization to be auctioned at a fund-raising promotion. See, e.g., Florida Opinion 86-9 (1987); Hawaii Opinion 31 (1992); Indiana Opinion 4 of 2008 (identifying caveats, including that the lawyer must be competent, avoid conflicts, and ensure that the client is satisfied with the choice of counsel, and that the description of the attorney must not include laudatory remarks or claims of special expertise); Nebraska

40 See, e.g., N.Y. State 933 (2012) (citing, among other sources, Ibanez v. Florida Dep't of Business and Professional Regulation, 512 U.S. 136 (1994), which struck down advertising restriction on lawyer-accountant); N.Y. State 757 (2002) (discussing implications of Peel v. Attorney Registration and Disciplinary Commission of Illinois, 496 U.S. 91 (1990), which recognized a lawyer's First Amendment right to state on letterhead "certified civil trial specialist by the National Board of Trial Advocacy"); N.Y. State 637 (1992) (citing, among other cases, von Wiegen v. Committee on Professional Standards, 63 N.Y.2d 163, 481 N.Y.S.2d 40 (1984), holding that the blanket prohibition of mail solicitation of accident victims is unconstitutional).

Opinion 06-11 (2007) (rescinding earlier opinion, and reasoning that "the possibility of misleading information being communicated to the bidders could be adequately protected against by the attorney in the wording of the auction item that the services would only be in the lawyer's area of competence, that the attorney retains the right to decline the service for conflicts or other ethical problems in which case the price would be refunded by the attorney, and that communications regarding the auction not be false and misleading"); South Carolina Opinion 91-35 (1991) ("to avoid misleading the recipient of donated services, the donating lawyer must offer the services with certain express qualifications, clarifications, and reservations"). But see Nassau County Opinion 97-11 (1998); New Hampshire Opinion 1990-91/2 (1991) (finding that because of ethical concerns, lawyers should not donate their services to a charitable fund raiser even though the rules do not explicitly prohibit doing so); Ohio Opinion 2002-5 (concluding that donating legal services "is a giving of a thing of value which secures employment of the lawyer").

8. For example, Hawaii's ethics committee concluded:

> A lawyer may donate his or her legal services to a charitable cause or nonprofit corporation, to be auctioned to the highest bidder in fund-raising promotions, provided that:
> (a) only services for which the lawyer has the requisite competence are donated;
> (b) the legal services donated and the identity of the lawyer who will perform the services must be clearly designated at the auction (for example, "preparation of a will by John Doe, Esq.");
> (c) the lawyer retains the right to decline his or her provision of the donated services in the event of a conflict of interest or for similar cause, in which event the lawyer must take steps to ensure that any auction bid paid by the prospective client is promptly refunded by the charitable organization, nonprofit corporation, or by the lawyer; and
> (d) the lawyer takes steps to ensure that communications or advertisements regarding the auction (i) accurately describe the donated legal services and the identity of the lawyer who will perform the services, and (ii) are not false, fraudulent, misleading or deceptive.

Hawaii Opinion 31 (1992) (original emphasis).

9. Likewise, Florida's ethics committee concluded, among other things, that the lawyer (1) must comply with applicable advertising rules, including by "ensur[ing] that the charitable organization, in publicizing and conducting the auction, does not describe the offered legal service in a false or misleading manner," which the lawyer can accomplish by providing the description and requiring preapproval, and (2) "should have a guarantee from the charitable organization that the successful bidder's money will be refunded on request if the lawyer is prevented by any of the conflict rules from performing the auctioned service for that person." Florida Opinion 86-9 (1987).

10. On reexamining N.Y. State 524, we conclude for the following reasons that, consistent with the language and purposes of the Rules, a lawyer may properly donate legal services to a charitable organization to be auctioned in exchange for a contribution to the organization. However, limitations and conditions apply, including those identified in the Hawaii and Florida bar opinions noted above.

11. First, as N.Y. State 524 correctly recognized, a lawyer will not necessarily be able to provide the requested legal services to the winner of the auction. A lawyer may not accept a representation that the lawyer cannot perform competently. Rule 1.1(b). Nor may a lawyer accept a representation if it would involve an impermissible conflict of interest. See, e.g., Rules 1.7 and 1.9. In allowing his or her services to be auctioned, the lawyer must ensure that bidders are apprised of these limitations and any other applicable limitations in advance, so that prospective clients are not misled. The lawyer must also ensure that the charitable organization sponsoring the auction will offer to refund the bidder's contribution if for any reason the lawyer ultimately cannot provide the relevant legal services. But the fact that there are limitations does not mean that the lawyer cannot participate at all. See, e.g., N.Y. State 897 (2011), cited above.

12. Second, we conclude on reflection that participating in a charitable fundraising auction does not violate Rule 7.2(a) by giving something of value to the charitable organization for the purpose of having it recommend the lawyer's services. The lawyer's purpose is to assist the organization's charitable fund-raising efforts, not to secure a referral. Indeed, it is fair to assume that lawyers will conclude that they have achieved their primary purpose if the winning bidder simply makes a donation without seeking to take advantage of the lawyer's uncompensated services.

13. Third, we do not believe that a charitable fund-raising auction of the lawyer's services will necessarily undermine the prospective client's ability to make an intelligent selection of counsel. However, the lawyer must ensure that sufficient information is provided, including about the areas of law in which the lawyer practices, to enable prospective bidders intelligently to decide whether to bid on the lawyer's services.

14. Fourth, the lawyer must comply with the advertising rules, as applicable,[41] including Rule 7.1(a)(1), which forbids any "false, deceptive or misleading" statements or claims in advertising the lawyer's services. Therefore, only accurate information about the lawyer should be provided to potential bidders. The scope of the services to be provided should be clearly described, cf. Rule 7.1(j), as should the limitations on the lawyer's ability to provide services.

15. Often the auctioned service may be a discrete one, such as the preparation of a simple will. However, if the lawyer were to offer a service of limited scope – e.g., a set number of hours of advice concerning estate planning – the representation would have to comport with Rule 1.2(c). That is, any limitation must be "reasonable under the circumstances," which means that the services may not be too limited to be useful to the client. If the lawyer proposes to donate a limited number of hours of advice to be auctioned by the charitable organization, but to offer the client foreseeably needed additional services for a fee, the auction materials should indicate that as well.

41 Rule 1.0(a) defines an "advertisement" as "any public or private communication made by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm about that lawyer or law firm's services, the primary purpose of which is for the retention of the lawyer or law firm." Promotional material concerning the lawyer's services, and distributed by the organization sponsoring the charitable auction, may constitute an "advertisement" under that definition. Although the lawyer's primary purpose in donating his or her services is not to secure a referral but to make a charitable contribution, the primary purpose of the promotional material describing the lawyer's services may be "for the retention of the lawyer," since that is the incentive that the organization offers to attract bids. And even if such materials are not deemed advertising, provisions in Rule 8.4 indicate that the lawyer should not assist the charitable organization in disseminating false or misleading information.

CONCLUSION:

16. Subject to disclosure requirements and limitations as described in this opinion, a lawyer may donate legal services to a charitable organization for auction as a fund-raising device.

OPINION 972 (06/26/2013)

TOPIC: Listing in social media

DIGEST: Law firm may not list its services under heading of "Specialties" on a social media site, and lawyer may not do so unless certified as a specialist by an appropriate organization or governmental authority.

RULE: 7.4

FACTS:

1. The inquiring lawyer's firm has created a page on LinkedIn, a professional network social media site. A firm that lists itself on the site can, in the "About" segment of the listing, include a section labeled "Specialties." The firm can put items under that label but cannot change the label itself. However, the firm can, in the "About" segment, include other sections entitled "Skills and Expertise," "Overview," "Industry," and "Products & Services."

QUESTION:

2. When a lawyer or law firm provides certain kinds of legal services, and is listed on a social media site that includes a section labeled "Specialties," may the lawyer or law firm use that section to describe the kinds of services provided?

OPINION:

3. The New York Rules of Professional Conduct allow lawyers and law firms to make statements about their areas of practice, but the Rules also limit the wording of such statements:

> A lawyer or law firm may publicly identify one or more areas of law in which the lawyer or the law firm practices, or may state that the practice of the lawyer or law firm is limited to one or more areas of law, provided that the lawyer or law firm shall not state that the lawyer or law firm is a specialist or specializes in a particular field of law, except as provided in Rule 7.4(c).

Rule 7.4(a) (emphasis added). The exception in Rule 7.4(c) allows a lawyer to state the fact of certification as a specialist, along with a mandated disclaimer, if the lawyer is certified as a specialist in a particular area by a private organization approved for that purpose by the American Bar Association, or by the authority having jurisdiction over specialization under the laws of another state or territory.[42]

4. A lawyer or law firm listed on a social media site may, under Rule 7.4(a), identify one or more areas of law practice. But to list those areas under a heading of "Specialties" would constitute a claim that the lawyer or law firm "is a specialist or specializes in a particular field of law" and thus, absent certification as provided in Rule 7.4(c), would violate Rule 7.4(a). See N.Y. State 559 (1984) (under the Rule's similar predecessor in Code of Professional Responsibility, it would be improper for lawyer to be listed in law school alumni directory cross-referenced by "legal specialty"). We do not in this opinion address whether the lawyer or law firm could, consistent with Rule 7.4(a), list practice areas under other headings such as "Products & Services" or "Skills and Expertise."

42 Also, Rule 7.4(b) allows a lawyer admitted to patent practice before the United States Patent and Trademark Office to use a designation such as "Patent Attorney." This opinion does not address the particular circumstances of such patent attorneys.

5. If a lawyer has been certified as a specialist in a particular area of law or law practice by an organization or authority as provided in Rule 7.4(c), then the lawyer may so state if the lawyer complies with that Rule's disclaimer provisions, which have undergone recent change.[43] However, Rule 7.4(c) does not provide that a law firm (as opposed to an individual lawyer) may claim recognition or certification as a specialist, and Rule 7.4(a) would therefore prohibit such a claim by a firm.

CONCLUSION:

6. A law firm may not list its services under the heading "Specialties" on a social media site. A lawyer may not list services under that heading unless the lawyer is certified in conformity with the provisions of Rule 7.4(c).

(22-13)

43 In Hayes v. Grievance Comm. of the Eighth Jud. Dist., 672 F. 3d 158 (2d Cir. 2012), the Court struck down two parts of the Rule's required disclaimers. One part was the language that "certification is not a requirement for the practice of law in the State of New York and does not necessarily indicate greater competence than other attorneys experienced in this field of law." Subsequently, by order dated June 25, 2012, the Appellate Divisions deleted that language from the required disclaimers. (The other part of the originally required disclaimers – that a certifying organization is not affiliated with a governmental authority, or alternatively that certification granted by another government is not recognized by any New York governmental authority – remains in place.) The Hayes court also held that Rule 7.4's requirement that disclaimers be "prominently made" was unconstitutionally void for vagueness as applied to the plaintiff. In a memorandum dated May 31, 2013, the Unified Court System requested comments from interested persons with respect to defining the term "prominently made." A lawyer asserting a specialty risks violation of Rule 7.4(c) if the social media site does not satisfy the requirement of "prominently" making the required disclaimer. See Rule 8.4(a) (violation of Rules "through the acts of another").

TOPIC: Conflicts in arguing ineffective assistance; imputation of conflicts within legal aid organization

DIGEST: Appellate lawyer in a legal aid organization may not represent a defendant on an appeal that will assert ineffective assistance by trial counsel employed in the same organization unless circumstances allow defendant's waiver of the appellate lawyer's conflict of interest.

RULES: 1.7(a); 1.10(a)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a member of the appeals unit of a legal aid organization. A lawyer in the trial unit of the same legal aid organization represented a certain defendant at trial, and the trial resulted in a conviction. The inquirer proposes to prosecute the defendant's criminal appeal even though ineffective assistance of trial counsel will be asserted as a basis of the appeal. It is presupposed that that there is at least a colorable basis for arguing ineffective assistance of counsel, and that such argument will reflect adversely on trial counsel.[44]

QUESTION:

2. May an appellate legal aid attorney prosecute the appeal of a criminal defendant who was represented at trial by another lawyer in the inquirer's legal aid organization, when the appeal will argue that the defendant was denied effective assistance of trial counsel?

OPINION:

3. The touchstones for our analysis are Rules 1.7 and 1.10 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct. The answer to the inquiry will depend on whether the inquirer, under those Rules, is subject to a "personal-interest" conflict that precludes the inquirer's prosecution of the appeal. The basic standard for personal-interest conflicts is set forth in Rule 1.7(a):

> Except as provided in paragraph (b) [governing waiver], a lawyer shall not represent a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that . . . (2) there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests.

4. On the facts of the inquiry, a personal-interest conflict could arise either directly or by imputation. A conflict could arise directly because the inquirer has an interest in the reputation of the legal aid organization that employs both the inquirer and the inquirer's allegedly ineffective colleague. Moreover, the inquirer presumably has an interest in collegiality within the office, and may not wish to alienate a colleague by attacking his work. The risk of an adverse effect on the inquirer's professional judgment would be magnified if the inquirer has a friendship or close professional relationship with trial counsel whose work would be criticized on appeal; if trial counsel has a high-level position within the legal aid organization or has a role in evaluating the inquirer's job performance; or if trial counsel had consulted the inquirer for advice during the trial. These kinds of considerations would be factors in applying the Rule 1.7(a)(2) standard directly to the inquirer. More detailed facts would be needed for a definitive application of that standard, but on the facts as presented, it seems not unlikely that a reasonable lawyer would perceive a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the appellant would be adversely affected.

44 There may be circumstances in which the assertion of ineffective assistance of trial counsel would not reflect adversely on that counsel. An example might be a case in which trial counsel requests a continuance, claiming that more preparation is needed to represent the defendant effectively, and the judge denies that request. The analysis in this opinion is not intended to address such cases.

5. However, even if the presence of a direct conflict could be denied on some fuller set of facts, there is no question about the existence of an imputed conflict. Clearly if trial counsel were prosecuting the appeal, a reasonable lawyer would perceive a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the appellant would be adversely affected by the lawyer's interest in his or her own reputation. See N.Y. State 533 (1981) ("Where a lawyer, as the basis for an appeal, must attack his own competence as trial counsel there is obviously a personal interest that is fundamentally at odds with the client's right to impartial and zealous representation – and the spectre of malpractice litigation strains such a relationship even further."). Thus it would present a personal-interest conflict for trial counsel to prosecute the appeal by asserting ineffective assistance at the trial level.

6. The inquirer, as a colleague of the trial counsel in the same legal aid organization, is burdened with the same conflict. Rule 1.10(a) provides: "While lawyers are associated in a firm, none of them shall knowingly represent a client when any one of them practicing alone would be prohibited from doing so by Rule 1.7, 1.8 or 1.9, except as otherwise provided therein." A legal aid office is a "firm" as defined by the Rules.[45] Because the inquirer is associated in the same legal aid organization as the trial counsel whose conflict arises under Rule 1.7, that conflict would be imputed to the inquirer. See, e.g., N.Y. State 862 ¶¶ 5-9 (2011); N.Y. State 592 (1988); N.Y. State 533 (1981); N.Y. State 462 (1977).

7. We turn to the question whether these conflicts may be waived by the client's informed consent. Both Rule 1.7(a) and Rule 1.10(d) allow for waiver by consent of the affected client(s) if the conditions of Rule 1.7(b) are met. Of particular relevance in the circumstances under consideration are the first and fourth of the conditions set forth in Rule 1.7(b). The first is that "the lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client." Rule 1.7(b)(1). The fourth condition is that "each affected client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing." Rule 1.7(b)(4). Since there is only one client in this case, only he or she is affected and, accordingly, only his or her consent would be required.

8. As noted above, trial counsel would have a direct conflict in prosecuting the appeal on the basis of ineffective assistance below, and in our view that conflict would not be readily waivable. Trial counsel's interest in a personal reputation for competence would typically be strong and at sharp odds with the appellate needs of the client. Accordingly, any belief by trial counsel that he or she could provide "competent and diligent representation" would be unlikely to be reasonable. Moreover, for client

45 See Rule 1.0(h) (defining "firm" to include "lawyers employed in a qualified legal assistance organization"); Rule 1.0(p) (defining "qualified legal assistance organization" to mean "an office or organization of one of the four types listed in Rule 7.2(b)(1)-(4) that meets all of the requirements thereof"); Rule 7.2(b)(1) (expressly listing "a legal aid office" when operated or sponsored by various specified entities).

consent to be informed, trial counsel would need to help the client understand issues surrounding the potential waiver, which would in turn put trial counsel in the further conflicted position of giving advice as to the quality of his or her own legal services at trial and ability to prosecute the appeal effectively. Trial counsel's conflict thus appears nonconsentable.[46]

9. The analysis proceeds differently, however, for the imputed conflict of the inquirer. Only the underlying conflict, and not the nonconsentability of that conflict, is imputed. In other words, whether the inquirer's imputed conflict is waivable is to be judged from the position of the inquirer, and not from the position of the trial counsel whose conflict gave rise to the imputation. See N.Y. State 968 ¶¶ 25-26 (2013). And because consentability of the imputed conflict is judged from the position of the inquirer, the analysis for the imputed conflict is the same as it would be for waivability of any direct conflict that may apply to the inquirer.

10. Thus, although trial counsel's conflict appears nonconsentable, there may be a greater prospect that the inquirer's conflict could be waived. The kinds of considerations that could interfere with the inquirer's professional judgment, see paragraph 4 above, may well be less distortive than those applicable to trial counsel. Just as they would be less sure to create a conflict in the first place, they would also, in the event of a conflict, tend to be more allowing of a reasonable belief in an ability to give the client competent and diligent representation. And the inquirer would be in a better position than trial counsel to provide the client with fair and complete advice as needed for any properly informed consent.

11. To say that the imputed conflict might be waivable, however, is not to say that waivability would be inevitable or even common. We note a few considerations bearing on this question. First, it requires a detailed factual analysis. We again refer to the kinds of considerations that factor into the existence of a conflict, see paragraph 4 above, because they also factor into consentability.

12. Second, there may be a widespread perception that waiver of such conflicts is typically inappropriate. Standards promulgated by the National Legal Aid and Defender Association, while not controlling, seem to reflect such a view. Those standards adopt a per se approach to the existence of a conflict:

> Each office shall have a written definition of situations which constitute a conflict of interest. . . . Those situations shall include . . .
> > b. When the defendant was represented by the trial division of that same defender agency and it is asserted by the client or appears arguable to the appellate attorney that trial counsel provided ineffective representation . . . .[47]

46 Cf. N.Y. State 865 (2011) (to permit lawyer who planned estate to undertake representation of executor with colorable malpractice claim would put place lawyer in "manifestly untenable position of having to counsel the executor on whether to sue himself (the lawyer)," and thus lawyer could not reasonably believe that the lawyer could provide competent and diligent representation to executor, and conflict would be unwaivable).

47 Nat'l Legal Aid and Defender Ass'n, Standards and Evaluation Design for Appellate Defender Offices, II. Criteria for Assuring the Efficiency of the Legal Representation, E. Procedures for Handling Conflict of Interest Cases, ¶1 (1980), found at http://www.nlada.org/Defender/Defender_Standards/Standards_For_Appellate_Defender_Offices?printable=yes

Furthermore, the standards could be taken to reflect a view that the conflict is unwaivable.[48] See also N.Y. State 533 (1981) (decided under Code of Professional Responsibility, and on similar facts finding preclusive conflict without discussing possibility of waiver).

13. Third, even if the inquirer deems the conflict waivable, the requirement of informed consent requires particular care in the context of a defendant whose alternatives to assigned appellate counsel may be limited.[49] We also note, without opining on, potential constitutional implications under the Sixth Amendment of the United States Constitution. See N.Y. State 605 (1989) (citing Wheat v. United States, 486 U.S. 153 (1988)).

CONCLUSION:

14. An appellate lawyer in a legal aid organization needs to consider conflicts of interest before undertaking to represent a defendant on an appeal that asserts ineffective assistance by trial counsel employed in the same organization. The pursuit of appellate claims that would reflect adversely on a colleague in the same organization would give rise to a personal-interest conflict at least by imputation and perhaps directly as well. The appellate lawyer may undertake the representation only when the circumstances allow, and the defendant makes, an effective waiver of the appellate lawyer's conflict.

TOPIC: Lawyers as title insurance agents; reduction of legal fees; illegal fee arrangements; excessive fees

DIGEST: When the circumstances make it ethically permissible for a lawyer to represent a party in a real estate transaction and also receive payment to act as agent of a title abstract company, the lawyer must consider any relevant legal restrictions before reducing the legal fee to the transaction party. Reasonableness of legal fees must be determined under Rule 1.5(a) in light of all the facts and circumstances, and overlap in the services provided to the transaction party and the company does not automatically render fees excessive.

RULES: Rule 1.5(a)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer represents parties in real estate transactions. He sometimes has occasion to act also as a title insurance agent in those transactions, performing services for, and receiving payment from, a title abstract company.

2. There have been numerous ethics opinions relating to attorneys who also act as title insurance agents in real estate transactions, and the inquirer asks about the continuing validity of those opinions. He says that "a more recent Insurance Department Opinion, as well as the promulgation of a Model Title Insurance Disclosure Form by the Real Property Section of the New York State Bar Association has reintroduced confusion to the issue . . . ."

3. The inquirer, claiming a conflict between our prior opinions and the opinion of the Insurance Department, asks that we clarify the matter generally, and asks two questions in particular.

QUESTIONS:

4. May a lawyer who represents a party in a real estate transaction, and also acts as a title insurance agent, reduce the legal fee when the client uses that attorney's title agency to obtain insurance?

5. If not, will disclosure and the use of the Model Title Insurance Disclosure Form cure the problem?

OPINION:

6. This Committee has issued several opinions discussing circumstances in which lawyers connected to a title abstract company in a real estate transaction – by serving as its agent or having an ownership interest in the company – may also represent a party in the transaction.

7. In N.Y. State 351 (1974), we concluded that when the lawyer serves as agent for the title abstract company, the lawyer may also represent a party to the transaction,

> "provided it is clear that there is no conflict of interest between the client and the title company, that both parties consent after the attorney makes full disclosure to both, and > his client is either given credit for the amount of any fees paid to the attorney by the title company or the client expressly consents to the retention of such fee."

This analysis was amplified in N.Y. State 576 (1986), which among other things indicated that particular conflicts between representing a party and acting as agent for the title abstract company may or may not be consentable, id. n.5; see N.Y. State 631 (1992). We have reached a more restrictive result when the lawyer has an ownership interest in the abstract company.[50] The current inquiry, however, does not present the circumstance of ownership.

8. Two other aspects of N.Y. State 576 are relevant here. First, we reaffirmed our view that, absent client consent, the lawyer should credit the client with any savings realized from the title company:

> "[I]f a lawyer has a relationship with one or more title insurance companies that enables the lawyer to achieve a reduction in total cost to the client for the appropriate legal services and any title insurance requested, while providing a reasonable fee to the lawyer and doing so without violating any legal or ethical constraint, we believe that the lawyer has a duty to afford the client the opportunity to realize the savings."

N.Y. State 576 (1986) (citations omitted).

9. Second, N.Y. State 576 went beyond the principle that a lawyer may not receive fees from the title abstract company unless there is disclosure and client consent. It held that overlap of services to the client and the title abstract company would result in an excessive and therefore impermissible fee:

> "Moreover, even with client consent, the lawyer is not entitled to receive amounts from the transaction that would in the aggregate constitute an excessive fee. DR 2-106(A). To the extent that the services for which the title insurance company is paying are duplicative of services the lawyer would render the client in any event, we believe that compensation to the lawyer from both for those same services would constitute an excessive fee."

We have since reiterated this principle. See N.Y. State 626 n.1 (1992).

50 In particular, we have found that an ownership interest makes certain conflicts nonconsentable:

> "With respect to abstract title companies, in N.Y. State 595 (1988), N.Y. State 621 (1991) [with four members of the Committee dissenting], and N.Y. State 738 (2001), we held that a lawyer could, with consent after disclosure, refer real estate clients to a title abstract company in which the lawyer or his or her spouse had an ownership interest 'for purely ministerial abstract work,' but not where the abstract company provided the additional service of preparing a title report or serving as an agent for the title underwriter. The central rationale was that if the abstract company prepared a report showing exceptions in title and recommending whether a title insurance policy should be issued, the law firm for the party would be required 'to negotiate these issues . . . with itself.' N.Y. State 738 (2001). See also N.Y. State 731 (2000) (lawyer cannot pay employees to refer clients to lawyer-owned title company for non-ministerial tasks)."

N.Y. State 753 (2002). Those opinions were decided under the Code of Professional Responsibility, but we have reached the same conclusion under the Rules of Professional Conduct. See N.Y. State 891 (2011).

10. We were clear in prior opinions that our analyses addressed only ethical considerations, and not whether any legal rules would prohibit the various fee arrangements discussed.[51] Indeed, we recognized that actual fact patterns might well raise substantial legal issues.[52]

11. As noted by the inquirer, the Real Property Law Section of the New York State Bar Association has published an article including a "Model Title Insurance Disclosure Form." See NYSBA, "Title Insurance: Disclosure to and Consent by Client," 37 N.Y. Real Prop. L.J. 42 (Winter 2009). The model form was intended to "represent a good-faith effort on the part of [an ad hoc subcommittee] to draft a form that complies with the various ethics opinions issued by the Committee on Ethics of the New York State Bar Association." The article cited ten relevant opinions of this Committee and urged attorneys to be familiar with them. Id. at 42-43.

12. The Model Title Insurance Disclosure Form contains various disclosures relating to the cost of title insurance and to the attorney's relationship to the title insurance company. The form then states:

> "Our code of ethics prohibits us from being compensated twice for the same services if there is any duplication of services in the work we do for you and the title insurance company. Therefore, to the extent that there is any duplication of services, we are required to reduce our legal fee by the amount attributable to the same services for which we are also being compensated by the title insurance company. This reduction will be reflected as a credit on your statement for legal services rendered."

37 N.Y. Real Property L.J. at 43. This language was seemingly included to reflect what we have said in some of our prior opinions as cited above.

13. The article containing the model form included two caveats. First, it made clear that the model form may need to be revised "as may be appropriate for each transaction," id. at 42, which is an important caution given the variety of permutations, and resulting ethical implications, that can 51 See, e.g., N.Y. State 667 (1994) (declining to opine whether proposed arrangement would violate any law such as RESPA prohibition on "kickbacks" and "unearned fees"); N.Y. State 626 n.1 (1992) (noting that "the Committee does not pass upon questions of law, and therefore we do not address any issues that might be raised by such circumstances under the Real Estate Settlement Procedures Act, 12 U.S.C. § 2601, et seq., the New York Insurance Law, § 6409(d), or any other legal provision"); N.Y. State 595 (1998); N.Y. State 576 (1986) (expressing "no opinion on whether the division of premiums with an attorney acting as agent for the title insurer is in whole or in part an impermissible subterfuge or whether such a division otherwise violates either or both" of RESPA and Insurance Law §6409(d)).

52 For example, we assumed for purposes of one opinion that it is unlawful "for the lawyer to receive any compensation from the title insurer except for services rendered." In the same opinion, we considered various fee arrangements and said it seemed "apparent that at least some of the differences constitute an inducement to 'get the business' and not a real and substantial difference in legal services provided. . . . If the representation is one in which the client pays more under one arrangement than under another for the same services and the same title insurance, it is difficult to escape the conclusion that the difference is for originating business." N.Y. State 576.

arise.[53] Second, the article and the model form – like our opinions – were addressed to ethical issues rather than legal ones.[54]

14. As noted by the inquirer, one such legal issue was addressed by a New York State agency with responsibility for this area. In July 2009, the Office of the General Counsel of the New York State Insurance Department (which has since been incorporated into the newer Department of Financial Services) issued an opinion to the effect that "[a]n attorney who is also a title agent may not lawfully charge an applicant for title insurance a reduced legal fee as an inducement to use the attorney's title agency to obtain insurance, because such an inducement would violate N.Y. Ins. Law § 6409(d) . . . ." After quoting from the relevant statute, the opinion concludes:

> "Providing reduced legal fees to title insurance applicants who use the attorney's title agency to obtain insurance constitutes the giving by the agent/attorney of 'consideration or valuable thing as an inducement for . . . title insurance business,' in violation of Insurance Law § 6409(d). In addition, such fee reduction constitutes a special benefit not afforded to other applicants who choose not to obtain title insurance from that attorney's title agency. See Circular Letter No. 9 (2009)."

OGC Op. No. 09-07-08 (available at http://www.dfs.ny.gov/insurance/ogco2009/rg090708.htm).

15. The Committee, as noted above, opines as to ethical issues but not legal ones. We do not address the legal issues raised in Opinion 09-07-08, nor do we opine as to the opinion's soundness. But that is not to say that the opinion would be irrelevant to a lawyer considering ethical responsibilities in this area.

16. A lawyer considering payment arrangements in this area must take into account Insurance Law § 6409(d) and other relevant statutes, not only because they determine legal obligations, but also because they provide a backdrop against which ethical obligations must be assessed. See N.Y. State 576 (1986) (asserting duty to offer savings to client if lawyer can do so "without violating any legal or ethical constraint"); Rule 1.2(d) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") (prohibition of counseling or assisting a client to engage in conduct that the lawyer knows is illegal or fraudulent); Rule 8.4 (b) (prohibition of engaging in illegal conduct that adversely reflects on the lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness as a lawyer). In assessing the import of such statutes, a lawyer should, of course, consider all relevant materials, including agency materials such as Opinion 09-07-08. If that opinion is sound, it states a significant legal constraint for the lawyer to take into account.

53 For example, the same section of the form refers both to ministerial services (e.g., "examining the title") and those that require the exercise of professional judgment (e.g., "clearing underwriting objections"), a distinction that is significant under our prior opinions. See, e.g., N.Y. State 753 (2002) (quoted in n.1 supra). Similarly, while the form does not distinguish between agencies that are owned by lawyers and those that are not, we have previously determined that, regardless of the client's informed consent, "[a] lawyer who owns a title abstract company and a mortgage brokerage is barred from acting as a lawyer in a transaction in which one or both of those companies is also acting in a variety of situations in which the lawyer's personal interest in a fee (or dividend) from the ancillary businesses compromises the independence of the lawyer's legal advice." Id.

54 "We note, however, that we do not examine what legal duties and restrictions are imposed upon an attorney/title agent. An attorney/agent should well consider the statutory restrictions and limitations of the Real Estate Settlement Procedures Act of 1974, 12 U.S.C. § 2601 et seq. and Section 6409 of the New York Insurance Law before undertaking an attorney/agency relationship with a client." 37 N.Y. Real Prop. L.J. at 43.

17. If a lawyer determines that a particular fee arrangement is permitted by Insurance Law §6409(d) and other relevant statutes, there is still a question whether further restrictions may be imposed by the rules of legal ethics. We now turn to that topic. We will set forth reasons leading us to reexamine our earlier assumptions and reasoning with regard to excessiveness of aggregate fees in this situation. Based on that reexamination, we reach a conclusion on this point different from that of N.Y. State 576.

18. Although the ethics opinions previously cited were decided under the former Code of Professional Responsibility, its replacement by the Rules of Professional Conduct in April 2009 did not change the operative principles applied in those opinions. Compare DRs 1-106 (responsibility for non-legal services), 2-106 (fees), 5-101(A) (personal conflicts) and 5-105 (conflicts in multiple representation) with Rules 5.7, 1.5(a) and 1.7. Thus it is not the change from the Code to the Rules that leads us to reconsider N.Y. State 576.

19. We are mindful of the extent to which conditions in the residential real estate market, as well as the practices of those serving that market, have changed since Opinion 576 was issued. Looking back 25 years, we recall a time when many attorneys, particularly in upstate New York, did their own title searching and certified the property's title for their clients. Then, the use of title insurance was quite unusual. Today, nearly every transaction involves the use of title insurance. As the use of title insurance has become the norm, the respective responsibilities of the lawyer, examiner and insurer have become more pronounced even while the potential for duplication of effort has increased. Thus, the same time and effort may be expended from quite different perspectives to satisfy manifestly distinct responsibilities and professional obligations.

20. Further, fee structures for residential closings have changed. In years past, it was fairly common to see residential closings billed as a percentage of the purchase price or on the basis of the time expended. Today, lawyers are far more likely to bill as a flat fee, and it would seem difficult if not impossible to identify which part of a flat legal fee should be attributed to arguably duplicative work.

21. With these changes in mind, we consider Rule 1.5(a), which sets forth the ethical standard governing the size of legal fees:

> "A lawyer shall not make an agreement for, charge, or collect an excessive or illegal fee or expense. A fee is excessive when, after a review of the facts, a reasonable lawyer would be left with a definite and firm conviction that the fee is excessive. The factors to be considered in determining whether a fee is excessive may include the following:
> > "(1) the time and labor required, the novelty and difficulty of the questions involved, and the skill requisite to perform the legal service properly;
> > "(2) the likelihood, if apparent or made known to the client, that the acceptance of the particular employment will preclude other employment by the lawyer;
> > "(3) the fee customarily charged in the locality for similar legal services;
> > "(4) the amount involved and the results obtained;

"(5) the time limitations imposed by the client or by circumstances;

"(6) the nature and length of the professional relationship with the client;

"(7) the experience, reputation and ability of the lawyer or lawyers performing the services; and

"(8) whether the fee is fixed or contingent."

22. We understand the facts of the inquiry to be that the lawyer performs services for both the transaction party and the title abstract company, and that the payment from the title abstract company is for services provided to it.[55] The Rule 1.5(a) standard is to be applied to the legal fee from the transaction party, and that legal fee does not include the amounts earned by the lawyer for services to the title abstract company.[56]

23. As noted, one of our conclusions in N.Y. State 576 was that the fee to the transaction party is excessive to the extent that the services for which the title abstract company is paying are duplicative of services the lawyer would render the transaction party client in any event. We now modify that conclusion. We do not see anything in Rule 1.5 to suggest that the receipt of a payment from the title abstract company, and some overlap in the work, necessarily renders excessive the fee charged to the transaction party.

24. Although there may be some overlap, we have already noted that the work for the two parties may be done to satisfy distinct responsibilities and professional obligations. Moreover, the listed factors listed in Rule 1.5(a) do not seem to rule out the legitimate possibility of payment from both parties despite overlapping services. Indeed, in certain circumstances, some of them could support that possibility. For example, if the fee to the transaction party were small when judged by the time spent on the matter by the attorney, and when judged by the customary charge in the locality, then that fee may well not be excessive even though the attorney also receives a payment from the title abstract company. See Rule 1.5(a)(1), (a)(3).

25. To be sure, overlap in the work for two parties can be relevant. The reasonableness of a fee depends in part on the time and labor required. When services to be provided to two parties require some of the same work, the time and labor required to provide services to one or both may be reduced. But that factor would be taken into account on a case-by-case basis under Rule 1.5(a), rather than standing as an irrebuttable presumption of excessiveness.

55 Our prior opinions have assumed as much. One stated that there would be a clear violation of law (and ethics) when an attorney-agent "performs no significant additional services in return for his portion of the premium," and accordingly analyzed the ethical issues "on the assumption that the lawyer actually renders services to the title insurer and receives payment from the title insurer solely for such services." N.Y. State 576, supra.

56 N.Y. State 576 said that in the context of overlapping work for the transaction party and the title company, the lawyer may not receive amounts "from the transaction" that would "in the aggregate" constitute an excessive fee. In other words, the lawyer would add the amounts received from the transaction party and the title abstract company in determining whether the total fees were excessive. See also N.Y. State 667 (1994). However, the differing responsibilities and professional obligations undertaken lead us to analyze the reasonableness of the fee from the transaction party on its own, rather than as aggregated with the payment from the title abstract company. Of course if the lawyer serving as title insurance agent also provides legal services to the company, then the fee for those services would also be subject to Rule 1.5(a). See N.Y. State 576 (reviewing various bundles of services that lawyers sometimes provide to title companies). And if the lawyer's "nonlegal services" to the company were "not distinct" from the legal services, then the nonlegal services would be subject to Rule 5.7(a)(1) and the Rules generally, and the lawyer's total compensation from the company would be subject to Rule 1.5(a). See N.Y. State 958 ¶14 (2013).

26. In one circumstance there will be a brighter line. When the lawyer and client have agreed that legal work will be charged on an hourly basis, then the lawyer may charge only for the hours actually expended, and charging for hours separately billed to another party is impermissible. See ABA 93-379. Even in the context of hourly rates, however, it may be permissible to receive payment from each despite some overlap in the work, as long as the same hours are not billed to two different parties.

27. Thus, when the proper standard is applied, it is not impermissible per se for the lawyer to be paid by the transaction party and the title abstract company for partially duplicative services. Unless a reasonable lawyer, having reviewed the degree of overlap, the billing arrangements, locally customary fees and other relevant facts, would be left with a definite and firm conviction that any legal fees to the transaction party are excessive, then those fees may be charged consistently with Rule 1.5(a).[57]

CONCLUSION:

28. A lawyer who represents a party in a real estate transaction and also receives payment to act as an agent of the title abstract company in that transaction may not receive an excessive legal fee from the transaction party. Overlap between work performed for the transaction party and the company does not automatically render that fee excessive, and the lawyer should apply the standards of Rule 1.5(a) to determine the fee's reasonableness. Depending on all the circumstances, the lawyer's fee may be reasonable even if there is some duplication in the services provided.

29. A lawyer receiving payment for acting as agent to a title abstract company should consider any relevant legal restrictions before determining that it is permissible to make corresponding reductions in legal fees to the party to the transaction who is represented by that lawyer, with or without disclosures such as those reflected in the "Model Title Insurance Form." The Committee does not opine as to such legal questions, but their resolution may inform the lawyer's ethical obligations.

57 We leave for another day the question of the extent to which the lawyer must offer the client a credit for the amounts received from the title insurer. See N.Y. State 351 (1974) (identifying a requirement that when the attorney is paid by both parties, "his client is either given credit for the amount of any fees paid to the attorney by the title company or the client expressly consents to the retention of such fee"). As noted above, in N.Y. State 576, we treated this requirement as an aspect of the lawyer's fiduciary obligation to obtain the best deal possible for the client. But the conclusion that the lawyer is taking on additional responsibility in performing services for the title company suggests that that lawyer might be entitled to keep some or all of what he or she earns from the title insurer, because it compensates the lawyer for that undertaking. Our prior opinions state that the lawyer must obtain informed consent in all such cases, and Rule 1.8(f) requires a lawyer to obtain the client's informed consent in order to "accept . . . anything of value related to the lawyer's representation of the client." We do not today address the precise scope of that consent or what must be disclosed to obtain it. The current opinion is about whether, upon whatever informed consent is needed, it can ever be ethically permissible for the lawyer to retain payment from a title insurance company for overlapping services.

TOPIC: Imputation of conflicts among part-time, independently operating members of Public Defender Office

DIGEST: A county Public Defender Office is a firm for imputation purposes even if its lawyers work independently. A lawyer in such an office who is a part-time Assistant Public Defender in Family Court would be subject to an imputed conflict when another Assistant Public Defender has a conflict under Rule 1.7, 1.8 or 1.9. The lawyer could not appear in such matters unless the imputed conflict were waivable and properly waived, and the availability of waiver may be limited by various circumstances.

RULES: 1.0(h); 1.7; 1.10 (a), (d)

FACTS:

1. Inquiring counsel has been offered a position as a part-time Assistant Public Defender in a small upstate county to practice in Family Court. The Public Defender's office has three part-time criminal public defenders and two part-time Family Court public defenders. There is an attorney who as Public Defender is the administrator and maintains an office for himself and a secretary. All the Assistant Public Defenders maintain their own private offices. There is no overlap in the case assignments of the two kinds of Assistant Public Defender: the criminal Assistant Public Defenders do all the office's criminal work, and they do not appear in Family Court.

2. The Family Court public defenders each have a private practice. They do not share files with each other, either at the Public Defender's Office or in their separate private practices. One of them appears in Family Court on Monday, Wednesday and Friday, and the other appears in court on Tuesday and Thursday.

QUESTIONS:

3. If inquiring counsel accepts a position as part-time Assistant Public Defender practicing in Family Court, then may inquiring counsel appear in Family Court in the following situations?

   A. As the "conflict" Assistant Public Defender on cases in which the first (i.e., the other) Assistant Public Defender has a conflict of interest;

   B. Appearing "against the first Assistant Public Defender" by representing the "opposing party" either (i) as an Assistant Public Defender or (ii) as retained (i.e., private) counsel; or

   C. As an Attorney for the Child in matters in which another Assistant Public Defender appears.

4. If inquiring counsel accepts a position as part-time Assistant Public Defender practicing in Family Court, then may inquiring counsel accept assignments under County Law article 18-B to represent criminal defendants in the same county?

OPINION:

5. Counties in New York are authorized by statute to create an Office of Public Defender, or to contract with another county's Office of Public Defender. County Law §716 et seq. Public defenders represent not only indigent criminal defendants, County Law §717(1), but also persons in Family Court or Surrogates Court who are entitled to counsel but financially unable to obtain such counsel,[58] which can include persons in numerous kinds of Family Court proceedings.[59]

6. Answers to the various parts of the inquiry will depend on whether certain conflicts of interest would be imputed to the inquiring lawyer. The New York Rules of Professional Conduct provide: "While lawyers are associated in a firm, none of them shall knowingly represent a client when any one of them practicing alone would be prohibited from doing so by Rule 1.7 ["Conflict of Interest: Current Clients"], 1.8 ["Current Clients: Specific Conflict of Interest Rules"] or 1.9 ["Duties to Former Clients"], except as otherwise provided therein." Rule 1.10(a).

7. A public defender's office is a "firm" as defined in the Rules.[60] Accordingly, our prior opinions make clear that when one lawyer in a public defender's office has a conflict based on Rule 1.7, 1.8 or 1.9, that conflict is imputed to other lawyers in the same public defender's office. See N.Y. State 941 ¶14 (2012); N.Y. State 862 ¶¶ 5-9 (2011); cf. N.Y. State 973 (2013) ¶6 (2013) (legal aid office). This remains the rule even when the assistant public defenders work on a part-time basis, and even when the lawyers concerned work in different divisions of the office. N.Y. State 862 ¶8 (the phrase "associated" in Rule 1.10(a) "includes part-time attorneys as well as full-time attorneys," and "fact that the inquirer appears as a Public Defender only in Family Court rather than in the Criminal Courts does not change the result"; inquirer is still "associated" with the disqualified Assistant in same firm "even though his area of practice is different," because "Rule 1.10(a) imputes conflicts to all lawyers in a firm, in all practice areas, not just to lawyers in the same department or practice area").

8. The inquirer notes that – unlike in some public defenders' offices – the Assistant Public Defenders in the inquirer's small upstate county maintain their own private offices, without working in any common locations, and they do not share their Public Defender files with each other. In some respects, therefore, the inquirer's prospective office is similar to the kind of lawyer panel we addressed in N.Y. State 914 (2012). That opinion concerned a panel of lawyers established to provide 58 "The public defender shall also represent, without charge, in a proceeding in family court or surrogate's court in the county or counties where such public defender serves, any person entitled to counsel pursuant to [certain statutes], who is financially unable to obtain counsel. When representing such person, the public defender shall counsel and represent him at every stage of the proceedings, shall initiate such proceedings as in the judgment of the public defender are necessary to protect the rights of such person, and may prosecute any appeal when, in his judgment the facts and circumstances warrant such appeal." County Law §701(2).

59 The Public Defender represents, among others, persons entitled to counsel under Family Court Act §262, which includes parties in a "child protective proceeding (child neglect or abuse, termination of parental rights, and Article 10-A permanency hearings), the petitioner and the respondent in a family offense case, the parents involved in a custody proceeding, the respondent in a paternity case, the parent who opposes adoption in an adoption proceeding, and any person who faces possible incarceration for contempt of court," as well as "foster parents or other persons having physical or legal custody of the child in a child protective proceeding, and non-custodial parents or grandparents who receive notice pursuant to Social Services Law Section 384-a(2)." Merril Sobie, Practice Commentaries, New York Family Court Act §262 (McKinney's) (citations omitted).

60 See Rule 1.0(h) ("firm" includes "lawyers employed in a qualified legal assistance organization"); Rule 1.0(p) (''Qualified legal assistance organization' means an office or organization of one of the four types listed in Rule 7.2(b)(1)-(4) that meets all of the requirements thereof."); Rule 7.2(b)(1)(iii) (applying to "a legal aid or public defender office . . . operated or sponsored by a governmental agency").

legal assistance to indigent clients when the Legal Aid Society has a conflict. The panel members did not work out of or store active files at a common location, did not have a common supervisor, and did not share client confidential information with the Legal Aid Society lawyers. We concluded that when members of that conflicts panel "act as independent counsel to their assigned indigents," they are not members of the same firm for imputation purposes. Id. ¶ 10.

9. The question that this Committee confronts, then, is whether the similarities of this small upstate Public Defender's Office to the legal aid conflicts panel are sufficient to remove this particular office from the rule articulated in N.Y. State 862, and instead bring it within the rule articulated in N.Y. State 914. In the Committee's opinion they are not, and the rule stated in N.Y. State 862 therefore applies.

10. While it is relevant that in actual practice the Assistants work independently, that factor is outweighed by others. The structure of the office and the central role of the Public Defender are prescribed by statutory provisions.[61] There is a single attorney who is the Public Defender and who is publicly listed with that title. The other attorneys in the office serve as Assistant Public Defenders and are publicly identified as such. The Public Defender appoints those assistants, and fixes their compensation, subject to authorization by the board of supervisors. It is the Public Defender who is statutorily charged with representing clients of the office. See County Law §701(2) (quoted in footnote 58 above). We accept the inquirer's representation that the defenders typically do not share assignments or files, but they could, consistent with the underlying statutory provisions, sometimes work together collaboratively.[62]

11. Taking into account all the circumstances, we do not believe that the similarities between the inquirer's prospective Public Defender's Office and a legal aid conflicts panel, or anything in N.Y. State 914, would take this office out of the usual rule that applies to public defenders' offices. The result could be different if the defenders were organized with a different structure, more like the legal aid conflicts panel considered in N.Y. State 914. See, e.g., County Law §722(3)(a)(i) (counties required to adopt a plan for provision of counsel that may, as alternative to using a public defender, use a plan of a local bar association whereby "the services of private counsel are rotated and coordinated by an administrator"). But a Public Defender's Office like the one in the inquiry, organized in the manner prescribed by County Law §716, constitutes a firm within which conflicts are subject to imputation under Rule 1.10(a). In light of that principle, we address the four situations posed by the inquirer.

61 "The board or boards of supervisors may designate an attorney-at-law as public defender and shall fix his term and compensation. Subject to the approval of such board or boards, the public defender may appoint as many assistant attorneys, clerks, investigators, stenographers and other employees as he may deem necessary and as shall be authorized by such board or boards. The public defender shall fix the compensation of such aides and assistants within the amounts such board or boards may appropriate for such purposes." County Law §716.

62 For example, while Assistants are normally assigned to appear in court only on different days, if one gets sick, has a vacation scheduled, or otherwise cannot go to court one day, then it would be possible for another Assistant Public Defender to cover the court appearance. Similarly, whether or not routine, the statutory basis of the office would allow the Assistant Public Defenders to have conferences, or informally call one another to discuss issues they are confronting, as a mutual resource network. Presumably, all cases taken in would be included in the Public Defender's conflict checking system.

Appearance in Family Court as a "Conflict" Assistant Public Defender

12. We address first the inquirer's question whether it would be permissible to serve as a "conflict" Assistant Public Defender who would be assigned to handle cases in which the other Family Court Assistant Public Defender has a conflict of interest. If the other Assistant's conflict is based on Rule 1.7, 1.8 or 1.9, then for reasons discussed above, none of the other lawyers of the Public Defender's Office may "knowingly" represent the client who cannot be represented by the other Assistant.[63] The inquiring lawyer's knowledge of the conflict would be implicit in service as a "conflict" defender.

13. Thus when the other Family Court Assistant Public Defender has a conflict under Rule 1.7, 1.8 or 1.9, the conflict would be imputed to the inquiring lawyer, and the inquiring lawyer could serve as "conflict" defender only if the imputed conflict were properly waived. Rule 1.10(d) provides that imputed disqualifications may be waived by the affected client under the conditions stated in Rule 1.7. Even if the other Assistant's conflict is unwaivable under Rule 1.7(b), the imputed conflict may still be waived if the necessary conditions of waiver are satisfied as to the "conflict" defender. See N.Y. State 968 ¶¶ 25-26 (2013).

Appearance in Family Court against another Assistant Public Defender

14. The inquirer next asks whether it is permissible to appear "against" the other Family Court Assistant Public Defender on behalf of the party "opposing" that other Assistant Public Defender's client, either when inquiring counsel is acting as an Assistant Public Defender or as retained (private) counsel. Such a situation might happen, for example, when one parent opposes another parent in a litigated matter.

15. These two situations by their terms presuppose that the inquiring lawyer and the other Family Court Assistant Public Defender would be representing "differing interests" as defined by Rule 1.0(f). That in turn means that under Rule 1.7(a)(1), a single Assistant Public Defender proposing to represent both parties would have a conflict of interest. Rule 1.10(a) would impute that conflict to other Assistant Public Defenders for reasons discussed above.

16. Moreover, the inquiring lawyer would be subject to the imputed conflict whether acting as Assistant Public Defender or as retained counsel, because the inquiring lawyer remains "associated" with the Public Defender's Office even when not acting in that capacity.[64] A part-time Assistant Public Defender thus does not escape imputation when representing a client in the role of private practitioner. The inquiring lawyer could not appear in either capacity unless the conflict imputed to the inquiring lawyer were waivable and waived under the conditions stated in Rule 1.7(b).

63 Conflicts based on Rules other than 1.7, 1.8 or 1.9 are not imputed by the terms of Rule 1.10(a), although service as a "conflict" defender in such cases may require the inquiring lawyer to consider other provisions. See, e.g., Roy Simon, Simon's New York Rules of Professional Conduct Annotated 532, 578 (2013 ed.) (discussing other Rules that "carry their own imputation provisions"); id. at 578 (pointing out that even when one lawyer has a kind of conflict not imputed to associated lawyers, an associated lawyer could still be subject to a direct conflict such as one based on personal interest); N.Y. State 890 (2011) (conflicts under Rule 1.10(h), relating to family members, are not "automatically" imputed to other lawyers in the firm, "but imputation may arise in the particular circumstances of any given case").

64 See N.Y. State 862 (2011) (imputation of an assistant public defender's conflict to another assistant public defender "in his private practice"); cf. N.Y. State 793 ¶15 & n.7 (citing authority for rule that where lawyer is of counsel to two firms, the firms are treated as one for conflicts purposes, so that conflict arising in one firm is imputed to lawyers in the other firm).

17. Such a conflict may well be unwaivable, especially since it involves two members of the same firm appearing for adverse parties in the same litigation.[65] In our view, however, that posture does not mean that the conflict is necessarily unwaivable in every circumstance. There is a per se rule that the conflict may not be waived for a single lawyer who represents both sides.[66] But as noted in paragraph 13 above, such unwaivability is not imputed by Rule 1.10(a). See N.Y. State 968 ¶¶ 25-26 (2013). Whether such an imputed conflict is waivable may require consideration of the interests not just of the opposing clients but also of the public and the judiciary, see id. ¶28, but we cannot say categorically that such a conflict is never waivable in any set of circumstances.

18. The conflict will not be waivable, however, unless the lawyers on both sides of the litigation (here, the inquiring lawyer and the other Assistant Public Defender) each reasonably believe that they can "provide competent and diligent representation" to their respective clients. Rule 1.7(b)(1). If the lawyers work in separate offices rather than in a common location, have little interaction, and do not share files, it may be more likely that both lawyers could reasonably form that belief. But each such conflict would have to be evaluated on its own facts and circumstances.

Appearance in Family Court as Attorney for the Child when another public defender also appears

19. The inquirer has also asked about the propriety of appearing as an attorney for a child concerned in a Family Court proceeding when another Assistant Public Defender is appearing for a party in such proceeding. Private attorneys may be appointed as attorneys for children,[67] and appointment is available in a wide variety of circumstances, see Family Court Act §249 (listing specific circumstances and providing that in other Family Court proceedings, the court may appoint an attorney to represent the child when in the judge's opinion it would serve statutory purposes and independent legal counsel is not available to the child).

20. The inquiry is cast in general terms. The question of whether there would be a conflict can be resolved only in the factual context of a particular matter. If the inquiring lawyer serving as attorney for the child and the Assistant Public Defender would not be representing differing interests, then there would be no conflict under Rule 1.7(a)(1). If they would be representing differing interests, then there would be a conflict under Rule 1.7(a)(1), and it would be imputed to both lawyers under Rule 1.10(a).

65 See Rule 1.7(b)(1) (conflict not waivable unless lawyer has reasonable belief in ability to provide competent and diligent representation to the affected client); Rule 1.7(b)(3) (conflict not waivable if it involves "assertion of a claim by one client against another client represented by the lawyer in the same litigation or other proceeding before a tribunal"); Roy Simon, Simon's New York Rules of Professional Conduct Annotated 557-58 (2013 ed.) (noting question as to whether different lawyers in same firm may represent both sides in the same suit, even with informed consent, and expressing doubt about propriety of doing so in light of Rules 1.7(b)(1) and 1.7(b)(3)).

66 Rule 1.7(b)(3). This rule refers to a "lawyer" rather than a "law firm" and thus does not, by its literal text, categorically prohibit different lawyers in the same firm from opposing each other in the same litigation or other proceeding before a tribunal.

67 "Under New York Law, children (minors) in many kinds of court proceedings . . . are entitled to be represented by counsel. . . . A governmental office entitled the Attorneys for Children Program ('AFC Program') maintains a list or 'panel' of attorneys qualified to represent children, and assigns an attorney from the panel to children involved in the judicial system who qualify by law for an appointed attorney." N.Y. State 941 ¶2 (2012) (footnotes omitted). Attorneys for children may also be assigned through agreements with legal aid societies or with individual attorneys. Family Court Act §243.

21. If such a conflict were imputed, then the inquiring lawyer could not serve as attorney for child unless the imputed conflict could be waived, and was in fact waived, under the standards of Rule 1.7(b) as applied through Rule 1.10(d). However, even if such a conflict were waivable, the inquiring lawyer's client would be a child and would be incapable by himself or herself of giving informed consent to satisfy Rule 1.7(b)(4). See N.Y. State 941 ¶8 (2012); N.Y. State 790 ¶8 (2005). The situation might be different if the child had another representative with authority to consent to a conflict, but whether a representative would have such authority is a question of law beyond the Committee's jurisdiction. See N.Y. State 895 ¶16 (2011) (raising but declining to answer that question with respect to representatives of the child "such as a parent, guardian ad litem, custodian, guardian, committee, trustee or court").

Appearance in criminal court as assigned counsel under County Law article 18-B

22. The inquirer's final question has to do with appointment to represent criminal defendants when the Public Defender's Office has a conflict.[68] This is the question that was addressed in N.Y. State 862 (2011), and we reach the same result that we did in that opinion.

23. Specifically, if the conflict in the public defender's office were based on Rule 1.7, 1.8 or 1.9, it would be imputed to the inquiring lawyer for reasons discussed above. The inquiring lawyer, knowing of the underlying conflict, could not accept the appointment unless the imputed conflict were waivable, and waived, under the standards of Rule 1.7(b) as applied via Rule 1.10(d).

CONCLUSION:

24. Even though the lawyers in a county's Public Defender Office work independently, the office constitutes a "firm" for purposes of imputing conflicts of interest under Rule 1.10(a).

25. A lawyer who is a part-time Family Court Assistant Public Defender in such an office would be subject to an imputed conflict if that lawyer were to appear in Family Court (i) as a "conflict" lawyer when another Assistant Public Defender has a conflict under Rule 1.7, 1.8 or 1.9; (ii) as an Assistant Public Defender or retained counsel "opposing" another Assistant Public Defender; or, (iii) depending on the circumstances, as an attorney for the child in a matter in which another Assistant Public Defender has appeared. The same principles of imputation under Rule 1.10(a) would also apply if a part-time Assistant Public Defender were to appear in criminal court as assigned counsel when another Assistant Public Defender has a conflict under Rule 1.7, 1.8 or 1.9.

26. In all such cases, the part-time Assistant Public Defender could not undertake the representation, even in private practice as retained counsel, unless the imputed conflict were waivable and properly waived. Whether a given conflict is waivable can be determined only by considering all the circumstances, and waivability may be less likely in various circumstances such as when the two Assistant Public Defenders seek to represent adverse parties in the same proceeding, or when the client is a child and thus incapable, acting alone, of providing informed consent.

68 "In many cases, counties that have chosen to establish a public defender in accordance with County Law Article 18-A rely on private attorneys under Article 18-B in cases in which the public defender is unable to represent an indigent litigant because of a conflict of interest with another client of the office (co-defendants in a criminal proceeding, for instance)." OPINION 976 (07/25/2013)

TOPIC: Arrangement between law firm and nonlegal service provider

DIGEST: A law firm may not enter into an exclusive contractual agreement with a marketing company to provide clients with forensic mortgage analysis as well as legal services, to pay the company for referred clients, or to share legal fees with the company.

RULE: 1.7(a); 5.4(a); 5.5(b); 5.8, 7.2(a)

FACTS:

1. The inquiring law firm wishes to enter into an exclusive Services Agreement with an entity ("the Company") that it describes as "a national marketing company with a nationally marketed website that educates mortgagors on a unique cause of action where they can proactively bring an action in state court to contest the validity of their mortgage."

2. The Company's website would inform its New York viewers of the availability of this cause of action. For those interested in pursuing such relief, the Company would "enter into a contractual agreement with the individual mortgagor for the purpose of performing a forensic analysis on their mortgage and its chain of title" so as "to ascertain if an error exists." If the Company finds such an error, it would "inform the individual of [the inquiring law firm's] services." When such persons contact the inquiring firm, the firm would "attempt to become retained by them for the purpose of filing this particular action" in New York. The inquiring firm would charge such clients a contingent fee or "success fee" of twenty percent of the debt it reduces in a successful action to "invalidate a client's . . . mortgage and clear their title."

3. The Company would charge the inquiring firm a fixed monthly fee for marketing the law firm's services. It would also charge the law firm additional fees relating to individual clients that it has referred to the firm. These additional fees would be characterized either as a success fee or as a fee for the Company to file and collect on a lien on the client's house to ensure payment of legal fees. The inquiring firm has asked whether these additional fees – whichever way characterized – could properly be set as (a) "a determined percentage" of the law firm's fee, or (b) a fixed fee regardless of the size of the client's mortgage or debt reduction.

4. Thus the firm proposes a multi-faceted relationship with the Company. The Company would market to people in need of a specific legal service. The Company would conduct a "forensic" analysis of whether those people may have legal claims, and then would refer prospective claimants to the law firm. To secure the legal fee as well as its own fee, the Company may file liens against the firm's clients. The law firm would pay the Company both the fixed periodic "marketing fee" and also, in the particular matters undertaken, the "success" fee or a fee for lien services as described above. The arrangement is exclusive to the law firm; the Company would not offer legal services by any other provider.

QUESTION:

5. The inquiring law firm asks whether it can enter into compensation arrangements as described above. We will address that question, but we also perceive and analyze additional ethical concerns with the firm's proposal.

OPINION:

6. "The term 'multidisciplinary practice' means a venture that offers both legal and non-legal services to the public." N.Y. State 930 ¶6 (2012) (recounting history of multidisciplinary practice rules, including "MacCrate Report" of 2000, subsequent adoption of DR 1-106 and DR 1-107 in Code of Professional Responsibility, and their replacement by Rules 5.7 and 5.8 upon adoption of Rules of Professional Conduct in 2009).

7. One form of multidisciplinary practice occurs through contractual relationships between lawyers and nonlegal professionals. This form is authorized, but also limited, by Rule 5.8 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct. That rule provides that a lawyer or law firm may – but only under certain conditions – "enter into and maintain a contractual relationship with a nonlegal professional or nonlegal professional service firm for the purpose of offering to the public, on a systematic and continuing basis, legal services performed by the lawyer or law firm as well as other nonlegal professional services." Rule 5.8(a). In the Joint Appellate Division Rules, such a relationship is termed a "cooperative business arrangement." See 22 NYCRR §1205.2 (definition).

8. The inquiry contemplates an exclusive contractual relationship between the inquiring law firm and the Company, which is a nonlegal professional service firm. The proposed relationship would be for the purpose of offering the public legal services, as well as services of the nonlegal professional service firm, on a systematic and ongoing basis. This form of multidisciplinary practice would thus be a cooperative business arrangement, and thus, to be permissible, it would have to satisfy Rule 5.8. See N.Y. State 930 ¶¶ 11-15 (2012) (concluding that language of rule 5.8(a) is mandatory, not permissive); Rule 5.8(c) (rule on cooperative business arrangements does not apply to relationships consisting solely of "non-exclusive" reciprocal referral agreements).

9. Rule 5.8(a) specifies three conditions that must be met for a law firm to enter into a cooperative business arrangement with a nonlegal professional service firm. The first of these is that the profession of the nonlegal professional service firm "is included in a list jointly established and maintained by the Appellate Divisions pursuant to Section 1205.3 of the Joint Appellate Division Rules." Rule 5.8(a)(1).

10. The proposed arrangement does not satisfy this first of the three requirements in Rule 5.8(a). Whether the Company is viewed as a marketing company or one that provides forensic mortgage analysis, it is not engaged in one of the nonlegal professions listed by the Appellate Divisions, which are currently limited to Architecture, Certified Public Accountancy, Professional Engineering, Land Surveying, and Certified Social Work. See 22 NYCRR §§ 1205.3 (process for establishing list of professions), 1205.5 (setting forth list); cf., e.g., N.Y. State 930 ¶10 (1012) (lawyer may not enter into proposed cooperative business arrangement because listed professions do not include provision of insurance services); N.Y. State 885 ¶¶ 6-7 (2011) (lawyer may not enter into proposed cooperative business agreement because listed professions do not include provision of tax reduction services).

11. Thus, from the fact that the Company is not among the types of nonlegal professional service firms that have been approved for cooperative business arrangements, it follows that the proposed arrangement is impermissible. Although Rule 5.8(a) fully disposes of the inquiry, other features of the proposed arrangement also raise concerns meriting comment.

12. First, Rule 5.5(b) provides that a lawyer "shall not aid a nonlawyer in the unauthorized practice of law." Determining the boundaries of unauthorized practice is not within our charge, but we consider the Company's activities here – conducting forensic analyses of mortgage instruments and title, and identifying "errors" that would make the mortgage appropriate for the marketed "unique cause of action" – sufficiently near the borders of legal practice to advise the law firm to reflect on these matters.

13. Second, we note some statutory provisions that may be relevant. New York prohibits the corporate practice of law.[69] There are also statutory limits on the solicitation of legal business by employees of attorneys,[70] and on the solicitation of legal business by corporations.[71] These provisions (like the prohibition of aiding unauthorized practice) present questions of law on which the Committee does not opine.

14. Third, the proposed fee arrangements implicate the rule against paying for referrals. Rule 7.2(a) says that (except in circumstances not applicable here) a lawyer "shall not compensate or give anything of value to a person or organization to recommend or obtain employment by a client." This provision does not prohibit paying a fixed monthly fee to a company for advertising or marketing services, though the advertisements and other aspects of the arrangement must comply with other relevant Rules. Rule 7.2, Cmt. [1]; see, e.g., Rule 7.1 (advertising); Rule 7.3 (solicitation); Rule 8.4(a) (a lawyer may not violate the Rules through the acts of another).

15. Here, however, the law firm would pay the Company not only the monthly marketing fee but also, for individual cases handled, either "success fees" or fees for services in connection with filing and collecting on liens. If any of the various fees would constitute payments to the Company for having recommended or obtained employment by a law firm client, then those payments would violate Rule 7.2(a). There could be a violation even if the fee were stated to be one for lien services,[72] and the 69 Judiciary Law §495(1) provides: "No corporation or voluntary association shall . . . (c) . . . render legal services or advice, nor (d) furnish attorneys or counsel, nor (e) render legal services of any kind in actions or proceedings of any nature or in any other way or manner, nor (f) assume in any other manner to be entitled to practice law, . . . nor (h) advertise that either alone or together with or by or through any person whether or not a duly and regularly admitted attorney-at-law, it has, owns, conducts or maintains a law office or an office for the practice of law, or for furnishing legal advice, services or counsel."

70 Judiciary Law §482 provides: "It shall be unlawful for an attorney to employ any person for the purpose of soliciting or aiding, assisting or abetting in the solicitation of legal business or the procurement through solicitation either directly or indirectly of a retainer, written or oral, or of any agreement authorizing the attorney to perform or render legal services."

71 Judiciary Law §495(2) provides: "No corporation or voluntary association shall . . . solicit any claim or demand for the purpose of . . . furnishing legal advice, services or counsel to, a person sued or about to be sued in any action or proceeding or against whom an action or proceeding has been or is about to be brought, or who may be affected by any action or proceeding which has been or may be instituted in any court or before any judicial body."

72 It might be permissible for the firm to pay the Company a fee for lien services if the fee were reasonably related to the value of the services provided, but otherwise that characterization of the fee could be problematic. Cf. N.Y. State 727 (2000) (when accounting firm that referred clients to law firm received fees from those clients for accounting services that clients had not sought, fee arrangement appeared to serve as impermissible pretext to avoid prior Code rule against payments for referrals).

violation would be plain if the law firm were to pay the Company a "success fee" for each referred client. See N.Y. State 902 (2012) (lawyer may not base marketing fee on number of actual or potential clients the marketer introduces to the lawyer); cf. N.Y. State 887 (2011) (improper to pay marketer a bonus based on particular referrals or profitability); N.Y. State 779 (2004) (improper for attorney to pay marketer for bundles of leads to potential clients).

16. Moreover, whatever the particulars of the inquiring firm's payments to the Company, other more general considerations suggest that the firm's participation would violate Rule 7.2(a). The law firm would be providing benefits to the Company not only through the marketing payments and per-client payments but also by its very participation in the ongoing program. It appears that a substantial part of the value that the Company would provide in return would consist in providing referrals. The Company will advise potential clients of its "unique" claim for relief, identify the law firm (and only the law firm) as engaged in the business of filing such a claim, and then refer potential claimants to the law firm upon the company's "forensic" inquiry into the claimants' qualifications to make the claim. The firm may legitimately provide benefits to the Company for marketing and lien services, but if the benefits are also to reward referrals, then it is difficult to harmonize the arrangement with Rule 7.2(a). See N.Y. State 799 (2006) (impermissible for lawyer to pay a website marketer a fee for recommending the lawyer based on the marketer's analysis of the client's problem).

17. Fourth, one of the options contemplated by the inquiry is that the law firm would pay the Company an amount based on a percentage of the firm's legal fee. Rule 5.4(a) provides that a "lawyer or law firm shall not share legal fees with a nonlawyer," except in circumstances outside the scope of the inquiry. The inquiring firm, recognizing this fee-sharing issue, asks whether it may be avoided by having the payment made not from the firm to the Company, but rather directly from the client to the Company, as to be provided by contract between those parties. If such a contractual arrangement is independent of the legal fee, then it may be consistent with Rule 5.4. See, e.g., N.Y. State 875 (2011) (lawyer may handle case on contingent fee basis where the client has already retained a non-testifying expert to work on the same case on a contingent fee basis).

18. However, the situation would be different if the separate compensation agreement between the client and the Company were merely an attempt to circumvent the rule against fee-sharing. For example, the arrangement could constitute impermissible fee-sharing if the client's payment to the Company were insufficiently related to the value of the services provided by the Company, or if the law firm's fees were reduced to allow for the client's payment to the Company. See N.Y. State 885 ¶8 (2011) (finding improper fee-splitting where attorney reduced customary contingency fee "knowing that the amount of the reduction would be owed to the non-attorney company" that provided tax reduction services and referred clients to the attorney, and where there appeared to be "no relation between the funds to be received by the non-lawyer company and the value of the services actually performed for the client"); N.Y. State 727 (2000) (when accounting firm that referred clients to law firm received fees from those clients for accounting services that clients had not sought, fee arrangement "appear[ed] to constitute a portion of the contingency fee that would otherwise have been paid to the lawyer").

19. Finally, a participating lawyer in the inquiring firm would have to "consider the edicts of Rule 1.7(a)(2), as qualified by Rule 1.7(b), to determine whether the lawyer's personal and financial interest in the arrangement complicates the inquirer's representation of the [Company's] clients." N.Y.

State 930 ¶18 (2012); see N.Y. State 932 (2012) (even when referral arrangements are non-exclusive, "the lawyer must not have such an interest in a steady stream of referrals that it undermines the lawyer's professional judgment for the client").

CONCLUSION:

20. A lawyer or law firm may not maintain an exclusive contractual arrangement with a company that provides marketing services and forensic mortgage analysis so as to offer both legal and nonlegal services to the public on a regular basis; may not pay the company for referring clients; and may not share legal fees with the company.

OPINION 977 (08/01/2013)

TOPIC: Trial publicity in administrative proceeding; distributing via social media a petition and survey in support of client's pending case

DIGEST: A lawyer who represents a client in an administrative proceeding may distribute an online petition and survey in support of the client's case unless there is reason to believe that distributing those statements would have a substantial likelihood of materially prejudicing the adjudication.

RULE: 3.6

FACTS:

1. The inquiring lawyer is defending a client in a cancellation proceeding before the U.S. Trademark Trial and Appeal Board ("TTAB"). In the pending TTAB proceeding, a third-party petitioner has alleged that the client's registered mark is confusingly similar to the petitioner's registered mark and is seeking cancellation of the client's registration.

2. The client has created an online petition to garner opposition to cancellation. The petition presents the proceeding as a contest between a family business and a big corporation, and asks readers to sign in order to demonstrate that there is no likelihood of confusion between the petitioner's mark and the client's mark. The lawyer asks if there is any ethical prohibition of distributing a link to the client's online petition via social media (specifically, using Facebook and Twitter) if the lawyer will merely tell readers it is there but not ask them to sign it.

3. In addition, the lawyer asks if it is ethically permissible to post online a survey asking questions along the lines of the following: "Do you think Mark X is confusingly similar to Mark Y? Click here to express your opinion."

4. The lawyer does not indicate what he intends to do with the petition or the survey results (e.g., whether he intends to try to present the results as evidence in the proceeding).

QUESTIONS:

5. If a client has set up an online petition in support of his case in a trademark cancellation proceeding, may the client's lawyer distribute a link to the petition via social media?

6. May a lawyer in a trademark cancellation proceeding post an online survey asking readers whether they find two trademarks confusingly similar?

OPINION:

7. Rule 3.6(a) of New York's Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") provides that a lawyer who is participating (or has participated) in a criminal or civil matter "shall not make an extrajudicial statement that the lawyer knows or reasonably should know will be disseminated by means of public communication and will have a substantial likelihood of materially prejudicing an adjudicative proceeding in the matter." This provision attempts to balance the public value of informed commentary with a party's right to a fair proceeding.[73] We note that such provisions have been the subject of constitutional challenge,[74] but we are limited to interpreting the rules of legal ethics and do not undertake to assess their validity.

8. The prohibition in Rule 3.6(a) can be divided into a few components: (i) it applies to a lawyer who is participating in "a criminal or civil matter" in which there is or will be an adjudicative proceeding; (ii) it applies when the lawyer "make[s] an extrajudicial statement that the lawyer knows or reasonably should know will be disseminated by means of public communication"; and (iii) it applies to statements "that the lawyer knows or reasonably should know . . . will have a substantial likelihood of materially prejudicing an adjudicative proceeding in the matter." We consider how each of these components applies to the communications proposed in the inquiry.

9. The first component is clearly satisfied. "Matter" is defined by Rule 1.0(l) to include "any . . . administrative proceeding." A trademark cancellation proceeding is an administrative and adjudicative proceeding.[75] The inquiring lawyer is therefore subject to Rule 3.6(a).

10. As to the second component we start by considering whether distributing a link to the petition would constitute making extrajudicial statements. The petition itself includes extrajudicial statements, as it is a document that is being distributed online and it characterizes the nature and merits of the dispute in particular ways. The fact that it was the client who created and posted the petition does not make the rule inapplicable. The lawyer, by distributing the link, is effectively disseminating the petition – and thus "mak[ing]" the statements it contains – over the internet as a means of public communication.

11. Whether the proposed survey meets this second component is less clear and may depend on a more detailed description of its contents. It may not make any "statement" subject to the Rule if it is limited to posing questions in neutral terms and giving readers the opportunity to express opinions. But if it includes leading questions, they could constitute implied statements subject to the Rule.

12. The final and central element of the prohibition is that the lawyer knows or reasonably should know that the statement "will have a substantial likelihood of materially prejudicing an adjudicative proceeding in the matter."

13. The rule provides some guidance on this final element by identifying certain kinds of statements that are presumptively permissible and other kinds that are presumptively impermissible. See

73 See Rule 3.6, Cmt. [1] (discussing "balance between protecting the right to a fair trial and safeguarding the right of free expression," and noting "vital social interests served by the free dissemination of information about events having legal consequences and about legal proceedings themselves").

74 See, e.g., Gentile v. State Bar of Nevada, 501 U.S. 1030, 1063, 1075 (1991) (holding in criminal case that "'substantial likelihood of material prejudice' standard . . . satisfies the First Amendment" as "it is designed to protect the integrity and fairness of a State's judicial system, and it imposes only narrow and necessary limitations on lawyers' speech"); Hirschkop v. Snead, 594 F.2d 356, 373-74 (4th Cir. 1979) (concluding that a rule limiting lawyers' speech on matters pending before administrative tribunals, more restrictive than Rule 3.6, was unconstitutional because overbroad, and noting lack of record evidence "that any administrative decision has been set aside because the comments of lawyers impaired the fairness of the proceedings").

75 See Trademark Trial and Appeal Board Manual of Procedure §102.02 (3d ed., rev. 2, June 2013) (describing proceedings within jurisdiction of TTAB, including cancellation proceedings); id. §102.03 (cancellation proceedings include pleadings, motions and trial). This TTAB Manual is available at http://www.uspto.gov/trademarks/process/appeal/Preface_TBMP.jsp.

Rule 3.6(b) (1) – (6) (listing kinds of statements "ordinarily" deemed likely to be prejudicial; Rule 3.6(c) (1) – (7) (listing kinds of information a lawyer may state, without elaboration, if the statement does not violate the basic prohibition in Rule 3.6(a)). As to the communications in question, however, the rule's presumptions do not apply. Neither the petition nor the survey would be within any of the presumptively permissible categories of information listed in Rule 3.6(c). Nor would either of those communications be presumptively prohibited, because Rule 3.6(b) applies only to certain statements that refer "to a civil matter triable to a jury, a criminal matter or any other proceeding that could result in incarceration." A trademark cancellation proceeding is not triable to a jury.[76] For this inquiry, therefore, the rule's lists of categories give no presumptive answer to the question of likely prejudice.

14. However, the presumptions described above do not exhaust the content of Rule 3.6. Whether or not one of the presumptions applies, the governing standard remains the one found in Rule 3.6(a). We turn to some factors that bear on whether the communications would have a substantial likelihood of materially prejudicing the cancellation proceeding.

15. One factor is the nature of the adjudicative proceeding. Its relevance may be inferred from Rule 3.6(b), because as noted above, the presumptive prohibitions do not apply to civil matters not triable to a jury. Here is a more direct statement of this factor's importance:

> Criminal jury trials will be most sensitive to extrajudicial speech. Civil trials may be less sensitive. Non-jury hearings and arbitration proceedings may be even less affected. The Rule will still place limitations on prejudicial comments in these cases, but the likelihood of prejudice may be different depending on the type of proceeding.

Rule 3.6, Cmt. [6]. Indeed, it has been said that the concern about improperly influencing a fact-finder's decisions > is largely irrelevant in matters to be decided by judges. Judicial officers are expected to be immune from the influences of inadmissible evidence and similar sources of information and from the potentially distorting effects of inflamed public opinion. Thus, media comments by a lawyer outside a nonjury proceeding will pose a significant and direct threat to the administration of justice . . . only in extreme situations.[77]

16. Another factor is the content of the extrajudicial statements. For example, statements on peripheral issues may carry little risk of prejudice. Statements may be more likely to be prejudicial if they address crucial issues committed to the finder of fact or are expressed in an inflammatory way.

17. The likelihood of prejudice will depend in part on the likelihood that the statements will come to the attention of the finder of fact. Thus the method of disseminating extrajudicial statements may be a relevant factor, and another related one is the statements' timing.[78] Other relevant factors may include the purpose with which the statements were made[79] and whether the information in the statements is otherwise available from public sources.[80] Having listed some of the factors relevant to likely prejudice (but without any claim that the list is comprehensive), we consider their application to the inquiry.

76 TTAB Manual, note 2 supra, §102.03 (decisions on merits of cases are rendered by panels of TTAB judges).

77 Restatement (Third) of The Law Governing Lawyers §109, cmt. b (2000). But cf., e.g., United States v. Khan, 538 F.Supp.2d. 929, 932-35 (S.D.N.Y. 2007) (interpreting analogous local rule against statements likely to "prejudice the due administration of justice" to prohibit not only lawyer's statements likely to taint jury pool but also those likely to threaten safety of witnesses).

18. The nonjury nature of the TTAB proceeding is a consideration counting strongly against likely prejudice. On the other hand, while the inquiry does not fully describe the proposed communications, it appears at least that the statements in the petition, and implied ones in the survey if any, would directly address the merits of the dispute. The inquiry does not reveal the amount of time that would be expected to pass from the making of the statements until the trial.

19. A factor that may assume particular significance on these facts is motive. In this connection it is useful to distinguish between the mere making of the statements and their ultimate intended uses. The inquiry does not specify those uses.

20. It is possible that the lawyer's intent is to use the survey results as evidence that the two marks are not confusingly similar. If so, then the question arises whether such survey evidence would be permissible in a cancellation proceeding. If conducting the survey were an appropriate means of seeking competent evidence, then it would not have a substantial likelihood of "prejudicing" the proceeding. On the other hand, if the survey results would not constitute proper evidence, their dissemination could give rise to additional concerns. Cf. Rule 3.6(b)(5) (in jury or criminal context, statement ordinarily likely to be prejudicial if it relates to information the lawyer knows or reasonably should know is "likely to be inadmissible as evidence in a trial and would, if disclosed, create a substantial risk of prejudicing an impartial trial"). Similar questions would apply to possible intended use of the petition in evidence.

21. However, the petition was created by the client and there is no indication of intent to use is as evidence. In the absence of some other explanation, the inquiring lawyer should consider whether the client's goal is to disseminate the petition so broadly as to influence the finders of fact other than through the tribunal's processes. Of course in that instance it would be improper for the lawyer to participate in its dissemination.

78 See Gentile v. State Bar of Nevada, 501 U.S. 1030, 1044 (1991) (citing case law and ABA source for proposition that timing of a statement is significant factor in the assessment of the possible threatened prejudice, and giving as problematic example a statement "which reaches the attention of the venire on the eve of voir dire"); Restatement (Third) of The Law Governing Lawyers §109, cmt. c (2000) ("statement made long before a jury is to be selected presents less risk than the same statement made in the heat of intense media publicity about an imminent or ongoing proceeding").

79 See Gentile v. State Bar of Nevada, 501 U.S. at 1064-65, 1080 (disciplinary authority considered purpose of statements in assessing likelihood of prejudice); id. at 1079 (minority finding it persuasive that lawyer admitted having called press conference to influence venire, because it was "difficult to believe that he went to such trouble, and took such a risk, if there was no substantial likelihood that he would succeed").

80 See id. at 1046 (minority portion of opinion noting that "[m]uch of the information provided by petitioner had been published in one form or another, obviating any potential for prejudice"); Restatement (Third) of The Law Governing Lawyers §109, cmt. c (2000) (if same information "is available to the media from other sources, the lawyer's out-of-court statement alone ordinarily will not cause prejudice," but this factor is not "controlling" and "the information must be both available and likely in the circumstances to be reported by the media"); In re Sullivan, 185 A.D.2d 440, 445 (3d Dept. 1992) (dismissing disciplinary charges against criminal defense lawyer whose "television interview was a mere drop in the ocean of publicity" surrounding the trial, when the matters discussed "had been otherwise publicized prior to the interview").

22. We have mentioned various relevant facts not contained in the inquiry, and their absence limits our ability to balance the above factors. Even without those facts, however, we can identify an outline of the analysis. The dominant factor in this case may be the nature of the adjudicative proceeding. The fact that the adjudication will be by an administrative tribunal like the TTAB counts heavily in favor of the inquiring lawyer being permitted to disseminate the proposed communications. There could be a different answer if the inquiring lawyer were aware of additional facts indicating that the client seeks to use the petition to exert improper influence, or that prejudice is otherwise likely. But in the absence of such additional facts, it seems unlikely that distribution of the petition or the survey would materially prejudice an adjudicative proceeding to be conducted by a panel of specialized trademark judges.

23. We have addressed only such constraints on the proposed communications as might be imposed by the rules of legal ethics. There could also be legal constraints, but issues of law are beyond the scope of this Committee. The inquiring lawyer may be well advised to review TTAB rules and other applicable laws and rules before distributing the petition or survey.

CONCLUSION:

24. A lawyer representing a client in a trademark cancellation proceeding may use social media to distribute a link to an online petition in support of the client's case, and may post an online survey, where there is no substantial likelihood that the petition or survey would materially prejudice the upcoming administrative adjudication. If the lawyer knew that the client were trying to use the petition to pressure the trademark judges, or the lawyer had other information indicating a likelihood of materially prejudicing the proceeding, then the lawyer should not participate in disseminating those statements. But in the absence of such information, such statements may fairly be considered unlikely to prejudice a proceeding conducted by a panel of administrative judges.

OPINION 978 (08/06/2013)

TOPIC: Counsel to closely held corporation

DIGEST: An attorney acting as general counsel to a closely held corporation 1) represents the entity and not its directors/sole shareholders and 2) must explain to the directors/shareholders that he does not represent them when he becomes aware that action to be taken on behalf of the entity may be divergent from their personal interests.

CODE: Rule 1.13(a) Rule 1.4(b)

BACKGROUND:

1. An attorney acts as general counsel for a closely held corporation in which its directors are also the sole shareholders. The attorney does not represent the directors/shareholders. Discussions are on-going within the corporation as to certain issues relevant to the corporation's by-laws and shareholder agreements the result of which will impact the corporation's ability to take advantage of a tax/property evaluation benefit. While the change will benefit the corporation, half of the directors will be personally disadvantaged by it. The lawyer is aware that the interests of the individuals will diverge from those of the entity and/or the other directors/shareholders when these issues are raised and the lawyer fears the board will deadlock and be unable to take advantage of the benefit.

QUESTION:

2. Is the lawyer required to raise the issues on behalf of the organization because of the relevance to the discussion or is the lawyer prohibited from raising the issues because the lawyer is aware of the divergent personal interests of the shareholder directors?

ANALYSIS:

3. As Rule 1.13(a) notes, "[w]hen a lawyer employed or retained by an organization is dealing with the organization's directors, . . . shareholders or other constituents, and it appears that the organization's interests may differ from those of the constituents with whom the lawyer is dealing, the lawyer shall explain that the lawyer is the lawyer for the organization and not for any of the constituents." As Professor Simon notes, '[t]he essence of the rule is in the final clause, which says that a lawyer who is employed by an organization 'is the lawyer for the organization and not for any of its constituents.'" Simon's New York Rules of Professional Conduct Annotated 2013 Edition, p.633.

4. The question then becomes whether the lawyer must raise the issue with the client, the organization, or remain quiet because of the awareness of the divergent interests among the director/shareholders. Rule 1.4(b) requires that "[a] lawyer shall explain a matter to the extent reasonably necessary to permit the client to make informed decisions regarding the representation." If knowledge of the issue is reasonably necessary to permit the client to make an informed decision, then it must be raised. At this juncture, Rule 1.13(a) will provide guidance to the lawyer. Now that the lawyer has made the decision that this is something he must raise with his client, the organization, and that it may be adverse to the personal interests of the directors/shareholders or presents a conflict between the interests of the directors/shareholders, the lawyer is required to explain to the director/shareholders that he is the lawyer for the organization and not for any of them personally. Comment 2A to Rule 1.13(a) notes:

> There are times when the organization's interests may differ from those of one or more of its constituents. In such circumstances, the lawyer should advise any constituent whose interest differs from that of the organization: (i) that a conflict or potential conflict of interest exists, (ii) that the lawyer does not represent the constituent in connection with the matter . . . , (iii) that the constituent may wish to obtain independent representation, and (iv) that any attorney-client privilege belongs to the organization and may be waived by the organization. . . .

CONCLUSION:

5. When a lawyer acting as general counsel to a closely held corporation becomes aware of an issue, the knowledge of which is necessary for the entity to make an informed decision and proposes a change that may be contrary to the personal interests of certain directors/shareholders, the lawyer must advise the entity of the issue and should consider, as appropriate, advising the directors/shareholders (1) the lawyer is the lawyer for the organization and not for the directors/shareholders, (2) that an actual or potential conflict of interest exists, (3) that the directors/shareholders may wish to retain counsel on their own behalf, and (4) that any attorney client privilege belongs to the organization and may be waived by the organization.

TOPIC: Lawyer-mediator group; payment for referrals

DIGEST: A group of lawyer-mediators, though not associated in a firm, may place joint advertisements and maintain a website that lists the varied experience and biographies of its members, allowing those seeking mediation services to contact a particular member of the group by visiting a website maintained by the group or calling a telephone number listed for the group as a whole.

RULES: 2.4; 5.7(a); 7.2(a)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a lawyer who, with another lawyer, has been organizing a group of lawyer-mediators with varied areas of experience. The group has a name, and a website that lists the names, areas of experience, and detailed biographies of each member. The group plans to place advertisements. Members of the group will pay its operating costs, including the price of the advertisements.

2. A legal assistant employed by the inquirer will answer calls to a telephone number listed on the website, but will not recommend specific members of the group to the caller. Instead, those seeking mediation services from the group will be expected to pick the appropriate lawyer-mediator based on the information about each member contained on the website. The inquirer has asked whether this arrangement would constitute a referral arrangement prohibited under the authority of N.Y. State 678 (1996).

QUESTION:

3. May a group of lawyer-mediators, though not associated in a firm, place joint advertisements, maintain a website that lists the varied experience and biographies of its members, and maintain a phone line available to callers seeking a particular lawyer-mediator?

OPINION:

4. The New York Rules of Professional Conduct generally do not allow lawyers to pay for referrals of clients. Subject only to certain exceptions not relevant to this inquiry, "A lawyer shall not compensate or give anything of value to a person or organization to recommend or obtain employment by a client, or as a reward for having made a recommendation resulting in employment by a client." Rule 7.2(a). However, this prohibition is not meant to keep "a lawyer from paying for advertising and communications permitted by the[] Rules, including the costs of print directory listings, online directory listings, newspaper ads, television and radio airtime, . . . and group advertising." Rule 7.2, Cmt. [1].

5. We consider two threshold questions as to the applicability of Rule 7.2. The first asks which of the Rules apply (and in particular whether Rule 7.2 applies) to the kind of mediation services contemplated by this inquiry. One that would clearly apply is the Rule specific to service as a third-party neutral.[81] Some other Rules apply to lawyers at all times, irrespective of whether they are providing legal services.[82]

6. The applicability of other Rules, including Rule 7.2, presents a more complicated question that requires consideration of whether mediation services constitute legal services. A service that can lawfully be performed only by lawyers is clearly a legal service, but nonlawyers can lawfully serve as mediators. We nonetheless concluded in N.Y. State 678 (1996) that "lawyers who serve as mediators should be presumed to be rendering a legal service," and thus, at least presumptively, "are engaged in the practice of law."[83] If that conclusion is correct today, then mediation services by a lawyer are presumptively governed by the Rules. See Rule 5.7, Cmt. [4] (lawyer or law firm rendering legal services "is always subject to these Rules").

7. There is, however, controversy on this point. Some authorities have concluded that mediation services by a lawyer do not constitute the practice of law and are not subject to the full range of legal ethics rules.[84] Other authorities have endorsed the approach of N.Y. State 678.[85] And some have taken a middle position in which a lawyer-mediator may or may not be practicing law, and may or may not

81 Rule 2.4 ("Lawyer Serving as Third-Party Neutral") applies to lawyers serving as mediators and in other neutral capacities. Moreover, a lawyer who serves as a third-party neutral "may be subject to court rules or other law that applies either to third-party neutrals generally or to lawyers serving as third-party neutrals," as well as various codes of ethics. Rule 2.4, Cmt. [2]. We express no opinion on the applicability or import of any such constraints outside the Rules of Professional Conduct. See, e.g., N.Y. State 900 ¶19 (2011).

82 Rule 5.7 determines when the Rules are generally applicable to lawyers who are providing "nonlegal services," but a comment to the rule explains that some Rules apply in all circumstances: "Although a lawyer may be exempt from the application of these Rules with respect to nonlegal services on the face of [Rule 5.7(a)], the scope of the exemption is not absolute. A lawyer who provides or who is involved in the provision of nonlegal services may be excused from compliance with only those Rules that are dependent upon the existence of a representation or client-lawyer relationship. Other Rules, such as those prohibiting lawyers from misusing the confidences or secrets of a former client (see Rule 1.9), requiring lawyers to report certain lawyer misconduct (see Rule 8.3), and prohibiting lawyers from engaging in illegal, dishonest, fraudulent or deceptive conduct (see Rule 8.4), apply to a lawyer irrespective of the existence of a representation, and thus govern a lawyer not covered by [Rule 5.7(a)]." Rule 5.7, Cmt. [4].

83 We reasoned in part: "Whether or not one conceives of the lawyer as 'representing' the participants in divorce mediation, the lawyer's role as a neutral mediator may include rendering advice about legal questions or preparing a separation agreement – services that would ordinarily seem to entail the practice of law when performed by lawyers." We did not treat this as a per se rule: "Presumably a lawyer who serves as a mediator outside of the law office, gives no legal advice or opinions, and does not draw up an agreement is not acting in any legal capacity and is not then governed by the lawyer's code. This would, however, be a rare case. More often the lawyer would offer impartial legal advice or explain the law to the participants." N.Y. State 678 (1996).

84 E.g., Indiana Opinion 5 (1992) (because nonlawyers may act as mediators and nature of mediation is substantially different from practice of law, lawyer-mediator was not generally bound by legal ethics rules on trade names and solicitation); Kentucky Opinion KBA E-377 (1995) (corporation formed by attorney to provide mediation services not subject to legal ethics rule on trade names, though advertisement of mediation services which identifies any participant as a lawyer must comply with ethics rules on advertising). The case that such services are not the practice of law was arguably bolstered by New York's adoption of the Rule specifically governing a lawyer's service as a mediator. In relevant part the Rule provides: "A lawyer serves as a 'third-party neutral' when the lawyer assists two or more persons who are not clients of the lawyer to reach a resolution of a dispute or other matter that has arisen between them." Rule 2.4(a).

85 E.g., Iowa Opinion 96-30 (1997) (alternative dispute resolution done by nonlawyers "has not been held to be the practice of law . . . [b]ut when done by a lawyer it becomes the practice of law" and lawyer working as a mediator would be bound by Iowa legal ethics code); Mississippi Opinion 241 (issued 1997, amended 2013) (mediation is a "law related" service which when provided by a lawyer becomes the practice of law and is subject to rules of legal ethics); New Jersey Opinion 711 (2007) (when mediation center advertised that lawyer-mediators would help parties understand legal rights and procedures, attorneys who accept referrals to mediate "are practicing law" by "accepting clients in a form of limited representation . . . for the sole purpose of serving as a third-party neutral, as contemplated by [New Jersey Rule 2.4]," and their conduct is governed by New Jersey legal ethics rules).

be generally subject to the rules of legal ethics, depending on the circumstances.[86] In any event, the current inquiry does not require, and we do not now undertake, a reconsideration of N.Y. State 678.[87]

8. The other threshold question has to do with the status of the group of lawyer-mediators. If they were to constitute a law firm, then its members would merely be making financial contributions toward advertising for that very firm. In that case the inquiry would implicate general restrictions on advertising but not the prohibition on paying others for referrals. See Rule 7.2, Cmt. [1] (stating that lawyers are not permitted "to pay others" for channeling professional work). On the facts as presented in the inquiry, however, the group of lawyer-mediators does not constitute a law firm as defined by Rule 1.0(h). Rule 7.2 is thus applicable (subject to considerations in the previous paragraph). We also note that joint advertisements must not misstate the relationship among members of the group. See Rule 7.1(c)(2) (advertisements shall not "imply that lawyers are associated in a law firm if that is not the case").

9. We turn to the application of Rule 7.2(a). Some of our prior opinions shed light on the boundary between referrals and group advertising. In one opinion applying the former Code of Professional Responsibility, the Committee concluded that > a program in which an advertising agent runs generic ads for legal services and distributes prospective clients to participating lawyers who have been assigned the exclusive right to cases arising in particular geographical areas is more in the nature of a lawyer referral service than advertising by an individual lawyer. When a prospective client answers the advertisement, the purpose is to be given the name of a lawyer, rather than to contact a particular lawyer.

N.Y. State 597 (1989). The Committee found such an arrangement to violate certain provisions, then part of the Code, limiting lawyer referral services.

10. The Committee reached a different conclusion, however, as to an advertisement which "presents in a meaningful fashion" the names and other information of the lawyers or firms participating in the group advertisement "so that the potential client knows the identity of the lawyer to whom his call will be referred and there is no discretion in referrals on the part of the advertising agent." The Committee found such a listing permissible if otherwise compliant with the Code and court rules, and we noted that "such joint advertising may be the only way it is economically feasible for a practitioner with a small practice to afford certain forms of advertising." N.Y. State 597.

86 E.g., Oregon Opinion 2005-101 (identifying certain rules of legal ethics that would apply if the mediation service "would involve the practice of law, such as by drafting settlement agreements"); Pennsylvania Opinion 96-167 (mediation appears to be among "nonlegal services" such that Rule 5.7 will determine applicability of other Rules, but "if an attorney-mediator advertises his/her services, he/she must comply with the advertising and solicitation rules").

87 If – contrary to N.Y. State 678 – mediation services by a lawyer do not constitute legal services subject to the full range of legal ethics rules, then Rule 7.2 would not apply, and the conduct proposed in the inquiry would not be prohibited by the Rules. The other possibility – following N.Y. State 678 – is that mediation services by a lawyer constitute legal services (either always or in particular cases), and Rule 7.2 applies. Even in that case, based on the analysis in the rest of this opinion, the proposed conduct would be permissible. In other words, the outcome would be the same either way and would not turn on whether we would reach the same conclusion if we were deciding N.Y. State 678 today.

11. We followed the reasoning of N.Y. State 597 in the context of a divorce mediation service that proposed running ads with an "800" number. Callers would be referred to a participating mediator based on the caller's geographic location. The Committee reiterated that this type of arrangement – in which a potential client calls to get the name of a provider of services rather than to contact a specified individual – would constitute a lawyer referral service. N.Y. State 678 (1996).

12. We believe that the lines drawn by these precedents with respect to certain provisions in the former Code apply equally to the prohibition of payments for referrals that is in the current Rules of Professional Conduct. The proposed conduct does not, like the arrangements that our prior opinions found to be referral services, contemplate that prospective clients will call a number and be given the name of a lawyer. Rather, the members of the inquirer's group will be listed on a website and perhaps other advertisements by name and areas of experience. The website will include a detailed member biography. This format is reasonably designed to encourage the consumer to select the member with the expertise appropriate to the consumer's needs, rather than to trigger a consumer to call for a referral. We rely also on the inquirer's assurance that a caller seeking a referral will not be supplied with the name of a lawyer-mediator, but rather will be directed back to the website to choose a member with appropriate qualifications. Accordingly, in the model proposed, the members of the group would be paying for joint advertising but would not be making payments for referrals as prohibited by Rule 7.2.

13. We note that the inquirer may need to consider various matters of legal ethics beyond Rule 7.2. For example, the inquirer may need to consider ethical constraints on advertising, claims of specialization, trade names and payment arrangements.[88] However, the inquiry neither focuses on these matters nor fully describes the facts surrounding them, and we do not opine as to the permissibility of the proposed conduct in these respects.

CONCLUSION:

14. A group of lawyer-mediators, though not associated in a firm, may place joint advertisements and maintain a website identifying the group's members and listing their varied experience, practice areas and biographies, so as to allow a party seeking mediation services to call a single telephone number or visit a single website to contact the lawyer-mediator of that party's choice. The members of the group may pay the group's operating costs as long as the advertising and payment arrangements comply with relevant Rules.

(28-13)

88 Limits on advertising, claims of specialization, and trade names are set forth in Rule 7.1, Rule 7.4, and Rule 7.5(b) respectively. As to payment by the lawyer-mediators for advertisements and other operating costs of the group, some arrangements could be problematic and require further analysis. For example, the inquiry mentions that the amount of each lawyer's payments may be determined as a percentage of fees earned by that lawyer on work brought in through the group's marketing. See Rule 1.5(g) (generally prohibiting division of legal fees with a lawyer not associated in same firm); Rule 5.4(a) (generally prohibiting sharing legal fees with a nonlawyer). If we had occasion to reach such issues, the threshold question would be the applicability to the proposed conduct of the Rules cited in this footnote, and that would require consideration of N.Y. State 678 in light of Rule 2.4. See paragraphs 6-7 supra.

TOPIC: Disclosure of confidential information to collect a fee; candor toward a tribunal

DIGEST: A lawyer, having learned in a prior proceeding that a then-client imparted material and false information about the client's finances to the tribunal, has a duty to take reasonable remedial measures that may still be available, including, if necessary, disclosure to that tribunal. Even if the correct information about the former client's finances is confidential, the lawyer may disclose it in the former client's bankruptcy proceeding if, but only to the extent that, the lawyer reasonably believes that disclosure is necessary to collect a fee that the former client owes to the lawyer.

RULES: 1.6; 3.3(a)-(c)

FACTS:

1. While the inquiring attorney was representing a client in a contested judicial proceeding in which the client's finances were at issue, the client disclosed confidential information to the attorney about the client's finances (including that the client was working "off the books"). The information was inconsistent with what the client was providing to the court. The attorney, according to the inquiry, did not "promote" this information in the judicial proceeding.

2. Subsequently, the client filed for protection from creditors, including the inquiring lawyer, who is owed a legal fee from the prior representation. The lawyer wishes to reveal the confidential information from the first proceeding in the bankruptcy proceeding so as to aid the lawyer's effort to be paid the legal fee.

QUESTION:

3. Having received confidential information from the client in one proceeding, may the inquiring lawyer disclose that information in a subsequent bankruptcy proceeding in an effort to collect an unpaid legal fee?

OPINION:

4. Ordinarily, under Rule 1.6(a) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the Rules), a lawyer shall not "knowingly reveal confidential information" or "use such information to the disadvantage of a client or for the advantage of the lawyer." One of the exceptions to this proscription is Rule 1.6(a)(3), which says that a lawyer may do so if "the disclosure is permitted by paragraph (b)" of Rule 1.6. That paragraph, among other things, permits a lawyer to "reveal or use confidential information to the extent that the lawyer reasonably believes necessary . . . to establish or collect a fee." Rule 1.6(b)(5)(ii).

5. We caution that Rule 1.6(b)(5)(ii) is no license for counsel to reveal any confidential information beyond what is "reasonably believe[d] necessary" to collect the fee. The Rules do not shed much light on these terms.[89] Nonetheless, these terms provide significant limits beyond which a lawyer may not go in seeking to collect a fee. We have previously discussed those limits, and while some of the opinions were decided under the prior Code of Professional Responsibility, we believe they generally remain sound guides under the Rules.

89 A lawyer "reasonably believes" something when "the lawyer believes the matter in question and . . . the circumstances are such that the belief is reasonable." Rule 1.0(r). The Rules do not define "necessary," but Webster's Unabridged Dictionary at 1200 (2nd ed. 1983) says that the word means "unavoidable, essential, indispensable, needful."

6. First, a lawyer should not resort to disclosure to collect a fee except in appropriate circumstances.[90] Second, the lawyer should try to avoid the need for disclosure.[91] Third, disclosure must be truly necessary as part of some appropriate and not abusive process to collect the fee.[92] Fourth, disclosure may not be broader in scope or manner than the need that justifies it, and the lawyer should consider possible means to limit damage to the client.[93]

7. Bearing in mind these limits on the fee-collection exception, we now turn to its applicability. The exception, as set forth in Rule 1.6(b)(5)(ii) and quoted above, is not reserved for any particular kinds of proceedings. In particular, the fee-collection exception "has been applied to bankruptcy proceedings." D.C. Opinion 236 (1993) (citing examples and concluding that a "well-established but narrow exception to the general rule against revealing client confidences and secrets . . . permits the disclosure of such information in connection with actions to establish or collect fees in bankruptcy proceedings in limited circumstances").

8. Of course the limits on the exception also apply in bankruptcy proceedings.[94] Indeed, there is some authority as to how those limits may apply to particular uses of confidential information in the 90 See N.Y. State 684 (1996) (analogizing to rule allowing withdrawal when client "deliberately disregards" a fee obligation, which occurs when "'the failure is conscious rather than inadvertent, and is not de minimis in either amount or duration'"); Restatement (Third) of the Law Governing Lawyers §41 cmt. c (2000) [hereinafter Restatement] ("The lawyer's fee claim must be advanced in good faith and with a reasonable basis.").

91 See Rule 1.6, Cmt. [14] ("Before making a disclosure, the lawyer should, where practicable, first seek to persuade the client to take suitable action to obviate the need for disclosure."); N.Y. State 608 (1990) (noting Code principle that a lawyer should "zealously avoid," and "attempt amicably to resolve," fee controversies with clients, and concluding that lawyer may use a collection agent to collect a fee but only after all other reasonable efforts short of litigation have been exhausted).

92 See N.Y. State 684 (1996) (disclosure to a credit bureau would appear to aid collection process if at all "only by virtue of its in terrorem effect on the client," and where "the client's potential injury arising from the disclosure of the client secret is the very vehicle of collection, such disclosure cannot be viewed as the type that is 'necessary' for the collection"); Restatement §41 cmt. c (lawyer "may not disclose or threaten to disclose information to nonclients not involved in the suit in order to coerce the client into settling").

93 See Rule 1.6, Cmt. [14] ("a disclosure adverse to the client's interest should be no greater than the lawyer reasonably believes necessary to accomplish the purpose," and disclosure in adjudicative proceeding "should be made in a manner that limits access to the information to the tribunal or other persons having a need to know the information, and appropriate protective orders or other arrangements should be sought by the lawyer to the fullest extent practicable"); Restatement §65, cmt. d (describing requirements that use or disclosure of confidential information in compensation dispute be proportionate and restrained); id. §41, cmt. c ("lawyer should not disclose the information until after exploring whether the harm can be limited by partial disclosure, stipulation with the client, or a protective order").

94 "[T]he inquirer must have a good faith expectation of recovering more than a de minimis amount of the outstanding fee." D.C. Opinion 236 (1993). "[T]he proposed disclosure to the bankruptcy court must be as narrow as possible, providing only the minimal information necessary to establish or collect a fee. In addition, if possible, the inquirer should use protective orders, in camera proceedings, John Doe pleadings, and/or other appropriate mechanisms to protect the identity and interests of the client. Id.; accord Los Angeles County Opinion 452 (1988) (attorney may prosecute adversary proceeding to have a debt declared non-dischargeable but "as in any fee collection action, the attorney should avoid the disclosure of confidences and secrets to the extent feasible, and should obtain appropriate confidentiality orders for this purpose").

bankruptcy context.[95] However, because the inquiry does not specify the particular planned uses of confidential information, we leave to the inquiring attorney a careful consideration of whether disclosure is appropriate under the above principles, and if so, how to limit it to the minimum necessary.

9. The inquiring attorney should also consider whether the information from the client is not only confidential under the rules of ethics, but also subject to attorney-client privilege, and whether such privilege might affect the permissibility of the proposed disclosure.[96] However, questions of privilege are legal matters on which we do not opine.

10. We turn to a second question that was not part of the inquiry but is raised by its facts. The inquiring attorney says that the attorney did not "promote" the client's apparently false evidence about the client's finances during the first proceeding. Depending on when that first proceeding occurred, however, the lawyer may have had a greater duty to the tribunal than forbearing from relying on the false evidence. Specifically, the applicable rule may have obliged the attorney to disclose the confidential information to the first tribunal if the client declined to do so and lesser remedial measures were insufficient to cleanse the record of the untrue evidence.

11. The Rules of Professional Conduct became effective, replacing the former Code of Professional Responsibility, on April 1, 2009. On that day, a lawyer's duty in appearing before a tribunal materially changed. The relevant provision of the Code had required that a lawyer who learned that the lawyer's client had clearly perpetrated a fraud upon a tribunal "shall promptly call upon the client to rectify the same, and if the client refuses or is unable to do so, the lawyer shall reveal the fraud to the affected . . . tribunal, except when the information is protected as a confidence or secret." DR 7-102(B)(1) (emphasis added).

12. In contrast, one of the new rules that took effect on April 1, 2009, sweeps more broadly. The duty to take remedial steps is triggered when "a lawyer, the lawyer's client, or a witness called by the lawyer has offered material evidence and the lawyer comes to know of its falsity." Rule 3.3(a)(3). The 95 One ethics committee, while opining that an "attorney may make a claim in the bankruptcy case, and may prosecute a dischargeability proceeding as to the claim," also opined that the attorney may not participate in the "collective collection effort of the bankruptcy process." In other words, "the attorney may not use confidential or secret information to challenge the right of his former client to a discharge, and may not disclose such information to the trustee or other creditors," or otherwise "assist [the] trustee or other creditors in recovering assets." Los Angeles County Opinion 452 (1988).

96 We have previously noted a question whether the court-adopted rules of legal ethics "can override the statutory protection to the attorney-client privilege afforded by CPLR § 4503(a)." N.Y. State 831 (2009). Even if they cannot, however, it is not clear that privilege would bar disclosure in the case at hand. We note that in certain proceedings seeking relief from creditors, the privilege typically belongs to the Trustee and not to the person seeking relief. Thus, the person with capacity to waive the privilege may reside in someone other than the lawyer's onetime client. Moreover, an exception to the privilege could apply. See, e.g., Alexander, CPLR §4503 Practice Commentaries, C4503:5(b) (McKinney) (discussing, as an exception to the privilege, "the rule that permits a lawyer to reveal confidences in order to collect a fee from the client"); Restatement §83(1) ("attorney-client privilege does not apply to a communication that is relevant and reasonably necessary for a lawyer to employ in a proceeding . . . to resolve a dispute with a client concerning compensation or reimbursement that the lawyer reasonably claims the client owes the lawyer"); Restatement §82(a) (exception to privilege when client "consults a lawyer for the purpose, later accomplished, of obtaining assistance to engage in a crime or fraud").

duty is also triggered whenever the lawyer knows of "fraudulent conduct related to the proceeding."[97] In either case, "the lawyer shall take reasonable remedial measures, including, if necessary, disclosure to the tribunal." Rule 3.3(a)(3), (b). There is no longer any exception for confidences or secrets. See Rule 3.3(c) (duty applies "even if compliance requires disclosure of information otherwise protected by Rule 1.6"); N.Y. State 837 ¶¶ 6-7 (2010).

13. The application of the new standards of Rule 3.3 depends on when the first proceeding occurred. In N.Y. State 831 (2009), we concluded that, notwithstanding the adoption of Rule 3.3, DR 2-107(a) remained in force as to a fraud committed by the client prior to April 1, 2009, regardless of when the lawyer came to know the falsity of the information. Here, the lawyer's duty to disclose the information to the tribunal depends on whether the client imparted the false information to the tribunal before or after April 1, 2009.

14. If the false information was imparted before that date, the lawyer had a duty to call upon the client to rectify the fraud. However, if the client declined to do so, the lawyer had no further duty to disclose the information to the tribunal if that information was protected as a confidence or secret. And the information was undoubtedly so protected, given its nature and the way the lawyer learned it. On the other hand, if the false information was material and was imparted to the tribunal on or after April 1, 2009, then the lawyer had a duty to take reasonable remedial measures, and if measures short of disclosure were insufficient, then the lawyer would have a duty of disclosure to the tribunal.

15. This leaves us with two remaining matters, each on the assumption that Rule 3.3, not DR 7-102(B), governs the lawyer's obligations. One is the issue of whether, even if the Rules of Professional Conduct would seem to require disclosure of the false information, such information might nevertheless be shielded from disclosure in the first proceeding by the attorney-client privilege.[98] As noted above, however, privilege issues are questions of law beyond our purview.

16. The other remaining issue is the duration of the lawyer's obligation to make a Rule 3.3(a) disclosure to a tribunal. Although the State Bar proposed that the duty continue only to the conclusion of the proceeding, the courts did not adopt that proposal. N.Y. State 837 ¶16 (2010). Thus it appears that the obligation to disclose "may continue even after the conclusion of the proceeding in which the false material was used." We nevertheless opined that the endpoint of the obligation "cannot sensibly or logically be viewed as extending beyond the point at which remedial measures are available, since a disclosure which exposes the client to jeopardy without serving any remedial purpose is not authorized under Rule 3.3." Id. (citations omitted); accord N.Y. City 2013-2 (opining that "for a measure to

97 Rule 3.3(b). Under the new rules, "fraudulent" conduct includes not only conduct that is fraudulent under applicable law, but also conduct that "has a purpose to deceive." Rule 1.0(i). This new definition apparently broadened the category of conduct constituting client frauds that could require remedial steps. See N.Y. State 831 (2009).

98 We have already noted issues as to whether privilege might bar disclosure otherwise permitted for the purpose of collecting a fee, see footnote 96 supra, and some of the same considerations (including possible applicability of the crime-fraud exception) apply to whether privilege might bar disclosure otherwise mandated by Rule 3.3. In any event, even if the privilege applied to the client communications in question, it may not extend to the context of disclosure under Rule 3.3. See Rule 1.6, Cmt. [3] (attorney-client privilege is part of evidence law and applies "when compulsory process by a judicial or other governmental body seeks to compel a lawyer to testify or produce information or evidence concerning a client"); N.Y. State 837 ¶¶ 12-13 (2010) (noting that CPLR §4503's limit on remedial measures "extends only to the introduction of protected information into evidence"); Restatement §86(1) (privilege may be invoked "[w]hen an attempt is made to introduce in evidence or obtain discovery" of a privileged communication).

be remedial, it must have a reasonable prospect of protecting the integrity of the adjudicative process," and discussing how application of that standard requires consideration of law and court procedures applicable to correction of the false evidence in question).

CONCLUSION:

17. A lawyer who in one proceeding obtains confidential information about a client's financial affairs may disclose that information in a subsequent bankruptcy proceeding if, but only to the extent that, the lawyer reasonably believes that disclosure is necessary to collect a fee that the former client owes to the lawyer and disclosure is not barred by attorney-client privilege.

18. If a lawyer learns that a client has imparted false and material information to a tribunal since Rule 3.3 has been in effect, then the lawyer has a duty to take reasonable remedial measures that are still available, including, if necessary, disclosure to that tribunal, unless disclosure is barred by attorney-client privilege.

TOPIC: Payment to lawyer of referral fee for clients who sign up for a security system.

DIGEST: A lawyer may receive a referral fee under certain circumstances.

RULES: 1.7, 5.4

FACTS:

1. The inquirer, whose legal practice is predominantly residential real estate, has been approached by a company which provides home security services. The company has offered to pay a referral fee of $150.00 for each person who procures security services using a code on flyers placed in the lawyer's office. It is assumed that the attorney is not recommending these services and that the services are not substantially related to the legal services being provided by the attorney to the person who procures the services.

QUESTION:

2. Can the attorney accept a referral fee from the home security company?

DISCUSSION:

3. There are a number of opinions which discuss whether it is appropriate for a lawyer to receive a referral fee for referring a client to a service particular provider.[99] In each of these opinions the service provider was related in some way to the legal services being provided by the lawyer to the client.

4. Here, in contrast, the nature of the service provider (home security services) is not related to the legal services to be provided by the lawyer. These flyers would be available to anyone who passed through the lawyer's waiting room, including clients, delivery persons and individuals who might accompany clients to the lawyer's office. The lawyer is expressing no opinion regarding the quality or suitability of the services. He is merely providing space for the flyers for collection by anyone who might have an interest in a security system. Nothing in the Rules of Professional Conduct prohibits a lawyer from being compensated for providing passive space for advertisement by third parties.

5. However, should the lawyer recommend the services, or should the non-legal services be related to the legal services provided by the lawyer, the opinions in footnote 99 should be carefully considered before proceeding.

99 See for example: N.Y. State 667 (1994) where it was opined that a lawyer could receive an referral fee from a mortgage broker provided certain conditions were met; Nassau County 2001-10 where a real estate lawyer could receive a referral fee from a termite treatment company; N.Y. State 461 (2007) which permitted a lawyer to receive a portion of a commission from a fire adjuster; N.Y. State 845 (2010) which permitted a real estate broker to share her commission with lawyers who refer buyers or sellers to her; D.C. Opinion 361 (2011) permitted a referral fee; Arizona Opinions 95-10 (1995) and 06-02 (2006) both of which prohibited referral fees. All of the opinions turned on an analysis of Rule 1.7 (or its predecessor) to determine whether such a referral fee created a conflict of interest between the lawyer receiving compensation and the obligation of the lawyer to make a referral which was in the client's best interest.

CONCLUSION:

6. A lawyer may receive a referral fee from a home security firm which places flyers in the lawyer's office.

OPINION 982 (10/02/2013)

TOPIC: Obligation to disclose potential fraud on a tribunal

DIGEST: A lawyer who has not appeared before a tribunal has no duty and no right to disclose confidential information protected by Rule 1.6 even if necessary to correct a prior false statement by the lawyer, made to opposing counsel before any proceeding began, which may be later used as evidence before the tribunal.

RULES: 1.0(b), 1.0(q), 1.0(c), 1.6(a), 1.6(b)(2), 1.6(b)(3), 3.3(a), 3.3.(b),

FACTS:

1. The inquiring lawyer represented a client in an estate matter in which a will has yet to be offered for probate. The inquirer is not admitted in this State and so associated with a member of the New York bar to handle the matter.

2. Although the will has not been offered for probate, it is likely to be, and, in the inquirer's judgment, will result in a contested proceeding between two siblings. The inquirer represented one of the siblings – for ease of reference "AB" – who provided the inquirer with seemingly credible and material information which the lawyer in turn sent to counsel for the sibling, the adverse client to whom we refer as "CD." Upon review of the information, CD's counsel responded by strongly questioning the accuracy of the information. When the inquirer confronted AB with CD'S response, AB admitted in confidence that the information AB had provided to the inquirer was false. The inquirer urged AB to correct the information, citing the lawyer's own ethical obligations and AB's potential criminal liability. Despite these entreaties, AB refused to correct the information. Thereafter, the inquirer terminated the attorney-client relationship with AB, and notified opposing counsel of the withdrawal without reference to the inquirer's earlier provision of information to CD's lawyer that the inquirer now knows to be false. While we are not opining on the propriety of the resignation, there is every reason to believe it proper under Rule 1.16.

3. The inquirer states that no basis exists for a reasonable belief that CD's counsel is relying on the statement that the inquirer provided to CD which the inquirer now knows to be untrue, a belief apparently rooted in the tenacity of opposing counsel's rejection of the information. Nevertheless, the inquirer apprehends that some party to the probate proceeding, be it AB or CD, will submit the inquirer's statement to the tribunal. This prospect gives rise to the inquirer's interest in whether, in such a circumstance, a lawyer may or must reveal "confidential information" as defined in Rule 1.6 of the N.Y. Rules of Professional Conduct. For our purposes, we assume that the information AB imparted qualifies as such. We do not address purely legal questions such as the application of evidentiary privileges, in this instance, for example, whether AB provided the information in furtherance of a crime or fraud, thereby removing the information from the protection of the attorney-client privilege. These issues are for courts to decide.

4. The inquirer suggests two exceptions to Rule 1.6(a) that may permit but not require the lawyer to disclose the information. One is Rule 1.6(b)(2), which permits a lawyer to prevent a client "from committing a crime," and the other is Rule 1.6(b)(3), which allows a lawyer to "withdraw a written or oral opinion or representation previously given to the lawyer and reasonably believed by the lawyer still to be relied upon by a third person, where the lawyer has discovered that the opinion or representation was based on materially inaccurate information or is being used to further a crime or fraud." The lawyer also asks whether Rule 3.3(a), which concerns a lawyer's candor to a tribunal, requires the lawyer to disclose the information.

QUESTION:

5. The inquiry before us asks that we determine whether a lawyer has an obligation to disclose a fraud on a tribunal when the lawyer is not appearing, and has never appeared, before that tribunal. We find no such language in the Rules of Professional Conduct and accordingly answer the inquiry in the negative.

ANALYSIS:

6. We begin with Rule 1.6(b)(2), which permits a lawyer to disclose confidential information to prevent a client from committing a crime. Whether AB's failure to correct the false information constitutes a crime at this stage of the matter, or even later, is also a legal issue beyond our jurisdiction to address. If the inquirer concludes that AB has already committed a crime, then Rule 1.6(b)(2) would not apply and thus would not allow the lawyer to disclose AB's confession. N.Y. State 674 (1994). This is true even though AB is now a former client. N.Y. City 1994-8 (1994). The inquirer's fear that AB may later commit a crime by submitting the false information to a tribunal – namely, the court overseeing the probate proceeding – is unduly speculative. The permissive disclosures in Rule 1.6(b) allow the revelation of confidential information only "to the extent that the lawyer reasonably believes necessary" under one or more of the enumerated circumstances. As of the date of the inquiry, the probate proceedings have not yet started. That AB and her new counsel may elect not to submit the information remains a possibility and calls into question the necessity of disclosure. Even if the lawyer were to conclude that the commission of a crime were imminent, the restricting language of Rule 1.6(b) cautions that disclosure should be to AB's current counsel, not to the opposing counsel or the court.

7. Whether Rule 1.6(b)(3) permits disclosure of the information depends on the reasonableness of the lawyer's belief that CD's lawyer continues to rely on the information the lawyer provided. That CD's lawyer "rejected" the information – that an adversary questioned its veracity – does not invariably mean that CD and her counsel are not relying on the information. Rule 1.0(b) defines "belief" to mean that "the person involved actually believes the fact in question to be true," which "may be inferred from the circumstances." Rule 1.0(q) defines "reasonable" to be "conduct of a reasonably prudent and competent lawyer." Rule 1.0(r)'s definition of "reasonable belief" combines these two concepts. "A mere suspicion or theoretical possibility that a third person is still relying is not enough – the lawyer must actually believe it." Simon's Rules of Professional Conduct Annotated 223 (2013). Without knowing the information or the content of the exchanges between counsel, we must accept the inquirer's unqualified statement that the lawyer does not reasonably believe that CD's counsel is still relying on the inquirer's statement. If that is so – if in light of all the facts and circumstances a lawyer does not reasonably believe that CD's counsel is so relying – then Rule 1.6(b)(3) provides no license for the lawyer to reveal the information.

8. This does not end the inquiry, for the lawyer asks also whether Rule 3.3(a) requires the lawyer to disclose the information if the probate proceeds and AB's successor counsel presents the court with lawyer's prior factual representation as a true statement. That Rule mandates disclosure, notwithstanding the confidentiality restrictions of Rule 1.6, in certain circumstances. That a lawyer appearing before a tribunal must correct a client's false statement to the tribunal (after unsuccessfully trying to persuade the client to do so) is not at issue. The question, instead, is whether a lawyer who knows that a former client is using the lawyer's prior statements or work product to place false evidence before a court is required or permitted to disclose the information.

9. The requirement that a lawyer do so is not readily apparent in Rule 3.3. Rule 3.3(a), unlike Rule 3.3(b), does not limit its application to a "lawyer who represents a client before a tribunal," yet the mandate of disclosure in Rule 3.3(a) extends only to the knowing failure of a lawyer "to correct a false statement of material fact or law previously made to the tribunal by the lawyer." It is difficult to read this phrase to mean anything other than a statement that the lawyer personally makes to the tribunal, rather than a statement the lawyer previously made to an adverse counsel which another lawyer then places before the court. In contrast to some other jurisdictions, the New York Rules do not make the obligations of Rule 3.3 "ongoing," or cross-reference Rule 3.3 in Rules 1.6 and 1.9, e.g., Indiana Opinion 2 (2003); Illinois Opinion 98-07 (1999), which would clarify the duties of former counsel in these circumstances. Absent such clarity, we cannot conclude, based on Rule 3.3 alone, that a lawyer who is not counsel appearing before the court has an obligation to correct information that another lawyer submits to a court. See Virginia Opinion 1777 (2003) (forbidding disclosure); but see ABA 93-376 (1993) (holding that "noisy withdrawal" does not relieve the lawyer of the duty of candor in Rule 3.3).

10. Practical concerns support this conclusion. Rule 1.16(a)(3) permits a client to discharge a lawyer at any time for any reason. For better or worse, Rule 1.6 does not allow a discharged lawyer to reveal confidential information to successor counsel without a client's consent. These Rules, taken together, mean that a client may discharge a lawyer precisely because the lawyer is unwilling to further a client's ill-advised and potentially fraudulent pursuits. The so-called "noisy withdrawal" provisions of Rule 1.6(b)(3) supply some leverage to the lawyer in these circumstances, but only upon a "reasonable" belief that reliance on a lawyer's prior statements persists. As we have said, if, as here, that condition is not met, then the avenue of permissive disclosure is closed. Upon withdrawal from a matter, the lawyer's interest in the representation ends except insofar as Rule 1.9 protects former clients from the disclosure of confidential information and the lawyer's involvement in matters adverse to the onetime client substantially related to the prior representation. To impose on the former lawyer the additional obligation to monitor the client's use of a lawyer's onetime statements to opposing counsel exceeds any duty that the language of the Rules imposes.

11. The inquiry does not require us to speculate on the lawyer's obligations if, despite having no duty to watch over the matter, the lawyer somehow learns that the lawyer's erstwhile client intends to use, or has used, the lawyer's statement before a tribunal. For now, we deal only with the question before us, which does not present those facts. Whether a lawyer may or must disclose information in such circumstances implicates a variety of Rules that are best left for consideration when the issue is presented.

CONCLUSION:

12. A lawyer who has not appeared before a tribunal has no duty and no right to disclose confidential information protected by Rule 1.6 even if necessary to correct a prior false statement by the lawyer, made to opposing counsel before any proceeding began, which may be later used as evidence before the tribunal. OPINION 983 (10/08/2013)

TOPIC: Legal fees; advance payment retainers

DIGEST: Lawyer may retain unearned portion of prior retainer on conclusion of matter, at client's request, as advance payment of fees for future legal services; such advance payment may be treated as client-owned funds depending on agreement with client.

RULES: 1.5; 1.15

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a lawyer who settled a case he was handling for his client. He had been paid a retainer (the "first retainer") that was not exhausted, and he sought to return the balance. The client asked him to keep the balance in his escrow account, telling the lawyer she "might need [him] for something else."

QUESTION:

2. May the lawyer, at the client's request, keep the unearned portion of the first retainer in his escrow account, as an advance against unspecified legal services to be provided in the future?

OPINION:

3. The inquiry concerns advance payment retainers, which the Committee has previously addressed.[100] "An advance payment retainer is a sum provided by the client to the lawyer to cover payment of legal fees expected to be earned during the representation." N.Y. State 816 ¶3 (2007). The arrangement proposed by the inquiry is of this type – it is a deposit toward payment of fees for future legal services – even though there is not yet any agreement between client and lawyer as to what further legal services, if any, will actually be provided.[101] Any ultimately unearned portion of an advance payment retainer must be returned to the client.[102]

100 See N.Y. State 570 (1985), adhered to in N.Y. State 816 (2007). These opinions were decided under the prior Code of Professional Responsibility, but we see no reason that the current Rules of Professional Conduct (the Rules) would lead to different results.

101 There are variations in terms used to describe retainer agreements. Here we follow the usage of our prior opinions, but what we are calling an advance payment retainer or advance fee retainer is also sometimes called a "special," "specific" or "security" retainer. See Grievance Administrator v. Cooper, 06-36-GA (Mich. Att'y Disc. Bd. 2007). The term "special retainer" is also sometimes used to denote a broader category of arrangements, as distinguished from the "general retainers" described in paragraph 5 below. Special retainers in that broader sense can be further divided into "security retainers," which are advances intended to secure the client's payment of fees when earned for future legal services, and "advance fee retainers," which in this usage means "a present payment to a lawyer as compensation for the provision of specified legal services in the future," generally "intended to compensate the lawyer for all work to be done on a matter, regardless of the time required or the complexity of the assignment," and also known as "fixed" or "flat" fees. See, e.g., In re Hann, 819 N.W.2d 498, 505-06 (N.D. 2012) (quoting D. Richmond, "Understanding Retainers and Flat Fees," 34 J. Legal Prof. 113 (2009)). Using this terminology, the present inquiry concerns a proposed security retainer.

102 See Rule 1.5(d)(4) ("A lawyer shall not enter into an arrangement for, charge or collect . . . a nonrefundable retainer fee," though a retainer agreement may include a reasonable and clear minimum fee clause); id., Cmt. [4] (lawyer "may require advance payment of a fee, but is obliged to return any unearned portion"); Rule 1.16(e) (upon termination of representation, lawyer shall take steps to avoid foreseeable prejudice to the rights of the client, including "promptly refunding any part of a fee paid in advance that has not been earned"); N.Y. State 816 ¶¶ 3-4, 8, 10 (2007); In re Cooperman, 83 N.Y.2d 465 (1994) (interpreting prior Code to prohibit nonrefundable advance payment retainers).

4. The inquiry raises a question about how an advance payment retainer may be handled from the time it is provided to the lawyer until it is either earned by the lawyer or returned to the client. Under our opinions, the parties may choose either of two options. One option is to treat advance payment of legal fees as client funds, in which case the lawyer must deposit the advance payment into an escrow account and may not retain interest earned on the funds.[103] Alternatively, the parties may "agree to treat advance payment of fees as the lawyer's own." N.Y. State 816 ¶5. Under this option, > the lawyer may use the money as the lawyer chooses (except that the lawyer may not deposit it in a client trust account), subject only to the requirement that any unearned fee paid in advance be promptly refunded to the client upon termination of the employment. In [this] case, any interest earned on the advance payment of fees would belong to the lawyer.

N.Y. State 570 (citation omitted). By allowing both options, the New York ethics rule differs from rules in a number of other jurisdictions where the client necessarily continues to own the funds until earned, and thus the lawyer must keep the funds in an escrow account.[104]

5. An advance payment retainer, in either of these two variations, is to be distinguished from a "general retainer," which is not a payment for specific legal services. Rather, it is "a payment to the lawyer for being available to the client in the future and for being unavailable to the client's opponents," and it is "earned upon receipt."[105]

103 See N.Y. State 816 ¶5, quoting N.Y. State 570; Rule 1.15(b)(1) & Cmt. [1] (money "that is the property of clients" or prospective clients must be kept in one or more trust accounts). Interest earned on the funds while in an escrow account must be remitted to the client unless the funds are deposited into an "interest on lawyer account" or "IOLA", which is an unsegregated interest-bearing account for the deposit of moneys "which, in the judgment of the attorney, are too small in amount or are reasonably expected to be held for too short a time to generate sufficient interest income to justify the expense of administering a segregated account for the benefit of the client or beneficial owner." Judiciary Law §497(1), (2). Under Judiciary Law §497(6)(c), interest on such accounts is remitted to the IOLA fund established by State Finance Law §97-v.

104 See N.Y. State 570 (1985) (noting that "majority of opinions by other ethics committees that have addressed the issue . . . would require that advance payments of legal fees be deposited in a client trust account and retained there until earned," and citing examples). Some jurisdictions have adopted explicit rules to this effect. E.g., Arizona ER 1.15(c); Maine Rule 1.15(b)(1); see ABA Model Rule 1.15(c) (lawyer "shall deposit into a client trust account legal fees . . . that have been paid in advance, to be withdrawn by the lawyer only as fees are earned"). Some others have adopted such a rule as a matter of interpretation. E.g., In re Lochow, 469 N.W.2d 91, 97-98 (Minn. 1991); State v. Fellman, 678 N.W.2d 491, 497 (Neb. 2004); In re Dawson, 8 P.3d 856, 859 (N.M. 2000); Oklahoma Opinion 317 (2002); Philadelphia Opinion 96-7. Other jurisdictions yet have adopted this rule only as a default. E.g., Att'y Grievance Comm'n of Maryland v. Stinson, 50 A.3d 1222, 1226 n.4 (2012) (fees to be deposited into client trust account unless client "gives informed consent, confirmed in writing"); In re Mance, 980 A.2d 1196, 1201 (D.C. 2009) (advances of unearned fees to be treated as property of client "unless the client gives informed consent to a different arrangement"). See generally Kewalramani & Greenberger, "Advance Payment Retainers: Whose Property? What Account?," N.Y.L.J (Feb. 15, 2013); O'Shea, "Advance Fee Retainers: Should We Change the Rules?," N.Y. Prof. Resp. Report (July 2001) (arguing against amending Code to require that advance fee payments be held in trust until earned, and opining that N.Y. State 570 "has served for many years as clear and largely uncontroversial guidance for the New York Bar").

105 N.Y. State 570 n.1; accord N.Y. State 816 ¶3. According to one source:

> A general retainer is also known as a "true," "classic," or "availability" retainer, or as an "engagement fee." A true retainer fee is an amount a lawyer charges the client not for specific services but to ensure the lawyer's availability whenever the client may need legal services. Such a fee is a charge separate from fees incurred for services actually rendered. In other words: A fee is an engagement retainer only if the lawyer is to be additionally compensated for actual work, if any, performed. . . . A retainer purporting to be "both for availability and for services" has been called a "hybrid" and is usually treated as a special retainer or advance payment of fees.

Grievance Administrator v. Cooper, 06-36-GA (Mich. Att'y Disc. Bd. 2007) (footnotes and internal quotations omitted).

6. On the facts of the current inquiry, the first retainer was an advance payment retainer to pay for services in the matter that has now been concluded, and the funds in question are the unused balance of that first retainer. These funds are now intended to pay for unspecified legal services in the future, if and when the parties agree that such further services will be provided, rather than to secure the availability of the lawyer to the client. Thus these funds are being maintained as a further advance payment retainer.

7. The client has requested that the funds be kept in the lawyer's escrow account, and as seen above, the lawyer is free to agree to that request. The parties are thus agreeing that the funds will be treated not as belonging to the lawyer, but rather as belonging to the client unless and until earned by future provision of legal services. "[O]nce a lawyer agrees to treat a fee advance as client property, the lawyer is bound by that agreement and all of its consequences," including all ethical requirements "applicable to client funds and trust accounts." N.Y. State 570 (1985).

8. We note an additional question about the lawyer's ongoing duties during the period from completion of the first matter until such time as the parties may agree on the performance of further legal services. The inquiry does not specify whether the parties contemplate that their attorney-client relationship will continue during that period. It is possible that the lawyer could serve merely as an escrow agent for the funds without continuing as attorney for the person whose funds are being held. Even then, however, the lawyer would remain bound by certain ethical duties to that person. See, e.g., Rule 1.9 (duties to former clients); Rule 1.15 (preserving identity of funds of others, fiduciary responsibility, and record keeping).

9. Alternatively, the attorney-client relationship may continue while the lawyer holds the advance payment retainer, in which case lawyer would continue to be bound by the full set of ethical duties owed to clients. The inquiry does not say that the lawyer has told the client that the representation has terminated. The parties have discussed the possible future provision of legal services. And the lawyer is agreeing to keep possession of the client's funds for that purpose. Each of these circumstances is a factor that may bear on whether the client reasonably views that the representation will continue.[106] However, whether there is an attorney-client relationship during the interim between past services and potential future ones is a legal rather than an ethical question. We have mentioned some relevant factors but it is not our province to opine whether the representation continues. See, e.g., Rules Scope ¶[9] ("principles of substantive law external to these Rules determine whether an client-lawyer relationship exists"); N.Y. State 963 ¶10 (2013).

10. Of course the lawyer would be well advised to try to avoid misunderstandings as to either the treatment of the advance payment retainer or whether the representation is continuing. See, e.g., N.Y. State 816 ¶9 (2007) ("imperative for a lawyer at the outset of the representation to discuss the advantages and disadvantages of advance payment retainers and to reach an agreement about the treatment of any such advances"). Moreover, to embody agreements with the client in writing, whether or not required,[107] may enhance clarity. See, e.g., Rule 1.3, Cmt. [4] ("Doubt about whether a client-lawyer relationship still exists should be clarified by the lawyer, preferably in writing, so that the client will not mistakenly suppose the lawyer is looking after the client's affairs when the lawyer has ceased to do so.").

106 "If a lawyer has served a client over a substantial period in a variety of matters, the client sometimes may assume that the lawyer will continue to serve on a continuing basis unless the lawyer gives notice of withdrawal." Rule 1.3, Cmt. [4]; see Restatement (Third) of the Law Governing Lawyers §14(1)(b) & cmt. e (2000) (relationship of client and lawyer arises when "a person manifests to a lawyer the person's intent that the lawyer provide legal services for the person . . . and . . . the lawyer fails to manifest lack of consent to do so, and the lawyer knows or reasonably should know that the person reasonably relies on the lawyer to provide the services").

CONCLUSION:

11. At the client's request, the lawyer may retain the unspent portion of the retainer on the conclusion of a matter as an advance payment of fees to be used for unspecified future legal services. Such advance payment retainers may be treated either as client-owned funds, to be kept in the lawyer's escrow account, or as lawyer-owned funds, subject to the lawyer's obligation to reimburse the client for any portion ultimately not earned in fees.

(6-13)

107 The Rules do not state that the terms of a representation must be written, and depending on the circumstances, a writing may or may not be required by law. See Rule 1.5(b) (lawyer "shall communicate" to client the scope of the representation and the basis or rate of fee and expenses); 22 N.Y.C.R.R. §§ 1215.1(a), 1215.2(a), (b) (written letter of engagement not required where "the fee to be charged is expected to be less than $3000," or "the attorney's services are of the same general kind as previously rendered to and paid for by the client").

OPINION 984 (10/08/2013)

TOPIC: Conduct that has no substantial purpose other than to cause needless expense

DIGEST: A lawyer's refusal to provide copies of publicly-available pleadings to adverse counsel does not violate Rule 3.2.

RULES: Rule 3.2

FACTS:

1. Inquirer is asked by adverse counsel in a case to provide copies of pleadings and other documents already filed which form the basis of a default judgment. Inquirer proposes to respond that he will not provide copies of documents that are available from the court file, although such documents are electronically stored on his computer and may not be available electronically from public sources. Such refusal will mean that adverse counsel will incur the cost of time and expense travelling to the court clerk in order to photocopy those documents.

QUESTION:

2. Would such a refusal violate Rule 3.2?

OPINION:

3. We assume without opining that the inquirer is not required by law or court rule to provide the documents in question. See Rule 3.3(a) (lawyer shall not intentionally violate any established rule of procedure or of evidence), Rule 8.4(b) (lawyer shall not engage in illegal conduct that adversely reflects on the lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness as a lawyer). If the lawyer were so required, refusal to provide the documents would constitute a violation of Rule 3.2.

4. New York Rule of Professional Conduct 3.2 states that "In representing a client, a lawyer shall not use means that have no substantial purpose other than to delay or prolong the proceeding or to cause needless expense." Cmt. [1] to the Rule adds that "The question is whether a competent lawyer acting in good faith would regard the course of action as having some substantial purpose other than delay or needless expense."

5. Rule 3.2 was introduced to New York on April 1st, 2009 when the Rules of Professional Conduct were promulgated by the courts to supercede and replace the old Code of Professional Responsibility. There was no predecessor version of Rule 3.2 in the old Code but it did include Disciplinary Rule 7-101(A)(1) "Representing a Client Zealously" which stated in pertinent part that "acceding to reasonable requests of opposing counsel which do not prejudice the rights of the client" was not a violation. Former Ethical Consideration 7-38 stated that a "lawyer should . . . acede to reasonable requests regarding court proceedings, settings, continuances, waiver of procedural formalities, and similar matters which do not prejudice the rights of the client." The quoted language from the former DR 7-101(A)(1) and EC 7-38 was not included by the Courts in the Rules of Professional Conduct, nor in the Comments to the Rules (the Comments were adopted by the New York Bar Association's House of Delegates). But it seems instructive that only the Ethical Consideration (not the Disciplinary Rule) stated a lawyer "should" acede, because Ethical Considerations had an aspirational, rather than disciplinary, nature. This is our first opinion construing Rule 3.2.[108]

6. While providing the documents would save adverse counsel time and effort, the documents were presumably produced or obtained at the expense of adverse counsel's client, so even if no money were expended, there would be an implicit cost to sharing them. But even if there were no implicit cost, it does not seem likely that in promulgating Rule 3.2 the courts intended to create an ethical obligation to share information, documents or resources solely because the cost of sharing would be minimal. Otherwise, one side could be compelled to provide copies of the cases it has cited in pleadings or even to "lend" the assistance of salaried personnel. When Rule 3.2 states that a lawyer shall not "cause needless expense" we believe it means that a lawyer shall not take affirmative steps which result in "needless expense" but that mere refusal to cooperate, as here, does not constitute such an affirmative step. In short, declining to provide documents available at the court to adverse counsel does not constitute "causing" needless expense.

7. We add that while Rule 3.2 does not compel sharing the documents available from the court, we also see no prohibition in the Rules against acceding to such a request. See Rule 1.2(e) (lawyer may exercise professional judgment to acede to reasonable requests of opposing counsel when doing so will not prejudice the client's rights). The lawyer should also consider whether the circumstances of the request merit consultation with the client before deciding whether to acede. See Rule 1.4(a)(2) (lawyer shall "reasonably consult" with client regarding the means of accomplishing client's objectives).

CONCLUSION:

8. The proposed refusal would not violate Rule 3.2

(23-13)

108 Cf., N.Y. State 469 (1977) (lawyer may not interpose a general denial knowing that the client has no valid defense). We do not find any state or federal court decisions in New York that construe the Rule either. ABA Model Rule 3.2 reads differently, stating that "A lawyer shall make reasonable efforts to expedite litigation consistent with the interests of the client."

OPINION 985 (10/08/2013)

TOPIC: Former law clerk appearing before judge who employed clerk

DIGEST: A lawyer is permitted to appear, and assist others who appear, before a judge by whom the lawyer was employed, on matters unless the lawyer had substantial personal participation in the matter.

RULES: 1.12(b)(2)

FACTS:

1. The inquiring lawyer has served as a law clerk of a judge in the past. Now the lawyer has opportunities to advise and provide legal analysis to clients or other lawyers in matters before the judge for whom the lawyer had worked. None of the opportunities relate to any matters before the judge while the lawyer worked for the judge.

QUESTION:

2. May a lawyer who formerly served as a legal clerk, appear, or assist those who appear, before the judge who had employed the lawyer?

3. If prohibited from appearing before the judge for whom the lawyer worked, may the lawyer appear before judges of the same court for whom the lawyer did not work?

OPINION:

4. The only Rule of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct that addresses this matter is Rule 1.12. It states in relevant part, ". . . unless all parties to the proceeding give informed consent, confirmed in writing, a lawyer shall not represent anyone in connection with a matter in which the lawyer participated personally and substantially as a law clerk to a judge . . ." Rule 1.12(b)(2).

5. In order to trigger the requirement for informed consent, the matter must be one in which the law clerk had substantial personal involvement. Thus absent written informed consent from the parties, confirmed in writing, a former law clerk is prohibited by this Rule from appearing before the judge in such a matter.[109] [110]

109 Whether the Judge has any obligations, or is required to consent to the former law clerk's appearance before the Judge, is a question under the Code of Judicial Conduct; this Committee expresses no opinion about the application or interpretation of the Code of Judicial Conduct.

110 What constitutes "substantial and personal involvement" has been discussed by this Committee in several opinions. For example, Opinion 748 (2001) sets forth factors which might require disqualification of a government prosecutor from representing a criminal defendant who was investigated and prosecuted while the lawyer was employed in the prosecutor's office. That Opinion states, "DR 9-101(B) (the predecessor to Rule 1.12 (b)) made clear that disqualification must be based on the lawyer's personal participation to a significant extent." The factors to be considered in analyzing whether the involvement of a lawyer was personal and substantial include serving more than a supervisory role, having responsibility for more than mere ministerial aspects of a matter, assisting in the research and writing of decisions on the merits and interaction with parties by which the clerk might have had access to confidential information.

6. In the present inquiry, the lawyer asks only whether it is permissible to appear or advise others who will appear before the judge for whom the lawyer worked in new matters, that is, those matters which had not been before the judge while the lawyer was employed by the judge.

7. The application of these principles is illustrated in the Second Department's decision, In re Coleman, 69 AD3d 846 (2010). There the court held that a lawyer who had served as supervising attorney in the law department supporting the Surrogate's Court was not disqualified from appearing in that court on matters which had been handled by the lawyer's former law department. The court held that the record did not support a finding that "the former government attorney was "personally involved to an important, material degree, in the investigati[on] or deliberative processes regarding the transactions or facts in question" (In re Coleman, at 849).

8. Given that the former law clerk is not prohibited by Rule 1.12 from appearing before the judge who employed the lawyer, the lawyer is permitted to appear before other judges of the same court as the judge for whom the lawyer worked.

CONCLUSION:

9. A lawyer is permitted to appear, and assist others who appear, before a judge by whom the lawyer was employed, on matters unless the lawyer had substantial personal participation in the matter.

OPINION 986 (10/25/2013)

TOPIC: Whether it is a conflict of interest for a lawyer who represents a mentally incapacitated client in a Medicaid benefits proceeding to also represent the client's sister in seeking to petition for a guardianship for the client where the incapacitated client's stated wishes as to living arrangements are contrary to the sister's position.

DIGEST: It is a conflict of interest for a lawyer who represents a mentally incapacitated client in a Medicaid benefits proceeding to also represent the client's sister in seeking to petition for a guardianship for the client where the incapacitated client's stated wishes as to living arrangements are contrary to the sister's position.

RULES: 1.7, 1.14

QUESTION:

1. May a lawyer who represents a mentally incapacitated adult in a Medicaid benefits proceeding also represent that person's sister in seeking to petition for a guardianship for him where the sister, against the client's wishes, has refused to remove her brother from a hospital and will not permit him to return to her home?

BACKGROUND:

2. A Legal Services lawyer was retained to represent a severely incapacitated man to appeal the denial of certain Medicaid services. He has been diagnosed with schizophrenia and mental retardation. A recent evaluation concluded that he is "unable to function autonomously, and he cannot make financial or health decisions on his own. He is significantly mentally retarded." The client is not able to make decisions during the representation and "does not understand what is involved in appealing the denial of Medicaid Services." The client was assisted by his sister in applying for Legal Aid Services.

3. The sister has cared for and lived with the client until recently, when the client accidentally set fire to the sister's home. The sister brought him to a hospital where he remains. The hospital wants to discharge the client and his expressed desire is to return to the sister's home. The sister is unwilling to accept the client back to her home.

4. The attorney states that there is no practical method of protecting the client's interests other than to have a guardian appointed. There is no other family. Social services agencies have extremely limited resources. The sister is willing to serve as the guardian, but the client is so incapacitated that he is not capable of consenting or objecting to the appointment of his sister as guardian.

5. The attorney asks whether he is permitted to represent the sister in a petition for guardianship over her brother.

OPINION:

6. The lawyer asks whether concurrent representation of client A with significant diminished capacity and another client (B) who seeks to become the guardian for client A is permissible when the stated wishes of client A are directly contrary to the position of Client B as the prospective guardian. To what extent is the lawyer bound by the arguably unreasonable and ill-considered stated desire of the incapacitated client in assessing whether such a conflict exists? What action is permissible by the lawyer?

7. Concurrent conflicts of interest are governed by Rule 1.7 of the Rules of Professional Conduct which prohibits a lawyer from representing clients with "differing interests." This includes "every interest that will adversely affect either the judgment or the loyalty of a lawyer to a client, whether it be a conflicting, inconsistent, diverse, or other interest. Rule 1.0(f); See also Rule 1.7 Cmts. [1],[2],[8]. The lawyer is expected to be loyal, protect client confidences and provide independent judgment.

8. In the representation of Client A in the Medicaid appeal, the lawyer learned of the client's stated desire to return to his sister's home. Living arrangements are a fundamental interest of the client as contemplated by Rule 1.7. Unquestionably, if Client A did not have significant diminished capacity, the lawyer could not undertake to represent his sister in any proceeding where Client A's stated desires would be undermined, and in this case directly contrary to the client's wishes, by the lawyer's representation of another client. [111]

9. Thus, the question is whether the client's significantly diminished capacity alters the judgment as to whether the lawyer would be representing "differing interests" if he undertook representation of the sister in the guardianship proceeding. As explained below, it does not.

10. Rule 1.14 seeks to provide guidance to a lawyer in such circumstances. It acknowledges the difficulty of providing diligent and competent representation to clients who have diminished capacity precisely because the client is often incapable of understanding and making decisions about the matter. In such circumstances, even though the representation may be premised upon the goal of maximizing a client's autonomy and dignity, the lawyer may believe that advocating the client's stated position to be directly contrary to what the lawyer reasonably believes is the only viable choice for the client with significant diminished capacity. May the lawyer maintain a position contrary to the client's stated wishes when that client has significant diminished capacity?

111 In some circumstances, the concurrent conflict may be waived, but not in this case. Even if the lawyer reasonably believed that he could provide competent and diligent representation to both Clients A and B, Client A is not capable of providing informed consent to such a waiver. Rule 1.7 (b).

11. Rule 1.14 suggests a course of action for the attorney in such circumstances. [112] First, a lawyer must "as far as reasonably possible" maintain a normal lawyer-client relationship. The fact that a client suffers from mental illness or retardation does not diminish the lawyer's responsibility to treat the client attentively and with respect. Rule 1.14, Cmt. [2].

12. Second, Rule 1.14 permits a lawyer to take protective action when the lawyer reasonably believes that the client is at risk of physical, financial, or other harm unless such action is taken. Before considering what measures to undertake, lawyers must carefully evaluate each situation based on all of the facts and circumstances. "Any condition that renders a client incapable of communicating or making a considered judgment on the client's own behalf casts additional responsibilities on the lawyer." Roy D. Simon, Simon's Rules of Professional Conduct Annotated, 662 (2013). One of those responsibilities is to acknowledge that even clients with diminished capacity may have the ability to make decisions or reach conclusions about matters affecting their own well-being.

13. Any protective action taken by the lawyer should be limited to what is essential to carry out the representation. Thus, the lawyer may consult with family members, friends, other individuals, agencies or programs that have the ability to take action to protect the client. The Rule does not specify all of the potential protective actions that may be undertaken, but it makes clear that seeking the appointment of a guardian is the last resort, when no other protective action will protect the client's interests.

14. This opinion presumes that, before considering guardianship, the attorney has considered and exhausted other options. First, the lawyer has attempted to maintain a normal client-lawyer relationship as best as possible under the circumstances. A primary aspect of that relationship is to maintain communications with the client. The attorney has determined that the client's stated desire is to return to his sister's home. Even if the attorney reasonably believes this to be unwise, unreasonable, or otherwise ill advised, the client still deserves attention and respect.

15. Second, before deciding whether to take protective action with respect to the client, the lawyer has a reasoned basis, beyond what he believes to be the client's ill considered judgments, to conclude that the client cannot act in his own best interests and that protective action is necessary. The lawyer unsuccessfully attempted to communicate with the client, obtained information and assistance from the client's sister, and sought a medical evaluation.

112 Rule 1.14 provides that:

> (a) When a client's capacity to make adequately considered decisions in connection with a representation is diminished, whether because of minority, mental impairment or for some other reason, the lawyer shall, as far as reasonably possible, maintain a conventional relationship with the client.
> (b) When the lawyer reasonably believes that the client has diminished capacity, is at risk of substantial physical, financial or other harm unless action is taken and cannot adequately act in the client's own interest, the lawyer may take reasonably necessary protective action, including consulting with individuals or entities that have the ability to take action to protect the client and, in appropriate cases, seeking the appointment of a guardian ad litem, conservator or guardian.
> (c) Information related to representation of a client with diminished capacity is protected by Rule 1.6. When taking protective action pursuant to paragraph (b), the lawyer is impliedly authorized under Rule 1.6 (a) to reveal information about the client, but only to the extent reasonably necessary to protect the client's interests.

16. It is not clear whether there are other individuals, community resources or social services agencies that may be of assistance to the client. Nor is it clear whether other options have been explored prior to seeking the appointment of a guardian. This includes an assessment as to whether or not referral to support groups or social services could provide protection to the client.

17. These alternatives should be exhausted prior to seeking the appointment of a guardian. The situation is particularly fraught for clients with limited financial means and social support networks. There are few social services available to assist such clients, thereby leaving the attorney in circumstances with few options to carry out representation as contemplated by Rule 1.14. Therefore, these circumstances require a lawyer to exercise careful judgment to adopt a course of action that best protects the client's interests.

18. The lawyer must recognize that seeking a guardianship is an extreme measure as it "deprives the person of so much and control over his or life." In the Matter of the Guardianship of Dameris L., 38 Misc 3d 570 (Sur. Ct. NY Cty 2012) citing Rose Mary Bailly, PRACTICE COMMENTARIES, MCKINNEY'S CON LAW OF NY, Book 34A, MENTAL HYGIENE LAW § 81.01 at 79 (2006). It has been suggested that the lawyer should seek a guardian only if "serious harm is imminent, intervention is necessary, no other ameliorative development is foreseeable, and nonlawyers would be justified in seeking guardianship." Paul R. Tremblay, On Persuasion and Paternalism: Lawyer Decisionmaking and the Questionably Competent Client, 3 Utah L. Rev. 515, 566. (1997); See 62 Fordham L. Rev. 1073 (1993-1994)

19. Article 81 of the Mental Hygiene Law, allows for the judicial appointment of a legal guardian for one's personal needs, property management or both, when a person is incompetent to conduct his or her own affairs. N.Y. MENTAL HYGIENE LAW § 81.02(a); 81.06 et seq. The statute expects that the system is tailored to meet the individual's specific needs by taking into account the incapacitated person's wishes, and preferences. N.Y. State 746 (2001).

20. Assuming that the attorney has undertaken this thorough evaluation of the circumstances, and now reasonably believe that guardianship is the only alternative, that lawyer may seek out others to petition for the guardianship.

21. The guardianship process is initiated by a petition. The lawyer may seek out any available individual, social service agency or private organization to petition for guardianship. Article 81 specifies seven categories of persons who may file such a petition. § 81.06.

22. The court then is required to appoint a court evaluator who will recommend whether the alleged incapacitated person (AIP) requires counsel. The court evaluator will also make recommendations as to who should serve as guardian and make appropriate living arrangements. Any conflicts between the sister and AIP will be addressed by the court evaluator. See e.g., MHL 81.09(c)(5)(xv). It is not apparent whether court evaluators are appointed in all matters as required by statute.

23. The court then considers all of the evidence and determines, by clear and convincing evidence, whether the person is likely to suffer harm because he or she is unable to provide for his or her personal needs and/or property management and cannot adequately understand and appreciate the nature and consequences of this inability. § 81.02 (b).

24. The guardian is to engage in the "least restrictive form of intervention, consistent with the concept that the needs of persons with incapacities are as diverse and complex as they are unique to the individual." NY Mental Hgy Law §81.01.

25. The attorney may suggest that the sister seek a petition for guardianship and may make suggestions as to individuals or agencies to assist her in completing the petition, but the lawyer may not represent her in petitioning for the guardianship. Her interests are contrary to that of the client. She has clearly stated, contrary to the client's desires, that she will not permit him to return to her home. Thus, the attorney would be in conflict with his client if he represents the sister and assists her in filing a petition seeking an objective contrary to the client's stated desire.

26. The lawyer's position in protecting the client's interests is complicated by perceived difficulties for lay persons in completing the petition for guardianship and the lack of social service and other resources to assist the family of incapacitated people. The sister may desire to file a petition for guardianship but may be ill-equipped to do so and there may be no assistance available to her. Consequently, it may be that the attorney is the only person who can reasonably seek the appointment of a guardian. In general, a lawyer should only act as petitioner in seeking the appointment of a guardian if there is no one else who reasonably can do so. Simon, Rules of Prof Conduct Annot. at 663, N.Y. State 746 (2001).

27. In general, the interests of the petitioner in a guardianship proceeding are in conflict with that of the client, notably where there will be a contested hearing and the petitioner will serve as a witness. However, where the client does not oppose the guardianship or is incapacitated and cannot express an opinion as to the guardianship, Rule 1.14 implicitly acknowledges that the lawyer may file the petition to seek a guardianship in circumstances where the guardianship will not be subject to a hearing and no one else is reasonably available to file the petition. We previously considered the issue of whether an attorney-in-fact could petition for guardianship for a client and concluded, under the then-existing Code of Professional Conduct, that it was permissible under circumstances such as those presented here where there is no other option and there will not be a contested hearing under Article 81. We considered whether the "dual role" of petitioner in a guardianship proceeding and as client representative was impermissible in these circumstances and concluded that, given other safeguards in the Article 81 proceedings, the dual role was not impermissible. N.Y. State 746 (2001). We affirm that opinion under the Rules of Professional Conduct.

28. Should the attorney file the petition for guardianship, and the court become aware that the sister may be the only person who can be appointed as the client's guardian, the lawyer should advise the court of the sister's position regarding the client's living arrangements. The court can then consider whether, in light of the potential conflict between the client and his sister, she is the appropriate guardian.

29. Thus, using the same reasoning, Connecticut has determined that in these circumstances should the lawyer petition for the appointment of a guardian, the lawyer does not need to withdraw from representation on the underlying Medicaid matter. In circumstances involving clients with disabilities, this is not a preferred course of action. See Connecticut Inf. Opinion 97-19 (1997).

30. Assuming that a guardian is appointed, the lawyer should consult with the client and the guardian as to the position to be asserted in the Medicaid matter. The guardian is the representative of the client. The rationale for the appointment of a guardian is to have someone who can make decisions for the incompetent client. Thus, after the appointment of the guardian, the lawyer generally must take direction from that guardian.

31. Finally, Rule 1.14 is often frustrating because it does not provide solutions to all problems in dealing with clients with diminished capacity. It does, however, provide "an intelligible frame of reference for the lawyer and those who might later judge his conduct." Geoffrey C. Hazard Jr. and W. William Hodes, THE LAW OF LAWYERING, § 1.14:101, p.439. (1990). See Connecticut Inf. Opinion 97-19.

CONCLUSION:

32. It is a conflict of interest for a lawyer who represents a mentally incapacitated client in a Medicaid benefits proceeding to also represent the client's sister in seeking to petition for a guardianship for the client where the incapacitated client's stated wishes as to living arrangements are contrary to the sister's position.

TOPIC: Insurance company review of staff counsel's files.

DIGEST: Absent informed consent from the insured (staff counsel's client), staff counsel may not permit review of the confidential information in the client's file by non-attorney employees of the insurance company which employs the staff counsel.

RULES: 1.0(h); 1.6(a); 1.8(f)

FACTS:

1. An insurance company that employs staff counsel to represent the company's insureds conducts peer reviews of the staff counsels' files to both evaluate the attorneys' handling of files and to develop best practices to be followed by staff counsel attorneys of the insurance company. The panel conducting these reviews has until now been comprised solely of staff attorneys of the insurance company but the insurance company now proposes adding non-attorney members of the insurance company's claims department to the panel.

QUESTION:

2. Is it permissible to allow non-attorney members of the reviewing panel access to the insured's confidential information contained in the staff counsel's files?

OPINION:

3. Rule 1.6(a) provides that a lawyer "shall not knowingly reveal confidential information . . . or use such information to the disadvantage of a client or for the advantage of the lawyer or a third person, unless:

> (1) the client gives informed consent . . . ;
> (2) the disclosure is impliedly authorized to advance the best interests of the client and is either reasonable under the circumstances or customary in the professional community; or
> (3) the disclosure is permitted by paragraph (b) [none of the provisions of which paragraph (b) are applicable to the facts of this opinion]."

4. Confidential Information is defined in Rule 1.6(a) as "information gained during or relating to the representation of a client, whatever its source, that is (a) protected by the attorney-client privilege, (b) likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed, or (c) information that the client has requested be kept confidential."

5. Rule 1.0(h) defines "law firm" to include "the legal department of a corporation or other organization". The office of staff counsel therefore constitutes a law firm but the non-attorney members of the insurance company's claims department are not members or employees of the "law firm" of staff counsel and are not subject to supervision and control by the staff counsel. Therefore, the attorney does not have the ability or authority to exercise reasonable care in their supervision to prevent their disclosure or use of confidential information in accordance with Rule 1.6(c).

6. Accordingly, any confidential information in the staff counsel's file cannot, without the client's informed consent, be revealed to the non-attorney members of the review panel. Informed consent is defined in Rule 1.4(j) as, "denot[ing] the agreement by a person to a proposed course of conduct after the lawyer has communicated information adequate for the person to make an informed decision, and after the lawyer has adequately explained to the person the material risks of the proposed course of conduct and reasonably available alternatives." Unless such consent is contained in the language of the applicable insurance policy, it is incumbent upon the staff counsel to obtain the client's informed consent to the disclosure of the information to the non-attorney members of the reviewing panel. Absent such consent, the confidential information must be redacted from the file before the file may be reviewed by the non-attorney members of the reviewing panel. See N.Y. State 716 (1999) (counsel assigned by insurance company to represent the insured cannot provide bills, which are deemed to contain confidential information, to independent auditors retained by the insurance company, without the insured's informed consent) and N.Y. State 721 (1999) (defense counsel may follow direction of insurance carrier to utilize a specified legal research service subject to certain conditions, but may not in doing so reveal client confidential information without the informed consent of the client).

7. Because the fees of the staff counsel are paid by the insurance company, the provisions of Rule 1.8(f) are also applicable. These provisions require that if the fees are to be paid by someone other than the client, the client must give informed consent (this is usually in the language of the policy), there be no interference with the lawyer's independent professional judgment or with the client-lawyer relationship and the client's confidential information is protected as required by Rule 1.6.

CONCLUSION:

8. Absent informed consent from the insured (staff counsel's client), staff counsel may not permit review of the confidential information in the client's file by non-attorney employees of the insurance company which employs the staff counsel.

OPINION 988 (10/25/2013)

TOPIC: Lawyer Advertising; Solicitation

DIGEST: A lawyer may forward a cover letter describing his practice accompanied by a third party brochure containing helpful information of general applicability and the lawyer's contact information to nonlawyer professionals, such as accountants and bankers, in the hope that these professionals will consider referring their clients to the lawyer if a need arises.

RULES: Rules 7.1, 7.2, 7.3, 7.4, 7.5.

FACTS:

1. The inquirers are practicing attorneys licensed in New York State who wish to market their services by sending brochures to local accountants and bankers with a cover letter stating that their practice includes estate planning, trusts and estates, and elder law. The brochures, which are purchased from a national publisher, are entitled "2013 Federal Tax Pocket Guide," and "2013 Personal Planning Guide," and include, among other things, various tax rate tables, estate tax planning techniques and tax laws. The brochures will have the inquirers' firm information printed on the cover.

2. The inquirers are not seeking to solicit the accountants and bankers to become clients. Rather, they hope that as these accountants and bankers meet with their own clients, they may recommend the inquirers if such clients are in need of legal services. The inquirers candidly admit that they are "[e]ssentially . . . hoping to gain these accountants and bankers as referral sources." In addition, the cover letter to the bankers will advise them to call the inquirers if they have general questions on which they can provide assistance, but they do not plan to charge the bankers for that assistance.

QUESTION:

3. May a lawyer forward a cover letter describing his practice accompanied by a third-party brochure containing helpful information of general applicability and the lawyer's contact information to nonlawyer professionals, in the hope that these nonlawyers will recommend the lawyer's services if the nonlawyer determines that a particular client is in need of the lawyer's services?

OPINION:

4. Rule 1.0(a) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct ("Rules") provides that an "advertisement" includes "any public or private communication made by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm about that lawyer or law firm's services, the primary purpose of which is for the retention of the lawyer or law firm." The cover letters the inquirers plan to send to various accountants and bankers are advertisements governed by various rules, including Rule 7.1 ("Advertising"), Rule 7.4 ("Identification of Practice and Specialty"), and Rule 7.5 ("Professional Notices, Letterheads, and Signs"). See N.Y. State 848 (2010) (concluding that law firm's contemplated educational newsletter was an attorney advertisement within the meaning of Rule 1.0(a) after considering three factors: "(i) the intent of the communication, (ii) the content of the communication and (iii) the targeted audience of the communication").

5. If the above rules are satisfied, the lawyers are permitted to mail cover letters describing their practice with third party brochures to nonlawyer professionals in the hope that these professionals will consider referring their clients to the lawyers if a need arises. Since a lawyer can ethically enter into a nonexclusive reciprocal referral agreement, a lawyer's mere forwarding of cover letters and brochures to nonlawyer professionals with whom the lawyer does not intend to enter into a reciprocal referral arrangement, in the hope that it may one day lead to a new client is, by analogy, also permitted by the Rules. [113]

6. Rule 7.3, entitled "Solicitation and Recommendation of Professional Employment," defines a "solicitation" as any "advertisement initiated by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm that is directed to, or targeted at, a specific recipient or group of recipients, or their family members or legal representatives, the primary purpose of which is the retention of the lawyer or law firm, and a significant motive for which is pecuniary gain." Rule 7.3(b). Rule 7.3(a) prohibits a lawyer from engaging in solicitation by in-person contact unless the recipient of the solicitation is a close friend, relative, former client or existing client. Rule 7.3(a) (1). Since the inquirers cannot personally solicit the prospective clients they are seeking, as they had no prior relationship with them, they may not do so through the acts of a third party, such as an accountant or banker. Rule 8.4(a) ("A lawyer or law firm shall not . . . violate or attempt to violate the Rules of Professional Conduct, knowingly assist or induce another to do so, or do so through the acts of another."); see N.Y. State 887 (2011) (law firm could not authorize nonlawyer marketer to meet with or call prospective clients who are acquaintances of the marketer in order to promote the firm's services, because doing so would violate Rule 7.3(a)(1) unless the prospects were close friends, clients or former clients of the law firm); N.Y. State 885 (2011) ("Non-attorneys are not subject to the New York Rules of Professional Conduct, but a lawyer cannot circumvent either the solicitation or the advertising rules through the indirect use of the non-lawyer's communications.").

7. Thus, the inquirers could not expressly request that the accountants or bankers hand out the inquirers' brochures to their clients and ask their clients to contact the inquirers. However, there is no ethical prohibition for the accountant or banker to refer the client to the lawyer or hand the lawyer's brochure to the client when they perceive that their client needs legal advice, or in response to the client's request for a legal advice. See Rule 7.3, Cmt. [2] ("a communication made in response to an inquiry initiated by a potential client" does not constitute a solicitation).

8. However, Rule 7.2(a) prohibits a lawyer from compensating or giving anything of value to a person or organization to recommend or obtain employment by a client. To the extent the inquirers are offering to answer questions from bankers free of charge in exchange for the banker recommending the inquirers' services, such conduct violates Rule 7.2(a)'s prohibition. See N.Y. State 942 (2012) (Rule's prohibition is violated if the inquiring lawyer would be giving something of value to nonlawyer firm in exchange for client referrals, such as a reduced fee); N.Y. State 741 (2001) (attorney, who was required to pay substantial dues to organization in exchange for membership that entitled the attorney to referrals from the organization's members, and was required to make referrals to those members, would be transferring something "of value" in order to obtain referrals in violation of current Rule 7.2(a)).

113 In N.Y. State 765 (2003), we noted that under former DR 1-107 and DR 2-103(B), a lawyer "may enter into a non-exclusive reciprocal referral agreement or understanding with a securities broker or insurance agent." In N.Y. State 870 (2011), we opined that the reasoning of N.Y. State 765 applied under current Rules 5.7 and 5.8 and that a lawyer could enter into a nonexclusive reciprocal referral arrangement with a debt reduction company.

9. Finally, Judiciary Law section 479 provides, in pertinent part, that it is unlawful to solicit legal business, or to solicit a retainer authorizing an attorney to perform or render legal services, on behalf of an attorney. Whether the inquirers' proposed conduct is in violation of this statute is a question of law beyond the jurisdiction of this Committee. See N.Y. State 942; N.Y. State 927 (2012).

CONCLUSION:

10. A lawyer may forward a cover letter describing his practice with a brochure to nonlawyer professionals, such as accountants and bankers, in the hopes that these professionals will consider referring their clients to the lawyer if a need arises.

TOPIC: Conflicting interests; former client

DIGEST: A law school legal clinic which previously represented a not-for-profit organization may thereafter represent an organization with similar objectives in applying to the Internal Revenue Service for not-for-profit status, since the matters for the proposed and former clients are not substantially related within the meaning of the Rules, the new representation would not involve use of confidential information of the former client, and the relevant interests of the clients are not materially adverse.

RULES: 1.6(a), 1.9

FACTS:

1. A law school legal clinic (the "Clinic") previously represented a not-for-profit organization (the "Former Client"). As a result of a dispute within the organization, a group of dissident organization members has formed a new organization (the "Proposed Client") that would perform the same kinds of functions as the Former Client, and has asked the Clinic to represent it in applying for tax-exempt status under Section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code (the "New Representation").

QUESTION:

2. May the Clinic undertake the New Representation, or would such representation constitute a conflict of interest?

OPINION:

3. Under the Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"), a lawyer has ethical responsibilities to former clients as well as to current ones: "After termination of a client lawyer relationship, a lawyer has certain continuing duties with respect to confidentiality and conflicts of interest and thus may not represent another client except in conformity with these Rules." Rule 1.9, Cmt. [1].

4. In particular, Rule 1.9 (Duties to Former Clients) provides:

> (a) A lawyer who has formerly represented a client in a matter shall not thereafter represent another person in the same or a substantially related matter in which that person's interests are materially adverse to the interests of the former client unless the former client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing.
> . . . .
> (c) A lawyer who has formerly represented a client in a matter . . . shall not thereafter:
> > (1) use confidential information of the former client protected by Rule 1.6 to the disadvantage of the former client, except as these Rules would permit or require with respect to a current client or when the information has become generally known; or

> (2) reveal confidential information of the former client protected by Rule 1.6 except as these Rules would permit or require with respect to a current client.

5. The term "substantially related" is explained in Comment 3 to Rule 1.9:

> Matters are "substantially related" for purposes of this Rule if they involve the same transaction or legal dispute or if, under the circumstances, a reasonable lawyer would conclude that there is otherwise a substantial risk that confidential factual information that would normally have been obtained in the prior representation would materially advance the client's position in the subsequent matter.

6. If the Clinic were to undertake an extensive or continuing relationship with the Proposed Client, that representation could include matters substantially related to the representation of the Former Client in which the two clients' interests were materially adverse. In that case, Rule 1.9(a) would preclude representation of the Proposed Client unless the Former Client gave informed consent, confirmed in writing.

7. For two reasons, however, we believe that the limited New Representation proposed in the inquiry would be unlikely to give rise to such a conflict.

8. First, on the facts presented, the New Representation does not seem "substantially related" to the representation of the Former Client within the meaning of Rule 1.9. The filing of an application for tax exemption would generally not implicate confidential information of the Former Client.[114] The information needed for such an application is, rather, information about the Proposed Client and its conformity with legal requirements for tax-exempt status.

9. Second, the facts presented do not suggest that the Proposed Client's interests in the IRS application would be materially adverse to the interests of the Former Client. While the Former Client may be concerned with competition from a new organization with similar goals, this kind of general enterprise competition is not enough to create a conflict of interest. Cf. Rule 1.7, Cmt. [6] ("simultaneous representation in unrelated matters of clients whose interests are only economically adverse, such as representation of competing economic enterprises in unrelated litigation, does not ordinarily constitute a conflict of interest and thus may not require consent of the respective clients"). Just as representation of competing business enterprises is not automatically representation of "differing interests" under Rule 1.7(a), we believe that competition between not-for-profit organizations would not ordinarily make establishment of the newer organization materially adverse to the interests of the existing one under Rule 1.9(a).

114 See Rule 1.6(a) ("'Confidential information' does not ordinarily include (i) a lawyer's legal knowledge or legal research or (ii) information that is generally known in the local community or in the trade, field or profession to which the information relates."); Rule 1.6, Cmt. [4A] ("The accumulation of legal knowledge or legal research that a lawyer acquires through practice ordinarily is not client information protected by this Rule. However, in some circumstances, including where the client and the lawyer have so agreed, a client may have a proprietary interest in a particular product of the lawyer's research."); Rule 1.9, Cmt. [3] ("In the case of an organizational client, general knowledge of the client's policies and practices ordinarily will not preclude a subsequent representation. On the other hand, knowledge of specific facts gained in a prior representation that are relevant to the matter in question ordinarily will preclude such a representation.").

CONCLUSION:

10. Under Rule 1.9, the Clinic's representation of the Proposed Client would not be in a matter substantially related to its representation of the Former Client; it would not involve use of the Former Client's confidential information; and the relevant interests of the Former Client and Proposed Client are not materially adverse. The Clinic may thus undertake the New Representation, representing the Proposed Client in applying for not-for-profit status, without obtaining the Former Client's consent.

TOPIC: Representation of Conflicting Interests.

DIGEST: A lawyer who regularly represents both Client A and Client B may represent Client B in negotiating a loan agreement in which Client B would lend money to Client A in accordance with Rule 1.7. Whether the lawyer may properly request the clients to waive conflicts that might arise in the future if Client A defaults on the loan and Client B wishes the lawyer to sue Client A on its behalf, is subject to the conditions set forth in Rule 1.7(b) and on the sophistication and experience of the clients. If the consent complies with Rule 1.7(b) and both clients consented to such adverse representation, the lawyer would not have to withdraw from representing Client A in unrelated matters. If Client B is willing to make the loan to Client A only if the lawyer uses knowledge from the representation of Client A to help Client B determine the nature and value of Client A's collateral for the loan, the lawyer may disclose such information only if Client A gives informed consent to the disclosure. The lawyer may accept stock in Client B as all or part of the fee in the lending matter as long as the lawyer determines that the fee is not excessive for the work performed by the lawyer, the terms of the transaction are fair and reasonable to Client B, Client B is advised in writing of the desirability of seeking the advice of independent legal counsel and is given a reasonable chance to do so, and Client B signs a writing that describes the transaction and the lawyer's role in the deal, including whether the lawyer is acting for the client in the acquisition of the stock. It is unlikely that acceptance of stock in Client B would require the lawyer to withdraw from representing Client A in matters unrelated to the loan.

RULES: 1.0(f), 1.0(j), 1.5(a), 1.6, 1.6(b), 1.7, 1.7(b), 1.8(a), 1.8(b), 1.8(c)

FACTS:

1. A lawyer represents a sophisticated business client who is an individual. The existing representations are both transactional and litigation, and the lawyer represents both the client individually and entities wholly-owned by the client. (The client individually and the client's wholly-owned entities are hereafter called Client A.) Client A wishes to borrow money, and the lawyer has one or more other clients (hereinafter Client B) who may be willing to extend the loans.

QUESTION:

2. A. If Client B determines to lend money to Client A, may the lawyer represent Client B in the transaction and continue to represent Client A in other matters?

B. May the lawyer ask Client A to sign a waiver of future conflicts, so that if the loan transaction results in litigation between Client B and Client A, the lawyer may represent Client B?

C. If so, would the lawyer be required to withdraw from unrelated representation of Client A?

D. If Client B is only willing to make the loan to Client A in reliance upon the lawyer's personal familiarity with the nature and value of the underlying collateral, may the lawyer participate in the transaction and disclose such information?

E. If so, may the Lawyer receive, as all or part of the lawyer's fee, an equity interest in Client B?

F. Does such an ownership interest in the lender affect the lawyer's ability to continue to represent Client A in unrelated matters?

OPINION:

Representation of Differing Interests

3. The first question involves whether the Lawyer, who regularly represents both Client A and Client B, may represent Client B in negotiating a loan agreement in which Client B would lend money to Client A. We assume Client A would be represented by separate counsel. Rule 1.7 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") prohibits a lawyer from representing a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that the representation will involve the lawyer in representing differing interests, unless the clients give informed consent, where consent is permitted by Rule 1.7(b). The term "differing interests" is defined in Rule 1.0(f) and including "every interest that will adversely affect either the judgment or the loyalty of a lawyer to a client, whether it be conflicting, inconsistent, diverse, or other interest."

4. In order to be "differing," the interests need not arise in the same matter, and they need not arise in litigation. For example, Comment [7] to Rule 1.7 provides:

> "Differing interests can also arise in transactional matters. For example, if a lawyer is asked to represent the seller of a business in negotiations with a buyer represented by the lawyer, not in the same transaction but in another, unrelated matter, the lawyer could not undertake the representation without the informed consent of each client."

In this case, representing Client B in lending money to Client A clearly would involve the lawyer in representing differing interests, since the interests of Client A and Client B in the negotiation of the loan agreement would be adverse. What is in the best interests of the lender are not necessarily in the best interests of the borrower. See Rule 1.7, Cmt [6] (absent consent, a lawyer may not advocate in one matter against another client that the lawyer represents in some other matter, even when the matters are wholly unrelated"); N.Y. State 952 (2012) ("The lawyer who represents a residential buyer and lender is representing differing interests if only because the buyer is executing a note and a mortgage in favor of the bank.")

5. Rule 1.7(b) provides that, notwithstanding the existence of a concurrent conflict of interest, the lawyer may represent Client B in lending money to Client A if:

> "(1) the lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client;
> (2) the representation is not prohibited by law;
> (3) the representation does not involve the assertion of a claim by one client against another client represented by the lawyer in the same litigation or other proceeding before a tribunal; and

(4) each affected client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing."

6. Whether the lawyer reasonably believes the lawyer can provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client is a factual determination that we cannot make. But in the facts presented here, we see nothing that would prevent the lawyer from reasonably reaching that conclusion. Similarly, the representation is not prohibited by any law. Cf., Rule 1.7, Cmt. [16] (non-consentable conflicts). Moreover, the inquirer has presented no facts that would provide grounds for believing, at this stage of the relationship between Clients A and B, that the lending relationship will result in litigation or another proceeding before a tribunal. Consequently, if the lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to both Clients A and B, the lawyer may ask for consent to the conflict.

7. In N.Y. State 952 (2012) we found yet another possible conflict of interest. Because the lawyer regularly represented the lender and might well be eager to maintain that relationship and income stream, we found that the lawyer would have a personal business interest in advancing the lender's cause, which would create a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the borrower would be adversely affected by the personal business interest. See N.Y. State 867 at n. 2 (2011). Rule 1.7(a)(2) provides that a lawyer may not represent a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or the personal interest, except as provided in paragraph 1.7(b) (quoted above). The lawyer must therefore decide whether a reasonable lawyer would conclude that such a personal conflict of interest exists, and, if so, whether the requirements for requesting client consent are met. If so, the lawyer may request such consent, after disclosing the nature of the relationship with Client A.

Future Conflict Waivers

8. The second question assumes that the clients will grant a waiver for the lawyer to represent Client B in negotiating the loan agreement and asks if the conflict waiver may also include a consent to represent Client B against Client A if the loan agreement should result in litigation.

9. As noted above, Rule 1.7(b) allows a lawyer to represent a client despite the existence of differing interests, as long as, among other things, the lawyer reasonably believes he or she will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client and each affected client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing. Whether each affected client can give informed consent to a future conflict depends on the extent to which the lawyer is able to explain adequately the material risks of the proposed course of conduct and reasonably available alternatives, and on the sophistication of the client. See Rule 1.0(j) (definition of informed consent) and Rule 1.7, Cmt [22].

10. Rule 1.7, Comment 22 states:

> "The more comprehensive the explanation and disclosure of the types of future representations that might arise and the actual and reasonably foreseeable adverse consequences of those representations, the greater the likelihood that the client will have the understanding necessary to make the consent 'informed' and the waiver effective. . . . The lawyer should also disclose the measures that will be taken to protect the client > should a conflict arise, including procedures such as screening that would be put in place."

Since Client A would be asked to consent to his lawyer's (or law firm's) suing him, it would be particularly important to make clear whether the lawyer who regularly represents Client A would be actively involved in any potential litigation.

11. Comment 22 warns that the effectiveness of advance conflict waivers is generally determined by the extent to which the client reasonably understands the material risks that the waiver entails. The more comprehensive the explanation and disclosures of the types of future represents that might arise, the greater the likelihood that the client will have the understanding necessary to make the consent "informed." See also Comment [22A], which discusses how to determine whether an advance waiver remains valid after the passage of time, when the circumstances may have greatly changed from those anticipated in the waiver. Whether Client A understands the material risks that the waiver entails depends on the sophistication of Client A. See, e.g. Rule 1.7, Cmt [22]:

> "[I]f the client is an experienced user of the legal services involved and is reasonably informed regarding the risk that a conflict may arise, an advance waiver is more likely to be effective, particularly if, for example, the client is independently represented or advised by in-house or other counsel in giving consent."

See generally Simon's New York Rules of Professional Conduct Annotated (2012 ed), Annotations of Rule 1.7(b)(3) (hereinafter, Simon) ("The depth and content of the disclosure will depend largely on the sophistication of the client").

12. In the fact situation posited here, the requested conflict waiver would not be open-ended. The circumstances anticipated – that the lawyer would represent Client B in suing Client A for a default under the loan agreement (and in executing on the collateral for the loan) – is quite specific. Compare N.Y. City 2006-1 (authorizing a law firm to request that the client waive future conflicts of interest, and discussing requests for open-ended waivers, where the lawyer may not be able to give appropriate disclosure of the implications, advantages and risks involved, so that the client can make an informed decision whether to consent). The inquirer characterizes Client A as a sophisticated business client who is an individual. It is not clear whether Client A will be independently advised in connection with the waiver. Such independent advice would clearly make any waiver less subject to challenge.

The Downsides of Requesting Current and Future Waivers

13. The conflict of interest rules are derived from the lawyer's traditional duty of loyalty to the client. See, e.g. Preamble, par. 2 ("The touchstone of the client-lawyer relationship is the lawyer's obligation . . . to act with loyalty during the period of the representation"); Rule 1.7, Cmt. [1] ("Loyalty and independent judgment are essential aspects of a lawyer's relationship with a client.") The lawyer who requests a conflict waiver from a client must consider the possibility that a client such as Client A may give consent to a conflict today but consider it to be the height of disloyalty tomorrow (or in several months) when the lawyer represents Client B in bringing suit against Client A. Such a client may challenge whether the conflict waiver was made with sufficient disclosure, and may seek fee forfeiture or professional discipline, or sue the lawyer for malpractice or breach of fiduciary duty. See generally Simon, supra.

14. As Comment 21 to Rule 1.7 points out, the client (in this case, Client A) can also revoke a valid consent at any time, at least with respect to continued representation of Client A. Whether such revocation would also prevent the lawyer from representing Client B depends on the circumstances, including the nature of the conflict, whether the client revoked consent because of a material change in circumstances, the reasonable expectations of Client B, and whether material detriment to Client B would result. See N.Y. State 902 (whether the lawyer may continue to represent the non-revoking client depends upon the circumstances, unless an advance agreement specifies what happens upon revocation of consent.)

Suing a Current Client

15. The third question asks whether the lawyer may represent Client B in legal action against Client A if the lawyer still represents Client A. Rule 1.7(b)(3), in describing non-consentable conflicts, includes cases where the representation involves "the assertion of a claim by one client against another client represented by the lawyer in the same litigation or other proceeding before a tribunal." However, in this case, the lawyer would not represent Clients A and B in the same litigation or other proceeding. Client A, we assume, would be represented by another law firm. Thus the conflict would not be non-consentable. The question would be the same as that discussed above with respect to Rule 1.7(b)(1) – whether the lawyer believes he or she can adequately represent Client B, explains the situation to both clients and obtains the informed consent of both. See generally, Simon, Annotations of Rule 1.7(b)(3). In addition, the lawyer would have to determine that the lawyer's independent professional judgment on behalf of Client A in the unrelated matters would not be affected.

Use of Client Confidential Information

16. The fourth question posits that Client B might only be willing to make the loan to Client A in reliance upon the lawyer's personal familiarity with the nature and value of Client A's collateral for the loan.

17. Rule 1.6(a) prohibits a lawyer from knowingly revealing confidential information of a client, or using such information to the disadvantage of the client or for the advantage of the lawyer or a third person, unless the client gives informed consent (as defined in Rule 1.0(j)) or the disclosure is permitted by Rule 1.6(b) (which is not applicable to this situation). Confidential information is defined in Rule 1.6 to include information gained during or relating to the representation of a client that the client has requested to be kept confidential or the disclosure of which is likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client.

18. We believe that information gained by the lawyer during the representation of Client A about the value of the potential collateral for the loan by Client B constitutes confidential information within the meaning of Rule 1.6. Consequently, the Lawyer could not use the information for the benefit of Client B without the informed consent of Client A. In accordance with Rule 1.0(j), this would involve the lawyer explaining to Client A the material risks of the authorizing the lawyer to disclose information about the collateral to Client B, as well as the reasonably available alternatives, and obtaining the agreement of Client A. Although use of the information might be detrimental to the client (if the lawyer possesses information indicating that the value of the collateral is less than it otherwise appears), we believe that a sophisticated client might well consent to the disclosure, and see no reason why the conflict is inherently non-consentable.

19. The inquirer will want to clearly spell out to both Client A and Client B the extent to which confidential information of Client A will be shared, and the extent to which the lawyer has continuing obligations to inform Client B of changes in the value of the collateral. See Spector v. Mermelstein, 361 F. Supp. 30 (S.D.N.Y. 1972), aff'd in part and remanded, 485 F.2d 474 (2d Cir. 1973) (defendant attorney breached his fiduciary duties to plaintiff client by failing to inform client fully of facts known to attorney which raised serious questions regarding the advisability of client's loaning money to a corporation which owned a Nevada gambling casino). Cf., Rule 2.3 (When the layer knows or should know that the evaluation is likely to affect the client's interests materially and adversely, the lawyer shall not provide the evaluation unless the client gives informed consent).

Ownership Interest in a Client/Lender

20. The fifth question assumes that Client B might wish to compensate the lawyer by giving the lawyer an interest in the legal entity that makes the loan and asks whether such an ownership interest would affect the ability of the lawyer to represent Client B in the loan transaction or to represent Client A in other matters. It is not clear whether the entity that makes the loan is a public or private company, whether its shares have a recognized value, and whether the value of its shares will depend principally on the success of the loan to Client A.

21. There are three questions implicit in this question. First, could the lawyer personally make the loan to the client (i.e. is the ownership interest in the lender allowing the lawyer to do something that would otherwise not be permitted by the Rules)? See Rule 8.4 (A lawyer shall not violate the Rules of Professional Conduct through the acts of another). Second, would the ownership interest in the lending entity pass muster under the rule governing the reasonableness of legal fees and the rule governing business transactions with clients? Third, would the ownership interest affect the lawyer's judgment on behalf of either client?

22. We have held that there is no express prohibition against a lawyer lending a client funds in connection with a non-litigated matter, although a loan transaction between a lawyer and client is a business transaction that involves potential conflicts of interest. See N.Y. State 600 (1989). Cf., Rule 1.8(e) (While representing a client in connection with contemplated or pending litigation, a lawyer shall not advance or guarantee financial assistance to the client except as set forth in the rule). Consequently, the lawyer should ensure that the client understands the potential conflict and the fact that, at some point in the future, the lawyer may need to withdraw from representing the client. We warned that, despite the fact that the lawyer-lender is extending a benefit to the client, the lawyer should exercise caution when considering personal involvement in client affairs.

23. The rules of business transactions with clients are currently found in Rule 1.8(a), which provides that a lawyer may not enter into a business transaction with a client if they have differing interests therein and if the client expects the lawyer to exercise independent professional judgment for the protection of the client, unless:

> "(1) the transaction is fair and reasonable to the client and the terms of the transaction are fully disclosed and transmitted in writing in a manner that can be reasonably understood by the client;

(2) the client is advised in writing of the desirability of seeking, and is given a reasonable opportunity to seek, the advice of independent legal counsel on the transaction; and

(3) the client gives informed consent, in a writing signed by the client, to the essential terms of the transaction and the lawyer's role in the transaction, including whether the lawyer is representing the client in the transaction"

24. In N.Y. State 913 (2012), the Committee discussed the ethical issues that arise when a lawyer is paid with client stock. As we explained there, the starting point for determining whether a lawyer's compensation for legal services is appropriate is that, under Rule 1.5(a), the lawyer may not accept a fee the amount of which would leave a reasonable lawyer "with a definite and firm conviction that the fee is excessive." Rule 1.5(a) sets out the factors that should be used to determine excessiveness. However, we also concluded that Rule 1.8(a) (business transactions with a client) applies to negotiation of a fee in which a lawyer is to receive an equity interest in a client company, despite the clause in Rule 1.8(a) that makes the rule applicable only if the client expects the lawyer to exercise professional judgment on behalf of the client in the business transaction. In N.Y. State 913, we found that the common situation in which the lawyer will receive stock as a legal fee involves a "nascent venture" lacking a public market and offering consideration of indeterminate value and liquidity in lieu of cash, although our conclusion was not limited to this situation.

25. Accordingly, the lawyer may accept stock in Client B's corporation as long as the lawyer determines that the fee is not excessive for the work performed by the lawyer, the terms of the transaction are fair and reasonable to Client B, Client B is advised in writing of the desirability of seeking the advice of independent legal counsel and is given a reasonable chance to do so, and Client B signs a writing that describes the transaction and the lawyer's role in the deal, including whether the lawyer is acting for the client in the acquisition of the stock.

26. Finally, the lawyer must determine whether acceptance of stock in payment of all or part of the legal fee would negatively affect his judgment on behalf of either client – Client A if the amount of the fee from Client B would encourage the lawyer to violate the confidences of Client A, and Client B if the fact that the lawyer has an ownership interest in the lender causes him or her to elevate his own economic interests over those of Client B.

If Lawyer Accepts Ownership Interest in Lender Corporation, May Lawyer Continue to Represent the Borrower in Matters Unrelated to the Loan?

27. As noted above, Rule 1.7(a) prohibits a lawyer from representing a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that either (a) the representation will involve the lawyer in representing differing interests, or (b) there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests. Mere ownership of stock in the lending corporation would not involve the lawyer in representing differing interests. Whether ownership of such stock would involve a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a Client A will be adversely affected depends on the value of the stock. The lawyer should also consider whether the relationship with Client B and the importance of lawyer's continuing representation of Client B would affect the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of Client A.

CONCLUSION:

A. A lawyer who regularly represents both Client A and Client B may represent Client B in negotiating a loan agreement in which Client B would lend money to Client A, if:

(1) the lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client;

(2) the representation is not prohibited by law;

(3) the representation does not involve the assertion of a claim by one client against another client represented by the lawyer in the same litigation or other proceeding before a tribunal; and

(4) each affected client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing."

B. Whether the lawyer may properly request Client A to waive conflicts that might arise in the future if Client A defaults on the loan and Client B wishes the lawyer to sue Client A on its behalf, is subject to the conditions set forth in Rule 1.7(b) and on the sophistication of the clients and their experience with legal representation.

C. If the consent complied with Rule 1.7(b) and both clients consented to such adverse representation, the lawyer would not have to withdraw from representing Client A in unrelated matters.

D. If Client B is willing to make the loan to Client A only if the lawyer uses knowledge from the representation of Client A to help Client B determine the nature and value of Client A's collateral for the loan, the lawyer may disclose such information only if Client A gives informed consent to the disclosure.

E. The lawyer may accept stock in Client B as all or part of the fee in the lending matter as long as the lawyer determines that the fee is not excessive for the work performed by the lawyer, the terms of the transaction are fair and reasonable to Client B, Client B is advised in writing of the desirability of seeking the advice of independent legal counsel and is given a reasonable chance to do so, and Client B signs a writing that describes the transaction and the lawyer's role in the deal, including whether the lawyer is acting for the client in the acquisition of the stock.

F. It is unlikely that acceptance of stock in Client B would require the lawyer to withdraw from representing Client A in matters unrelated to the loan.

TOPIC: Lawyer's disclosure of confidential information for personal advantage

DIGEST: A lawyer who handles foreclosure matters in mediation and at trial desires to provide leads on desirable properties to friends in the real estate business. The lawyer must not reveal confidential information to the disadvantage of a client or to the advantage of the lawyer or a third party unless the client gives informed consent. If a reasonable lawyer would perceive a significant risk that the lawyer's own financial, business, or other personal interests will adversely affect the lawyer's professional judgment on the client's behalf, then the lawyer may not continue the representation unless the conflict is consentable and the client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing. In any event, the lawyer may not use litigation tactics that have no substantial purpose other than delay.

RULES: 1.6(a); 1.7(a) & (b); 1.8(b); 1.9(c); 3.1(a) & (b); 3.2.

FACTS:

1. An associate (the "Associate") works at a law firm that represents various lenders (collectively "Lender") in foreclosure actions. The Associate's duties include such tasks as drafting motions for default judgment, reviewing applications from borrowers seeking loan modifications, and appearing at mediation conferences.

2. Some of the Associate's college friends want to form a real estate LLC (the "LLC"). The LLC would evaluate properties that are in the foreclosure process or that have already been foreclosed, and would purchase those that the LLC considers to be sound investments as rental properties. The purchases would be made either (a) in short sales (if the LLC buys a property after the summons and complaint but before or during the foreclosure proceedings) or (b) at foreclosure auctions (if the LLC buys a property after the foreclosure proceedings end).

3. The Associate's college friends have asked him to join their real estate LLC. If he agrees, they anticipate that he would use information acquired during his law practice to provide leads on properties facing foreclosure that may be sound investments as rental properties. (The Associate does not say that he would represent the LLC or perform any legal services for it, so we assume he will not.)

4. However, the Associate is concerned that his role at mediation conferences may conflict with his role in the LLC. A conflict could arise because it might be to the LLC's advantage (and therefore to his personal advantage) either to speed up or to slow down or delay foreclosure proceedings, which might be contrary to the Lender's interest in a particular foreclosure case. In particular, the LLC might sometimes prefer to buy a property at a short sale, before the foreclosure proceedings begin or while they are pending, but might at other times prefer to buy a property at auction, after the foreclosure proceedings conclude. The Lender, however, might desire the opposite of what the LLC wants.

5. The Associate is in a position to speed up or slow down foreclosure proceedings regarding a given property because of his role in mediation conferences. In New York State, all foreclosure proceedings are effectively stayed, practically if not formally, while an action is in the mediation part. While an action is in the mediation part, Lenders must participate in good faith in one or more conferences to determine whether a borrower meets eligibility guidelines for a loan modification. If a borrower does meet the guidelines, then the pending or threatened foreclosure action will be settled via loan modification. If a borrower does not meet the guidelines (or if a borrower does not properly fill out and diligently update an application for a loan modification), then the action is released from the mediation part and the action can move forward toward foreclosure.

6. When the Associate attends a mediation conference on behalf of a Lender, his job (as he describes it) is either (a) to facilitate the loan modification process or (b) to argue that the borrower is ineligible for loan modification and that the action should be released from the mediation part so it can move toward foreclosure. The Associate independently decides which of these alternative courses to follow based on the totality of the facts and circumstances at the time of the conference.

7. If the Associate successfully facilitates the loan modification process and the case settles via loan modification, then neither a short sale nor a foreclosure auction will occur, and the LLC will have no opportunity to buy the property. But if the Associate stalls the mediation process, then the LLC may have an opportunity to buy the property at a short sale before a foreclosure auction occurs. Conversely, if the Associate persuades the mediator to release the matter from the mediation part and allow the case to continue toward foreclosure, the LLC may eventually have an opportunity to buy the property at a foreclosure auction.

QUESTIONS:

8. May a lawyer who currently represents a lender in foreclosure proceedings join a real estate LLC and provide leads to the LLC regarding properties in foreclosure that the lawyer believes will be sound investments as rental properties? If not, may the lawyer do so if he waits until he leaves his current firm and joins a different firm in a different practice area?

OPINION:

9. The inquiry raises three sets of issues: (i) confidentiality issues, (ii) conflict of interest issues, and (iii) issues regarding diligence and frivolous or dilatory litigation techniques. We will address these three sets of issues one at a time.

A. Confidentiality Issues: Rules 1.6(a), 1.8(b), and Rule 1.9(c).

10. The first set of issues concerns confidentiality. May the Associate disclose leads to the LLC based on information he acquires while representing Lenders in foreclosure proceedings? This question implicates Rules 1.6(a) and 1.8(b) while he is working at his current firm, and implicates Rule 1.9(c) if he waits until after he has moved to a different firm.

Rule 1.6(a) prohibits disclosure absent the client's informed consent

11. Rule 1.6(a), which is the most fundamental confidentiality rule, provides as follows (with emphasis added):

> (a) A lawyer shall not knowingly reveal confidential information, as defined in this Rule, or use such information to the disadvantage of a client or for the advantage of the lawyer or a third person, unless:

(1) the client gives informed consent, as defined in Rule 1.0(j);

(2) the disclosure is impliedly authorized to advance the best interests of the client and is either reasonable under the circumstances or customary in the professional community; or

(3) the disclosure is permitted by paragraph (b).

"Confidential information" consists of information gained during or relating to the representation of a client, whatever its source, that is (a) protected by the attorney-client privilege, (b) likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed, or (c) information that the client has requested be kept confidential. "Confidential information" does not ordinarily include (i) a lawyer's legal knowledge or legal research or (ii) information that is generally known in the local community or in the trade, field or profession to which the information relates. [Emphasis added.]

12. The threshold question is whether information identifying properties that may be sound investments constitutes "confidential information" within the meaning of Rule 1.6(a). If so, then the Associate is prohibited from using the information to his own advantage, or for the advantage of third parties (such as his college friends or the LLC), or to the disadvantage of his client (the Lender). Whether information is confidential depends on multiple criteria.

13. The first of these multiple criteria is whether the information has been "gained during or relating to the representation of the client . . . ." (Emphasis added.) Here, information about whether properties would be sound investments is plainly "gained during" the representation of the Lender, and is information "relating to" the representation. Only one of these is necessary, see N.Y. State 866 (2011), but here we have both. Accordingly, we need to examine one by one the three categories of confidential information listed in Rule 1.6(a).

14. Regarding privilege, the identity of properties in foreclosure by itself is not "protected by the attorney-client privilege," but communications from the Lender to the attorney about particular properties would be privileged. For example, if the Lender has told the Associate that a particular property is in excellent condition or has attracted interest from a renovator, that communication is privileged.

15. Regarding detriment to the client, if the Lender's interests differ in any material way from the LLC's interests, then revealing confidential information about desirable investment properties to the LLC is "likely to be detrimental" to the Lender. In the context of confidentiality, we understand the term "likely" in Rule 1.6(a) to indicate a "significant risk" that revealing or using the information will harm the client. (This understanding borrows a concept from Rule 1.7(a)(2), which is quoted later in this opinion.) In other words, we think the phrase "likely to be detrimental" falls somewhere in between "probable" (meaning "more likely than not") and "possible" (meaning that it can't be completely ruled out). If there is a significant risk that revealing or using the information will disadvantage the client, then it is "likely to be detrimental" within the meaning of Rule 1.6(a). And the more sensitive the information to be disclosed, the more significant the risk, because the detriment to the client will increase as the sensitivity of the information increases.

16. Regarding client expectations, if the Lender has requested that information about the properties in foreclosure be kept confidential, then the information is presumptively confidential even if it is not privileged and even if disclosing the information is not likely to be detrimental to the client. Moreover, if the Associate's law firm has assured the Lender that all such information will be kept confidential, then that is equivalent to the Lender's request that the information be kept confidential even if the Lender has not expressly made such a request.

17. The fact that foreclosure proceedings are a matter of public record does not make the information "generally known" (which would take it outside the purview of "confidential information"). Comment [4A] to Rule 1.6 says, in relevant part:

> Information that is generally known in the local community or in the trade, field or profession to which the information relates is also not protected, unless the client and the lawyer have otherwise agreed. Information is not "generally known" simply because it is in the public domain or available in a public file. [Emphasis added.]

18. The emphasized sentence in the quoted language is significant because in 2011 it replaced the following two sentences that were originally in Comment [4A]:

> Information that is in the public domain is not protected unless the information is difficult or expensive to discover. For example, a public record is confidential information when it may be obtained only through great effort or by means of a Freedom of Information request or other process.

19. These two original sentences were criticized as inaccurate, and the New York State Bar Association therefore removed them from Comment [4A] in 2011 and substituted the single sentence in today's Comment [4A] (emphasized above). This legislative history strongly suggests that information in the public domain may be protected as confidential information even if the information is not "difficult or expensive to discover" and even if it could be obtained without "great effort" and without a Freedom of Information request or other formal process.

20. Here, we think the information in question cannot be "generally known." In our view, information is generally known only if it is known to a sizeable percentage of people in "the local community or in the trade, field or profession to which the information relates." Given that hundreds or thousands of homes are in foreclosure in any locale at any given time, we do not believe that the identity of particular properties that would make sound investments is "generally known" within the meaning of Rule 1.6(a).

21. If information about particular properties – such as which ones are in good repair and which ones have new appliances – is "confidential information" within the meaning of Rule 1.6(a), then the Associate cannot use or reveal that information unless one of the exceptions in Rule 1.6(a) applies. The Associate may not have any such information – we understand that lenders do not always inspect properties in foreclosure, and may not share the foreclosure report with their lawyers – but if the Associate does have confidential information about particular properties, then Rule 1.6(a) prohibits him from using for his own benefit, or for the benefit of his friends in the LLC, or to the client's detriment, regardless of who benefits.

22. The first exception to Rule 1.6 is the client's "informed consent, as defined in Rule 1.0(j)," which is in the Terminology section. Rule 1.0(j) provides as follows:

> (j) "Informed consent" denotes the agreement by a person to a proposed course of conduct after the lawyer has communicated information adequate for the person to make an informed decision, and after the lawyer has adequately explained to the person the material risks of the proposed course of conduct and reasonably available alternatives.

23. We lack sufficient facts to spell out all of the disclosures the Associate would need to make to obtain the Lender's informed consent to revealing the identity of a promising investment property, but at a minimum it would need to include both (a) whether the Associate believes the particular property would be a sound investment for rental purposes and, if so, why; and (b) whether the Associate plans to speed up or slow down the mediation process. Armed with that information, the Lender should be able to decide whether it would also be interested in buying the property or working out a loan modification. If so, the Lender will presumably deny consent for the Associate to disclose the information to the LLC.

24. The second exception to the duty of confidentiality arises when the disclosure (a) is "impliedly authorized to advance the best interests of the client" and (b) is either (i) "reasonable under the circumstances" or (ii) "customary in the professional community." We do not perceive any circumstances in which disclosing a promising investment property to the LLC would advance the Lender's interests. If such circumstances exist, the better practice would be for the Associate to disclose the relevant facts to the client and obtain the client's informed consent. The "impliedly authorized" exception is intended mainly for situations in which time is of the essence and it is impractical for the lawyer to wait for the client's informed consent (such as during settlement negotiations or trial), or for situations in which revealing information about a client with diminished capacity is "necessary to take protective action to safeguard the client's interests." See Rule 1.6, Cmt. [5] (giving examples of circumstances in which disclosure of confidential information is impliedly authorized). Nothing suggests that those situations apply here.

25. The third exception to the duty of confidentiality arises when "the disclosure is permitted by paragraph (b)," meaning that the facts fall within one of the six specified exceptions in Rule 1.6(b) (e.g., the need "to prevent reasonably certain death or substantial bodily harm" or "to prevent the client from committing a crime)." We need not elaborate on these exceptions because none apply here.

Rule 1.8(b) prohibits disclosure absent the client's informed consent

26. Rule 1.8(b) provides as follows:

> (b) A lawyer shall not use information relating to representation of a client to the disadvantage of the client unless the client gives informed consent, except as permitted or required by these Rules.

27. At first glance, Rule 1.8(b) appears to duplicate the prohibition in Rule 1.6(a) against using confidential information "to the disadvantage of a client." But Rule 1.8(b) – unlike Rule 1.6(a) – applies to all information "relating to representation of a client," whether or not the information is protected by the attorney-client privilege, whether or not disclosure would not be embarrassing or detrimental to the client, and whether or not the client has not requested that the information be held inviolate, and whether or not the information has become "generally known." Under Rule 1.8(b), a lawyer simply may not use information relating to the representation of a client unless either (i) "the client gives informed consent" (discussed above) or (ii) disclosure is "permitted or required by these Rules" (an exception that does not apply here).

28. Thus, whenever disclosing the identity of a promising investment property would be disadvantageous to the Lender, the Associate may not do it absent the client's informed consent pursuant to Rule 1.0(j). As Comment [5] to Rule 1.8 says:

> [5] A lawyer's use of information relating to the representation to the disadvantage of the client violates the lawyer's duty of loyalty. Paragraph (b) applies when the information is used to benefit either the lawyer or a third person, such as . . . a business associate of the lawyer, at the expense of a client. For example, if a lawyer learns that a client intends to purchase and develop several parcels of land, the lawyer may not use that information to purchase one of the parcels in competition with the client or to recommend that another client make such a purchase. . . .

Rule 1.9(c) prohibits disclosure absent the client's informed consent

29. The Associate also asks whether the answer will change if he waits until he has moved to a different firm working in a different practice area. It will not. Rule 1.8(b) does not apply to former clients, but Rule 1.6 does apply, via Rule 1.9(c), which provides as follows:

> (c) A lawyer who has formerly represented a client in a matter or whose present or former firm has formerly represented a client in a matter shall not thereafter:
> > (1) use confidential information of the former client protected by Rule 1.6 to the disadvantage of the former client, except as these Rules would permit or require with respect to a current client or when the information has become generally known; or
> > (2) reveal confidential information of the former client protected by Rule 1.6 except as these Rules would permit or require with respect to a current client.

30. In other words, the duty of confidentiality in Rule 1.6 toward current clients carries over with full force to former clients. To the extent that the Associate is barred from using or revealing confidential information of his current clients while working at his current firm, he will be equally barred from using or revealing the same information after he has moved to a different law firm. Whether his new firm practices in the same area of law or a different area of law will make no difference.

31. In sum, we conclude that Rules 1.6(a), Rule 1.8(b), and 1.9(c) all prohibit the Associate from making the disclosures he proposes to make here unless the Lender gives informed consent.

B. Conflict Issues: Rule 1.7.

32. The second set of issues pertains to conflicts of interest between the Lender's interests and the lawyer's personal interests. Indeed, in his inquiry, the Associate expressly worries that his involvement in a business that buys properties upon which clients of his employer's law office are foreclosing "will create an ethical conflict subject to disciplinary action . . . ."

33. The Associate's concern is well founded. The applicable provision of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct is Rule 1.7(a)(2), which provides as follows:

> > (2) there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests.

34. In the circumstances before us, a reasonable lawyer would conclude that there is a "significant risk" that the Associate's professional judgment on behalf of the Lender in foreclosure proceedings regarding each property will be adversely affected by (a) the Associate's own financial and business interests in the LLC, and by (b) the Associate's personal interests in maintaining good relationships with his friends who run the LLC. Thus, a concurrent conflict will arise with respect to each foreclosure proceeding in which the Associate represents the Lender.[115] In particular, the Lender has a legal duty to participate in the loan modification process in good faith, but the LLC is not involved in that process and has no good faith obligation. Some courts have sanctioned lenders for dragging out the loan modification process or for otherwise failing to negotiate a loan modification in good faith. See, e.g., U.S. Bank v. Shinaba, No. 381917/09 (Bronx Sup. Ct., July 31, 2013) (imposing sanctions on bank for "dilatory, and dishonest, conduct" that dragged out settlement conferences in a foreclosure action); Citibank, N.A. v. Barclay, No. 381649/09 (Bronx Sup. Ct., June 21, 2013) (same). These decisions underscore the conflict of interest that the Associate will face if the Lender desires to reach a loan modification agreement or otherwise move the foreclosure process along quickly, but the LLC wants to drag it out. (We address below the Associate's separate duty to avoid conduct whose purpose is to delay and prolong litigation.)

35. Because a concurrent conflict of interest exists, the Associate may not represent the Lender in any foreclosure proceeding unless he complies with Rule 1.7(b), which provides, in pertinent part, as follows:

> (b) Notwithstanding the existence of a concurrent conflict of interest under paragraph (a), a lawyer may represent a client if:
> > (1) the lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client; . . . and
> > (4) each affected client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing.

36. Under Rule 1.7(b), the Associate may not be involved in the LLC unless he "reasonably believes" that he can "provide competent and diligent representation" to the Lender, and the Lender "gives informed consent, confirmed in writing." This standard will be difficult to meet because the Lender has many interests that may diverge from the LLC's interests. For example, the Lender may desire to establish or maintain a reputation for cooperation with the courts, for fairness to borrowers, or for efficiency in resolving foreclosure proceedings. The Lender will also desire to minimize legal fees and minimize the costs of taxes, insurance, and maintenance on properties in foreclosure. And the Lender will want to avoid sanctions for dilatory or frivolous litigation conduct. The LLC does not share these interests – its only interest is in purchasing sound investments for the LLC. Accordingly, it is unlikely that the Associate can provide competent and diligent representation to the Lender if he is personally involved in the LLC or has agreed to provide "leads" to the LLC. Thus, the conflict may well be non-consentable (non-waivable).

115 As mentioned earlier, nothing in his inquiry indicates that he will be representing the LLC. As long as the Associate does not perform any legal services for the LLC, the Associate's involvement in the LLC will not involve him in representing "differing interests." and thus will not create a concurrent conflict under Rule 1.7(a)(1).

37. Even if a conflict regarding a particular property is consentable – and it usually will not be – the Associate must not continue representing the Lender in the matter without the Lender's informed consent. The disclosures needed to obtain the Lender's informed consent to disclose confidential information to the LLC (see above) should normally suffice to obtain the Lender's informed consent for conflict purposes – but Rule 1.7(b)(4) also requires that the client's consent be "confirmed in writing" – see Rule 1.0(e) (defining "Confirmed in writing"). Moreover, the Associate will have to obtain a separate consent with respect to each property on which he represents the Lender, because each property presents a new and different conflict of interest.

C. Dilatory Tactics in Litigation: Rules 3.1 and 3.2

38. The Associate says in his inquiry that he may have an incentive to frustrate the mediation process by "causing delays in forwarding applications that I receive from borrowers to my client." Deliberately causing such delays would implicate Rule 3.1 ("Non–Meritorious Claims and Contentions"). Rule 3.1(a) provides that a lawyer "shall not bring or defend a proceeding, or assert or controvert an issue therein, unless there is a basis in law and fact for doing so that is not frivolous. . . ." Rule 3.1(b)) provides that a lawyer's conduct is "frivolous" for purposes of Rule 3.1 if the conduct "has no reasonable purpose other than to delay or prolong the resolution of litigation, in violation of Rule 3.2 . . . ." [Emphasis added.]

39. Thus, the Associate may not advance frivolous claims or defenses, or engage in conduct whose main purpose is to "delay or prolong" the litigation.

40. Moreover, Rule 3.2 ("Delay of Litigation"), which is referred to in Rule 3.1(b)(2), provides that a lawyer representing a client, a lawyer "shall not use means that have no substantial purpose other than to delay or prolong the proceeding or to cause needless expense." (Emphasis added.) Comment [1] to Rule 3.2 explains the rule as follows (with emphasis added):

> [1] Dilatory practices bring the administration of justice into disrepute. Such tactics are prohibited if their only substantial purpose is to frustrate an opposing party's attempt to obtain rightful redress or repose. . . . The question is whether a competent lawyer acting in good faith would regard the course of action as having some substantial purpose other than delay or needless expense. Seeking or realizing financial or other benefit from otherwise improper delay in litigation is not a legitimate interest of the client. [Emphasis added.]

41. Seeking financial or other benefit for the lawyer's own client is not a legitimate reason for a lawyer to delay litigation, so seeking financial benefit for the lawyer (or a business in which the lawyer is involved) is a fortiori not a legitimate justification for using delaying tactics. Thus, even if the Associate obtains the client's consent to disclose confidential information to the LLC pursuant to Rule 1.6(a), and even if the Associate obtains the client's valid consent to the concurrent conflict pursuant to Rule 1.7(b), the Associate still must not use dilatory litigation tactics, such as seeking unwarranted continuances or demanding unnecessary loan documentation, that have "no substantial purpose other than to delay or prolong the proceeding."

CONCLUSION:

42. A lawyer must not reveal confidential information to the disadvantage of the client or to the advantage of the lawyer or a third party (such as a business in which the lawyer is involved) unless the client gives informed consent. If a reasonable lawyer would perceive a significant risk that the lawyer's financial, business, or other personal interests will adversely affect the lawyer's professional judgment on the client's behalf, then the lawyer may not continue the representation unless the conflict is consentable and the client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing. In any event, the lawyer may not use litigation tactics that have no substantial purpose other than delay.

TOPIC: Permissible business structures and fee arrangements for a lawyer to work with a business person who seeks to establish a "Disability Office" to help persons with government benefit matters, most of which do not require representation by legal counsel.

DIGEST: A lawyer seeks to work with a nonlawyer who will establish a "Disability Office" in the local community to assist people with Social Security Supplemental Income, Social Security Disability Income, Medicaid Planning, and Guardianship matters. Some of these services may be performed by a nonlawyer pursuant to applicable regulations. The lawyer may not enter into a partnership or be employed by a nonlawyer to solicit third party clients, nor may the lawyer share legal fees with the business person. The lawyer may compensate the business person for marketing and may provide for other forms of compensation for the success of the firm. The lawyer may not enter into a business with a nonlawyer to handle matters where the lawyer is practicing law even if those services may be performed by a nonlawyer.

RULES: 5.4, 5.7, 5.8, 7.2 (a)

QUESTION:

1. The inquiring lawyer seeks to enter into an arrangement with a business person to provide legal services to assist clients in the community with government benefits programs (Social Security Supplemental Income, Social Security Disability, Medicaid Planning, Medicare and an occasional guardianship). He asks whether any of the following four proposals are consistent with the Rules of Professional Conduct:

    a. Businessman runs a "Disability Office" and employs attorneys. Attorney meets with clients and sets the fees. The fees are paid to the Office, and the percentage is then paid to the attorney.

    b. Businessman runs a "Disability Office" and enters into a legal services agreement with attorney's law firm, where attorney pays the Office certain percentage of the fees from each case.

    c. Attorney opens a separate law firm and employs the businessman as an Office and Marketing manager. Officer gets paid percentage of the overall business he brings in through his marketing efforts.

    d. Businessman employs attorney in nonlegal capacity to represent clients with the matters not requiring a legal license.

BACKGROUND:

2. The inquirer practices in the field of trusts and estates, guardianships and provides services to assist clients in Medicaid planning, Medicare, Social Security Supplemental Income (SSI), Social Security Disability Income (SSDI), and guardianships. He is of Russian descent, fluent in Russian, and provides these services to the Russian immigrant community. There are few lawyers of his background in his community performing these services, which are in high demand.

3. By statute, nonlawyers may represent clients in Social Security and Medicaid cases through the hearing process. 42 U.S.C. 406 (a) (1); 20 C.F.R. §404.1705 (non-attorney representatives"), 18 N.Y.C.R.R. 358-3.9 (non-attorney authorized representatives for Medicaid and other hearings). Only attorneys may represent a client in the appeal of such cases, in guardianship proceedings or in providing legal advice in Medicaid planning. In SSI and SSDI matters, fees are contingent of up to 25 per cent of the overall award.

4. A businessman in the inquirer's community wants to establish a "Disability Office" to assist the community with its unmet needs to obtain Social Security Supplemental Income, Social Security Disability Income, Medicaid Planning, and Guardianships. This for-profit entity would market its services to assist clients in the community with government benefit programs, fair hearings and guardianships. The businessman (owner) would have no client contact and would not interfere with the attorney-client relationship.

5. The attorney seeks to enter into a structural relationship and fee arrangement with the businessman that is consistent with the Rules of Professional Conduct. The attorney proposes four structures and inquires whether any of them are permissible.

OPINION:

Structural Relationship

6. Rule 5.4 (d) provides that:

> "A lawyer shall not practice with or in the form of an entity authorized to practice law for profit if:
> (1) a nonlawyer owns any interest therein . . .
> (2) a nonlawyer is a member, corporate director or officer thereof or occupies a position of similar responsibility in any form of association other than a corporation

7. The rule seeks to protect the independent professional judgment of a lawyer and uncompromised loyalty to the client. Despite longstanding debate as to whether it should be revised to permit Alternative Law Practice Structures,[116] New York Rule 5.4(d)(2) endures and is intended to regulate nonlawyer ownership of entities in which a lawyer engages in the practice of law for profit. See Roy D. Simon, SIMON'S NEW YORK RULES OF PROFESSIONAL CONDUCT ANNOTATED, 1152-1157 (2013). So the proposal for the inquiring attorney working as an "employee" of the Disability Office is prohibited by Rule 5.4(d)(2).

116 NYSBA Task Force on Nonlawyer Ownership, www.nysba.org; ABA Commission on Ethics 20/20 Discussion Paper on Alternative Law Practice Structures, http://222.americanbar.org/Ethics2020; See District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct, Rule 5.4 (permitting forms of Alternative Law Practice), http://www.dcbar.org/for_lawyers/ethics/legal_ethics/rules_of_professional_condcut/amended_rules/rule_five/rule05_04.cfm.

8. Judiciary Law § 495 prohibits the practice of law by a corporation or voluntary association. Thus, the Disability Office may not engage in the practice of law. Moreover, Rule 5.4 (b) also prohibits a lawyer from forming a partnership with a non-lawyer if any of the activities of the partnership constitute the practice of law. Even if the business employed persons who are permitted by law to represent claimants in Social security and Medicaid hearings, it could not provide representation of clients in guardianships and Medicaid planning because legal advice on such matters constitutes the practice of law. In such circumstances, the lawyer may not form a partnership with a nonlawyer.

9. Rule 5.8 permits ongoing business relationships with a nonlawyer service provider, but only under limited circumstances that are not presented here. The first of these criteria is that the nonlawyer professional be one of those listed by the Appellate Division Rules §1205.3 (22 NYCRR §§1205.3) (limited to architects, certified public accountants, professional engineers, land surveyors, certified social workers). See N.Y. STATE 930 (2012); N.Y. STATE 885 (2011). Thus, neither Rule 5.4 (d) nor Rule 5.8 permits the first two business arrangements contemplated by the inquirer, wherein the attorney proposes to work directly for the business entity or have a legal services agreement with the business owner.

Fee Agreement

10. Even though the inquiring attorney may not enter into a business relationship as discussed above, the lawyer may enter into an agreement to compensate the business owner for marketing or other services. That agreement is subject to several rules.

11. First, it is long established that a lawyer may not share a legal fee with a nonlawyer. Rule 5.4 (a); N.Y. JUDICIARY LAW §491. Two of the proposed business structures are impermissible fee sharing agreements.

These are:

> Businessman runs a "Disability Office" and employs attorneys. Attorney meets with clients and sets the fees. The fees are paid to the Office, and the percentage is then paid to the attorney.
> Businessman runs a "Disability Office" and enters into a legal services agreement with attorney's law firm, where attorney pays the Office certain percentage of the fees from each case

12. Second, a lawyer may not pay a fee to a person or organization for referring or recommending employment by specific clients. Rule 7.2 (a); N.Y. STATE 887 (2011); N.Y. STATE 917 (2012).

13. However, a lawyer may pay for marketing and advertising. Comment [1] to Rule 7.2 provides that:

> A lawyer may compensate employees, agents and vendors who are engaged to provide marketing or client development services such as publicists, public relations personnel, marketing personnel and web site designers.

See also N.Y. STATE 860 (2011) (firm can pay for marketing or client development services).

14. In N.Y. STATE 887 (2011) we opined that a firm could pay a bonus to the marketer employee based on overall profits of the firm or on a percentage of the employee's salary. The firm may pay a bonus to the marketer based upon the number of clients referred, but not based on the fees paid by those clients. N.Y. STATE 917 (2012).

15. The firm may also enter into a profit sharing arrangement as part of a retirement plan so long as that agreement is not tied to profit from a particular case or cases. Rule 5.4 (a)(3) provides that "a lawyer or law firm may compensate a nonlawyer employee or include a nonlawyer employee in a retirement plan based in whole or in part on a profit sharing arrangement. Comment 1[B] clarifies that "such sharing of profits with a nonlawyer employee must be based on the total profitability of the law firm or a department within a law firm and may not be based on the fee resulting from a single case."

16. Thus, the third proposed business arrangement is permissible only if the business person receives a bonus based upon firm profitability or a percentage of his salary. Payment of a percentage of firm profits for a specific matter is tantamount to fee sharing and is not permitted. The proposed arrangement is prohibited because it contemplates that the attorney will open a firm, employ the businessman as an Office and Marketing manager, and pay him a percentage of the overall business he brings in through his marketing efforts.

Nonlawyer Practice

17. The final proposed structure contemplates that the businessman will hire the lawyer in a nonlegal capacity to represent clients for the matters not requiring a legal license.

18. As indicated above, regulations authorize persons other than attorneys to represent claimants in Social Security hearings. The governing regulations set forth specific criteria that qualify non-attorneys as representatives of clients in these cases. CFR § 404.1705 (b). The non-attorney is referred to as a "representative." N.Y. STATE 938 (2012). State regulations permit non–attorneys who are authorized by claimants to represent them in Medicaid hearings. These persons are referred to as "authorized representatives." Thus, the business may employ any such qualified person to represent claimants in such proceedings.

19. We have previously opined that SSDI services are "nonlegal services" defined in Rule 5.7 (c) as "those legal services that lawyers may lawfully provide and that are not prohibited as an unauthorized practice of law when provided by a nonlawyer." NY STATE 938 (2012). It is not the unauthorized practice of law for non lawyers to advise clients as to SSDI. The same is true for nonlawyer representatives in Medicaid hearings.

20. However, a lawyer who provides such SSDI or Medicaid services, is by definition, engaged in the practice of law and provides the client with legal services. (NY STATE 938 (fn.2) notes that a lawyer providing such services was a different matter).

21. The governing SSDI regulations distinguish between attorney and non-attorney representation. Attorneys may represent claimants so long as they are in good standing before a court. CFR§ 404.1705 (a). Where an attorney is engaged, the client has a reasonable expectation that the attorney has the skills and qualifications beyond that of a non attorney representative, is governed by professional conduct rules, and is subject to civil liability for the representation. Consequently, that lawyer may not circumvent the Rules of Professional Conduct and practice law by a designation that the attorney is employed in a "non-legal capacity" even if a non attorney may perform the same legal services. Cf., Rule 4.3.

CONCLUSION:

22. The lawyer may not be employed by a nonlawyer to represent third party clients, nor may the lawyer share legal fees with the business person. The lawyer may compensate the business person for marketing and may provide for other forms of compensation for the success of the firm. Alternatively, the lawyer may hire a business person and compensate him through a bonus or profit-sharing as part of a retirement plan. The lawyer may not enter into a business with a nonlawyer to handle matters where the lawyer is practicing law even if those services may be performed by a nonlawyer.

OPINION 993 (11/13/2013)

TOPIC: Misrepresentations as to purchase price in residential real estate contracts; disclosure of "gross-ups"

DIGEST: The requirement to disclose a "grossed up" real estate purchase price is triggered when the purchase price has in fact been grossed up in connection with a seller's concession.

RULE: 8.4(c)

FACTS:

1. A local bar association and a local association of realtors have jointly approved a new form to be used for residential real estate sales. This new "Contract of Sale for Residential Property" includes the following sentence: "The Purchase Price reflects an increase equal to the amount of the Seller's Concession."

2. This sentence (the "Disclosure Clause") was added to the form in an effort to comply with N.Y. State 882 (2011). That opinion followed the reasoning of N.Y. State 817 (2007). According to the inquiry, these two opinions require the Disclosure Clause to be included in all contracts that include a seller's concession.[117]

3. The inquirer reports that since adoption of the new form, attorneys and real estate personnel "have encountered continual problems with various lenders" such as "significant delays, requests for modifications of contracts, including strike out of the gross up text, and outright rejection of mortgage loan applications."

4. The inquiry says that these problems have arisen because, with the addition of the Disclosure Clause, mortgage lenders "consider the Seller's Concession to be an 'inducement to purchase.'" These mortgage lenders therefore "will only lend on the amount of the Purchase Price less the Seller's Concession, rather than based on the adjusted Purchase Price or the grossed up amount" (emphasis in inquiry).

5. The inquirer requests that the Committee reconsider N.Y. State 882 and modify it "by eliminating the requirement that all Seller's Concessions must be stated as an increase in the Purchase Price." The inquiry, and a memorandum submitted with it, set forth arguments in support of that request.

OPINION:

6. The inquiry is based on a misunderstanding of our prior opinions. Those opinions did not require that all transactions with a seller's concession be characterized as involving an increase or gross-up of the purchase price. N.Y. State 817 is clearly limited to situations in which there is, in fact,

117 The inquiry states (incorrectly) that N.Y. State 882 and N.Y. State 817 "assume that all Seller's Concessions are phantom gross ups," and it urges that contracts should not need to "characterize every Seller's Concession as an increase or gross up of the Purchase Price as the Majority in Opinion 882 currently requires" (emphasis added).

a gross-up of purchase price in connection with a seller's concession.[118] Our opinion in N.Y. State 882 is similarly limited, and its disclosure requirement does not apply to situations in which "the seller actually bears an economic cost equivalent to the concession."[119] In the most recent opinion in this line, we again adhered to the disclosure requirement in the context of a transaction in which "there has been a gross-up of the purchase price" in connection with a seller's concession. N.Y. State 892 ¶8 (2011).

7. Under our opinions, what the lawyer must disclose depends on the facts of the transaction. The relevant obligation is that a lawyer shall not "engage in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation." Rule 8.4(c). In some instances, as reflected in previous inquiries to this Committee, the parties may agree on a purchase price and thereafter agree to increase or gross up that price in connection with a seller's concession. The lawyer would be required to disclose such a gross-up. But when there has in fact been no gross-up, because the seller is actually bearing an economic cost reflected in the concession, the lawyer is under no obligation to assert that a gross-up has occurred. Indeed, it would be inappropriate for the lawyer to "disclose" something known to be inaccurate.

8. Thus, because the facts may vary from transaction to transaction, the lawyer's disclosure obligation may vary from transaction to transaction as well.[120] It appears that the Disclosure Clause quoted above is invariably included in the described Contract of Sale for Residential Property. That degree of uniformity is not required by the rules of legal ethics, nor is it appropriate if it results in misstatement of the facts in particular cases. The inquiry also mentions another form, adopted in one county, that takes a less uniform approach. In that county's alternate form, there is a checkbox next to the disclosure that "The Purchase Price has been increased by a sum equal to the Seller's Concession," and above that line is the instruction "Check if Applicable." We do not opine as to the best wording for forms, but we note that this alternate form allows a lawyer to make or not make the disclosure in question, depending on the known facts of the transaction.

118 That opinion dealt with this situation: "Following written agreement between buyer and seller of real estate as to terms," the buyer requested that the agreed sales price be increased by 3% to cover closing costs, and that the increase be set off by a seller's concession, allowing the buyer to obtain a larger mortgage loan. N.Y. State 817 ¶1. We concluded that when there is "a 'gross up' of the actual purchase price and concomitant seller's concession," then "the gross-up . . . must be disclosed," id. ¶14.

119 N.Y. State 882 distinguished the situation it considered – one in which there had been a "'gross-up' in the sales price to offset the seller's supposed concession" – from one in which

> "the seller actually bears an economic cost equivalent to the concession. . . . This is a distinction with a difference. . . . The problem here is the matching 'gross-up' of the sales price, which effectively wipes out the seller's concession."

Opinion 882 states that an ethical violation occurs "when a seller, buyer, lender, and their attorneys engage in the device of a seller's concession accompanied by a like increase in the purchase price that create a misrepresentation." The Committee concluded that "an attorney may ethically participate in a real estate transaction where the sales price is grossed-up by an amount equal to a corresponding seller's concession if the amount of the gross-up and the amount of the seller's concession are expressly and meaningfully disclosed."

120 We recognize that the lawyer may not always be aware of the history of negotiations. For example, we understand that it is not unusual for draft contracts already reflecting sellers' concessions to be submitted to lawyers, and we do not suggest that the mere statement of a seller's concession will suffice to put the lawyer on notice of a grossed up purchase price. A lawyer's good-faith omission to disclose unknown facts does not constitute "dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation." On the other hand, we do not think that a lawyer may avoid the disclosure requirement by remaining willfully blind to the existence of a gross-up. Cf. Restatement (Third) of the Law Governing Lawyers §120, Reporter's Note to Comment c (2000) (citing court decisions that arguably articulate for certain disciplinary purposes "a version of the conscious-avoidance doctrine" applied in criminal law); Rule 1.0(k) ("A person's knowledge may be inferred from circumstances.").

9. The inquiry details problems that can result from use of the Disclosure Clause, including resistance by mortgage lenders. This is not the first time the Committee has addressed such problems. A prior inquiry recounted how use of similar disclosure language led a lender to balk at a transaction, advising the seller's attorney: "Contract states price increased due to Seller concession; increase for this reason is not allowed." N.Y. State 892 ¶2 (2011). The Committee answered that a lawyer may not ethically participate in a residential real estate transaction in which a lender's objection precluded the required disclosure. Id. ¶8. The current inquiry tells us that the kind of problem addressed in N.Y. State 892 is not aberrational, but rather is faced with some frequency. That circumstance may make N.Y. State 892 and previous opinions more important in practice, but it does not refute their reasoning, which we believe continues to be sound.

10. The inquiry asserts that "the mortgage loan industry is fully familiar with and permits use of Seller's Concessions." As we have noted, however, the issue is not simply whether there is a seller's concession, but whether there is an associated gross-up of the purchase price. The reported industry reaction supports the significance of this distinction. The inquiry suggests that mortgage lenders do not consider sellers' concessions in general to be "inducements to purchase," but do consider them to be inducements to purchase when the purchase price is stated to be correspondingly grossed up. In effect, the very lenders that "permit" the use of sellers' concessions may not permit associated gross-ups, when explicitly recognized as such, to be included in the basis for the loan amount. This industry reaction does not undercut our prior conclusion that stating a grossed up purchase price without disclosing the gross-up is a misrepresentation. Indeed, the industry reaction demonstrates the materiality of that misrepresentation. The required disclosure of gross-ups may preclude uniformity of loan documents and may lead lenders to reject contracts in some cases, but an attorney's understandable desire to avoid such complications cannot justify misrepresentation.

CONCLUSION:

11. We adhere to the conclusions in N.Y. State 882 and N.Y. State 817. The mere existence of a seller's concession does not require a statement that the purchase price has been increased. However, when the purchase price in a sale of residential real estate has in fact been grossed up in connection with a seller's concession, then a lawyer who participates in the transaction is required to ensure that the grossing up of the price is disclosed.

TOPIC: Conflict of interest arising from lawyer's nonlegal employment by a law client.

DIGEST: A lawyer who coaches a sports team of a school district may also provide legal services to that school district unless there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the school district would be adversely affected by the lawyer's financial or other personal interest as a coach.

RULES: 1.7, 1.10

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a lawyer who recently began working for a law firm that "represents and provides general counsel for school districts," including a school district that has previously employed and paid a stipend to the lawyer to coach one of the school sports teams. During part of the year, the school's team is run by the school district, and during another part, the team members participate in the sport under the auspices of a private club (the "Club"). The inquirer posits that to continue receiving stipends from the school district would create a conflict of interest given the inquirer's new position with the law firm, and asks whether it would be permissible to continue coaching if (a) the inquirer were to coach solely as an employee of the Club, or (b) the inquirer were to forgo the stipends and coach for the school district as a volunteer.

QUESTION:

2. May a lawyer whose firm represents a school district also work as a coach for one of the district's sports teams, and does the answer depend on whether the lawyer's coaching services are compensated by the school district, compensated by an affiliated private club, or not compensated at all?

OPINION:

3. Seeking to avoid any possibility of conflict, the inquirer starts from the premise that a lawyer in a law firm may not be paid by a client of the firm to provide nonlegal services. But that premise goes beyond what is required by the rules of legal ethics. In a wide range of foreseeable circumstances, a law firm may ethically provide legal services to a school even though the school pays one of its lawyers to provide nonlegal services such as sports coaching. Indeed, the very lawyer employed as a coach could, in many circumstances, also provide legal services to the school.

4. The governing standard is found in Rule 1.7(a)(2) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"). That Rule provides that in the absence of appropriate client consent, "a lawyer shall not represent a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that . . . there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests."

5. Before considering whether the firm as a whole could provide legal services to the school district, we first consider whether the inquiring lawyer could provide such services. The relevant analysis, made always from the viewpoint of a reasonable lawyer, is whether the inquirer's financial or other personal interest as a coach would create a significant risk of adversely affecting the inquirer's professional judgment. The inquirer's employment as a coach may incline the inquirer toward benefiting the school, but that interest generally would not interfere with exercising professional judgment that would also be for the benefit of the school. There may be little or no risk of adverse effect if, for example, the legal work on behalf of the school district were unrelated to the lawyer's work as coach. Whether payment of a stipend would create such a risk could depend on its size, but even if large enough to give the inquirer a significant financial interest in its continuation, there would be no conflict unless that interest were to create a significant risk of interfering with professional judgment on behalf of the client.

6. It is possible to imagine particular circumstances in which employment as a coach could create a conflict. For example, there might be a significant risk that the inquirer's professional judgment would be adversely affected by personal interests if the inquirer were retained to defend the school district in a wrongful termination action filed by another coach of the same team; to defend a Title IX lawsuit alleging insufficient support of girls' sports teams; or to advise the district whether to implement policies that would constrain the ability of certain students to participate on the team.

7. To assess the risk in such cases would require knowing the facts in some detail. If the facts in a particular legal matter give rise to a conflict under Rule 1.7(a) and the inquirer chooses to continue as a coach, then the inquirer could not represent the school district in that matter unless the school district could and did waive that conflict. Waiver would be available if the inquirer reasonably believed it possible to provide competent and diligent representation to the school district despite the conflict, and the school district gave informed consent confirmed in writing. See Rule 1.7(b).

8. If a conflict would preclude the inquirer from handling a particular legal matter for the school, then that conflict would also be imputed to the other lawyers in the inquirer's firm. Absent appropriate waiver of the conflict, those other lawyers would be prohibited from representing the school in that matter. See Rule 1.10(a). The imputed conflict may, however, be waived by the school under appropriate circumstances. See Rule 1.10(d). Even if there were no reasonable prospect that the inquirer could adequately represent the school, rendering the inquirer's underlying conflict unwaivable under Rule 1.7(b)(1), the imputed conflict may still be waivable if other lawyers in the firm reasonably believe that they could provide competent and diligent representation to the school. See N.Y. State 968 ¶25 (2013).

9. We have addressed only those constraints arising from the rules of legal ethics. There may also be relevant legal rules in statutes or regulations relating to employees of the school district, or in internal policies of the school district or law firm. The inquirer would be well advised to consult any such rules, as they may limit outside employment or require its disclosure and approval.

CONCLUSION:

10. Even though a lawyer works for a school district as a volunteer or paid sports coach, the lawyer or the lawyer's firm may provide legal services to the school district unless there appears to be a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the school district would be adversely affected by the lawyer's financial or other personal interest as a coach.

TOPIC: Conflict of interest; lawyer and judge with employee in common

DIGEST: The fact that a lawyer's part-time secretary also works on personal matters of a City Court judge related to the lawyer does not preclude the lawyer's appearance before a different City Court judge, but the lawyer must take appropriate steps to protect confidential client information and may not suggest an ability to exercise improper influence.

RULES: 1.6(c); 8.4(e), 8.4(f)

FACTS:

1. Inquiring attorney's son (the "related judge") is a full-time City Court judge, and there is one other full-time judge (the "unrelated judge") in the same court. The related judge was inquiring attorney's law partner before becoming a judge. The inquiry states that the related judge is permitted to hire a part-time secretary "to handle his personal matters" and he would like to hire a secretary who would also work part time in the inquiring attorney's office. In working for the related judge, the secretary "will not be working on the [unrelated] judge's files."

QUESTION:

2. May the inquiring attorney appear in the City Court, before the unrelated judge only, if the inquiring attorney's part-time secretary also works for the related judge as part-time secretary for his private matters?

OPINION:

3. The inquirer does not propose to appear before the related judge. Cf. N.Y. State 725 (1999) (opining that prosecutor may not appear before sibling Town Justice).

4. The inquirer does, however, propose to appear before the unrelated judge. We previously considered a situation in which a lawyer sought to appear before a judge although the lawyer's wife worked as the judge's confidential law assistant. N.Y. State 548 (1983). We found that the law assistant would be required to recuse herself from cases in which her husband appeared. We analyzed the underlying propriety of such appearances as an ethical issue for the judge rather than for the lawyer. Our conclusion was that the judge would not be automatically disqualified from hearing a case in which the lawyer appeared, as long as the law assistant were screened from contact with that case, but that disqualification "may nonetheless be required or appropriate on the facts of circumstances of a particular case." Id.

5. In the current inquiry, a lawyer proposing to appear before a judge has a close familial relationship not to one of the judge's employees, but rather to another judge of the same court. We find the considerations expressed in N.Y. State 548, though based on the Code of Judicial Conduct and the prior Code of Professional Responsibility, to be relevant to the current inquiry under the Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"). A lawyer's familial relationship with one judge does not automatically preclude the lawyer's appearance before another judge in the same court. Additional factors in particular cases could count against the propriety of such appearance, but the only additional factor mentioned in the inquiry, which we address below, is the employment of the same secretary by the lawyer and the related judge.

6. We rely on the inquiry's representation that the secretary will not work on any court cases assigned to the unrelated judge, and we take it that this would be true even if, for example, the unrelated judge were unavailable at a particular time and the related judge had occasion to handle one of the matters ordinarily assigned to the unrelated judge. Limiting our analysis to the ethical question posed, we do not consider other questions such as the legal propriety of the arrangements to compensate the secretary for handling the related judge's personal matters.

7. The contemplated kinds of employment relationships are not specifically addressed by any of the Rules. Nor would more general ethical provisions and the rules of judicial disqualification, such as discussed in N.Y. State 725 and N.Y. State 548, prohibit the proposed conduct. See, e.g., Rule 8.4(f) (prohibiting lawyer's conduct in connection with a judge only when the lawyer knowingly assists the judge in conduct "that is a violation of applicable rules of judicial conduct or other law"). The inquiring lawyer is not automatically precluded from appearing before the unrelated judge on account of having an employee in common with a different judge, any more than appearing before the unrelated judge would be automatically precluded by the inquirer's familial relationship with that different judge.

8. The inquiring lawyer must, however, be mindful of the need to protect confidential client information and must fulfill the obligation under Rule 1.6(c) to "exercise reasonable care to prevent the lawyer's employees . . . from disclosing or using confidential information of a client." A secretary who will also be working part time in another law office should be given appropriate instructions about the importance of maintaining confidentiality while at that other office. Particular situations may call for renewed and more tailored warnings to the secretary. For example, if and when the secretary works on one of the lawyer's cases before the unrelated judge, or even a case in some other court involving parties or issues related to a case in the City Court, the duty of reasonable care may require the lawyer to highlight the need to maintain client confidentiality at the office of the related judge. See also Rule 5.3(a) (degree of lawyer's required supervision over nonlawyer depends on factors including likelihood that ethical problems might arise in course of working on the matter).

9. The inquirer must also be careful, as required by Rule 8.4(e)(1), not to state or imply an ability "to influence improperly or upon irrelevant grounds any tribunal, legislative body or public official." This proscription is equally applicable to the familial relationship and the shared employment relationship. For example, when negotiating a case pending in City Court, the lawyer should not gratuitously volunteer to other parties to the negotiation that the attorney's son is a judge in that court or that the lawyer's secretary also works for that judge.

CONCLUSION:

10. A lawyer's appearance before the one of two City Court judges who is not related to the lawyer is not precluded by the circumstance that the lawyer's part-time secretary is also employed part time as secretary for personal matters by the judge related to the lawyer, but the lawyer must comply with Rules 1.6(c) and 8.4(e)(1).

OPINION 996 (01/03/2014)

TOPIC: Escrowed client funds

DIGEST: Client funds in a lawyer's escrow account may not be shielded from lawyer's creditor by transferring them to an escrow account held by the lawyer's lawyer.

RULES: 1.15; 8.4

FACTS:

1. The inquiring lawyer ("L1") represents another lawyer ("L2") who owes money to a third party. As part of that representation, L1 is trying to negotiate an installment payment agreement with the third party, but has been unsuccessful. L1 is concerned that L2's creditor may seek to levy on L2's escrow account, which contains unearned advance payment retainers paid by L2's clients. So as to protect those funds, L2 would like to transfer the funds to L1, to be held in L1's escrow account. So long as the funds belong to L2's clients and L2 continues to represent those clients, L1 would maintain the funds in L1's escrow account; once L2 earns the funds, L1 would disburse them in whatever manner L2 directs.

QUESTION:

2. May L2 properly transfer the unearned advance payment retainers from L2's escrow account to L1's escrow account, and may L1 receive those funds, for the purpose of protecting the funds from levy by a third party?

OPINION:

3. The inquiry is governed by Rule 1.15 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct ("the Rules"). Rule 1.15(a) provides: "A lawyer in possession of any funds or other property belonging to another person, where such possession is incident to his or her practice of law, is a fiduciary, and must not misappropriate such funds or property or commingle such funds or property with his or her own." Rule 1.15(b)(1) provides in part that funds belonging to another person but in the lawyer's possession incident to the practice of law shall be maintained in a special account or accounts "in the lawyer's own name, or in the name of a firm of lawyers of which the lawyer is a member, or in the name of the lawyer or firm of lawyers by whom the lawyer is employed."

4. The funds at issue are advance payment retainers from L2's clients that have been paid to, but not yet earned by, L2. See N.Y. State 983 ¶5 & n.6 (2013) (distinguishing advance payment retainers from general retainers). L2 may agree with those clients to treat such funds as belonging to the clients until earned, or alternatively, to treat the funds as belonging to L2 subject to an obligation to return any ultimately unearned amounts to L2's clients. See N.Y. State 983 ¶4 (2013); N.Y. State 816 ¶¶ 4-7 (2007). The inquiry does not explicitly state whether L2's clients agreed with L2 on one of these options. However, it does state that the funds are being maintained in L2's escrow account. We assume that the funds are being held in that account properly, which is to say that the funds do not yet belong to L2, but rather are being treated as belonging to L2's clients until earned. See N.Y. State 983 ¶4; N.Y. State 816 ¶ 5. Because the funds currently belong to persons other than L2, but are in L2's possession incident to the practice of law, they constitute property subject to Rule 1.15.

5. Under Rule 1.15, L2 must continue to maintain these advance payment retainers belonging to L2's clients in L2's escrow account. That requirement is subject to client direction, in that L2 must comply with any given client's request for disbursement of that client's funds. See Rule 1.15(c)(4). But there is no suggestion in the current inquiry that any client has requested that L2 disburse escrow funds to L1, much less that all the clients have done so, as would be required for L2 to pursue the proposed course of action. Absent such direction from all affected clients and as long as the funds remain unearned, L2 may not transfer them to L1 or anyone else other than the clients to whom the money belongs.

6. We note some matters beyond the scope of our response. There are legal questions about whether the proposed transfer of the client's escrowed funds would tend to serve the purpose of avoiding levy by L2's creditor. These include the questions whether the funds in the L2's escrow account, which are unearned retainer fees not yet belonging to L2, would even be subject to levy under the circumstances, and whether the funds, if they could appropriately be transferred to the L1's escrow account, would be any better protected from the creditor. The Committee does not opine on questions of law as opposed to ethics, and in any event, the propriety of the proposed transfer does not turn on its efficacy.

7. Another kind of legal question is more relevant to ethical propriety. L1 does not ask about the lawfulness of the proposed transfer of the client's escrowed funds for the purpose of avoiding levy by the L2's creditor, but the propriety of the proposed conduct depends in part on whether such conduct is known by L1 or L2 to be in violation of law. Under the facts presented, L1 already is representing L2 in negotiating with the creditor, those negotiations have been unsuccessful, and L2 and L1 are contemplating the transfer from L2 to L1 for the specific purpose of protecting the L2's escrowed funds from being levied upon by the creditor. It is relevant to consider whether there would be anything fraudulent about the proposed transfer or whether, for example, L1 and L2 might reasonably believe that the purpose of transfer would be to protect from a wrongful rather than a legitimate attempt to levy. We note only that whether the proposed transfer would be fraudulent or otherwise unlawful, although a legal question, would implicate various rules of legal ethics. See Rule 1.2(d) (a lawyer shall not "counsel a client to engage, or assist a client, in conduct that the lawyer knows is illegal or fraudulent, except that the lawyer may discuss the legal consequences of any proposed course of conduct with a client"); Rule 8.4(b) (a lawyer shall not "engage in illegal conduct that adversely reflects on the lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness as a lawyer"); Rule 8.4(c) (a lawyer shall not "engage in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation").

8. If L1 and L2 were free under Rule 1.15 to engage in the proposed transfer of funds, then they would need to consider legal questions such as those mentioned above, and the ethical consequences of the answers to those questions. However, because the proposed transfer would violate Rule 1.15, they need not reach such issues.

CONCLUSION:

9. Funds held by a lawyer as advance payment retainers belonging to the attorney's clients and not yet earned by the lawyer must be held in the lawyer's escrow account and may not be transferred into the escrow account of another lawyer who represents the attorney holding the advance payments.

OPINION 997 (01/24/2014)

TOPIC: Payment for evidence

DIGEST: A lawyer may in general pay for physical evidence in connection with contemplated or pending litigation, and such payment may be contingent on the outcome of the matter. There are limitations, however, such as when the transaction involves witness payments or the prospect of false evidence.

RULES: 1.1(c), 1.8(e), 3.4(b), 8.4(d)

FACTS:

1. A lawyer represents a plaintiff in a personal injury action arising out of an automobile accident.

2. A store surveillance camera recorded the events at issue, apparently showing that the defendant's actions caused the accident. The storeowner has contacted the lawyer and has offered to provide the surveillance tape for a payment.

QUESTIONS:

3. May a lawyer purchase video surveillance evidence from a third party on behalf of a client?

4. If a lawyer purchases such evidence, may the amount of the payment be contingent upon the outcome of the matter?

OPINION:

5. This inquiry raises a narrow question regarding the propriety, under the Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"), of purchasing physical evidence for use in contemplated or pending litigation. We therefore do not address various related but different questions about the acquisition or use of physical evidence.[1]

6. Nothing in the Rules explicitly prohibits paying for evidence, nor do we perceive any implied prohibition. Such payment may, depending on the circumstances, be an appropriate means of advancing a client's interests. See Rule 1.1(c)(1) (lawyer shall not intentionally "fail to seek the objectives of the client through reasonably available means permitted by law and these Rules"); Rule 1.8(e), Cmts. [9B] & [10] (discussing rule that lawyer may not advance or guarantee financial assistance to client, subject to exceptions for court costs and litigation expenses, including "the costs of obtaining and presenting evidence").

1 For example, we do not address the admissibility of the purchased evidence. Nor do we address factors bearing on a lawyer's choice between seeking to obtain evidence by purchase or subpoena. See CPLR 3122(d) ("reasonable production expenses of a non-party witness shall be defrayed by the party seeking discovery"). Moreover, this opinion presumes that the evidence in question is acquired legally, and we do not address circumstances in which evidence is acquired in violation of another's rights, or acquired for purposes of alteration, suppression or other obstruction, which would require a separate analysis of the facts and circumstances under Rules 4.4 and 8.4, respectively.

7. However, while it is permissible in general for a lawyer to pay for evidence, particular circumstances may give rise to important limitations on that practice.

8. First is the prohibition of knowingly offering or using false evidence. See Rule 3.3(a)(3). A lawyer who knows that a surveillance videotape has been fraudulently altered may not offer or use that videotape. Nor may the lawyer evade that Rule by remaining willfully blind to the falsity of the videotape. See N.Y. State 993 ¶9 n.4 (2013) (addressing conscious-avoidance doctrine applied to ethics context).

9. Second, to offer the surveillance tape in evidence, the lawyer may need to offer foundation testimony by the person who has offered the tape for sale. When it is foreseeable that the lawyer will have occasion to call that person as a witness, either to authenticate the tape or for any other reason, then the lawyer will be subject to ethical limitations on witness payments:

> A lawyer shall not . . . pay, offer to pay or acquiesce in the payment of compensation to a witness contingent upon the content of the witness's testimony or the outcome of the matter. A lawyer may advance, guarantee or acquiesce in the payment of:
> > (1) reasonable compensation to a witness for the loss of time in attending, testifying, preparing to testify or otherwise assisting counsel, and reasonable related expenses . . .

Rule 3.4(b); see N.Y. State 962 (2013) (discussing "reasonable related expenses" permitted by Rule 3.4(b)(1)); N.Y. State 668 (1994) (discussing "reasonable compensation" as permitted by predecessor rule and also current Rule 3.4(b)(1)).

10. Of course a lawyer may not circumvent the restrictions of Rule 3.4(b) by disguising witness payments in whole or part as payments for physical evidence. On the other hand, the restrictions do not apply except to the extent that there is actual or proposed compensation to a witness. By the terms of the Rule, the limitations – including the prohibition of payment contingent on the matter's outcome – do not apply to purely physical as opposed to testimonial evidence.

11. Third, particular circumstances of payment for evidence could give rise to concerns about the reliability of that evidence. Such concerns may be heightened when, for example, the evidence in question is readily susceptible to alteration that is difficult to detect; when the payment for the evidence seems disproportionately large; and when a person involved in the transaction otherwise acts in ways raising suspicion about the integrity of the evidence. On sufficiently extreme facts, the purchase in such a case could amount to an ethical violation. See Rule 8.4(d) (lawyer shall not "engage in conduct that is prejudicial to the administration of justice"). While we cannot specify in the abstract all the circumstances that could rise to the level of a violation, a trial court would be positioned to assess the facts of a particular case and fashion appropriate remedies. Cf. Caldwell v. Cablevision Systems Corp., 20 N.Y.3d 365 (2013) (citing Rule 3.4(b), noting concern about "what appears to be a substantial payment to a fact witness in exchange for minimal testimony" and "such a disproportionate fee for a short amount of time at trial," and concluding that trial court should have given a special jury instruction as to potential bias of the paid witness).

12. However, when these limitations are not triggered by particular circumstances, a lawyer may purchase surveillance video from a third party for use as evidence in contemplated or pending litigation. There is no requirement that the cost of purchasing evidence be charged to the client immediately, or in some cases, even ultimately. See Rule 1.8(e)(1)-(3) and Cmts. [9B] & [10] (providing that lawyer may "advance" expenses of litigation such as costs of obtaining evidence, "the repayment of which may be contingent on the outcome of the matter," and may "pay" such costs for indigent or pro bono clients and in contingent fee matters).

CONCLUSION:

13. A lawyer may in general purchase video surveillance evidence on behalf of a client for use in connection with contemplated or pending litigation. There is no per se rule against such payments being contingent on case outcome. The lawyer's conduct may be subject to limitations, however, such as when the conduct also involves witness payments or the prospect of false evidence.

OPINION 998 (02/05/2014)

TOPIC: Confidential information; criminal conduct

DIGEST: Lawyers who become aware of fraudulent conduct by buyer and seller in a real estate transaction, including delivery of a fraudulent check in payment of the fee of buyer's lawyer, may not disclose attempted or completed fraud unless necessary to withdraw a representation by the lawyer still being relied upon; to the extent necessary to collect the fee; or where required by other law.

RULES: 1.6(b), 3.3

FACTS:

1. Buyer, seller and the mortgage-holding lender agreed to a short-sale residential real estate transaction. A short sale is a transaction in which the holder of a mortgage on the property consents to release its lien in a sale for less than the outstanding amount of its loan. Such a sale is often an alternative to initiating a foreclosure proceeding. In this case, buyer and seller secretly agreed prior to the closing (and without informing their lawyers) that the buyer would pay the seller an amount in addition to the amount being paid to the mortgage holder. At the closing, the buyer and seller signed affidavits swearing that there had been no side agreements and that no money would be exchanged outside of the approved arrangements. Buyer delivered checks to pay the broker's fee and to pay the buyer's own lawyer. Unbeknownst to counsel for either party, the buyer also delivered to the seller a check for the additional amount on which they had agreed.

2. The closing was completed, and a day or two later, the broker, seller and buyer's attorney all discovered that the checks they had received were fraudulent. (The buyer otherwise had used non-fraudulent checks to consummate the closing.) The account on which the fraudulent checks were drawn did not exist. The seller asked the seller's attorney for advice regarding the fraudulent check the seller had received, resulting in that attorney also learning about the side agreement and ultimately about the other fraudulent checks. We are told, and it seems reasonable to conclude, that the side agreement was an attempt to defraud, if not an actual fraud upon, the mortgage holder.

QUESTION:

3. In a short-sale residential real estate transaction in which buyer and seller may have, without the knowledge of their lawyers, committed a fraud on the lender, and buyer has also issued fraudulent checks to buyer's attorney and others involved in the transaction, may or must the lawyers reveal the fraudulent conduct to the lender or law enforcement authorities?

OPINION:

4. The critical facts here – that the buyer and seller had agreed on and attempted to consummate a side payment and swore affidavits to the contrary, and the buyer's issuance of fraudulent checks – are clearly "confidential information" within the meaning of Rule 1.6 of the Rules of Professional Conduct. Rule 1.6(a) defines "confidential information" as follows:

> "Confidential information" consists of information gained during or relating to the representation of a client, whatever its source, that is (a) protected by the attorney-client privilege, (b) likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed, or (c) information that the client has requested be kept confidential.

The information here was gained during or relating to the representation of each lawyer's client. In N.Y. State 866 (2011), we opined that the term "during" in Rule 1.6 should not be read to be purely temporal, but rather "implies some connection between the lawyer's activities on behalf of the client and the lawyer's acquisition of the information – for example, if the lawyer learned the information because of the lawyer-client relationship." Id. ¶ 17 (footnote omitted). The seller's lawyer clearly learned the information during the course of his representation of the seller in this sense – indeed, the lawyer learned it in the course of a request for legal advice. The buyer's lawyer might have learned the information after the end of the representation, and thus not "during" the representation, but the information clearly "relat[ed] to" the representation.[2]

5. Moreover, the disclosure of that information by either lawyer is likely to be detrimental to that lawyer's client: the fact that the buyer and seller apparently defrauded the lender would be detrimental to each client if disclosed; the disclosure of the buyer's delivery of fraudulent checks would clearly be detrimental to the buyer; the disclosure of that fact likely would be detrimental to the seller as well, because it would likely lead to disclosure of the apparently illegal side agreement. Under Rule 1.6(a), each side's lawyer is therefore barred from revealing this information unless his or her client gives informed consent or the disclosure is permitted by Rule 1.6(b).

6. Rule 1.6(b) merely authorizes, but does not require, disclosure in the circumstances enumerated therein (and discussed below), and no other rule requires disclosure of confidential information in the present case. Another rule, Rule 3.3, does compel disclosure of confidential information, but it is inapplicable here. Rule 3.3 provides, among other things, that a lawyer who knows that a person has engaged in criminal or fraudulent conduct related to a proceeding before a tribunal must take remedial measures, including, if necessary, disclosure of confidential information. But Rule 3.3 only applies to lawyers who represent clients before a tribunal and only to criminal or fraudulent conduct related to a proceeding before the tribunal. Here, the lawyers do not represent clients before a tribunal and there is no applicable proceeding.

7. Turning to the permissive-disclosure provisions of the Rules, Rule 1.6(b) contains several exceptions to the obligation not to reveal confidential information. There are five exceptions that merit discussion here:

> A lawyer may reveal or use confidential information to the extent that the lawyer reasonably believes necessary: . . .
> (2) to prevent the client from committing a crime;
> (3) to withdraw a written or oral opinion or representation previously given by the lawyer and reasonably believed by the lawyer still to be relied upon by a third person,

2 Cf. Levitt v. Brooks, 669 F.3d 100, 104 (2d Cir. 2012) (disclosure of client's "vulgar remark" relating to fee dispute did not violate Rule 1.6 because "remark contained no material information beyond the use of profanity directed at counsel").

> where the lawyer has discovered that the opinion or representation was based on materially inaccurate information or is being used to further a crime or fraud; . . . .
> (5) (i) to defend the lawyer or the lawyer's employees and associates against an accusation of wrongful conduct; or
> (ii) to establish or collect a fee; or
> (6) when permitted or required under these Rules or to comply with other law or court order.

8. Rule 1.6(b)(2) permits disclosure to prevent the client from committing a crime, but not to remedy a past crime.[3] Here, it appears that each of the potential crimes was complete before the lawyers learned of it. The Comments to this Rule recognize that some crimes are continuing crimes, and state that a lawyer "whose services were involved in the criminal acts that constitute a continuing crime may reveal the client's refusal to bring an end to a continuing crime, even though that disclosure may also reveal the client's past wrongful acts . . . ." Rule 1.6, Cmt. [6D]; see also N.Y. State 866 ¶ 26 (2011) (discussing disclosure of continuing crimes). While we do not opine on questions of law, as opposed to ethics, the frauds here do not appear to be continuing crimes, so Rule 1.6(b)(2) does not appear to be applicable.

9. Rule 1.6(b)(3) permits disclosure to the extent reasonably believed necessary to withdraw a written or oral opinion or representation that was based on materially inaccurate information and that the lawyer reasonably believes is still being relied upon by a third person. We do not know whether either lawyer might have given a representation upon which any third person – presumably, the lender – is still relying. If either lawyer gave a representation implying the absence of fraud in the transaction, it may be possible to conclude that the lender is continuing to rely on that representation in not pursuing remedies against the buyer and seller for their attempted fraud.

10. Rule 1.6(b)(5)(i) permits a lawyer to disclose confidential information to defend the lawyer against an accusation of wrongful conduct. On the facts known to us, there does not appear to have been any accusation of wrongful conduct leveled against either lawyer. Unless and until such an accusation is made, this exception to the bar on disclosure of confidential information is inapplicable.

11. Rule 1.6(b)(5)(ii) permits a lawyer to disclose confidential information to collect a fee. The buyer's lawyer thus would be entitled to disclose confidential information to the extent necessary to collect the fee that was purportedly paid with a fraudulent check. Any such disclosure would need to be limited, however. See Rule 1.6 Cmt. [14] ("a disclosure adverse to the client's interest should be no greater than the lawyer reasonably believes necessary to accomplish the purpose"); N.Y. State 980 ¶¶ 5-6 (2013) (discussing limitations on authorization to reveal information to collect fee). For example, the buyer's lawyer might reasonably conclude that the Rule does not authorize disclosure of the side agreement for the secret payment, but only the use of the fraudulent check to pay the lawyer's fee. The lawyer will also need to consider whether reporting the fraud to law enforcement authorities is reasonably necessary to collect the fee. Ordinarily, one need not report a crime in order to initiate a civil action to collect damages caused by the criminal conduct, but we do not exclude that in certain circumstances a lawyer could reasonably conclude that such reporting is necessary. Cf. N.Y. State 980 (2013) (addressing whether disclosure of fact that client had been "working off the books" was necessary to collect fee in bankruptcy proceeding); N.Y. State 684 (1996) (concluding that lawyer could not disclose to credit bureau client's failure to pay fee because disclosure was not necessary to collect fee).

3 We note that New York has not adopted the ABA version of the exceptions, which include a provision that a lawyer may reveal confidential information to the extent the lawyer reasonably believes necessary "to prevent, mitigate or rectify substantial injury to the financial interests or property of another that is reasonably certain to result or has resulted from the client's commission of a crime or fraud in furtherance of which the client has used the lawyer's services." ABA Model Rule of Prof. Conduct 1.6(b)(3). New York's rule thus provides a significantly narrower scope to reveal information about already completed crimes than the ABA model.

12. Finally, Rule 1.6(b)(6) permits disclosure to the extent reasonably believed necessary "when permitted or required under these Rules or to comply with other law or court order." There are statutes that require reporting information about some crimes, or that at least prohibit concealment of such information, though the obligations they impose may be limited by judicial consideration of ethical principles.[4] As our jurisdiction is limited to questions of legal ethics under the Rules, we express no view as to whether other law may require disclosure here.

13. There is nothing anomalous about our conclusion that the lawyers may not be able to disclose the frauds to law enforcement authorities. There are various circumstances in which confidentiality obligations prevent a lawyer from exercising the full set of remedies for wrongful conduct available to others, even when the lawyer has suffered the consequences of the wrongful conduct. See, e.g., Simon's New York Rules of Professional Conduct Annotated 215 (2013 ed.) (explaining rule that lawyer may reveal confidential information relating to future but not past crimes on ground that "preventing client crimes is more important than the duty of confidentiality, but solving crimes is not"); N.Y. City 1994-1 (citing cases for proposition that where an attorney "was pursuing a common law remedy, several courts have not permitted in-house attorneys to sue former employers for retaliatory termination, basing their conclusion on the confidential nature of the attorney-client relationship and the ethical requirements relating to clients' confidences and secrets").

14. Finally, we note that even though the lawyers might be barred from disclosing the information at issue here voluntarily, that does not answer the question whether they might be compelled to disclose it. Some of the information may be protected from compulsory process by attorney-client privilege, such as any facts about the side agreement that were revealed by client to lawyer in confidence. But some of the information at issue here may be confidential for reasons other than the attorney-client privilege, and thus the lawyers may be compelled to disclose it. For example, the receipt of the fraudulent check might well not be privileged. See In re Subpoena to Testify Before the Grand Jury, 39 F.3d 973, 976 (9th Cir. 1994) (identity of client who paid lawyer with counterfeit bill was "entirely distinct from the matter in which the client sought the lawyer's services. It was therefore unprotected by the privilege.").

4 See, e.g., Wayne LaFave, Substantive Criminal Law § 13.6 & n.86 (2013) ("There is a misprision of felony statute in the United States Code, but it is not a true misprision statute in that it requires an act of concealment in addition to failure to disclose."); People v. Belge, 83 Misc. 2d 186, 372 N.Y.S.2d 798 (Co. Ct. Onondaga) (dismissing, on grounds of attorney-client privilege and in interests of justice, indictment of lawyer for failure to report, under Public Health Law §§ 4143 (requirement to report death occurring without medical attendance) and 4200 (duty of decent burial), where location of murder victim's body had been disclosed in attorney-client communication), aff'd, 50 A.D.2d 1088, 376 N.Y.S.2d 771 (4th Dept. 1975), aff'd, 41 N.Y.2d 60, 390 N.Y.S.2d 867 (1976); Stephen Gillers, Guns, Fruits, Drugs, and Documents: A Criminal Defense Lawyer's Responsibility for Real Evidence, 63 Stan. L. Rev. 813, 829-46 (2011) (discussing criminal statutes and court cases dealing with disclosure of evidence of a crime).

CONCLUSION:

15. Neither the buyer's lawyer nor the seller's lawyer may disclose the apparent fraud on the lender or the delivery of fraudulent checks, except (i) to the extent reasonably believed necessary to withdraw any opinion or representation made by the lawyer asserting the absence of such conduct where the lender is reasonably believed still to be relying on such opinion or representation, (ii) where required by other law, or (iii) by the buyer's lawyer, to the extent reasonably believed necessary to collect the lawyer's fee.

TOPIC: Marital Mediation and referrals.

DIGEST: An attorney who works exclusively in the field of Marital Mediation, with a stated goal "to help couples resolve problems and stay together", may ethically refer such couples to the attorney's spouse, a psychiatrist, who has volunteered to provide two free couples-counseling sessions to such couples.

RULES: 1.7; 2.4(a); 2.4(b); and 8.4.

QUESTION:

1. May an attorney who works exclusively in the field of marital mediation, with a stated goal: "to help couples resolve problems and stay together" ethically refer couples to the attorney's spouse, a psychiatrist who has volunteered to provide two free couples-counseling sessions to such couples?

OPINION:

2. Rule 2.4(a) is entitled: "Lawyer Serving as Third Party Neutral" and provides that, "a lawyer serves as a third-party neutral when the lawyer assists two or more persons who are not clients of the lawyer to reach a resolution of a dispute or other matter that has arisen between them." Since the inquiring attorney is engaging in neutral mediation, that attorney is not representing clients.

3. The attorney serving as a third-party neutral must be mindful of the obligations imposed by Rule 2.4(b), which requires that, "a lawyer serving as a third-party neutral shall inform unrepresented parties that the lawyer is not representing them." Additionally, should it become apparent that "a party does not understand the lawyer's role in the matter, the lawyer shall explain the difference between the lawyer's role as a third-party neutral and a lawyer's role as one who represents a client."

4. Because the lawyer is not engaging in the representation of a client or clients during the course of the mediation, the lawyer would not have a personal interest conflict under Rule 1.7 (Rule 1.7 applies only to client representation).

5. With respect to the attorney/inquirer's spouse's offer to provide two free "couples-counseling" sessions to the mediating parties, the attorney/inquirer must also be mindful of Rule 8.4(c), which provides that an attorney must not engage in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation." It may be that under the circumstances Rule 8.4(c) would require the attorney/inquirer to make clear disclosures that the psychiatrist is in fact the spouse of the attorney and also that the two free sessions might not be sufficient to resolve every issue between the parties and that therefore the attorney could conceivably derive an indirect benefit from fees charged to the parties by the attorney/inquirer's spouse for work beyond the two free sessions.

6. The attorney should be aware that even though a neutral mediator is not representing a client, the lawyer neutral may still be practicing law, and other Rules may apply. See N.Y. State 979 (2013); N.Y. State 678 (1996).

CONCLUSION:

7. The attorney inquirer may make the referral to the attorney inquirer's psychiatrist spouse subject to the cautions identified above.

OPINION 1000 (03/28/2014)

TOPIC: Payment of Legal Fees by a Non-Client Whose Interests Could Be Adverse to the Lawyer's Client

DIGEST: It is permissible for a third-party to pay for a lawyer's representation of a client where the client's interests may be adverse to the interests of the third-party payer if: 1) the lawyer obtains the informed consent of the lawyer's client and 2) the lawyer exercises independent professional judgment on the client's behalf without interference from the potentially adverse third-party payer. That the lawyer may be owed additional fees from the client does not pose a conflict unless the outstanding debt interferes with the lawyer's ability to represent the client.

RULES: 1.0(e), 1.6, 1.7(a), 1.8(f); 1.16(b)(5), 4.3.

QUESTION:

1. The inquiring lawyer asks whether the lawyer may accept payment of a retainer fee from the client's sibling to pursue an appeal on behalf of the client notwithstanding that the appeal could be adverse to the interests of the sibling and that the client remains in arrears on fees owed to the lawyer for work on proceedings giving rise to the appeal. We conclude that the lawyer may do so if the lawyer complies with Rule of Professional Conduct 1.8(f) concerning payments of fees by persons other than the client and if the third-party payer understands that the lawyer's obligations run solely to the client. That the client owes the lawyer additional fees from prior work is not an obstacle to this conclusion unless the debt gives rise to a conflict of interest with the client for which informed consent is not a remedy.

BACKGROUND:

2. The inquirer is a New York lawyer who represents one of two siblings in a dispute arising out of the incapacity of their now-deceased parent. Before the parent died, the client sued for removal of the non-client sibling as guardian of the parent. The court ruled in favor of the non-client sibling on the guardianship issue and awarded attorney's fees from the parent's assets. The parent thereafter died, but the appeal of the award of attorney's fees lives on.

3. The prevailing non-client sibling, apparently unhappy with the amount of the award of attorneys' fees, has paid the inquiring lawyer a retainer from the parent's estate to enable the lawyer's client to pursue an appeal of the attorney's fee award. One of the arguments the inquirer will make on the appeal is that the non-client sibling should be held personally liable for the attorney's fee.

4. The inquirer's client has not satisfied the terms of their fee arrangement for services rendered in connection with the trial-level disputes underlying the appeal. The inquirer is concerned that the inquirer's personal financial interest in being paid for the earlier services could give rise to a conflict between the lawyer and the lawyer's client.

ANALYSIS:

5. Rule of Professional Conduct 1.8(f) deals with third-party payment of attorneys' fees. That Rule states that a "lawyer shall not accept compensation for representing a client from one other than the client unless (1) the client gives informed consent; (2) there is no interference with the lawyer's independent professional judgment or with the client-lawyer relationship and (3) information relating to the representation of the client is protected as required by Rule 1.6," which requires a lawyer to maintain the confidential information of the client. Simply put, Rule 1.8(f) means that a lawyer owes a client the same duties owed to a client without regard to the source of the fees the lawyer is paid, with the added proviso that a client must give "informed consent" to the arrangement.

6. Rule 1.0(e) defines "informed consent" as "the agreement by a person to a proposed course of conduct after the lawyer has communicated adequate information and explanation about the material risks of and reasonably available alternatives to the proposed course of conduct." We have a number of opinions that apply these principles to various scenarios. See, e.g., N.Y. State 901 (2011) and 867 (2011). Whether a lawyer conveys "adequate information" to constitute "informed consent" varies with the facts and circumstances in which the lawyer seeks consent and involves many factors including the proposed course of conduct, the sophistication of the client as a consumer of legal services, and risks attending the particular representation. Under these specific facts the inquiring lawyer cannot obtain informed consent without clarifying that the lawyer's duty runs solely to the client, that the non-client payer will not affect the lawyer's exercise of independent professional judgment on the client's behalf on the appeal, and, most important, that the non-client payer's interests may be adverse to the client's interests on the appeal, with particular emphasis on the fact that the non-client sibling may be found personally liable for the attorneys' fees.

7. It is common for third parties to pay attorney's fees. Mortgagors commonly pay lenders' legal fees in real estate closings. In 2007, in N.Y. State 818, we acknowledged and approved the regular practice of issuers paying the legal fees of designated underwriters' counsel assuming compliance with DR 5-107(B), the predecessor of Rule 1.8(f), provided there was disclosure of conflicts accompanying the arrangement. We said the same in 1989, in N.Y. State 601, although there we disapproved the proposal because the fee arrangement provided a financial incentive for the lawyer to subordinate the interests of the lawyer's clients (tenants) if the lawyer achieved a settlement with the adverse third-party payer (the landlord).

8. Here, the non-client sibling is willing to finance the appeal without condition and knows that a result of the appeal could be that the non-client-sibling would have to pay the attorneys' fee. The lawyer's full disclosure to the lawyer's client must necessarily entail disclosure of the lawyer's discussions with the non-client payer.[5]

9. Accordingly, the lawyer should leave no doubt in the third-party payer's mind concerning the potential consequences of the appeal for which the payment is being made. We do not mean thereby to suggest that a lawyer who receives payment from a third-party payer in compliance with Rule

5 If the estate is not represented by counsel the lawyer must abide by Rule 4.3. This Rule provides, in relevant part, that, if the lawyer knows or reasonably should know that a possibility of adversity exists, the lawyer must explain that the lawyer is not disinterested in the matter, and should not provide legal advice to the person in the circumstances other than the advice to obtain independent counsel.

1.8(f) must always undertake this responsibility. To the contrary, in most instances, we would expect that the third-party payer is fully mindful of the potential for adversity in the lawyer's representation of a client under some form of indemnity duty, whether contractual or otherwise.

10. Finally, that the inquirer's client is in arrears on fees for prior services is insufficient to suggest that the lawyer has a conflict in representing the client on the appeal. While under Rule 1.7 a lawyer may not represent a client when a lawyer's personal interests conflict with those of the client, it provides a lawyer may obtain a client's informed consent to proceed despite the conflict if the lawyer "reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation" of the client. Sometimes, clients do not pay their lawyers, and this fact alone does not invariably negate a "reasonable belief" that a lawyer will be able to "provide competent and diligent" representation to the client. If the lawyer concludes that the lawyer is able to "provide competent and diligent representation" of the client on the appeal, see Rule 1.7(b), then the mere existence of the debt does not ethically disable the lawyer from obtaining informed consent from the client to proceed with the appeal.

CONCLUSION:

11. A lawyer may accept a retainer from a third-party payer whose interests are potentially adverse to the lawyer's client's interests if the lawyer complies with Rule of Professional Conduct 1.8(f) concerning payments of fees by persons other than the client and if the third-party fee-payer understands that the lawyer's obligations run solely to the client. That the client owes the lawyer an additional fee from prior work is not an obstacle to this conclusion unless the debt gives rise to such adversity with the client that the lawyer's representation will be affected by the adversity or the lawyer may not obtain informed consent.

TOPIC: Sale of Third-Party Advertising in Law Firm Brochures and Rules Governing Advertising Brochures with Educational Content

DIGEST: Law firms that distribute brochures with educational content on legal issues of importance to the public may sell advertising in those brochures to third parties, including other law firms, as long as the law firm does not charge rates for the advertising suggestive of improper referral or fee-splitting arrangements. Whether the brochure constitutes lawyer advertising depends on the entirety of the brochure and not only those portions promoting the firm.

RULES: 1.0(a); 1.5(g), 7.1(d), (e), (f), (k), (l), (m), 7.2(a)

QUESTION:

1. The inquiring law firm asks whether the law firm may accept a fee for allowing third parties to advertise in the firm's monthly brochure, which is distributed free of charge through a variety of outlets and contains both articles of legal interest in the areas in which the law firm practices and advertisements, identified as such, for the law firm's services. We see no obstacle in the Rules of Professional Conduct to such a practice subject to the caveats below.

BACKGROUND:

2. The inquirer is a New York law firm that offers professional services in several practice areas. On a monthly basis, the law firm publishes a newsletter containing information about a variety of legal subjects on which the firm concentrates, which is distributed free of charge through several means to clients and non-clients. The content of this newsletter provides analysis of legal issues of importance in the practice areas the law firm offers, but the articles typically conclude with an invitation to call the law firm for additional information. Some articles prominently feature a successful representation by the law firm. The newsletter also prominently features advertisements for the law firm, offering, among other things, free legal consultations, "reasonable" fees, and payment plans for the firm's services. The back cover of the newsletter consists entirely of an advertisement for the firm.

ANALYSIS:

3. The law firm's sole question is whether the law firm may accept advertising for the newsletter from other professionals, including law firms, medical professionals, and others. The law firm states that it will charge a straight fee for this advertising, without any arrangement indicative of referrals, fee-sharing, or other illicit agreements between service providers. The inquiry, then, is essentially whether a lawyer who engages in advertising on the lawyer's own behalf through a regular publication of interest to the public may also sell advertising in the same publication, without any kind of agreement between the publishing law firm and the advertiser. In our view, if the publication complies with New York Rule of Professional Conduct 7.1, then the law firm may provide space in its newsletter to others provided no impermissible conditions accompany the transaction.

4. In so opining, we rely on the law firm's representation that improper factors do not influence the value the law firm receives, if any, for the advertising. For instance, solely for the purpose of promoting good relationships, a law firm may decide to offer at no cost an advertisement for a former colleague who is starting a new law practice, or for a non-lawyer service provider whom the law firm sincerely considers worthy of consideration by persons who receive the brochure. Our concern is not with the price of the advertising but with any explicit or implicit understanding between the publisher and the advertiser suggestive of a fee-splitting or referral arrangement that would violate other Rules of Professional Conduct, including, for example, Rule 1.5(g) and Rule 7.2(a).

5. Although not the subject of the firm's inquiry, we would be remiss if we failed to note that, in our view, the firm's entire newsletter, as presented to us, constitutes "advertising" within the meaning of the Rules of Professional Conduct. Rule 1.0(a) defines "advertisement" to mean "any public or private communications made by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm about the lawyer or law firm's services, the primary purpose of which is for the retention of the lawyer or law firm." Whether a brochure constitutes lawyer advertising depends on the entirety of the brochure and not only those portions promoting the firm. That portions of the newsletter are primarily educational in nature is not dispositive, especially when nine of the twelve pages contain advertisements for the law firm, including the entire back cover; almost all the articles end with an invitation to call the law firm for advice; and several articles begin with questions targeting persons with potential issues and identifying the firm as a firm that may assist with those issues.

6. This means that the provisions of Rule 7.1 apply to the entire newsletter. Among other things, the words "Attorney Advertising" should appear in some form on the first page of the brochure. Rule 7.1(f). These words must be "clearly legible and capable of being read by the average person." Rule 7.1(l). Statements "characterizing the quality of the lawyer's or firm's services" or that are "reasonably likely to create an expectation about the results the lawyer can achieve" – which at least some of the articles in the newsletter can be read to do – must be "accompanied by the following disclaimer: "Prior results do not guarantee a similar outcome." Rules 7.1(d) & (e). Rule 7.1(k) requires the law firm to maintain a copy of the advertisement for at least three years. Rule 7.1(m) says that any fee arrangement offered in an advertisement published at least monthly must be held open until the next issue. This is not intended as an exhaustive list of the issues the inquirer should examine in light of Rule 7.1, which we urge the inquirer to review carefully in publishing future issues.

7. Otherwise, we see no problem with a law firm selling or otherwise offering advertising space in its newsletter to other professionals provided that no other arrangement, such as a referral or other fee, attends the transaction. In our recent Opinion 981, we opined that a law firm may place advertisements for a non-legal service provider in the lawyer's office (in this instance, a home security firm), and that the non-legal service provider may pay the lawyer a fee if someone, whether or not a client of the lawyer, happens to retain the third party as a result of the advertisement being placed in the lawyer's office. We have otherwise concluded that a variety of cross-selling techniques are permissible provided that the lawyer complies with Rule 7.1 and does not transgress rules of fee-splitting, referrals and similar improper practices. See, e.g., N.Y. State 947 (2012) (acquisition of mailing lists); N.Y. State 937 (2012) (cooperative arrangement with a hospital for promotional gifts); N.Y. State 915 (2012) (linking of non-legal websites to a lawyer's website).

CONCLUSION:

8. Law firms that distribute brochures with educational content on legal issues of importance to the public may sell advertising in those brochures to third parties, including other law firms, as long as the publishing law firm does not charge rates for the advertising suggestive of improper referral or fee-splitting arrangements. Whether a brochure constitutes lawyer advertising depends on the entirety of the brochure and not only those portions promoting the firm.

TOPIC: Lawyer's ethical obligations when in possession of lawfully obtained wills containing confidential information in which unknown third parties have an interest

DIGEST: Lawyer appointed as executor to estate of deceased lawyer who had custody of client and non-client wills may access and disclose confidential information in the wills insofar as necessary to learn identity of testator, executor, or beneficiary/ies in order to dispose of wills properly.

RULES: 1.6(a), 1.15(c).

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a lawyer who works as a prosecutor and has been named his father's executor. The inquirer's father was an attorney who had a law firm that dissolved. After the firm's dissolution, the inquirer's father operated as a solo practitioner. The inquirer's father safeguarded wills from his dissolved law firm, and in addition agreed to preserve client wills of other attorneys who either retired, died, or whose firms dissolved. While a solo practitioner, the inquirer's father hired his former secretary to help him in locating and returning original wills to former clients and others who entrusted wills to him, and a large number of wills were so disposed. The inquirer's father also had made provision with another attorney to take over his few remaining clients, but not the remaining wills in his possession. The inquirer seeks guidance for ethical obligations applicable to himself as executor in disposing of several hundred wills, mostly from the 1980s, belonging both to former clients of his father and non-clients.

QUESTIONS:

2. This inquiry requires us to consider three questions. Does the lawyer have an ethical obligation to notify persons with an interest in the wills that he possesses them? Is the lawyer ethically prohibited from inspecting the wills to identify the executors/executrixes and beneficiaries for notification purposes? How may the lawyer ethically dispose of the wills?

OPINION:

3. Although a lawyer who, incident to the lawyer's practice, comes into possession of property in which a third party has an interest has an ethical obligation under Rule 1.15(c) to promptly notify such third party that he or she has possession of the property, the lawyer-executor here does not have such an ethical obligation because he did not come into possession of the wills incident to his practice. Rule 1.15(c) of the Rules of Professional Conduct requires a lawyer to "promptly notify a client or third person of the receipt of funds, securities, or other properties in which the client or third person has an interest[.]" (Emphasis added). Rule 1.15(c) further directs the lawyer to preserve such property, keep complete records and render appropriate accounts, and to promptly pay or deliver the property as requested by the client or third person. The requirements of Rule 1.15(c) expressly apply to a lawyer who receives property in which a third person, who is not the client of the lawyer, has an interest. Subsections (a) and (b)(1) of Rule 1.15 each expressly apply to property or funds of another within the lawyer's possession "incident to the lawyer's practice of law." While that express qualification is not repeated in Rule 1.15(c), we are persuaded that it must necessarily be inferred from the context, including the preceding subsections.

4. Here again, however, it is clear that the inquirer did not come into possession of the wills incident to his practice. Even his father was only safekeeping at least some of the wills prepared by other lawyers. We see no notification obligation under the Rules of Professional Conduct that applies to the inquirer, who merely serves as his father's executor because of the familial relationship, not incident to his practice of law.

5. Turning to the question of confidentiality, in order to make notifications and thereby dispose of the wills that were in his father's possession, he may need to inspect them to identify the testators and/or executors/executrices entitled to receive the wills. The lawyer may ethically do so. Although the wills may contain confidential information protected by the rules of ethics as between the client and the lawyer who prepared the wills, the executor is not prohibited from accessing or disclosing such information to the extent necessary to properly dispose of the wills.

6. We start with our review of a somewhat similar situation in N.Y. State 341 (1974), where a lawyer had a client relationship with the testators of some wills, giving rise to the protections of client confidentiality provided by the Code of Professional Responsibility. Then the lawyer joined a firm, but not all of the lawyer's client relationships continued. Thus, at least for some of the wills in the firm's possession, the relationship was custodial, not professional. The deceased lawyer here likewise had a professional relationship with the makers of some of the wills but only a custodial, non-professional relationship with others.

7. This Committee concluded that a lawyer who receives wills from an attorney who retires from the practice of law "holds them only as a custodian. It is generally unethical for him to examine the wills or files without the clients [sic] consent." This was because, we assumed, the wills likely contain information that was obtained by the lawyer under an ethical obligation to keep the information confidential. We concluded that the firm was required to notify the lawyer's clients of his retirement. We recognized that the client has two rights when a lawyer retires: "First, to retake the will whenever he retires, or direct the ultimate disposition of it, and, second, to have his confidences concerning the will and information relating to it respected." Id.

8. Rule 1.6(a) establishes the client's right to protect confidential information shared with his lawyer. We assume it would apply, at least in part, to information shared by a testator client with a lawyer where, for example, it was requested or intended that the information not be divulged except in certain ways and/or where disclosure would harm the testator. By its plain language, however, Rule 1.6(a) only applies to confidential information "gained during or relating to the representation of a client." Because the inquirer did not receive the wills from a client or during the representation of a client, but as his father's executor, Rule 1.6(a) does not apply to him. Even if it were applicable, Rule 1.6(a) permits disclosure where the client has given informed consent to disclosure or where "disclosure is impliedly authorized to advance the best interests of the client and is either reasonable under the circumstances or customary in the professional community." The purpose of preparing a will is that the testamentary commands and desires eventually be made known in the appropriate circumstances, but not otherwise in many or most cases.

9. For these reasons, we conclude that Rule 1.6(a) does not prohibit the inquirer from accessing or disclosing the confidential information in the wills insofar as reasonably necessary to dispose of the wills. The inquirer should first attempt to identify and contact surviving testators in order to avoid disclosure to other parties where unnecessary.

10. We emphasize that the lawyer should proceed carefully in order to only review or disclose information to the extent necessary for proper will disposal. Cf., N.Y. State 749 (2001) (lawyers may not ethically use available technology to surreptitiously examine and trace email and other electronic documents because such would, among other things, be prejudicial to the administration of justice); N.Y. State 700 (1998) (ethically improper for lawyer to exploit unauthorized communication of confidential information because doing so would, among other things, be prejudicial to the administration of justice). We add that we do not see any ethical reason why the lawyer could not transfer the wills to another custodian, such as a lawyer who could better serve the purpose of proper and timely notification of executors, at least where to do so would be appropriate in discharging the executor's duties and not for an improper purpose proscribed by the Rules. However, transferring them to someone who is not a lawyer and thus not subject to these constraints, combined with other risk factors, might not be viewed has having been impliedly authorized under Rule 1.6(a).

CONCLUSION:

11. To the extent that the lawyer must notify the testators, or executors, or beneficiaries of each of the wills that he possesses that he is holding such property, in order to dispose of them properly, the lawyer may inspect the wills and may transfer them to another custody under certain conditions.

OPINION 1003 (03/31/2014)

TOPIC: Law Firm Name

DIGEST: A lawyer who practices under his full name may use a law firm name that includes only the lawyer's middle name initials and last name, without including his first name.

RULES: 7.5(b), (e)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer's name is John P.J. Jones (fictional name), which is listed on his stationery, business card, and email signature line. The inquirer states that the primary reason he includes his middle initials is that there are other attorneys by the name John Jones.

2. The inquirer plans to leave his current firm and start a solo practice. He has researched available law firm names, including available domain and business entity names, and has found that there are other attorneys named John Jones and that domain names for that name have been taken.

3. The inquirer has determined that "P.J. Jones Law Offices," "The Law Offices of P.J. Jones," or "P.J. Jones Law" would be the best available options for purposes of a domain name, firm name, and marketing because an attorney search of "P.J. Jones" will then usually lead to him first.

4. The inquirer notes that while he wishes to use one of the above proposed firm names, he still plans to practice using his full name, John P.J. Jones, as he has in the past and presently does.

QUESTION:

5. May a lawyer practice under a law firm name that includes only the lawyer's middle name initials and last name, without including his first name?

OPINION:

6. Rule 7.5(b) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct provides, with certain limited exceptions, that a "lawyer in private practice shall not practice under a trade name, a name that is misleading as to the identity of the lawyer or lawyers practicing under such name, or a firm name containing names other than those of one or more of the lawyers in the firm . . . ." As we have noted many times, this rule serves to protect the public from being deceived as to the identity, responsibility or status of those who use the firm name. See N.Y. State 920 (2012); N.Y. State 732 (2000) (applying trade name prohibition in former Code of Professional Responsibility).

7. In N.Y. State 740 (2001), this Committee opined that "[u]sing a name that is not the legal name of one or more partners or former partners in the law firm constitutes [the] use of a trade name" within the meaning of the language contained in Rule 7.5(b). Therefore, we concluded that a lawyer may not place an advertisement in the Yellow Pages in which the lawyer uses the firm name "A", or inserts the letter "A" before the firm name, in order to insure favorable placement.

8. In N.Y. State 920, a solo practitioner believed that his last name was too long and inquired whether he could call his law firm by his initials, "[JDR Law]." We concluded that "[b]ecause the lawyer's initials do not constitute the lawyer's legal name, they would constitute a trade name, and therefore the lawyer is prohibited from practicing under that name." Similarly, in N.Y. State 948 (2012), we opined that a law firm name may not include a variant on the lawyer's name that is created by conjoining the lawyer's initials with an abbreviation of the lawyer's surname. We concluded that the first portion of the proposed firm name that included the conjoined and abbreviated form of the lawyer's name "deviate[d] . . . substantially from the lawyer's actual name, and in that respect is similar to firm names found impermissible in [our prior] opinions . . . ." N.Y. State 948; see also N.Y. County 677 (1990) (firm name may not include first name of one partner and contraction of surname of another partner, as such a name would violate requirement that lawyers practice only under names of lawyers in the firm).

9. In N.Y. State 948 we acknowledged, however, that "[s]ome variations on names may deviate so slightly from the original as not to offend Rule 7.5(b)." Cf. N.Y State 872 (2011) (permissible to use English translation of foreign first name in informal communications, and on business cards and website, if not misleading and if compliant with statutes and court rules). Applying our above precedents, we conclude that the slight name variation proposed by the inquirer here, which maintains his full surname and the initials of two of his three given names and does not add anything to his legal name, does not offend Rule 7.5(b)'s prohibition against the use of trade names. Therefore, the inquirer can drop his first name to formulate a firm name that includes his middle name initials and legal surname. This assumes, however, that the inquirer can ensure that the proposed firm name does not violate the additional prohibition in Rule 7.5(b) against practicing under a firm name that is "misleading as to the identity of the lawyer or lawyers practicing under such name."

10. As we noted in N.Y State 872, the inquirer must also abide by any statutes, court rules, and judicial guidelines that govern an attorney in these circumstances. See, e.g., Judiciary Law § 468 ("Official registration of attorneys to be kept by the chief administrator of the courts"); Part 118 of the Rules of the Chief Administrator of the Courts ("Registration of Attorneys").

11. With regard to domain names, we note that under Rule 7.5(e) "[a] lawyer or law firm may utilize a domain name for an internet web site that does not include the name of the lawyer or law firm" provided certain conditions are met. As further explained in Cmt. [2] to Rule 7.5, "[a]s long as a law firm's name complies with other Rules, it is always proper for a law firm to use its own name or its initials or some abbreviation or variation of its own name as its domain name."

CONCLUSION:

12. A lawyer who practices under his full name may use a law firm name that includes only the lawyer's middle name initials and last name, without including his first name.

OPINION 1004 (04/01/2014)

TOPIC: Attorney's Obligations Regarding Excessive Fee of Counter-Party's Attorney

DIGEST: Where a contract provides that one party pay the counter-party's attorney's fee and that fee is excessive, the attorney for the first party is not ethically prohibited from participating in the transaction. Whether the attorney has an obligation to report the excessive fee of another attorney depends on the circumstances.

RULES: 1.5(a), 8.3, 8.4(a).

FACTS:

1. The inquirer's client is entering into a commercial loan with a bank, and one of the standard terms of the loan is that the borrower pay the bank's attorney's fee. The inquirer characterizes the contemplated transaction as "standard with some nuances." He states that the nuances will not require a great deal of extra drafting beyond the boiler plate document. The inquirer believes that the bank attorney's proposed fee is "at least double the normal fee" charged for this type of transaction. He asked the bank's attorney to reduce his fee, but that attorney refused.

QUESTIONS:

2. Assuming that an attorney's fee – to be paid by the counter-party – is excessive, can the counter-party's lawyer continue to participate in representing his client in this transaction and must that lawyer report the conduct of the fee-charging attorney?

OPINION:

3. As the question of whether the bank's attorney's fee is excessive does not involve the inquirer's own conduct, we are not in a position to resolve that issue. It is worth noting, however, that Rule 1.5(a) sets forth the ethical standard governing the amount of legal fees that can be reasonably charged. It provides that

> A lawyer shall not make an agreement for, charge, or collect an excessive or illegal fee or expense. A fee is excessive when, after a review of the facts, a reasonable lawyer would be left with a definite and firm conviction that the fee is excessive. The factors to be considered in determining whether a fee is excessive may include the following:
> > (1) the time and labor required, the novelty and difficulty of the questions involved, and the skill requisite to perform the legal service properly;
> > (2) the likelihood, if apparent or made known to the client, that the acceptance of the particular employment will preclude other employment by the lawyer;
> > (3) the fee customarily charged in the locality for similar legal services;
> > (4) the amount involved and the results obtained;

(5) the time limitations imposed by the client or by circumstances;

(6) the nature and length of the professional relationship with the client;

(7) the experience, reputation and ability of the lawyer or lawyers performing the services; and

(8) whether the fee is fixed or contingent.

Cmt. [1] to Rule 1.5 observes that the factors specified in paragraphs (a)(1) through (a)(8) are not exclusive and that each factor will not always be relevant. While it has been noted that factor (a)(3)("the fee customarily charged in the locality for similar legal services") is an important factor, see Simon's New York Rules of Professional Conduct Annotated, 2013 Edition, p. 131, it has also been noted that factor (a)(7) ("the experience, reputation and ability of the lawyer or lawyers performing the services") is usually "the most important factor." Id. at 134.

4. We further note that the fact that the fee sought by the bank's attorney is roughly double the fee often charged for similar transactions does not render the fee per se excessive. A high fee is not necessarily an excessive fee. That is because the excessiveness determination requires a consideration of all the relevant factors. For example, we know nothing about "the experience, reputation and ability of the lawyer" performing the services (see Rule 1.5(a)(7)), a critical factor. And the inquirer acknowledges that the prospective transaction does involve "some nuances"; Rule 1.5(a)(1) indicates that the "novelty and difficulty of the questions involved" is relevant to the appropriateness of the fee. An experienced attorney handling a difficult nuance has more leeway to charge a higher fee.

5. Even if the fee is excessive, the inquirer can still ethically participate in the transaction. While Rule 8.4(a) prohibits an attorney from assisting or inducing another to violate the Rules of Professional Conduct, the inquirer did not provide any such assistance or inducement. In Opinion 809, this Committee concluded that a lawyer did not aid in the unauthorized practice of law (as then prohibited by DR 3-101(A) of the Code of Professional Responsibility) where the lawyer, to carry out the representation of one client in a transaction, dealt with a non-lawyer who had been engaged by the client's counter-party. We reasoned that the inquiring lawyer had not caused or encouraged the counter-party's representational situation and was merely continuing to represent his own client in the transaction. The same logic applies to the present inquirer. He did not cause or encourage the counter-party's lawyer to charge a potentially excessive fee. On the contrary, he attempted to negotiate a lower fee.

6. Moreover, even if the fee is excessive, the inquirer does not necessarily have to report the conduct of the bank's attorney. That is because attorneys need not report all ethical violations of which they become aware. Instead, Rule 8.3, which governs the reporting of professional misconduct, provides, in relevant part, that "(a) A lawyer who knows that another lawyer has committed a violation of the Rules of Professional Conduct that raises a substantial question as to that lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness as a lawyer shall report such knowledge to a tribunal or other authority empowered to investigate or act upon such violation" (emphasis added). Cf. Cmt. [2] to Rule 8.4 ("Many kinds of illegal conduct reflect adversely on fitness to practice law. Illegal conduct involving violence, dishonesty, fraud, breach of trust, or serious interference with the administration of justice is illustrative of conduct that reflects adversely on fitness to practice law. A pattern of repeated offenses, even ones of minor significance when considered separately, can indicate indifference to legal obligation").

Thus, even if the inquirer concludes that the bank's attorney's fee is excessive, he is only obligated to report the conduct of the bank attorney if he concludes, under all the circumstances, that the setting of the fee reflects adversely on that attorney's fitness to practice law or involves dishonesty.[6]

CONCLUSION:

7. Where a contract provides that one party pay the counter-party's attorney's fee and that fee is excessive, the attorney for the first party is not ethically prohibited from participating in the transaction. Whether the attorney has an obligation to report the excessive fee of another attorney depends on the circumstances

(47-13)

6 Of course, if the inquirer believes that the bank's attorney's fee is excessive, he is permitted to report the bank's attorney.

OPINION 1005 (04/02/2014)

TOPIC: Whether using the phrases "I KNOW HOW TO WIN FOR YOU" or "unsurpassed litigation skills," violates Rule 7.1.

DIGEST: Neither the statement "I KNOW HOW TO WIN FOR YOU" or "unsurpassed litigation skills" in lawyer advertising is permissible under Rule 7.1 because the statements are misleading, and neither statement can be factually supported as of the date on which it is disseminated.

RULES: 7.1

QUESTION:

1. Two inquirers have asked about the use of specific phrases to advertise their services. The first asks whether she may use the phrase "I KNOW HOW TO WIN FOR YOU" in print and other advertising. A second inquirer asks whether the law firm can use the words "unsurpassed litigation skills" on its website.

OPINION:

2. Each inquiry concerns a form of lawyer advertising. Whether each is permissible primarily is governed by Rule 7.1 in New York's Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"). In general, Rule 7.1 prohibits the use or dissemination of an advertisement that "contains statements or claims that are false, deceptive or misleading." Rule 7.1(a)(1).

3. Determining whether the proposed advertising is ethical requires an assessment of whether the phrases violate Rule 7.1(a)(1) (prohibiting advertising that is "false, misleading or deceptive"), or 7.1(d) and (e) (together, permitting statements that "compare the lawyer's services with the services of other lawyers" or describe "the quality of the lawyer's or law firm's services" provided the statements do not violate Rule 7.1(a), can be factually supported by the lawyer or law firm as of the date on which the advertisement is published or disseminated, and are accompanied by the disclaimer "Prior results do not guarantee a similar outcome").

4. Comment [3] to Rule 7.1 provides that "[a] truthful statement is misleading if it omits a fact necessary to make the lawyer's communication . . . not materially misleading . . . [or if there is] a substantial likelihood that it will lead a reasonable person to formulate a specific conclusion about the lawyer or the lawyer's services, or about the results a lawyer can achieve, for which there is no reasonable factual foundation." For example, this Committee concluded a proposed advertisement that stated "We will stop your foreclosure" was impermissible because a layperson was likely to read the phrase literally to mean that the lawyer could cease and terminate a foreclosure, rather than merely delay its progress and assist with a negotiated settlement. N.Y. State 921 (2012). Cmt. [12] to Rule 7.1 explains that descriptions of characteristics of a lawyer or law firm that compare its services with other firms and cannot be factually supported could mislead potential clients, and therefore it could be improper for a lawyer to advertise that he or she is the "Best." Rule 7.1, Cmt. [12].

5. Neither of the proposed statements is permissible under Rule 7.1. The statement "I KNOW HOW TO WIN FOR YOU" is misleading because it suggests that the lawyer can win any potential client's case regardless of the facts of the case or legal support for the prospective client's position, and this statement cannot be factually supported by the lawyer. Similarly, advertising on a website that a lawyer has "unsurpassed litigation skills" is misleading because it compares the skills of the lawyer with others without factual support, similar to listing a lawyer as the "Best" in the example provided in Cmt. [12] to Rule 7.1. See N.Y. State 877 (2011) (a statement that describes or characterizes the "quality" of a lawyer's work must be "factually supported" at the time it is disseminated and accompanied by the disclaimer provided in Rule 7.1(e)). Merely posting the disclaimer that "Prior results do not guarantee a similar outcome" will not cure the ethical infirmity of the proposed advertising.

CONCLUSION:

6. The statement "I KNOW HOW TO WIN FOR YOU," and the statement "unsurpassed litigation skills," may not be used in lawyer advertising. Both statements are misleading in suggesting a result or skill level that cannot be factually supported as of the date on which the statements are published or disseminated, and therefore both violate Rules 7.1(a) and 7.1(e).

OPINION 1006 (04/02/2014)

TOPIC: Settlement agreements; restrictive covenants; prohibiting solicitation of new clients having similar claims; prohibiting the referral of such claims to other counsel

DIGEST: A lawyer may not settle or offer to settle a claim on the understanding that the lawyer for the claimant will thereafter (a) refrain from soliciting clients for the purpose of bringing similar claims against the settling party, or (b) refrain from referring potential claimants with similar claims to other counsel.

RULES: 5.6(a)(2); 1.6; 1.9(c)

FACTS:

1. The inquiring attorney represents an organization against which one of its employees has asserted certain claims. The matter is in the process of being settled. The organization fears that similarly situated employees may assert additional claims. As part of the settlement negotiation, the inquirer proposes to seek assurances from the claimant's lawyers that they will not solicit or refer further clients from among those similarly situated employees, although the inquirer accepts that if a further employee approached the attorney without being solicited, the attorney would have the right to represent that individual.

QUESTIONS:

2. May a lawyer settle or offer to settle a claim on the understanding that the lawyer for the claimant will not thereafter solicit new clients for the purpose of bringing similar claims against the settling party?

3. May a lawyer settle or offer to settle a claim on the understanding that the lawyer for the claimant will not thereafter refer prospective clients to other lawyers for the purpose of bringing similar claims against the settling party?

OPINION:

4. Rule 5.6(a)(2) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") states: "A lawyer shall not participate in offering or making . . . an agreement in which a restriction on a lawyer's right to practice is part of the settlement of a client controversy." Policies cited as underlying this rule include enhancement of the public's access to lawyers and avoidance of conflicts.[7] In interpreting Rule 5.6, we are guided also by interpretations of its predecessor rule, DR 2-108 of the former Code

7 According to ABA 93-371 (1993), which we cited in N.Y. State 730 (2000):

> The rationale of Model Rule 5.6 is clear. First, permitting such agreements restricts the access of the public to lawyers who, by virtue of their background and experience, might be the very best available talent to represent these individuals. Second, the use of such agreements may provide clients with rewards that bear less relationship to the merits of their claims than they do to the desire of the defendant to "buy off" plaintiff's counsel. Third, the offering of such restrictive agreements places the plaintiff's lawyer in a situation where there is conflict between the interests of present clients and those of potential future clients.

of Professional Responsibility (the "Code"). Although DR 2-108 was controversial, its essential terms were carried forward into Rule 5.6.[8]

5. The lawyer whose "right to practice" is at issue here is the lawyer representing the settling claimant, rather than the inquirer who represents the organization that is the target of the actual and potential claims. This distinction, however, is not important to our inquiry, because Rule 5.6 provides that no lawyer may "participate in offering or making" a settlement agreement that restricts any lawyer's right to practice. See N.Y. State 730 (2000) (predecessor rule applied "equally to a lawyer who would propose or offer such an agreement and to a lawyer who would accept it").

6. This Committee last examined restrictive settlement agreements in N.Y. State 730 (2000), which construed DR 2-108. The question there was whether an attorney for an employment discrimination plaintiff could agree as part of a settlement not to disclose broad categories of information, including facts about the business and operations of the defendant corporation and "any matters relating directly or indirectly" to the settlement agreement. We concluded that such terms would violate DR 2-108. We reasoned that although the terms would not "directly" restrict the inquirer's right to practice law or to represent similar clients, they would nonetheless violate the rule "if their practical effect is to restrict the lawyer from undertaking future representations and if they involve conditions or restrictions on the lawyer's future practice that the lawyer's own client would not be entitled to impose."[9]

7. We recognized in N.Y. State 730 the permissibility of standard agreements not to disclose settlement terms, reasoning that such agreements bolster the client's independent right to require that the lawyer keep information confidential, and do not "effectively restrict the lawyer from representing other clients." In contrast, we found the more sweeping nondisclosure terms at issue in N.Y. State 730 to be impermissibly overbroad in that they "would restrict the lawyer's right to practice law by requiring the lawyer to avoid representing future clients in cases where the lawyer might have occasion to use information that was not protected as a confidence or secret . . . but was nevertheless covered by

8 See N.Y. City 99-03 (citing sources arguing that the rule is justified, and others arguing that it is not); Proposed Rules and COSAC Commentary, September 30, 2005, Reporter's Notes at 373 (noting "considerable controversy" about DR 2-108 in that "both the breadth of the prohibition and the public policy benefits of the Rule have been subject to debate," citing court cases, and reporting that Committee on Standards of Attorney Conduct "considered many various possible alternatives to the language of this Rule, but determined to retain the language of the current New York Disciplinary Rule"), available at http://www.onbar.org/news/COSAC_Rules/Rule5.6.pdf; Reporter's Notes, NYSBA Proposed Rules of Professional Conduct at 185 (Feb. 1, 2008) (explaining that Rule 5.6 was intended to be "substantively identical" to the former DR 2-108).

9 Accord D.C. Opinion 335 (2006) (surveying ethics opinions, including N.Y. State 730, in which an "underlying rationale . . . is that the prohibited provisions restrict the lawyer's right to practice by effectively preventing him or his firm from representing clients in certain kinds of cases against the settling party"); Colorado Opinion 92 (1993) (stating that the rule may be violated by restrictions "less onerous than a complete prohibition against subsequent representation of clients against a settling party defending a claim," and citing ethics opinions recognizing "impropriety of practice restrictions that fall short of an out-right bar to future or ongoing representation").

the settlement terms."[10] The scope of information protected as a "confidence or secret" under the prior Code is largely carried forward under the Rules as "confidential information," which is protected for current clients under Rule 1.6 and for former clients under Rule 1.9(c). This category of confidential information is broad enough to give the parties considerable leeway in extending the reach of permissible nondisclosure clauses.[11]

Agreements Barring Solicitation

8. Solicitation of clients, once prohibited as an ethical matter, is now permitted subject to various constraints including those of Rule 7.3. Solicitation of clients in compliance with the Rules is an aspect of law practice that may be important or even crucial to a lawyer's ability to engage meaningfully in the profession. On that premise, the reasoning of N.Y. State 730 guides the resolution of this inquiry as well. While a lawyer's agreement not to solicit further clients would not "directly" restrict that lawyer's right to practice law by precluding representation of clients who find the lawyer on their own, such an agreement could nonetheless have the practical effect of substantially restricting the lawyer's ability to undertake future representations. Accordingly, it is impermissible for any lawyer to settle or offer to settle a claim on the understanding that the lawyer for the claimant will not thereafter solicit new clients for the purpose of bringing similar claims against the settling party.[12]

9. The contrary result was reached in Feldman v. Minars, 230 A.D.2d 356, 658 N.Y.S.2d 614 (1st Dept. 1997), but that opinion is of limited weight here. In Feldman, the court held that plaintiff's law firm should be disqualified, based in part on the firm's solicitation of the plaintiffs in violation of a prior settlement in which the firm had agreed not to "encourage any other parties or attorneys to commence such action or proceeding." The firm sought to be relieved from that prior agreement on the ground that it violated public policy as expressed in DR 2-108. The court rejected that argument on a 10 Accord D.C. Opinion 335 (2006) ("A settlement agreement may provide that the terms of the settlement and other non-public information may be kept confidential, but it may not require that public information be confidential."); South Carolina Opinion 10-04 (stating that Rule 5.6 "prohibits settlement agreements that reach information not reached by [Rule] 1.6," and suggesting that lawyers generally should not become parties to their clients' settlement agreements); ABA 00-417 (distinguishing agreements not to reveal confidential information from agreements not to use it, and concluding that Rule 5.6 does not prohibit the former because a "settlement provision, agreed to by the client, that prohibits the lawyer from disclosing information relating to the representation is no more than what is required by the Model Rules absent client consent, and does not necessarily limit the lawyer's future practice in the manner accomplished by a restriction on the use of information relating to the opposing party in the matter"); Colorado Opinion 92 (1993) (agreement conditioned upon "nondisclosure of the amount and terms of the settlement, provided this information is not already a matter of public record . . . [does] not materially restrict a lawyer's ability to practice law").

11 Subject to certain exceptions, the category includes all information which the client has requested be kept confidential. See Rule 1.6(a). As to a related rule prohibiting employment agreements that restrict the right of a lawyer to practice after termination of the employment, we have noted that "as a practical matter, because the definition of confidential information in Rule 1.6 is so broad, most contractual confidentiality provisions are not likely to exceed the scope of a New York lawyer's confidentiality obligations under the Rules." N.Y. State 858 ¶10 (2011).

12 Other jurisdictions have reached similar results. See Texas Opinion 505 (1994) ("To the extent that [solicitation] is permitted under the State Bar Rules, and other applicable state and federal statutes, solicitation is part of the practice of law and therefore cannot be more severely restricted in a settlement agreement [than] it is restricted in the Rules and applicable law."); South Carolina Opinion 10-04 ("Rule 5.6(b) protects a lawyer's access to the legal market, and that protection is implicated by advertisements and solicitations equally.").

number of grounds, most of which do not apply here.[13] However, the court also briefly addressed the ethical issue at hand:

> Even assuming, arguendo, that a settlement agreement that forbids an attorney to represent other clients against the settling defendants in similar litigation is against public policy, as expressed in the Code of Professional Responsibility, an agreement not to solicit clients is not likewise against public policy.

Feldman, 230 A.D.2d at 359 (original emphasis). The basis for that conclusion was suggested in the sentence that followed: "In fact, until recently, solicitation of clients, even without an agreement, was barred by applicable disciplinary rules." Id. But as noted above, solicitation of clients, when done in accordance with applicable rules, is no longer ethically suspect. A settlement agreement effectively restricting the right to practice is impermissible, and it does not matter that the restriction would be achieved only through limits on otherwise appropriate solicitation. See N.Y. State 730 at n.2 (noting that Feldman decision had been strongly criticized insofar as it found "that an agreement not to solicit clients would not violate the rule").

Agreements Barring Referral

10. The second question concerns potential claimants whom the claimant's lawyer has not solicited, but who have on their own volition approached the claimant's lawyer for representation, information or guidance. The inquirer recognizes that it would be improper for a settlement agreement to provide that the lawyer may not represent such a person, but nonetheless asks whether an agreement could provide that the lawyer may not refer the person to be represented by another lawyer.

11. Referral of prospective clients to other lawyers is, like solicitation of clients, integral to the practice of law. If a lawyer who is approached by a prospective client does not, for whatever reason, end up representing that person, the lawyer can nonetheless perform an important service by referring the prospective client to some other lawyer appropriate to the task. To perform this service well, the lawyer may need to ask the prospective client for information that will give rise to certain duties of legal ethics. See Rule 1.18 (duties as to confidentiality and conflicts). Then the lawyer will need to exercise legal judgment in assessing which other lawyers would be well suited to provide the representation. All of this helps achieve what Comment [1] to Rule 7.1 calls the "important functions of the legal profession . . . to facilitate the process of intelligent selection of lawyers, and to assist in making legal services fully available." Accordingly, a settlement agreement precluding future referrals would impermissibly restrict the lawyer's right to practice law. See Colorado Opinion 92 (1993) (stating that improper restrictions in settlement agreements may include prohibiting settling lawyer's "referral of potential clients to other counsel"); D.C. Opinion 35 (1977) (unethical for lawyer to agree to settlement term prohibiting referral to other lawyers of potential clients with claims against settling defendant).

13 The court reasoned that "failure to enforce a freely entered-into agreement would appear unseemly, and the 'clean hands' doctrine would preclude the offending attorneys from using their own ethical violations as a basis for avoiding obligations undertaken by them." Feldman, 230 A.D.2d at 361. It continued that even if the settlement agreement were against public policy of the State, the violation could be addressed by the appropriate disciplinary authorities rather than by invalidating the agreement. Id. For both these reasons, an agreement may be enforceable even if it violates a rule of legal ethics. See N.Y. City 1999-3 (settlement agreement restricting practice ethically impermissible "even if such an agreement may be enforceable as a matter of law"). Also the Feldman court approvingly cited an article calling the relevant ethics rule "an anachronism, illogical and bad policy." Feldman, 230 A.D.2d at 360 (citing Gillers, A Rule Without A Reason, Let the Market, Not the Bar, Regulate Settlements that Restrict Practice, 79 ABA J 118 [Oct. 1993]). But as noted above, New York later adopted Rule 5.6 despite such policy criticisms.

CONCLUSION:

12. The questions are answered in the negative. A lawyer may not settle or offer to settle a claim on the understanding that the lawyer for the claimant will thereafter (a) refrain from soliciting other clients for the purpose of bringing similar claims against the settling party; or (b) when contacted by potential claimants, refrain from referring such persons to other counsel.

OPINION 1007 (04/03/2014)

TOPIC: Advertising a lawyer's listing in "Best Lawyers."

DIGEST: A lawyer may advertise his or her inclusion in "Best Lawyers" provided that the lawyer's assessment of the methodology used to determine inclusion demonstrates that it is an unbiased, nondiscriminatory and defensible process.

RULES: 7.1

QUESTION:

1. The inquirer states that he will be nominated for inclusion in the 2015 "Best Lawyers" publication for the New York Area, but is concerned that inclusion in "Best Lawyers" may violate Rule 7.1 because the listing implies that he has skills or results that are better than other lawyers without a basis in objective criteria. The inquirer notes that the listing in "Best Lawyers" might be considered a statement comparing him to other attorneys or implying to the public that he is one of the best attorneys without any presentation of objective criteria, and he suggests he may not be the "best" attorney as compared to others.

OPINION:

2. The inquiry concerns a form of lawyer advertising. Whether advertising that a lawyer is listed in "Best Lawyers" is permissible is governed by Rule 7.1 in New York's Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"). In general, Rule 7.1 prohibits the use or dissemination of an advertisement that "contains statements or claims that are false, deceptive or misleading." Rule 7.1(a)(1). [14]

3. "Best Lawyers" publishes lists that may constitute professional ratings of lawyers in various geographic areas and areas of legal practice. Rule 7.1(b) provides that an advertisement may include information as to "bona fide professional ratings." A rating is not "bona fide" unless it is "unbiased and nondiscriminatory." Rule 7.1, Cmt. [13].

> [The professional rating] must evaluate lawyers based on objective criteria or legitimate peer review in an manner unbiased by the rating services economic interests (such as payment to the rating service by the rated lawyer) and not subject to improper influence by lawyers who are being evaluated. Further, the rating service must fairly consider all lawyers within the pool of those who are purported to be covered. For example, a rating service that purports to evaluate all lawyers practicing in a particular geographic area or in a particular area of practice or of a particular age must apply its criteria to all lawyers within that geographic area, practice area, or age group."

14 The Committee responds to inquiries regarding an inquirer's own conduct, rather than the conduct of a third party. In the scenario described above, inclusion in the "Best Lawyers" listing does not constitute an "advertisement" under Rule 1.0(a). A lawyer's inclusion in the "Best Lawyers" list is determined by the publication, and does not occur due to any direct affirmative effort by the lawyer to be included in the listing. At the same time, if the "Best Lawyers" listing violates Rule 7.1, then the lawyer or the lawyer's firm would violate the Rule by making reference to the listing in any marketing material.

Rule 7.1, Cmt. [13]. Thus, determining whether the "Best Lawyers" listing is a "bona fide professional rating" requires a fact specific inquiry into the methodology used by the publication to create the list.

4. The "Best Lawyers" publication explains that its list is based on peer-review and attempts to depict the consensus opinion of "leading lawyers" about the professional abilities of colleagues in the same geographical and legal practice areas. Nominations are open to anyone, although the primary sources for nominations are clients, other lawyers and marketing teams. In-house lawyers are not eligible to be nominated. Lawyers included in the previous "Best Lawyers" edition are automatically nominated into their practice area(s) for the next peer-review process. The ballots are distributed to lawyers currently listed based on the voter's practice area(s) and geographic regions. The ballots ask if the respondent were unable to handle a case himself or herself, how likely would the respondent be to refer it to nominee, and requests a response rating on a scale of "1" to "5," where "5" is the highest. Lawyers may not vote for themselves, and their names will be removed from their own ballots. Voters can complete ballots for lawyers in their own firm, but these votes do not weigh as heavily as votes from outside the firm. Best Lawyers staff reviews the votes and comments, selected lawyers are checked against state bar association sanction lists to ensure the nominees are in good standing, and then the listed lawyers are notified of their inclusion and the list is released to the public.

5. We have opined that for a rating to be "bona fide and nondeceptive it should at least be unbiased, nondiscriminatory and based on some defensible method." N.Y. State 877 (2011); see also Rule 7.1, Cmt. 13. While we will not opine on whether a "Best Lawyers" listing is "bona fide," the Committee has not identified a disqualifying defect in the methodology used. The lawyer must assess whether the methodology is unbiased, nondiscriminatory and defensible. The lawyer's assessment should consider that nominations are open to everyone, and making an assessment of the following: (1) that the "leading lawyers" who participate in voting are limited to the lawyers who are currently listed in the publication; (2) the question posed to voters and the "1' to "5" ranking system; (3) the weighting of votes completed by lawyers in one's own firm as compared to those outside the firm; (4) the review conducted by Best Lawyers staff; and (5) the automatic nomination of lawyers previously included in the publication. In addition, although it does not appear that inclusion is biased by direct economic interest in the form of the receipt of payment from the listed lawyers, an assessment of the bona fides of inclusion in "Best Lawyers" might also consider that automatic nomination of lawyers previously listed in the publication ensures the nomination of lawyers to whom Best Lawyers has sold additional marketing materials associated with the listing, including special reprints and enhanced advertising.

6. The inquirer also questioned whether advertising that he is listed in "Best Lawyers" may constitute a statement comparing the lawyer to other attorneys or implying that he is one of the best attorneys. Rule 7.1(d)(2) permits advertising that compares the lawyer's services with the services of other lawyers and Rule 7.1(d)(4) permits advertising that describes or characterizes the quality of the lawyer's or law firm's services provided that the statement "can be factually supported by the lawyer or law firm as of the date on which the advertisement is published or disseminated." Comment [12] explains that descriptions of characteristics of a lawyer or law firm that compare its services with other firms and cannot be factually supported could mislead potential clients and therefore it would be improper for a lawyer to advertise that he or she is the "Best." Rule 7.1, Cmt. [12].

7. We believe that describing a lawyer as the "Best" can be distinguished from inclusion in a "Best Lawyers" listing. Rather than stating that any particular lawyer is the "best," the magazine publishes a long list of attorneys selected according to a nomination and voting methodology that is described in the publication, without ranking the attorneys or making any specific statement about a particular lawyer's skills as compared to those who are not listed. The listing is simply a factual statement that the compilers of the listing have selected the lawyer based on the disclosed methodology. Even if the rating is construed as a comparison of the quality of the lawyer's services to others, the lawyer's determination that the rating is "bona fide" satisfies the requirement under Rule 7.1(e)(2) that the statement be factually supported as of the date that it is published or disseminated.

CONCLUSION:

8. A lawyer may advertise his or her inclusion in "Best Lawyers" provided that an assessment of the methodology used to determine a lawyer's inclusion reveals that it is an unbiased, nondiscriminatory and defensible process. Advertising a lawyer's inclusion in the publication is distinguishable from making a statement in advertising that cannot be factually supported and is misleading. If the listing constitutes a comparison of lawyers' skills, a lawyer's determination that it is a "bona fide" rating satisfies the requirement that the statement be factually supported on the date that it is published or disseminated.

TOPIC: Representing new clients adverse to a current or former client

DIGEST: Whether a law firm may represent new clients against an entity that the law firm has represented in the past depends on whether the entity is a current or former client, which is a mixed question of fact and law. A law firm may not oppose a current client in any matter, related or unrelated, absent the current client's informed consent, confirmed in writing. However, a law firm may oppose a former client in any matter that is not substantially related to the firm's legal work for that former client. Even if the entity is no longer a client, a law firm has a continuing duty to protect confidential information of that entity.

RULES: 1.6(a); 1.7(a) & (b); 1.9(a) & (c)

FACTS:

1. Inquirer is a law firm ("Law Firm") that desires to represent some new clients ("New Clients") against an entity that the Law Firm considers to be a former client (the "Entity"). The Entity objects to the representation. The Entity and the Law Firm have jointly prepared and submitted a detailed set of facts that we accept for purposes of this opinion. According to the jointly submitted statement of facts, the Entity at one time leased a gas station. The gas station's owner later sued the Entity and a co-defendant ("Co-Defendant") for breaching the lease agreement (the "Lease Action"). The owner sought to recover the costs of removing gasoline storage tanks and remediating the premises. The Law Firm defended the Entity in the Lease Action.

2. The defense in the Lease Action was controlled by the Entity's Co-Defendant, which had purchased the Entity's interest in the property before the Lease Action began. The purchase was made pursuant to a Purchase and Sale Agreement ("PSA") covering scores of gas stations. The Law Firm worked closely with the Co-Defendant's counsel on the Lease Action. The Lease Action eventually settled.

3. Recently, the Law Firm agreed to represent the New Clients against the Entity and/or its Co-Defendant. Specifically, the New Clients claim that the Entity and/or its Co-Defendant operated various gas stations (though not the one involved in the concluded Lease Action) in a manner that damaged the New Clients' property. The Entity at one time owned these other gas stations, but sold them to Co-Defendant pursuant to the PSA before the Lease Action was filed.

4. The Entity has asked the Law Firm to withdraw from representing the New Clients, on two grounds: (a) the Law Firm never sent a termination letter to the Entity, which therefore contends that it remains a current client; and (b) even if the Entity is a former client, it contends that the new matter is substantially related to the Lease Action in which the Law Firm defended the Entity. Specifically, the Entity says that the matters are substantially related because the Law Firm acquired confidential information during the Lease Action regarding: (i) the Entity's negotiating strategy in the Lease Action, (ii) the Entity's interpretation of the PSA, (iii) the relationship between the Entity and its Co-Defendant in the Lease Action, and (iv) the future obligations of the environmental/remediation contractor assigned to the PSA properties by the Entity.

5. The Law Firm counters that (a) the Entity is a former client because the Law Firm has not performed any legal services for the Entity since October 2012, and (b) the New Clients' matter is not substantially related to the Lease Action. Specifically, the Law Firm contends that the New Clients' claims are not substantially related because the present claims involve a different lease agreement and different gas stations. The Law Firm recognizes that the New Clients' matters might involve theories of recovery under the PSA, but the Law Firm says the PSA would potentially be a discoverable document. In sum, the Law Firm argues that the present and former matters are not substantially related because the Law Firm did not acquire any confidential information from the Entity in the Lease Action that New Clients could use to the Entity's disadvantage in the present dispute.

QUESTION:

6. If a law firm represented an entity in a matter and has not performed any legal services for the entity for more than a year, but the law firm has not sent a termination letter to the entity, may the law firm represent new clients against the entity, over the entity's objection, in a new matter that is related in some ways to the original matter?

OPINION:

7. The inquiry raises three sets of issues: (i) conflicts with current clients; (ii) conflicts with former clients; and (iii) duties of confidentiality to former clients. We will address these issues in turn. We address only whether the representation is permitted under the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules").[15] We are not taking into account additional factors that a court might consider if deciding a motion to disqualify, and we are not predicting how a court would rule if such a motion were eventually filed. Our jurisdiction extends only to interpreting the Rules; we do not opine on legal questions such as whether there is warrant for disqualification.

A. Conflicts with Current Clients: Rule 1.7.

8. The threshold question is whether the Entity is a current client or a former client. Rule 1.7(a)(1) generally prohibits a law firm from opposing a current client in any matter, related or unrelated, absent compliance with Rule 1.7(b), which among other things would require the client's informed consent confirmed in writing.[16] If the Entity remains a current client of the Law Firm, there-

15 The inquiry was submitted by a law firm rather than by an individual lawyer. For simplicity of expression, this opinion speaks in terms of duties of that firm rather than duties of its individual lawyers. At the expense of that simplicity, we could set forth our analysis in greater detail to account for the following. We rely on certain provisions of the Rules in which the direct imposition of duties is upon an individual lawyer rather than upon a law firm. See Rules 1.6(a), 1.7 and 1.9. It is through other provisions of the Rules that such duties are imposed derivatively (or related duties are imposed) on others in the lawyer's firm and on the firm as a whole. See, e.g., Rule 1.6(c) (requiring lawyer to exercise reasonable care to prevent breaches of confidentiality by others), Rule 1.10 (a)-(c) (imputing specified conflicts to law firm and its associated lawyers), Rule 1.10(e) (requiring law firm to maintain conflict-checking system), Rule 5.1 (requiring law firm and supervisory lawyers to make reasonable efforts to ensure that lawyers in the firm conform to the Rules), and Rule 8.4(a) (providing that a lawyer "or law firm" shall not "violate or attempt to violate the Rules of Professional Conduct, knowingly assist or induce another to do so, or do so through the acts of another"). However, we do not think it necessary to set forth all our analysis at that greater level of detail.

16 "The duty to avoid the representation of differing interest prohibits, among other things, undertaking representation adverse to a current client without that client's informed consent. For example, absent consent, a lawyer may not advocate in one matter against another client that the lawyer represents in some other matter, even when the matters are wholly unrelated." Rule 1.7, Cmt. [6]. Conflicts arising under Rule 1.7 (and also those arising under Rule 1.9, which we discuss below) are among those imputed by Rule 1.10(a) to other lawyers associated in the same firm.

fore, the Law Firm may not oppose the Entity on behalf of New Clients because the Entity is objecting rather than consenting to the representation. But if the attorney-client relationship between the Law Firm and the Entity has ended, then we would instead apply Rule 1.9, which governs conflicts with former clients.

9. The Rules of Professional Conduct do not define when an attorney-client relationship ends. On the contrary, Scope ¶ 9 says that "principles of substantive law external to these Rules determine whether a client-lawyer relationship exists." Thus, whether the attorney-client relationship between the Law Firm and the Entity has ended depends in part on questions of law beyond our jurisdiction. Scope ¶ 9 also says: "Whether a client-lawyer relationship exists for any specific purpose can depend on the circumstances and may be a question of fact." We also lack sufficient facts to determine whether the Entity remains a current client of the Law Firm.

10. We note, however, that the Law Firm's failure to send a termination letter to the Entity does not by itself prove that the attorney-client relationship continues. A termination letter (or email) from a lawyer to a client clearly notifying the client that the attorney-client relationship has ended will often be a good practice, and in some circumstances may be dispositive. But an attorney-client relationship may also terminate without a termination letter. See, e.g., Revise Clothing, Inc. v. Joe's Jeans Subsidiary, Inc., 687 F. Supp. 2d 381, 389-91 (S.D.N.Y. 2010) ("'In what is perhaps the most typical situation, an attorney-client relationship . . . is terminated, simply enough, by the accomplishment of the purpose for which it was formed in the first place,'" and a rule "that requires a law firm announce the conclusion of its engagement. . . . would conflict with the principle . . . that the relationship is terminated upon the accomplishment of the purpose for which it was created"); Miller v. Miller, 203 A.D.2d 338, 339, 610 N.Y.S.2d 88, 89 (2d Dep't 1994) ("When the Family Court matter concluded, so did the attorney-client relationship"); Restatement (Third) of the Law Governing Lawyers § 31(2)(e) (2000) ("a lawyer's actual authority to represent a client ends when . . . the lawyer has completed the contemplated services").

11. The passage of time is another indicator of whether a person remains a current client, but it is not dispositive. Other circumstances, such as a longstanding pattern of representation over the years or the client's reasonable belief that a lawyer needs to perform additional legal work to fulfill the purpose of the representation, could also preserve an attorney-client relationship, even if the Law Firm has no specific pending assignment for the Entity at a given moment.

12. Here, despite the lack of a termination letter, several circumstances – including the fact that the Law Firm has concluded its work on the Lease Action and has not handled (or been asked to handle) any new matters for more than a year – suggest that the Entity is a former client. The parties have not identified any countervailing factors, such as a longstanding pattern of representation over the years, or the Entity's reasonable belief that the Law Firm needs to perform additional legal work to fulfill the purpose of the earlier representation. If such factors exist, they could count in favor of the Entity being a current client.

13. Although we have set forth some relevant factors, we do not have all the facts relevant to whether the Entity remains a current client of the Law Firm, and in any event we lack authority to reach what is ultimately a legal determination on that issue. If the Entity remains a current client of the Law Firm, then the Entity is entitled to the protections of Rule 1.7(a)(1). In that case the Law Firm may not oppose the Entity in any matter, related or unrelated, unless the conflict is consentable under Rule 1.7(b)(1) and the Law Firm obtains the Entity's informed consent, confirmed in writing, under Rule 1.7(b)(4).

B. Conflicts with Former Clients: Rule 1.9.

14. If the Entity is not a current client, then it is a former client. Under Rule 1.9(a), a lawyer may not represent a client with interests "materially adverse" to those of a former client in a matter "substantially related" to the matter the lawyer handled for the former client, unless the former client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing. Here, the interests of New Clients in the current matter are "materially adverse" to the interests of the Entity, and the Entity has not consented (and in fact has objected) to the Law Firm's representation of New Clients. Given the former client's objection, the only open question is whether the current matter is "substantially related" to the former matter (the Lease Action).

15. Guidance on this question is found in Comment [3] to Rule 1.9. The first sentence says that matters are "substantially related" if (i) they involve the "same transaction or legal dispute" or (ii) a reasonable lawyer would perceive "a substantial risk that confidential factual information that would normally have been obtained in the prior representation would materially advance the client's position in the subsequent matter." Here, the new matter is plainly not the "same transaction or legal dispute" as the old one, but the new and old matters could still be substantially related based on the risk that confidential information acquired by the Law Firm in the old matter would materially advance the position of New Clients in the new matter. We therefore turn to the balance of Comment [3], which discusses how even distinct matters may be substantially related through confidential information.

16. Some parts of Comment [3] address what "normally" or "ordinar[il]y" happens, rather than whether the lawyer actually obtained confidential information in the particular case. It makes sense that what normally happens should trigger the protections of Rule 1.9(a). As Comment [3] notes, the purpose of those protections would be defeated if a party seeking disqualification had to reveal its confidential information in order to protect it:

> A former client is not required to reveal the confidential information learned by the lawyer in order to establish a substantial risk that the lawyer has confidential information to use in the subsequent matter. A conclusion about the possession of such information may be based on the nature of the services the lawyer provided the former client and information that would in ordinary practice be learned by a lawyer providing such services.

17. The relevance of what normally or ordinarily happens is reflected in the Comment's example of a matter deemed to be substantially related even though the example identifies no particular actually acquired confidential information: "[A] lawyer who has previously represented a client in securing environmental permits to build a shopping center would be precluded from representing neighbors seeking to oppose rezoning of the property on the basis of environmental considerations . . . ." Rule 1.9, Cmt. [3].

18. On the other hand, the actual receipt of confidential information in the prior matter would seem even more compelling than a mere likelihood of its receipt. "A fortiori, matters are also substantially related if the lawyer in question actually and knowingly obtained (and now possesses) confidential factual information that would materially advance the prospective client's position in the subsequent matter." N.Y. State 992 ¶7 (2012). This view is supported by the following language from Comment [3]:

> [A] lawyer who has represented a businessperson and learned extensive private financial information about that person may not then represent that person's spouse in seeking a divorce. . . . [K]nowledge of specific facts gained in a prior representation that are relevant to the matter in question ordinarily will preclude such a representation.

19. Comment [3] also suggests various reasons that current and former matters might not be substantially related:

- The environmental lawyer mentioned above "would not be precluded . . . from defending a tenant of the completed shopping center in resisting eviction for nonpayment of rent.
- "Information that has been disclosed to the public or to other parties adverse to the former client ordinarily will not be disqualifying."
- "Information acquired in a prior representation may have been rendered obsolete by the passage of time, a circumstance that may be relevant in determining whether two representations are substantially related."
- "In the case of an organizational client, general knowledge of the client's policies and practices ordinarily will not preclude a subsequent representation."

20. The inquiring Law Firm should apply the precepts of Rule 1.9(a) and Comment [3] to the various kinds of information that the Entity contends demonstrate a substantial relationship between the Lease Action and the current matter, and to other kinds of potentially relevant information as well, such as the practices of the Entity in maintaining gas stations.

21. If any of these kinds of information would "materially advance" New Clients' position against the Entity, that would make the matters substantially related and preclude the new representation. However, the "materially advances" inquiry is fact-intensive, so we cannot reach a definitive conclusion as to whether the matters are substantially related.

C. Confidentiality Duties to Former Clients: Rule 1.9(c).

22. Whether or not the present and former matters are substantially related, the Law Firm has a continuing duty of confidentiality to the Entity pursuant to Rule 1.9(c), which "generally extends the confidentiality protections of Rule 1.6 to a lawyer's former clients." Rule 1.9, Cmt. [8]. Specifically, Rule 1.9(c) provides that a lawyer (1) shall not "use" confidential information "to the disadvantage of the former client" unless the Rules "would permit or require [such use] with respect to a current client" or the information has become "generally known" and (2) shall not "reveal" a former client's confidential information "except as these Rules would permit or require with respect to a current client."[17]

23. Particular pieces of confidential information may lose their protected status as time goes by, such as when the information becomes generally known or when disclosure would no longer be embarrassing or detrimental to the client. But otherwise, a lawyer's duty to protect such information remains in force even after a current client becomes a former client. We lack sufficient facts to determine what information is protected by Rule 1.9(c), but we note that the duty of confidentiality under Rule 1.9(c) applies whether or not matters are substantially related under Rule 1.9(a).

CONCLUSION:

24. Whether a law firm may represent new clients against an entity that the law firm has represented in the past depends on whether the entity is a current or former client, which is a mixed question of fact and law. A law firm may not oppose a current client in any matter, related or unrelated, absent the current client's informed consent, confirmed in writing. However, a law firm may oppose a former client in any matter that is not substantially related to the law firm's legal work for that former client. Even if the entity is no longer a client, a law firm has a continuing duty to protect confidential information of that entity.

(46-13)

17 The term "confidential information" is broadly defined in Rule 1.6(a) to include (subject to certain exceptions not applicable here) "information gained during or relating to the representation of a client, whatever its source, that is (a) protected by the attorney-client privilege, (b) likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed, or (c) information that the client has requested be kept confidential."

OPINION 1009 (05/21/2014)

TOPIC: Advertising; solicitation; press releases and tweets regarding shareholder litigation

DIGEST: Press releases and tweets directed to potential clients in shareholder suits constitute advertising and solicitation. They are thus subject to retention requirements, and, if directed to New York recipients, are also subject to filing requirements. The tweets must be labeled "attorney advertising" but are not prohibited by the rule against interactive solicitation.

RULES: 1.0(a) & (c); 7.1(f) & (k); 7.3; 8.5(b)

FACTS:

1. Inquirer is a New York attorney who works for a firm based in a different state. The firm focuses its practice on shareholder litigation, and the companies and lawsuits in question are sited in various states.

2. The firm distributes press releases concerning new investigations or lawsuits, and potential clients sometimes contact the firm after seeing such releases. The inquiry states that the releases "are generally issued through an outlet such as Business Wire, PR Newswire or other electronic wire service." The firm also sends out "tweets" to alert recipients to the press releases.

3. According to the inquiry, the general purposes of the press releases are "to inform shareholders of the case or investigation" and to enable potential clients to contact the firm "for a potential attorney-client engagement." The inquiry attaches sample press releases, all of which are labeled "Attorney advertising," and some of which indicate that shareholders may contact the firm concerning their legal rights and remedies with respect to the specific cases described.

QUESTIONS:

4. If a law firm issues press releases to inform potential clients of new investigations or actions, and sends "tweets" to alert recipients to the press releases, then are the press releases and tweets "advertisements" governed by Rule 7.1, and if so, (a) must copies be retained for one year or three years; and (b) must the tweets be labeled "attorney advertising"?

5. Are such press releases and tweets "solicitations" governed by Rule 7.3, and if so, (a) must copies be filed with the attorney disciplinary committee, and (b) are the tweets a permissible form of solicitation?

OPINION:

A. Advertising issues under Rule 7.1

6. Lawyer conduct in using and disseminating advertisements is subject to Rule 7.1 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules").[18] Under Rule 1.0(a), the term "advertisement" means (subject to exceptions not relevant here) "any public or private communication made by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm about that lawyer or law firm's services, the primary purpose of which is for the retention of the lawyer or law firm." The communication is to be assessed in light of the circumstances of its circulation, and if its primary purpose is to obtain clients, then it is an advertisement for purposes of the Rules. See, e.g., N.Y. State 873 (2011).

7. It seems clear from the nature of the press releases and the tweets that their primary purpose is to secure clients. Such communications are therefore advertisements under the Rules. As such, they can serve potential clients by educating them as to their need for legal advice and helping them obtain an appropriate lawyer, and can serve lawyers by enabling them to attract clients. See Rule 7.1, Cmt. [3] (indicating "principal purposes" of advertising).

8. Because press releases and tweets constitute lawyer advertising, they are subject to pre-approval and retention requirements. Rule 7.1(k) provides that all advertisements "shall be pre-approved by the lawyer or law firm." It also provides that a copy of an advertisement "shall be retained for a period of not less than three years following its initial dissemination," but specifies an alternate one-year retention period for advertisements contained in a "computer-accessed communication," and specifies another retention scheme for web sites. Rule 1.0(c) defines "computer-accessed communication" to mean > any communication made by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm that is disseminated through the use of a computer or related electronic device, including, but not limited to, web sites, weblogs, search engines, electronic mail, banner advertisements, pop-up and pop-under advertisements, chat rooms, list servers, instant messaging, or other internet presences, and any attachments or links related thereto.

9. The releases will be disseminated through wire services. We understand that such wire services typically distribute the releases to a wide variety of media, usually in full-text and without alteration. Even if the lawyers and wire services distribute the press releases by electronic means in the first instance, it does not follow that the alternative one-year retention period applies. Distribution by the wire services is merely the beginning of a pipeline of information that is intended to find its way into all kinds of mass media, including not only web sites and social networks but also newspapers, magazines and trade journals. Accordingly, the press releases at issue do not appear to constitute "computer-accessed communication[s]" subject to the alternative one-year retention period.

18 The inquiry notes that the proposed conduct has connections to jurisdictions other than New York: the inquirer's firm is based in another state, and the companies involved in the derivative suits, and the lawsuits themselves, may be in any state. Although the inquirer is admitted to practice only in New York, in some circumstances ethics rules from other jurisdictions could apply. If the advertising and solicitations in question are "in connection with" a proceeding that has already been filed in court in a jurisdiction other than New York, and the inquirer has been admitted to practice before that court for purposes of that proceeding, then that jurisdiction's ethical rules would govern unless the rules of the court provide otherwise. See Rule 8.5(b)(1). But when there is not yet any particular forum for a lawsuit, the New York rules will generally apply to the inquirer's conduct (no matter where the firm is based), because the inquirer is licensed to practice only in New York. See Rule 8.5(b)(2)(i). And of course New York rules will also apply to the inquirer's conduct as to any lawsuit that has been filed in New York. In this opinion we limit our analysis to the latter two situations and apply the New York rules of ethics. We also note that beyond the general provisions of Rule 8.5, one of the Rules at issue here includes more specific provisions as to its own applicability. See Rule 7.3(c) (discussed infra ¶19) and Rule 7.3(i).

10. We reach a different conclusion as to the tweets. These are disseminated by computer and resemble the examples in Rule 1.0(c). It is conceivable that the tweets could ultimately be reproduced in a newspaper or some other non-electronic format, but that is not their intended route of distribution. The tweets are therefore computer-accessed communications, and their retention is required only for one year.

11. Rule 7.1(f) provides that advertisements must be labeled as "Attorney Advertising" unless they appear in certain specified media such as newspapers, radio, television, or billboards, or are "made in person pursuant to Rule 7.3(a)(1)." We next consider the applicability of Rule 7.1(f) to the tweets described in the inquiry.[19]

The tweets do not appear in any of the media that are explicitly exempted from the labeling requirement in Rule 7.1(f). They would be exempt only if they constituted advertisements "made in person pursuant to Rule 7.3(a)(1)." That provision generally prohibits certain forms of interactive solicitation – those made in person, by telephone, or by "real-time or interactive computer-accessed communication" – but allows those otherwise prohibited forms when "the recipient is a close friend, relative, former client or existing client." For present purposes, we need not determine the precise scope of this exemption from the labeling requirement.[20] Even if the exemption can apply to real-time or interactive computer-accessed communication, the tweets in question do not appear to come within that category. See infra ¶22. And even if they did, the exemption would still not apply. The inquirer has not suggested that access to the tweets would be limited to existing or former clients, or friends and relatives, nor does such a limitation seem plausible given the goal of directing potential new clients to the press releases. Because the tweets would not be in any of the categories exempted from Rule 7.1(f), they would need to include the "Attorney Advertising" label.

B. Solicitation issues under Rule 7.3

12. The threshold question is whether the press releases and tweets are "solicitations," a term defined in relevant part as > any advertisement [1] initiated by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm [2] that is directed to, or targeted at, a specific recipient or group of recipients, or their family members or legal representatives, [3] the primary purpose of which is the retention of the lawyer or law firm, and [4] a significant motive for which is pecuniary gain.

19 Whether press releases must be labeled as attorney advertising may depend on the circumstances. See Rule 7.1, Cmt. [5] (explaining that the label is not necessary for advertising in newspapers or on television or for "similar communications that are self-evidently advertisements," such as "press releases transmitted to news outlets" as to which there is no risk of confusion). The inquirer has already chosen to apply the label to the press releases in question, and has not asked us whether such labeling is required, so we do not opine on that issue.

20 Read literally, the exemption could apply only to those solicitations that are permissible under Rule 7.3(a)(1) even though they are made "in person." However, the exemption has also been read more broadly to apply to all solicitations permitted under Rule 7.3(a)(1), including those by real-time or interactive computer-accessed communication. See Simon's New York Rules of Professional Conduct Annotated 1377 (2013 ed.).

Rule 7.3(b) (numbering added); see Rule 7.3, Cmt. [2] (elaborating on the four elements).

13. We have already noted (supra ¶7) that the press releases and tweets are advertisements, the primary purpose of which is to obtain retention of the lawyer or firm. It is also clear from the inquiry and the context that the press releases and tweets are initiated by or on behalf of the lawyer or law firm, and are motivated by desire for pecuniary gain. Whether they are solicitations thus depends on whether they are "directed to, or targeted at, a specific recipient or group of recipients, or their family members or legal representatives."

14. The Comments to Rule 7.3 point out a few ways in which communications can be directed to, or targeted at, specific recipients. First, they can be directed to specific recipients by their mode of transmission (such as through telephone calls, mail, email, or in-person contact), which is not the case here. See Rule 7.3, Cmt. [3].

15. "Second, an advertisement in public media such as newspapers, television, billboards, web sites or the like is a solicitation if it makes reference to a specific person or group of people whose legal needs arise out of a specific incident to which the advertisement explicitly refers." Rule 7.3, Cmt. [3]. This is an exception to the general rule that "an advertisement in public media such as newspapers, television, billboards, web sites or the like is presumed not to be directed to or targeted at a specific recipient or recipients." Rule 7.3, Cmt. [4]. This exception is triggered by reference to people with legal needs arising from a "specific incident," which is "a particular identifiable event (or a sequence of related events occurring at approximately the same time and place) that causes harm to one or more people." Rule 7.3, Cmt. [5]. The harm caused by a "specific incident" to which a solicitation relates will often be physical but may also be economic.[21]

16. Third, an advertisement in a public medium that is aimed at a specific group of people, such as those injured by a defective medical device or medication, is a solicitation even if the potential claimants were injured "over a period of years." In such cases the claims arise "at disparate times and places" and do not relate to one specific incident so as to trigger the "blackout" provisions of Rule 7.3(e). Nonetheless, the advertisements are solicitations because they make reference to, and are "intended to be of interest only to," the potential claimants. Rule 7.3, Cmt. [6].

17. An advertisement in a public medium, seeking retention and pecuniary gain, does not become a solicitation "simply because it is intended to attract potential clients with needs in a specified area of law" such as shareholder litigation. See Rule 7.3, Cmt. [4]. But the advertisement does become a solicitation if it is directed to or targeted at the specific group of recipients who held shares in a particular company on particular dates. From the sample press releases submitted with the inquiry, it appears that at least some refer to a "specific incident" in the management of the companies in question, and to groups of shareholders whose legal needs, the advertisements suggest, arise out of that specific incident. But even if a shareholder suit alleges misconduct too extended in time and place as to constitute a single incident, it can nevertheless be described in a press release that makes reference to, and is "intended to be of interest only to," the potential claimants. Accordingly, the press releases and tweets at issue here are "solicitations" subject to the requirements of Rule 7.3.

21 "Specific incidents include such events as traffic accidents, plane or train crashes, explosions, building collapses, and the like." Rule 7.3, Cmt. [5] (emphasis added). But as quoted above, this comment also includes more general language explaining that – for purposes of the definition of solicitation – a specific incident occurs when events closely connected in time and place cause "harm." Comment [5] also refers to "a specific incident involving potential claims for personal injury or wrongful death," but that reference is for the different purpose of describing the scope of the 30- and 15-day "blackout" provisions of Rule 7.3(e), which are explicitly limited to such claims.

18. A filing requirement applies to solicitations that are "directed to a recipient in this State." Rule 7.3(c); see Rule 7.3(c), Cmt. [8] ("Solicitations by a lawyer admitted in New York State directed to or targeted at a recipient or recipients outside of New York State are not subject to the filing and related requirements set out in Rule 7.3(c)."). If a press release or tweet is targeted at the shareholders of a particular company, the lawyer may or may not know those shareholders' identities and residences. A lawyer's solicitation is not "directed" to a New York recipient if the lawyer has no reason to be aware that New York residents are in fact among the target audience. But Rule 7.3(c) would apply if the lawyer knows that the intended audience includes any New York residents, or if the existence of such persons would be apparent from the size or nature of the company. Cf. Rule 1.0(k) ("A person's knowledge may be inferred from circumstances.").

19. The remaining issue is whether the tweets violate the rule that prohibits solicitation through certain interactive forms of contact. A lawyer may not engage in solicitation "by in-person or telephone contact, or by real-time or interactive computer-accessed communication unless the recipient is a close friend, relative, former client or existing client." Rule 7.3(a)(1). The policy is one of protecting potential clients:

> Paragraph (a) generally prohibits in-person solicitation, which has historically been disfavored by the bar because it poses serious dangers to potential clients. For example, in-person solicitation poses the risk that a lawyer, who is trained in the arts of advocacy and persuasion, may pressure a potential client to hire the lawyer without adequate consideration. These same risks are present in telephone contact or by real-time or interactive computer-accessed communication and are regulated in the same manner.

Rule 7.3, Cmt. [9].

20. As noted in ¶12 supra, it does not appear that the tweets would go only to close friends, relatives, former clients or existing clients. Accordingly, the tweets would be impermissible if they were to constitute "real-time or interactive computer-accessed communication." The tweets do constitute computer-accessed communications, see ¶10 supra, but that leaves open the question whether those communications are also "real-time or interactive." This concept is addressed in Comment [9] to Rule 7.3:

> Ordinary email and web sites are not considered to be real-time or interactive communication. Similarly, automated pop-up advertisements on a web site that are not a live response are not considered to be real-time or interactive communication. Instant messaging, chat rooms, and other similar types of conversational computer-accessed communication are considered to be real-time or interactive communication.

21. Our understanding is that the broadly distributed tweets contemplated here, as currently used and in contrast to instant messaging or chat rooms, generally do not involve live responses. In that sense the tweets are more like ordinary email or web site postings. Because the tweets should not be considered real-time or interactive communication, Rule 7.3 does not prohibit them.

CONCLUSION:

22. The subject press releases and tweets constitute "advertisements" and are thus subject to retention requirements. Copies of the press releases must be retained for three years. The tweets must be labeled "attorney advertising" and copies must be retained for one year. The press releases and tweets also are "solicitations" and are thus subject to filing requirements if directed to recipients in New York. The tweets are not prohibited by the rule against interactive solicitation.

OPINION 1010 (07/21/2014)

TOPIC: Advertising; second opinions

DIGEST: A firm may advertise that it provides second opinions to represented parties.

RULES: 4.2(a), 7.1, 7.3

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a member of a law firm that advertises via public media including radio. The firm proposes to inform the public that it is available to provide second opinions on pending legal cases on which individuals are already represented. Specifically, the firm proposes to include in its advertisements language such as: "If you are unhappy with your current attorney, you can call [ABC Law Firm] to discuss your matter."

QUESTION:

2. May a law firm advertise its availability to provide second opinions as to pending legal cases on which individuals are already represented?

OPINION:

3. We first consider the "no-contact rule" set forth in Rule 4.2(a) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"), which states:

> In representing a client, a lawyer shall not communicate or cause another to communicate about the subject of the representation with a party the lawyer knows to be represented by another lawyer in the matter, unless the lawyer has the prior consent of the other lawyer or is authorized to do so by law.

4. This rule applies only to communications made by a lawyer in the course of "representing a client." It does not apply, therefore, to the communications proposed by the inquirer, by which the inquirer's firm would seek to obtain new clients in matters in which the firm is not already involved. Cf. Rule 4.2, Cmt. [4] (noting that the Rule does not preclude "communication with a represented party or person who is seeking advice from a lawyer who is not otherwise representing a client in the matter"). Accordingly, the proposed communications are not subject to Rule 4.2(a). Accord Florida Opinion 02-5 (2003) (citing opinions from several jurisdictions).

5. The proposed communications are, however, subject to restrictions on legal advertisements. See Rule 1.0(a) (defining "advertisement" generally to include "any public or private communication made by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm about that lawyer or law firm's services, the primary purpose of which is for the retention of the lawyer or law firm"). These restrictions include, among other things, prohibition of statements or claims that are false, deceptive or misleading, Rule 7.1(a)(1); limitations on paid endorsements and fictionalized portrayals, Rule 7.1(c); in some media, a requirement to label as attorney advertising, Rule 7.1(f); a requirement to include certain information identifying the advertiser, Rule 7.1(h); and pre-approval and retention requirements, Rule 7.1(k).

6. It does not appear from the face of the inquiry, or from the illustrative sentence quoted in paragraph 1 above, that the proposed advertisement would contain any false, deceptive or misleading statements or claims. A more definitive conclusion would require consideration of the entire actual advertisement in relation to terms of the representation available to the advertisement's recipients.[22] But if the advertisement as a whole and in context is not false, deceptive or misleading, and if it complies with the other requirements such as pre-approval and retention for required periods, then Rule 7.1 would not preclude its use.

7. Rule 7.3 contains further restrictions applying only to those advertisements that are also solicitations. The Rules define "solicitation" to include > any advertisement initiated by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm that is directed to, or targeted at, a specific recipient or group of recipients, or their family members or legal representatives, the primary purpose of which is the retention of the lawyer or law firm, and a significant motive for which is pecuniary gain.

Rule 7.3(b) (but excluding writings delivered in response to a specific request); see N.Y. State 1009 ¶13 (2014) (discussing elements of this definition).

8. "[A]n advertisement in public media such as newspapers, television, billboards, web sites or the like is a solicitation if it makes reference to a specific person or group of people whose legal needs arise out of a specific incident to which the advertisement explicitly refers." Rule 7.3, Cmt. [3]. But an advertisement in public media that does not make such reference "is presumed not to be directed to or targeted at a specific recipient or recipients" even if "it is intended to attract potential clients with needs in a specified area of law." Rule 7.3, Cmt. [4].

9. Thus, if the proposed advertisements were to refer explicitly to a specific incident and to a specific group of people with legal needs arising out of that incident, then the advertisements would be subject to restrictions on solicitations that are set forth in Rule 7.3.[23] But it does not appear from the inquiry that the advertisements would include such references. In that case, they would not be solicitations and Rule 7.3 would not apply.

10. The inquiry seeks guidance only as to the propriety of the proposed advertisements. Accordingly, we do not address the application of ethical rules to what the lawyer may say in a meeting resulting from a prospective client's response to the advertisement.

22 For example, the advertisement may not mislead as to the costs of seeking a second opinion or the additional costs, if any, that may be incurred by changing attorneys. Considerations bearing on the possibility of such additional costs may include but are not limited to the import of contingent fee arrangements and work that may need to be reconsidered or redone if a new strategy is adopted. Moreover, if a represented person contacts the inquirer about taking over an existing representation, whether as a result of the advertisement or otherwise, then the inquirer may need to address such considerations. See Rule 1.5(b) (requiring lawyer to communicate "the scope of the representation and the basis or rate of the fee and expenses for which the client will be responsible").

23 See, e.g., Rule 7.3(a)(2)(v) (prohibiting solicitation when lawyer intends but does not disclose that legal services will be performed primarily by a different and unaffiliated lawyer); Rule 7.3(c) (setting forth filing requirements); Rule 7.3(h) (requiring inclusion of certain information about the soliciting lawyer). Additional restrictions apply to solicitations relating to a specific incident involving potential claims for personal injury or wrongful death. See Rule 7.3(e) & Cmt. [5].

CONCLUSION:

11. A firm may advertise that it is available to provide second opinions on pending legal cases on which individuals are already represented.

OPINION 1011 (07/29/2014)

TOPIC: Duty to remedy fraudulent submissions to administrative agency

DIGEST: Duty under Rule 3.3 to remedy false statements made to a "tribunal" does not apply to applications for visas or work permits, though other rules may apply.

RULES: 1.2(d), 1.6, 3.3, 4.1, 8.5(b)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a New York attorney representing a corporate client (the "Employer," or the "Corporation") in matters related to immigration benefits. In the course of the representation, the inquirer filed several employment-based immigrant visa petitions with the Department of Labor, and related petitions with the Department of Homeland Security, in order to obtain the appropriate visas for foreign workers allowed to accept full-time employment in the United States when no U.S. worker is able to fill the position.

2. The application process required the Corporation to certify that it undertook sufficient efforts to locate a U.S. worker qualified for and willing to accept the position before offering the position to a foreign worker. As another required part of the visa petitions, an employee of the Corporation (the "Corporate Recruiter") signed and submitted attestations regarding the various methods of local recruiting the Corporation had supposedly undertaken. Relying on the Corporate Recruiter's assurances, the inquiring lawyer signed each application and submitted them to the Department of Labor. In each instance, the Department of Labor certified each application, at which time the lawyer prepared and filed related petitions with the Department of Homeland Security, which incorporated the applications certified by the DOL, to obtain permanent resident status for the foreign workers.

3. After the submission of these applications, and after some of the foreign workers acquired permanent resident status, the Corporation discovered that its employee, the Corporate Recruiter, had submitted knowingly false attestations.

4. Upon learning of this misconduct, the inquiring lawyer withdrew from representation of the Employer in connection with the applications that were filed but not resolved and in connection with similarly tainted documents that the lawyer had prepared but had not filed, and urged the Employer to disclose the conduct to the federal agencies. The Employer has refused to give the lawyer consent to disclose information regarding the fraudulent conduct to the federal agencies, claiming that the information is privileged and confidential.

QUESTION:

5. Where an attorney learns of misconduct by an employee of a client that resulted in both the client and the attorney making false representations to a government agency in an application for a foreign-workers' visa, does Rule 3.3(b) require the attorney to disclose the underlying misconduct to the federal agency that granted the visa if the client declines to do so?

OPINION:

The New York Rules of Professional Conduct Apply

6. The inquiry concerns conduct before a federal agency with its own rules of professional conduct. See 8 C.F.R. § 1003.102. The choice-of-law provisions in Rule 8.5 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") distinguish between an attorney's "conduct in connection with a proceeding in a court," Rule 8.5(b)(1), and "any other conduct," Rule 8.5(b)(2). For conduct in connection with a proceeding in a court, "the rules to be applied shall be the rules of the jurisdiction in which the court sits, unless the rules of the court provide otherwise." Rule 8.5(b)(1). For all other conduct, if "the lawyer is licensed to practice only in this state" – as is the case here – "the rules to be applied shall be the rules of this state." Rule 8.5(b)(2).

7. Rule 8.5(b)(1) is limited to a proceeding before "a court"; the New York Appellate Division declined to adopt a proposed version of the rule that would have extended it to govern conduct in connection with proceedings before any "tribunal." See N.Y. State 968 ¶6 (2013) ("we do not believe we are free to read 'court' in Rule 8.5(b)(1) to include administrative tribunals"). We discuss below whether consideration of a visa application is a proceeding before a "tribunal," but it is clearly not a proceeding before a "court." See N.Y. State 750 (2001) (conduct of attorney "who represents individuals in immigration matters" is conduct that "does not involve court proceedings"). Accordingly, Rule 8.5(b)(2) governs, and the conduct is subject to the New York Rules of Professional Conduct.

8. Attorney conduct rules of the federal agencies involved, such as those cited above, could also be relevant to the inquirer's obligations. For example, the rules of professional conduct for practitioners before the Executive Office for Immigration Review provide: "If a practitioner has offered material evidence and comes to know of its falsity, the practitioner shall take appropriate remedial measures." 8 C.F.R § 1003.102(c); see 8 C.F.R § 1001.1(i) (defining "practice" to include acts of any person appearing in a case through "the preparation or filing of any brief or other document, paper, application, or petition on behalf of another person or client before or with DHS, or any immigration judge, or the Board"). However, our jurisdiction is limited to interpreting the New York Rules. We thus analyze the inquirer's ethical obligations under those Rules, but we express no view as to whether those obligations are modified or supplemented by ethics rules of the agencies in question.

Rule 3.3 Does Not Apply to False Statements in an Administrative Immigration Proceeding

9. Rule 3.3, which is entitled "Conduct Before a Tribunal," addresses a lawyer's obligations upon learning that evidence provided to a "tribunal" was false. In relevant part, Rule 3.3 provides:

> (a) A lawyer shall not knowingly:
> > (1) make a false statement of fact or law to a tribunal or fail to correct a false statement of material fact or law previously made to the tribunal by the lawyer; . . . or
> > (3) offer or use evidence that the lawyer knows to be false. If a lawyer, the lawyer's client, or a witness called by the lawyer has offered material evidence and the lawyer comes to know of its falsity, the lawyer shall take reasonable remedial measures, including, if necessary, disclosure to the tribunal. . . .

> (b) A lawyer who represents a client before a tribunal and who knows that a person intends to engage, is engaging or has engaged in criminal or fraudulent conduct related to the proceeding shall take reasonable remedial measures, including, if necessary, disclosure to the tribunal.

10. Of central importance here, Rule 3.3(c) requires that a lawyer take such remedial measures "even if compliance requires disclosure of information otherwise protected by Rule 1.6." That is, the duty to remedy false statements of fact or law made to a tribunal, or false "evidence" presented to the tribunal, can override the lawyer's duty of confidentiality to a client.

11. In contrast to Rule 8.5(b)(1), which is limited to proceedings before a "court," Rule 3.3 applies broadly to false statements made to any "tribunal." Rule 1.0(w) defines the term "tribunal" as follows:

> "Tribunal" denotes a court, an arbitrator in an arbitration proceeding or a legislative body, administrative agency or other body acting in an adjudicative capacity. A legislative body, administrative agency or other body acts in an adjudicative capacity when a neutral official, after the presentation of evidence or legal argument by a party or parties, will render a legal judgment directly affecting a party's interests in a particular matter.

12. We have previously offered the following general criteria to help guide analysis of whether a particular administrative proceeding is sufficiently adjudicative to qualify as a "tribunal":

> (a) Whether specific parties will be affected by the decision;
> (b) Whether the parties have the opportunity to present evidence and cross examine other providers [of] evidence; and
> (c) Whether the ultimate determination will be made by a person in a policy-making role or by an independent trier of fact, such as an administrative law judge.

N.Y. State 838 ¶12 (2010).

13. Based on the facts provided to us, we conclude that the immigration proceedings at issue here do not qualify as proceedings before a "tribunal." The ordinary meanings of the words "tribunal" and "adjudication" do not encompass an administrative procedure involving a unilateral application for a benefit. In ordinary parlance, the material presented with such an application, although attested to "under penalty of perjury," is not "evidence," and the answers to the questions in the required forms are not "legal argument," both terms used in the Rule's definition of "tribunal." There is also no adverse party, no oral proceeding and no cross-examination, which are hallmarks of many adjudicative proceedings. The consular officers and other government officials who consider these applications, while they presumably endeavor to administer the laws in an impartial and conscientious way, would not be called "triers of fact," another common feature of adjudicative proceedings to which we pointed in N.Y. State 838. We do not say that unilateral proceedings may never be adjudicative – the Rule expressly contemplates that an adjudication may result from a proceeding in which there is "presentation of evidence or legal argument by a [single] party." But the visa and work permit proceedings at issue here do not meet the test.

14. Two ABA ethics opinions have reached a similar conclusion with respect to administrative proceedings, although each involved proceedings that were more akin to investigations than those here. ABA 93-375 advised that a "routine bank examination" should not "be considered an 'adjudicative proceeding' so as to bring into play the lawyer's duty of candor under Rule 3.3(b)."[24] The opinion relied on a prior ABA opinion that had held, for purposes of predecessor rules, that the Internal Revenue Service was "neither a true tribunal, nor even a quasi-judicial institution," at least when settling tax cases. ABA 314 (1965) (withdrawn on other grounds by ABA 85-352). Professor Wolfram concludes that a patent application, which is in some respects similar to the visa applications at issue here, is "a substantially nonadjudicatory proceeding" for purposes of a predecessor to Rule 3.3 in which "tribunal" was similarly defined to mean "all courts and all other adjudicatory bodies." Wolfram, Modern Legal Ethics § 12.6.5, at 673-74 (1986). He notes that "many administrative agencies can be regarded as 'adjudicatory bodies' only if the concept of adjudication is taken very far from its judicial roots" and that the "adjudicatory model" involves "adversarial presentation of two points of view." Id.

15. We are aware of contrary authority. In particular, three courts have found applications for a visa or other government benefit to be proceedings before a "tribunal" for purposes of Rule 3.3, but none explained its analysis. In In re Vohra, 68 A.3d 766, 781-82 (D.C. 2013), the District of Columbia Court of Appeals affirmed a conclusion that the District of Columbia's version of Rule 3.3 applied to an attorney who forged his clients' signatures on a visa application, but the attorney did not dispute the finding that the Rule applied, and the violation of Rule 3.3 was one of approximately a dozen rules that the underlying disciplinary board had found to have been violated.[25] In Matter of Bihlmeyer, 515 N.W.2d 236 (S.D. 1994), the South Dakota Supreme Court found that statements made to the Industrial Commissioner of Iowa regarding the attorney's fee arrangement in an application for a lump-sum payment on a worker's compensation claim were also "before a tribunal" for purposes of Rule 3.3, but the attorney there also had admitted that the rule applied. In In re Disciplinary Proceeding Against Conteh, 284 P.3d 724 (Wash. 2012), the Washington Supreme Court found a lawyer's misrepresentation of his own employment history in his asylum application to be a violation of Rule 3.3, but the opinion does not discuss whether the application was made before a "tribunal." See also Hazard & Hodes, The Law of Lawyering § 29.3, at 29-7 (2007 Supp.) (stating, without citing authority, "Rule 3.3(d) applies to such matters as applications before the Patent Office and other ex parte presentations").

16. In addition, while not determinative of the ethics question, we note that Congress, in creating the Bureau of Citizenship and Immigration Services, referred to one of the functions being transferred 24 The ABA opinion predates the inclusion of the definition of "tribunal" in the ABA Model Rules, but the ABA committee viewed Rule 3.3 as applying to an "'adjudicative proceeding' before a 'tribunal,'" a view derived from the contrast to Rule 3.9, which applies to "nonadjudicative proceedings." The opinion thus predicted the definition of "tribunal" that was later adopted.

25 The D.C. definition of "tribunal" is different from New York's, although the gist of the test appears to be similar. In place of the term "adjudicative capacity," the D.C. rule defines "tribunal" to be "a court, regulatory agency, commission, and any other body or individual authorized by law to render decisions of a judicial or quasi-judicial nature, based on information presented before it, regardless of the degree of formality or informality of the proceedings." See Report and Recommendation of Hearing Comm. No. 1, In the Matter of Robert N. Vohra, Bar Dkt. 324-06, at 42 n.6 (Aug. 9, 2011) (emphasis added).

from the Immigration and Naturalization Service as "[a]djudications of immigrant visa petitions." 6 U.S.C. § 271(b)(1). This is in line with the Administrative Procedure Act, which treats "licensing" as "adjudications." 5 U.S.C. § 551(6), (7).[26]

17. We are not persuaded by these authorities. We are concerned that interpreting the terms "tribunal" and "adjudicatory" to apply to unilateral applications for government benefits would lay a trap for the unwary, because such an application would, as Professor Wolfram notes, take the term "adjudicative" "very far from its judicial roots." Wolfram, supra, at 673-74. There may well be, as Professor Wolfram also notes, id., policy reasons that duties of candor should apply with even more rigor in unilateral proceedings. But the drafters of the Rules were conscious of the very strong countervailing force of a lawyer's duty of confidentiality. The circumstances in which a lawyer is required to override that duty are thus very limited. Indeed, the New York Rules do not contain the one other rule in the ABA Model Rules in which the lawyer has an obligation to disclose false testimony, Rule 3.9. ABA Model Rule 3.9 states that a lawyer representing a client "before a legislative body or administrative agency in a nonadjudicative proceeding . . . shall conform to the provisions of Rules 3.3(a) through (c) . . . ." New York's version of that Rule omits the duty to conform to Rule 3.3 and does not does not address the question of correcting false statements.

18. A Comment to the ABA version of Rule 3.9 also supports the conclusion that administrative proceedings such as those at issue here are not "adjudications" for purposes of ABA Model Rule 3.3 (which served as the model for New York's Rule 3.3). Comment [3] provides that Rule 3.9 applies only when the lawyer or the lawyer's client "is presenting evidence or argument. It does not apply to representation of a client in a negotiation or other bilateral transaction with a governmental agency or in connection with an application for a license or other privilege or the client's compliance with generally applicable reporting requirements, such as the filing of income-tax returns." ABA Model Rule 3.9 Comment [3] (emphasis added). The Comment thus appears to consider "applications for a license or other privilege" not to involve the presentation of "evidence or argument." As quoted above, the definition of "tribunal" indicates that the presentation of "evidence or legal argument" is one of the required elements of adjudication.

Other Rules or Law May Permit, or Even Require, Disclosure of the False Statements

19. The inquirer asks only about the obligation to correct false statements under Rule 3.3. We note, however, that even if, as we conclude above, Rule 3.3 does not apply to require disclosure of the false statements here, Rule 1.6(b)(3) permits a lawyer to reveal confidential obligation to the extent that the lawyer reasonably believes necessary > to withdraw a written or oral opinion or representation previously given by the lawyer and reasonably believed by the lawyer still to be relied upon by a third person, where the lawyer has discovered that the opinion or representation was based on materially inaccurate information or is being used to further a crime or fraud.

The forms that we understand the inquirer submitted each require that the "preparer" of the form certify that the information contained in the forms is true to the best of the preparer's knowledge. If the 26 Issuance of a visa appears to be a form of "licensing," which is defined as, among other things, the grant of "an agency permit, certificate, approval, registration, charter, membership, statutory exemption or other form of permission." 5 U.S.C. § 551(8)-(9).

inquirer reasonably believes that the relevant federal agencies are continuing to rely upon any certification that the inquirer may have made, or that such certification is being used to further a crime or fraud, then Rule 1.6 permits (but does not require) him to withdraw that certification.

20. In addition, Rule 1.6(b)(6) permits disclosure of confidential information to the extent a lawyer reasonably believes necessary "when permitted or required under these Rules or to comply with other law or court order." (Emphasis added.) Thus, for example, if the federal rule noted in paragraph 8 above (8 C.F.R § 1003.102(c)) requires that the inquirer take action to remedy the false statements here, and the inquirer reasonably concludes that disclosure of confidential information or withdrawal of his certification is necessary to comply with that obligation, then such disclosure or withdrawal would not violate Rule 1.6. However, any such "disclosure adverse to the client's interest should be no greater than the lawyer reasonably believes necessary to accomplish the purpose." Rule 1.6, Cmt. [14].

21. Further, Rule 1.2(d) provides that a lawyer generally shall not assist a client "in conduct that the lawyer knows is illegal or fraudulent," and Rule 4.1 provides that a lawyer, in representing a client, "shall not knowingly make a false statement of fact or law to a third person." A comment notes that "[s]ometimes it may be necessary for the lawyer to give notice of the fact of withdrawal and to disaffirm an opinion, document, affirmation or the like." Rule 4.1, Cmt. [3]. We do not express any view on whether silence in the present circumstances could be deemed to be a continuing affirmative statement of fact such as to require correction. Cf. D.C. Ethics Op. 336 (2006) (opining that when incapacitated person gave false name and social security number, and court-appointed guardian used that information to obtain benefits and learned later that the information was false, withholding those facts in periodic reports to the court "would likely constitute a 'circumstance[] where the failure to make a disclosure is the equivalent of an affirmative misrepresentation'" for purposes of Rules 3.3 and 8.4).

CONCLUSION:

22. The lawyer's conduct is subject to the New York Rules of Professional Conduct. The immigration proceedings at issue here do not constitute adjudicative proceedings before a "tribunal" so as to trigger the lawyer's obligations under Rule 3.3. The lawyer should consider, however, whether obligations may by imposed by other ethics rules including rules of the federal agencies involved.

TOPIC: Conflicts arising from limited-services pro bono representation

DIGEST: A lawyer who represents a client in a limited pro bono legal services program owes a continuing duty of confidentiality to that client, and is precluded from later representing a materially adverse client in the same or a substantially related matter if the lawyer has actual knowledge of the unwaived conflict, but conflicts arising from participation in such a program are not imputed to others in the lawyer's firm.

RULES: 1.6, 1.7, 1.9, 1.10, 5.1, 6.5

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is the managing attorney of a county bar association legal services project. The bar association sponsors a legal services corporation that runs a limited pro bono legal services program (the "Program"). A lawyer who volunteers in such a program (a "Participating Lawyer") renders advice to individual clients (the "Program Clients") in a clinic setting on subjects such as landlord/tenant, domestic violence, family court and pro se federal court matters. The services are completed in one evening and often involve referral to another agency to assist the Program Client. After that evening, the Participating Lawyer does not provide any additional services to, or have any continuing relationship with, the Program Client.

2. Participating Lawyers typically volunteer their services three to four times per year. The Program advises the Program Clients that the services are limited to addressing one problem and that the lawyer rendering the limited service will not provide any further services to the client. The rights and responsibilities of the Program and the Program Client, including the limited nature of the representation, are set forth in a written agreement signed by the Program and the Program Client, and the Program retains that written agreement.

QUESTIONS:

3. If a lawyer has represented a client in a limited pro bono legal services program, may that same lawyer later represent another client with interests materially adverse to the Program Client in the same or a substantially related matter?

4. If a lawyer in a firm has represented a client in a limited pro bono legal services program, may another lawyer associated in the same firm represent a client with interests materially adverse to the Program Client in the same or a substantially related matter?

OPINION:

5. The inquiry is governed by Rule 6.5 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"). That rule's precursor, ABA Model Rule 6.5, was adopted in 2002 based on a proposal by the ABA Ethics 2000 Commission. The ABA proposal addressed conflict-checking requirements in the context of providing short-term limited representation under the auspices of a volunteer legal services project operated by a local bar association. The concern underlying the ABA rule was that

"strict application of the conflict-of-interest rules may be deterring lawyers from serving as volunteers in programs in which clients are provided short-term limited legal services." Report of the ABA Ethics 2000 Commission, quoted in Simon's New York Rules of Professional Conduct Annotated 1314 (2013 ed.). In New York, prior to the adoption of Rule 6.5 in 2007, Rule 1.10(e) required a lawyer advising a client in a limited-services program to do a firm-wide conflicts check even though such programs "are normally operated under circumstances in which it is not feasible for a lawyer to utilize the conflict-checking system required by Rule 1.10(e)" before providing the limited kinds of services that such programs provide. Rule 6.5, Cmt. [1].

6. New York adopted a version of Rule 6.5 in 2007, using language slightly different from the ABA Model Rule. The current New York Rule 6.5 applies to a lawyer who provides short-term limited legal services under the auspices of a program sponsored by a bar association or certain other kinds of entities.[27]

7. Rule 6.5 provides in part that such a lawyer is required to comply with certain conflicts rules – namely, Rules 1.7, 1.8 and 1.9 – "only if the lawyer has actual knowledge at the time of commencement of representation that the representation of the client involves a conflict of interest." Rule 6.5(a)(1) (emphasis added). It also provides that the lawyer is required to comply with the imputation provisions in Rule 1.10 "only if the lawyer has actual knowledge at the time of commencement of representation that another lawyer associated with the lawyer in a law firm is affected by Rules 1.7, 1.8 and 1.9." Rule 6.5(a)(2) (emphasis added). However, Rule 6.5 ceases to apply "if during the course of the representation, the lawyer providing the services becomes aware of the existence of a conflict of interest precluding continued representation." Rule 6.5(e).

8. Rule 6.5 is written from the perspective of the individual Participating Lawyer and addresses what the lawyer must consider when undertaking a limited-services assignment. It makes the usual conflicts rules inapplicable unless the Participating Lawyer has "actual knowledge" that the representation of the client involves a conflict of interest.[28] In the absence of such actual knowledge, the lawyer does not need to make any further conflicts inquiry and may provide the short-term services.

9. The reason for relaxing the conflicts rules in this context is that "a lawyer who is representing a client in the circumstances addressed by [Rule 6.5] ordinarily is not able to check systematically for conflicts of interest." Rule 6.5, Cmt. [3]; see Rule 6.5, Cmt. [1], quoted in paragraph 5 supra. Thus the clear implication of Rule 6.5 is that a Participating Lawyer may undertake a limited-services representation without first consulting the conflict-checking system required by Rule 1.10(e). Moreover, while Rule 6.5 does not explicitly address what is required by Rule 1.10(e), we think it is within the fair import of the approach taken in Rule 6.5 that a limited-services representation does not require the Participating Lawyer or that lawyer's firm to enter the limited-services relationship into the firm's conflict-checking system.

27 "Short-term limited legal services" is defined to mean "services providing legal advice or representation free of charge as part of a program described in [Rule 6.5(a)] with no expectation that the assistance will continue beyond what is necessary to complete an initial consultation, representation or court appearance." Rule 6.5(c).

28 For example, if, at the outset of the consultation, the lawyer actually knows that the short-term representation would conflict with a current client under Rule 1.7 or with a former client under Rule 1.9, then the lawyer generally may not provide the short-term limited legal services. Likewise, if the lawyer obtains such actual knowledge during the course of the consultation, then the lawyer may not continue to provide the services.

A. Do the Usual Conflict Rules Apply to a Participating Lawyer?

10. The first question is whether the relaxed conflicts rules that apply to the Participating Lawyer during the provision of the short-term limited legal services also apply if a conflict between a Program Client and another client or prospective client arises (or is discovered) after the short-term representation has ended. Suppose, for example, that after the Participating Lawyer has finished rendering services in a certain matter to a short-term Program Client, a prospective client seeks to retain the Participating Lawyer in the same or a substantially similar matter, and the prospective client's interests in the matter are materially adverse to those of the Program Client. Does Rule 6.5 continue to apply? If not, then the lawyer would be subject to the more exacting conflict provisions that ordinarily apply.[29]

11. We believe that Rule 6.5 continues to relax the conflict rules in this situation until there is actual knowledge of a conflict. Our conclusion is based on the Rule's broad language, its policy of facilitating participation in limited legal services programs, and the lack of any provision explicitly terminating its application at the conclusion of the short-term representation. See Rule 6.5(b) (providing that except when conflict is imputed based on actual knowledge, Rules 1.7 and 1.9 "are inapplicable to a representation governed by this Rule").

12. Thus, when a prospective client seeks to retain the Participating Lawyer, and unknown to the Participating Lawyer there is a potential conflict arising from the lawyer's participation in the Program, the Participating Lawyer remains subject only to the relaxed conflict provisions of Rule 6.5(a)-(b). In other words, if the Participating Lawyer does not have "actual knowledge" of a conflict with the Program Client, then the Participating Lawyer may undertake the new representation.[30]

13. However, if at any time the Participating Lawyer comes to have actual knowledge that the prospective client is seeking representation in a matter that is the same as or substantially related to a matter on which the Participating Lawyer represented a Program Client, and that the interests of the two are materially adverse, then the relaxed conflict provisions of Rule 6.5(a)-(b) cease to apply. See Rule 6.5(e). At that point, the regular conflicts rules apply as usual, and the Participating Lawyer may not represent the prospective client absent the former Program Client's informed consent confirmed in writing. See Rule 1.9(a).

B. Are the Participating Lawyer's Conflicts Imputed to the Firm?

14. In the second question, the inquirer asks whether Rule 1.10(a), which imputes a lawyer's conflicts under certain rules to others associated in the same firm, would prohibit another member of the 29 If Rule 6.5 did not apply, the lawyer would be subject to the provisions in Rule 1.9 that govern conflicts relating to former clients. See Rule 6.5, Cmt. [1] (noting that in advice-only clinics and pro se counseling programs, "a client-lawyer relationship is established"); Rule 6.5, Cmt. [2] (stating that except as provided in Rule 6.5, the limited representation is subject to all the Rules, and citing as an example Rule 1.9(c), which applies to former clients). But see Simon's New York Rules of Professional Conduct Annotated 1321 (2013 ed.) (arguing that limited-service clients should enjoy only the protections accorded prospective clients under Rule 1.18 rather than the broader protections accorded former clients under Rule 1.9).

30 Of course it would still be necessary to consult the firm conflict-checking system to check for possible conflicts with current firm clients, and with former clients other than Program Clients. Rule 6.5 relaxes the requirement of using a conflict-checking system only with respect to short-term clients under that Rule; with respect to other former clients and current ones, Rules 1.7, 1.9 and 1.10(e) apply as usual.

Participating Lawyer's firm from representing a client who has interests materially adverse to the Program Client in the same or a substantially similar matter.

15. In analyzing this question, we are again guided by the Rule's broad language and its policy of facilitating participation in short-term legal services programs. For such programs, Rule 6.5 not only limits the application of underlying conflict provisions such as Rules 1.7 and 1.9, but also – at least as to a Participating Lawyer – limits the application of the imputation provisions of Rule 1.10. See Rule 6.5(a)(2). We believe that just as applying a rigid imputation rule to a Participating Lawyer could unduly burden a firm's participation in such programs, so could undue burdens result from applying a rigid imputation rule to other lawyers in the Participating Lawyer's firm. And the rules do not by their terms explicitly mandate such imputation to other lawyers in the firm.[31]

16. Thus, if a new client seeks to retain the Participating Lawyer's firm in a matter that is the same as or substantially related to a matter on which the Participating Lawyer represented a Program Client, and there is known material adversity between the interests of the two, then Rule 1.10(a) will not preclude other members of the firm from representing the new client, even though Rule 1.9(a) will preclude the Participating Lawyer from doing so absent proper waiver.[32] The same reasoning applies if the firm discovers that it is already representing a client in a matter that is the same as or substantially related to a matter on which the Participating Lawyer represented a Program Client, and that there is material adversity between the interests of the two. In that case too, the Participating Lawyer's conflict would not be imputed to other members of the firm, and those other members could continue the representation.[33]

17. Nothing about the limited nature of the Program modifies the Participating Lawyer's duties of confidentiality to the Program Client.[34] Thus, even when the Participating Lawyer or another lawyer in the firm may and does represent another client with materially adverse interests in a substantially related matter, the Participating Lawyer may not reveal confidential information of the former Program Client, or use confidential information of the former Program Client to that former client's disadvantage, except as permitted by Rule 1.9(c).

31 So long as a possible conflict remains governed by Rule 6.5 – which means that the application of that Rule has not been negated by actual knowledge under Rule 6.5(a) and (e) – then the possible conflict is not governed by Rule 1.7 or 1.9, and the literal terms of Rule 1.10(a) therefore do not impute any conflict. Rule 6.5 ceases to apply when the Participating Lawyer comes to have actual knowledge of a conflict, but the Rules do not explicitly provide in that case that Rule 1.10 springs back to apply to other lawyers in the firm. Cf. Rule 6.5(a)(2) (providing that in case of actual knowledge the Participating Lawyer shall comply with Rule 1.10); Rule 6.5, Cmt. [5] (Rule 1.10 does "become applicable" if the Participating Lawyer later undertakes to represent the Program Client "on an ongoing basis," meaning beyond the confines of the short-term program).

32 We have addressed only the situation in which the conflict is known to the firm. It is also possible, especially since conflict-checking systems are not required to include short-term clients, see paragraph 9 supra, that the firm would not discover the conflict. But in that case there would be no argument for imputation. See Rule 1.10(a) (providing that lawyers shall not "knowingly" represent a client whom an associated lawyer could not represent due to certain kinds of conflicts).

33 Of course Rule 6.5 affects only those conflicts that could arise as a result of a lawyer's participation in a short-term limited legal services program. If other lawyers in the firm have any direct or imputed conflicts arising from any other source, then Rule 6.5 would not alter their obligation to follow the normal rules governing conflicts of interest.

34 Confidentiality duties are defined by Rule 1.6 during the short time of the representation in the Program, and thereafter are defined by Rule 1.9(c). See Rule 6.5(d) (short-term limited legal services representation "shall be subject to the provisions of Rule 1.6"); Rule 6.5, Cmt. [2] (except as provided in Rule 6.5, all rules of legal ethics, "including Rule[ ] 1.6 and Rule 1.9(c), are applicable to the limited representation"). We decline to follow the alternative suggestion, see note 3 supra, that confidentiality duties should be only those that apply to prospective clients under Rule 1.18.

18. The ethical obligations arising from participating in the Program extend beyond the Participating Lawyer. All lawyers with management responsibility in the firm, and the firm itself, are required to make reasonable efforts to ensure that the lawyers in the firm conform to ethical obligations. See Rule 5.1(a), (b). Here, those obligations include (i) the Participating Lawyer's duty of confidentiality to the Program Client and (ii) the Participating Lawyer's duty to refrain from representing a client materially adverse to the Program Client when the Participating Lawyer actually knows of a conflict prohibiting such representation.

CONCLUSION:

19. A lawyer who has represented a client in a limited pro bono legal services program is prohibited from subsequently representing a materially adverse client in the same or a substantially related matter only if the lawyer has actual knowledge of the conflict. Even if the lawyer has actual knowledge of such a conflict, however, the conflict is not imputed to others in the lawyer's firm. Whether or not anyone in the firm represents a client adverse to the limited-services client, the lawyer who represented the limited-services client remains bound by confidentiality obligations to that client.

OPINION 1013 (08/01/2014)

TOPIC: Dual Practice; Conflict of Interest

DIGEST: An attorney who works as a broker at a brokerage firm cannot represent an owner of property in foreclosure proceedings for the purposes of preventing the foreclosure and allowing the attorney to subsequently act as a broker for the brokerage firm to purchase the property.

RULES: Rules 1.7(a) & (b).

FACTS:

1. The inquirer, who is an attorney, is also working as a broker at a brokerage firm that wishes to purchase a property. The owner of the property is in foreclosure proceedings.

2. The inquirer desires to represent the defendant owner in foreclosure proceedings for the purpose of preventing the foreclosure so the brokerage firm where he works as a broker can purchase the property. The inquirer concedes that he would be "the broker and attorney on the same property at the same time," but contends that "the roles would be played in two different manners[:] One as attorney in litigation with the lien holder, and one as broker for the prospective purchasing brokerage."

QUESTION:

3. May an attorney who works as a broker at a brokerage firm represent an owner of property in foreclosure proceedings for the purposes of preventing the foreclosure and allowing the attorney to subsequently act for the brokerage firm in its purchase of the property?

OPINION:

4. We have concluded in a legion of opinions that a lawyer may not act as an attorney on behalf of any party to a real estate transaction in which the lawyer or the lawyer's spouse is acting as a broker because the dual role creates a conflict between the interests of the client and the interests of the lawyer. See, e.g., N.Y. State 919 (2012); N.Y. State 493 (1978); N.Y. State 340 (1974); N.Y. State 291 (1973); N.Y. State 244 (1972); N.Y. State 208 (1971). This conflict is not waivable, so the prohibition cannot be overcome through disclosure and client consent under Rule 1.7(b). See N.Y. State 919; N.Y. State 208. "'The rationale for these opinions is that a lawyer should not have a personal stake in the advice rendered, and a broker who is paid only if the transaction closes cannot be fully independent in advising the client as a lawyer.'" N.Y. State 919 (2012) (quoting N.Y. State 753 (2002)).

5. The facts presented by this inquiry demand the same analysis and the same result; a nonconsentable conflict arises in the situation posed by the inquirer. As in situations where an attorney acts as both a real estate broker and an attorney, an inherent conflict of interest arises when the lawyer represents the defendant owner in mortgage foreclosure proceedings with the intention of thereafter purchasing the property as broker for a prospective purchaser. A "reasonable lawyer would conclude" that where an attorney representing a defendant owner in a mortgage foreclosure proceeding plans to subsequently purchase the property as a broker for a prospective purchaser, "there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of [the] client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests." Rule 1.7(a)(2). This is due to the fact that any outcome in the mortgage foreclosure proceeding in which the plaintiff lender obtains the property, even if that is the best possible result for the client, will thwart the attorney's plan to broker the purchase of the property from the client.

6. Furthermore, we conclude that the inquirer cannot "provide competent and diligent representation" to the defendant owner in the mortgage foreclosure proceeding, as required by Rule 1.7(b)(2), because his judgment will be inherently tainted by his desire to subsequently broker the purchase of the property from the client, which will necessarily be contingent on the outcome of the foreclosure proceeding. Therefore, the inquirer's conflict cannot be cured by the client's informed consent under Rule 1.7(b)(4).

CONCLUSION:

7. An attorney who works as a broker at a brokerage firm cannot represent an owner of property in foreclosure proceedings for the purposes of preventing the foreclosure and allowing the attorney to subsequently act as a broker for the brokerage firm to purchase the property.

OPINION 1014 (08/04/2014)

TOPIC: Solicitation; client recommendation

DIGEST: Lawyer may contact prospective client recommended by current client when prospective client has made known that lawyer should contact the prospective client and the lawyer did not make any payment or give any other consideration to the current client for the recommendation.

RULES: 1.0(a), 7.2, 7.3, 8.4(a)

QUESTION:

1. May a lawyer contact a prospective client who is detained in jail, prison or an immigration holding center when a current client advises the lawyer that the prospective client desires the lawyer to contact him as a result of the current client's recommendation, for which no payment or other consideration was made?

FACTS:

2. A lawyer's current client is being held in a detention center and has recommended the lawyer to a fellow detainee. The prospective client has told the lawyer's client that he would like the lawyer to contact him to discuss his defense. The client has given the prospective client's name and telephone number to the lawyer and advised the lawyer that the prospective client would like the lawyer to contact him. The lawyer neither requested that the client make any recommendations nor did the lawyer make any payment or give any other consideration to the client.

OPINION:

3. The traditional manner of obtaining new clients has from early days been the recommendation of satisfied clients. The original Canon 27 of the ABA Canons of Professional Ethics adopted in 1908 provided in part that "[T]he most worthy and effective advertisement possible, even for young lawyers . . . is the establishment of a well-merited reputation for professional capacity and fidelity to trust." "The best way to build a practice is to work hard and conduct yourself ethically. In short time you will win the approval of clients, other lawyers, and judges; with their approval will come recommendation and success." Raymond L. Wise, Legal Ethics 137 (1970).

4. The vast majority of people do not know a lawyer. It is natural for one to ask a neighbor, an acquaintance, a business associate, a fellow worker or even a fellow prisoner or detainee not only for a recommendation, but in many instances an introduction to their lawyer.

5. Where nothing of value is given to the person recommending the lawyer, the proscription of Rule 7.2(a) and its predecessor DR 2-103(B) that provide that a "lawyer shall not compensate or give anything of value to a person . . . to recommend . . . a client or as a reward for having made a recommendation resulting in employment by a client . . ." is inapplicable. The recommendation by the lawyer's current client was unsolicited and nothing was paid to the client by the lawyer. Gratuitous referrals from current and former clients were never viewed as unethical. ABA Inf. 1298 (1974). Indeed the title of Rule 7.2 is "Payment for Referrals."

6. Comment [1] to Rule 7.2 which provides that "[l]awyers are not permitted to pay others for channeling professional work" (emphasis added) similarly places the prohibition on the fact of a payment or reward. As stated in Roy D. Simon, New York Rules of Professional Conduct 1633 (2014 ed.) "[a] lawyer must not pay cash or any other form of compensation to anyone or any entity for referring business to the lawyer unless one of the exceptions to subparagraphs (a)(1) and (a)(2) applies." The vice that these rules address is the payment to what have been described as "touts," "runners" and "ambulance chasers." If there is no payment involved the proscription in not applicable.

7. Not surprisingly we find no Rule that prohibits a lawyer from contacting a prospective client who has requested the lawyer do so on the recommendation of a current client.

8. The provisions of Rule 7.3(a)(1) which prohibit "in-person or telephone" solicitation (with exceptions not here pertinent) are also inapplicable. Solicitation is advertising initiated by or on behalf of a lawyer. Rule 7.3(b). Here the contact with the potential client was not initiated by or on behalf of the lawyer. Comment 2 to Rule 7.3 further emphasizes the point that to be solicitation the contact must be initiated by the lawyer. The Comment provides that solicitation means an advertisement "that is initiated by a lawyer or law firm (as opposed to a communication made in response to an inquiry initiated by a potential client.)" (Emphasis added). Here the current client, without prompting by the lawyer, recommended the lawyer to a fellow detainee. Even though the lawyer's contact with the prospective client might be considered an advertisement under Rule 1.0(a), the contact by the lawyer to the prospective client is being made at the request of the prospective client and thus has not been initiated by the lawyer. This is no different than a lawyer returning a voice mail message left by a prospective client or a response by a lawyer to a request for proposals to provide legal services. There is nothing improper in returning a request to be contacted. It has been summarized that "a response to a prospective client is not a solicitation." Simon at 1699. If upon the initial contact with the prospective client it is apparent that the prospective client did not request to be contacted by the lawyer, the lawyer must cease the conversation as further contact would constitute proscribed solicitation under Rule 7.3(a)(1).

9. Under the Code of Professional Responsibility, which governed the conduct of lawyers until April 1, 2009, this Committee determined that it was not ethically improper for a lawyer to accept referrals from real estate brokers. N.Y. State 467 (1977). Under the Rules of Professional Conduct, which replaced the Code, we have determined that it is not improper to accept referrals from accountants and bankers. N.Y. State 988, ¶7 (2013). In these instances there was no consideration paid by the lawyer for the referrals.

10. We conclude that the question is not who made the referral, but rather whether the lawyer initiated the solicitation or paid the person for the referral. If the lawyer neither initiated the solicitation of the proposed client nor paid for the referral, the lawyer may accept the proposed client. Thus, the inquiry is answered in the affirmative. The lawyer may contact a prospective client that a current client advises wants to be contacted by the lawyer, provided the lawyer neither initiated the contact nor paid for the referral. The same conclusion was reached in N. Y. City 2000-1 (2000), Texas Opinion 623 (2013), Boston Opinion 2012-01 (2012) and Rhode Island Opinion 98-16 (1998).

11. Nevertheless, a lawyer cannot instigate a current client or anyone else to solicit a specific client for the lawyer if the lawyer could not directly solicit the prospective client under Rule 7.3(a). The lawyer cannot do indirectly through the acts of a third- party that which he is forbidden to do. Rule 8.4(a) ("A lawyer or law firm shall not . . . violate or attempt to violate the Rules of Professional Conduct, knowingly assist or induce another to do so, or do so through the acts of another"). N.Y. State 988, ¶6 (2013). On the other hand, it is not improper to encourage clients and others to recommend the lawyer to their friends if they know someone who needs a lawyer.

CONCLUSION:

12. It is not unethical for a lawyer to contact a prospective client who has advised a current client that the prospective client would like the lawyer to contact him after the current client recommended the lawyer, provided that the lawyer has not paid or given anything of value to the current client for the recommendation.

OPINION 1015 (08/04/2014)

TOPIC: Dual practice; conflict of interest; nonlegal services

DIGEST: Lawyer who is also a real estate broker may represent the seller of real property and act as broker in same transaction if the lawyer's fee as a broker is fixed and non-refundable and any conflict is properly waived. Broker services that are not distinct from legal services are subject to the rules of legal ethics.

RULES: 1.5(a); 1.7; 5.7

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is both a lawyer and a licensed real estate broker. He proposes to provide certain broker services to sellers of real estate and then, if a buyer is found, also to provide legal services to the seller in the resulting transaction. The broker services would be compensated in a flat fee paid in advance rather than in a commission-based payment contingent upon closing.

2. The inquirer has provided two examples of the proposed arrangements. One example is that he would charge a fixed non-refundable fee of $300 for listing the property on the local multiple listing service ("MLS"), and the client would be advised that such listing would be the only service provided.[35] In the other example, the inquirer would charge a fixed non-refundable fee of $1,500 for all services normally provided by a broker for a seller. Even this larger amount would typically be less than the traditional broker's fee.[36]

3. In both examples, the inquirer would also represent the seller as the seller's lawyer in connection with the sale. Although the flat-rate broker fees would be lower than standard commission-based fees, the inquirer would not on that account charge more for his legal services than he charges other law clients for similar services.

QUESTION:

4. May a lawyer who is also a licensed real estate broker act as the lawyer for a seller of real property and also act as the seller's broker if the lawyer's compensation as broker is a fixed non-refundable fee not contingent on the closing of the sale?

35 This is in effect a listing for sale by owner ("FSBO"). However, if the seller wants the property listed on an MLS, the seller needs to engage a broker who is a participant in that MLS. The MLS arrangements, by providing for a commission to a broker representing the ultimate buyer, encourage brokers for prospective buyers to show the property. Typically the MLS listing form, signed by the seller and the seller's broker, sets forth the compensation of the seller's broker and the compensation of the buyer's broker, if any, to be paid by the seller. The inquirer is a participant in the local MLS.

36 We understand that there is some variation in fee arrangements depending on the transaction and the area of the State. Sometimes the seller's broker is paid a contingent fee of 6%, split equally with the buyer's broker so that each receives 3% of the selling price. In other cases the commission percentage and the split may be a bit different. But under any of the variations, the $1,500 fixed broker's fee would in most instances be significantly less than a traditional percentage-based fee.

OPINION:

5. The New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") generally prohibit a representation in which there is a significant risk that the lawyer's personal interests would have an adverse effect on the lawyer's exercise of professional judgment.[37]

6. We have opined on numerous occasions that a lawyer may not act as an attorney on behalf of any party to a real estate transaction in which the lawyer is acting as a broker. See, e.g., N.Y. State 1013 ¶1 (2014); N.Y. State 933 ¶7 (2012), N.Y. State 919 ¶3 (2012) (citing N.Y. State 493 (1978); N.Y. State 340 (1974); N.Y. State 291 (1973); N.Y. State 244 (1972); N.Y. State 208 (1971)). "The rationale for these opinions is that a lawyer should not have a personal stake in the advice rendered, and a broker who is paid only if the transaction closes cannot be fully independent in advising the client as a lawyer." N.Y. State 1013 ¶1 (2014) (quoting N.Y. State 753 (2002) and N.Y. State 919 (2012)).

7. The risk that legal judgment would be adversely affected is heightened by the common circumstance that the broker's contingent fee will be substantially greater than the fee of the lawyer representing the seller. Indeed, given the usual fee arrangements, we have found the risk so great that "[t]he conflict is nonconsentable (i.e., non-waivable), meaning that the prohibition cannot be overcome through disclosure and client consent" under Rule 1.7(b). N.Y. State 919 ¶3; see Rule 1.7(b)(1) (providing that conflict is nonconsentable if the lawyer cannot "reasonably" believe that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to the affected client).

8. However, these prior opinions were based on the premise of contingent brokers' commissions; we have not previously addressed the kind of broker's fee proposed in this inquiry. If a fee for broker services is not contingent on the transaction being closed and is non-refundable, then there is no reason to believe that the lawyer's professional judgment would be adversely affected by the lawyer's interest in that broker's fee. The reasoning in our prior opinions thus does not apply to the current inquiry.

9. On the facts of the current inquiry, however, there may still be a conflict of interest arising from considerations other than the lawyer's interest in the broker's fee.

> When a lawyer or law firm provides both legal and nonlegal services in the same matter . . . , a conflict with the lawyer's own interests will nearly always arise. For example, if the legal representation involves exercising judgment about whether to recommend nonlegal services and which provider to recommend, or if it involves overseeing the provision of the nonlegal services, then a conflict with the lawyer's own interests under Rule 1.7(a)(2) is likely to arise.

Rule 5.7, Cmt. [5A]; see N.Y. State 958 ¶17 (2013) (citing opinions holding that Rule 1.7 applies with undiminished force when lawyer's conflicting personal interest arises from a separate, permitted nonlegal business). For example, a lawyer representing a real estate seller who also engages the services of a real estate broker may have occasion to advise his client as to whether the broker services are being well performed. When, as proposed in the inquiry, the lawyer performs the broker services as well, there can be the kind of personal-interest conflict described in the Comment. This leads to the question whether such a conflict would be consentable.

37 Rule 1.7(a)(2) provides that "a lawyer shall not represent a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that . . . there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests" unless the conflict is waivable and properly waived pursuant to Rule 1.7(b).

10. The nonconsentability of the conflicts discussed in our prior broker opinions was based on fee considerations not present here. As to the current inquiry, if the lawyer believes that he will be able to provide competent and diligent legal representation to a particular seller, we do not see anything in the facts presented that would preclude that seller's proper waiver of the conflict.[38] If the seller gives informed consent confirmed in writing, as required by Rule 1.7(b)(4), then the inquiring lawyer may undertake the representation.

11. We referred in paragraph 9 to the lawyer's provision of nonlegal services – here, acting as a broker – because it bears on whether the lawyer has a conflict of interest in the concurrent provision of legal services. But an analysis of the inquirer's ethical obligations also requires consideration of the ways in which nonlegal services can themselves be subject to the rules of legal ethics. Rule 5.7 sets forth the responsibilities regarding nonlegal services, which are defined as "those services that lawyers may lawfully provide and that are not prohibited as an unauthorized practice of law when provided by a nonlawyer." Rule 5.7(c).

12. We understand that the services of a real estate broker may include pricing the house, market analysis, and advice on how to present the house and highlight desirable amenities. The broker may participate in marketing the house with for-sale signs, internet and newspaper advertising, direct-mail flyers, showings, an MLS listing to interest other brokers, and determination of factors such as annual utility costs and local school facts. The broker may also handle offers, counter-offers and contingency issues, up to final price negotiations, and keep a paper trail from initial offer to final closing. These are all services that both lawyers and nonlawyers may lawfully provide. Thus, as noted in N.Y. State 933 ¶8 (2012), broker services are nonlegal services within the meaning of Rule 5.7.

13. Different parts of Rule 5.7 apply to different situations. To determine which provision applies when a lawyer provides both legal and nonlegal services to a client, it is necessary to consider whether the nonlegal services "are distinct" from legal services being provided to that client. See Rule 5.7(a)(1), (2); Rule 5.7, Cmt. [1] ("Under some circumstances, the legal and nonlegal services may be so closely entwined that they cannot be distinguished from each other."). If they are not distinct, then the lawyer is subject to the Rules of Professional Conduct "with respect to the provision of both legal and nonlegal services." Rule 5.7(a)(1).

14. In the arrangements proposed here, the inquiring lawyer would provide legal and nonlegal services to a client from the same office and in the very same matter. Some of the potential nonlegal services, such as price negotiation, are ones also commonly performed by lawyers. Moreover, it appears that the client would communicate with the inquirer in the same way, and perhaps in the same conversations, for the provision of legal and nonlegal services. Possibly the contemplated legal and nonlegal services could be structured so as to keep them distinct.[39] But that has not been attempted here. Under the facts as presented, the inquirer's broker services to a client would not be distinct, for purposes of Rule 5.7, from the legal services to that client. Cf. N.Y. State 860 (2011) (legal and nonlegal services not distinct "where the law firm provides both grant writing services and tax advice or other legal services related to the grant application").

38 See Rule 1.7(b)(1) (precluding waiver if belief in ability to provide competent and diligent representation would be unreasonable); Rule 1.7(b)(2) (precluding waiver when representation is prohibited by law); Rule 1.7(b)(3) (precluding waiver when one client asserts claim against another).

15. Because the nonlegal and legal services would not be distinct, nonlegal broker services would be subject to all ethical protections "that ordinarily accompany a client-lawyer relationship," such as "the protection of client confidences and secrets, prohibitions against representation of persons with conflicting interests, and obligations of a lawyer to maintain professional independence." Rule 5.7, Cmt. [1]. Moreover, the prohibition of excessive fees in Rule 1.5(a) applies not only to legal fees, but also to the lawyer's overall compensation for the transaction, when there are legal and nonlegal services that are not distinct. See N.Y. State 958 ¶14 (2013).

CONCLUSION:

16. A lawyer may represent a seller of real property while also representing the seller as broker if (a) the services as broker are for a fixed non-refundable fee that is not contingent on the closing of the transaction, and (b) any conflict is properly waived. If the legal and broker services are not distinct, then the provision of broker services is subject to the rules of legal ethics, and the combined fees for legal and broker services may not be excessive.

(19-14)

39 For example, it could count toward a conclusion of distinct services if the lawyer performs all broker services at an office away from the law office and with a different company name, staff, and telephone number. If the services are distinct and the lawyer advises the client in writing that the broker services "are not legal services and that the protection of a client-lawyer relationship does not exist with respect to the nonlegal services," then the broker services would not be subject to rules of legal ethics, with some exceptions. Rule 5.7(a)(2), (4); see Rule 5.7, Cmt. [4] (noting that some rules, "such as those prohibiting lawyers from misusing the confidences or secrets of a former client (see Rule 1.9), requiring lawyers to report certain lawyer misconduct (see Rule 8.3), and prohibiting lawyers from engaging in illegal, dishonest, fraudulent or deceptive conduct (see Rule 8.4), apply to a lawyer irrespective of the existence of a representation" and thus govern even the provision of distinct nonlegal services).

OPINION 1016 (08/04/2014)

TOPIC: Advertising

DIGEST: An attorney may advertise using commercial posts sent via email to members of internet message boards provided the advertisement is not false, deceptive or misleading, does not otherwise violate the Rules and the label "Attorney Advertising" is in the subject line of the email.

RULES: Rule 1.0(a), 1.0(c), 7.1, 7.3, 7.4 & 8.4(c)

FACTS:

1. A sole practitioner belongs to several internet message boards, including one for parents and one for residents of specific neighborhoods. The attorney primarily practices in the areas of wills, trusts & estates and guardianship matters and proposes to advertise on the internet message boards to which the attorney belongs through an email sent to all the members of a particular message board.

2. The proposed advertisement would include the attorney's contact information, practice areas and a list of languages spoken, and would state that the attorney offers in-home consultations for the elderly and parents of young children.

QUESTION:

3. May an attorney advertise via commercial post email sent to the members of a message board to which the attorney belongs?

4. If so, are there any relevant limitations?

OPINION:

Attorney Advertising

5. Rule 1.0(a) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") defines the term "advertisement" as follows:

> "Advertisement" means any public or private communication made by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm about the lawyer or law firm's services, the primary purpose of which is for the retention of the lawyer or law firm. It does not include communications to existing clients or other lawyers.

6. Rule 7.1 of the Rules governs advertisements by lawyers and law firms and states in part as follows:

> (a) A lawyer or law firm shall not use or disseminate or participate in the use or dissemination of any advertisement that:
> (1) contains statements or claims that are false, deceptive or misleading; or

(2) violates a Rule.

7. Rule 7.1(b) expressly provides that subject to the provisions of Rule 7.1(a), advertisements may include information as to "legal and nonlegal education, degrees and other scholastic distinctions . . . areas of law in which the lawyer or law firm practices, as authorized by these Rules . . . foreign language fluency . . ." In addition, Rule 7.1(h) requires that "[a]ll advertisements . . . include . . . the principal law office address . . . of the lawyer or law firm whose services are being offered."

8. Clearly the information that the attorney proposes to include in the advertisement is permissible under Rule 7.1(b).

9. The Rules also contain certain requirements to be included in advertising. Rule 7.1(f) requires that most lawyer advertising be labeled "Attorney Advertising." Specifically Rule 7.1(f) states in part that:

> "every advertisement other than those appearing in a radio, television or billboard advertisement, in a directory, newspaper, magazine or other periodical (and any website related thereto) or made in person under Rule 7.3(a)(1) must be labeled "Attorney Advertising" on the first page or on the home page in the case of a website . . . in the case of electronic mail, the subject line shall contain the notation "ATTORNEY ADVERTISING."

10. In N.Y. State 848 (2010), the Committee determined that if a proposed newsletter is determined to be an advertisement then the law firm "should consider the audience for the newsletter in order to determine whether it must be labeled "Attorney Advertising." The Committee concluded that if the newsletter at issue "will also be circulated and made available electronically via the firm's website, via email, and via blogs, and posts where the precise nature of the receiving audience is unknown, [the] Law Firm must include the phrase "Attorney Advertising" on electronic versions of the newsletter." In making this determination the Committee explained that "[t]he "Attorney Advertising" label serves to dispel any confusion or concern that might be created when non-lawyers receive letters or emails from lawyers and the recipients might not otherwise know whether these communications are advertisements or educational items."[40]

11. The advertisement must also comply with Rule 8.4(c), which prohibits a lawyer from engaging in conduct involving "dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation," and "with Rule 7.4 ("Identification of Practice and Specialty"), which prohibits a lawyer or law firm from stating that the lawyer or law firm is a specialist or specializes in a particular field of law except in special circumstances." N.Y. State 841 (2010).

Does the Advertisement Constitute a Solicitation?

12. The advertisement would be transmitted via an email commercial post to all the members of the various message boards of which the attorney is a member, including parenting groups, neighborhood specific groups and parents of children with special needs. Does such advertising constitute a solicitation?

40 In addition, if the advertisement contains "statements that are reasonably likely to create an expectation about results the lawyer can achieve," and "statements that compare the lawyer's services with services of other lawyers" the precise disclaimer language, "prior results do not guarantee a similar outcome" is required. See, Rule 7.1(e) (3).

Comment [1] of Rule 7.3 states that "Not all advertisements are solicitations within the meaning of this Rule." Solicitation is defined in Rule 7.3(b) as follows:

> "Solicitation" means any advertisement initiated by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm that is directed to, or targeted at, a specific recipient or group of recipients, or their family members or legal representatives, the primary purpose of which is the retention of the lawyer or law firm, and a significant motive for which is pecuniary gain. It does not include a proposal or other writing prepared and delivered in response to a specific request of a prospective client.

13. Comments [3] and [4] to Rule 7.3 provide guidance as to whether an advertisement is considered to be directed to or targeted at a specific recipient or recipients.

14. Comment [3] states that one way that an advertisement may be considered to be directed to or targeted at a specific recipient or recipients is if it is made by "in-person or telephone contact or by real time or interactive computer-accessed communication or if it is addressed so that it will be delivered to the specific recipient or recipients or their families or agents." A non-interactive commercial post to members of the message group would not constitute an interactive computer-accessed communication.

15. In addition, comment [4] of Rule 7.3 states that "[u]nless it falls within Comment [3] an advertisement in public media such as newspapers, television, billboards, web sites or the like is presumed not to be directed to or targeted at a specific recipient or recipients." The presumption would not be rebutted simply because the advertisement is "intended to attract potential clients with needs in a specified area of law" and that fact would not render the advertisement to be targeted at a specific recipient or recipients. See Rule 7.3, Cmt. [4]. Similarly, the reality that some of the recipients of the proposed advertisement might be in need of the legal services offered by the attorney does not transform the advertisement into a solicitation. Id.

16. Because the proposed advertisement is not directed to, or targeted at, a specific recipient or group of recipients, it would not be a solicitation under Rule 7.3.

CONCLUSION:

17. An attorney may advertise using commercial posts sent via email to members of internet message boards to which the attorney belongs provided the advertisement is not false, deceptive or misleading, does not otherwise violate the Rules and the label "Attorney Advertising" is in the subject line of the email.

OPINION 1017 (08/06/2014)

TOPIC: Firm Name; Trade Name

DIGEST: A law firm's staff may answer the firm's telephones using the first initials of the last names of the named partners. Such limited use of the initials would not be practice under a trade name and would not violate Rule 7.5(b) as long as the firm will not practice law using those initials. The name of the little league team sponsored by the inquirer's firm could be the first initials of the named partners' last names; such a designation would not constitute practice under a trade name.

RULES: 7.5(b), 7.5(e)

FACTS:

1. For ease of answering phones, the inquirer would like to have the office staff answer the phones stating "ABC Law Firm." "ABC" represents the first initials of the last names of the named partners and would be for the limited purpose of answering the phones.

2. The inquirer also indicates that the firm would like to sponsor a little league team with the name "ABC Law Firm" and ABC would again represent the first initials of the last names of the named partners.

QUESTION:

3. Is the proposed conduct ethically permissible?

OPINION:

4. Rule 7.5(b) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") is relevant to answer the first question as it governs law firm names and the restrictions involved. Specifically, Rule 7.5(b) states in pertinent part:

> A lawyer in private practice shall not practice under a trade name, a name that is misleading as to the identity of the lawyer or lawyers practicing under such name, or a firm name containing names other than those of one or more of the lawyers in the firm, except that by the name of a professional corporation shall contain "PC" or such symbols permitted by law, the name of a limited liability company or partnership shall contain "LLC," "LLP" or such symbols permitted by law . . .

In N.Y. State 740 (2001), the Committee concluded that "using a name that is not the legal name of one or more partners or former partners in the law firm constitutes use of a trade name."The prohibition against practice under trade names is broad and Rule 7.5(b) serves to protect the public from being deceived as to the identity, responsibility or status of those who use the firm name. See N.Y. State 920 (2012) (citing N.Y. State 732 (2000), which applied the trade name prohibition under the former Code of Professional Responsibility).

5. Rule 7.5(e)(2) states that "A lawyer or law firm may utilize a domain name for an internet web site that does not include the name of the lawyer or law firm provided: the lawyer or law firm in no way attempts to engage in the practice of law using the domain name." Comment [2] to Rule 7.5(e) states that "as long as a firm's name complies with other Rules, it is always proper for a law firm to use its own name or its initials or some abbreviation or variation of its own name as its domain name."

6. In N.Y. State 872 (2011), we opined on the question of whether a lawyer with a Polish first name could use an English version of that name on business cards and his firm's website. We concluded that "a lawyer's use of an English name [in informal communications, on business cards and on his firm's website] is not misleading as to the identity of the lawyer and is not dishonest, fraudulent, deceitful, or a misrepresentation." Accordingly, it "does not run afoul of either Rule 7.5(b) or Rule 8.4(c)." We also stated that the attorney could use a "nickname by which the attorney is commonly known, as long as the name is not misleading as to the lawyer's identity."

7. In N.Y. State 1003 (2014), we concluded that a lawyer who practices under his full name may use a law firm name that includes only the lawyer's middle name initials and last name, without including his first name.

8. In the instant inquiry, the law firm does not want to change its name or practice under a different name. The law firm merely wants to use the named partners' initials for the limited purpose of answering the phones. The proposed use of the initials as a greeting to answer the phones is similar to the use of a nickname or English name in "informal communications" by the lawyer in N.Y. State 872. Neither the use of the nickname nor the use of the initials to answer the phone (as in the instant inquiry) would be used by the respective attorneys to practice law. We conclude that the use of the partners' initials when answering the telephones does not constitute practicing under a trade name, and does not misrepresent the identities of the lawyers. Therefore, the proposed limited use would not violate Rule 7.5(b). In addition, the sponsorship of a little league baseball team named after the initials of the named partners' last names, to wit, ABC Law Firm, would not constitute practice under a trade name, is not misleading as to the identities of the attorneys and is permissible under the applicable Ethics Rules.

9. In N.Y State 920 (2012), this Committee concluded that a lawyer may not practice under a law firm name that consists only of the lawyer's initials, but that the initials could constitute the firm's motto. We also stated that "[l]anguage or a name that is impermissible as a trade name may be permissible as a firm 'motto'" Here, the law firm does not intend to practice under the firm name ABC Law Firm, but rather intends to utilize the initials as a matter of convenience for the limited purpose of answering the phones. The firm name will remain the complete last names of the three named partners.

CONCLUSION:

10. A law firm's staff may answer the firm's telephones using the first initials of the last names of the named partners. Such limited use of the initials, without more, would not be practice under a trade name and would not violate Rule 7.5(b) as long as the firm will not practice law using those initials.

11. For the same reason, the name of the little league team sponsored by the inquirer's firm could be the initials of the named partners' last names.

TOPIC: Conflict of interest; withdrawal of representation; referral to new attorney.

DIGEST: A law firm that has a conflict of interest and withdraws from representation may provide the former client with a good faith referral to other attorneys the law firm believes appropriate to represent the client.

RULES: Rule 1.1(c)(2), 1.7, 1.9(c)(1), 1.16

FACTS:

1. The inquiring law firm has determined that it has a conflict of interest with an existing client and is moving to withdraw as attorneys of record for the client. The law firm states that it is not retaining any financial interest in the client's case.

QUESTION:

2. The question posed by the inquiring law firm is whether, after withdrawing as the client's attorneys, it can refer the former client to specific attorneys that it believes would be appropriate counsel for the former client or whether it can only recommend that the former client seek other counsel.

OPINION:

3. At the outset, we note that lawyers are not required under the New York Rules of Professional Conduct to provide former clients with specific referrals when a conflict of interest arises. In the event that a lawyer decides to provide such a referral in good faith, this opinion addresses the ethical considerations that a lawyer faces.

4. While the Rules do not directly address the question posed, Rule 1.16(e) provides that upon termination of representation a lawyer shall take steps to avoid foreseeable prejudice to the rights of a client, including allowing time for the client to employ other counsel.

5. Accordingly, providing a recommendation concerning new counsel to the former client is consistent with Rule 1.16(e). For example, such a recommendation reduces the potential for prejudice to the rights of the former client because the former client will have available to it "appropriate" new counsel that can take over representation of the client's interests. As another example, a recommendation will likely result in the former client finding new counsel that can handle its matter more quickly than it otherwise might in the absence of the referral.

6. Further, such a recommendation provides the former client with the benefit of the law firm's judgment of the appropriateness of the recommended new counsel based on information the law firm possesses about the client and the client's case, and depriving the former client of the benefit of such a recommendation could potentially cause prejudice to the client, contrary to Rule 1.16(e).

7. The former client is free to accept or reject the recommendation or to consider the recommended attorney as one option in the search for new counsel. Ultimately, it will be up to the client to decide which attorney to retain to represent its interests.

8. It is also worth noting that our prior opinions have assumed referrals were permitted where representation by the referring attorney was not permitted under the governing ethical standards. See, e.g., N.Y. State 338 (1974) (discussing that an attorney disqualified from representing a client may not accept a referral fee from the lawyer he recommended to handle a matter).

9. Consideration must also be given to whether such a referral runs afoul of Rules 1.1(c)(2) and 1.7 with respect to the rights of any continuing client whose representation caused the conflict that led to the withdrawal.

10. Rule 1.1(c)(2) prohibits a lawyer from intentionally prejudicing or damaging the client during the course of representation. However, we do not believe that a good faith recommendation of competent counsel to a former client under these circumstances is the type of prejudice or damage encompassed by Rule 1.1(c)(2).

11. Rule 4.3 supports this interpretation by allowing lawyers to advise unrepresented persons with potential conflicts with the lawyers' clients to seek counsel. Arguably, a lawyer's clients would be prejudiced by such a recommendation and in a better position had the unrepresented person remained uninformed about potentially needing counsel. Yet, the rules do not ban such a recommendation nor is the effect on the lawyer's client a factor in determining if the recommendation can be made.

12. This opinion is also consistent with D.C. Opinion 326 (2004) holding that a lawyer may recommend a specific attorney to a prospective client whose matter is adverse to that of an existing client. The D.C. Bar likewise opined that providing a specific referral did not violate the District of Columbia's equivalent to Rule 1.1(c)(2):

> We assume that in making the referral, the lawyer will act in good faith and will recommend competent and independent counsel. First, the person would almost certainly find a lawyer even in the absence of a recommendation. Second, it would be mere speculation to conclude that the lawyer the person might find on his own would not be as competent as the one recommended by the conflicted lawyer. The lawyer could be as good, better, or not as good as the one that the conflicted lawyer might recommend. Moreover, we cannot assume that it is disadvantageous to the referring lawyer's existing client for its adversary to be represented by competent counsel. Competent opposing counsel is likely in many cases to contribute to reaching a reasonable resolution of the dispute.

D.C. 326 (2004).

13. Before making a specific referral, the lawyer should also consider whether his or her professional judgment is affected, as set forth in Rule 1.7(a)(2). Ordinarily, we do not believe that providing a referral under these circumstances will impair a lawyer's professional judgment for purposes of Rule 1.7. However, should a lawyer reasonably believe that his or her professional judgment is affected, it would then be impermissible for the lawyer to provide a specific referral.

14. Likewise, Rule 1.9(c)(1) also prohibits an attorney from acting in a way that would disadvantage the former client.

15. The D.C. Bar also noted a few practical considerations that lawyers should consider before making a specific referral. For example, some clients may not understand why their lawyer helped an opposing party obtain other counsel and therefore client relations may impact whether a lawyer provides a specific referral. A lawyer may also want to provide several referrals "to avoid recriminations from the inquirer, should the recommended lawyer prove unsatisfactory, or from her client, should the recommended lawyer turn out to be vexatious." D.C. Opinion 326 (2004).

16. Ultimately, "each lawyer must decide for herself whether under the particular circumstances this is a wise thing to do." Id.

17. Of course, the referral itself must comply with the rules. See Rule 7.2; N.Y. State 745 (2001).

CONCLUSION:

18. A law firm that withdraws from representation of a client due to a conflict of interest may provide the client with a good faith referral to attorneys the law firm believes appropriate to handle the client's matter.

OPINION 1019 (08/06/2014)

TOPIC: Confidentiality; Remote Access to Firm's Electronic Files

DIGEST: A law firm may give its lawyers remote access to client files, so that lawyers may work from home, as long as the firm determines that the particular technology used provides reasonable protection to client confidential information, or, in the absence of such reasonable protection, if the law firm obtains informed consent from the client, after informing the client of the risks.

RULES: 1.0(j), 1.5(a), 1.6, 1.6(a), 1.6(b), 1.6(c), 1.15(d).

QUESTION:

1. May a law firm provide its lawyers with remote access to its electronic files, so that they may work from home?

OPINION:

2. Our committee has often been asked about the application of New York's ethical rules – now the Rules of Professional Conduct – to the use of modern technology. While some of our technology opinions involve the application of the advertising rules to advertising using electronic means, many involve other ethical issues. See, e.g.:

N.Y. State 680 (1996). Retaining records by electronic imaging during the period required by DR 9-102(D) [now Rule 1.15(d)].

N.Y. State 709 (1998). Operating a trademark law practice over the internet and using e-mail.

N.Y. State 782 (2004). Use of electronic documents that may contain "metadata".

N.Y. State 820 (2008). Use of an e-mail service provider that conducts computer scans of emails to generate computer advertising.

N.Y. State 833 (2009). Whether a lawyer must respond to unsolicited emails requesting representation.

N.Y. State 842 (2010). Use of a "cloud" data storage system to store and back up client confidential information.

N.Y. State 940 (2012). Storage of confidential information on off-site backup tapes.

N.Y. State 950 (2012). Storage of emails in electronic rather than paper form.

3. Much of our advice in these opinions turns on whether the use of technology would violate the lawyer's duty to preserve the confidential information of the client. Rule 1.6(a) sets forth a simple prohibition against disclosure of such information, i.e. "A lawyer shall not knowingly reveal confidential information, as defined in this Rule . . . unless . . . the client gives informed consent, as defined in Rule 1.0(j).” In addition, Rule 1.6(c) provides that a lawyer must “exercise reasonable care to prevent . . . others whose services are utilized by the lawyer from disclosing or using confidential information of a client” except as provided in Rule 1.6(b).

4. Comment 17 to Rule 1.6 provides some additional guidance that reflects the advent of the information age:

> [17] When transmitting a communication that includes information relating to the representation of a client, the lawyer must take reasonable precautions to prevent the information from coming into the hands of unintended recipients. The duty does not require that the lawyer use special security measures if the method of communication affords a reasonable expectation of privacy. Special circumstances, however, may warrant special precautions. Factors to be considered to determining the reasonableness of the lawyer’s expectation of confidentiality include the sensitivity of the information and the extent to which the privacy of the communication is protected by law or by a confidentiality agreement. A client may require the lawyer to use a means of communication or security measures not required by this Rule, or may give informed consent (as in an engagement letter or similar document) to the use of means or measures that would otherwise be prohibited by this Rule.

5. As is clear from Comment 17, the key to whether a lawyer may use any particular technology is whether the lawyer has determined that the technology affords reasonable protection against disclosure and that the lawyer has taken reasonable precautions in the use of the technology.

6. In some of our early opinions, despite language indicating that the inquiring lawyer must make the reasonableness determination, this Committee had reached general conclusions. In N.Y. State 709, we concluded that there is a reasonable expectation that e-mails will be as private as other forms of telecommunication, such as telephone or fax machine, and that a lawyer ordinarily may utilize unencrypted e-mail to transmit confidential information, unless there is a heightened risk of interception. We also noted, however, that “when the confidential information is of such an extraordinarily sensitive nature that it is reasonable to use only a means of communication that is completely under the lawyer’s control, the lawyer must select a more secure means of communication than unencrypted internet e-mail.” Moreover, we said the lawyer was obligated to stay abreast of evolving technology to assess changes in the likelihood of interception, as well as the availability of improved technologies that might reduce the risks at a reasonable cost.

7. In N.Y. State 820, we approved the use of an internet service provider that scanned e-mails to assist in providing user-targeted advertising, in part based on the published privacy policies of the provider.

8. Our more recent opinions, however, put the determination of reasonableness squarely on the inquiring lawyer. See, e.g. N.Y. State 842, 940, 950. For example, in N.Y. State 842, involving the use of “cloud” data storage, we were told that the storage system was password protected and that data stored in the system was encrypted. We concluded that the lawyer could use such a system, but only if the lawyer took reasonable care to ensure that the system was secure and that client confidentiality would be maintained. We said that "reasonable care" to protect a client's confidential information against unauthorized disclosure may include consideration of the following steps:

> (1) Ensuring that the online data storage provider has an enforceable obligation to preserve confidentiality and security, and that the provider will notify the lawyer if served with process requiring the production of client information;
> (2) Investigating the online data storage provider's security measures, policies, recoverability methods, and other procedures to determine if they are adequate under the circumstances;
> (3) Employing available technology to guard against reasonably foreseeable attempts to infiltrate the data that is stored; and/or
> (4) Investigating the storage provider's ability to purge and wipe any copies of the data, and to move the data to a different host, if the lawyer becomes dissatisfied with the storage provider or for other reasons changes storage providers.

Moreover, in view of rapid changes in technology and the security of stored data, we suggested that the lawyer should periodically reconfirm that the provider's security measures remained effective in light of advances in technology. We also warned that, if the lawyer learned information suggesting that the security measures used by the online data storage provider were insufficient to adequately protect the confidentiality of client information, or if the lawyer learned of any breaches of confidentiality by the provider, then the lawyer must discontinue use of the service unless the lawyer received assurances that security issues had been sufficiently remediated.

9. Cyber-security issues have continued to be a major concern for lawyers, as cyber-criminals have begun to target lawyers to access client information, including trade secrets, business plans and personal data. Lawyers can no longer assume that their document systems are of no interest to cyber-crooks. That is particularly true where there is outside access to the internal system by third parties, including law firm employees working at other firm offices, at home or when traveling, or clients who have been given access to the firm's document system. See, e.g. Matthew Goldstein, "Law Firms Are Pressed on Security For Data," N.Y. Times (Mar. 22, 2014) at B1 (corporate clients are demanding that their law firms take more steps to guard against online intrusions that could compromise sensitive information as global concerns about hacker threats mount; companies are asking law firms to stop putting files on portable thumb drives, emailing them to non-secure iPads or working on computers linked to a shared network in countries like China or Russia where hacking is prevalent); Joe Dysart, "Moving Targets: New Hacker Technology Threatens Lawyers' Mobile Devices," ABA Journal 25 (September 2012); Rachel M. Zahorsky, "Being Insecure: Firms are at Risk Inside and Out," ABA Journal 32 (June 2013); Sharon D. Nelson, John W. Simek & David G. Ries, Locked Down: Information Security for Lawyers (ABA Section of Law Practice Management, 2012).

10. In light of these developments, it is even more important for a law firm to determine that the technology it will use to provide remote access (as well as the devices that firm lawyers will use to effect remote access), provides reasonable assurance that confidential client information will be protected. Because of the fact-specific and evolving nature of both technology and cyber risks, we cannot recommend particular steps that would constitute reasonable precautions to prevent confidential information from coming into the hands of unintended recipients, including the degree of password protection to ensure that persons who access the system are authorized, the degree of security of the devices that firm lawyers use to gain access, whether encryption is required, and the security measures the firm must use to determine whether there has been any unauthorized access to client confidential information. However, assuming that the law firm determines that its precautions are reasonable, we believe it may provide such remote access. When the law firm is able to make a determination of reasonableness, we do not believe that client consent is necessary.

11. Where a law firm cannot conclude that its precautions would provide reasonable protection to client confidential information, Rule 1.6(a) allows the law firm to request the client's informed consent. See also Comment 17 to Rule 1.6, which provides that a client may give informed consent (as in an engagement letter or similar document) to the use of means that would otherwise be prohibited by the rule. In N.Y. State 842, however, we stated that the obligation to preserve client confidential information extends beyond merely prohibiting an attorney from revealing confidential information without client consent. A lawyer must take reasonable care to affirmatively protect a client's confidential information. Consequently, we believe that before requesting client consent to a technology system used by the law firm, the firm must disclose the risks that the system does not provide reasonable assurance of confidentiality, so that the consent is "informed" within the meaning of Rule 1.0(j), i.e. that the client has information adequate to make an informed decision.

CONCLUSION:

12. A law firm may use a system that allows its lawyers to access the firm's document system remotely, as long as it takes reasonable steps to ensure that confidentiality of information is maintained. Because of the fact-specific and evolving nature of both technology and cyber risks, this Committee cannot recommend particular steps that constitute reasonable precautions to prevent confidential information from coming into the hands of unintended recipients. If the firm cannot conclude that its security precautions are reasonable, then it may request the informed consent of the client to its security precautions, as long as the firm discloses the risks that the system does not provide reasonable assurance of confidentiality, so that the consent is "informed" within the meaning of Rule 1.0(j).

TOPIC: Confidentiality; use of cloud storage for purposes of a transaction

DIGEST: Whether a lawyer to a party in a transaction may post and share documents using a "cloud" data storage tool depends on whether the particular technology employed provides reasonable protection to confidential client information and, if not, whether the lawyer obtains informed consent from the client after advising the client of the relevant risks.

RULES: 1.1, 1.6

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is engaged in a real estate practice and is looking into the viability of using an electronic project management tool to help with closings. The technology would allow sellers' attorneys, buyers' attorneys, real estate brokers and mortgage brokers to post and view documents, such as drafts, signed contracts and building financials, all in one central place.

QUESTION:

2. May a lawyer representing a party to a transaction use a cloud-based technology so as to post documents and share them with others involved in the transaction?

OPINION:

3. The materials that the inquirer seeks to post, such as drafts, contracts and building financials, may well include confidential information of the inquirer's clients, and for purposes of this opinion we assume that they do.[41] Thus the answer to this inquiry hinges on whether use of the contemplated technology would violate the inquirer's ethical duty to preserve a client's confidential information.

4. Rule 1.6(a) contains a straightforward prohibition against the knowing disclosure of confidential information, subject to certain exceptions including a client's informed consent, and Rule 1.6(c) contains the accompanying general requirement that a lawyer "exercise reasonable care to prevent . . . [persons] whose services are utilized by the lawyer from disclosing or using confidential information of a client."

5. Comment [17] to Rule 1.6 addresses issues raised by a lawyer's use of technology:

> When transmitting a communication that includes information relating to the representation of a client, the lawyer must take reasonable precautions to prevent the information from coming into the hands of unintended recipients. The duty does not require that the lawyer use special security measures if the method of communication affords a reasonable expectation of privacy. Special circumstances, however, may warrant special precautions. Factors to be considered in determining the reasonableness of the

41 Rule 1.6(a) defines "confidential information" generally to include "information gained during or relating to the representation of a client, whatever its source, that is (a) protected by the attorney-client privilege, (b) likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed, or (c) information that the client has requested be kept confidential."

> lawyer's expectation of confidentiality include the sensitivity of the information and the extent to which the privacy of the communication is protected by law or by a confidentiality agreement. A client may require the lawyer to use a means of communication or security measures not required by this Rule, or may give informed consent (as in an engagement letter or similar document) to the use of means or measures that would otherwise be prohibited by this Rule.

6. In the recent past, our Committee has repeatedly been asked to provide guidance on the interplay of technology and confidentiality. N.Y. State 1019 (2014) catalogues the Committee's opinions on technology. In that opinion, we considered whether a law firm could provide its lawyers with remote access to its electronic files. We concluded that a law firm could use remote access "as long as it takes reasonable steps to ensure that confidential information is maintained." Id. ¶12

7. Similarly, in N.Y. State 842 (2010), which considered the use of cloud data storage, we concluded that a lawyer could use this technology to store client records provided that the lawyer takes reasonable care to protect the client's confidential information. We also reached a similar conclusion in N.Y. State 939 (2012) as to the issue of lawyers from different firms sharing a computer system.

8. The concerns presented by the current inquiry were also present in N.Y. State 1019, N.Y. State 939 and N.Y. State 842, and those opinions govern the outcome here. That is, the inquirer may use the proposed technology provided that the lawyer takes reasonable steps to ensure that confidential information is not breached.[42] The inquirer must, for example, try to ensure that only authorized parties have access to the system on which the information is shared. Because of the fact-specific and evolving nature of technology, we do not purport to specify in detail the steps that will constitute reasonable care in any given set of circumstances. See N.Y. State 1019. ¶10. We note, however, that use of electronically stored information may not only require reasonable care to protect that information under Rule 1.6, but may also, under Rule 1.1, require the competence to determine and follow a set of steps that will constitute such reasonable care.[43]

42 This result is consistent with results in other jurisdictions that have considered lawyers' use of off-site, third-party cloud services for storing and sharing documents. See, e.g., ABA 95-398; Arizona Opinion 05-04; California Opinion 2010-179; Connecticut Inf. Opinion 2013-07; Florida Opinion 12-3 (2013); Illinois Opinion 10-01 (2009); Iowa Opinion 11-01; Maine Opinion 207 (2013); Massachusetts Opinion 12-03; Massachusetts Opinion 05-04; Missouri Inf. Opinion 2006-0092; Nebraska Opinion 06-05; New Hampshire Opinion 2012-13/4 (2013); New Jersey Opinion 701 (2006); North Carolina Opinion 2011-6 (2012); North Dakota Opinion 99-03 (1999); Ohio Opinion 2013-03; Oregon Opinion 2011-188; Pennsylvania Opinion 2011-200; Pennsylvania Opinion 2010-060; Vermont Opinion 2010-6 (2012); Washington Inf. Opinion 2215 (2012).

9. Finally, we note that Rule 1.6 provides an exception to confidentiality rules based on a client's informed consent. Thus, as quoted in paragraph 5 above, a client may agree to the use of a technology that would otherwise be prohibited by the Rule. But as we have previously pointed out, "before requesting client consent to a technology system used by the law firm, the firm must disclose the risks that the system does not provide reasonable assurance of confidentiality, so that the consent is 'informed' within the meaning of Rule 1.0(j), i.e. that the client has information adequate to make an informed decision." N.Y. State 1019 ¶11.

CONCLUSION:

10. Whether a lawyer for a party in a transaction may post and share documents using a "cloud" data storage tool depends on whether the particular technology employed provides reasonable protection to confidential client information and, if not, whether the lawyer obtains informed consent from the client after advising the client of the relevant risks.

43 It has been said for example that the duty of competence may require litigators, depending on circumstances, to possess a basic or even a more refined understanding of electronically stored information. See, e.g., Zachary Wang, "Ethics and Electronic Discovery: New Medium, Same Problems," 75 Defense Counsel Journal 328, at 7 (October 2008) ("disclosure of privileged information as a result of a lack of knowledge of a client's IT system would subject an attorney to discipline under Rules 1.1 and 1.6"). The California State Bar Standing Committee on Professional Responsibility and Conduct has tentatively approved an interim opinion interpreting California ethical rules as follows:

> Attorney competence related to litigation generally requires, at a minimum, a basic understanding of, and facility with, issues relating to e-discovery, i.e., the discovery of electronically stored information ("ESI"). On a case-by-case basis, the duty of competence may require a higher level of technical knowledge and ability, depending on the e-discovery issues involved in a given matter and the nature of the ESI involved. . . . An attorney lacking the required competence for the e-discovery issues in the case at issue has three options: (1) acquire sufficient learning and skill before performance is required; (2) associate with or consult technical consultants or competent counsel; or (3) decline the client representation.

TOPIC: Use of the word "expert" in law firm domain name

DIGEST: A law firm may not use a domain name that couples the word "expert" with the law firm's area of concentration.

RULES: 7.1, 7.4, 7.5

QUESTION:

1. The inquiring law firm asks whether the firm may use, as its website domain name, the firm's sole field of practice with the word "expert" added.

BACKGROUND:

2. The inquiring law firm practices exclusively in one area of law, in which, it is said, the firm "has a very successful track record." The firm wishes to use as its internet website domain name a combination of the name of its sole practice area and the word "expert," for example, "realestatelaw-expert" or bankruptcylawexpert," or the like. The inquirer says that the website will elsewhere contain a disclaimer that the firm does not guarantee any favorable outcomes, and that past success does not assure future results. The law firm says that the firm will not use the word "expert" except in its domain name.

OPINION:

3. N.Y. Rule of Professional Conduct 7.5(e)(3) specifically addresses domain names, so we begin our discussion there. That Rule says that a lawyer or law firm may use "a domain name for an internet web site that does not include the name of the lawyer or law firm provided," among other things, that "the domain name does not imply an ability to obtain results in a matter." Comment 2 accompanying this Rule notes that "a personal injury firm could not use the domain name www.win-your-case.com or www.settle-for-more.com because such names imply that the law firm can obtain favorable results in every matter regardless of the particular facts and circumstances." We echoed this sentiment, albeit in the context of a different form of advertising, in our Opinion 1005 (2014), in which we concluded that a claim "We Know How To Win For You" was impermissible under Rule 7.1, adding that "[m]erely posting the disclaimer that 'Prior results do not guarantee a similar outcome' will not cure the ethical infirmity of the proposed advertising."

4. The word "expert" in a domain name is laden with claims of comparison. In its common and ordinary meaning, the word denotes having been "proved or approved by test," or a sense of relative superiority "having special skill or knowledge derived from training or experience" or "knowing and ready as a result of wide experience or extensive practice." Webster's Third (Unabridged) International Dictionary 800 (2002). The implication of the word is that the law firm may bring to the matter a seal of approval that provides comparatively greater assurance of some favorable outcome which no disclaimer may readily cure.

5. We need not rely on Rule 7.5(e) alone, however, for two other Rules accent our point. First, Comment 12 accompanying Rule 7.1 teaches that "descriptions of characteristics of the law firm that compare its services with those of other law firms and that are not susceptible of being factually supported could be misleading to potential clients. Accordingly, a lawyer may not advertise that the lawyer is the 'Best,' 'Most Experienced,' or 'Hardest Working.'" To us, the use of the word "expert" is exactly the sort of description that the Comment intends lawyers to avoid – an avoidance that a disclaimer about the past does not fix.

6. Second, Rule 7.4 provides that a lawyer may claim to be recognized or certified as a "specialist" only in certain specific circumstances, none applicable here, and then only if married to a statement qualifying the limits on the "specialist" label. The word "expert" is an obvious synonym for the word "specialist." See, e.g., Roget's International Thesaurus 639 (7th ed. 2010) (listing "expert" as synonym for "specialist"). To suppose that the framers of Rule 7.4 would so restrict the use of the word "specialist" but approve the use of the near-identical label of "expert" is incongruous. Other jurisdictions agree. Spencer v. The Honorable Justices of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, 579 F. Supp. 880, 885-88 (E.D. Pa. 1984); Maryland Op. 00-21; Ohio Opinion 2005-06; cf. N.Y. State 757 (2002) (no support in rules for use of "expert" even in communications with other lawyers).

7. Nothing in this opinion is intended or should be interpreted to prevent a lawyer from offering or advertising the lawyer's services as an expert witness, whether as a testifying or consulting expert. Courts frequently qualify lawyers as experts to provide admissible testimony on issues in dispute in civil and criminal actions, arbitrations, and other dispute resolution forums. A common example is testimony in a legal malpractice action concerning, among other things, the reasonable standard of care applicable to the legal services in question. The use of the word "expert" in this context, which is typically though not always directed to other lawyers, does not raise the concerns set forth above about claims of superiority to the general public.

CONCLUSION:

8. In sum, we conclude that a law firm may not use the word "expert" in the law firm's domain name regardless of whether the website otherwise contains a disclaimer that prior results do not guarantee future results.

OPINION 1022 (09/26/2014)

Modifies N.Y. State 882

TOPIC: Seller's concessions in real estate transactions

DIGEST: A lawyer may participate in a real estate transaction where the form TP-584 reports the full (gross) sales price, and the form RP-5217 reports the sale price as the price net of the seller's concession, and neither form discloses that the purchase price was grossed up prior to application of the seller's concession, even though this will result in a different sale price on the two documents. Neither document is misleading within the meaning of this Committee's prior opinions on seller's concessions, because the forms are completed in accordance with their instructions and the lack of disclosure will not result in foreseeable negative consequences.

RULES: 8.4(b), (c) and (d).

FACTS:

1. A lawyer working on a residential house closing inquires as to the proper method of completing the TP-584 and RP-5217 forms so as to comply with our opinions on seller's concessions.

2. The TP-584 is a tax form used to satisfy the filing requirements regarding certain taxes, including the real property transfer tax (or to claim a transfer tax exemption). The form requires the filer to report the consideration for the conveyance, among other things. The instructions to the form TP-584 define "consideration" as "the price actually paid or required to be paid for the real property," including cash consideration, assumed mortgages and the fair market value of other property received. In other words, the full (gross) purchase price must be reported on this document. If there has been a gross-up of the purchase price, the price reported would be the grossed up price. There is no place on this document to indicate that a seller's concession is a part of the transaction.

3. The RP-5217 also is used to report the sale price of a conveyance. The purpose of this document is to provide information that taxing authorities will use to calculate certain assessments. Like the form TP-584, the form calls for the total amount paid for the property, including cash consideration, assumed mortgages and the fair market value of other property received. Unlike the TP-584, however, the instructions for this document expressly state that a seller's concession is not to be included in the "full sale price," i.e. it calls for the sale price, net of the "seller concession":

> Do NOT include seller concessions in the full sale price (i.e., the buyer and seller have agreed on a price of $100,000 for the purchase of the property. As part of the agreement, the seller will pay $4000 of the buyer's closing costs. Therefore, the actual full sale price paid by the buyer (or received by the seller) is $96,000 ($100,000 - $4000)).

This form also contains a place to note information affecting sale price and to describe that information. However, the instructions to the form indicate that a seller's concession should not be included at that location.

QUESTION:

4. Will a lawyer's accurate completion and submission of the TP-584 and RP-5217 forms in accordance with their instructions result in misrepresentation under the prior opinions of this Committee on seller's concessions, even though the gross up would not be disclosed in all deal documents?

DISCUSSION:

5. This Committee has issued four opinions on seller's concessions (N.Y. State 817 (2007), 882 (2011), 892 (2011) and 993(2013)). All of these essentially opine, as we first stated in N.Y State 817, that:

> [A] lawyer may not ethically participate in such a "gross up" of the actual purchase price and concomitant seller's concession, unless there is neither deception nor misrepresentation at work in the transaction and its predictable consequences. At a minimum this means that the gross-up (and not merely the grossed-up purchase price) must be disclosed in the transaction documents.

N.Y. State 817, ¶14. The opinion cites the Disciplinary Rule predecessors to Rules 8.4(b), (c) and (d). In N.Y. State 882 we said the amount of the gross-up and the amount of the seller's concession must be "expressly and meaningfully disclosed in all documents that state the sales price, including but not limited to the contract of sale, the HUD-1 Settlement Statement, and all other documents that the attorneys prepare, review or approve."

6. The question presented in the current inquiry is whether filling out these two forms as required by the forms and their instructions is a misrepresentation. It is not. The governmental entities that use these forms have specified how the sale price should be reported, for the particular purposes of the governmental entities. Furthermore, failure to disclose the gross up does not undermine the purpose of the form or result in either entity receiving less in taxes than it would have in the absence of the gross-up. In the case of the TP-584, where the sale price was grossed up, the tax is computed on the grossed-up amount, potentially resulting in higher transfer taxes. In the case of the RP-5217, if there has been a gross-up, the sale price for purposes of tax assessments would be the price net of the gross-up. But if there had been no gross up and seller concession, the sale price for purposes of tax assessments would also have been the net price. Consequently, if a lawyer states the purchase price on each form in accordance with the instructions for the form, there cannot be a misrepresentation.

7. In the case of the RP-5217, this conclusion differs from our conclusion regarding that form in N.Y. State 882. That opinion involved a contract for the sale of a home for $306,000, and a seller's concession of $6,000 to pay for closing costs, where the sales contract expressly stated that the sales price had been increased by $6,000. We discussed disclosures in a number of closing documents, including the RP-5217. Of that form, we said:

> We assume that the real property will be assessed based upon the $306,000 disclosed sales price, not the $300,000 actual price, unless the documents make clear to the assessor that the true sales price was $300,000. See RP-5217 Real property Transfer

Report Instructions ¶13, (requiring that the seller's concession be deducted to reach the actual or full sales price.)

8. Upon reconsideration, for the reasons stated in paragraph 6 above, we do not believe that failure to disclose the gross-up is misleading to the government or to other persons who may see the forms. There are no foreseeable negative consequences within the meaning of N.Y. State 817. This situation is markedly different from failure to disclose the gross-up on other transaction documents, such as the sales contract and the HUD-1 Form, where other parties affected by the transaction (including lenders and subsequent purchasers of the mortgage) may be misled as to the terms of the transaction and there may be foreseeable negative consequences (e.g. the bank lending more than it otherwise would, or a purchaser assuming that a stated sales concession is a genuine sales concession and not an inducement to purchase). To the extent N.Y. State 882 reaches a different conclusion, it is hereby modified.

CONCLUSION:

9. A lawyer may participate in a real estate transaction where the form TP-584 reports the full (gross) sales price and does not disclose that a seller's concession is a part of the transaction, and the form RP-5217 reports the sale price as the price net of the seller's concession, and does not disclose that the purchase price was grossed up prior to application of the seller's concession, even though this will result in a different sale price on the two documents. Neither document is misleading within the meaning of this Committee's prior opinions on seller's concessions, because the forms are completed in accordance with their instructions and the lack of disclosure will not result in foreseeable negative consequences.

OPINION 1023 (09/26/2014)

TOPIC: Firm Name; Trade Name; Disciplinary Authority; Choice of Law

DIGEST: A lawyer admitted only in New York, which prohibits a lawyer from practicing under a trade name, may not be of counsel to an out-of-state firm with a trade name.

RULES: 7.5(b), 8.5(a), 8.5(b)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer (Y) is a New York licensed attorney who has a full time job and wants to be of counsel to a District of Columbia law firm that a colleague (X) is forming. X is a member of the District of Columbia bar, and Y is a member of only the New York State bar. X has been informed that the firm name could not be "X and Y," since that would imply that Y was a partner and therefore would be misleading. See Rule 7.5(c) ("Lawyers shall not hold themselves out as having a partnership with one or more other lawyers unless they are in fact partners.") X has proposed using a trade name, based on the kind of law the firm would practice, which the District of Columbia permits and New York State does not. The firm would disclose that the inquirer is a member of only the New York State bar.

QUESTION:

2. May an attorney admitted only to the New York State bar be of counsel to a District of Columbia law firm that practices under a trade name?

OPINION:

3. The law firm involved in this inquiry is a District of Columbia entity. Although many aspects of the practice of the D.C. firm will be governed by the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct, to determine whether Y may become of counsel to[44] and practice with the firm, certain aspects of Y's practice will be governed by the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules").

4. The question of which jurisdiction's ethics rules are to be applied to particular circumstances is governed by Rule 8.5 ("Disciplinary Authority and Choice of Law"), which reads as follows:

> (a) A lawyer admitted to practice in this state is subject to the disciplinary authority of this state, regardless of where the lawyer's conduct occurs. A lawyer may be subject to the disciplinary authority of both this state and another jurisdiction where the lawyer is admitted for the same conduct.
> (b) In any exercise of the disciplinary authority of this state, the rules of professional conduct to be applied shall be as follows:

44 Although Y proposes to become "of counsel" to the firm, the principles set forth in this opinion would also apply to a lawyer admitted only in New York who wished to become an associate or partner in an out-of-state firm practicing under a trade name.

> (1) For conduct in connection with a proceeding in a court before which a lawyer has been admitted to practice (either generally or for purposes of that proceeding), the rules to be applied shall be the rules of the jurisdiction in which the court sits, unless the rules of the court provide otherwise; and
> (2) for any other conduct: (i) if the lawyer is licensed to practice only in this state, the rules to be applied shall be the rules of this state, and (ii) if the lawyer is licensed to practice in this state and another jurisdiction, the rules to be applied shall be the rules of the admitting jurisdiction in which the lawyer principally practices; provided, however, that if particular conduct clearly has its predominant effect in another jurisdiction in which the lawyer is licensed to practice, the rules of that jurisdiction shall be applied to that conduct.

5. Under Rule 8.5(b)(2), since Y is licensed to practice only in New York, the New York Rules will apply to his conduct.

6. Rule 7.5(b) prohibits an attorney in private practice from practicing under a trade name. Specifically, Rule 7.5(b) states in pertinent part:

> A lawyer in private practice shall not practice under a trade name, a name that is misleading as to the identity of the lawyer or lawyers practicing under such name, or a firm name containing names other than those of one or more of the lawyers in the firm, except that by the name of a professional corporation shall contain "PC" or such symbols permitted by law, the name of a limited liability company or partnership shall contain "LLC," "LLP" or such symbols permitted by law and, if otherwise lawful, a firm may use as, or continue to include in its name the name or names of one or more deceased or retired members of the firm or of a predecessor firm in a continuing line of succession.

7. In N.Y. State 740 (2001), the Committee concluded that "using a name that is not the legal name of one or more partners or former partners in the law firm constitutes use of a trade name."

8. In N.Y. State 861 (2011), the committee held that, although the New York office of a law firm may not ethically operate under a trade name, a lawyer who is admitted in New York and another jurisdiction that permits a law firm to practice under a trade name, and who principally practices in the other jurisdiction, may be of counsel to a firm with a trade name, even though the lawyer could not do so in New York. In reaching its conclusion, the committee analyzed Rule 8.5(b)(2)(ii) and concluded that "[b]ecause the conduct – practicing with a firm that uses a trade name – principally occurred in the other jurisdiction, the applicable ethical rules would be those of the other jurisdiction." See also N.Y. State 889 (2011) (a lawyer admitted in New York and D.C. who principally practices in D.C., which allows partnership with a non-lawyer, may conduct New York litigation even if the D.C. partnership includes a non-lawyer who would benefit from the resulting fees, because the governing ethical provisions would be those of D.C.).

9. The analysis of N.Y. State 861, however, does not apply to the instant inquiry, because the inquiring attorney – Y – is only admitted to the New York State Bar and is not admitted in D.C. (the other jurisdiction involved here), and is therefore not authorized to "principally practice" in the jurisdiction that allows lawyers to practice under a trade name.

CONCLUSION:

10. A lawyer admitted solely in New York, where lawyers are prohibited from practicing under trade names, may not be of counsel to an out-of-state firm that is practicing under a trade name.

OPINION 1024 (09/29/2014)

TOPIC: Counseling clients in illegal conduct; medical marijuana law.

DIGEST: In light of current federal enforcement policy, the New York Rules permit a lawyer to assist a client in conduct designed to comply with state medical marijuana law, notwithstanding that federal narcotics law prohibits the delivery, sale, possession and use of marijuana and makes no exception for medical marijuana.

RULES: 1.2(d), 1.2(f), 1.2 cmt 9, 1.16(c)(2), 6.1 cmt 1, 8.4(b).

FACTS:

1. In July 2014, New York, following the lead of 22 other states, adopted the Compassionate Care Act ("CCA"),[45] a law permitting the use of medical marijuana in tightly controlled circumstances. The CCA regulates the cultivation, distribution, prescription and use of marijuana for medical purposes. It permits specially approved organizations such as hospitals and community health centers to dispense medical marijuana to patients who have been certified by a health care provider and who have registered with the state Department of Health, and it further provides for the regulation and registration of organizations to manufacture and deliver marijuana for authorized medical uses.

2. At the same time, federal criminal law forbids the possession, distribution, sale or use of marijuana, and the federal law provides no exception for medical uses. The U.S. Department of Justice takes the position that the federal law is valid and enforceable even against individuals and entities engaged in the cultivation, transportation, delivery, prescription or use of medical marijuana in accordance with state regulatory law; however, the U.S. Department of Justice has adopted and published formal guidance restricting federal enforcement of the federal marijuana prohibition when individuals and entities act in accordance with state regulation of medical marijuana.

QUESTION:

3. Under these unusual circumstances, do the New York Rules of Professional Conduct ("Rules") permit a lawyer to provide legal advice and assistance to doctors, patients, public officials, hospital administrators and others engaged in the cultivation, distribution, prescribing, dispensing, regulation, possession or use of marijuana for medical purposes to help them act in compliance with state regulation regarding medical marijuana and consistently with federal enforcement policy?

OPINION:

4. Lawyers may advise clients about the lawfulness of their proposed conduct and assist them in complying with the law, but lawyers may not knowingly assist clients in illegal conduct. Rule 1.2(d) provides: "A lawyer shall not counsel a client to engage, or assist a client, in conduct that the lawyer knows is illegal or fraudulent, except that the lawyer may discuss the legal consequences of any proposed course of conduct with a client." Disciplinary Rule 7-102(A)(7), contained in the pre-2009 Code of Professional Responsibility, was to the same effect. As this Committee has observed, if a client proposes to engage in conduct that is illegal, "then it would be unethical for an attorney to recommend the action or assist the client in carrying it out." N.Y. State 769 (2003); accord N.Y. State 666 (1994).

45 Laws of 2014, Chap. 90 (signed by the Governor and effective on July 5, 2014).

5. This ethical restriction reflects lawyers' fundamental role in the administration of justice, which is to promote compliance with the law by providing legal advice and assistance in structuring clients' conduct in accordance with the law. See also Rule 8.4(b) (forbidding "illegal conduct that adversely reflects on the lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness as a lawyer"). Ideally, lawyers will not only attempt to prevent clients from engaging in knowing illegalities but also discourage clients from conduct of doubtful legality:

> The most effective realization of the law's aims often takes place in the attorney's office, . . . where the lawyer's quiet counsel takes the place of public force. Contrary to popular belief, the compliance with the law thus brought about is not generally lip-serving and narrow, for by reminding him of its long-run costs the lawyer often deters his client from a course of conduct technically permissible under existing law, though inconsistent with its underlying spirit and purpose. . . .
> The reasons that justify and even require partisan advocacy in the trial of a cause do not grant any license to the lawyer to participate as legal adviser in a line of conduct that is immoral, unfair, or of doubtful legality.

Am. Bar Ass'n & Ass'n of Am. Law Sch., Professional Responsibility Report of the Joint Conference, 44 A.B.A. J. 1159, 1161 (1958). The public importance of lawyers' role in promoting clients' legal compliance is reflected in the attorney-client privilege, which protects the confidentiality that is traditionally considered essential in order for lawyers to serve this role effectively. See, e.g., Hunt v. Blackburn, 128 U.S. 464, 470 (1888) (privilege "is founded upon the necessity, in the interest and administration of justice, of the aid of persons having knowledge of the law and skilled in its practice, which assistance can only be safely and readily availed of when free from the consequences or the apprehension of disclosure").

6. It is counter-intuitive to suppose that the lawyer's fundamental role might ever be served by assisting clients in violating a law that the lawyer knows to be valid and enforceable. But the question presented by the state's medical marijuana law is highly unusual if not unique: Although participating in the production, delivery or use of medical marijuana violates federal criminal law as written, the federal government has publicly announced that it is limiting its enforcement of this law, and has acted accordingly, insofar as individuals act consistently with state laws that legalize and extensively regulate medical marijuana. Both the state law and the publicly announced federal enforcement policy presuppose that individuals and entities will comply with new and intricate state regulatory law and, thus, presuppose that lawyers will provide legal advice and assistance to an array of public and private actors and institutions to promote their compliance with state law and current federal policy. Under these unusual circumstances, for the reasons discussed below, the Committee concludes that Rule 1.2(d) does not forbid lawyers from providing the necessary advice and assistance.

Legal background

7. Much has been written elsewhere about the interrelationship between federal criminal narcotics laws and recent state medical marijuana laws. For purposes of this opinion, only the following basic understanding is needed.

8. Under federal criminal law, marijuana is a Schedule I narcotic, whose manufacture, possession and distribution is prohibited, and for which there is no approved medical use. Further, individuals and entities are forbidden by federal law not only from violating these laws as principals, but also, under principles of accessorial liability, from intentionally aiding and abetting others in violating the narcotics law, counseling others to violate the narcotics law, or conspiring with others to violate the narcotics law.[46]

9. For many years, states likewise criminalized the manufacture, possession and distribution of marijuana, allowing for concurrent federal and state enforcement of the criminal law. Most prosecutions of narcotics laws, especially with regard to marijuana, occurred at the state and local level. However, in recent years, more than 20 states have legalized marijuana for medicinal purposes to make it available by prescription. Colorado and Washington have gone farther, developing regulation permitting the sale and use of marijuana for recreational purposes.

10. The U.S. Department of Justice ("DOJ") takes the position that the manufacture, possession and distribution of marijuana remains a federal crime, and can be enforced by federal law enforcement officials, even when the conduct in question is undertaken in accordance with state medical marijuana laws. However, current federal policy restricts federal enforcement activity, including civil as well as criminal enforcement, concerning medical marijuana. The Deputy Attorney General's August 29, 2013 memorandum, titled "Guidance Regarding Marijuana Enforcement," acknowledges that "the federal government has traditionally relied on state and local law enforcement agencies to address marijuana activity through enforcement of their own narcotics laws," and the federal government has concentrated its effort in accordance with federal enforcement priorities, such as preventing the distribution of marijuana to minors, preventing revenue from marijuana sales from going to criminal enterprises, and preventing marijuana activity from being used as a cover for trafficking other drugs. The memorandum directs Department attorneys and federal law enforcement authorities to focus their enforcement resources and efforts on these priorities, which are less likely to be threatened "[i]n jurisdictions that have enacted laws legalizing marijuana in some form and that have also implemented strong and effective regulatory and enforcement systems to control the cultivation, distribution, sale, and possession of marijuana." Although the memorandum makes plain that it is not intended to create any enforceable substantive or procedural rights, the memorandum might fairly be read as an expression by the current Administration that it will not enforce the federal criminal law with regard to otherwise-lawful medical marijuana activities that are carried out in accordance with a robust state regulatory law and that do not implicate the identified federal enforcement priorities. Over the period of more than a year since the memorandum was published, federal law enforcement authorities have acted consistently with this understanding.

11. The CCA allows specified licensed New York physicians to prescribe, and patients to use, medical marijuana only in pill form or in a form that may be inhaled as a vapor, but not in a form that may be smoked. Medical marijuana may only be prescribed for identified, documented medical conditions categorized as "severe[ly] debilitating or life-threatening." The regulation of medical marijuana under the law will be overseen by the Health Department, which, among other things, will authorize and register a limited number of organizations ("Registered Organizations") to manufacture and dispense marijuana for medical use, will issue registration cards to patients or their caregivers certified to receive medical marijuana, and will set prices. The law restricts who may be hired by Registered Organizations, regulates their production and dispensation of medical marijuana, establishes a tax on their receipts, and criminalizes various abuses. See generally Francis J. Serbaroli, "A Primer on New York's Medical Marijuana Law," NYLJ, July 22, 2014, p. 3.

The potential role of lawyers in providing legal assistance regarding compliance with the medical marijuana law

12. Lawyers might provide a range of assistance to clients seeking to comply with the CCA and to act consistently with federal law enforcement policy. Among the potential clients are public officials and agencies including the Health Department that have responsibility for implementing the law, health care providers and other entities that may apply to be selected or eventually be selected as Registered Organizations authorized to manufacture and dispense medical marijuana, physicians seeking to prescribe medical marijuana, and patients with severely debilitating or life-threatening conditions seeking to obtain medical marijuana. Any or all of these potential clients may seek legal assistance not only so that they may be advised how to comply with the state law and avoid running afoul of federal enforcement policy but also for affirmative legal assistance. The Health Department may seek lawyers' help in establishing internal procedures to conduct the registrations and other activities contemplated by the law. Entities may seek assistance in applying to become Registered Organizations as well as in understanding and complying with employment, tax and other requirements of the law. Physicians may seek help in understanding the severe restrictions on the issuance of prescriptions for medical marijuana and in navigating the procedural requirements for effectively issuing such prescriptions.

13. Leaving aside the federal law, the above-described legal assistance would be entirely consistent with lawyers' conventional role in helping clients comply with the law. Indeed, it seems fair to say that state law would not only permit but affirmatively expect lawyers to provide such assistance. In general, it is assumed that lawyers, by virtue of their expertise and ethical expectations, have a necessary role in ensuring the public's compliance with the law. "As our society becomes one in which rights and responsibilities are increasingly defined in legal terms, access to legal services has become of critical importance." Rule 6.1, Cmt. [1]. This is especially true with regard to complex, technical regulatory schemes such as the one established by the CCA, and where, as in the case of the CCA, noncompliance can result in criminal prosecution.

14. However, the federal law cannot easily be left aside. The question of whether lawyers may serve their traditional role is complicated by the federal law. Assuming, as we do for purposes of this opinion, that the federal marijuana prohibition remains valid and enforceable notwithstanding state medical marijuana law, then individuals and entities seeking to dispense, prescribe or use medical marijuana, or to assist others in doing so, pursuant to the CCA would potentially be violating federal narcotics law as principals or accessories; in that event, the legal assistance sought from lawyers might involve assistance in conduct that the lawyer knows to be illegal.

Prior ethics opinions

15. Several other bar association ethics committees have confronted this problem but reached different conclusions under their counterparts to Rule 1.2(d). Most of these opinions pre-dated DOJ's August 2013 guidance, but took account of a 2009 DOJ memorandum suggesting that federal law enforcement would not be directed at patients and their caregivers who are in "clear and unambiguous compliance" with state medical marijuana laws.

16. In 2010, Maine's ethics committee took the view that although lawyers may assist clients in determining "the validity scope, meaning or application of the law," the rule "forbids attorneys from assisting a client in engaging in the medical marijuana business" because the rule "does not make a distinction between crimes which are enforced and those which are not. . . . [A]n attorney needs to . . . determine whether the particular legal service being requested rises to the level of assistance in violating federal law." Maine Op. 199 (July 7, 2010).

17. Connecticut's ethics committee similarly concluded that a lawyer may not assist a client insofar as its conduct, although authorized by the state's medical marijuana law, which created a broad licensing and registration structure to be implemented by the Department of Consumer Protection, violates federal law. Connecticut Op. 2013-02 (Jan. 16, 2013). The opinion noted that much of the legal assistance sought by clients seeking to comply with the law (e.g., patients, caregivers, physicians, pharmacists, distributers and growers), such as legal advice and assistance regarding the law's requirements and the rule-making and regulatory processes, would be consistent with lawyers' "traditional role as counselors" and "in the classic mode envisioned by professional standards." But some of that legal work might nevertheless constitute impermissible assistance in violating federal law.

18. More recently, in the context of Colorado's state law decriminalizing and regulating the sale of marijuana for recreational purposes, the state's ethics committee opined: "[U]nless and until there is a change in applicable federal law or in the Colorado Rules of Professional Conduct, a lawyer cannot advise a client regarding the full panoply of conduct permitted by the marijuana amendments to the Colorado Constitution and implementing statutes and regulations. To the extent that advice were to cross from advising or representing a client regarding the consequences of a client's past or contemplated conduct under federal and state law to counseling the client to engage, or assisting the client, in conduct the lawyer knows is criminal under federal law, the lawyer would violate Rule 1.2(d)." Colorado Op. 125 (Oct. 21, 2013). However, the committee recommended amending the state ethics rules to authorize lawyers to advise and assist clients regarding marijuana-related conduct, notwithstanding contrary federal law.[47]

19. In 2011, Arizona's ethics committee reached a very different conclusion, however, based in significant part on the premise that "no court opinion has held that the state law is invalid or unenforceable on federal preemption grounds."

> In these circumstances, we decline to interpret and apply ER 1.2(d) in a manner that would prevent a lawyer who concludes that the client's proposed conduct is in "clear and unambiguous compliance" with state law from assisting the client in connection with activities expressly authorized under state law, thereby depriving clients of the very legal advice and assistance that is needed to engage in the conduct that the state law expressly permits. The maintenance of an independent legal profession, and of its right to advocate for the interests of clients, is a bulwark of our system of government. History is replete with examples of lawyers who, through vigorous advocacy and at great personal and professional cost to themselves, obtained the vindication of constitutional or other rights long denied or withheld and which otherwise could not have been secured.
> A state law now expressly permits certain conduct. Legal services are necessary or desirable to implement and bring to fruition that conduct expressly permitted under state law. In any potential conflict between state and federal authority, such as may be presented by the interplay between the Act and federal law, lawyers have a critical role to perform in the activities that will lead to the proper resolution of the controversy. Although the Act may be found to be preempted by federal law or otherwise invalid, as of this time there has been no such judicial determination.

Arizona Op. 11-01 (Feb. 2011). The opinion concluded:

> • If a client or potential client requests an Arizona lawyer's assistance to undertake the specific actions that the Act expressly permits; and
> • The lawyer advises the client with respect to the potential federal law implications and consequences thereof or, if the lawyer is not qualified to do so, advises the client to seek other legal counsel regarding those issues and limits the scope of his or her representation; and
> • The client, having received full disclosure of the risks of proceeding under the state law, wishes to proceed with a course of action specifically authorized by the Act; then

47 Colorado added a new comments [14] to Rule 1.2 of the Colorado Rules of Professional Conduct, permitting a lawyer to counsel a client regarding the validity, scope and meaning of the Colorado marijuana law and to assist a client in conduct that the lawyer reasonably believes is permitted by that law, but the lawyer must also advise the client regarding related federal law and policy. Nevada adopted a new Comment [1] to Rule 1.2 that is substantively identical to Colorado Comment [14]. In Washington State, the King County Bar Association has urged the Washington Supreme Court to amend the Washington Rules of Professional Conduct to add a comment to Rule 8.4 and a new Rule 8.6, to make clear that conduct permitted by the state marijuana law does not reflect adversely on the lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness in other respects, and that a lawyer is not subject to discipline for counseling or assisting a client in conduct permitted by the state marijuana law, even though the conduct may violate federal law. Those proposals were still pending when we issued this opinion.

> • The lawyer ethically may perform such legal acts as are necessary or desirable to assist the client to engage in the conduct that is expressly permissible under the Act.

Id.

20. A recent opinion of the King County (Washington) Bar Association endorsed the Arizona committee's conclusion and much of its reasoning,[48] in the context of Washington's adoption of a state-regulated system for producing and selling marijuana for recreational purposes:

> While the KCBA does not agree with all components of the Arizona opinion, its emphasis on the client's need for legal assistance to comply with state law accurately reflects the reality that Washington clients face in navigating the new Washington law. The initial proposed implementing regulations for I-502, for example, have added 49 new sections in the Washington Administrative Code encompassing 42 pages of text. These regulations are consistent with I-502's express goal of removing the marijuana economy from the province of criminal organizations and bringing it into a "tightly regulated, state-licensed system." In building this complex system, the voters of Washington could not have envisioned it working without attorneys. As the State Bar of Arizona recognized, disciplining attorneys for working within such a system would deprive the state's citizens of legal services "necessary and desirable to implement and bring to fruition that conduct expressly permitted under state law."

KCBA Ethics Advisory Opinion on I-502 [Initiative 502 - marijuana legalization] & Rules of Professional Conduct (Oct. 2013). Following suit, the Washington State bar ethics committee recently proposed adding a Comment to the state's ethics code and issuing an advisory opinion authorizing lawyers to assist clients in complying with the state marijuana law at least until federal enforcement policy changes.

Analysis

21. As Rule 1.2(d) makes clear, although a lawyer may not encourage a client to violate the law or assist a client in doing so, a lawyer may advise a client about the reach of the law. See N.Y. State 455 (1976) ("[W]here the lawyer does no more than advise his client concerning the legal character and consequences of the act, there can be no professional impropriety. That is his proper function and fully comports with the requirements of Canon 7. . . . But, where the lawyer becomes a motivating force by encouraging his client to commit illegal acts or undertakes to bring about a violation of law, he oversteps the bounds of propriety."). Thus, a lawyer may give advice about whether undertaking to manufacture, transport, sell, prescribe or use marijuana in accordance with the CCA's regulatory scheme would violate federal narcotics law. If the lawyer were to conclude competently and in good faith that the federal law was inapplicable or invalid, the lawyer could so advise the client and would not be subject to discipline even if the lawyer's advice later proved incorrect. See, e.g., ABA Op. 85-352 (1985) ("[W]here a lawyer has a good faith belief . . . that a particular transaction does not result in taxable income or that certain expenditures are properly deductible as expenses, the lawyer has no duty to require [disclosure] as a condition of his or her continued representation. . . . In the role of advisor, the lawyer should counsel the client as to whether the position is likely to be sustained by a court if challenged by the IRS, as well as of the potential penalty consequences to the client if the position is taken on the tax return without disclosure.").[49] As the Second Department recognized in dismissing a prosecution against a lawyer who allegedly gave erroneous advice about the lawfulness of the client's proposed conduct:

> We cannot conclude that an attorney who advises a client to take an action that he or she, in good faith, believes to be legal loses the protection of the First Amendment if his or her advice is later determined to be incorrect. Indeed, it would eviscerate the right to give and receive legal counsel with respect to potential criminal liability if an attorney could be charged with conspiracy and solicitation whenever a District Attorney disagreed with that advice. The potential impact of allowing an attorney to be prosecuted in circumstances such as those presented here is profoundly disturbing. A looming threat of criminal sanctions would deter attorneys from acquainting individuals with matters as vital as the breadth of their legal rights and the limits of those rights. Correspondingly, where counsel is restrained, so is the fundamental right of the citizenry, bound as it is by laws complex and unfamiliar, to receive the advice necessary for measured conduct.

Matter of Vinluan v Doyle, 60 AD3d 237, 243, 873 NYS2d 72 (2d Dep't 2009).

22. Further, Rule 1.2(d) forbids a lawyer from assisting a client in conduct only if the lawyer knows the conduct is illegal or fraudulent. If the lawyer believes that conduct is unlawful but there is some support for an argument that the conduct is legal, the lawyer may provide legal assistance under the Rules (but is not obligated to do so). See Rule 1.2(f) ("A lawyer may refuse to aid or participate in conduct that the lawyer believes to be unlawful, even though there is some support for an argument that the conduct is legal."); s*ee also* Rule 1.16(c)(2) ("a lawyer may withdraw from representing a client when . . . the client persists in a course of action involving the lawyer's services that the lawyer reasonably believes is criminal or fraudulent").

23. The difficult question arises if the lawyer knows that the client's proposed conduct, although consistent with state law, would violate valid and enforceable federal law.[50] Ordinarily, in that event, while the lawyer could advise the client about the reach of the federal law and how to conform to the federal law, the lawyer could not properly encourage or assist the client in conduct that violates the federal law. That would ordinarily be true even if the federal law, although applicable to the client's proposed conduct, was not rigorously enforced and the lawyer anticipated that the law would not be enforced in the client's situation. See Charles W. Wolfram, Modern Legal Ethics 703 (1986) ("on the whole, lawyers serve the interests of society better if they urge upon clients the desirability of complying with all valid laws, no matter how widely violated by others they may be"); cf. Restatement

49 Inasmuch as this Committee limits itself to interpreting the ethics rules, we take no view on whether a colorable argument can be made that the federal narcotics law is invalid or unenforceable in situations where individuals or entities transport, distribute, possess or use marijuana pursuant to state medical marijuana law. We note, however, that as a constitutional matter, duly enacted federal laws ordinarily preempt inconsistent state laws under the federal Supremacy Clause. We also note, in particular, that in Gonzales v. Raich, 545 U.S. 1 (2005), the Court rejected a claim that Congress exceeded its authority under the Commerce Clause insofar as the marijuana prohibition applied to personal use of marijuana for medical purposes.

50 Rule 1.2(d) allows lawyers to assist clients in good faith challenges to a law's validity, but that is not the situation posed here.

(Third) of the Law Governing Lawyers § 94, Cmt. f (2000) ("A lawyer's advice to a client about the degree of risk that a law violation will be detected or prosecuted [is impermissible when] the lawyer thereby intended to counsel or assist the client's crime, fraud, or violation of a court order."). But the situation is different where the state executive branch determines to implement the state legislation by authorizing and regulating medical marijuana, consistent with current, published federal executive-branch enforcement policy, and the federal government does not take effective measures to prevent the implementation of the state law. In that event, the question under Rule 1.2(d) is whether a lawyer may assist in conduct under the state medical marijuana law that the lawyer knows would violate federal narcotics law that is on the books but deliberately unenforced as a matter of federal executive discretion.

24. This situation raises political and philosophical questions that this Committee cannot and need not resolve regarding how best to make and implement law in a federal system. Some may think it anomalous, where Congress has recognized no relevant exception to its narcotics prohibitions, for states to adopt medical marijuana laws that appear to contravene federal law and for the federal executive branch, through the exercise of prosecutorial discretion, effectively to carve out an exception for the implementation of these state laws. Others may think that DOJ's forbearance is consistent with its tradition, known to Congress, of exercising prosecutorial discretion to mitigate the criminal law's excesses, including where the criminal law reaches farther than its underlying purposes. We do not believe that by adopting Rule 1.2(d), our state judiciary meant to declare a position on this debate or meant to preclude lawyers from counseling or assisting conduct that is legal under state law. Rule 1.2(d) was based on an ABA model and there is no indication that anyone – not the ABA, not the state bar, and not the state court itself – specifically considered whether lawyers may serve in their traditional role in this sort of unusual legal situation. We assume for purposes of this Opinion that state courts will themselves serve in their traditional role: As issues of interpretation arise in litigation under the CCA, state courts will be available to issue interpretive rulings and take other judicial action that has the practical effect of assisting in the implementation of the CCA.[51] Serving this role will not undermine state judicial integrity. Similarly, we do not believe that it derogates from public respect for the law and lawyers, or otherwise undermines the objectives of the professional conduct rules, for lawyers as "officers of the court" to serve in their traditional role as well, if they so choose. Obviously, lawyers may decline to give legal assistance regarding the CCA.

25. We conclude that the New York Rules of Professional Conduct permit lawyers to give legal assistance regarding the CCA that goes beyond a mere discussion of the legality of the client's proposed conduct. In general, state professional conduct rules should be interpreted to promote state law, not to impede its effective implementation. As the Arizona and King County opinions recognized, a state medical-marijuana law establishing a complex regulatory scheme depends on lawyers for its success. Implicitly, the state law authorizes lawyers to provide traditional legal services to clients seeking to act in accordance with the state law. Further, and crucially, in this situation the federal enforcement policy also depends on the availability of lawyers to establish and promote compliance with the "strong and effective regulatory and enforcement systems" that are said to justify federal forbearance from enforcement of narcotics laws that are technically applicable. The contemplated legal work is not designed to escape law enforcement by avoiding detection. Cf. Rule 1.2 cmt. [9] ("There is a critical distinction between presenting an analysis of the legal aspects of questionable conduct and recommending the means by which a crime or fraud might be committed with impunity."); N.Y. State 529 (1981) ("[T]he Code distinguishes between giving legal advice and giving advice which would aid the client in escaping punishment for past crimes. EC 7-5 warns that 'a lawyer should never encourage or aid his client to commit criminal acts or counsel his client on how to violate the law and avoid punishment'"). Lawyers would assist clients who participate openly and subject to a state regulatory structure that the federal government allows to function as a matter of discretion. Nothing in the history and tradition of the profession, in court opinions, or elsewhere, suggests that Rule 1.2(d) was intended to prevent lawyers in a situation like this from providing assistance that is necessary to implement state law and to effectuate current federal policy.[52] If federal enforcement were to change materially, this Opinion might need to be reconsidered.

51 If the state courts were to nullify the CCA based on inconsistent federal narcotics law, the question addressed in this opinion would, of course, become moot.

CONCLUSION:

26. In light of current federal enforcement policy, the New York Rules of Professional Conduct permit a lawyer to assist a client in conduct designed to comply with state medical marijuana law, notwithstanding that federal narcotics law prohibits the delivery, sale, possession and use of marijuana and makes no exception for medical marijuana.

(34-14)

52 For essentially the same reason, we regard Rule 8.4(b) as inapplicable. Assuming that a lawyer's legal assistance in implementing the state medical-marijuana law technically violates the unenforced federal criminal law, we do not believe that the lawyer's assistance under the circumstances described here would amount to "illegal conduct that adversely reflects on the lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness as a lawyer."

OPINION 1025 (09/29/2014)

Modifies N.Y. State 756 and 964

TOPIC: Virtual law office; Advertising principal law office address

DIGEST: An attorney may operate via a purely virtual office, provided the attorney complies with all applicable laws and Rules. An attorney who is admitted to practice in New York but who is not resident in New York and who advertises his or her law practice in New York must include the address of the attorney's principal office, which may be the Internet address of a virtual law office. The attorney must have an office that meets the minimum requirements of Judiciary Law §470, but we express no opinion as to what Judiciary Law §470 requires.

RULES: 7.1(h)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer seeks to operate a "virtual law office," meaning solely an online presence. The inquirer does not reside in New York (in fact, lives outside the U.S.) and does not have in New York a brick-and-mortar office of any kind for the purpose of client meetings or otherwise conducting the practice of law (hereafter referred to as a "physical office"), but is licensed to practice in New York. The inquirer is a solo practitioner and engages only in transactional practice, such as preparing contracts relating to employment law, business law, and charity law. The inquirer does not accept litigation clients and would make this clear in any advertising.

2. The inquirer would advertise through a website and other forms of electronic communications.

3. The inquirer would interact with clients online and by other electronic means. The inquirer would contract with a service (the "Service") that would (i) provide a website and electronic means of communication, (ii) provide someone based in New York to answer calls to the inquirer's New York phone number, (iii) forward mail and other delivered materials to the inquirer, and (iv) accept service of process on behalf of the inquirer. Alternatively, the inquirer would rely upon a relative who resides in New York to receive calls, forward deliveries and mail, and accept service of process.

4. The inquirer's law office, which could be described as an "online" or "virtual" law office, would allow the client and attorney to communicate rapidly and securely, without regard for their physical location or the time of day. Once a client is registered, the client would have access to a private portal for obtaining legal services, checking on the status of matters, storing relevant documents, and communicating with the attorney. A prospective client would be informed that the attorney will operate only virtually, and that the client would receive an email instructing the client how to download the relevant software and obtain a user name and password. Then, the attorney would send the prospective client an engagement letter, an intake form, and invoices. Client communications would be secured using a level of security comparable to what banks and government agencies use. (The Service uses "secure HTTP" protocols.) Only the client would have authorized access to the client's information. Documents would be backed up on secure servers that keep redundant copies in multiple locations to reduce the risks of data loss.

QUESTION:

5. Rule 7.1(h) of the Rule of Professional Conduct, governing advertising, requires that advertisements contain the attorney's principal law office address. Does that Rule prohibit the inquirer from operating via a purely virtual law office?

OPINION:

6. Rule 7.1(h) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") requires attorney advertising to include the attorney's "principal law office address." Rule 7.1(h) states what an attorney's advertising must contain, but does not expressly state that all attorneys "shall" or "must" maintain a physical office, or set standards to determine what constitutes such an office.

7. In N.Y. State 964 (2013), we interpreted Rule 7.1(h) to mean that "[a]dvertising for legal services may not identify a mail drop as the sole address, and must include the street address of the lawyer's principal office."[53] The inquirer in that opinion was a New York attorney whose principal office was the attorney's home and who did not wish to receive mail or drop-in clients at home. We concluded that a mail drop was not a principal office within the meaning of Rule 7.1(h), and cited N.Y. State 756 (2002) for the proposition that an advertised office address must be a physical street address at which the office of the attorney or law firm is located.

8. In N.Y. State 756, we interpreted the phrase "office address" in DR 2-101(k), the predecessor of Rule 7.1(h), to require a physical address. The opinion cited three reasons for that interpretation. First, "this was the accepted meaning of the term prior to advent of the Internet." Second, the absence of a street address could be misleading by suggesting a physical proximity to the recipient of the advertisement that does not in fact exist (and by suggesting the ability to provide services in jurisdictions in which the advertising lawyer is not qualified to practice). Third, we wanted to ensure that attorneys practicing in New York are amenable to contact by their clients, adversaries and other interested parties, and to ensure a client's ability to find and meet with the lawyer "at a known physical location."[54]

9. In N.Y. State 964 (2013) we noted that the advertising rules adopted by the Appellate Divisions in 2007 modified the term "office address" in DR 2-101(K) to read "principal law office address," and we inferred (citing a law dictionary) that this was meant "to disclose the address of an office where the lawyers were present and available for contact, and where personal service or delivery of legal papers could be effected." We noted that the phrase "principal law office address" in the 2007 version of the former Disciplinary Rule was "carried forward in haec verba in the Rules of Professional Conduct . . . effective April 1, 2009," despite the fact that the requirement was not in the rules proposed by the New York State Bar Association. From this we concluded that "the intent of the Appellate Divisions [was] that all lawyer advertisements were to disclose the address of an office where the lawyers were present and available for contact, and where personal service or delivery of legal papers could be effected." We also concluded that there is "no exception from the mandate of Rule 7.1(h) for advertisements that are in the form of business cards or letterhead."

53 We also concluded that "a lawyer's business cards and letterhead may use a mail drop as the sole address, provided they are not being used as advertising and use of the address is not misleading."

54 N.Y. 756 did not state that these interests are only important when lawyers advertise, and it would be difficult to conclude they are.

10. Our Opinions therefore construe Rule 7.1(h) to require all attorneys who advertise to have and disclose a physical office address.

11. In N.Y. State 756, we noted that the requirement of a street address served the same purpose as Judiciary Law §470[55] – to ensure that attorneys practicing in New York are amenable to contact by their clients, adversaries and other interested parties. Although our interpretation related in part to Judiciary Law §470, it implied that Rule 7.1(h) by itself provided an independent basis for requiring a physical office. Interpreting Rule 7.1(h) and DR 2-101(K) in light of requirements of Judiciary Law §470 is appropriate. We have now concluded, however, that it is incorrect to interpret the attorney-advertising rule as an independent mandate for attorneys who advertise to maintain a physical office address.

12. Before our opinions, Judiciary Law §470 was held to be unconstitutional when applied only to non-New York residents residing in adjoining states, and thus was construed instead to require all lawyers who do not reside in New York but are licensed to practice here and who wish to practice law in New York to have a local office. See Lichtenstein v. Emerson, 171 Misc. 2d 933, 656 N.Y.S.2d 180 (Sup. Ct. 1997), aff'd 251 A.D.2d 64, 674 N.Y.S.2d 298 (1st Dep't 1998); White River Paper Co. v. Ashmont Tissue, Inc., 110 Misc. 2d 373, 441 N.Y.S.2d 960 (Sup. Ct. 1981). The requirements of Judiciary Law §470 for such an office for non-residents has been interpreted by various courts in ways that may differ from, or impose lesser obligations than, our past interpretation of DR 2-101(k) and Rule 7.1(h). For example, one court found that the non-resident office requirement was satisfied by having an office at a family member's residence or a New York hotel. See Rosenstein v. Ernstoff, 176 A.D. 2d 686 (App. Div. 1991). Another found it met by maintaining a desk at a realty company's Manhattan office and having access to a secretary at that location even though the secretary was not on the attorney's payroll. See Matter of Scarsella, 195 A.D. 2d 513 (App. Div. 1993). These holdings verge on approving the kind of "mail drop" we found inadequate in N.Y. State 964. In order to align this Committee's interpretation of Rule 7.1(h) with rulings by courts applying Judiciary Law §470, we have reconsidered whether Rule 7.1(h) independently requires a physical office.

13. Recently, the physical office requirement has come under judicial scrutiny. In Schoenefeld v. New York, after a District Court found unconstitutional the interpretation of Judiciary Law §470 to require a physical office, the Second Circuit referred the following certified question to the New York Court of Appeals:[56]

> Under New York Judiciary Law §470, which mandates that a nonresident attorney maintain an "office for the transaction of law business" with the state of New York, what are the minimum requirements necessary to satisfy that mandate?

55 Judiciary Law §470 states: "Attorneys having offices in this state may reside in adjoining state. A person, regularly admitted to practice . . . in the courts of record of this state, whose office for the transaction of law business is within the state, may practice as such attorney or counsellor, although he resides in an adjoining state."

56 Schoenefeld v. New York, 748 F.3d 464 (2d Cir. 2014). The Second Circuit did not cite to either N.Y. State 756 or 964, and only cited Rule 1.15 of the Rules of Professional Conduct in passing, in a footnote stating that it "requires an attorney to maintain complete and accurate books and records, but nothing in that Rule requires an attorney to maintain an "office."

14. In addition, the physical office requirement is undergoing changes in other states.[57]

15. In light of these developments, we no longer believe that Rule 7.1(h) – a rule that on its face regulates only advertising – provides an independent basis for requiring a physical office.

16. The New York City Bar recently issued an opinion – N.Y. City 2014-2 – in response to a somewhat different inquiry concerning a virtual law office arrangement, and opined that "a New York lawyer may use the street address of a virtual law office located in New York state as the 'principal law office address' for the purposes of rule 7.1(h) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct, even if most of the lawyer's work is done at another location." N.Y. City 2014-2 also concluded that such an address may be used on business cards, letterhead and law firm websites. There, as here, the lawyer did not intend to maintain a separate office, but there the lawyer had access to an office run by the virtual law office service provider contracted by the lawyer (which distinguishes it from the facts in Opinion 964)[58] whereas here the lawyer will not use any office in New York (although the lawyer will appoint an agent for purposes of personal delivery and acceptance of service of process). N.Y. City 2014-2 referred to our Opinions 756 and 964 as well as Schoenefeld, but it did not consider, as we do here, whether having no physical office in New York runs afoul of the Rules of Professional Conduct. Instead, it opined that the virtual law office service there provided a level of physical office presence in New York that would satisfy our Opinions 756 and 964.

17. For several reasons, we agree with the reasoning of N.Y. City 2014-2 that a virtual law office can, at least in some cases, adequately advance the policy interests we identified in Opinion 756 (see ¶ 8 above). First, a prospective client's intelligent selection of a lawyer can be facilitated not merely by physical presence but also by the potential value (due to lower overhead) of having a lawyer who works solely through a virtual law office (where that can be done competently, as we address below). Second, some clients who work only virtually might also prefer, for some kinds of work, the lawyer who operates virtually as well. Third, the robustness of electronic communications, and the appointment of a virtual law office service as an agent for accepting service of process, effectively combine to eliminate any concern that a physical office is necessary in all cases for the receipt of service and other communications. Indeed, as N.Y. City 2014-2 points out, the more electronically-connected lawyer may be "at least as accessible as a lawyer who rents a dedicated physical office space." We note that physical offices almost always are open only on a limited schedule. Finally, there is nothing inherently misleading about advertising a virtual law office. All such advertising must be truthful and not misleading, and the inquirer here intends to disclose that all services are conducted virtually and not via a physical office.

57 In In re Application of Carlton, 708 F. Supp. 2d 524, 526 (D. Md. 2010), the District Court overruled the denial of an attorney's license renewal, holding that the "principal law office" rule had evolved with advances in technology allowing attorneys the flexibility to carry out their work at different locations. The court, however, interpreted the rule to continue to require some physical presence "sufficient to assure accountability of the attorney to clients and to the court." Last year, New Jersey significantly altered its "bona fide office" requirement. The New Jersey Supreme Court amended Supreme Court Rule 1:21-1(a) to provide that "an attorney need not maintain a fixed physical location for the practice of law, but must structure his or her practice in such a manner as to assure, as set forth in Rules of Professional Conduct 1.4 (New Jersey's equivalent of our Rule 1.4), prompt and reliable communication with and accessibility by clients, other counsel, and judicial and administrative tribunals before which the attorney may practice, provided that an attorney must designate one or more physical locations where client files and the attorney's business and financial records may be inspected on short notice by duly authorized regulatory authorities, where mail or hand-deliveries may be made and promptly received, and where process may be served on the attorney for all actions, including disciplinary actions, that may arise out of the practice of law and activities related thereto."

58 New York City Bar offers its members a virtual law firm service that it describes as "so much more than just a 'mail drop' or a street address," including its meeting rooms, library, and phone answering service. See http://www.nycbar.org/small-law-firm-center/virtual-law-firm-program.

18. Pennsylvania Opinion 2010-200 concluded that an attorney is permitted to operate from a virtual law office, i.e., one "without a traditional physical counterpart," and specifically concluded that an attorney practicing in a virtual office is not required to list a physical address in advertisements and on letterheads. The Pennsylvania Committee also concluded that an attorney may use a post office address in advertisements and letterheads, but may not state that services are performed at the address where the post office box is located and that a virtual law office must disclose information specifying where the services advertised will be performed, but need not disclose the specific address where each attorney is located.[59]

19. North Carolina Opinion 10 (2005) opined that North Carolina rules do not prohibit "use of the Internet as an exclusive means of promoting and delivering legal services." However, the Opinion reminded lawyers that advertising must include "a physical office address on its website pursuant to Rule 7.2(c)" and pointed out some key concerns for cyberlawyers who use the Internet as the foundation of their law practice. These included (1) engaging in unauthorized practice in other jurisdictions, (2) violating advertising rules in other jurisdictions, (3) providing competent representation given the limited client contact, (4) creating a client-lawyer relationship with a person the lawyer does not intend to represent, and (5) protecting client confidences.

20. This opinion does not pass upon every potential form of virtual law practice. Our inquirer, for example, will not be engaging in litigation, which may present additional issues. Other fact-sensitive matters affect virtual law practice, such as how the matters are staffed, and how effectively the document storage and communications technologies function, and such matters are beyond the scope of this opinion. No matter how this inquirer proceeds, the Rules impose various duties that we emphasize here:

- All attorneys owe their clients a duty of competence (Rule 1.1) and this not only includes competence in performing the legal work but also competence in handling communications and storing and providing access to client files. An attorney should only use technology that he or she is competent to use.

- Attorneys owe duties of effective communication with clients to keep them promptly and reasonably informed and consulted about the means of achieving the client's objectives (Rule 1.4).

- Attorneys owe duties to maintain confidentiality (Rule 1.6), and there are unique concerns about confidentiality that relate to conducting all communications and client file storage electronically.

59 The Pennsylvania Committee also addressed whether an attorney must maintain a physical office, concluding, among other things, that "an attorney may maintain a virtual law office in Pennsylvania;" "an attorney may maintain a virtual law office in which the attorney works from home, and associates work from their homes in various locations, including locations outside of Pennsylvania;" and "an attorney with a virtual office is not required to meet with clients at the address listed in any advertisements and/or in the geographic location where the attorney will perform the services advertised, but must disclose to the client all of the information required under the Rules of Professional Conduct."

- Attorneys have numerous duties relating to the proper preservation of client materials (Rules 1.6(c) and 1.15).

- Attorneys must assure adequate supervision of subordinate lawyers and of non-lawyers (Rule 5.1 and 5.3).

There is no "virtual law office exception" to any of the Rules.

21. A lawyer is, of course, required to comply with applicable law. See Rule 8.4(b) (A lawyer must not engage in illegal conduct that adversely reflects on the lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness as a lawyer.) We believe that violation of the requirements of the Judiciary Law applicable to the practice of law may adversely reflect on the lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness.

CONCLUSION:

22. In whatever manner the courts resolve the statutory issues regarding virtual law offices – and we express no opinion on how they will or should resolve those issues – neither Rule 7.1(h) nor any other advertising rule imposes or defines the contours of an attorney's office or style of practice. To the extent N.Y. State 756 and 964 opine that Rule 7.1(h) or its predecessor imposes an obligation for a physical office, they are modified. We now conclude that an attorney who is admitted to practice in New York but who is not resident in New York and who advertises his or her law practice in New York must include the address of the attorney's principal office, which may be the Internet address of a virtual law office. The attorney must have an office that meets the minimum requirements of Judiciary Law §470, but we express no opinion as to what Judiciary Law §470 requires.

OPINION 1026 (10/01/2014)

TOPIC: Ethical duties of lawyer-mediator; confidentiality duties as to work of fiction

DIGEST: A lawyer-mediator who provides mediation services that are not distinct from legal services is subject to the Rules of Professional Conduct with respect to the mediation services, and those Rules protect confidential information that the lawyer-mediator learns about a client. The lawyer-mediator may not include such information in a work of fiction if there is a reasonable likelihood that readers will be able to ascertain the client's identity.

RULES: 1.6; 1.9(c); 2.4; 5.7(a)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is an attorney who also serves as a private mediator in divorce cases. The inquirer does not advertise, but potential parties to a mediation learn that he is a lawyer because, among other things, his answering machine greeting says, "You have reached the law and mediation offices of [name of inquirer]," and parties who wish to retain the inquirer must sign retainer papers making clear that the inquirer is a practicing attorney. In fact, many divorcing parties come to the inquirer precisely because he is also a lawyer.

2. Inquirer's services for divorcing parties are not limited to mediation services. When mediation is successful – i.e., the parties reach a settlement – the inquirer drafts the court papers to formalize the divorce according to the settlement terms. In advance of the mediation, divorcing parties sign both a mediation retainer agreement and a separate retainer agreement by which they retain the inquirer, in his capacity as an attorney, to draft and file with a court the papers necessary to obtain a divorce.[60]

3. The mediation retainer agreement contains a section governing confidentiality, which promises "complete confidentiality" from all outside parties and proceedings, unless all parties to the mediation give their written consent. The mediation retainer agreement also states that the inquirer in his role as a mediator does not represent the parties and is not providing legal advice or legal assistance to either party in the context of the mediation. But, as provided in the legal retainer agreement, he will represent the parties in drafting and filing the court papers to obtain a divorce if the mediation results in a settlement.

4. The inquirer now wants to write a book containing stories and events drawn from information about his divorce mediation clients. He would change the clients' names and geographic locations,

60 We have not been asked whether a lawyer-mediator may ethically represent the mediating parties in filing for a divorce in court, but we note N.Y. State 736 (2001) ("An attorney-mediator may prepare divorce documents incorporating a mutually acceptable separation agreement and represent both parties only in those cases where mediation has proven entirely successful, the parties are fully informed, no contested issues remain, and the attorney-mediator satisfies" the applicable conflict Rules). In addition, Rule 1.12(b) – which did not exist when N.Y. State 736 was issued – provides that the inquirer may not represent either party after the mediation (in court or otherwise) "unless all parties to the proceeding give informed consent, confirmed in writing." The inquirer should also consult Rule 1.12(c), which provides that a lawyer "shall not negotiate for employment with any person who is involved as a party . . . in a matter in which the lawyer is participating personally and substantially as . . . an arbitrator, mediator or other third-party neutral." This rule may prohibit the inquirer from asking the party to sign a retainer for post-mediation legal services during the mediation, but we have not been asked whether it is permissible to propose a retainer for post-mediation legal services before the mediation begins.

and would fictionalize various segments by adding children, addictions, extramarital affairs, etc. He would also sometimes blend the stories of multiple clients to safeguard against revealing sensitive and personal information that he obtained in confidence as a divorce mediator. He wants to know whether he may ethically do this without violating the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules").

QUESTION:

5. May a lawyer-mediator who handles divorce mediation, and subsequently provides legal services to those parties when the mediation is successful, publish a book of fiction that is based in part on facts relating to the mediation parties without obtaining the consent of those parties?

OPINION:

6. Service of a lawyer as a mediator is expressly addressed by Rule 2.4 ("Lawyer Serving as Third-Party Neutral"), which had no equivalent in the former New York Lawyer's Code of Professional Responsibility. Rule 2.4 provides, in full, as follows:

> (a) A lawyer serves as a "third-party neutral" when the lawyer assists two or more persons who are not clients of the lawyer to reach a resolution of a dispute or other matter that has arisen between them. Service as a third-party neutral may include service as an arbitrator, a mediator or in such other capacity as will enable the lawyer to assist the parties to resolve the matter.
> (b) A lawyer serving as a third-party neutral shall inform unrepresented parties that the lawyer is not representing them. When the lawyer knows or reasonably should know that a party does not understand the lawyer's role in the matter, the lawyer shall explain the difference between the lawyer's role as a third-party neutral and a lawyer's role as one who represents a client. [Emphasis added.]

This Rule, which refers to mediation parties as persons who are not law clients represented by the lawyer-mediator, does not by itself make a lawyer's service as a mediator subject to all the duties imposed by the other Rules. In particular, the Rule, by itself, imposes no duty of confidentiality. See Rule 1.12, Cmt. [3] (noting generally that "lawyers who serve as third-party neutrals do not obtain information concerning the parties that is protected under Rule 1.6"). But there are other possible sources of confidentiality duties.

7. We do not consider whether substantive laws (such as statutes or court rules) or private sources of guidance (such as ethics codes promulgated by mediation groups) impose duties of confidentiality on mediators. Our jurisdiction is limited to interpreting the Rules. The inquirer should therefore research substantive law and ethics codes that may apply to him in his capacity as a mediator. See Rule 2.4, Cmt. [2] ("the lawyer may be subject to court rules or other law that applies either to third-party neutrals generally or to lawyers serving as third-party neutrals. Lawyer-neutrals may also be subject to various codes of ethics"); Rule 1.12, Cmt. [3] (lawyers who serve as third-party neutrals "typically owe the parties an obligation of confidentiality under law or codes of ethics governing third-party neutrals").

8. Rather, the question before us is whether the New York Rules of Professional Conduct impose a duty of confidentiality on a divorce mediator who also drafts and files divorce papers with the appropriate court if the mediation results in an agreement. We think they do, even though the duty is not based on Rule 2.4.

9. Mediation is a "nonlegal service" as defined by Rule 5.7(c), and it therefore implicates Rule 5.7 ("Responsibilities Regarding Nonlegal Services"). Rule 5.7(a)(1) provides:

> A lawyer or law firm that provides nonlegal services to a person that are not distinct from legal services being provided to that person by the lawyer or law firm is subject to these Rules with respect to the provision of both legal and nonlegal services.

10. The mediation services that the inquirer provides to the mediating parties are "not distinct" from the legal services that he provides. The mediation itself (the nonlegal service) is designed to result in a "Memorandum of Understanding," and the inquirer's separate retainer for drafting and filing the divorce papers in court (the legal services) says that he will draw up the legal divorce documents in accordance with the Memorandum of Understanding. Thus the legal and nonlegal services that the inquirer provides, far from being "distinct," are intimately bound up with each other. Cf. N.Y. State 1015 ¶14 (2014) (discussing factors bearing on whether legal and nonlegal services are distinct). Consequently, the inquirer is subject to the Rules – including their confidentiality provisions – not only when he provides legal services (representing the parties in court) but also when he provides nonlegal services (serving as a divorce mediator). [61]

11. Under Rule 5.7(a)(1), therefore, the inquirer is "subject to" the duty of confidentiality articulated in Rule 1.6 with respect to information that the inquirer learns from the parties during the mediation process.[62] Unless there is informed consent or some other applicable exception:

> A lawyer shall not knowingly reveal confidential information, as defined in this Rule, or use such information to the disadvantage of a client or for the advantage of the lawyer or a third person . . . .
> "Confidential information" consists of information gained during or relating to the representation of a client, whatever its source, that is (a) protected by the attorney-cli-

61 Given the relationship between the legal and nonlegal services in this inquiry, the disclaimer found in Rule 5.7(a)(4) is not available. Rule 5.7(a)(4) provides:

> For purposes of paragraphs (a)(2) and (a)(3), it will be presumed that the person receiving nonlegal services believes the services to be the subject of a client-lawyer relationship unless the lawyer or law firm has advised the person receiving the services in writing that the services are not legal services and that the protection of a client-lawyer relationship does not exist with respect to the nonlegal services . . . .

Because paragraph (a)(1) is not listed, the disclaimer is not effective when, as here, the legal and nonlegal services are not distinct from each other.

62 We have previously opined that even if nonlawyers may engage in divorce mediation, lawyers who serve as mediators "should be presumed to be rendering a legal service". N.Y. State 678 (1996). That presumption too would support our conclusion that there is a duty of confidentiality, but the presumption is controversial, especially after the adoption of Rule 2.4. See N.Y. State 979 ¶¶ 6-7 (2013) (citing conflicting authorities but not opining as to continuing validity of N.Y. State 678). Here, Rule 5.7(a)(1) gives rise to a duty of confidentiality even if the mediation services by the inquirer are not legal services. Thus we again have no need to address the status of N.Y. State 678.

> ent privilege, (b) likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed, or (c) information that the client has requested be kept confidential. "Confidential information" does not ordinarily include (i) a lawyer's legal knowledge or legal research or (ii) information that is generally known in the local community or in the trade, field or profession to which the information relates.

Rule 1.6(a) (emphasis added).

12. Applying this Rule to the mediation process, the inquirer wishes to use information "gained during" the mediation and the post-mediation court proceedings. The information is not protected by the attorney-client privilege (because both opposing parties take part in the communications with the inquirer), but much of the information is "likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed," and is also "information that the client has requested be kept confidential" by signing a retainer agreement in which the client is promised "complete confidentiality." Such information is thus confidential within the meaning of Rule 1.6. Under that Rule, the inquirer may not publish a book revealing that information in the absence of informed consent or some other applicable exception to the duty of confidentiality. And that duty continues even after conclusion of the post-mediation legal representation. See Rule 1.9(c)(2) (providing that a lawyer "who has formerly represented a client in a matter . . . shall not thereafter . . . reveal confidential information of the former client protected by Rule 1.6 except as these Rules would permit or require with respect to a current client).

13. However, the conclusion that the inquirer owes a duty of confidentiality to the mediating parties does not end our analysis. The inquirer plans to write what is essentially a work of fiction based on confidential information that will be altered, augmented, rearranged, and amplified with details from the inquirer's imagination. Comment [4] to Rule 1.6 briefly addresses the issue of hypotheticals, saying:

> Paragraph (a) [of Rule 1.6] prohibits a lawyer from knowingly revealing confidential information as defined by this Rule. This prohibition also applies to disclosures by a lawyer that do not in themselves reveal confidential information but could reasonably lead to the discovery of such information by a third person. A lawyer's use of a hypothetical to discuss issues relating to the representation with persons not connected to the representation is permissible so long as there is no reasonable likelihood that the listener will be able to ascertain the identity of the client. [Emphasis added.]

14. The issue addressed by Comment [4] arises not only in the context of hypotheticals but also in the context of fiction. Indeed, there are many well-known lawyer-novelists (such as Scott Turow, David Baldacci, Alafair Burke, John Grisham, Lisa Scottoline, Erle Stanley Gardner, and Louis Auchincloss), and their books are often apparently based in part on the authors' personal experiences as lawyers. But when a lawyer's writings could not reasonably lead to the discovery of confidential information by a third person, then the common-sense implication of Comment [4] is that the duty of confidentiality is not violated. A lawyer may publish a work of fiction inspired by issues relating to a represented client so long as there is no reasonable likelihood that the reader will be able to ascertain the client's identity.

15. Applying that standard here, if the inquirer writes a book in which there is "no reasonable likelihood" that readers will be able to identify his mediation and divorce clients, then the inquirer will not violate any duty of confidentiality imposed by the Rules. In essence, if confidential information is sufficiently altered, disguised, rearranged, and infused with the inquirer's own imagination so that no one can trace particular information to a particular client, then the book will not reveal "confidential information" within the meaning of Rule 1.6.

16. We caution, however, that this is a high standard that may be difficult to meet. The inquirer has a local practice serving individual clients. Details that would be meaningless to a person across the country may provide meaningful clues to a person living in the same county or village. The inquirer will need to pay meticulous attention, fact by fact and detail by detail, to ensure that readers cannot identify his clients. For readers of the book who know (or know of) the inquirer's clients, concealing their identities may be nearly impossible. Perhaps it can be done, but we do not want to make it sound like an easy task.

17. Finally, because the inquirer's retainer agreement for mediation services promises "complete confidentiality" to the mediating parties, the inquirer would appear to have contractual obligations of confidentiality to those who sign the retainer. Whether the scope of that contractual promise is broader than the inquirer's duty of confidentiality under the Rules is a question of law beyond our jurisdiction to decide.

CONCLUSION:

18. A lawyer-mediator who serves as a private mediator in divorce cases, and thereafter represents the mediating parties by drafting and filing the papers needed to secure a divorce in court, is providing mediation services that are not distinct from legal services. The lawyer-mediator is therefore subject to the Rules of Professional Conduct with respect to the mediation services. In particular, the Rules protect confidential information about a client that was learned in the mediation or subsequent court proceedings. The lawyer-mediator may not publish a work of fiction that includes such confidential information if there is a reasonable likelihood that the reader will be able to ascertain the client's identity.

TOPIC: Choice of ethics rules for non-court matters

DIGEST: If a lawyer is licensed only in New York, then the New York Rules of Professional Conduct apply to the lawyer's conduct in all non-court matters. If a lawyer is licensed in New York and one or more other jurisdictions, then the lawyer's conduct in non-court matters will be governed by the rules of the jurisdiction in which the lawyer "principally practices" unless the "predominant effect" of the lawyer's conduct clearly will be felt in another jurisdiction in which the lawyer is also licensed to practice.

RULE: 8.5

FACTS:

1. The inquiring lawyer (the "Dual-Licensed Lawyer") is licensed and in good standing in both New York and the District of Columbia, and has offices in both jurisdictions. The lawyer handles state and federal matters outside of court. For example, he negotiates commercial contracts and real estate deals, and he represents clients in matters before various federal agencies such as the United States Patent and Trademark Office and the Internal Revenue Service. The lawyer does not handle any matters pending in a court.

2. Questions regarding confidentiality, conflicts of interest, and other legal ethics issues have arisen in some of the matters that the Dual-Licensed Lawyer is handling, and he wishes to know which jurisdiction's ethics rules apply to his conduct. This opinion does not address the underlying legal ethics questions in the inquirer's matters. It addresses only choice-of-ethics rules, and only in the context of the inquirer's practice, which does not include matters pending in any court.

QUESTION:

3. When a lawyer is licensed to practice in both New York and the District of Columbia, and the lawyer is handling a non-court matter (meaning a matter other than a matter in connection with proceedings pending before a court in which the lawyer has been admitted), which jurisdiction's rules of legal ethics govern the matter?[63]

OPINION:

4. The relevant provision in the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") is Rule 8.5, entitled "Disciplinary Authority and Choice of Law." Rule 8.5 has two paragraphs.

63 We are choosing the unusual term "non-court" to track the structure of New York Rule 8.5(b), which divides lawyer conduct into two categories: (1) "conduct in connection with a proceeding in a court before which a lawyer has been admitted to practice"; and (2) "any other conduct." Many types of litigation occur outside of a "court," so the term "non-litigation matters" would be too narrow to describe the second category, and many types of law practice cannot be described as "transactions," so the term "transactional practice" would also be too narrow. The term "non-court" covers the range of the inquirer's conduct that is not "in connection with a proceeding in a court before which a lawyer has been admitted to practice . . . ." Use of this term could be confusing in some contexts, because a lawyer could work on a proceeding in a court to which the lawyer is not admitted, but the inquirer does not do such work.

5. Rule 8.5(a), the "disciplinary authority" part of the rule, provides that a lawyer who is licensed in New York may be disciplined by New York disciplinary authorities for professional misconduct whether the misconduct occurs in New York or elsewhere, and may be disciplined by New York disciplinary authorities even if the lawyer is also disciplined for the same conduct by disciplinary authorities in another jurisdiction. Specifically, Rule 8.5(a) provides as follows:

> (a) A lawyer admitted to practice in this state is subject to the disciplinary authority of this state, regardless of where the lawyer's conduct occurs. A lawyer may be subject to the disciplinary authority of both this state and another jurisdiction where the lawyer is admitted for the same conduct.

6. However, Rule 8.5(a) does not specify which jurisdiction's rules of legal ethics will be applied by New York disciplinary authorities when the lawyer is admitted to practice in more than one jurisdiction. That question is instead addressed by the "choice of law" part of Rule 8.5, which provides as follows:

> (b) In any exercise of the disciplinary authority of this state, the rules of professional conduct to be applied shall be as follows:
> (1) For conduct in connection with a proceeding in a court before which a lawyer has been admitted to practice (either generally or for purposes of that proceeding), the rules to be applied shall be the rules of the jurisdiction in which the court sits, unless the rules of the court provide otherwise; and
> (2) For any other conduct:
> (i) If the lawyer is licensed to practice only in this state, the rules to be applied shall be the rules of this state, and
> (ii) If the lawyer is licensed to practice in this state and another jurisdiction, the rules to be applied shall be the rules of the admitting jurisdiction in which the lawyer principally practices; provided, however, that if particular conduct clearly has its predominant effect in another jurisdiction in which the lawyer is licensed to practice, the rules of that jurisdiction shall be applied to that conduct.

Rule 8.5(b) (emphasis added).[64]

7. Rule 8.5(b) is thus designed to ensure that New York disciplinary authorities will apply one and only one set of ethics rules to any particular conduct by a lawyer. See Rule 8.5, Cmt. [3] (explaining that the rule takes the approach of "providing that any particular conduct of a lawyer shall be subject to only one set of rules of professional conduct"). To analyze how Rule 8.5(b) applies to the Dual-Licensed Lawyer in non-court matters, we will examine the rule's subparagraphs.

64 New York Rule 8.5(b) is intended to guide choice-of-law decisions by New York disciplinary authorities. Other jurisdictions may have different versions of rules of professional conduct governing choice-of-law questions, or may govern such questions by common law, such as by reference to Restatement (Second) of Conflict of Laws §§ 6 and 188 (setting forth multiple factors for resolving a conflict of laws).

Rule 8.5(b)(1): "conduct in connection with a proceeding in a court"

8. Rule 8.5(b)(1) applies only to "conduct in connection with a proceeding in a court before which a lawyer has been admitted to practice," and thus does not apply at all to matters not in a "court." The term "court" is not defined in the Rules, but it is narrower than the word "tribunal," which is defined in Rule 1.0(w) as follows:

> "Tribunal" denotes a court, an arbitrator in an arbitration proceeding or a legislative body, administrative agency or other body acting in an adjudicative capacity. A legislative body, administrative agency or other body acts in an adjudicative capacity when a neutral official, after the presentation of evidence or legal argument by a party or parties, will render a legal judgment directly affecting a party's interests in a particular matter.

9. Thus, a "court" is just one of many kinds of "tribunal" – and canons of statutory construction support the conclusion that the term "court" excludes the other types of tribunal listed in Rule 1.0(w). See N.Y. State 1011 ¶7 (2014) (citing the Rule's history); N.Y. State 968 ¶6 (2013) (also citing Rule 1.0(w) and stating that "we do not believe we are free to read 'court' in Rule 8.5(b)(1) to include administrative tribunals" such as the Merit Systems Protection Board). The practice of the Dual-Licensed Lawyer includes matters before federal agencies, but not matters before courts. Accordingly, Rule 8.5(b)(1) does not apply to his inquiry, and we therefore proceed to Rule 8.5(b)(2).

Rule 8.5(b)(2): "any other conduct"

10. Rule 8.5(b)(2) governs "any other conduct," a phrase that encompasses all of a lawyer's conduct not in connection with a proceeding in a court before which the lawyer has been admitted to practice. Thus, non-court law practice encompasses many types of conduct, including:

- adversarial matters (i.e., matters with an opposing party) that are pending before (i) a state or federal agency, (ii) an arbitrator not annexed to a court, or (iii) some other adjudicative body that is not a "court" – see Rule 1.0(w) (defining "Tribunal");
- non-adversarial matters before a government agency, such as prosecuting patents in the USPTO, filing papers with the SEC, and requesting private letter rulings from the IRS;
- transactional matters, such as mergers and acquisitions, contract negotiations, and formation of partnerships; and
- counseling-only matters, such as tax advice, estate planning advice, advice on corporate by-laws, and other counseling matters involving neither a government agency or an opposing party.[65]

65 The phrase "any other conduct" in Rule 8.5(b)(2) would also seem to include conduct in connection with a proceeding in a court before which a lawyer has not been admitted to practice. But because the inquirer does not practice in any "court," this opinion does not address a lawyer's conduct in connection with a proceeding in a court before which the lawyer has not been admitted to practice. It addresses only conduct that is not in connection with any court proceeding.

11. Rule 8.5(b)(2) is divided into two subparagraphs. Subparagraph (b)(2)(i) governs lawyers who are licensed to practice solely in New York. Subparagraph (b)(2)(ii) governs lawyers who are licensed to practice in New York and in at least one other jurisdiction, whether in the United States or a foreign country. See Rule 8.5, Cmt. [7] ("The choice-of-law provision applies to lawyers engaged in transnational practice, unless international law, treaties or other agreements between or among competent regulatory authorities in the affected jurisdictions provide otherwise."). We will deal with both subparagraphs in turn.

12. Rule 8.5(b)(2)(i) provides that if a lawyer is "licensed to practice only in this state" (meaning only in New York), then the applicable ethics rules shall be "the rules of this state." The inquirer here, however, is licensed in both New York and in the District of Columbia, so subparagraph (b)(2)(i) does not apply.

13. Rule 8.5(b)(2)(ii) contains both a general rule and an exception. The general rule is that when a lawyer is licensed in two or more jurisdictions, "the rules to be applied shall be the rules of the admitting jurisdiction in which the lawyer principally practices." An exception applies, however, if "particular conduct clearly has its predominant effect in another jurisdiction in which the lawyer is licensed to practice." In that case, the rules of the jurisdiction feeling the "predominant effect" apply to the lawyer's conduct.

14. Here, the Dual-Licensed Lawyer maintains offices in both New York and D.C., but we do not know the jurisdiction in which he "principally practices." Neither the text of Rule 8.5 nor its Comments provide any guidelines for determining where a lawyer principally practices. We believe that when a lawyer is licensed in more than one jurisdiction, various factors are relevant to determining the one in which the lawyer principally practices, including: (a) the number of calendar days the lawyer spends working in each jurisdiction; (b) the number of hours the lawyer bills in each jurisdiction; (c) the location of the clients the lawyer serves; (d) the activities the lawyer performs in each jurisdiction (e.g., legal work for clients vs. administrative work for the law firm); and (e) special circumstances (such as a recent move, an extended illness, or a natural disaster). For a discussion of each of these factors, see Roy D. Simon, Simon's New York Rules of Professional Conduct Annotated 1915-17 (2014). Given the increase in law practice over the Internet, and the corresponding decrease in the importance of a lawyer's physical location, the jurisdiction in which a lawyer "principally practices" for purposes of Rule 8.5(b)(2)(ii) is becoming less certain, and we should consider a lawyer's significant contacts with all jurisdictions, not solely the jurisdiction in which the lawyer is most often physically present.

15. Even if we had sufficient information to determine the jurisdiction in which the Dual-Licensed Lawyer principally practices, his conduct could in some situations be evaluated by the ethics rules of the other admitting jurisdiction because of the exception stated in Rule 8.5(b)(2)(ii). Specifically, "if particular conduct clearly has its predominant effect in another jurisdiction in which the lawyer is licensed to practice," then "the rules of that jurisdiction" – the one where the predominant effect occurs – "shall be applied to that conduct." (Emphasis added.) Here, for example, if the Dual-Licensed Lawyer principally practices in New York but the predominant effect of particular conduct "clearly" would be in D.C., then the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct would govern that conduct. But if the Dual-Licensed Lawyer principally practices in New York and the predominant effect of the conduct would not "clearly" be in D.C., then the New York Rules of Professional Conduct would govern that conduct.

16. Unfortunately, no simple formula is available to determine where the "predominant effect" will occur. As Comment [5] to New York Rule 8.5 points out: "When a lawyer is licensed to practice in New York and another jurisdiction and the lawyer's conduct involves significant contacts with more than one jurisdiction, it may not be clear whether the predominant effect of the lawyer's conduct will occur in an admitting jurisdiction other than the one in which the lawyer principally practices."[66] Factors to consider include such things as: (a) where the clients reside, and where they work; (b) where any payments will be deposited; (c) where any contract will be performed; and (d) where any new or expanded business will operate. For example, if a lawyer principally practices in D.C. but is advising a New York client on how to draft (or interpret, or enforce) a commercial contract among several parties, and all of those parties live and work in New York, and the contract will be performed solely in New York, then advising the client would ordinarily be conduct that "clearly has its predominant effect" in New York. But if some of the parties to the contract work outside New York, or if part of the contract will be performed outside New York, then the lawyer's advice may not "clearly" have its predominant effect in New York – in which case the ethics rules applicable under Rule 8.5(b)(2)(ii) will be the rules of the jurisdiction in which the lawyer principally practices.

17. Notably, the exception in the second half of Rule 8.5(b)(2)(ii) applies only if the predominant effect occurs in another jurisdiction and the lawyer is licensed to practice in that jurisdiction. Both criteria must be met for the exception to apply. If the Dual-Licensed Lawyer principally practices in D.C. but the predominant effect will clearly occur in a jurisdiction where he is not licensed to practice (in this case, anywhere other than New York or D.C.), then the ethics rules of D.C. (the jurisdiction in which the lawyer principally practices) will apply even though the predominant effect is elsewhere. As Comment [5] says, "as long as the lawyer's conduct conforms to the rules of the jurisdiction in which the lawyer principally practices, the lawyer should not be subject to discipline unless the predominant effect of the lawyer's conduct will clearly occur in another admitting jurisdiction." (Emphasis added.)

Do the ethics rules of a federal agency apply?

18. Because this inquiry concerns a lawyer who handles matters before federal agencies, the rules of the federal agency in question may also come into play.[67] If an agency has its own professional conduct rules, then those rules might take precedence over state rules by virtue of the Supremacy

66 The ABA version of this rule adds the following escape hatch: "A lawyer shall not be subject to discipline if the lawyer's conduct conforms to the rules of a jurisdiction in which the lawyer reasonably believes the predominant effect of the lawyer's conduct will occur." Model Rule 8.5(b)(2). The New York State Bar Association proposed that language to the Courts in 2008, but the Courts decided not to adopt it. Consequently, New York Rule 8.5(b)(2)(ii) has no exemption based on a lawyer's reasonable belief. However, New York builds in some leeway by limiting the exception to those admitting jurisdictions in which the predominant effect will "clearly" occur. If a lawyer "reasonably believes the predominant effect of the lawyer's conduct will occur" (to use the ABA's wording) in the admitting jurisdiction in which the lawyer principally practices, then it will seldom be the case that the predominant effect "clearly" occurs in a different jurisdiction.

67 For example, the USPTO adopted Rules of Professional Conduct, effective May 3, 2013, that govern a wide range of professional conduct by lawyers and others practicing before the USPTO. See 37 C.F.R. §§ 11.101 et seq. Similarly, the IRS has adopted ethics rules governing lawyers and others in practice before the IRS. See 31 C.F.R. §§ 10.20 et seq.

Clause and the pre-emption doctrine.[68] There are interesting and controversial questions about the circumstances in which a federal agency's rules might pre-empt state rules of legal ethics.[69] But these are questions of law beyond our jurisdiction, and we do not address them.

CONCLUSION:

19. If a lawyer is licensed only in New York, then the New York Rules of Professional Conduct apply to the lawyer's conduct in non-court matters (meaning all matters not in connection with proceedings pending before a court in which a lawyer has been admitted). If a lawyer is licensed in New York and other jurisdictions, then the lawyer's conduct in non-court matters will be governed by the rules of the jurisdiction where the lawyer principally practices unless the predominant effect of the lawyer's conduct clearly will be felt in another jurisdiction where the lawyer is also licensed to practice. Whether a federal agency's rules of ethics pre-empt the New York Rules in particular cases depends on questions of law beyond our jurisdiction.

VI, cl. 2 (providing that federal laws "shall be the supreme Law of the Land; and the Judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any Thing in the Constitution or Laws of any State to the Contrary notwithstanding"); Fidelity Fed. Sav. & Loan Ass'n v. de la Cuesta, 458 U.S. 141, 152-54 (1982) (discussing various forms of pre-emption).

69 For example, controversy continues as to whether Sarbanes-Oxley regulations governing attorneys who practice before the SEC enjoy supremacy over contrary state rules of professional conduct. Under 17 C.F.R. § 205.3(d)(2), an attorney practicing before the SEC may reveal a client's confidential information to the extent the attorney reasonably believes necessary to "prevent the issuer from committing a material violation [of the federal securities laws] that is likely to cause substantial injury to the financial interest or property of the issuer or investors." Other regulatory provisions address choice of law. See 17 C.F.R. § 205.1 ("Where the standards of a state . . . where an attorney is admitted or practices conflict with this part, this part shall govern."); 17 C.F.R. § 205.5(c) ("An attorney who complies in good faith with the provisions of this part shall not be subject to discipline or otherwise liable under inconsistent standards imposed by any state . . . where the attorney is admitted or practices."). Nevertheless, N.Y. County 746 (2013) opined that a New York lawyer may not disclose confidential information pursuant to SEC regulations that permit but do not mandate disclosure. We have no occasion here to endorse or reject N.Y. County 746.

TOPIC: Firm Name, Letterhead, Business Cards

DIGEST: A. If two lawyers, X and Y, form a law firm that is a professional corporation, the law firm may not be called simply "X & Y". The firm name must contain "P.C."

B. A law firm name need not expressly refer to the firm as a law office, e.g. "Law Offices of X & Y." It is sufficient that the firm is identified as "X & Y, P.C."

C. On personal letterhead and business cards, it is sufficient to identify lawyers by their name (with or without "Esq.") without a designation of their position within the firm, e.g., "partner," "principal" or "associate."

D. On firm letterhead that lists both partners and associates, a law firm must distinguish between partners and associates, such as by using a separating line or by listing partners and associates on different sides of the letterhead, because failure to do so would be misleading.

RULES: 7.1, 7.5(a) and (b).

QUESTION:

1. The inquirer asks several questions:

A. If two lawyers, X and Y, form a law firm that is a professional corporation, may the law firm be called "X & Y", or must the firm name contain "P.C."?

B. Must the name of the firm on letterhead or business cards expressly refer to it as a law office, e.g. "Law Offices of X & Y," or is it sufficient that the firm is identified as "X & Y, P.C."?

C. On personal letterhead and business cards, is it sufficient to identify lawyers by their name (with or without "Esq."), or must there also be a designation of the lawyers' position within the firm, e.g., "partner" or "associate"?

D. On firm letterhead that lists all partners and associates, must there be a designation of the lawyers' position within the firm, e.g., "partner" or "associate"?

OPINION:

Use of "P.C." by Professional Corporations

2. Rule 7.5(a) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") provides that a lawyer or law firm may use professional cards, office signs and letterheads, as long as they do not violate any statute or court rule and are in accordance with Rule 7.1. Rule 7.1(a)(1) prohibits a lawyer from using an advertisement that is false, deceptive or misleading.

3. Rule 7.5(b), in pertinent part, states that "the name of a professional corporation shall contain 'PC' or such symbols permitted by law, [and] the name of a limited liability company or partnership shall contain 'LLC,' or 'LLP' or such symbols permitted by law." Consequently, the name of a law firm organized as a professional corporation cannot be "X & Y," but must also include "P.C." or such symbols as may be permitted by law. See also N.Y. Bus. Corp. Law § 1515(b) ("The name of a professional service corporation shall end with the words 'Professional Corporation' or the abbreviation 'P.C.'")

4. The purpose of this requirement is to avoid misleading prospective clients who may believe that a law firm is a partnership whose members are personally liable for the firm's debts, including those arising out of liability for malpractice, when the firm is in fact practicing as a professional corporation with more limited liability. Cf. D.C. Opinion 235 (1993).

Identification as a Law Office

5. No provision of the Rules specifically requires a law firm to be identified as "law offices," whether the firm is formed as a professional corporation, a partnership or another permitted form of organization. The question is governed by Rules 7.1 and 7.5. As noted above, Rule 7.1(a)(1) generally forbids deceptive and misleading advertisements, while Rule 7.5 sets forth certain standards for professional notices, letterheads and signs, including professional cards. Neither these nor other rules expressly require law firms to refer to themselves as "law offices" in their professional cards and letterheads. Nor is there any invariable tradition of including that phrase in firm names. While a law firm may wish to identify itself in its name or on its letterhead or business cards as a law office, in order to indicate to potential clients that the firm provides legal services, it is not required by the Rules or by applicable law to do so. Moreover, we do not believe that a law firm's failure to identify itself as a law firm in its name, on its letterhead and on professional cards is misleading. Ordinarily, the context in which the firm uses its name, its letterhead and its professional cards will indicate the nature of the firm's work.

Identification of Role of Lawyers

6. Rule 7.5(a)(1) and (4) authorize professional cards and letterheads to identify the lawyer "by name and as a lawyer." May a professional card or personalized letterhead identify only the firm name and the name of the lawyer, or must it also identify the lawyer as a lawyer, e.g., "lawyer," "Esquire" or a similar identifier, and/or include the designation of the lawyer's role within the firm, e.g. partner, principal, associate? We believe that both a professional card and personal letterhead may designate only the name of the lawyer, without adding "lawyer," "Esquire" or a similar identifier, or the lawyer's role within the firm.

7. In N.Y. State 704 (1998), the inquirer asked whether an attorney's relationship with the firm (e.g., partner, associate or of counsel) must be disclosed on personal letterhead and professional cards. We concluded that it would be ethically permissible to use personal letterhead or professional cards that did not provide any information on the attorney's role in the firm, as long as the omission was not false, deceptive or misleading and did not violate any statute or court rule. We also stated "we have not found any rule or ethical authority that suggests that the nature of the precise status of an attorney in the law firm must be indicated on the letterhead." We noted that the language in DR 2-102(A) – the predecessor provision in the Code of Professional Responsibility that corresponds to Rule 7.5(a) – did not require any particular information to be included on a lawyer's professional card or letterhead but instead provided a non-exclusive list of information that might permissibly be included. We said:

> While DR 2-102(A)(4) states literally that "a letterhead identifying the lawyer by name and as a lawyer" is permissible, we believe that provision to be enabling and not limiting.

See also N.Y. State 932 (2012)("Rule 7.5(a)(i) provides a non-exclusive list of the content of a lawyer's professional card. It provides that the card may contain [the enumerated items]"); N.Y. County 682 (1990) (An associate's professional card need not indicate the fact that the associate is only an associate as opposed to a partner in the law firm; as long as the individual is a lawyer, further designation of the lawyer's status in the firm is not ethically required.)

8. We would not reach the same conclusion with respect to firm letterhead that listed both partners and associates. See N.Y. County 612 (1973) (firm letterhead must differentiate between partners and associates); N.Y. City 890 (1977) (same). For example, N.Y. County 612 states:

> It has been a long established practice in New York City for law firm letterheads to distinguish between partners and associates thereof by a separating line, enlarged spacing between the classes or otherwise. On the letterheads of many law firms only the names of partners are listed.
> In light of such strong precedent it would appear misleading to all who receive such non-differentiating letterheads to depart from the usual form of separation between partner and associate. Absent some clear form of differentiation . . . the letterhead would constitute in the mind of a recipient a representation that all the listed names were those of partners. The public is entitled to know the status of those listed on the letterhead.

We agree with that reasoning. Furthermore, we believe the practice of distinguishing between partners and associates on letterhead also exists throughout the state. Typical methods of making the distinction include using a separating line between partners and associates or listing partners and associates on different sides of the letterhead. Because the practice of distinguishing between partners and associates on letterhead is longstanding and statewide, a law firm's failure to do so would be misleading within the meaning of Rule 7.1 and therefore would violate Rule 7.5(a).

CONCLUSION:

9. We conclude as follows:

A. If two lawyers, X and Y, form a law firm that is a professional corporation, the law firm may not be called simply "X & Y". The firm name must also contain "P.C."

B. A law firm name need not expressly refer to the firm as a law office, e.g., "Law Offices of X & Y." It is sufficient that the firm is identified as "X & Y, P.C."

C. On personal letterhead and professional cards, it is sufficient to identify lawyers by their name (with or without "Esq.") without a designation of position within the firm, e.g., "partner," "principal" or "associate".

D. On firm letterhead that lists both partners and associates, a law firm must distinguish between partners and associates, such as by using a separating line or by listing partners and associates on different sides of the letterhead, because failure to distinguish between partners and associates would be misleading.

TOPIC: Conflicts of interest for government lawyers with prior private clients

DIGEST: A government agency lawyer who previously represented a nongovernmental client in litigation against the agency is prohibited from representing the agency in a particular matter if that matter is the same as or substantially related to the litigation and the interests of the former client and the agency are materially adverse, although such conflict may be cured by informed consent of the prior client. If the lawyer participated personally and substantially in the prior litigation, then, notwithstanding any consent of the prior client, the lawyer is also prohibited from representing the agency in a particular matter that is the same as the prior litigation, such as advising the agency on compliance with the settlement agreement that ended the litigation. Advice on programs that were not involved in the litigation likely would not be the same matter as, nor substantially related to, the litigated matter unless the parties and the underlying facts were the same. Advice on programs that were involved in the litigation would require closer scrutiny to determine if the matter were the same or substantially related. The fact that legal issues involved in a new matter may be the same as ones in the litigation does not automatically make the matters substantially related.

RULES: 1.0(l); 1.9(a); 1.11(d)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is employed as an attorney for a municipal agency. The inquirer was previously employed by an advocacy organization that conducted class action litigation (the "Litigation") against the agency. In that capacity the inquiring lawyer participated personally and substantially in the Litigation, which was eventually settled.

2. The lawyer's responsibilities with the agency include setting policy for programs provided to the agency's constituents. The lawyer does not provide legal advice to the agency on compliance with the settlement agreement that resolved the Litigation. While much of lawyer's advice to the agency involves new programs for the agency's constituents, the lawyer may be called upon to advise on programs involving the same settings that gave rise to the Litigation.

3. The inquirer asks whether his prior involvement in the Litigation presents any ethical issues for his ongoing work for the agency on any programs or issues that were involved in the Litigation.

QUESTION:

4. May the lawyer advise the agency on issues involved in the Litigation, including issues relating to the provision of services to the agency's constituents with respect to (i) programs that were not involved in the Litigation, and (ii) programs that were involved in the Litigation?

OPINION:

5. Two separate conflicts rules in the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") apply to this situation: Rule 1.9 and Rule 1.11.

6. Rule 1.9(a) is the general rule applicable to conflicts with former clients. It provides that "[a] lawyer who has formerly represented a client in a matter shall not thereafter represent another person in the same or a substantially related matter" in which the new client's interests "are materially adverse to the interests of the former client" unless the former client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing.

7. The goals of Rule 1.9 include (1) preventing a lawyer from switching sides (e.g., from participating in the litigation and settlement of a matter and then attacking the settlement), and (2) preventing a lawyer from improperly using confidential information of the former client. See Rule 1.9, Cmts. [2] & [3]. To achieve these goals, Rule 1.9(a) applies not only to representation in the very matter in which the lawyer represented the former client, but also to representation in matters that are "substantially related."

8. Rule 1.11, as its name denotes, is the special conflicts rule applicable to current and former government employees. Rule 1.11(a) applies to a lawyer in the private sector who formerly served as a public officer or employee of the government. Rule 1.11(d) applies to the reverse situation – the one presented here – providing in part:

> (d) Except as law may otherwise expressly provide, a lawyer currently serving as a public officer or employee shall not:
> > (1) participate in a matter in which the lawyer participated personally and substantially while in private practice or nongovernmental employment, unless under applicable law no one is, or by lawful delegation may be, authorized to act in the lawyer's stead in the matter . . .

9. Rule 1.11(a) applies instead of Rule 1.9(a) with respect to lawyers who leave the government and join the private sector, but Rule 1.11(d), which applies to lawyers who leave private practice to join the government, applies in addition to Rule 1.9(a). Compare Rule 1.11, Cmt. [4] (explaining that a former government lawyer is disqualified "only from particular matters in which the lawyer participated personally and substantially") with Rule 1.11, Cmt. [9B] ("Where a government law office's representation is materially adverse to a government lawyer's former private client, . . . the representation would, absent informed consent of the former client, also be prohibited by Rule 1.9.").

10. The goal of Rule 1.11 is not to prevent switching sides. In particular, Rule 1.11(d) applies "regardless of whether a lawyer is adverse to a former client." Rule 1.11, Cmt. [3] (noting that rule is designed not only to protect former clients "but also to prevent a lawyer from exploiting public office for the advantage of another client," so that in general, "a lawyer who has pursued a claim on behalf of a private client may not pursue the claim on behalf of the government"). The goals of Rule 1.11 are discussed in a Comment which goes on to state:

> On the other hand, the rules governing lawyers presently or formerly employed by a government agency should not be so restrictive as to inhibit transfer of employment to and from the government. The government has a legitimate need to attract qualified lawyers as well as to maintain high ethical standards. . . . [Certain provisions in Rule 1.11(b)] are necessary to prevent the disqualification rule from imposing too severe a deterrent to entering public service. The limitation on disqualification in paragraphs

> (a)(2) and (d) to matters involving a specific party or specific parties, rather than extending disqualification to all substantive issues on which the lawyer worked, serves a similar function.

Rule 1.11, Cmt. [4] (noting that the Rule "represents a balancing of interests").

Are the Litigation and the Current Representation the Same Matter?

11. The term "matter," which appears in both Rule 1.9 and Rule 1.11, appears in the definition section of the Rules: "'Matter' includes "any litigation, judicial or administrative proceeding, case, claim, application, request for a ruling or other determination, contract, controversy, investigation, charge, accusation, arrest, negotiation, arbitration, mediation or any other representation involving a specific party or parties." Rule 1.0(l); see Rule 1.9, Cmt. [2] ("The scope of a 'matter' for purposes of this Rule depends on the facts of a particular situation or transaction."). And, at least for purposes of Rule 1.11:

> [A] "matter" may continue in another form. In determining whether two particular matters are the same, the lawyer should consider the extent to which (i) the matters involve the same basic facts, (ii) the matters involve the same or related parties, and (iii) time has elapsed between the matters.

Rule 1.11, Cmt. [10].[70]

12. The inquiry specifies that the lawyer does not provide legal advice to the agency on compliance with the settlement agreement that resolved the Litigation. We note that for the lawyer to give such advice would seemingly be prohibited under Rule 1.9(a) and Rule 1.11(d). The lawyer participated personally and substantially in the Litigation settled by that agreement, and advising on compliance with the agreement with respect to the very parties involved in the Litigation would implicate concerns of switching sides, improperly using the former client's confidential information, and exploiting public office for the advantage of the former client.

13. Since the lawyer does not in fact advise the agency on compliance with the settlement agreement, the lawyer's representation of the agency does not necessarily constitute representation in the same "matter" as the Litigation. We turn to an analysis of the factors mentioned in Comment [10] to Rule 1.11 – the facts, the passage of time, and the parties.

14. As to whether the matters involve the same basic facts, we distinguish between (i) programs that were not involved in the Litigation and (ii) programs that were involved in the Litigation. If the lawyer's advice to the agency does not involve the same programs that were the subject of the Litigation, it may be easy to conclude that the current representation and the Litigation do not involve the same basic facts. But if the lawyer were to advise the agency regarding the same programs, especially if the advice were given in connection with an adversarial proceeding brought on behalf of the agency's constituents, then a more detailed analysis would be required to determine whether the new advice involves the same basic facts as the Litigation.

70 Comment [10] addresses the relationship of two matters "[f]or purposes of paragraph (e)." Rule 1.11(e) does not define "matter" in general, but merely provides that "[a]s used in this Rule, the term 'matter' as defined in Rule 1.0(l) does not include or apply to agency rulemaking functions." The Rule's history may shed light on why the Comment, in making a general point about the definition of "matter," refers to a paragraph that addresses only rulemaking. The ABA Model Rules do not include a definition of "matter" in the definition section, but rather define that term in Rule 1.11(e). Nor was the term defined in the definition section in the version of the Rules proposed to the Appellate Divisions by the New York State Bar Association in 2008. Rule 1.0(l) was added by the New York Administrative Board sua sponte.

15. As to the passage of time, the Litigation was commenced years ago and has already been settled. Although the settlement agreement was finalized only within the past year, the inquiry nonetheless involves matters separated by time.

16. Finally, as to whether the matters involve the same or related parties, the current clients of the agency were not named plaintiffs in the Litigation. We have found no case law or ethics opinions attempting to define "a specific party or parties" as that phrase is used in Rule 1.0(l), but our prior opinions citing that Rule involve the same party or parties. See, e.g., N.Y. State 904 ¶ 8 (2012) (concluding that criminal investigation and civil claim for restitution, though related, were not same matter, in part because prosecutor was party only to the former and claimant was party only to the latter).

17. We believe the term "a specific party or parties" in Rule 1.0(l), at least for purposes of Rule 1.11, should be interpreted narrowly. See Rule 1.11, Cmt. [4] (quoted above). In a class action, only named plaintiffs should be considered a "specific party or parties," and that term should generally not be deemed to include all members of the class even though they may benefit from relief resulting from the lawsuit. Cf. N.Y. City 2004-1 (2004) ("If a class member has not individually retained the class lawyer or consulted with that lawyer and the lawyer has not acquired confidential information about that class member, the lawyer should be free to accept an unrelated matter against the class member while the class action is pending."). This factor thus counts against a conclusion that the matters are the same.

18. Taking these various factors into account, it seems unlikely that the current representation and the Litigation would be deemed the same matter if the advice does not involve the programs that were the subject of the Litigation. We do not foreclose the possibility that they could be deemed the same matter in some circumstances, such as if the lawyer were to advise the agency regarding the litigated programs and the advice were given in connection with an adversarial proceeding brought on behalf of the agency's constituents, especially if that adversarial proceeding were similar or related to the prior Litigation.

Are the Litigation and the Current Representation Substantially Related Matters?

19. If a matter on which the inquirer would advise the agency were not the same as the one in which the inquirer "participated personally and substantially while in private practice or nongovernmental employment," then Rule 1.11(d) would not preclude the inquirer's participation in giving such advice. However, giving such advice could still implicate Rule 1.9(a), which applies to representation not only in the same matter, but also in matters that are "substantially related." It is therefore relevant to determine whether issues involving the constituents of the agency should be viewed as substantially related to the Litigation.

20. Comment [3] to Rule 1.9 explains that matters are "substantially related" if "they involve the same transaction or legal dispute or if, under the circumstances, a reasonable lawyer would conclude that there is otherwise a substantial risk that confidential factual information that would normally have been obtained in the prior representation would materially advance the client's position in the subsequent matter." Ultimately, the determination of substantial relationship is a factual one. See N.Y. State 1008 ¶ 21(2014) ("the 'materially advances' inquiry is fact-intensive").

21. The test of substantial relation between two matters is more easily met than the test of whether two matters will be deemed the same, but the factors discussed above are again relevant to the analysis. If the lawyer's advice to the agency does not involve the same programs that were the subject of the Litigation, then the current representation and the Litigation probably are not substantially related. But if the advice involves the same programs, and especially if the advice is given in connection with litigation (such as an adversarial proceeding brought on behalf of the agency's constituents), then a more detailed analysis would be required to determine whether a reasonable lawyer would perceive a substantial risk that "confidential factual information that would normally have been obtained in the prior representation" would materially advance the agency's position in the new representation.

22. The mere circumstance that the current representation may involve legal issues that were also involved in the Litigation does not make the matters substantially related. Interpretations of the ethical rules have long distinguished between conflicts involving the same matter and conflicts involving the same legal issue. Such "issue" (or "positional") conflicts tend to be more problematic in the case of concurrent representation than in the case of former representation. Even as to concurrent representation, a lawyer may ordinarily "take inconsistent legal positions in different tribunals at different times on behalf of different clients," although there can be circumstances in which an issue conflict arises because "there is a significant risk that a lawyer's action on behalf of one client will materially limit the lawyer's representation of another client in a different case.[71] As to former representation:

> When a lawyer has been directly involved in a specific transaction, subsequent representation of other clients with materially adverse interests in that transaction clearly is prohibited. On the other hand, a lawyer who recurrently handled a type of problem for a former client is not precluded from later representing another client in a factually distinct problem of that type, even though the subsequent representation involves a position adverse to the prior client.

Rule 1.9, Cmt. [2]. That is not to say that an issues conflict could never arise as to a former client, but the Comment makes clear that such conflicts are not typical, and they are even less likely to occur when (as here) the second representation does not involve litigation.

23. If the inquirer were asked to give advice to the agency in a matter substantially related to the Litigation, then the inquirer would need to consider whether the agency's interest in that matter is "materially adverse to the interests of the former client" under Rule 1.9(a). If so, then Rule 1.9 would preclude the inquirer's representation of the agency in that matter. Of course at the time of the Litigation, there was adversity between the plaintiffs and the agency. The inquiry does not provide the facts necessary to determine whether the interests of the agency and the former client are, currently, materially adverse in any matter in which the lawyer would be advising the agency.

71 Rule 1.7, Cmt. [24]; accord Restatement (Third) of the Law Governing Lawyers § 128, comment (f) (2000); see N.Y. State 826 (2008) (discussing consentability of positional conflicts).

Consent to Conflicts

24. A conflict under Rule 1.9(a) may be cured if "the former client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing," and those terms are defined. See Rule 1.0(j) (defining "Informed consent"); Rule 1.0(e) (defining "Confirmed in writing"). If representation of the agency in a particular matter presents a conflict under Rule 1.9 but not under Rule 1.11, then the former client's informed consent, confirmed in writing, would allow the lawyer to represent the agency in that matter. Situations in which there would be a conflict under Rule 1.9 but not under Rule 1.11 could arise if the interests of the agency in the new matter were materially adverse to those of the former client, but the government lawyer had not participated "personally and substantially" in the prior matter, or if the new matter were not the same as the prior one but only substantially related.

25. On the other hand, informed consent does not cure a conflict under Rule 1.11(d). Under that Rule, a lawyer currently serving as a public officer may not participate in a matter in which the lawyer participated personally and substantially while in private practice. The only exceptions arise when "law may otherwise expressly provide" or when, "under applicable law, no one is, or by lawful delegation may be, authorized to act in the lawyer's stead in the matter." Rule 1.11(d).

26. Here, the lawyer did participate personally and substantially in the Litigation, so the existence of a conflict under Rule 1.11(d) turns on whether the matter of the current representation is the same matter as the Litigation. If the matters are the same, then the lawyer would be disqualified, notwithstanding any consent of the former client, because neither of the exceptions in Rule 1.11(d) would apply. The lawyer is apparently not the only one authorized to act for the agency. Nor has the inquirer mentioned any law expressly providing that the lawyer may represent the agency notwithstanding the conflict.

CONCLUSION:

27. The lawyer may not advise the agency on compliance with the Litigation settlement agreement with respect to the parties in that Litigation. Otherwise, the lawyer may advise the agency on a matter involving the agency's programs unless (a) the matter is the same as the matter in the Litigation, or (b) the matter is substantially related to the matter in the Litigation and the agency's interest in that matter is materially adverse to the interests of the former client. Advice on programs that were not involved in the Litigation likely would not be in the same or a substantially related matter unless the parties and the underlying facts were the same as those in the Litigation. Before giving advice on a program that was involved in the Litigation, the lawyer would need to determine whether such advice is in the same matter, or, if in a substantially related matter, whether there is material adversity between the interests of the agency and the former client. Even if legal issues involved in the new matter may be the same as issues in the prior Litigation, that does not automatically make the matters substantially related.

OPINION 1030 (10/30/2014)

TOPIC: Trust Account; Letterhead

DIGEST: If a law firm with a new name partner is either the same firm (with a new name) or a legal successor to the business and property of the original firm, and the firm (i) makes all necessary corporate filings, and (ii) takes all steps with the bank that maintains its trust account necessary to reflect any changes taking place under the Business Corporation Law and the firm's constituent documents, then the firm may (1) continue to use its old letterhead while the remaining stock is being depleted and (2) continue to use the trust account and the checks used to draw upon it (although it would be desirable to indicate the change in firm name on the old checks).

RULES: Rules 1.15(b), 7.5(b), 8.4(c).

FACTS:

1. A lawyer (Z) recently joined a law firm known as W, X & Y, P.C. as a partner. The firm would like to change the firm's name to add attorney Z's name to the firm's name to create the law firm of W, X, Y & Z, P.C.

QUESTIONS:

2. A. Must the law firm discard all existing letterhead/stationery in the original name of the firm, or may it continue to use the old stationery, until it runs out?

B. May the law firm continue to use the original firm's checking account and checks until the checks run out, or must the firm open a new checking account in the new name?

OPINION:

3. The answer to the questions posed here depend on both applicable law and the applicable provisions of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"). The questions about applicable law – whether the firm has merely changed its name, or is considered a completely new law firm, and, if the firm is a new corporate entity, whether it has succeeded to all of the rights and liabilities of the original firm, including its business and bank accounts – are legal questions beyond our jurisdiction to answer, but, in the Committee's experience, it is common, when a professional corporation adds a name partner, to amend its certificate of incorporation to change its name. In this case, the firm is the same firm.[72]

Use of Old Letterhead

4. Rule 7.5 sets out the ethical rules with respect to professional notices, letterheads and signs. It provides generally that a lawyer or law firm may use letterheads, professional cards and similar professional notices, as long as they do not violate any statute or court rule and are not false, deceptive or misleading. In addition, Rule 7.5(b) provides, among other things, that "[a] lawyer in private practice shall not practice under . . . a name that is misleading as to the identity of the lawyer or lawyers practicing under such name." Rule 8.4(c) prohibits an attorney from engaging in "conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation."

72 New York Professional Corporations are formed under Article 15 of the Business Corporation Law. P.C.'s, like other corporations, are entitled to amend their certificates of incorporation to change their corporate names. See N.Y. Bus. Corp. L. § 801(b)(1).

5. It is common for law firms to add partners from time to time, and also common for law firm names not to include the name of all partners in the firm. Consequently, assuming that W, X, Y & Z is either the same firm or a legal successor to W, X & Y, and that all necessary public filings have been made, we do not believe use of the old letterhead would be misleading while the remaining stock is being depleted merely because it does not reflect the new name of the firm.[73]

Use of Original Bank Account

6. Rule 1.15(b)(1) provides in relevant part:

> A lawyer who is in possession of funds belong to another person incident to the lawyer's practice of law shall maintain such funds in a banking institution within New York State. . . . Such funds shall be maintained, in the lawyer's own name, or in the name of a firm of lawyers of which the lawyer is a member, or . . . is employed . . . .

The Rule does not apply to the firm's general (i.e. operating) account, that is, the account that contains only funds that belong to the lawyer or law firm, such as funds that will be used to pay salaries or rent. Rather, Rule 1.15(b)(1) applies only to the attorney trust or escrow account containing client funds. With respect to the firm's general account, Rule 8.4(c), quoted in ¶4, above, would be the applicable provision.

7. We believe that whether an attorney trust account in the original firm name is an account in the name of a firm of lawyers of which the lawyer is a member depends on the legal issue of whether the new firm is the same as, or a legal successor to, W, X & Y, so that the original trust account remains or becomes the trust account of the successor firm. If the trust or escrow account is or becomes the property of the successor firm, and the firm takes the steps necessary with the bank to reflect the changes taking place under the Business Corporation Law and the firm's constituent documents, then we believe that the firm may ethically continue to use the trust or escrow account and the checks used to draw on that account without violating Rule 1.15(b)(1), although it would be desirable to indicate the change in firm name on the old checks.

8. Similarly, if the firm with the new name partner is the same as or a successor to the original firm, and the firm takes the steps necessary with the bank to reflect the changes taking place under the Business Corporation Law and the firm's constituent documents, then the firm may ethically continue to use the general account and the checks associated with that account without violating Rule 8.4(c), while the old checks are being depleted, although it would be desirable to indicate the change in firm name on the old checks.

73 We might not reach the same conclusion with respect to a firm that has lost a name partner due to retirement or other departures, depending on the context.

CONCLUSION:

9. If a law firm with a new name partner is either the same firm (with a new name) or a legal successor to the business and property of the original firm, and if the firm (i) makes all necessary corporate filings, and (ii) takes all steps with the bank that maintains its trust or escrow account and its general account necessary to reflect any changes taking place under the Business Corporation Law and the firm's constituent documents, then the firm may (1) continue to use its old letterhead while the remaining stock is being depleted and (2) continue to use the trust account and general account and the checks used to draw on them (although it would be desirable to indicate the change in firm name on the old checks).

OPINION 1031 (10/30/2014)

TOPIC: Specialization; Use of term "specialist" in the title of a job held by a lawyer that a nonlawyer may lawfully perform

DIGEST: A lawyer may use the title "immigration specialist" in a job previously and lawfully held by nonlawyers where the lawyer does not publicly associate the title with his or her status as a lawyer. The lawyer may disclose the status as a lawyer to persons interacting with the lawyer as long as the lawyer does not do so "publicly." Disclosure of the lawyer's status as a lawyer and "specialist" title on a resume ordinarily would not be prohibited by Rule 7.4, but disclosure of this title on a LinkedIn site would be prohibited.

RULES: Rules 5.7(a) & (c), 7.4(a) & (c).

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a lawyer who has been hired as an "immigration specialist" in the Human Resources Department of an educational institution in New York. In that role, the inquirer will prepare filings on behalf of the institution and devise immigration visa strategies, but she will not make any appearance on behalf of the institution and her status as an attorney will not generally be visible to the public. The position was previously held by a nonlawyer. The inquirer's email signature would identify her as "Immigration Specialist, Human Resources Department," with no indication that she is a lawyer.

QUESTION:

2. May a lawyer use the title of "specialist" when working in a position in which the lawyer's status as a lawyer is not disclosed to the public?

3. If so, may the lawyer include the title in a resume and LinkedIn profile?

OPINION:

4. This inquiry arises at the intersection of two provisions of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"). First, Rule 7.4 prohibits a lawyer from "publicly" identifying himself or herself as a "specialist" in an area of law unless he or she has been certified by certain approved organizations. See N.Y. State 757 (2002).[74]

5. Second, Rule 5.7 addresses the provision of nonlegal services by lawyers and the circumstances in which the Rules apply to the rendition of such services. Among other things, Rule 5.7(a) provides that where a lawyer renders both legal and nonlegal services to a person in circumstances in which the services are not kept "distinct," the Rules apply to the provision of both legal and nonlegal services. The services at issue here appear potentially to encompass both nonlegal and legal services. "Nonlegal services" means "those services that lawyers may lawfully provide and that are not prohibited as an unauthorized practice of law when provided by a nonlawyer." Rule 5.7(c). We assume that the immigration-related services at issue here are such a nonlegal service – that is, that they could lawfully be provided by a nonlawyer.[75] We have observed, however, that there are services that may be legally undertaken by both lawyers and nonlawyers but "when such services are performed by a lawyer who holds himself out as a lawyer, they constitute the practice of law and the lawyer, in performing them, is governed by the Code." N.Y. State 557 (1984). Some of the services that the inquirer provides – such as the development of immigration visa strategies for her employer and preparation of immigration filings – are services that, if provided by a lawyer "who holds himself out as a lawyer," would be governed by the Rules. See N.Y. State 832 ¶ 6 (2009) ("despite the fact that a nonlawyer might be entitled to provide some advice about a shelf corporation without committing the unauthorized practice of law, when a lawyer provides such advice it becomes the provision of legal services").

74 Rule 7.4(a) states: "A lawyer or law firm may publicly identify one or more areas of law in which the lawyer or law firm practices, or may state that the practice of the lawyer or law firm is limited to one or more areas of law, provided that the lawyer or law firm shall not state that the lawyer or law firm is a specialist or specializes in a particular field, except as provided in Rule 7.4(c)." (Emphasis added.) Rule 7.4(c), the exception referred to, provides that a lawyer may state that the lawyer has been recognized or certified as a specialist only if certified by certain organizations and only if the statement is accompanied by certain disclosures.

6. As indicated in ¶5, in our opinions addressing the services that may be provided by both lawyers and nonlawyers, we looked to whether the lawyer was "holding himself out as a lawyer." N.Y. State 557; see also N.Y. State 636 (1992) (lawyer could conduct business of selling will forms where lawyer does not identify himself as a lawyer); N.Y. State 832 ¶ 10 (noting that identifying person selling shelf corporations as a lawyer creates risk of confusion that the lawyer has a lawyer-client relationship with buyers); N.Y. State 951 ¶ 12 (2012) (same as to lawyer offering letter-writing service where the letters address legal subjects). Obscuring the fact that the person providing the service in question is a lawyer is not always effective to avoid the application of the Rules. See N.Y. State 662 (1994) (lawyer assisting nonlawyer in representing homeowners challenging real estate taxes must disclose status to avoid misleading the tribunal and opposing party). Nevertheless, in this circumstance we see no reason why the bar on use of the term "specialist" would apply to a lawyer who does not hold him- or herself out as a lawyer.

7. In short, whether the prohibition on use of the term "specialist" in Rule 7.4(a) applies here depends, first, on whether the inquirer is holding herself out as a lawyer, and second, whether she "publicly" uses the term "specialist." Combining these two provisions, we conclude that the use of the term "specialist" for a lawyer rendering immigration services that can lawfully be provided by a nonlawyer does not offend Rule 7.4 if the lawyer does not publicly associate the services with his or her status as a lawyer.

8. This conclusion is supported by substantial policy. The prohibition on the term "specialist" is derived from concerns that the term implies a statement as to the quality of services being provided by lawyers that may be difficult for laymen to assess and therefore particularly likely to be misleading. See, e.g., Bates v. State Bar of Arizona, 433 U.S. 350, 383-84 (1977) ("misstatements that might be overlooked or deemed unimportant in other advertising may be found quite inappropriate in legal advertising"). It makes little sense to bar a term that might be used by nonlawyers providing the same services if the lay public does not know that the person providing the services is in fact a lawyer. Second, the inquirer has taken a job with a title assigned by her employer for reasons apparently unre-

75 Whether a particular service would be the unauthorized practice of law if rendered by a nonlawyer is a question of law that is beyond the jurisdiction of this Committee. See, e.g., N.Y. State 863 ¶¶ 4-5 (2011) (whether lawyer admitted in another state is engaging in the unauthorized practice of law if he practices exclusively immigration law is a question of law beyond the Committee's jurisdiction).

lated to her status as a lawyer. It would be unfair and counterproductive to bar her from taking the job, or to condition her ability to take the job on the extent of her ability to persuade her employer to change the title, because of her status as a lawyer.

9. This does not necessarily mean that the inquirer must hide her status from those within the institution with whom she interacts – the institution itself and the individual employees whose immigration status is at issue. Even if that might in some circumstances constitute "holding herself out as a lawyer," Rule 7.4 would not prohibit the use of the term "specialist," because disclosure to this relatively limited universe of persons would not constitute a "public" statement.

10. Turning to the second question, an accurate statement of the inquirer's title on her resume does not constitute a "public" statement for purposes of Rule 7.4, as long as the inquirer does not post or distribute the resume beyond specific potential employers. A notation on the inquirer's LinkedIn page, however, must be construed as "public." See N.Y. State 757 (letterhead and business cards are forms of public communications for purposes of DR 2-105 (now Rule 7.4)). If the LinkedIn page notes the inquirer's status as an attorney, it cannot also note a title including the word "specialist." We have considered whether a notation on the site that the job does not entail the rendering of legal services might be sufficient to avoid the prohibition. The difficulty is that, as noted above, it appears that the inquirer does in fact render services that are "legal services" if rendered by a lawyer, so that the disclaimer would not be accurate. Cf. N.Y. State 832 ¶ 11 (a disclaimer that no legal services are being rendered and the protections of the attorney-client relationship do not exist "would not be effective if the lawyer actually provided legal advice or other legal services to the customer of the nonlegal business").

CONCLUSION:

11. The inquirer may use the title "immigration specialist" as long as she does not publicly associate her status as an attorney with her title. Noting the title on her resume would not ordinarily be prohibited by Rule 7.4, but noting it on her LinkedIn page together with her status as a lawyer would be prohibited.

OPINION 1032 (10/30/2014)

TOPIC: Responding to a former client's critical commentary on a website

DIGEST: A lawyer may not disclose confidential client information solely to respond to a former client's criticism of the lawyer posted on a lawyer-rating website.

RULES: 1.6(a); 1.6(b); 1.9(c)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer, a New York law firm, believes that a "disgruntled" former client has unfairly characterized the firm's representation of the former client on a website that provides reviews of lawyers. A note posted by the former client said that the former client regretted the decision to retain the firm, and it asserted that the law firm provided inadequate services, communicated inadequately with the client, and did not achieve the client's goals. The note said nothing about the merits of the underlying matter, and it did not refer to any particular communications with the law firm or any other confidential information. The former client has not filed or threatened a civil or disciplinary complaint or made any other application for civil or criminal relief.

2. The law firm disagrees with its erstwhile client's depiction of its services and asserts that the firm achieved as good a result for the client as possible under the difficult circumstances presented. The firm wishes to respond to the former client's criticism by telling its side of the story if it may do so consistently with its continuing duties to preserve a former client's confidential information.

QUESTION:

3. When a lawyer's former client posts accusations about the lawyer's services on a website, may the lawyer post a response on the website that tends to rebut the accusations by including confidential information relating to that client?

OPINION:

4. The Internet and social media today provide a number of sites that ask visitors to state their views of and experiences with lawyers, presumably to provide other visitors with information on which to base their choice of counsel. Our survey of a few of these sites did not reveal any protocols to monitor the accuracy of the commentary, except to assure that the very lawyers being reviewed are not the source. In this respect, the sites differ from other lawyer-rating agencies – Chambers, Super Lawyers, Best Lawyers in America, Martindale-Hubbell and the like – which claim to base their ratings on a canvass of clients and other members of the bar.

5. The inquiry concerns a negative posting on such a site by a former client. The inquiring firm believes that certain information about its representation of that client would tend to rebut the posted allegations. The information in question constitutes "Confidential information" as defined by Rule 1.6(a) of the Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"). Under Rule 1.9(c), a lawyer is generally prohibited from using or revealing confidential information of a former client.

6. There is, however, a "self-defense" exception to the duty of confidentiality set forth in Rule 1.6, which as to former clients is incorporated by Rule 1.9(c). Rule 1.6(b)(5)(i) says that a lawyer "may reveal or use confidential information to the extent that the lawyer reasonably believes necessary . . . to defend the lawyer or the lawyer's employees and associates against an accusation of wrongful conduct." When applicable, this exception permits, but does not require, disclosure of confidential information, and only to the extent the lawyer reasonably believes necessary to serve the purpose of self-defense. See Rule 1.6, Cmts. [12] & [14].

7. The inquiry raises the question whether a lawyer may rely on this exception to disclose a former client's confidential information in response to a negative web posting, even though there is no actual or threatened proceeding against the lawyer. We do not believe that a lawyer may do so.

8. The language of the exception suggests that it does not apply to informal complaints such as this website posting. The key word is "accusation," which has been defined as "[a] formal charge against a person, to the effect that he is guilty of a punishable offense," Black's Law Dictionary 21 (5th ed. 1979), or a "charge of wrongdoing, delinquency, or fault," Webster's Third International Dictionary Unabridged 22 (2002). See Roy D. Simon, Simon's New York Rules of Professional Conduct Annotated 230 (2013 ed.) ("An accusation means something more than just casual venting.")

9. Comment [10] to Rule 1.6 supports this conclusion. It says that "[w]here a claim or charge alleges misconduct of the lawyer related to the representation of a current or former client, the lawyer may respond to the extent the lawyer reasonably believes necessary to establish a defense." In the context of a set of legal standards, the words "claim" and "charge" typically suggest the beginning of a lawsuit, criminal inquiry, disciplinary complaint, or other procedure that can result in a sanction. Comment [10] continues by saying: "Such a claim may arise in a civil, criminal, disciplinary or other proceeding and can be based on a wrong allegedly committed by the lawyer against the client or on a wrong alleged by a third person, such as a person claiming to have been defrauded by the lawyer and client acting together or by the lawyer acting alone." Each of these examples involves a formal proceeding in which the lawyer's conduct has been placed in issue.

10. Case law supports our conclusion. New York cases permitting disclosure of confidential information under Rule 1.6(b)(5)(i) and its nearly identical predecessor DR 4-101(C)(4) have invariably involved allegations of lawyer wrongdoing in formal proceedings such as legal malpractice or other civil actions, disqualification proceedings, or sanctions motions.[76] Those cases stand in contrast to those in which lawyers have not been permitted to use a client's confidential information to initiate actions against former clients (other than lawsuits to collect legal fees, for which Rule 1.6(b)(5)(ii) provides a different exception to confidentiality).[77] Thus under the case law, a lawyer is not authorized to reveal confidential information whenever helpful in a dispute, but rather only when facing some kind of formal proceeding.[78]

11. In at least one case, discipline has been imposed for the kind of conduct in question here. In re Tsamis, Joint Stipulation and Recommendation ¶¶ 4-10 & Reprimand ¶ 1, No. 2013PR00095 (Hearing Board, Ill. Att'y Reg. & Disc. Comm. 2014) (reprimanding lawyer for revealing confidential information about her former client in response to client's negative review on AVVO legal referral website). Ethics opinions from other jurisdictions have reached varying results on the question facing us, but their relevance is limited by differences in the ethical rules in force in those jurisdictions.[79]

12. We note a New York opinion that addressed the predecessor to Rule 1.6(b)(5)(i), though in a different context. In N.Y. County 732 (2004), a client threatened to file a disciplinary complaint against a lawyer if the lawyer did not release funds in an IOLA account, the proper disposition of which was a part of the lawyer's inquiry to the Committee. The Committee opined that in the event of such a complaint, "the law firm would be entitled to disclose confidences or secrets necessary to defend itself against the client's accusations." The Committee concluded that the "rules permitting disclosure of client confidences should be read restrictively" but that the law firm may disclose protected client information "if the client files a complaint or claim against the law firm."

13. We do not mean to say that a formal proceeding must be actually commenced to trigger the authorization of disclosure by Rule 1.6(b)(5)(i). There may be circumstances in which the material threat of a proceeding would give rise to that right. See N.Y. City 1986-7 (in-house lawyer may disclose confidential information to government prosecutors who have identified the lawyer as the subject of a grand jury investigation in which other witnesses have made incriminating statements about the lawyer). We do not need to reach that question here because no material threat of a proceeding has been made on the website posting that is the subject of this inquiry.

14. Nor do we consider the question of whether and when a negative website posting may effect a waiver of a client's right to confidentiality, because that question is not raised by the facts as presented in the inquiry. If there were facts raising the question of waiver, it would be necessary to consider separately the possible waivers of attorney-client privilege and of other kinds of confidentiality under 78 See N.Y. City 2005-03 (noting recognition by courts that "an attorney may use client confidences or secrets to defend himself or herself from a claim or counterclaim brought by the client, or as evidence in a fee collection dispute, but may not necessarily be permitted to use that same information affirmatively in a different type of claim against a client"); Restatement (Third) of the Law Governing Lawyers § 64, comment (c) (2000) (noting that a lawyer may act under the Restatement's self-defense provision "only to defend against charges that imminently threaten the lawyer or the lawyer's associate or agent with serious consequences, including criminal charges, claims of legal malpractice, and other civil actions such as suits to recover overpayment of fees, complaints in disciplinary proceedings, and the threat of disqualification").

79 In California there is no ethical counterpart to New York Rule 1.6(b)(5)(i), but the Evidence Code contains a self-defense exception to attorney-client privilege. Opinions interpreting that exception have concluded that California law does not permit a lawyer "to disclose otherwise confidential information in an online attorney review forum, absent client consent or a waiver." San Francisco Opinion 2014-1; see Los Angeles County Opinion 525 (2012) (attorney may respond to former client's internet posting if (1) "response does not disclose confidential information"; (2) response will not injure former client in matter involving the former representation; and (3) response is proportionate and restrained). An Arizona opinion concluded that the right to disclose was not limited to "a pending or imminent legal proceeding," relying on a provision found in the Arizona rule (and in the ABA Model Rule) but not in the New York rule. Arizona Opinion 93-02 (reasoning that one category of cases within the exception, for a claim or defense "in a controversy" between the lawyer and the client, would include cases not covered by another category within the exception, for "allegations in any proceedings").

Rule 1.6(a). Waiver of attorney-client privilege turns on questions of law beyond our jurisdiction. See, e.g., 1050 Tenants Corp. v. Lapidus, 12 Misc. 3d 1118, 1123-25 (Civ. Ct. N.Y.C. 2006). Given the facts as presented, we need not consider whether a negative website posting might waive other kinds of confidentiality. Rather, we assume for present purposes that confidentiality has not been waived. It suffices to say that the mere fact that a former client has posted critical commentary on a website is insufficient to permit a lawyer to respond to the commentary with disclosure of the former client's confidential information.

15. This result properly respects the vital purpose of Rule 1.6(a) in preserving client confidentiality and fostering candor in the private communications between lawyers and clients, and it does not unduly restrict the self-defense exception. That exception reflects the fundamental unfairness of a current or former client – or others – being able to make consequential accusations of wrongful conduct against a lawyer, while the lawyer is disabled from revealing information to the extent reasonably necessary to defend against such accusations. Unflattering but less formal comments on the skills of lawyers, whether in hallway chatter, a newspaper account, or a website, are an inevitable incident of the practice of a public profession, and may even contribute to the body of knowledge available about lawyers for prospective clients seeking legal advice. We do not believe that Rule 1.6(b)(5)(i) should be interpreted in a manner that could chill such discussion.

CONCLUSION:

16. A lawyer may not disclose client confidential information solely to respond to a former client's criticism of the lawyer posted on a website that includes client reviews of lawyers.

OPINION 1033 (11/07/2014)

TOPIC: Conduct involving misrepresentation

DIGEST: Where a prospective buyer makes an offer for real property and is asked both to pay the cost of a "short sale negotiator" and to reduce the offer price by the same amount, the lawyer for the buyer may not participate in the transaction unless the bank is informed that the offer price was reduced by the cost of the short sale negotiator. Disclosure on the HUD-1 form that the seller is paying the fee of the short sale negotiator is insufficient, by itself, to put the bank on notice that the offer price was originally higher.

RULES: 8.4(c)

FACTS:

1. A lawyer represents a client (a prospective buyer) who made an offer to purchase residential real property for $310,000. The sale price will be subject to approval by the bank that holds the seller's mortgage, since the sale price is less than the outstanding amount of the mortgage (i.e., it is a "short sale"). However, the seller's real estate agent refuses to submit the offer to the bank for approval unless the buyer signs an agreement with a third party "short sale negotiator" for a fee of $10,000 (payable upon completion of a successful short sale) and submits a reduced purchase offer for $300,000. (The purpose of a short sale negotiator is to assist the seller in completing the paperwork necessary to support the bank's decision to accept less than the outstanding amount of the mortgage in satisfaction of all amounts owed to the bank. We assume for purposes of this opinion that this is a legitimate purpose and that the short sale negotiator will perform a valuable service.) The inquirer perceives an ethical issue because where a short sale is involved, the bank customarily requires that the offer submitted for its approval be the "highest and best" offer received by the seller. The Form HUD-1 would disclose that the $10,000 fee of the short sale negotiator is being paid by the buyer, but apparently would not disclose that the buyer's original offer of $310,000 has been reduced to $300,000 to cover this cost.

QUESTION:

2. May the buyer's lawyer proceed with a real estate transaction in which the buyer pays the cost of a short sale negotiator, and reduces the original offer price by the same amount, without disclosing that the original offer price was reduced to cover the cost of the seller's short sale negotiator?

OPINION:

3. Rule 8.4(c) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules) states that a lawyer shall not "engage in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation." Although the Rules do not define dishonesty or misrepresentation, this committee has previously identified circumstances that would constitute misrepresentation. See, e.g., N.Y. State 882 (2011), N.Y. State 817 (2007) (both involving a gross-up of the purchase price of real property before application of a so-called seller's concession). In N.Y. State 882 we stated:

> In essence, we concluded in N.Y. State 817 that it is a misrepresentation under DR 1-102(A)(4) (the predecessor to Rule 8.4(c)) for the transaction documents in a residential real estate transaction either to contain an untrue statement of a material fact or to omit a material fact where the untrue statement or the material omission makes the statements contained in the transaction document materially misleading. . . . A statement may be literally true with respect to the facts stated, but may fail to include other facts necessary to prevent a false implication, and a "failure to disclose is generally considered as much a misrepresentation as a false affirmative statement." U.S. Express, Inc. v. Intercargo Ins. Co., 841 F. Supp. 1328, 1337 (E.D.N.Y. 1994). An assertion need not be fraudulent to be a misrepresentation. Disclosing a seller's concession without disclosing a matching gross-up in the sales price produces a half-truth, which is a form of misrepresentation within the meaning of Rule 8.4(c).

4. In this case, disclosing that the buyer has offered $300,000 for the property and is paying $10,000 to a short sale negotiator, without also disclosing that the buyer's original offer was $310,000, would be misleading. This would be particularly so if, under the bank's short-sale program, the bank typically authorizes real estate commissions and other expenses to be paid out of the sale proceeds but does not treat third party short sale negotiator fees as an authorized expense payable from the sale proceeds.

5. Accordingly, a lawyer may not proceed with the real estate transaction proposed here unless the short sale bank is given notice that the original offer was for $310,000 and that it was reduced by an amount equal to the fee of a short sale negotiator. Failure to make that disclosure would constitute conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation, in violation of Rule 8.4(c). Disclosure on the HUD-1 form that the seller is paying the fee of the short sale negotiator is insufficient, by itself, to put the bank on notice that there was a higher offer.

CONCLUSION:

6. Where a prospective buyer makes an offer for real property and is asked both to pay the cost of a "short sale negotiator" and to reduce the offer price by an amount equal to that cost, the lawyer for the buyer may not participate in the transaction unless the bank is informed that the offer price was reduced by the cost of the short sale negotiator. Disclosure on the HUD-1 form that the seller is paying the fee of the short sale negotiator is insufficient, by itself, to put the bank on notice that the offer price was originally higher.

OPINION 1034 (11/10/2014)

Distinguishes N.Y. State 496 (1978), 512 (1979), 649 (1993)

TOPIC: Executor as lawyer's client; confidential information – disclosure of suspicion of misconduct by executor; withdrawal from representation of executor

DIGEST: Lawyer who represents executor has no ethical duty to beneficiary of estate, absent agreement to contrary. Lawyer must avoid assisting the client in conduct the lawyer knows to be illegal or fraudulent and must not knowingly make a false statement to a third person. A lawyer representing a client before a tribunal and who knows that the client intends to engage, is engaging or has engaged in criminal or fraudulent conduct related to the proceeding must take reasonable remedial measures, including, if necessary, disclosure to the tribunal. It is not clear that the inquirer has sufficient knowledge of misconduct by the client in this case. A suspicion of misconduct is not enough. But a reasonable belief that the client is engaging or has engaged in criminal or fraudulent conduct constitutes grounds for withdrawal from representation. If withdrawing when Rule 3.3(b) does not apply, the lawyer must preserve the confidences of the client unless an exception to confidentiality in Rule 1.6(b) applies. In any event, before making any permitted or required disclosures, the lawyer should remonstrate with the client.

RULES: Rules 1.2(d); 1.6(a); 1.16(b)(1); 1.16(c)(2), (4) and (7); 1.16(e); 3.3(b); 3.4(a); 4.1

FACTS:

1. A lawyer has been serving as attorney of record for a client who is one of a decedent's two surviving children. The client is (i) the executor of the decedent's estate, (ii) a beneficiary of half the residuum of that estate, and (iii) trustee of a supplemental needs trust created for the benefit of his sibling, who is disabled.[80] The trust will be funded with the other half of the residuum. To close this estate informally, the client must obtain a release from the sibling and then fund the trust. The lawyer is aware that an account of the client's proceedings as executor must be prepared and furnished to the sibling to obtain a legally effective release. The account will contain a statement by the client that, inter alia, all assets of the estate have been properly accounted for and that the client does not know of any assets that are not included in the account.

2. The lawyer has come to believe that the client could not truthfully make the representations that would be required to obtain a legally effective release. This belief is based on the facts that the client has not provided the lawyer with back-up for distributions from the estate accounts, that initial distributions may have been unequal (although that situation seems to have been corrected), that the client has mentioned selling an estate asset to a third party for 10% of what the client believed was its value, and that the client has repeatedly failed to cooperate with the lawyer throughout the course of the estate's administration. Because there will be no judicial settlement of the executor's account, the lawyer is concerned that the sibling will not be protected against any possible mismanagement of the estate.

80 The inquiry does not state the nature of the disability. We assume it is a medical disability, and not one that would qualify the sibling as a person under a disability under Section 103(40) of the SCPA, including an infant, an incompetent, or an incapacitated person, in which case special procedures would have been required.

QUESTION:

2. Is the lawyer obligated to protect the trust beneficiary? May the lawyer withdraw from the representation? If so, what information may or must the lawyer disclose?

OPINION:

Must the Lawyer Protect the Trust Beneficiary?

3. This Committee has issued a series of opinions addressing a lawyer's obligations when representing a fiduciary. For example, in N.Y. State 496 (1978), we decided that the attorney for the guardian of an infant should reveal the guardian's failure to comply with a court order relating to the infant's property. Consistent with the then prevailing case law, our analysis began by saying:

> The lawyer, although nominally characterized as attorney for the guardian, in fact and legal theory represents the guardian only as and to the extent that the [guardian] acts in a fiduciary capacity for the infant's benefit. The lawyer owes his allegiance to the infant whom he represents through the guardian. Hence the lawyer is ethically bound to treat the infant as his client and to act in a manner consistent with the best interests of the infant when those interests appear to conflict with the actions of the guardian.

Similarly, in N.Y. State 649 (1993) we discussed authorities both in this state and elsewhere, concluding that a lawyer for a fiduciary has a duty not only to the fiduciary client but also to serve the best interests of an estate to which the fiduciary owes fiduciary duties. See also N.Y. State 512 (1979) (a lawyer retained by the executors of an estate has a duty also to serve the best interests of the estate to which they owe their fiduciary responsibilities).

4. At the time we issued N.Y. State 496, the courts had recognized a kind of derivative (or constructive) representation of beneficiaries where the lawyer represented a fiduciary charged with the administration of an estate or trust in which such beneficiaries were interested. The courts continued to develop the concept of derivative representation in the years following the issuance of N.Y. State 496 and eventually created a so-called "fiduciary exception" to the attorney-client privilege. See, e.g., Jeffrey N. Pennell, Representations Involving Fiduciary Entities: Who Is the Client?, 62 Fordham L. Rev. 1319 (1994). Under the fiduciary exception, courts would not protect confidential communications between a lawyer and a fiduciary against discovery by an allegedly aggrieved beneficiary.

5. The New York Legislature, however, disagreed with these exceptions to the attorney-client privilege. In 2002, the Legislature amended § 4503(a) of the Civil Practice Law and Rules (the "CPLR"), which governs the attorney-client privilege in New York. The amendment added a new § 4503(a)(2), which states in relevant part:

> For purposes of the attorney-client privilege, if the client is a personal representative and the attorney represents the personal representative in that capacity, in the absence of an agreement between the attorney and the personal representative to the contrary:
> (i) No beneficiary of the estate is, or shall be treated as, the client of the attorney solely by reason of his or her status as beneficiary; and

> (ii) The existence of a fiduciary relationship between the personal representative and a beneficiary of the estate does not by itself constitute or give rise to any waiver of the privilege for confidential communications made in the course of professional employment between the attorney or his or her employee and the personal representative who is the client.

6. The question of who is the client is largely a matter of law. See N.Y. Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"), Scope ¶[9] ("for purposes of determining the lawyer's authority and responsibility, principles of substantive law external to these Rules determine whether a client-lawyer relationship exists.") The question here is whether the sibling is a client so that the lawyer may disclose otherwise confidential information, and the 2002 amendment to the CPLR calls into question the conclusion of N.Y. State 496 that the attorney for the fiduciary represents not only the fiduciary but also the beneficiary. Under CPLR § 4503(a)(2), for purposes of the attorney-client privilege, absent an agreement to the contrary between the attorney and the personal representative, no beneficiary of an estate may be treated as the client, and the existence of the fiduciary relationship does not by itself constitute a waiver of the privilege.

7. Whether any other New York law (e.g., the law governing fiduciaries) would require the attorney for an estate fiduciary to treat the estate beneficiaries as clients is a legal question beyond our jurisdiction.

8. Absent other law or agreements to the contrary, we conclude that the Rules and the CPLR require that the lawyer consider the executor as the only client. We also conclude that the executor's sibling would have no right to the disclosure of information protected by the attorney-client privilege solely by virtue of the sibling's status as a beneficiary. Moreover, because the executor is the lawyer's only client, the executor would also be ethically entitled to the lawyer's undivided loyalty, including strict confidentiality pursuant to Rule 1.6(a).

Misconduct by the Client-Fiduciary

9. Even if the fiduciary is the lawyer's only client, the lawyer is still bound by the requirements of Rules 1.2(d), 3.3(b), 3.4(a), and 4.1.

10. Rule 1.2(d) states in relevant part:

> A lawyer shall not counsel a client to engage, or assist a client, in conduct that the lawyer knows is illegal or fraudulent. . . .

11. Rule 3.4 states in relevant part:

> A lawyer shall not:
> > (a) (1) suppress any evidence that the lawyer or the client has a legal obligation to reveal or produce;
> * * *

> (3) conceal or knowingly fail to disclose that which the lawyer is required by law to reveal;
> * * *
> (6) knowingly engage in other illegal conduct or conduct contrary to these Rules [.]

12. Rule 4.1 states:

> In the course of representing a client, a lawyer shall not knowingly make a false statement of fact or law to a third person.

13. As we pointed out in N.Y. State 831 (2009), the definition of "fraud" or "fraudulent" in the Rules is broader than the term "fraud" in the law outside of the Rules. The definition in Rule 1.0(i) is as follows:

> "Fraud" or "fraudulent" denotes conduct that is fraudulent under the substantive or procedural law of the applicable jurisdiction or has a purpose to deceive, provided that it does not include conduct that, although characterized as fraudulent by statute or administrative rule, lacks an element of scienter, deceit, intent to mislead, or knowing failure to correct misrepresentations that can be reasonably expected to induce detrimental reliance by another. (emphasis added)

14. Taken together, Rules 1.2(d), 3.4(a) and 4.1 prohibit the lawyer from participating in the preparation or submission of an account to the sibling that the lawyer knows to be false or misleading. The question raised by the inquiry is whether or not the information the lawyer has satisfies the requisite knowledge component of the Rules. Rule 1.0(k) defines "knows" as denoting actual knowledge of the fact in question. Although a person's knowledge may be inferred from circumstances, it is clear that a mere suspicion would not be enough to constitute knowledge. Cf., N.Y. State 837 (2010) (A lawyer's reasonable belief that evidence is false does not preclude its presentation to the trier of fact. A lawyer's actual knowledge that evidence is false, however, can be inferred from the circumstances.)

15. In N.Y. State 837, the client had informed the lawyer that a document that had been introduced into evidence was forged. Consequently, the lawyer came to "know" that it was false evidence. In this case, the fact that the client has not provided the lawyer with back-up for distributions from the estate accounts, that initial distributions may have been unequal (although that situation seems to have been corrected) and that the client has repeatedly failed to cooperate with the lawyer may all constitute grounds for suspicion, but they do not result in the lawyer having knowledge of wrongdoing by the client. The fact that the client has mentioned selling an estate asset to a third party for a price that was 10% of what the client believed was its value may or may not constitute knowledge that the accounting is false, depending upon what facts the client disclosed about determining the value of the asset, and the circumstances in which the sale price was determined.

16. We have also considered whether the lawyer has ethical obligations under Rule 3.3(b). Rule 3.3(b) states:

> A lawyer who represents a client before a tribunal and who knows that a person intends to engage, is engaging or has engaged in criminal or fraudulent conduct related to the proceeding shall take reasonable remedial measures, including, if necessary, disclosure to the tribunal.

Thus, Rule 3.3(b) requires a lawyer who represents a client before a tribunal and who knows that the client or another person intends to engage, is engaging or has engaged in criminal or fraudulent conduct related to the proceeding to take reasonable remedial measures, including, if necessary, disclosure to the tribunal. In this respect, it differs from the other Rule provisions cited above, which are subject to the restrictions against disclosure of client confidential information, unless one of the exceptions to confidentiality in Rule 1.6(b) is applicable.

17. Comment [12] to Rule 3.3 explains the reason for Rule 3.3(b): "Lawyers have a special obligation as officers of the court to protect a tribunal against criminal or fraudulent conduct that undermines the integrity of the adjudicative process." Whether the lawyer has duties under Rule 3.3(b) depends on two issues – (1) whether the lawyer "knows" that the client has engaged or is engaging in criminal or fraudulent conduct relating to the proceeding, and (2) whether the probate matter constitutes representation "before a tribunal."

18. Regarding whether the lawyer has the requisite knowledge under Rule 3.3(b), the answer is the same as that discussed above with respect to other rules requiring knowledge.

19. The question of whether the matter is "before a tribunal" within the meaning of Rule 3.3(b) is a mixed one of ethics and law. Our understanding is that the probate matter at issue here was filed with the Surrogate's Court, which granted letters testamentary to the executor. Although the accounting is informal – meaning that no approval of the Surrogate's Court will be necessary as long as the beneficiaries sign a form of "receipt and release" provided by the Surrogate's Court – our understanding is that the affidavits filed by the fiduciary and the form of receipt and release all have captions indicating that the matter is before the Surrogate's Court. Moreover, consistent with SCPA § 207.1(d), attorneys of record are required to file a motion under CPLR § 321(b)(2) to withdraw unless a substitution can be arranged on consent of the client. These factors suggest that the matter is before the Surrogate's Court. The definition of "tribunal" in Rule 1.0(w) includes a court. Although we believe the inquirer must make his own determination on this question, it appears to us that the matter is before a tribunal within the meaning of Rule 3.3(b) and that the preparation of an inaccurate accounting is clearly "related to the proceeding" within the meaning of Rule 3.3(b).

20. Rule 3.3(b) would require the lawyer, if he knows that the client intends to engage, is engaging or has engaged in criminal or fraudulent conduct related to the proceeding, to take reasonable remedial measures, including, if necessary, disclosure to the tribunal, if remonstration with the client did not result in the client's submission of an accurate accounting. Because it is not clear that the inquirer has such knowledge, we will not discuss here the considerations of what remedial measures are reasonable. But see N.Y. State 837 (2010).

Withdrawal from Representation

21. Even if the lawyer does not have "knowledge" of impropriety on the client's part, his suspicions and the client's apparent lack of cooperation may be sufficient to warrant withdrawal from the representation. Rule 1.2(d) prohibits a lawyer from assisting a client in conduct that the lawyer knows to be illegal or fraudulent. Indeed, Rule 1.16(b)(1) will require a lawyer to withdraw from a representation if he knows that the representation will result in a violation of the Rules or of law. And paragraphs (c)(2), (c)(4) and (c)(7) of Rule 1.16 permit a lawyer to withdraw from a representation under standards that are lower than "knowledge" of illegal or fraudulent conduct, where (1) the client persists in a course of action involving the lawyer's services that the lawyer reasonably believes is criminal or fraudulent, (2) the client insists upon taking action with which the lawyer has a fundamental disagreement, or (3) the client fails to cooperate in the representation or otherwise makes the representation unreasonably difficult for the lawyer to carry out effectively. Furthermore, Rule 1.16(c)(1) always permits withdrawal for any reason if it can be accomplished without material adverse effect on the interests of the client.

Disclosure to the Court

22. Although we cannot resolve issues of substantive or procedural law, as noted above, in Surrogate's Court under SCPA § 207.1(d), attorneys of record are required to file a CPLR § 321(b)(2) motion to withdraw unless a substitution can be arranged on consent of the client. If a motion to withdraw will be required, then Rule 1.16(d) will apply and the lawyer will need the court's permission to withdraw.

23. In seeking permission to withdraw, the disclosures the lawyer may or must make about the client's conduct depend upon whether the lawyer knows that the client has engaged or is engaging in criminal or fraudulent conduct. If the lawyer does not have such knowledge, the lawyer should regard any information or suspicions about the client fiduciary's conduct as protected by Rule 1.6(a), which provides in relevant part:

> A lawyer shall not knowingly reveal confidential information, as defined by this Rule . . . . "Confidential information" consists of information gained during or relating to the representation of a client, whatever its source, that is (a) protected by the attorney-client privilege, (b) likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed, or (c) information that the client has requested be kept confidential.

24. Rule 1.6(a) generally prohibits a lawyer from revealing confidential information unless the client gives informed consent or the disclosure is permitted by Rule 1.6(b) or required by Rule 3.3. Rule 1.6(b) would allow the lawyer to reveal confidential information to the extent he reasonably believes necessary (1) to prevent the client from committing a crime (but not to prevent a non-criminal fraud or to rectify a past crime or fraud), (2) to the extent implicit in withdrawing a written or oral representation the lawyer has previously made and that he reasonably believes is still relied upon by a third person, where he has discovered that the representation was based on materially inaccurate information or is being used to further a crime or fraud, or (3) to comply with other law or court order. See generally Rule 1.6, Cmts. [6], [6A], [6C], [6D], [12], [13], [14], [15A].

25. In particular, in determining whether to exercise the discretion to reveal information under Rule 1.6(b), the lawyer should consider the guidance set forth in Comment [6A] to Rule 1.6.[81] In addition, if the lawyer believes, after balancing the factors set forth in Comment [6A], that disclosure is warranted, the lawyer should first remonstrate with the client about the desirability of filing a proper accounting.

26. Even if the lawyer obtains permission to withdraw, he must still abide by the requirements of Rule 1.16(e), which states:

> Even when withdrawal is otherwise permitted or required, upon termination of representation, a lawyer shall take steps, to the extent reasonably practicable, to avoid foreseeable prejudice to the rights of the client, including giving reasonable notice to the client, allowing time for employment of other counsel, delivering to the client all papers and property to which the client is entitled, promptly refunding any part of a fee paid in advance that has not been earned and complying with applicable laws and rules.

CONCLUSION:

27. In sum, the lawyer has no ethical duty to the non-client beneficiary. His only client is the executor and his ethical duty is to avoid assisting the client in conduct that he knows to be illegal or fraudulent. The lawyer may not assist the client in conduct the lawyer knows is fraudulent or knowingly make a false statement to a third person. And a lawyer who represents a client before a tribunal and who knows that the client intends to engage, is engaging or has engaged in criminal or fraudulent conduct related to the proceeding must take reasonable remedial measures, including, if necessary, disclosure to the tribunal. It is not clear that the inquirer has sufficient knowledge of misconduct by the client in this case. A suspicion of misconduct is not enough. But a reasonable belief that the client is engaging or has engaged in criminal or fraudulent conduct constitutes grounds for withdrawal from representation. If withdrawing when Rule 3.3(b) does not apply, the lawyer must preserve the confidences of the client unless an exception to confidentiality in Rule 1.6(b) applies. In any event, before making any permitted or required disclosures, the lawyer should remonstrate with the client.

(29-14)

81 This comment provides: "The lawyer's exercise of discretion conferred by paragraphs (b)(1) through (b)(3) requires consideration of a wide range of factors and should therefore be given great weight. In exercising such discretion under these paragraphs, the lawyer should consider such factors as: (i) the seriousness of the potential injury to others if the prospective harm or crime occurs, (ii) the likelihood that it will occur and its imminence, (iii) the apparent absence of any other feasible way to prevent the potential injury, (iv) the extent to which the client may be using the lawyer's services in bringing about the harm or crime, (v) the circumstances under which the lawyer acquired the information of the client's intent or prospective course of action, and (vi) any other aggravating or extenuating circumstances. In any case, disclosure adverse to the client's interest should be no greater than the lawyer reasonably believes necessary to prevent the threatened harm or crime."

OPINION 1035 (11/14/2014)

TOPIC: Taking over practice of retiring attorney; obligations as to original wills

DIGEST: A lawyer receiving an original will must take reasonable steps to locate and notify the testator or others with an interest in the will. The lawyer may review or disclose confidential information from the will as necessary for its appropriate disposition, and may file the original will with the local surrogate's court.

RULES: 1.15(c), 1.6

FACTS:

1. The inquiring lawyer has recently taken over the law practice of a retiring solo practitioner through a sale of the practice. An agreement between the retiring lawyer and the inquirer provided, inter alia, that the inquirer assumed the obligation to notify the clients whose wills had been drafted by the retiring lawyer.

2. The inquirer received from the retiring lawyer original wills of his clients dating back to 1970. Some of these wills were inherited when the retiring attorney took over the practices of other lawyers. At the time the practice was sold, none of the testators were clients of the inquirer, and we assume that none have become clients of the inquirer since then.

3. The inquirer has no original files related to any of the wills dated between 1970 and 2000, nor does she know whether clients of practices taken over by the retiring lawyer were notified that he had taken over those practices. Many of the wills contain phrases such as "I [name of testator], residing in the City of [named], State of New York," and "to my [unnamed] children, if they survive me," and do not include any more detailed address or beneficiary information.

4. The inquirer has painstakingly researched the whereabouts of the testators through Internet searches, obituaries, estate proceedings and real property records. To the testators whose whereabouts could be confirmed, the attorney sent letters with a request that the testators contact her regarding the original wills.

5. The inquirer also has confirmed that some of the testators are deceased. Some of those had moved out of state before they died. The inquirer has been unable to confirm whether other testators are still alive or whether they have moved out of state.

6. The inquirer also discovered that in some cases, estate proceedings were commenced in New York and in other jurisdictions, and those estate proceedings are now closed. In some of those cases, the testators had newer wills that were probated. In others, administrative proceedings were commenced because no wills were found.

QUESTIONS:

7. What is the lawyer's obligation with respect to original wills when (a) the lawyer cannot determine the testator's whereabouts; (b) administrative proceedings were filed because the petitioner did not know of the will, and that estate matter is closed; (c) probate proceedings were filed based upon a more recent will of the deceased, and that estate matter is closed; or (d) the testator has died and no estate proceedings have been filed?

8. May the lawyer file the original wills with the local surrogate's court if she cannot determine the testator's whereabouts?

OPINION:

9. The principal ethical obligations applicable to the inquiry are set forth in Rule 1.15(c) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"). Rule 1.15(c)(1) provides that a lawyer shall "promptly notify a client or third person of the receipt of funds, securities, or other properties in which the client or third person has an interest." The Rule further requires the lawyer to preserve such property, keep complete records and render appropriate accounts, and promptly pay or deliver the property as requested by a client or third person entitled to receive it. Rule 1.15(c)(2)-(4).

10. "The requirements of Rule 1.15(c) expressly apply to a lawyer who receives property in which a third person, who is not the client of the lawyer, has an interest." N.Y. State 1002 ¶3 (2014); cf. N.Y. City 1999-05 (interpreting prior Code of Professional Responsibility to require that lawyer in possession of original will, including successor to lawyer who drafted the will, must keep original will of a missing testator secure, comply with any legal obligations regarding that will, or, if appropriate, follow legal procedures to deposit the will with the court"). However, Rule 1.15(c) applies only to property obtained incident to the lawyer's practice of law. N.Y. State 1002 ¶3 (2014).

11. The obligation to protect confidential information is also relevant. We have previously discussed confidentiality obligations of lawyers with respect to original wills. In N.Y. State 341 (1974) we opined that an attorney who retires from practice may transfer clients' executed wills to another attorney, but that "the receiving attorney holds them only as a custodian" rather than in an attorney-client relationship, and that it would "generally" be unethical for the receiving attorney to examine the wills without consent from the transferring lawyer's clients.

12. More recently, we opined that a lawyer who received wills not from a client or during the representation of a client, but rather as his father's executor, was not prohibited by Rule 1.6 from "accessing or disclosing the confidential information in the wills insofar as reasonably necessary to dispose of the wills." N.Y. State 1002 ¶¶ 8-9 (2014). Although the lawyer did not represent those testators, and did not even come into possession of the wills incident to his practice, we followed N.Y. State 341 in recognizing certain imperatives of confidentiality. In particular, we emphasized that "the lawyer should proceed carefully in order to only review or disclose information to the extent necessary for proper will disposal." N.Y. State 1002 ¶10.

13. We next apply these principles to this inquiry. The importance of respecting confidentiality, and also the authority to access and disclose confidential information as necessary to dispose properly of the will, apply to the inquirer – who holds the wills as custodian incident to her law practice – just as they applied to the lawyer in N.Y. State 1002 who came into possession of wills other than incident to his practice. Thus, even though there may well be confidential information in the wills, the inquirer may access or disclose that information as reasonably necessary to provide for appropriate disposition of the wills and ultimately of the property subject to those wills. For that purpose, she may notify testators, executors, or beneficiaries of the wills.

14. The inquirer has not only the ability to take steps toward the proper disposition of the wills (even if it requires reviewing or disclosing confidential information), but also a responsibility to take at least one such step. Rule 1.15(c) applies here because the wills in question constitute property in which third parties have an interest, and the inquirer obtained them incident to her practice of law. Thus she would generally have an obligation to notify the testators of her receipt of their wills, even apart from having agreed with the retiring lawyer to do so.[82]

15. We note two common-sense exceptions to that general obligation. First, if the agreement for transfer of the practice had been different, and the retiring lawyer had been the one to notify his clients of the will transfers, then the notice requirement would have been satisfied. The inquirer need not give an additional notice contemporaneous with and duplicative to a notice given by the retiring lawyer. Cf. N.Y. State 341 (1974) (opining that when a lawyer who drafts and holds an original will later retires and transfers the will to the lawyer's partners, the firm is not required to give the client notice that the lawyer has retired, and that the will is now in the firm's possession, if the lawyer was already part of the firm at the time of the representation, or if the lawyer later joined the firm and the client had become aware of the lawyer's membership in the firm).

16. Second, when Rule 1.15(c)(1) requires an attorney to give notice to a third person whose location is unknown, the attorney should take reasonable steps to locate and notify that person. But the rule does not impose the impossible requirement of notifying someone who cannot be found. Cf. Massachusetts Opinion 76-7 (stating that lawyer who succeeds to another's practice, including files with wills that the prior lawyer's clients requested be held for safekeeping, "is obligated to make a reasonable effort" to locate the testators). Here the inquirer has made appropriate and extensive efforts to locate the testators and notify them of the existence and location of the wills. Based on the facts as presented, it appears that she has exercised due diligence and has satisfied the requirements of the Rule.

17. The inquiry includes various scenarios as described in paragraph 7 above, but the basic ethical analysis is the same for each: Rule 1.15(c)(1) requires the inquirer to notify those with an interest in the property received. In some cases, the inquirer has successfully contacted the testator or executor and transferred the will. In other cases, the inquirer has learned that the testator is deceased, but it still may be possible to locate third persons with an interest in the property that has been received by the inquirer. Rule 1.15(c) requires her to notify such persons if it is reasonably possible to identify and 82 This ethical obligation arises from receiving the property of others, but there can be contractual obligations as well. In an opinion involving the retention of wills by the lawyer who had drafted them, we discussed agreements with clients:

> Whether the lawyer will maintain the original will and, if so, what additional obligations the lawyer will assume, are primarily matters to be agreed upon by the lawyer and client after consultation. . . . Ordinarily, a lawyer would be obligated to carry out such contractual undertakings. . . . At least absent agreement to the contrary, there will ordinarily be an implied understanding that after the client's death, if the lawyer has maintained the original will and, as far as the lawyer knows, there is no later valid one, the lawyer must take steps to ensure that the executor and/or beneficiaries are aware of the will's existence.

N.Y. State 724 (1999). Here, while the inquirer has contractual obligations to the retiring lawyer, she never entered into agreements with the testators.

locate them, and she may use information from the wills to try to do so. All this remains true even if there have been administrative or probate proceedings and the estate has been closed. Notifying administrators, executors or beneficiaries may not be an empty exercise if, for example, someone with an interest in the will should choose to pursue legal action.

18. Finally, the inquirer asks whether she may file the original will with the local surrogate's court under section 2507 of the Surrogate's Court Procedure Act.[83] We see no ethical bar to that practice. As discussed in paragraph 12 above, even though the inquirer should be protective of confidential information in the wills, she is nevertheless free to make disclosures as reasonably necessary, and the statute explicitly protects the confidentiality of filed wills.[84] There may be good reasons to file the wills with surrogate's court when the testators' whereabouts cannot be determined. The prudential benefits of filing with the court would depend on the facts and circumstances of the particular case. In some circumstances, it might be prudent for the attorney to remain as custodian of the will.

CONCLUSION:

19. A lawyer who comes into possession of a will by acquiring the practice of a retiring lawyer is required to take reasonable steps to locate and notify third persons, such as the testator, with an interest in the will. In certain circumstances the obligation is excused if the third person otherwise has the necessary information, such as if the retiring lawyer has provided the notice. Although the lawyer newly in possession of the will may be holding it as a custodian rather than in an attorney-client relationship with the testator, the lawyer should nevertheless respect the confidentiality of information in the will. The lawyer may, however, review or disclose confidential information in the will to the extent reasonably necessary to help ensure the will's proper disposition, and the lawyer may file the will with the local surrogate's court.

83 "The court of any county upon being paid the fees allowed therefor by law shall receive and deposit in the court any will of a domiciliary of the county which any person shall deliver to it for that purpose . . ." SCPA §2507(1); see SCPA §2507(3)(d) (providing for delivery of will to surrogate's court if deposited with officer other than a surrogate). There is a statutory fee for filing a will for safekeeping, "except that the court in any county may reduce or dispense with such fee." SCPA §2402(9)(v). We are advised that some jurisdictions in New York permit an attorney to file such wills without fee, and that others require the attorney to remit a filing fee but could be amenable to a waiver of the fee.

TOPIC: Law Firm; Legal Assistance Organization

DIGEST: The local sections of a national legal services project are considered a single law firm for conflict of interest and confidentiality purposes where, among other things, the local sections share a single case management system and there is supervision across the local sections.

RULES: 1.0(h), 1.6, 1.10. 1.10(e)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer practices law with a national law project focusing on immigration matters that provides free legal services to non-citizens in several states. A number of attorneys work under the umbrella of the national organization, conducting clinics in churches around the country. The national board provides periodic financial grants and programmatic support, such as training of volunteers. The national board is incorporated, but each local section is also independently incorporated and receives local funding. All of the local sections share the same logo, the same insurance carrier and a group list serve. Additionally, the local sections share a single case management system that enables each attorney to have access to the information of all of the project's clients in all sections. The national board designates several lawyers as "Regional Attorneys" to supervise the attorneys in several local sections. The inquirer asks whether the nationwide network of local sections is a single law firm for confidentiality and conflict of interest purposes.

QUESTION:

2. Where the local sections of a national legal services project are separately incorporated, but share the same logo, the same insurance carrier, a group list serve, and a single case management system, and where the national board designates regional attorneys who supervise offices in multiple states, are the local sections a single law firm for purposes of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct, including for conflict of interest and confidentiality purposes?

OPINION:

3. Rule 1.0(h), in the "Terminology" section of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"), provides that a "firm" or "law firm" "includes, but is not limited to, a lawyer or lawyers in a law partnership, professional corporation, sole proprietorship or other association authorized to practice law; or lawyers engaged in a qualified legal assistance organization, a government law office, or the legal department of a corporation or other organization." Some groups may constitute a firm for the purposes of some of the Rules but not others. See Comment [2] to Rule 1.0 ("a group of lawyers could be regarded as a firm for purposes of determining whether a conflict of interest exists but not for application of the advertising rules."). Where a legal services organization consists of more than one component or section, the entire organization may constitute one single firm or each component may constitute a separate firm, depending on the organizational structure. See Comment [4] to Rule 1.0. Determining whether a group of lawyers is a single firm "is a fact-intensive inquiry." N.Y. State 881 (2011).

4. As to the facts that are relevant to that inquiry, Comment [2] to Rule 1.0 points to (1) whether the group presents itself to the public in a way that suggests it is a firm; and (2) whether the lawyers in the group have mutual access to information concerning the clients they serve. Our ethics opinions focus on similar facts, placing particular weight on access to client information. Thus, in N.Y. State 794 (2006), we concluded that the various divisions of a law school clinic constituted a single firm for purposes of the conflict rules where, even though each division maintained computer databases that were inaccessible to other divisions, the clinic shared common office and file space.

5. Our opinions also look to the independence of the lawyers in assessing whether a group of lawyers is a single firm. Thus, in N.Y. State 914 (2012), we concluded that the members of a panel of lawyers established to provide legal assistance to clients who had conflicts with the local Legal Aid office did not consist of a single firm. We focused on the independence of the members of the panel, noting that "[n]either the project nor its lawyers would exercise any supervision or control over the legal services provided by conflict panel volunteers."

6. Under the above principles, it is clear that the group of lawyers at issue in this inquiry is a single law firm for conflict and confidentiality purposes. Some of the factors present here would not, in-and-of-themselves, render the project a single firm, see N.Y. State 643 (1993) (shared liability insurance not sufficient for members of a panel to constitute single firm). Nevertheless, the facts taken together lead to only one conclusion about the status of the inquirer's entity. The factors that most strongly support this conclusion are (i) the project's use of a single case management system with shared access and (ii) the supervisory structure of the project. As currently constituted, the project's case management system permits all attorneys access to all confidential information about all matters in all sections of the project. The system provides no reliable means for confining confidential information to any one office. This joint access to confidential information can pass muster under Rule 1.6 only if those with shared access are treated as a single firm. See Rule 1.6, Cmt. [5] ("lawyers in a firm may, in the course of the firm's practice, disclose to each other information relating to a client of the firm, unless the client has instructed that particular information be confined to specified lawyers"). If each of the project's various sections were treated as a separate firm, then Rule 1.6(a) would prohibit one section from sharing confidential information with lawyers from another section absent client consent or another exception to the duty of confidentiality. A legal services organization, however, must consider whether a request for such consent would be coercive. See N.Y. State 490 (a legal services staff should be particularly sensitive to any element of submissiveness on the part of their indigent clients and such requests should be made only when the staff is satisfied that the clients could refuse to consent without any sense of guilt or embarrassment).

7. Even if the project's case management system compartmentalized confidential information by section, the regional supervision of lawyers from multiple local sections would prevent us from treating each section as a separate firm. Because each regional supervisor oversees local lawyers, the local lawyers are not acting independently, cf. N.Y. State 914, supra, and the supervisor gains access to confidential information from multiple local sections. This supervisory structure is incompatible with treating each local section as a single firm.

8. Since we find that the entire national project is a single firm for purposes of the Rules, the firm must comply with Rule 1.10 (Imputation of Conflicts of Interest), which provides that conflicts arising under Rules 1.7, 1.8 and 1.9 are imputed to all lawyers "associated in a firm." As part of a firm's

Rule 1.10 obligations, it must implement and maintain a conflict-checking system in accordance with Rule 1.10(e) as follows:

> A law firm shall make a written record of its engagements, at or near the time of each new engagement, and shall implement and maintain a system by which proposed engagements are checked against current and previous engagements when:
> (1) the firm agrees to represent a new client;
> (2) the firm agrees to represent an existing client in a new matter;
> (3) the firm hires or associates with another lawyer; or
> (4) an additional party is named or appears in a pending matter.

9. Of course, lawyers who practice primarily in a firm's office that is in a jurisdiction other than New York are not bound by New York's Rule 1.10. But, as a practical matter, the lawyers practicing in the firm's New York office cannot comply with Rule 1.10 unless the entire firm is part of a single conflict-checking system.

CONCLUSION:

10. The local sections of a national legal services project are considered a single law firm for conflict of interest and confidentiality purposes where, among other things, the local sections share a single case management system and regional attorneys supervise lawyers in multiple local sections.

OPINION 1037 (12/06/2014)

TOPIC: Limiting means used to pursue client's objectives; conduct prejudicial to administration of justice; status hearing

DIGEST: Government attorneys who handle matters before the Immigration Court may, with the informed consent of the client as well as the consent of the Immigration Court, provide the Immigration Court with a position paper and decline to attend in person Immigration Court status hearings at which no substantive or procedural issues can or will be addressed, as long as the government attorneys are not thereby impeded from competently and diligently representing their client.

RULES: 1.1(a) & (c), 1.2(a), 1.4(a); 3.4(c), 8.4(d)

FACTS:

1. The New York Office of the Chief Counsel (OCC) of Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) represents ICE in litigating removal proceedings before the Immigration Court.[85] Litigation before the Immigration Court—particularly litigation regarding the removal of unaccompanied alien children—often takes years to resolve because many respondent aliens make external applications to other administrative bodies (such as the U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Service) or courts (such as New York Family Court), and the Immigration Court often cannot decide individual cases until those other administrative bodies or courts issue their decisions.

2. While these external applications are pending, cases pending before the Immigration Court are listed on a master calendar and scheduled for periodic status hearings (each a "Status Hearing"). The purpose of a Status Hearing is to update the Immigration Court on the status of the external applications, but Status Hearings are repeatedly adjourned because there is nothing to report while the external applications remain pending. The ICE attorney generally does not oppose adjournments, changes of venue, or, in certain circumstances, administrative closure or dismissal of the Immigration Court proceedings. Once a respondent-alien has exhausted the external applications, the Immigration Court schedules the case for a merits hearing (the "Merits Hearing"). Under current practice, ICE attorneys appear in person before the Immigration Court for every Status Hearing and Merits Hearing.

3. The OCC is considering altering current practice regarding its representation of ICE before the Immigration Court during the Status Hearing stage. In order to increase efficiency, the OCC would like to have its attorneys submit position papers in lieu of in-person appearances at the Status Hearings. The OCC has requested an opinion as to the ethical implications of this proposed practice (assuming the Immigration Court would permit it).

QUESTION:

4. May OCC lawyers decline to attend the Immigration Court's Status Hearings at which no substantive or procedural issues can or will be addressed?

85 A removal proceeding is an administrative proceeding in Immigration Court to determine if an individual is removable under U.S. immigration law. Such proceedings formerly were known as deportation proceedings.

OPINION:

5. The New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") prohibit an attorney from engaging in "conduct that is prejudicial to the administration of justice." Rule 8.4(d). The phrase "prejudicial to the administration of justice" is explained in Comment [3] to Rule 8.4:

> The prohibition on conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice is generally invoked to punish conduct, whether or not it violates another ethics rule, that results in substantial harm to the justice system comparable to those caused by obstruction of justice, such as advising a client to testify falsely, paying a witness to be unavailable, altering documents, repeatedly disrupting a proceeding, or failing to cooperate in an attorney disciplinary investigation or proceeding. . . . The conduct must be seriously inconsistent with a lawyer's responsibility as an officer of the court.

6. Rule 3.4(c) prohibits a lawyer from disregarding, or advising the client to disregard, a standing rule of a tribunal or a ruling of a tribunal made in the course of a proceeding, with exceptions not relevant here. Thus, if the Immigration Court required personal attendance by OCC attorneys, the attorneys could not ethically refuse to attend. See N.Y. State 719 (1999) (a lawyer's retainer agreement may not vary a requirement of a court rule because doing so would constitute a violation of DR 7-106(A) [the predecessor to Rule 3.4(c)]); N.Y. State 613 (1990) (whether a lawyer may help a "pro se" client to draft a pleading depends on whether the lawyer would be disregarding a standing rule of the tribunal that requires disclosing the drafter of the pleadings). The purpose of the prohibition in Rule 3.4(c) is similar to the purpose of the legal doctrine of contempt of court, i.e. engaging in contemptuous behavior tending to impair the respect due to the authority of the court or intentional disobedience to a mandate of the court. See NY Penal Law § 215.50.

7. Attorneys who fail to attend court ordered hearings in New York are subject to discipline under Rule 8.4(d). Matter of Cronk, 52 A.D.3d 54, 58 (2d Dept 2008) (respondent disciplined for failure to attend scheduled court conferences). Other states' disciplinary authorities have reached similar conclusions. See, e.g., Oklahoma Bar Association v. Benefield, 125 P.3d 1191, 1194 (2005); Attorney Grievance Com'n of Maryland v. Monfried, 368 Md. 373 (2002); In re Davidsion, 761 N.E.2d 854 (2002); Florida Bar Association v. Ossinsky, 255 So.2d 526 (1971). Attorneys who disregard the ruling of a tribunal in New York also are subject to discipline. See, e.g. Matter of Goll, 27 A.D.3d 131 (2d Dept 2006) (violation of 7-106(A) for failing to prepared and submit documents when court directed lawyer to do so, among other violations, results in a 2-year suspension); Matter of Fretz, 88 A.D.3d 470 (4th Dept 2011)(violation of DR 7-106(A), among other violations, results in a 3-year suspension).

8. None of the cited decisions involve situations where the client and the court consented to the non-appearance (or appearance through a position paper in lieu of a personal appearance).

9. As long as the tribunal permits the lawyer to submit a position paper rather than appearing in person at a Status Hearing, the decision whether to forego the opportunity to make an in-person presentation before the judge is for the lawyer to make, in consultation with the client. Rule 1.2(a) requires a lawyer to abide by a client's decisions concerning the "objectives" of a representation, and to consult with the client as to the "means" by which those objectives are to be pursued. Rule 1.4(a)(2) reinforces that provision by providing that a lawyer shall reasonably consult with the client about the means by which the client's objectives are to be accomplished. In this case, appearing at a Status Hearing by submitting a position paper rather than appearing in person would be a decision as to "means," not "objectives." Nevertheless, we have warned that a client may not limit the representation in a manner that will compel the lawyer to neglect the matter, to prepare inadequately, or otherwise to represent the client incompetently. Cf. N.Y. State 751 (2002) (government agency may not require its lawyers to undertake more matters than the lawyers can competently handle, on the grounds that the agency does not have the funding to hire an adequate number of lawyers). Furthermore, while client consent is sufficient under Rule 1.2(a), the lawyer also needs the concurrence of the court under Rules 3.4(c) and 8.4(d).

10. Other provisions of the Rules also have a bearing on the questions posed here. For example, Rule 1.1(c)(2) prohibits a lawyer from intentionally prejudicing or damaging the client during the course of the representation, except as permitted or required by the rules. This provision demonstrates the importance of having the court approve the proposal to appear at Status Hearings through a position paper. Similarly, Rule 1.1(a) states that the lawyer should provide competent representation to a client.

11. According to the OCC, the submission of position papers in lieu of personal appearance would not undercut their ability to competently and diligently represent their client under Rule 1.1. Memoranda submitted to the Immigration Court would provide it with the same information as would the physical presence of an OCC attorney, and the absence of an OCC attorney would not prejudice the OCC attorney's client (which is ICE). Whether an OCC attorney's failure to attend Status Hearings delays the administration of justice rests ultimately with the Immigration Court. If that court permits OCC attorneys to send a position paper rather than attending a Status Hearing in person, we see no reason why the Rules would prohibit the practice.

CONCLUSION:

12. An OCC attorney may, with the informed consent of both the Immigration Court and the client, provide the Immigration Court with a position paper and decline to attend in person an Immigration Court Status Hearing at which no substantive or procedural issues can or will be addressed, as long as OCC attorneys are not thereby impeded from competently and diligently representing their client.

OPINION 1038 (12/06/2014)

TOPIC: Legal fees – sharing with nonlawyer, partnership with nonlawyer

DIGEST: New York lawyer with New York-based practice may not partner with nonlawyer or practice in law firm owned by parent firm that has nonlawyer partner.

RULES: 5.4; 8.5.

FACTS:

1. A law firm based in Washington, D.C. includes a nonlawyer partner, which is permitted by the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct. The firm is interested in associating with a New York-admitted lawyer, who is also licensed in D.C., to handle New York cases, staff an office in New York and have a primarily New York-based practice. The firm is contemplating having the New York lawyer join the firm as a partner or forming a "wholly-owned subsidiary law firm" in New York to be "independently managed/operated" by the New York lawyer. We understand the term "subsidiary law firm" to mean a firm whose partnership interests are owned entirely by the D.C. firm.

QUESTIONS:

2. May the New York lawyer join the D.C. firm as a partner?

3. May the New York lawyer practice in a subsidiary partnership of the D.C. firm?

OPINION:

4. Rule 5.4(a) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") provides, "A lawyer or law firm shall not share legal fees with a nonlawyer," with exceptions not applicable to the question presented. Rule 5.4(b) provides, "A lawyer shall not form a partnership with a nonlawyer if any of the activities of the partnership consist of the practice of law." Rule 5.4(d) provides, "A lawyer shall not practice with or in the form of an entity authorized to practice law for profit, if: (1) a nonlawyer owns any interest therein . . . (2) a nonlawyer is a member, corporate director or officer thereof or occupies a position of similar responsibility . . . or (3) a nonlawyer has the right to direct or control the professional judgment of a lawyer."

5. Comment [1] to Rule 5.4 states, "These limitations are to protect the lawyer's professional independence of judgment." Comment [2] notes, "This Rule also expresses traditional limitations on permitting a third party to direct or regulate the lawyer's professional judgment in rendering legal services to another."

6. Implicit in the inquiries here is the question whether New York's rules govern the proposed conduct of the New York lawyer. Choice of law questions are governed in New York by Rule 8.5, which provides as follows:

> (a) A lawyer admitted to practice in this state is subject to the disciplinary authority of this state, regardless of where the lawyer's conduct occurs. A lawyer may be subject to > the disciplinary authority of both this state and another jurisdiction where the lawyer is admitted for the same conduct.

> (b) In any exercise of the disciplinary authority of this state, the Rules of Professional Conduct to be applied shall be as follows:
> (1) For conduct in connection with a proceeding in a court before which a lawyer has been admitted to practice (either generally or for purposes of that proceeding), the rules to be applied shall be the rules of the jurisdiction in which the court sits, unless the rules of the court provide otherwise; and
> (2) For any other conduct:
>
> (i) If the lawyer is licensed to practice only in this state, the rules to be applied shall be the rules of this state, and
> (ii) If the lawyer is licensed to practice in this state and another jurisdiction, the rules to be applied shall be the rules of the admitting jurisdiction in which the lawyer principally practices; provided, however, that if particular conduct clearly has its predominant effect in another jurisdiction in which the lawyer is licensed to practice, the rules of that jurisdiction shall be applied to that conduct. [Emphasis added.]

7. We view the "conduct" at issue here to be (i) practicing in New York in a partnership with a nonlawyer partner and (ii) sharing legal fees from New York matters with a nonlawyer partner. Applying Rule 8.5(b) to that conduct, we believe that entering into either of the arrangements proposed here, and the profit-sharing that results, would not be conduct "in connection with" a New York proceeding, even if the lawyer were to undertake New York litigation. Consequently, the applicable choice-of-law rule is that set forth in Rule 8.5(b)(2). Under that provision, the choice of law will depend on (1) the jurisdiction in which the lawyer "principally practices," and (2) whether the lawyer's conduct – i.e., entering into a partnership that includes nonlawyers or sharing fees with nonlawyers – "clearly" has its "predominant effect" in D.C.

8. The inquiry specifies that the lawyer will handle New York cases and have a practice based primarily in New York, so it seems clear that the lawyer "principally practices" in New York. This means that Rule 5.4 will apply to the proposed conduct unless, in the words of Rule 8.5(b)(ii), the conduct "clearly has its predominant effect" in D.C., in which case the D.C. Rules would apply.

9. In N.Y. State 1027 (2014) we considered how to determine the location of the "predominant effect" when the conduct in question relates directly to the provision of legal services in a particular matter, and we advised looking to various factors relating to the circumstances of the particular matter. Here, however, the conduct does not relate to any particular matter, but rather relates to the entire operation of the partnership – specifically, practicing in New York in a partnership with a nonlawyer partner and sharing legal fees from New York matters with the nonlawyer partner. In these circumstances, the "predominant effect" of the conduct is "clearly" in New York. Two of our prior opinions interpreting Rule 8.5(b) – N.Y. State 911 (2012) and N.Y. State 889 (2011) – help to frame our conclusion.

10. In N.Y. State 911, a New York lawyer proposed to establish the New York office of a UK law firm that, as permitted by English law, included UK nonlawyers in ownership and supervisory positions. We concluded that New York Rule 5.4 prohibited the association because "[e]ven if the lawyers in question are also licensed in the UK, the predominant effect of their conduct, in practicing law from a New York office on behalf of New York clients, would be in New York."

11. Similarly, in N.Y. State 889, we were asked whether a lawyer licensed in New York and D.C. could practice in a D.C. firm with a nonlawyer member. Because the lawyer principally practiced in D.C. and received a majority of revenue from D.C. cases and matters, we concluded that Rule 5.4 did not prohibit the proposed arrangement, even if the lawyer undertook "occasional litigation in New York." We noted, however, that:

> Our conclusion as to choice of law is premised on the particular facts of the inquiry. . . . Different facts could lead to a different result. For example, if a major portion of the revenue of the lawyer or the law firm were derived from the practice of law in the State [of] New York, then, depending on the particular facts, Rule 8.5 could make applicable the prohibitions of New York Rule 5.4. Certainly if the partnership were created for the very purpose of litigation in New York, establishing it in the District of Columbia would be ineffective to circumvent the New York rules on fee sharing.

12. Under New York's Rule 5.4 it is clear that both forms of practice proposed in the inquiry are prohibited. As noted, Rule 5.4(b) expressly prohibits forming a partnership with a nonlawyer.

13. The question of practicing in a "wholly-owned subsidiary law firm" in New York that is owned by a partnership that has a nonlawyer member is not addressed directly by the language of Rule 5.4, but the result is the same. Rule 5.4(b) would plainly prohibit the lawyer from partnering, either directly (as proposed in the first question) or indirectly (through a subsidiary structure which ultimately has the effects of partnership) with a nonlawyer. Cf., Rule 8.4(a) (lawyer may not violate the Rules "through the acts of another"). But even if the inquiring lawyer were only an employee of either entity, without a partnership interest, Rule 5.4(d) would prohibit him from practicing "with or in the form of an entity authorized to practice law for profit, if . . . a nonlawyer owns any interest therein" or "has the right to direct or control the professional judgment of a lawyer."

14. We need not decide whether the undertaking that the New York lawyer would "independently manage/operate" the New York firm would surmount the ordinary incidents of law firm ownership with respect to directing or controlling the New York lawyer's professional judgment. The term "owns any interest therein" clearly extends to an indirect ownership interest such as that proposed by the subsidiary relationship, where one or more nonlawyers own an interest in a partnership that in turn owns the entirety of the ownership interests in the New York firm.

CONCLUSION:

15. A New York-based lawyer practicing primarily in New York may not join a D.C. firm that includes a nonlawyer partner. The lawyer is also prohibited from practicing in a firm organized as a wholly-owned subsidiary of that D.C. firm.

OPINION 1039 (12/08/2014)

TOPIC: Advertising; solicitation

DIGEST: An attorney may operate a blog containing an opt-in box where a person who subscribes can receive a free written report about copyrights in return for providing contact information that the attorney will later use to offer subscribers the attorney's products and services, provided that such later offers comply with applicable law and ethics rules. The blog does not itself constitute a solicitation. If the attorney later uses the contact information obtained through the opt-in box to send advertisements to subscribers, those communications would be subject to the rule on advertising and might also be subject to the rule governing solicitation.

RULES: 1.0(a), 7.1(a), (f) & (h), 7.3(b)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a member of the New York and California bars[86] and operates a blog (available on the internet) that provides legal and publishing information to authors. She wants to build a list of subscribers who are interested in her blog posts and to whom she might send alerts about changes in publishing matters and copyright law. She also wishes to periodically survey these same subscribers about what they regard as their legal and publishing needs in order to create products that suit those needs. Finally, she wishes to advertise those legal products to the subscribers and others in the future.

2. The entire blog is marked as an "attorney advertisement" and contains an opt-in box where the inquirer offers a free written report about copyrights in exchange for readers' names and legal addresses. Those subscribers that check the opt-in box will be broken down based on the state in which they live so the inquirer can determine what she "might offer as an attorney licensed in those states vs. general publishing information."

QUESTION:

3. May an attorney operate a blog containing an opt-in box whereby a person who subscribes can receive a written report about copyrights in return for providing contact information, which the attorney may later use to offer subscribers her products and services?

4. Does the above activity constitute "solicitation" within the meaning of Rule 7.3(b) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules")?

OPINION:

5. Our jurisdiction extends only to questions of legal ethics. We note that the use of email for commercial purposes is covered by the Federal Controlling the Assault of Non-Solicited Pornography and Marketing Act of 2003 (commonly known as the "CAN-SPAM Act"), and by rules promulgated by the Federal Trade Commission, see 16 C.F.R. 316. The inquirer should therefore determine whether the use of email addresses gathered for one purpose may be used for another purpose and what disclosures or disclaimers are legally required. Those are questions of law beyond our jurisdiction.

86 Whenever a lawyer is licensed in more than one jurisdiction, there is a question of choice of law under Rule 8.5(b)(2). We have assumed for purposes of this opinion that the inquirer principally practices in New York and that her conduct will have its predominant effect here.

6. Rule 1.0(a) defines the term "advertisement" for purposes of the Rules as: "any public or private communication made by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm about the lawyer or law firm's services, the primary purpose of which is for the retention of the lawyer or law firm. It does not include communications to existing clients or other lawyers."

7. If a communication constitutes an "advertisement," it is subject to numerous requirements in Rule 7.1. See N.Y. State 848 (2010). Primary among those is the requirement that the advertisement not contain any "statements or claims that are false, deceptive or misleading." Rule 7.1(a)(1). In addition Rule 7.1 requires that each advertisement (with certain listed exceptions) be labeled "Attorney Advertising" on the first page, or on the home page in the case of a web site. An advertisement must include the name, principal law office address and telephone number of the lawyer or law firm whose services are being offered. Rule 7.1(h). It must be pre-approved by the lawyer or law firm, and a copy must be retained for a period of not less than three years following its initial dissemination. (Advertisements contained in a computer-accessed communication must be retained for a period of not less than one year.) Rule 7.1(k).

8. Not all blogs operated by attorneys constitute advertisements under the Rules. See Rule 7.1, Comment [7] ("Topical newsletters, client alerts, or blogs intended to educate recipients about new developments in the law are generally not considered advertising."); N.Y. State 967 (2013) (blog written by an attorney that does not discuss legal topics and whose primary purpose is not the retention of the lawyer is not an advertisement). However, as Rule 7.1, Cmt. [7] points out, "a newsletter, client alert, or blog that provides information or news primarily about the lawyer or law firm (for example, the lawyer or law firm's cases, personnel, clients or achievements) generally would be considered advertising." See also Hunter v. Virginia State Bar ex rel. Third Dist. Committee, 285 Va. 485, 744 S.E.2d 611(Va. 2013) (attorney's blog posts, while containing some political commentary, were deemed commercial speech subject to attorney advertising rules).

9. The inquirer states that her blog is labeled an "attorney advertisement" because a primary purpose of the blog is to advertise her services. The definition of "advertisement" quoted in ¶6 above requires that the primary purpose must be the retention of the lawyer or law firm. We do not opine on whether the label is actually required here, but we recognize that many lawyers take a conservative approach to whether educational material prepared for clients is an advertisement and thus should bear the label "attorney advertisement" as required by Rule 7.1(f). Whether a given communication is an "advertisement" is not always clear. See N.Y. State 848 (discussing factors to be considered in determining if attorney communication constitutes an "advertisement," including: (i) the intent of the communication, (ii) the content of the communication and (iii) the targeted audience of the communication). The fact that the lawyer decides as a precautionary matter to use the "advertising" label is not dispositive.

10. In N.Y. State 873 (2011), we noted that the Rules do not prohibit an attorney from offering a prize to those who join the attorney's social networking sites, so long as the offer does not constitute illegal conduct. Similarly, we see no ethical bar prohibiting the inquirer here from offering a written report about copyrights in exchange for readers' names and email addresses.

11. The inquirer also asks whether her communications constitute a "solicitation," thereby subjecting them to the special requirements of Rule 7.3. The blog and opt-in box do not, standing alone, constitute a solicitation. Rule 7.3(b) defines a "solicitation" as an "advertisement" that meets other criteria. Thus, if the blog is not an "advertisement" under Rule 1.0(a), by definition it cannot be a solicitation under Rule 7.3(b). However, if the blog is in fact an "advertisement," the lawyer needs to consider whether it is also a solicitation.

12. Under 7.3(b), a "solicitation" is "any advertisement initiated by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm that is directed to, or targeted at, a specific recipient or group of recipients . . . the primary purpose of which is the retention of the lawyer or law firm, and a significant motive for which is pecuniary gain." Comment [3] to Rule 7.3 states that one way that an advertisement may be considered to be "directed to, or targeted at, a specific recipient or group of recipients" within the meaning of Rule 7.3(b) is if it is made by "in-person or telephone contact or by real time or interactive computer-accessed communication or if it is addressed so that it will be delivered to the specific recipient or recipients or their families or agents." The blog and opt-in box here are not transmitted by real time or interactive computer-accessed communication and are not delivered to any specific recipients. See N.Y. State 1016 (2014) ("A non-interactive commercial post to members of [a] message group would not constitute an interactive computer-accessed communication.").

13. Furthermore, the blog does not make "reference to a specific person or group of people whose legal needs arise out of a specific incident to which the advertisement explicitly refers." Rule 7.3(b), Comment 3; see also Rule 7.3(b), Comment [4] ("an advertisement in public media such as newspapers, television, billboards, web sites or the like is presumed not to be directed to or targeted at a specific recipient or recipients. For example, an advertisement in a public medium is not directed to or targeted at 'a specific recipient or group of recipients' simply because it is intended to attract potential clients with needs in a specified area of law.") Thus, even if the blog were an "advertisement" under the Rules, it is not a solicitation.

14. If the attorney (or someone on the attorney's behalf) later uses the email addresses obtained through the opt-in box to send the inquirer's advertisements, these communications would quality as "advertisements" and, in addition, may very well fall within the definition of "solicitation" in Rule 7.3(b) and would be subject to the rules governing solicitation in Rule 7.3.

CONCLUSION:

15. An attorney may operate a blog containing an opt-in box where a person who subscribes can receive a written report about copyrights in return for providing contact information that the attorney will later use to offer subscribers the attorney's products and services, provided that such later offers comply with applicable law and ethics rules. The blog does not itself constitute a solicitation. If the attorney uses the contact information obtained through the opt-in box to forward advertisements to subscribers, those communications would be subject to the rule governing advertising and might also be subject to the rule governing solicitation.

TOPIC: Judge (Lawyer responding to unfair criticism), Prejudicing client

DIGEST: A lawyer ordinarily may respond to unjust criticism of a judge in the media. However, a lawyer with a case pending before the judge should consider whether support of the judge is likely to cause the public reasonably to question the impartiality of the judge in presiding over such matter, and hence cause the judge's recusal. If so, and if the judge's recusal would prejudice or damage a client of the lawyer, the lawyer may not publicly support the judge.

RULES: 1.1(c), 8.2

FACTS:

1. A judge has been accused in the media of impropriety on the bench. In the lawyer's experience, the judge is hardworking, intelligent and even-handed, and the lawyer believes the accusations in the media are unfounded.

QUESTION:

2. Where a lawyer believes that the media has unjustly accused a judge of impropriety on the bench, may the lawyer – either individually or as one of multiple signatories sending an open letter or other communication to the media and/or to investigating authorities – publicly express support for that judge, if the lawyer has a case pending before the judge?

OPINION:

Defending Judges Against Unjust Accusations

3. It has long been the tradition of lawyers, individually and collectively (often through bar associations), to come to the aid of judges they believe have been unjustly criticized in the media. As stated in Comment [3] to Rule 8.2 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"): "To maintain the fair and independent administration of justice, lawyers are encouraged to continue traditional efforts to defend judges and courts unjustly criticized."

4. Comment [3] is merely the most current reflection of this long tradition. EC 9-6 of the 1970 New York Code of Professional Responsibility ("Code"), the predecessor to the Rules, exhorted attorneys "to uphold the integrity and honor of the profession; to encourage respect for the law and the courts and the judges thereof . . ." EC 8-6 of the Code provided that "Adjudicatory officials, not being wholly free to defend themselves, are entitled to receive the support of the bar against unjust criticism." Even earlier, Canon 1 of the 1908 Canons of Professional Ethics[87] provided: "Judges, not being wholly free to defend themselves, are peculiarly entitled to receive the support of the Bar against unjust criticism and clamor." The 1887 Alabama State Bar Association Code of Ethics, which was a model for many later codes of lawyer ethics, provided in Rule 4:

87 For an exhaustive treatment of the history of the 1908 Canons, see James M. Altman, Considering the A.B.A.'s 1908 Canons of Ethics, 71 Fordham L. Rev. 2395 (2003).

> Courts and judicial officers, in their rightful exercise of their functions, should always receive the support and countenance of attorneys against unjust criticism and popular clamor; and it is the attorney's duty to give them his moral support in all proper ways . . . .

5. Preserving the quality and independence of the judiciary has been a key goal of lawyers and the Bar over the years. Lawyers individually and the Bar as the collective voice of the legal profession frequently work to maintain and support public confidence in the judiciary by providing timely assistance to members of the bench in responding to adverse publicity, misinformation, or unwarranted criticism of an individual judge or the judiciary. The effectiveness of our justice system depends in large measure on public confidence. Inaccurate reporting and unjust criticism in the media regarding judges, courts or the system of justice erodes public confidence and weakens the administration of justice. It is vital that all members of the public – litigants and non-litigants alike – have faith that the courts, their procedures and their decisions are fair and impartial.

6. It is important for lawyers to ensure the accuracy of information published about the actions of judges because it is unethical for judges to answer criticism of their actions regarding pending or impending matters. See Code of Judicial Conduct ("CJC"), Canon 3(B)(8) (A judge shall not make any public comment about a pending or impending proceeding in any court in the U.S.). Responses by members of the profession to inaccurate information about judges promote the dignity of the administration of justice, prevent interference with pending litigation, and affirm the commitment to an independent judiciary – a judiciary dedicated to decision making based on facts and the law.

7. For these reasons, numerous bar associations have encouraged attorneys to respond accurately, quickly and fairly to criticism of judges and courts that is unwarranted.[88] See, e.g., American Board of Trial Advocates, Responding to Unfair Criticism of Judges; American Bar Assn. Standing Committee on Judicial Independence, Rapid Response to Unfair and Unjust Criticism of Judges (April 2008); Philadelphia Bar Assn. Special Committee to Respond to Attacks on the Judiciary (April 30, 1998); Nebraska State Bar Assn. Policy for Responding to Unjust Criticism (Nov. 3, 2006); 63 Bench & Bar of Minnesota, No. 6 (July 2006).

Effect on Appearances Before the Judge

8. An individual lawyer who responds to criticism of judges may wish to consider whether such support for the judge might be viewed as cause for the judge to be biased in favor of the lawyer. The issues that arise from such support are similar to those that arise where a judge may learn of a lawyer's contribution to a judge's reelection campaign. See N.Y. State 574 (1986), N.Y. City 893 (1978). Under the Code of Judicial Conduct, a judge must disqualify himself or herself in any proceeding in which the judge's impartiality might reasonably be questioned, including where the judge has a personal bias toward a party's lawyer. CJC Canon 3E(1). The judge therefore will have to determine whether his or her impartiality might reasonably be questioned as a result of the lawyer's support. This requires determinations of fact and law that are beyond the jurisdiction of our Committee.[89]

88 For a discussion of possible boundaries of a lawyer's criticism of a judge see N.Y. City 1996-1 (1996).

9. Our prior opinions have considered whether the lawyer should withdraw under the Rules or the judge should be disqualified under the CJC where the lawyer and the judge have prior connections that might affect the judge's impartiality. N.Y. State 574 (1986) thoroughly reviewed the authorities and held that:

> Where a judge and a lawyer have had previous connections, the question of whether the judge should be disqualified from sitting or the lawyer should be disqualified from appearing should be governed primarily by the Code of Judicial Conduct. N.Y. State 548 (1983), N.Y. State 384 (1975), ABA Inf. 1331 (1975). N.Y. State 548 extensively reviewed Codes governing lawyers' and judges' conduct and concluded that, absent statutory prohibition or special circumstances, the lawyer is not required to disqualify himself by reason of a relationship with the judge. Rather, it is the judge's duty to consider disqualification. [Emphasis added.][90]

10. Also relevant to our analysis is Rule 1.1(c)(2), which provides that a lawyer shall not intentionally "prejudice or damage the client during the course of the representation . . . ." If the lawyer's defense of the judge is likely to cause the judge to recuse himself or herself on grounds that the judge's impartiality toward the lawyer might reasonably be questioned, and if the judge's recusal is likely to prejudice or damage the client, then the lawyer may not publically support the judge. Rule 1.1(c)(2) would likely apply, for example, if (i) the lawyer is representing a client in a matter that has been long pending before that judge or the matter is on the eve of trial, and (ii) the lawyer's public support of the judge is likely to cause the judge's recusal, and (iii) reassignment of the matter to another judge would cause delay to the prejudice of the client.

Effect on Future Clients

11. If the lawyer has no pending matters before the judge, the question of the judge's recusal may arise with respect to future matters. Nevertheless, the lawyer does not have obligations to future clients under Rule 1.1(c). First, the rule by its terms applies only to actions by the lawyer "during the course of the representation." In any event, even if the judge were to determine that his or her impartiality might reasonably be questioned, it is unlikely that the judge's recusal and the assignment of a new proceeding to another judge would prejudice or damage the client within the meaning of Rule 1.1(c).

89 Thorough discussions of the circumstances that might lead to a judge's disqualification are found in N.Y. State 574 (1986) and N.Y. State 602 (1989). N.Y. State 602 involved a lawyer who had been subpoenaed to testify before the Commission on Judicial Conduct in a proceeding brought against a judge. We noted that, regardless of whether the witness' testimony would support the judge's position in those proceedings, the witness would be perceived to have some power to influence its outcome, and thus would have significant power over the judge's reputation and career. It is not clear that the same conclusion would apply to a lawyer's response to criticism of a judge in the media, as opposed to a judicial conduct proceeding. Ultimately, the judge would have to determine whether the lawyer's defense of the judge against criticism in the media would be perceived as reasonably calling into question the judge's impartiality toward the defender.

90 To the same effect is N.Y. State 673 (1995), where the lawyer was a relative of judge.

CONCLUSION:

12. A lawyer individually or the Bar collectively ordinarily may respond to unfair criticism of a judge in the media. Before responding as an individual or in a small group of lawyers, however, a lawyer with a case pending before the judge should consider whether support of the judge is likely to cause the public reasonably to question the impartiality of the judge in presiding over such matter, and hence cause the judge's recusal. If so, and if the judge's recusal would prejudice or damage a client of the lawyer, the lawyer may not publicly support the judge.

OPINION 1041 (12/10/2014)

TOPIC: Foreign jurisdiction (practice in); Choice of law, partnership with non-lawyer

DIGEST: A New York lawyer who practices principally in a foreign country but is not admitted to practice in that country may, without violating the New York Rules of Professional Conduct, (A) engage in lawful conduct that does not require licensing in the foreign country but would constitute the practice of law in New York, and (B) practice in the foreign country in partnership or association with an entity that includes a non-lawyer as a supervisor or owner; provided in each case that such practice is permitted under the laws and rules of the foreign country and the "predominant effect" of the lawyer's practice is not in New York.

RULES: 5.4(b) & (d), 8.5(a) & (b)

FACTS:

1. A New York lawyer contemplates establishing a practice based in the United Kingdom. For purposes of this opinion, we assume that the lawyer will practice principally in the U.K. While the lawyer's practice would constitute the practice of law if conducted in New York, the lawyer advises us, and we assume for purposes of this opinion, that the lawyer need not register as a foreign lawyer or otherwise be admitted to the bar in the U.K. in order to carry on his contemplated practice in that country. (Although the lawyer does not plan to register as a foreign lawyer at the outset, he may do so at some point.)

2. The lawyer also expects to join his practice with that of an entity formed and based in the U.K. to render legal services as an Alternative Business Structure ("ABS") under the U.K.'s Legal Services Act. The lawyer informs us, and we assume for purposes of this opinion, that the laws of the applicable jurisdiction in the U.K., unlike the laws and rules of New York, permit an entity practicing law to include among its supervisory personnel and owners both persons who are lawyers duly admitted in a jurisdiction other than the U.K. (but not in the U.K.) and persons who are not lawyers at all, such as management consultants or economists, and to render services as an ABS.

QUESTIONS:

3. May a New York lawyer who is based in the U.K. but is not formally admitted to practice in that country ethically engage in conduct there that does not require formal admission to the bar of the U.K. but would be the practice of law in New York?

4. May a New York lawyer who is based in the U.K. but is not formally admitted to practice there ethically practice law there with an entity authorized to practice law for profit if that entity has non-lawyer owners or supervisors?

OPINION:

Our Prior Opinions on Foreign Lawyers

5. This Committee has written several times in recent years on the application of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") to New York lawyers practicing in foreign jurisdictions (or domestic, non-New York jurisdictions), and, in particular, which jurisdiction's ethical rules and disciplinary authority apply under Rule 8.5. See N.Y. State 1027 (2014), N.Y. State 1023 (2014), N.Y. State 911 (2012), N.Y. State 889 (2011), N.Y. State 861 (2011) and N.Y. State 815 (2007).

6. Rule 8.5 provides as follows:

> (a) A lawyer admitted to practice in this state is subject to the disciplinary authority of this state, regardless of where the lawyer's conduct occurs. A lawyer may be subject to the disciplinary authority of both this state and another jurisdiction where the lawyer is admitted for the same conduct.
>
> (b) In any exercise of the disciplinary authority of this state, the Rules of Professional Conduct to be applied shall be as follows:
> > (1) For conduct in connection with a proceeding in a court before which a lawyer has been admitted to practice (either generally or for purposes of that proceeding), the rules to be applied shall be the rules of the jurisdiction in which the court sits, unless the rules of the court provide otherwise; and
> > (2) For any other conduct:
> >
> > > (i) If the lawyer is licensed to practice only in this state, the rules to be applied shall be the rules of this state, and
> > > (ii) If the lawyer is licensed to practice in this state and another jurisdiction, the rules to be applied shall be the rules of the admitting jurisdiction in which the lawyer principally practices; provided, however, that if particular conduct clearly has its predominant effect in another jurisdiction in which the lawyer is licensed to practice, the rules of that jurisdiction shall be applied to that conduct.

7. From these prior opinions and the Rules, the following principles emerge:

- If a lawyer is licensed to practice law by the State of New York, the lawyer – whether licensed in another jurisdiction or not – is subject to New York's disciplinary authority irrespective of where his or her conduct occurs (see Rule 8.5(a)).

- If the lawyer is licensed only by the State of New York and by no other jurisdiction, conformity to the New York Rules of Professional Conduct will be the standard against which a lawyer's conduct will be judged by disciplinary authorities in New York. Rule 8.5(b)(2)(i); N.Y. State 911 at ¶ 3.

- If a lawyer is admitted or licensed to practice in New York and also in another jurisdiction, then, in exercising its disciplinary authority, under Rule 8.5(b)(2)(ii) the court will apply the rules of the admitting jurisdiction in which the lawyer principally practices, unless the "predominant effect" of the lawyer's conduct is "clearly" in another admitting jurisdiction, in which case that jurisdiction's rules of ethics will apply.[91]

Engaging in a Foreign Jurisdiction in Conduct that Does Not Require Foreign Admission

8. Rule 8.5(b)(ii) by its terms applies when the New York lawyer is also admitted or licensed to practice in another jurisdiction. However, occasionally (as is the case in this inquiry) a New York lawyer based in a foreign jurisdiction may engage in conduct that does not trigger a registration requirement in that jurisdiction, but that would constitute the practice of law if conducted in New York. The question in that situation is whether the lawyer may be deemed to be "admitted" or "licensed to practice" in the foreign jurisdiction within the meaning of Rule 8.5(b) notwithstanding the lack of formal admission there.

9. We addressed that question in N.Y. State 815 (2007). In that opinion, we stated:

> "[L]icensed to practice" includes not only formal licensing procedures like those required by the states in the United States, but also less formal procedures that authorize a lawyer to undertake activities in a foreign jurisdiction that would constitute the practice of law if they were undertaken in the United States. So long as the activities are lawful in the jurisdiction in which they are performed, it is our view that a lawyer undertaking such activities is "licensed to practice" in that jurisdiction, and that jurisdiction is an "admitting jurisdiction," for purposes of DR 1-105(B)(2)(b).

Former DR 1-105(B)(2)(b) is identical to present day Rule 8.5(b)(2)(ii). Accordingly, nothing in the replacement of the Code of Professional Responsibility with the Rules of Professional Conduct gives us cause to alter the conclusions reached in N.Y. State 815.

Affiliation with a U.K. Alternative Business Structure

10. Whether a New York lawyer may affiliate with a law firm in the U.K. that is permitted by the laws of that jurisdiction to have non-lawyers among its owners and supervisors may be resolved by an analysis under Rule 8.5. The New York Rules preclude a New York lawyer from practicing law in any capacity with an entity authorized to practice law if a nonlawyer (a) is a partner, (b) owns an interest in the entity, (c) is a member, director or officer or has a position of similar responsibility, or (d) has the right to direct or control the professional judgment of a lawyer. Rule 5.4(b) & (d). The New York Rules also preclude a New York lawyer from sharing legal fees with a non-lawyer or from forming a partnership with a nonlawyer if any of the activities of the partnership consist of the practice of law. Rule 5.4(a) & (b). Those principles normally prohibit a New York lawyer from becoming a partner in 91 Rule 8.5(b)(1) sets forth an exception, not apparently applicable in the inquirer's situation, "for conduct in connection with a proceeding before a court before which a lawyer has been admitted to practice." With respect to such conduct, the rules of the jurisdiction in which the court sits are the rules to be applied. We concluded in N.Y. State 889 that Rule 5.4 does not prohibit occasional participation in litigation in New York by a lawyer licensed in New York but also licensed and practicing in a firm with non-lawyers principally in another jurisdiction that permits such practice. A lawyer in that general circumstance will need to judge whether that exception has any possible application to his or her situation.

a firm with nonlawyer owners or supervisors. The prohibitions against non-lawyer owners and splitting legal fees and forming law partnerships with non-lawyers apply even if the entity is located in another jurisdiction in which non-lawyer owners and supervisors are permitted, unless, under New York's choice of law rule, the rules of that other jurisdiction govern the New York lawyer's conduct. See Rule 8.5(b); N.Y. State 911 (New York lawyer may not practice law principally in New York as an employee of an out-of-state entity that has non-lawyer owners or managers); N.Y. State 889 (New York lawyer who principally practices in another jurisdiction allowing partnership with non-lawyers may ordinarily conduct litigation in New York because the other jurisdiction's ethics rules govern fee sharing with nonlawyers).

11. Under Rule 8.5(b), whether the laws of another admitting jurisdiction apply depends generally upon (a) where the New York lawyer has been "admitted to practice" or may be deemed to have been admitted to practice, (b) where the lawyer "principally practices" and (c) whether the predominant effect of the lawyer's practice will be in another admitting jurisdiction or in New York. See Rule 8.5(b)(2)(ii) (the rules to be applied to the conduct of a lawyer admitted to practice in more than one jurisdiction "shall be the rules of the admitting jurisdiction in which the lawyer principally practices "unless the particular conduct "clearly has its predominant effect in another jurisdiction in which the lawyer is licensed to practice").

12. The first question under Rule 8.5(b) is whether the inquirer has been admitted to practice or may be deemed to have been admitted in a jurisdiction besides New York. As we noted above, in this case the inquirer may be deemed to be "licensed to practice" in the U.K. (i.e., "admitted" to practice there) within the meaning of Rule 8.5(b). As to that question of interpretation, this Committee opined in N.Y. State 815 that "so long as the activities are lawful in the jurisdiction in which they are performed, it is our view that a lawyer undertaking such activities is 'licensed to practice' in that jurisdiction, and that jurisdiction is an 'admitting jurisdiction' for purposes of DR 1-105(B)(2)(b) [now Rule 8.5(b)(2)(ii).]" See also, N.Y. State 911; N.Y. State 889.

13. The second question under Rule 8.5(b) is where the lawyer "principally practices." In N.Y. State 1027 (2014), where the lawyer had offices in two different admitting jurisdictions, we noted that the Rules do not contain any guidance on the meaning of "principally practices." To help fill this gap, we set forth various factors that we believe are relevant to determining the jurisdiction in which the lawyer principally practices, including:

> (a) the number of calendar days the lawyer spends working in each jurisdiction; (b) the number of hours the lawyer bills in each jurisdiction; (c) the location of the clients the lawyer serves; (d) the activities the lawyer performs in each jurisdiction (e.g., legal work for clients vs. administrative work for the law firm); and (e) special circumstances (such as a recent move, an extended illness, or a natural disaster). (citing Roy D. Simon, Simon's New York Rules of Professional Conduct Annotated 1915-17 (2014).

We also noted that, given the increase in law practice over the Internet, and the corresponding decrease in the importance of a lawyer's physical location, the jurisdiction in which a lawyer "principally practices" for purposes of Rule 8.5(b)(2)(ii) is becoming less certain.

14. The present inquirer indicates that his practice would be "based" in the U.K., and this is certainly a significant factor. But, ultimately, the determination of "principally practices" is question of fact that is beyond the Committee's jurisdiction to decide.

15. The third question under Rule 8.5(b) is whether the lawyer's practice in the principal practice jurisdiction will have its "predominant effect" in another admitting jurisdiction. For example, if the inquirer principally practiced in the U.K., but most of his clients were in New York, then the choice of law rule would apply the New York rules because the predominant effect of the lawyer's conduct occurred in New York, which is also an admitting jurisdiction. This, too, is a question of fact.

16. In N.Y. State 889, we addressed whether a lawyer admitted to practice law in New York and, therefore, subject to New York's jurisdiction for disciplinary matters may join in the practice of law with an entity in the District of Columbia that has a non-lawyer partner, a technical expert, with whom legal fees are shared, where the majority of the partnership's revenue is derived from matters within D.C., but the firm might occasionally bring cases in New York. We noted that conduct in connection with litigation in New York would be subject to the New York Rules, as provided by Rule 8.5(b)(1) (conduct in connection with a proceeding in a court before which a lawyer has been admitted to practice is ordinarily governed by the ethics rules of "the jurisdiction in which the court sits"). However, we also determined that, as long as undertaking occasional matters in New York did not shift the lawyer's principal practice from D.C. to New York, the formation of the partnership and the distribution of its profits would not constitute "conduct in connection with" the New York proceeding, and thus would be analyzed under Rule 8.5(b)(2).

17. In N.Y. State 911, the inquirer proposed to establish a New York office of an entity formed as a U.K. Alternative Business Structure under the U.K.'s Legal Services Act. We noted that the New York lawyers would be practicing principally in New York, and that the "predominant effect" of their conduct, while practicing law from a New York office on behalf of New York clients, also would be in New York. We therefore concluded that the New York Rules prohibiting sharing legal fees with non-lawyer would apply, even if the lawyers were also licensed in the U.K.

18. The distinctions we made in these prior opinions indicate the importance of determining (i) where a lawyer is "licensed" (or "admitted") to practice, (ii) where the lawyer "principally practices," and (iii) where the "predominant effect" of the lawyer's conduct occurs.

CONCLUSION:

19. For the reasons, and subject to the conditions, stated above, a New York lawyer who practices principally in a foreign country but is not admitted to practice in that country may, without violating the New York Rules of Professional Conduct, (A) engage in lawful conduct that does not require licensing in the foreign country but would constitute the practice of law in New York, and (B) practice in the foreign country in partnership or association with an entity that includes a non-lawyer as a supervisor or owner; provided in each case that such practice is permitted under the laws and rules of the foreign country and the predominant effect of the lawyer's practice is not in New York.

OPINION 1042 (12/11/2014)

TOPIC: Choice of Law, Firm Name, Letterhead, Business Cards, Website

DIGEST: Where a lawyer admitted to the New York bar has applied for admission to the District of Columbia bar, and, while such application is pending, will practice from an office located in D.C. under the direct supervision of a member of the D.C. bar in accordance with the applicable D.C. court rule, the lawyer will be deemed to be "licensed to practice" in D.C. for purposes of applying New York Rule 8.5(b) on choice of law for disciplinary purposes. The rules of professional conduct to be applied to such lawyer will depend upon the jurisdiction where the lawyer "principally practices," and whether the conduct of the lawyer will have its "predominant effect" in another jurisdiction where the lawyer is admitted or deemed admitted. Determining which jurisdiction's rules apply to the website, letterhead and business card of the inquirer depends on the same principles.

RULES: 7.1(a), 7.5(d), 8.5(b).

FACTS:

1. The inquirer previously submitted an inquiry asking whether an attorney admitted to practice only in New York may be of counsel to a D.C. law firm that practices under a trade name. In N.Y. State 1023 (2014), the Committee concluded that, under the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"), a lawyer who is admitted solely in New York, where Rule 7.5(b) prohibits lawyers from practicing under trade names, may not be of counsel to an out-of-state firm that is practicing under a trade name.

2. The inquirer subsequently informed us, and we assume for purposes of this opinion, that (i) he has applied for admission to the D.C. bar, (ii) the applicable court rule, D.C. App. Rule 49(c) (8) (the "D.C. Court Rule"), permits a lawyer who is admitted in another jurisdiction and who has submitted an application for admission to the D.C. bar to practice law from a principal office located in D.C. for up to 360 days under the direct supervision of a member of the D.C. bar while the application for admission to the D.C. bar is pending, provided that (A) the District of Columbia Bar member takes responsibility for the quality of the work and for any complaints concerning the services, and (B) the practitioner or the District of Columbia Bar member gives notice to the public of the member's supervision and the practitioner's bar status, and (iii) the lawyer complies with each requirement of the D.C. court rule.

QUESTION:

3. Where a lawyer admitted to practice only in New York has applied for admission to the D.C. bar, and, while such application is pending, will practice from an office located in D.C. under the direct supervision of a member of the D.C. bar in accordance with the applicable D.C. Court Rule, will the rules applicable to the lawyer's conduct be those of New York or D.C.?

4. What rules will govern disclosures about the lawyer's practice made on the website, business cards and stationery of the law firm?

OPINION:

5. Rule 8.5 provides as follows:

> (a) A lawyer admitted to practice in this state is subject to the disciplinary authority of this state, regardless of where the lawyer's conduct occurs. A lawyer may be subject to the disciplinary authority of both this state and another jurisdiction where the lawyer is admitted for the same conduct.
>
> (b) In any exercise of the disciplinary authority of this state, the Rules of Professional Conduct to be applied shall be as follows:
> > (1) For conduct in connection with a proceeding in a court before which a lawyer has been admitted to practice (either generally or for purposes of that proceeding), the rules to be applied shall be the rules of the jurisdiction in which the court sits, unless the rules of the court provide otherwise; and
> > (2) For any other conduct:
> >
> > > (i) If the lawyer is licensed to practice only in this state, the rules to be applied shall be the rules of this state, and
> > > (ii) If the lawyer is licensed to practice in this state and another jurisdiction, the rules to be applied shall be the rules of the admitting jurisdiction in which the lawyer principally practices; provided, however, that if particular conduct clearly has its predominant effect in another jurisdiction in which the lawyer is licensed to practice, the rules of that jurisdiction shall be applied to that conduct.

6. In N.Y. State 1023, we concluded that the inquirer was admitted only in New York and that the lawyer was therefore subject only to New York's disciplinary authority under Rule 8.5(b)(1). The question raised in the inquirer's follow-up inquiry is whether the inquirer may be deemed to be "licensed to practice" in D.C. as well, in which case Rule 8.5(b)(2) will apply. Rule 8.5(b)(2)(ii) by its terms states that, in the exercise of the disciplinary authority of New York, the rules of another admitting jurisdiction will be applied to the lawyer's conduct if (a) the lawyer is "licensed to practice" both in New York and in another jurisdiction, (b) the lawyer "principally practices" in the other jurisdiction, and (c) the lawyer's conduct does not clearly have its "predominant effect" in another jurisdiction in which the lawyer is licensed.

Being "Licensed to Practice" in Another Jurisdiction

7. With respect to the first of these three tests, in N.Y. State 815 (2007), we determined that, if a New York lawyer is permitted to engage in conduct in a foreign jurisdiction without being formally admitted in the foreign jurisdiction, even though such conduct would constitute the practice of law in New York, the lawyer should be deemed to be "licensed to practice" in the foreign jurisdiction. We explained:

> With respect to DR 1-105(B)(2)(b), it is the opinion of the Committee that "licensed to practice" includes not only formal licensing procedures like those required by the states in the United States, but also less formal procedures that authorize a lawyer to undertake activities in a foreign jurisdiction that would constitute the practice of law if they were undertaken in the United States. So long as the activities are lawful in the jurisdiction in which they are performed, it is our view that a lawyer undertaking such activities is "licensed to practice" in that jurisdiction, and that jurisdiction is an "admitting jurisdiction" for purposes of DR 1-105(B)(2)(b).

8. Although N.Y. State 815 interpreted DR 1-105(b)(2)(b) under the former Code of Professional Responsibility, the analysis employed in N.Y. State 815 is still applicable under the instant facts because Rule 8.5(b)(2)(ii) is identical to its predecessor DR 1-105(B)(2)(b). See also N.Y. State 1041 (2014) (interpreting the Rules).

9. Assuming for purposes of this opinion that the inquirer's proposed practice complies with the D.C. Court Rule, then such practice would constitute being "licensed to practice" in another jurisdiction for purposes of New York's Rule 8.5, and D.C. would be an "admitting jurisdiction" for purposes of Rule 8.5(b)(2).

Whether the Lawyer "Principally Practices" in Another Jurisdiction

10. If a lawyer is deemed admitted in a second jurisdiction, it is still necessary under Rule 8.5 to determine the admitting jurisdiction in which the lawyer "principally practices." In N.Y. State 1027 (2014), the inquirer was licensed in both New York and D.C. and had offices in both jurisdictions. We noted there that neither the text of Rule 8.5 nor its Comments provide any guidelines for determining where a lawyer principally practices, and we set forth various factors that we believe are relevant to determining the jurisdiction in which the lawyer principally practices, including:

> (a) the number of calendar days the lawyer spends working in each jurisdiction; (b) the number of hours the lawyer bills in each jurisdiction; (c) the location of the clients the lawyer serves; (d) the activities the lawyer performs in each jurisdiction (e.g., legal work for clients vs. administrative work for the law firm); and (e) special circumstances (such as a recent move, an extended illness, or a natural disaster). (citing Roy D. Simon, Simon's New York Rules of Professional Conduct Annotated 1915-17 (2014).

We also noted that, given the increase in law practice over the Internet, and the corresponding decrease in the importance of a lawyer's physical location, the jurisdiction in which a lawyer "principally practices" for purposes of Rule 8.5(b)(2)(ii) is becoming less certain. Thus it is important to consider a lawyer's significant contacts with all jurisdictions, not solely the jurisdiction in which the lawyer is most often physically present.[92] Ultimately, this determination is one of fact that is beyond the jurisdiction of this Committee.

Whether Lawyer's Conduct has its "Predominant Effect" in Another Jurisdiction

11. Under Rule 8.5(b)(2)(ii), even if the lawyer principally practices in a particular admitting jurisdiction, there is an exception to the usual choice of law rule if the conduct of the lawyer would have its "predominant effect" in a different admitting jurisdiction. For example, if the inquirer principally practiced in D.C., but most of his clients were in New York, then the choice of law rule would apply the New York Rules (absent some countervailing factor) because the predominant effect of the lawyer's conduct would occur in New York, which is also an admitting jurisdiction. Determining where the predominant effect occurs, however, is also a question of fact that is beyond the jurisdiction of this Committee. Here, the inquirer has told us that the firm will not advertise in New York, which may make it more likely that the conduct of the lawyer's practice will not have its predominant effect in New York.

12. Comment [5] of Rule 8.5 states:

> When a lawyer is licensed to practice in New York and another jurisdiction and the lawyer's conduct involves significant contacts with more than one jurisdiction, it may not be clear whether the predominant effect of the lawyer's conduct will occur in an admitting jurisdiction other than the one in which the lawyer principally practices. For conduct governed by paragraph (b)(2), as long as the lawyer's conduct conforms to the rules of the jurisdiction in which the lawyer principally practices, the lawyer should not be subject to discipline unless the predominant effect of the lawyer's conduct will clearly occur in another admitting jurisdiction.

13. In contrast, in N.Y. State 815, the Committee concluded that "[i]f the lawyer principally practices in that [foreign/non-New York] jurisdiction and the particular conduct does not clearly have its predominant effect in New York, then under DR 1-105(B)(2)(b), the rules of the foreign jurisdiction apply."

14. We have previously addressed a choice-of-law question involving a trade name. In N.Y. State 861 (2011), the Committee considered whether a lawyer who is admitted both in New York and another jurisdiction that permits a law firm to practice under a trade name, and who principally practices in the other jurisdiction, may be of counsel to a firm with a trade name, even though the lawyer could not do so in New York. The committee held that the lawyer could ethically do so. In reaching its conclusion, the committee analyzed Rule 8.5(b)(2)(ii) and concluded that "[b]ecause the conduct – practicing with a firm that uses a trade name – principally occurred in the other jurisdiction, the applicable ethical rules would be those of the other jurisdiction." See also N.Y. State 889 (2011) (a lawyer admitted in New York who principally practices in D.C., which allows partnership with a non-lawyer, may conduct New York litigation even if the D.C. partnership includes a non-lawyer who would benefit from the resulting fees, because the governing ethical provisions would be those of D.C.).

92 We understand that the inquirer in this case teaches law but is not formally admitted to practice in yet a third jurisdiction (neither New York nor D.C.), and that inquirer may perform some client work in that jurisdiction. If the work performed in that jurisdiction would not require formal admission in that jurisdiction (e.g., if the work is authorized by some variant of ABA Model Rule 5.5(b), which governs temporary practice by out-of-state lawyers), then that jurisdiction could be deemed to be a third admitting jurisdiction. The existence of a third jurisdiction may complicate the determination of where the lawyer principally practices.

Disclosures on the Website, Business Cards and Stationery of the Law Firm

15. The inquirer also asks whether anything other than the fact he is practicing law in D.C. under the D.C. Court Rule should be disclosed on the firm's website and letterhead and on the lawyer's business cards. Such disclosures are covered by Rule 7.1 and by Rule 7.5(d). Specifically, New York Rule 7.5(d) requires that a law firm's letterhead listing the names of lawyers in the firm "must make clear the jurisdictional limitations" on lawyers not licensed to practice in all of the jurisdictions listed on the letterhead. See generally N.Y. State 704 (1997). Whether the New York rules or the rules of another admitting jurisdiction will apply to the website, letterhead and business card of the inquirer depends on the same principles discussed above in connection with the choice of law for other purposes.

CONCLUSION:

16. Where a lawyer admitted to the New York bar has applied for admission to the D.C. bar, and, while such application is pending, will practice from an office located in D.C. under the direct supervision of a member of the D.C. bar in accordance with the applicable D.C. Court Rule, the lawyer will be deemed to "licensed to practice" in D.C. for purposes of New York Rule 8.5(b). The rules to be applied to such lawyer will also depend upon the jurisdiction where the lawyer "principally practices," and whether the conduct of the lawyer will have its "predominant effect" in another jurisdiction where the lawyer is licensed or deemed to be licensed. Determining which jurisdiction's rules apply to the website, letterhead and business card of the inquirer depends on the same principles.

OPINION 1043 (01/08/2015)

TOPIC: Lawyer's Receipt of Referral Fee from a Real Estate Broker

DIGEST: A lawyer may not accept, as a referral fee, a portion of a real estate broker's commission in lieu of charging a fee to the lawyer's client.

RULES: 1.7(a)

FACTS:

1. A lawyer represented an estate in the sale of real property through a real estate broker the lawyer had recommended to the executors of the estate. The broker has offered to pay the lawyer a referral fee of 25% of the broker's commission, which the lawyer proposes to accept in lieu of the lawyer charging legal fees to the estate for services rendered in the real estate transaction.

QUESTION:

2. May a lawyer accept a referral fee from a real estate broker whom the lawyer recommended for a real property transaction in lieu of charging the lawyer's client for legal fees the lawyer would otherwise charge for legal services on the real estate transaction?

OPINION:

3. We have long and consistently stated that a lawyer may not act as a lawyer and a broker in the same real estate transaction, with or without client consent, and whether or not the lawyer charges for legal services. See, e.g., N.Y. State 916 (2012); N.Y. State 493 (1978); N.Y. State 340 (1974); N.Y. State 208 (1971). In N.Y. State 916, we explained: "The rationale of [our earlier] opinions is that the broker's personal and financial interest in closing the transaction interferes with the lawyer's ability to render independent legal advice with respect to the transaction consistent with the principles now embodied in Rule of Professional Conduct 1.7(a). Otherwise put, the problem primarily stems not from the fee the lawyer receives from rendering purely legal advice, but from the separate and independent financial interest of the lawyer/broker arising from compensation for the non-legal services."

4. This rationale applies as long as the lawyer has a financial interest in the real estate broker's commission, whether or not the lawyer is acting as a broker. The disabling conflict that these opinions identify is a lawyer's pecuniary interest in the broker's success and attendant commission, which irredeemably interferes with the lawyer's distinct obligation to exercise independent professional judgment on the client's behalf. That the estate beneficiaries may benefit from the arrangement does not remedy this circumstance, any more than a lawyer/broker's waiving a legal fee, which is also of benefit to the client, can do so. Our conclusion is the same whether the broker's offer of compensation was made before or after the completion of the transaction.

CONCLUSION:

6. A lawyer may not accept a referral fee consisting of a portion of a real estate broker's commission in place of charging a fee to the lawyer's client, even with a client's informed consent. (32-14)

OPINION 1044 (01/08/2015)

TOPIC: Attorney Payment of Expense of Litigation

DIGEST: Whether an attorney may advance the client's taxi and other transportation costs to and from (i) an independent medical examination under the New York no-fault insurance law or (ii) other appointments with doctors or for other medical treatments, depends on whether the cost qualifies as an expense of the litigation. Transportation to an IME clearly qualifies as such an expense, since an IME is a condition to receiving no-fault payments. Whether the cost of transportation to and from other appointments with doctors or for medical treatment are expenses of litigation depends on whether they are necessary to diagnose, assess or demonstrate the client's condition, or the client's efforts to treat that condition, for litigation purposes. We believe many such costs will qualify as expenses of litigation. However, some costs of routine medical care necessary to treat the client's injuries may not so qualify. The determination of what is a necessary expense of litigation is a question of fact that is beyond our jurisdiction to determine. If a client is indigent or pro bono, the attorney may pay qualifying expenses without seeking reimbursement.

RULES: 1.8 (a) & (e)

FACTS:

1. The inquiring attorney represents a client in a matter covered by no-fault insurance. Once a claim for coverage is filed with the insurance carrier, the carrier may demand that the client-claimant see a doctor chosen by the insurance company for an Independent Medical Examination or "IME". Failure to attend the IME may result in a cut-off or reduction in benefits. The client also may have appointments with treating physicians or for other medical treatments. In either case, the client will incur taxi and other transportation costs to and from appointments with doctors or for other medical treatments. These transportation costs are included in the client's claim under the no-fault law for "basic economic loss" arising out of the accident, up to $25 per day. The client is indigent and unable to pay these transportation expenses and has asked the inquirer to advance them.

QUESTION:

2. May the inquiring attorney advance the client's taxi and other transportation costs to and from (i) the IME, and (ii) appointments with doctors or for other medical treatments, either subject to repayment out of the no-fault insurance, or on a contingent basis?

OPINION:

3. Rule 1.8(e) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") provides:

> (e) While representing a client in connection with contemplated or pending litigation, a lawyer shall not advance or guarantee financial assistance to the client, except that:
> > (1) a lawyer may advance court costs and expenses of litigation, the repayment of which may be contingent on the outcome of the matter;

> (2) a lawyer representing an indigent or pro bono client may pay court costs and expenses of litigation on behalf of the client . . . .

4. As stated in Comment [9B] to Rule 1.8, paragraph (e) limits permitted financial assistance to court costs and expenses directly related to litigation. Comment [9B], however, cautions that permitted expenses do not include "living or medical expenses" other than those listed in Comment 9B. Comment [10] provides the rationale for this Rule:

> [10] Lawyers may not subsidize lawsuits or administrative proceedings brought on behalf of their clients, including making or guaranteeing loans to their clients for living expenses, because to do so would encourage clients to pursue lawsuits that might not otherwise be brought and because such assistance gives lawyers too great a financial stake in the litigation. These dangers do not warrant a prohibition against a lawyer lending a client money for court costs and litigation expenses, including the expenses of medical examination and testing and the costs of obtaining and presenting evidence, because these advances are virtually indistinguishable from contingent fee arrangements and help insure access to the courts. Similarly, an exception is warranted permitting lawyers representing indigent or pro bono clients to pay court costs and litigation expenses whether or not these funds will be repaid.

5. Assuming that the representation involves a pending or contemplated litigation,[1] the issue under Rule 1.8(e)(1) is whether the transportation expenses constitute "expenses of litigation." As examples of permitted litigation expenses that a lawyer may advance, Comment [9B] to Rule 1.8 lists "expenses of investigation, medical diagnostic work connected with the matter under litigation and treatment necessary for the diagnosis, and the costs of obtaining and presenting evidence." Professor Simon indicates that "expenses of litigation" would include such items as fees of a private investigator, the lawyer's travel expenses to visit witnesses or attend depositions, long distance phone bills, costs of clandestine videos and any other expenses that a lawyer or lawyer's agents incur while investigating the facts of the case. R. Simon, Simon's New York Rules of Professional Conduct Annotated 484 (2014 ed.).

6. The cost of the client's transportation to and from the IME is clearly an expense of the litigation, since it is a condition to receiving no-fault payments. Without it, the goal of the proceeding is unlikely to be met. With respect to transportation to other doctors or medical treatment, whether these costs are expenses of litigation depends on whether they are necessary to diagnose, assess or demonstrate the client's condition, or the client's efforts to treat that condition, for litigation purposes. For example, if the doctor or service provider will be testifying about the extent of the client's injuries, or, if the client otherwise cannot afford to travel to treatment and if failure to obtain treatment may be used by the insurer to minimize the extent of the client's injuries, then such costs certainly would qualify as costs of litigation. They are essentially "costs of obtaining . . . evidence" of the fact that the client requires and is obtaining ongoing medical treatment because of the injury. We believe many such expenses would qualify.

1 If there were no contemplated or pending litigation, Rule 1.8(e) would not by its terms apply. The lawyer could make a gift of the travel expenses. If the lawyer advanced the expenses, the financial arrangement would be subject to the provisions of Rule 1.8(a) on lawyer-client business transactions.

7. However, some costs of routine medical care necessary to treat the client's injuries may not qualify as costs of litigation, and the lawyer would not be authorized to pay them under Rule 1.8(e). The dividing line between what is and is not a necessary cost of litigation is a question of fact that is beyond our jurisdiction to determine.

8. Under Rule 1.8(e), the lawyer may advance permitted transportation costs, contingent on the outcome of the matter. In addition, if the client is indigent or represented on a pro bono basis, the lawyer may pay such costs. See Comment [9B] to Rule 1.8(e) (quoted above), as well as N.Y. State 852 (2011) and N.Y. State 840 (2010). In N.Y. State 786 (2005), interpreting the predecessor to Rule 1.8(e) in the Code of Professional Responsibility, we noted that the Code contained no definition of "indigent," but that New York courts have defined the term as "destitute of property or means of comfortable subsistence; needy; poor; in want; necessitous," (citing Healy v. Healy, 99 N.Y.S.2d 874, 877 (Sup. Ct. Kings County 1950). We note that Comment [3] to Rule 6.1 now contains a definition of "poor person" in the context of pro bono representation.[2] Such a person would in our opinion be "indigent" under Rule 1.8(e).

CONCLUSION:

9. Whether an attorney may advance the client's taxi and other transportation costs to and from (i) an independent medical examination under the New York no-fault insurance law or (ii) other appointments with doctors or for other medical treatments, depends on whether the cost qualifies as an expense of the litigation. Transportation to an IME clearly qualifies as such an expense, since an IME is a condition to receiving no-fault payments. Whether transportation to other appointments with doctors or for medical treatment are "expenses of litigation" depends on whether they are necessary to diagnose, assess or demonstrate the client's condition or the client's efforts to treat that condition, for litigation purposes. We believe many such expenses would qualify as expenses of litigation. However, some costs of routine medical care necessary to treat the client's injuries may not so qualify. The determination of what is a necessary expense of litigation is a question of fact that is beyond our jurisdiction to determine. If a client is indigent or pro bono, the attorney may pay qualifying expenses without seeking reimbursement.

(33-14)

2 "Poor persons" under Rule 6.1 include both individuals who qualify for participation in programs funded by the Legal Services Corporation and individuals whose incomes and financial resources are slightly above the guidelines utilized by Legal Services Corporation programs but nevertheless cannot afford counsel. The Legal Services Corporation services those with annual income at or below 125% of the federal poverty guidelines, which, in 2014, were $14,588 for an individual and $29,813 for a family of four.

OPINION 1045 (01/08/2015)

TOPIC: Lawyer as witness

DIGEST: In-house counsel for a corporation may submit to an interview with an administrative agency that is investigating alleged wrongdoing by the client, where the facts to be disclosed by the lawyer will not constitute confidential information. However, if the agency's investigation results in a proceeding before a tribunal, and if the lawyer is likely to be a witness on a significant issue of fact, the lawyer may not also act as an advocate before the tribunal in such proceeding, absent an exception to the advocate-witness rule.

RULES: 1.0(w), 1.1(c), 1.6(a), 3.7(a)

FACTS:

1. In-house counsel for a corporation has been asked to submit voluntarily to an interview with an administrative agency that is investigating a charge by a third party of wrongdoing by the client. The interview will involve what occurred at a meeting between the corporation and the third party, at which the lawyer was a participant. The lawyer's interview may help to avert a formal complaint against the client, and therefore may be beneficial to the client. The corporation has no objection to its lawyer appearing for such interview. The facts the lawyer would discuss during the interview are not subject to the attorney-client privilege and do not otherwise constitute confidential information of the client (e.g. will not be embarrassing or detrimental to the client and will not reveal information the client has requested be kept confidential). If, after its investigation, the agency believes the charge against the client has merit, it could file charges, in which case a hearing would be held before a tribunal.

QUESTION:

2. May in-house counsel for a corporation voluntarily submit to an interview with an administrative agency that is investigating a charge by a third party of wrongdoing by the client, where the facts disclosed by the lawyer will not constitute confidential information?

OPINION:

3. Rule 1.6 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") prohibits a lawyer from knowingly revealing confidential information (as defined in that Rule) unless the client gives informed consent, as defined in Rule 1.0(j). Confidential information includes information gained during the representation that (a) is protected by the attorney-client privilege, (b) is likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed, or (c) the client has requested be kept confidential. We have been told, and we assume for purposes of this opinion, that the information the lawyer would relate to the agency concerns the conduct of the client at a meeting at which the adversary was present (and thus would not be protected by the attorney-client privilege), and that the information related by the lawyer will not be embarrassing or detrimental to the client, and that the client has not requested that it be kept confidential. Consequently, we see no issue under Rule 1.6. If the information might be embarrassing or detrimental to the client, or if the client had requested that the lawyer not disclose it, the lawyer could not voluntarily disclose it without the informed consent of the client.

4. Rule 3.7(a) prohibits a lawyer from acting as an advocate before a "tribunal" in a matter in which the lawyer is likely to be a witness on a significant issue of fact. The term "tribunal" is defined in the Rules to include not only a court or arbitrator but also an administrative agency "acting in an adjudicative capacity," meaning that a neutral official, after the presentation of evidence or legal argument by a party or parties, will render a legal judgment directly affecting a party's interests in a particular matter. Rule 1.0(w).

5. Although the interview here is with an administrative agency, the agency at this stage is exercising its investigative functions, rather than acting in an "adjudicative capacity." Consequently, Rule 3.7(a) is not currently implicated.

6. If the agency determines to bring a formal complaint against the client following the interview, then the agency will be acting in its "adjudicative capacity." At that point, if the lawyer is "likely" to be a witness on a significant issue of fact, Rule 3.7(c) will come into play, and the lawyer will not be able to act "as advocate before" the tribunal unless one of the exceptions in Rule 3.7(a) applies. See N.Y. State 642 (1993) (lawyer may not serve as both lawyer for a union and as a witness in an arbitration concerning a collective bargaining agreement the lawyer negotiated).[3]

7. If the agency determines to bring charges against the client, the lawyer will need to determine if he is likely to be a witness on a significant issue of fact. This requires evaluating other available testimony. As the court stated in MacArthur v. Bank of New York, 524 F. Supp. 1205, 1208 (S.D.N.Y. 1981), "An additional corroborative witness would almost always be of some use to a party, but might nevertheless be essentially cumulative. At some point, the utility of additional corroboration is de minimus [sic] and does not require the attorney's disqualification." In that case, the court found that an independent lawyer would likely call the lawyer, both to supply his own account of the events in question (even if corroborative) and to prevent the jury from speculating about his absence. It therefore found the lawyer's testimony would be far from cumulative, because his role was pivotal, and his conduct had been brought into question by the adversary. Determining whether the lawyer is likely to be a witness on a significant issue of fact is a factual question beyond the jurisdiction of this Committee.

8. If the lawyer is likely to be a witness on a significant issue of fact, Rule 3.7(a) does not authorize the lawyer to choose whether to be a lawyer or a witness. The lawyer must not act as an advocate before the tribunal. The rule applies whether the lawyer would be called as a witness by the lawyer's client or the client's adversary, and whether or not the lawyer's testimony would be favorable to the client. Under the former Code of Professional Responsibility, EC 5-10 elaborated on the predecessor to Rule 3.7 as follows: "Where the question [of whether to be a witness or an advocate] arises, doubts should be resolved in favor of the lawyer testifying and against the lawyer's becoming or continuing as an advocate." See MacArthur v. Bank of New York, supra ("[T]he stricture is mandatory: the party cannot choose between the attorney's testimony and his representation. The rule embodies a conclusive preference for testimony. . . . A party can be represented by other attorneys, but cannot obtain substitute testimony for a counsel's relevant, personal knowledge.") This obligation is not eliminated by client consent. Id. at 1209. Although the language of EC 5-10 was not carried over into the comments to Rule 3.7, we believe it is implicit in the language of the rule itself.

3 While the lawyer could not appear before the tribunal as counsel in the matter, he or she could participate in the case outside the courtroom, for example, by directing outside counsel. Rule 3.7(a) (lawyer shall not act as advocate before a tribunal); see ABA Inf. 89-1529 (1989). But that is not the issue at this stage.

9. Similarly, Rule 1.1(c) prohibits a lawyer from intentionally prejudicing or damaging the client during the course of the representation, except as permitted or required by the Rules. Such prejudice might arise if the lawyer withheld material testimony on a significant issue of fact, either in the investigatory stage of the matter or at a later hearing before a tribunal.

CONCLUSION:

10. In-house counsel for a corporation may submit to an interview with an administrative agency that is investigating alleged wrongdoing by the client, where the facts to be disclosed by the lawyer will not constitute confidential information. However, if the agency's investigation results in a proceeding before a tribunal, and if the lawyer is likely to be a witness on a significant issue of fact, the lawyer could not also act as an advocate before the tribunal in such proceeding, absent an exception to the advocate-witness rule.

OPINION 1046 (01/08/2015)

TOPIC: Representing incapacitated client; conflict of interest

DIGEST: A lawyer may accept court appointments to serve as Court Evaluator or Guardian for an Alleged Incapacitated Person in a guardianship proceeding under the Mental Hygiene Law for an individual who is a resident of a health care facility represented by the law firm in matters unrelated to AIP. The lawyer does not represent the AIP as counsel and Rule 1.7(a) is not implicated. Whether a lawyer may accept a court appointment to serve as counsel for the AIP in a guardianship proceeding in which the petitioner is the health care facility depends on (1) whether the interests of the AIP and the health care facility are "differing interests" and whether the lawyer has a disabling personal interest, which are questions of fact beyond the jurisdiction of this Committee, and (2) whether the lawyer can obtain consent to the potential conflict, which requires a careful assessment by the lawyer of whether the AIP is capable of giving informed consent.

RULES: 1.0(f), 1.7(a) & (b), 1.14(a)

FACTS:

1. The inquiring law firm or its lawyers receive court appointments under the Mental Hygiene Law to serve as Court Evaluator or Guardian to an Alleged Incapacitated Person ("AIP") or Counsel to an AIP. These appointments are necessary when there is no family member or close associate willing to serve on behalf of the AIP.

2. Often, it is the residential care facility (the "Care Facility") where the AIP resides that is the petitioner in the proceedings, because there are no family members or close associates to act as petitioner.

3. The duties of a Court Evaluator are to interview the AIP and determine whether the AIP understands English, to explain the nature and possible consequences of the proceeding and the rights of the AIP, to determine whether the AIP wishes legal counsel of his or her own choice, to interview the petitioner or others familiar with the AIP's condition, affairs and situation, to determine whether sufficient resources are available to provide for the personal needs or property management of the AIP without the appointment of a guardian, and to make a written report and recommendation to the court.

4. The role of a Guardian is to manage the property and provide for the personal needs of the AIP, if the court determines (as a result of the guardianship petition) that the AIP cannot manage his or her own personal needs and either (i) the AIP agrees to the appointment, or (ii) the court determines that the AIP is incapacitated as defined in section 81.02(b) of the Mental Hygiene Law. Where the AIP does not have sufficient assets to manage his or her personal needs, the Guardian will apply for Medicaid to help to defray the costs of the Care Facility.

5. The role of independent counsel to the AIP is to represent the interests of the AIP where (i) the AIP has requested counsel, (ii) the AIP wishes to contest the petition or does not consent to the authority requested in the petition to move the AIP from where the AIP presently resides to a nursing home or other residential care facility, or (iii) the court determines that there is a potential conflict between the court evaluator's role and the advocacy needs of the AIP.

6. The inquiring law firm also represents residential care facilities in various matters involving Medicaid benefits, guardianship, litigation and collection. However, the law firm does not represent the Care Facility in any matter in which it has accepted an appointment to serve on behalf of a resident. Such work is handled by other law firms that regularly represent the Care Facility.

QUESTION:

7. May lawyers in a firm accept court appointments to serve as Court Evaluator, Guardian or Counsel to an Alleged Incapacitated Person in a proceeding under the Mental Hygiene Law for an individual who is a resident of a health care facility if their law firm simultaneously represents the health care facility in matters unrelated to the AIP?

OPINION:

8. The answer to the question depends upon whether there is a conflict of interest under Rule 1.7. Rule 1.7(a) states, in part, "a lawyer shall not represent a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that either: (1) the representation will involve the lawyer in representing differing interests; or (2) there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests." Thus the answer to the question turns on (a) whether the lawyer or others in the lawyer's firm represent both the AIP and the Care Facility, and (b) whether the interests of the AIP and the Care Facility are "differing interests" or there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the AIP would be adversely affected by the lawyer's personal interest in remaining in the good graces of the Care Facility.

9. Rule 1.0(f) defines "differing interests" as including "every interest that will adversely affect either the judgment or the loyalty of a lawyer to a client, whether it be a conflicting, inconsistent, diverse, or other interest." Comment [8] under Rule 1.7 explains:

> Differing interests exist if there is a significant risk that a lawyer's exercise of professional judgment in considering, recommending or carrying out an appropriate course of action for the client will be adversely affected or the representation would otherwise be materially limited by the lawyer's other responsibilities or interests. . . . The mere possibility of subsequent harm does not itself require disclosure and consent. The critical questions are the likelihood that a difference in interests will eventuate and, if it does, whether it will adversely affect the lawyer's professional judgment in considering alternatives or foreclose courses of action that reasonably should be pursued on behalf of a client.

Court Evaluator for an AIP

10. The responsibilities of a Court Evaluator differ from those of counsel to an alleged incapacitated person. The person acting as court evaluator is required to make inquiry into an AIP's assets, mental state and ability to handle his or her affairs, and then to report the findings to the court, so that the court may decide whether a guardian is needed and who that guardian should be. A Court Evaluator need not be a lawyer.

11. An appointment by a court to serve as a Court Evaluator under the Mental Hygiene Law does not create a lawyer-client relationship. Consequently, the limitations of Rule 1.7(a)(1) do not apply to a lawyer serving in such role,[4] because the lawyer does not "represent" the AIP.

Guardian for an AIP

12. The responsibilities of a Guardian do not begin until the court determines a Guardian should be appointed. For a general description of guardianship proceedings, see N.Y. State 986 (2013). As in the case of a Court Evaluator, a Guardian does not have an attorney-client relationship with the AIP. Consequently, the limitations Rule 1.7(a)(1) do not apply to a lawyer serving in such role.

Counsel for an AIP

13. Unlike a Court Evaluator or a Guardian for an AIP, Counsel for an AIP does have an attorney-client relationship with the AIP. Consequently, it is important to determine whether the AIP and Care Facility have "differing interests" in the guardianship proceedings under Rule 1.7(a)(1) and whether the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the AIP will be adversely affected by the lawyer's personal interests in remaining in the good graces of his or her firm's regular client, the Care Facility, under Rule 1.7(a)(2). It is irrelevant that the lawyer does not represent the AIP and the Care Facility in the same matter. See Rule 1.7, Comment [6] ("a lawyer may not advocate on one matter against another client that the lawyer represents in some other matter, even when the matters are wholly unrelated.")

Differing interests

14. Guardianship proceedings are not typical adversarial court proceedings and the interests of the AIP and the Care Facility are not always differing. The guardianship proceeding often is commenced by the Care Facility for the purpose of providing financial assistance to the AIP to remain in the Care Facility. These proceedings are rarely contested. Consequently, although the interests of the petitioner in a guardianship proceeding theoretically conflict with those of the AIP, we have concluded that, where the AIP does not oppose the guardianship, or is incapacitated and cannot express an opinion, the lawyer does not represent such a differing interest. See N.Y. State 986 (2013) (lawyer may serve as the petitioner), N.Y. State 746 (2001) (same). On the other hand, if the AIP has requested independent counsel, or if the court has appointed counsel for the AIP after determining that there is a potential conflict between the court evaluator's role and the advocacy needs of the AIP, then it is quite possible there are more than theoretically differing interests. Because determining whether the interests of the AIP and the Care Facility are "differing interests" raises questions of fact, such determination is beyond the jurisdiction of this Committee.

4 In the role of Court Evaluator or Guardian, a lawyer will receive information of a sensitive nature from the individual. This information is not "confidential information" covered by Rule 1.6(a) because it is not received from a client, although the Mental Hygiene Law or other law may create other responsibilities of confidentiality.

The Lawyer's Personal Financial Interests

15. Where the lawyer or the lawyer's firm have a continuing relationship with the Care Facility that is the petitioner in a guardianship proceeding, or into which a Guardian might place the AIP, the relationship between the law firm and the Care Facility could adversely affect the independent professional judgment of the lawyer in representing the AIP, thus creating a personal interest conflict for the lawyer.

Consent to Conflicts of Interest

16. If the court appointment as counsel for the AIP creates a differing interest conflict or a personal interest conflict under Rule 1.7(a), the next step is to determine whether the conflict is consentable under Rule 1.7(b), and, if so, whether the lawyer may obtain informed consent from both the Care Facility and the AIP.

17. The process of obtaining consent to a conflict under Rule 1.7(a) requires a lawyer to satisfy the four subparagraphs of Rule 1.7(b). Specifically, the lawyer must determine that (i) he or she can provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client, (ii) the representation is not prohibited by law, and (iii) the representation does not involve the assertion of a claim by the Care Facility against the AIP (or vice versa). Rule 1.7(b)(1), (2) and (3). Finally, each client must give "informed consent, confirmed in writing." Rule 1.7(b)(4). In N.Y. State 986, we applied Rule 1.7(b)(1)-(3), concluding that the inquirer could not represent both the AIP and his sister, who wished to be appointed guardian, because their positions as to the AIP's living arrangements were inconsistent. However, we did not reach the issue of consent.

18. In N.Y. State 836 (2010), we concluded that a conflict analogous to the one here was consentable. There, the lawyer had represented an incapacitated client in connection with the appointment of a guardian (one of the client's adult children). However, the client had subsequently been living independently and no longer needed a guardian. In addition, the guardian was planning to move across the country. Accordingly, the client and the guardian wanted the lawyer to represent them jointly in applying for termination of the guardianship. We noted that the interests of the client and the guardian were potentially differing, although we determined that the lawyer could reasonably believe that the lawyer could provide competent and diligent representation to both parties. Consequently, because the representation would not be adversarial and because the matter would be supervised by the court, we concluded that the conflict was consentable.

19. Before accepting a court appointment to represent the AIP in the proceeding here, the inquirer must obtain the informed consent of both the Care Facility and the AIP. Obtaining consent of the Care Facility ordinarily will not be problematical (even after explaining that the lawyer's obligation is to provide diligent representation to the AIP). However, obtaining informed consent of the AIP is more complicated.

20. In N.Y. State 836 (2010), we discussed the ability of an AIP to give consent. We noted that a lawyer must take special care when obtaining consent from a person who may be, or has been deemed to be, incapacitated and under guardianship. This careful assessment was necessary because, if the client's capacity to make reasoned decisions was so diminished that the client could not give informed consent, then the lawyer could not satisfy the informed consent requirement of Rule 1.7(b)(4). There, however, we concluded that a client may consent to dual representation despite the possible determination of incapacity. We relied on Rule 1.14(a) (which directs the lawyer to maintain a conventional relationship with the client to the extent possible), on the Mental Hygiene Law (which states that an incapacitated person retains all powers and rights except those that are specifically granted to the Guardian), and on our opinion in N.Y. State 746 (2001) (which stated "there is generally no bar to representing a client whose decision making capacity is impaired, but who is capable of making decisions and participating in the representation").

21. Because the inquirer needs to obtain consent before accepting a court appointment to act as counsel to an AIP where the lawyer's firm also represents the Care Facility in other matters, the lawyer should make sure that the court is aware that the firm represents the Care Facility in unrelated matters, and that the lawyer will need to obtain consent to a potential conflict from both the Care Facility and the AIP before proceeding.

CONCLUSION:

A lawyer may accept court appointments to serve as Court Evaluator or Guardian for an Alleged Incapacitated Person in a guardianship proceeding under the Mental Hygiene Law for an individual who is a resident of a health care facility represented by the law firm in matters unrelated to AIP. The lawyer does not represent the AIP as counsel and Rule 1.7(a) is not implicated. Whether a lawyer may accept a court appointment to serve as counsel for the AIP in a guardianship proceeding in which the petitioner is the health care facility depends on (1) whether the interests of the AIP and the health care facility are "differing interests" and whether the lawyer has a disabling personal interest, which are questions of fact beyond the jurisdiction of this Committee, and (2) whether the lawyer can obtain consent to the potential conflict, which requires a careful assessment by the lawyer of whether the AIP is capable of giving informed consent.

OPINION 1047 (02/17/2015)

TOPIC: Government Lawyer; No contact rule

DIGEST: A government lawyer whose duties include investigation of fraud is subject to Rule 4.2. Whether the government lawyer may interview a party to a proceeding before the agency about the conduct of his or her private lawyer in that proceeding as part of an investigation of the private lawyer depends on whether the investigation is part of a separate matter and, if so, whether the government lawyer knows that the interviewee is represented by counsel in the separate matter. Even if the matter is the same, or, if it is not the same but the lawyer knows that the interviewee is represented in the separate matter, the government lawyer may interview the private lawyer's clients without the consent of the private lawyer if the contact is "authorized by law." That is a question of law beyond our jurisdiction.

RULES: 1.7, 4.2, 4.3

FACTS:

1. A lawyer for a government agency (the "Government Lawyer") is performing an investigation involving accusations of fraud against a private lawyer (the "Private Lawyer") relating to claims submitted to the agency. The accusation may have been made in a number of different ways: (i) by the Private Lawyer's client; (ii) by one of the agency's administrative law judges; or (iii) by an anonymous tip on the agency's website. In some cases, the accusation will affect only the Private Lawyer, e.g., a claim that the Private Lawyer has left the law firm that is counsel of record, and has fraudulently signed a consent to change attorneys and therefore is not the person entitled to counsel fees. But in other cases the accusation may involve charges that will affect the rights of the Private Lawyer's client (the "Client"), e.g., by reducing the amount to which the Client is entitled or voiding the Client's claim.

2. The Government Lawyer's duties include investigating such accusations. If, as a result of the investigation, the agency believes there has been fraud or a violation of law, the agency will report the violation to the attorney general or another appropriate law enforcement agency. As part of the investigation, the Government Lawyer would like to interview one or more of the Private Lawyer's Clients. Each Client has a pending administrative case before the agency, but the inquirer states they are not targets of the investigation.

3. The agency has the statutory authority to investigate violations of the laws and regulations enforced by the agency. That includes the authority to conduct investigations of possible fraud and other violations of laws and regulations enforced by the agency. Nothing in the statute or regulations specifically authorizes the agency to interview witnesses represented by counsel when that counsel is not present and has not consented to the interview.

QUESTION:

4. May a government lawyer interview the clients of a Private Lawyer alleged to have committed fraud in connection with a proceeding before the government lawyer's agency, without the consent of the Private Lawyer?

OPINION:

5. This inquiry turns on Rule 4.2 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"), known as the "no-contact" rule, which concerns communication with a person represented by counsel. Rule 4.2(a) provides as follows:

> (a) In representing a client, a lawyer shall not communicate or cause another to communicate about the subject of the representation with a party the lawyer knows to be represented by another lawyer in the matter, unless the lawyer has the prior consent of the other lawyer or is authorized to do so by law.

6. Comment [1] to Rule 4.2 explains that the Rule "contributes to the proper functioning of the legal system by protecting a person who has chosen to be represented by a lawyer in a matter against possible overreaching by other lawyers who are participating in the matter, interference by those lawyers with the lawyer-client relationship, and uncounseled disclosure of information relating to the representation."

7. The issues under Rule 4.2 are evident from the language of the Rule. The rule prohibits a lawyer who represents a client in a matter (Lawyer A) from communicating with (1) a "party," (2) who Lawyer A "knows" is "represented by another lawyer" in the matter (Lawyer B), (3) about the subject of Lawyer A's representation, (4) unless Lawyer A has the prior consent of Lawyer B, or (5) Lawyer A is "authorized by law" to engage in the communication without the consent of Lawyer B.

Is the Client a "Party" Within the Meaning of Rule 4.2?

8. To determine the application of Rule 4.2 to this inquiry, we must also determine whether the Client is a "party" in connection with the investigation of the Private Lawyer. A number of federal courts in the Second Circuit interpreting Rule 4.2 or its predecessor in the Code of Professional Responsibility – DR 7-104 – in a criminal context have held that a "party" must be a party to a litigation. See, e.g., In re Chan, 271 F. Supp. 2d 539, 544 (S.D.N.Y. 2003); Grievance Comm. for S. Dist. of New York v. Simels, 48 F.3d 640 (2d Cir. 1995) (criminal defense attorney not subject to discipline for interviewing a cooperating witness who was represented in another matter but was not a "party" to the matter for which he was interviewed; court holds that narrow reading of "party" and "matter" is critical to allow the investigation essential to a defense attorney's preparation for trial.) But see United States v. Hammad, 846 F.2d 854, amended, 858 F.2d 834 (2d Cir. 1988) (court assumes the disciplinary rule would otherwise apply, but determines that the prosecutor was "authorized by law" to employ legitimate investigative techniques, including the use of an informant).

9. As we noted in N.Y. State 735 (2001), the scope and application of the no-contact rule have been hotly debated in the criminal context.[5] However, in the non-criminal context, we have uniformly interpreted the rule to apply to any represented party. Indeed, the legal definition of "party" is much broader than the plaintiff or defendant in pending litigation. See Black's Law Dictionary (9th ed.

5 In N.Y. State 735, we cited Bruce A. Green, A Prosecutor's Communications with Defendants: What Are the Limits?, 24 Crim. L. Bull. 283 (1988). The debate has continued since then. See, e.g., Bruce A. Green, Prosecutors and Professional Regulation, 25 Geo. J. of Legal Ethics 873 (2012) (citing authorities expressing various opinions). See also Roger C. Cramton & Lisa K. Udell, State Ethics Rules and Federal Prosecutors: The Controversies Over the Anti-Contact and Subpoena Rules, 53 U. Pitt. L. Rev. 291, 325 n. 4 (1992).

2009) (a party is "1. One who takes part in a transaction. 2. One by or against whom a lawsuit is brought"); Black's Law Dictionary (4th ed. 1968) (a party is "a person concerned or having or taking part in any affair, matter, transaction, or proceeding, considered individually"). As we said in N.Y. State 904 (2012):

> In the narrowest sense, the term "party" means a plaintiff or defendant (or the equivalent) in pending litigation. But this Committee has never read the term "party" so narrowly. Rather, in civil matters, the definition of "party" as used in Rule 4.2 – and in the definition of "matter" in Rule 1.0(l) – is not limited to formal parties to litigation. In N.Y. State 735 (2001), which addressed "noncriminal matters," we stated that the no-contact rule "applies to one who retains counsel in connection with a dispute even prior to the filing of a lawsuit; and during a civil lawsuit it applies to represented witnesses, potential witnesses and others with an interest or right at stake, although they are not nominal parties to the lawsuit."

A number of other bar associations, interpreting Rule 4.2 or its predecessor in the Code of Professional Responsibility (DR 7-104) also have read the rule as applying absent a pending litigation. See, e.g., Indiana Opin. 2008-02 (2008); Illinois Opin. 04-02 (2005); Utah Opin. 95-05 (1995); ABA Formal Opin. 95-396 (1995).[6] The adoption of the Rules effective in 2009 has not changed our opinion on the scope of the term "party."[7] Consequently, we believe the Client is a "party" within the meaning of Rule 4.2, even if the investigation of the Private Lawyer is a separate matter, and even if the Client is only a witness.

Is the Client Represented in the Matter?

10. Rule 4.2(a) by its terms prohibits a lawyer from communicating about a matter with a party that the lawyer "knows" is represented by another lawyer in the same matter. Comment [2] to the Rule explains that paragraph (a) applies to communications with any party who is "represented by counsel concerning the matter to which the communication relates" (emphasis supplied). Although the Definition Section of the Rules contains a definition of "matter," it does not define the scope of a single matter, but rather lists more than a dozen different types of matter that are included within the term. See Rule 1.0(l). Significantly, the term "matter" is not limited to litigation, but includes an investigation, an application, a contract, a negotiation or "any other representation involving a specific party or parties."

11. The term "matter" is also discussed in the comments to other Rules, and they make clear that the scope of the term is not defined mechanically but is sensitive to the particular facts and context of the inquiry. For example, Rule 1.9(a), the former-client conflict rule, prohibits a lawyer who has represented one client in a matter from representing another person in the same or a substantially related matter. Comment [2] to Rule 1.9 states: "The scope of a 'matter' for purposes of this Rule depends on the facts of a particular situation or transaction. When a lawyer has been directly involved in a specific transaction, subsequent representation of other clients with materially adverse interests in that transaction clearly is prohibited." Rule 1.11(a) prohibits a lawyer who has formerly served as a public officer or employee from thereafter representing a client in connection with a matter in which the lawyer participated personally and substantially as a public officer. Comment [10] to Rule 1.11 provides: "[A] 'matter' may continue in another form. In determining whether two particular matters are the same, the lawyer should consider the extent to which (i) the matters involve the same basic facts, (ii) the matters involve the same or related parties, and (iii) time has elapsed between the matters." See N.Y. State 1029 (2014) (discussing the facts, parties and time tests); N.Y. State 904 (2012) (asking whether representation in the first matter necessarily would include representation in the second matter).

6 Many of the non-New York ethics opinions and court cases arose before the ABA amended Rule 4.2 of the Model Rules of Professional Conduct in 1995 to change the term "party" to "person." While a handful of states, including New York, retained the reference to "party," most changed the term "party" to "person," thus eliminating any argument about the meaning of "party," and making it more likely that future disagreements with law enforcement officers in these states would center on the scope of the "provided by law" exception rather than the scope of the term "party."

7 We noted in N.Y. State 884 (2011) that the Committee had applied the no-contact rule more broadly in the past, but we concluded that Rule 4.2 does not apply to a non-party witness in a criminal matters, citing Grievance Committee for the Southern District of New York v. Simels, 48 F.3d 640 (2d Cir. 1995), while stressing that this conclusion did not extend to civil matters.

12. In N.Y. State 904, we discussed whether two matters were the same, so as to determine whether representation in one demonstrated representation in the other for purposes of Rule 4.2. One was a criminal investigation and the other was a civil suit. Although they involved the same underlying conduct and were inextricably intertwined, we determined they were different matters, because the parties, processes and issues were different. Thus, we have determined that the same underlying conduct is not, on its own, sufficient to constitute the same "matter." Rather the extent of a matter depends on a variety of factors, including whether the two matters involve (i) the same underlying events or alleged actions, (ii) the same or related parties, (iii) the same or related issues (which includes whether the matters involve the same interests that the Client has hired the lawyer to protect and whether the outcome of the second matter can affect the outcome of the first matter), and (iv) whether the matters are ongoing at the same time or close in time.

13. Here, the Government Lawyer knows that the Private Lawyer represents the Client in a claim before the government agency. Whether a communication in connection with the Government Lawyer's investigation (which is going on at the same time as the Client's claim proceeding and involves the same or related parties) involves the same "matter" in which the Government Lawyer knows the Private Lawyer represents the Client will depend on the extent to which the central events and issues of the claim proceeding are the same and on whether the communication may have an effect on the outcome of the claim proceeding.

14. We believe the overlap between the Client's claim before the agency and the Government Lawyer's investigation will often be greater than the overlap we analyzed in N.Y. State 904. If the investigation concerns an allegation of fraud in the prosecution of the Client's claim before the agency, the central facts underlying the claim are also likely to be at the center of the investigation, even if the issues are somewhat different. (For example, the issues in the investigation would include not only whether the facts as presented were true but also the circumstances leading to any misstatement in the application and who participated in that misstatement.) In that case, the investigation would likely constitute the same "matter" as the Client's claim proceeding before the agency, and the Client should be considered represented in the investigation for purposes of Rule 4.2. This is particularly true if the Client's claim is still pending and the investigation may materially affect the amount or validity of the Client's claim or if a prosecutor who receives the results of the investigation may decide to bring charges against the Client, whether or not the Client currently is a "target" of the investigation. In that circumstance, the Client and the Private Lawyer would ordinarily expect the Private Lawyer hired in connection with the Client's claim to protect the Client's interests, at least until the Client retained other counsel to defend the Client against those charges. If, however, the fraud did not involve the Client's claim before the agency, and the investigation cannot affect the outcome of the Client's claim – for example, where the agency is investigating whether the Lawyer fraudulently forged a consent to change of attorney form – then the agency's investigation of the Private Lawyer's conduct and the Client's claim before the agency would be different "matters," in which case representation of the client in one of those matters would not imply representation in the other.

15. Even if the investigation of the Private Lawyer's conduct is a separate matter, there is still a question of whether the Government Lawyer "knows" in some other way that the Client is represented in the second matter. The definition of "knows" requires actual knowledge of the fact in question, although a person's knowledge may be inferred from the circumstances. See Rule 1.0(k). We concluded in N.Y. State 904 that, where two matters are closely related and there is a strong possibility that the lawyer represents the client in both, then the lawyer must ask the client if he or she is represented in the matter, because "when a lawyer has a reasonable basis to believe that a party may be represented by counsel, then the lawyer has a duty of inquiry to ascertain whether that party is in fact represented by counsel in connection with a particular matter." N.Y. State 904 (2012), (citing N.Y. State 768 (2003), which in turn cites N.Y. State 735 (2001), N.Y. State 728 (2000) and N.Y. State 663 (1994)). See also N.Y. State 607 (1990) (when it is unclear whether a party is represented by counsel in a matter, the safest approach is to inform the party that, if he or she is represented by counsel, the communication should be referred to counsel). N.Y. State 904 added that the "necessary extent of such an inquiry will depend on the circumstances of a particular matter."

16. If the investigation into the Private Lawyer's actions is part of the same matter as the Client's claim before the agency, then the Government Lawyer will know that the Client is represented by the Private Lawyer in the matter. If, however, the investigation into the Private Lawyer's conduct involves different facts and issues, and cannot affect the outcome of the Client's claim, then it is a separate matter, and it is likely that Government Lawyer would not "know" that the Client was represented by the Private Lawyer with respect to the investigation. The two are especially likely to be separate matters if the Private Lawyer's Client, rather than a third party, made the allegation of fraud that the Government Lawyer is now investigating. In that case, it would be unlikely that the Private Lawyer also represented a witness in the investigation. Indeed, representing the Client as the complaining witness would probably involve a personal interest conflict for the Private Lawyer under Rule 1.7(a)(2) (A lawyer may not represent a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own personal interests.)

17. If the Client is not represented in connection with the investigation, the Government Lawyer may treat the Client as an unrepresented person with respect to the investigation. See Comment [4] to Rule 4.2 ("This Rule does not prohibit communication with a represented party or person . . . concerning matters outside the representation. For example, the existence of a controversy between a government agency and a private party or person . . . does not prohibit a lawyer for either from communicating with nonlawyer representatives of the other regarding a separate matter."). In doing so, the Government Lawyer must observe the requirements of Rule 4.3 ("Communicating with Unrepresented Persons"), which provides:

> In communicating on behalf of a client with a person who is not represented by counsel, a lawyer shall not state or imply that the lawyer is disinterested. . . . The lawyer shall not give legal advice to an unrepresented person other than the advice to secure counsel if the lawyer knows or reasonably should know that the interests of such person are or have a reasonable possibility of being in conflict with the interests of the client.

Is the Government Lawyer Authorized by Law to Communicate with the Represented Person?

18. Rule 4.2 by its terms authorizes a lawyer to communicate about a matter, even with a party that the lawyer knows is represented by another lawyer in the matter, if the lawyer is "authorized to do so by law."

19. A number of courts have held that contacts between prosecutors or their agents and represented persons in criminal matters are an investigative technique "authorized by law." See United States v. Hammad, 858 F.2d 834 (2d Cir. 1988). In a Report and Recommendation in In re Amgen Inc., 2011 WL 2442047, adopted in its entirety, 2011 WL 2418815 (E.D.N.Y. 2011), U.S. Magistrate Judge James Orenstein points out that neither Hammad nor subsequent cases identify the specific "law" that authorizes the uncounseled contact. Magistrate Judge Orenstein finds that a statute that authorizes prosecutors to enforce the law does not authorize specific investigative techniques, but that the part of Hammad that held a Federal prosecutor's communication with a represented target to be "authorized by law" continued to be good law in the Second Circuit.

20. We have issued only one prior opinion based on the "authorized by law" exception. That opinion involved a statute that specifically authorized a limited form of communication with a party that the lawyer knew to be represented by counsel in the matter. See N.Y. State 894 (2011) (because the Real Property Actions and Proceedings Law provides for process to be personally served upon the respondent, a lawyer may personally serve process on a represented party and ask certain related questions, but may not go beyond service of process to communicate on the subject of the representation without the consent of such party's lawyer). The ABA ethics committee, in ABA 95-396 (1995), approved such service of process and also additional interactions "authorized . . . by law," including "a constitutional provision, statute or court rule, having the force and effect of law, that expressly allows a particular communication to occur in the absence of counsel, such as court rules providing for service of process on a party, or a statute authorizing a government agency to inspect certain regulated premises."

21. Ultimately, what is "authorized by law" is a legal question beyond the jurisdiction of this Committee. Comment [5] to Rule 4.2 states: "Communications authorized by law may . . . include investigative activities of lawyers representing governmental entities . . . prior to the commencement (as defined by law) of criminal or civil enforcement proceedings." (emphasis added). In our opinion, this statement does not constitute a blanket exemption from Rule 4.2 for government lawyers conducting investigations in criminal and non-criminal proceedings, unless the communications are indeed authorized by law.

CONCLUSION:

22. A government lawyer whose duties include investigation of fraud is subject to Rule 4.2. Whether the government lawyer may interview a party to a proceeding before the agency about the conduct of his or her private lawyer in that proceeding as part of an investigation of the private lawyer depends on whether the investigation is part of a separate matter and, if so, whether the government lawyer knows that the interviewee is represented by counsel in the separate matter. Even if the matter is the same, or, if it is not the same but the lawyer knows the interviewee is represented in the separate matter, then the government lawyer may interview the private lawyer's clients without the consent of the private lawyer if the contact is "authorized by law," but that is a question of law beyond our jurisdiction.

OPINION 1048 (03/03/2015)

TOPIC: Waiver of appeal on grounds of ineffective assistance of counsel as part of plea bargain

DIGEST: A defense lawyer may advise the defendant as to a proposed plea agreement including waiver of challenges to the conviction based on ineffective assistance of counsel unless a reasonable lawyer would find a personal interest conflict of interest, i.e. a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the defendant would be adversely affected by the lawyer's own interest in avoiding an allegation of ineffective assistance of counsel. In case of such conflict, the lawyer may continue in the representation if the conflict is waivable and properly waived by the defendant, but otherwise must seek the court's permission to withdraw from the representation.

RULES: Scope ¶7, 1.0(j), 1.2(c), 1.4(a) 1.7(a) & (b), 1.16(d), 1.8(h), 8.4 (a) & (d)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a criminal defense attorney practicing in a county in which the District Attorney's Office conditions certain plea bargains on the defendant's execution of a form in which the defendant waives challenges to the judgment of conviction (the "Waiver"). The Waiver is signed during the plea proceedings, in court, by the defendant and the defense attorney.

2. The Waiver states that the defendant, in consideration for the plea agreement, waives all rights to appeal from the judgment of conviction; waives all right to make post-conviction motions challenging the judgment of conviction; and waives and withdraws all pre-trial motions that may have been made. It states that the defendant understands and intends that the plea agreement will be a complete and final disposition of the matter, and that the defendant understands that the terms of the plea agreement and the Court's sentence promise are conditioned upon the defendant's waiver of rights to challenge the judgment of conviction.

3. The inquiry focuses on one potential ground for challenging a conviction by plea: ineffective assistance of counsel (an "IAC" challenge). The inquirer claims that the Waiver would on its face preclude such challenges by waiving "any and all rights to make post-conviction motions challenging the underlying judgment of conviction," and cites various authorities for the proposition that it is unethical for prosecutors and defense attorneys to participate in a defendant's waiver of the right to challenge a conviction on grounds of ineffective assistance.

QUESTION:

4. May a defense lawyer participate in a plea bargain process in which the lawyer advises the defendant as to a waiver of the defendant's right to challenge the conviction on grounds including ineffective assistance of counsel?

OPINION:

5. This question has been the subject of much attention. Ethics opinions in at least twelve jurisdictions have answered it in the negative.[8] Opinions in two other jurisdictions have concluded that a defense attorney is not necessarily barred from participating in a plea agreement including an IAC waiver.[9]

6. Many of these opinions also address the question whether a prosecutor may ethically condition a plea offer on an IAC waiver, and that question also has been addressed recently by the Department of Justice.[10] The inquiry before us, however, is from a defense attorney and we limit our analysis accordingly. Thus we do not here opine as to whether a prosecutor may ethically condition a plea offer on an IAC waiver; we analyze only whether, if a prosecutor does condition a plea offer in that way, the defense lawyer may ethically participate in the plea bargain process.

Would the Waiver preclude challenges based on ineffective assistance of counsel?

7. As the inquirer points out, the Waiver on its face would apply to IAC challenges, given its broad language precluding all challenges to the conviction whether through appeal or post-conviction motion. There is nevertheless a threshold question as to whether the Waiver would actually bar IAC challenges. A subsidiary question is whether, in New York, a defendant may lawfully waive an IAC challenge as part of a plea proceeding. Whether a pleading defendant may effectively waive an IAC challenge is a question of law beyond our jurisdiction; we briefly survey case law only because the answer to the question could render the ethical analysis unnecessary.

8 Alabama Opinion 2011-02; Florida Opinion 12-1; Kentucky Opinion E-435 (2012), aff'd, United States v. Kentucky Bar Ass'n, 439 S.W.3d 136 (Ky. 2014); Missouri Opinion 126 (2009); Nevada Opinion 48 (2011); North Carolina Opinion 129 (1993); Ohio Opinion 2001-06; Pennsylvania Opinion 2004-100; Tennessee Opinion 94-A-549; Utah Opinion 13-04; Vermont Opinion 95-04; Virginia Opinion 1857 (2011). Some of these opinions conclude that participation is barred by a personal-interest conflict of interest; some conclude that a participating defense lawyer is impermissibly seeking to limit malpractice liability; and others rely on both theories.

9 Arizona Opinion 95-08 (concluding that a defense lawyer may participate in a plea agreement with an IAC waiver without violating the rule against limiting malpractice liability "or any other ethical rule"); Texas Opinion 571 (2006) (concluding that, depending on the facts of a given case, a criminal defense lawyer "may or may not have a conflict of interest" in advising defendant about a plea waiver of IAC claims, and that the rule against malpractice limitation does not prohibit such advice, assuming that a court would not interpret the plea agreement to limit malpractice liability).

10 The Department of Justice has stated that it perceives no ethical bar to the practice, but has nonetheless adopted a policy providing that United States Attorneys will no longer seek plea waivers of challenges based on ineffective assistance of counsel. The new policy states:

> While the Department is confident that a waiver of a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel is both legal and ethical, in order to bring consistency to this practice, and in support of the underlying Sixth Amendment right, we now set forth uniform Department of Justice policies relating to waivers of claims of ineffective assistance of counsel.
> Federal prosecutors should no longer seek in plea agreements to have a defendant waive claims of ineffective assistance of counsel . . . .

Deputy Attorney General James Cole, Memorandum for All Federal Prosecutors (Oct. 14, 2014). Prior to the new policy, 35 of 94 U.S. Attorney's Offices had been seeking plea waivers extending to IAC claims. Press Release, "Attorney General Holder Announces New Policy to Enhance Justice Department's Commitment to Support Defendants' Right to Counsel" (Oct. 14, 2014), available at http://www.justice.gov/justice-news.

8. It is settled in New York that plea waivers are valid, subject to certain exceptions:

> A criminal defendant's waiver of the right to appeal, obtained as a condition of a sentence or plea bargain, will be upheld if it is voluntary, knowing and intelligent, and implicates no larger societal interest or important public policy concern. As long as those conditions are satisfied, the scope of the waiver of the right to appeal can be fully comprehensive, and is enforceable consistent with the actual intent underlying its execution.

People v. Muniz, 91 N.Y.2d 570, 573 (1998) (citations omitted and emphasis added). Barring an exception, a general waiver "will be upheld completely even if the underlying claim has not yet reached full maturation," and even if the kind of underlying claim is not explicitly named in the waiver. 91 N.Y.2d at 574-75 (citations omitted).

9. The Muniz opinion states that the exceptions are:

> certain defects in the proceedings leading to a conviction which are unwaivable as part of a plea bargain. This narrow class of appellate claims, grounded in the integrity of our criminal justice system and "the reality of fairness in the process," implicate either an infirmity in the waiver itself or a public policy consideration that transcends the individual concerns of a particular defendant to obtain appellate review.

Muniz, 91 N.Y.2d at 573 (1998) (citations omitted). The opinion cites three kinds of challenges that may be asserted despite a general waiver: constitutional speedy trial rights, illegality of a sentence, and lack of competency to stand trial. 91 N.Y.2d at 574. But the opinion does not state that this list is exhaustive, and it does not address whether there is another exception for IAC challenges. There are Appellate Division cases indicating that there is an exception for some IAC challenges.[11] The question has also been addressed by courts in other jurisdictions, which have often declined to enforce waivers when the alleged ineffective assistance relates to the plea proceedings or the waiver itself.[12]

10. If New York law clearly excluded all IAC challenges from the Waiver, then the inquirer could advise the defendant as to the merits of the Waiver and the ethical issues discussed below would not even arise. But it appears from the case law to date that New York might deny enforcement of only 11 See People v. Abdullah, 122 A.D.3d 958 (3rd Dept. 2014) (appeal waiver foreclosed an IAC claim that did not "impact the voluntariness" of the plea); People v. Smith, 119 A.D.3d 1088 (3d Dept. 2014) (same); People v. Montalvo, 105 A.D.3d 774 (2d Dept. 2013) ("Because the defendant voluntarily waived his right to appeal, his claim that he was deprived of his right to effective assistance of counsel is precluded, except to the extent that the alleged ineffective assistance may have affected the voluntariness of his plea.").

12 See, e.g., United States v. Craig, 985 F.2d 175, 178 (4th Cir.1993) (waiver does not foreclose "a claim that the waiver of appeal as well as the guilty plea itself was tainted" by ineffectiveness); United States v. White, 307 F.3d 336, 343 (5th Cir. 2002) (following "wealth of authority" that IAC challenges survive a waiver of appeal only when the claimed assistance directly affected the validity of that waiver or the plea itself"); Davila v. United States, 258 F.3d 448, 451 (6th Cir.2001) (enforcing waiver as to IAC claim relating to sentencing rather than plea or waiver); *Hurlow v. United States, 726 F.3d 958, 964 (7th Cir. 2013) ("[A]ppellate and collateral review waivers cannot be invoked against claims that counsel was ineffective in the negotiation of the plea agreement."); United States v. Pruitt, 32 F.3d 431, 433 (9th Cir. 1994) (doubting "that a plea agreement could waive a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel based on counsel's erroneously unprofessional inducement of the defendant to plead guilty or accept a particular plea bargain"); United States v. Cockerham, 237 F.3d 1179, 1187 (10th Cir. 2001) (holding that a plea waiver does not bar IAC claims "challenging the validity of the plea or the waiver" but does bar other IAC claims), cert. denied, 534 U.S. 1085 (2002).

those challenges that relate to ineffective assistance in connection with the voluntariness of the plea. Since New York courts may enforce waivers at least as to other kinds of IAC challenges, the ethical issues cited in the inquiry do arise for a defense lawyer confronted with a blanket IAC waiver, and we turn to an analysis of those issues.

Rule 1.7: Personal-interest conflicts

11. Some of the ethics opinions cited in footnote 8 above conclude that a per se and unwaivable conflict bars a defense counsel from ever advising a defendant as to waiver of IAC challenges. We believe, however, that the personal interests at stake are not so invariably strong as to justify such a per se rule. Instead, the potential conflict should be analyzed based on the facts and circumstances of each case. See, e.g., Texas Opinion 571 (2006).

Rule 1.7(a)(2): Existence of a conflict

12. Under Rule 1.7(a)(2) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"), a lawyer may not represent a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that "there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests," unless that conflict is waivable and properly waived by the client under Rule 1.7(b).

13. An IAC challenge is meant to result in favorable consequences for the defendant (such as vacating a conviction, resulting in a trial) that typically would not be directly contrary to the personal interests of the defense lawyer. But there also may be indirect effects of such a challenge. For that reason, a criminal defense lawyer no doubt has a personal interest in avoiding challenges to the effectiveness and propriety of his or her professional services. Even a challenge that is neither meritorious nor successful could require the lawyer to spend time responding, and could cause the lawyer reputational damage. Stronger challenges could lead to more concrete harms like malpractice awards[13] or professional discipline. The degree of the lawyer's personal interest will be a factor in determining whether that interest gives rise to a Rule 1.7 conflict and, if so, in determining whether the conflict is waivable.

14. The degree of personal interest implicated by a lawyer's advice as to the Waiver here will in turn depend on a number of factors including the likelihood that, in the absence of such a waiver, the defendant would make a subsequent IAC challenge;[14] the various negative consequences likely to 13 But see Dumbrowski v. Bulson, 19 N.Y.3d 347, 971 N.E.2d 338, 948 N.Y.S.2d 208 (2012) (limiting damages in legal malpractice cases based on negligent representation in a criminal matter to pecuniary damages, such as lost wages, which often are negligible in indigent criminal representation).

14 In Strickland v. Washington, 466 U. S. 668 (1984), the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that, before deciding whether to plead guilty, a defendant is entitled to "the effective assistance of competent counsel." It also established a two-prong inquiry into determining whether the defendant has received such effective assistance: (1) counsel's representation must fall "below an objective standard of reasonableness," 466 U. S., at 688, and (2) there must be "a reasonable probability that, but for counsel's unprofessional errors, the result of the proceeding would have been different," id., at 694. The Court in Strickland recognized some of the drawbacks in winning an IAC claim: (a) judicial scrutiny of counsel's performance must be highly deferential, since attorney errors are as likely to be harmless as they are to be prejudicial, (b) to obtain relief on an IAC claim, a petitioner must convince the court that a decision to reject the plea bargain would have been rational under the circumstances (citing Roe v. Flores-Ortega, 528 U. S. 470, 480, 486 (2000)), and (b) it is difficult for petitioners to satisfy Strickland's prejudice prong if they have acknowledged their guilt. The Court also commented that collateral challenges at the plea stage are made less frequently than those after trial (e.g. pleas account for nearly 95% of all criminal convictions, but only approximately 30% of the habeas petitions filed.) result directly or indirectly from such a challenge; the seriousness of the personal detriment that each of those consequences would be likely to cause the lawyer; and the chance that the waiver would avoid such consequences.

15. In a given case, a reasonable lawyer could perceive low risk or high risk that the defense lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the defendant would be adversely affected by the prospect of an IAC challenge. For example, a reasonable lawyer could conclude that the likelihood of an IAC challenge is low if the client has acknowledged guilt, if the conviction involves a minimal sentence for a minor charge, or if it resulted from a plea bargain very favorable to the defendant. The likelihood of such a challenge may be much greater in case of a severe sentence or significant collateral consequences such as deportation. Even then, other factors may limit the risk of an adverse effect on professional judgment. If the defense lawyer has provided highly skilled representation, a reasonable lawyer may find that an IAC challenge is less likely to be made, or at least less likely to be successful. When the evidence of skilled representation is highly visible, such as when a defendant fares substantially better than similarly situated codefendants, then there may be a low likelihood of an IAC challenge even being asserted. But if the defense lawyer has provided deficient representation, especially of a nature that might well lead to severe reputational, financial or disciplinary consequences, then a reasonable lawyer might well find a significant risk of adverse effect on professional judgment.[15]

16. We cannot give a blanket answer to the fact-specific question of whether, in a particular case, a reasonable lawyer would find a significant risk that the prospect of an IAC waiver would adversely affect a defense lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the defendant. The defense lawyer in a particular case will be aware of the relevant facts bearing on personal interest. The decision of the Kentucky Supreme court affirming Kentucky Opinion E-435 (cited in footnote 8 above) argues that it will be hard for the lawyer to answer this question fairly, given studies in the field of behavioral economics showing that it is "extremely difficult for professionals . . . to appreciate the deleterious consequences of conflicts of interest," and that "people tend to overestimate their ability to act ethically." United States v. Kentucky Bar Ass'n, 439 S.W.3d 136, 154-55 (Ky. 2014) (citations omitted) (aff'g Kentucky Opinion E-435 (2012)). We agree that it may be hard to be objective, but lawyers routinely need to assess the ethics of their own potential conduct even when, as with Rule 1.7(a)(2), their personal interests may be implicated. To the extent that conflict analysis is conducted case by case rather than based on broad per se rules, such assessments are, even if difficult, unavoidable.

17. When a reasonable lawyer would conclude that the risk of adverse effect on professional judgment is not a significant one, then there is no conflict under Rule 1.7(a)(2) that would preclude the defense lawyer from advising the defendant as to the Waiver. On the other hand, when a reasonable lawyer would conclude that the risk is significant, then there is a personal-interest conflict, and the next step in the analysis is to consider waivability. Of course even when a defense lawyer is inclined to think that there is no conflict, the lawyer may choose to seek a conflict waiver as a matter of precaution and prudence. A lawyer who continues a representation in the absence of informed consent could face discipline if it later is determined that there actually was a conflict.

15 We are analyzing conflicts of interest, but we note also that deficient representation may give rise to a disclosure obligation whether or not the lawyer will continue to represent the client. See N.Y. State 789 ¶13 (2005); N.Y. State 734 (2000) (noting obligation to inform client of "significant error or omission that may give rise to a possible malpractice claim").

Rule 1.7(b): Waiver of a conflict

18. Under Rule 1.7(b), even if there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client would be adversely affected by the lawyer's personal interest in the client agreeing to an IAC waiver, the lawyer may continue the representation if the criteria of Rule 1.7(b) are met.

19. Rule 1.7(b) lists four criteria that must be met for effective waiver of a lawyer's personal-interest conflict. Two of them – requiring that the representation not be prohibited by law and not involve assertion of a claim by one client against another in the same proceeding – are not applicable to the current inquiry. Waivability of any conflict will therefore turn on the other two criteria: A defense lawyer with a personal-interest conflict may nonetheless represent a defendant and provide advice on an IAC waiver if "the lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation" to the defendant, Rule 1.7(b)(1), and the defendant "gives informed consent, confirmed in writing," Rule 1.7(b)(4).

20. The first criterion – that the lawyer reasonably believes he or she will be able to provide competent and diligent representation – has both a subjective and an objective component. The defense lawyer must believe that the lawyer will be able to give the defendant competent and diligent representation despite the conflict, and that belief must be reasonable. Whether such a belief is reasonable will depend on some of the same factors that bear on whether there is a conflict in the first place, as discussed in paragraphs 13–15 above. That is, the stronger the potential challenge to the lawyer's ineffective assistance prior to the negotiation of the plea agreement, the less likely that the lawyer could reasonably believe he or she will be able to provide competent and diligent representation in advising the defendant on the accepting a plea agreement with an IAC waiver.

21. If there is a fairly limited likelihood that an IAC challenge would result in serious detriment to the lawyer, then the lawyer may reasonably conclude that the lawyer can provide competent and diligent representation. For example, depending on the circumstances, such as the strength of the prosecution's case, the terms of the plea offer, and whether the defendant has admitted guilt to the lawyer, it might be quite clear that it would be in the interest of the defendant to accept the offer. On the other hand, if the defense lawyer believes that the defendant has a colorable claim of legal malpractice arising from defense services already provided, then it may not be reasonable to believe that the lawyer could provide competent and diligent representation. Cf. N.Y. State 865 (2011) (noting "manifestly untenable position of having to counsel the [client] executor on whether to sue himself (the lawyer)"). The inquiry is fact-specific, so we identify the relevant analysis but do not undertake to apply it to each kind of circumstance that could be covered by the current inquiry.

22. If the defense lawyer reasonably expects to provide competent and diligent representation, then the lawyer may continue the representation and advise the defendant as to the Waiver if the defendant "gives informed consent [to the conflict], confirmed in writing." Rule 1.7(b)(4). It is a prerequisite of informed consent that a lawyer "has adequately explained to the person the material risks of the proposed course of conduct and reasonably available alternatives." Rule 1.0(j). Here, again, whether the lawyer will be able to provide such an adequate explanation may depend on the strength of the defendant's IAC claim. See Rule 1.7, Cmt. [10] ("if the probity of a lawyer's own conduct in a transaction is in serious question, it may be difficult or impossible for the lawyer to give a client detached advice.")

23. If the defendant chooses not to waive the conflict, or if it is unwaivable – whether because the conflict is so stark that a belief in the possibility of competent and diligent representation would not be reasonable, or because serious questions about the probity of the lawyer's conduct preclude the kind of advice necessary for informed consent – then the lawyer would generally be required to withdraw from the representation.[16] There is an exception, however, if the lawyer needs, but cannot obtain, permission of court to withdraw. Rule 1.16(d).

24. If a defense lawyer's conflict results in withdrawal, another lawyer can be retained or appointed to represent the defendant. The new lawyer, having not previously represented the defendant and having no exposure for deficient representation up to that point, will likely be able to provide conflict-free representation.[17]

Rule 1.8(h): Limitation of liability

25. Rule 1.8(h)(1) provides that a lawyer shall not "make an agreement prospectively limiting the lawyer's liability to a client for malpractice." Some ethics opinions in other states have concluded that such provisions bar a defense lawyer's participation in a defendant's plea waiver of potential IAC challenges. We discuss first whether this Rule bars such participation by its literal terms, and then whether waiver of IAC challenges impermissibly violates the Rule's policy or spirit.

26. For several reasons, the literal terms of Rule 1.8(h)(1) do not bar a defense lawyer's participation in a plea process that includes a waiver of IAC challenges. First, the lawyer's participation typically will not constitute "mak[ing] an agreement" of the described type. A plea agreement is between the defendant and the prosecution; the defense lawyer may advise and may document that advice, but is not a party to the agreement.[18] Theoretically there could be a case in which the defense lawyer induces the prosecutor to require a plea waiver, in which case the defense lawyer's own conduct could be at issue. See Rule 8.4(a) (providing that a lawyer shall not violate the Rules "through the acts of another"). But we do not opine as to this unlikely situation of a defense lawyer proposing an IAC

16 Rule 1.16(b)(1) (providing that a lawyer who "knows that the representation will result in a violation of the Rules" generally must withdraw). Some of the prior ethics opinions finding an unwaivable conflict seem to assume that the remedy is for the lawyer merely to refrain from advising the defendant as to the waiver. But since the waiver is an integral part of a plea offer, the defense lawyer's duties would seem to require such advice. See, e.g., Rule 1.4(a)(1)(iii) (requiring lawyer to promptly inform client of plea offers), Rule 1.4(a)(2) (requiring reasonable consultation about means to obtain objectives) and Cmts. [1] – [3]. In some circumstances, a lawyer may limit the scope of the representation with the client's informed consent, Rule 1.2(c), and such a limitation may serve to avoid conflicts, see N.Y. City 2001-3. But a criminal defense lawyer contemplating this approach would have to consider whether refraining from advice as to plea offers would be a limitation "reasonable under the circumstances," as required under Rule 1.2(c), and how it would comport with the defendant's right to effective assistance of counsel.

17 The reason we do not adopt a per se conflict rule against defense lawyers participating in IAC waivers is that we see no circumstances to justify a departure from case-by-case analysis. But our discussion of withdrawal leads us to note an additional benefit of the case-by-case approach. A per se and unwaivable conflict rule would mean that when a prosecutor requires a plea bargain to include an IAC waiver, not only would the existing defense attorney have to withdraw, but so would every replacement defense attorney. Because defendants do need lawyers, the resolution might be for the court to order continued representation, despite the conflict, under Rule 1.16(d). A per se approach thus prevents any real solution to the claimed personal-interest conflict, while the case-by-case approach allows for a conflicted lawyer to be replaced by one without a conflict.

18 See Arizona Opinion 95-08 (noting that in plea context, "the defense lawyer is not entering into an agreement with his client" to limit liability, because generally the government is seeking to put end to proceedings in consideration for plea to lesser charge, and "[t]he government, not the defense lawyer, is requiring the waiver"); Virginia Opinion 1857 (2011) (opining that rule does not apply "because the defense lawyer is not making the agreement in this case – he is advising his client whether to enter into an agreement sought by the government").

waiver as part of a plea agreement. In the usual case, it is the prosecutor who seeks a waiver of appeal as part of a plea agreement.

27. Second, an instrument such as the Waiver is not, literally speaking, one "limiting the lawyer's liability to a client for malpractice."[19] It may limit the client's ability to pursue in criminal court a challenge to the conviction, but the client would remain legally entitled to sue the lawyer in civil court for any perceived malpractice.[20] Some ethics opinions have argued that the waiver nevertheless "limit[s]" the lawyer's malpractice liability in a practical sense. If this were a valid argument, it could well apply in New York, which precludes IAC malpractice claims by defendants whose criminal convictions remain intact.[21] But the argument is not valid. The Rule cannot mean that a plea agreement's indirect, preclusive effect on malpractice liability bars the defense lawyer from participating in its negotiation. If that were the case, it would lead to the absurd result that a defense lawyer could not negotiate any plea agreement or counsel any guilty plea, whether or not involving a waiver of appeal.

28. Some ethics opinions have reasoned that even if an IAC waiver does not violate the letter of Rule 1.8, it is nevertheless violates the Rule's policy or spirit. Even if there is some merit to that concern, we find it too attenuated to bar a defense lawyer from performing the crucial function of providing comprehensive and useful advice to a defendant who has been offered a potentially beneficial plea agreement.[22]

Rule 8.4(d): Conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice

29. The inquirer has also asked whether advising a defendant as to a plea waiver of IAC claims would violate Rule 8.4(d), which provides that a lawyer shall not "engage in conduct that is prejudicial to the administration of justice." But this provision is generally meant to address flagrantly improper kinds of conduct.[23] In considering prejudice to the administration of justice as a matter of 19 If the waiver were an agreement limiting the lawyer's liability to the client for malpractice, it would apply to a large extent retrospectively, rather than prospectively, and, to that extent, would not be prohibited by Rule 1.8(h).

20 See Arizona Opinion 95-08 (stating that Rule 1.8(h) is "specific and unambiguous" and that there is a "significant difference" between an IAC challenge to a conviction and a malpractice claim); Texas Opinion 571 (2006) (stating that plea waiver of IAC challenges "does not expressly limit the defense counsel's liability to the defendant for malpractice," and assuming that in a malpractice dispute, a court "would not allow a waiver in the plea agreement to be used or interpreted as an agreement limiting a defendant's malpractice claim").

21 See Carmel v. Lunney, 70 N.Y.2d 169, 173 (1987); Kaplan v. Sachs, 224 A.D.2d 666, 667 (2d Dept. 1996) (stating that "plaintiff's plea of guilty in the criminal proceeding bars recovery for legal malpractice allegedly committed by the defendant in that proceeding"); accord McClinton v. Suffolk County Police 3rd Precinct, 2014 WL 1028993 (E.D.N.Y. 2014) (applying New York law).

22 See Rule 1.4(a)(1)(iii) (requiring a lawyer to promptly inform client of "material developments in the matter including settlement or plea offers"); Missouri v. Frye, 132 S. Ct. 1399, 1408 (2012) ("[A]s a general rule, defense counsel has the duty to communicate formal offers from the prosecution to accept a plea on terms and conditions that may be favorable to the accused."); Lafler v. Cooper, 132 S. Ct. 1376, 1388 (2012) ("[T]he right to adequate assistance of counsel cannot be defined or enforced without taking account of the central role plea bargaining plays in securing convictions and determining sentences.").

23 Comment [3] to Rule 8.4 provides: "The prohibition on conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice is generally invoked to punish conduct, whether or not it violates another ethics rule, that results in substantial harm to the justice system comparable to those caused by obstruction of justice, such as advising a client to testify falsely, paying a witness to be unavailable, altering documents, repeatedly disrupting a proceeding, or failing to cooperate in an attorney disciplinary investigation or proceeding."

ethics, it is relevant to bear in mind rules that guide the justice system as a matter of law.[24] We have noted certain ethics and policy issues as to IAC waivers, but the fact that such waivers are accepted to a significant extent in case law belies any claim that advising a defendant as to a waiver would afoul of Rule 8.4(d). See cases cited in footnotes 11 and 12.

CONCLUSION:

30. A defense lawyer may advise the defendant as to a proposed plea agreement including waiver of challenges to the conviction based on ineffective assistance of counsel unless a reasonable lawyer would find a personal interest conflict of interest, i.e. a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the defendant would be adversely affected by the lawyer's own interest in avoiding an allegation of ineffective assistance of counsel. In case of such conflict, the lawyer may continue in the representation if the conflict is waivable and properly waived by the defendant, but otherwise must seek the court's permission to withdraw from the representation.

OPINION 1049 (03/02/2015)

TOPIC: Solicitation

DIGEST: A. Where a potential client posts a message on a website asking to be contacted by a lawyer about a particular legal problem, a New York lawyer may respond in the manner invited by the potential client. A response invited by the potential client does not constitute "solicitation," but a communication about the services of the lawyer or law firm for the purposes of securing retention would constitute "advertising." B. An attorney may post on a website to solicit plaintiffs for a case, unless the post relates to a specific incident involving potential claims for personal injury or wrongful death and is disseminated before the end of the cooling off period in Rule 7.3(e). The communication is subject to the Rules on attorney advertising. If the post referred to a specific incident, it also would constitute a solicitation and Rule 7.3, including the filing requirements of Rule 7.3(c), would apply as well.

RULES: 1.0(a) & (c), 7.1, 7.1(f), (h) & (k), 7.3(a), (b), (c) & (e)

FACTS:

1. An attorney frequents internet websites, such as Reddit and Twitter, which allow members to post questions about a variety of issues. A non-lawyer has posted a message on such a website describing a legal problem, and asking to be contacted by a lawyer who can help with the problem.

2. Our understanding of such social networking sites is that they are forums where registered community members can submit content, such as text posts. For example, in the case of Reddit, content is divided into categories, including a subcategory called "discussion based" that enables members to submit questions to other community members. Members can post comments about the submission, and respond back and forth in a thread or conversation-tree of written comments. Similarly, in the case of Twitter, users may post and read short messages posted by users, but members receive messages directly only from those they are "following," that is, from those with whom they have signed up to receive such messages.

QUESTIONS

3. A. May an attorney respond by email or through a social media website to an individual who posts about a specific problem on an internet forum or other similar website and who asks to be contacted by a lawyer about that problem to discuss undertaking a representation?

B. May an attorney who wishes to find plaintiffs for a potential case post an invitation on a third-party website, such as Reddit or Twitter, for individuals to contact him if they experienced a particular problem? If so, what requirements must be followed?

OPINION:

Responding to a Request from a Potential Client Seeking Counsel

4. The first question asks whether an attorney may contact an individual by email or through a social media website, such as on Twitter or Reddit, to discuss undertaking a representation, based on the individual's posting on the internet site, which includes a request to be contacted by a lawyer about the individual's problem.

5. The threshold issue is whether such a contact would constitute "solicitation" of, or "advertising" directed to, the potential client by the lawyer. If the contact constitutes an "advertisement" as defined in Rule 1.0(a), then the contents must comply with Rule 7.1 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"), including the requirements for labeling as "advertising," retention of copies for specified periods and inclusion of the address and telephone number of the lawyer's "principal law office." See Rule 7.1(f), (h), (k). If the advertisement has additional characteristics that transform it into a "solicitation" as defined in Rule 7.3(b), then (1) the lawyer may not solicit the potential client by in-person or telephone contact, or by "real-time or interactive computer-accessed communication,"[25] unless the recipient is a close friend, relative, former client or existing client, see Rule 7.3(a)(1), and (2) the solicitation must comply with Rule 7.3(c), including the restrictions on communications relating to a specific incident involving potential claims for personal injury or wrongful death. Moreover, the lawyer must file a copy of the solicitation at the time of its dissemination with the attorney disciplinary committee of the judicial district or department where the lawyer or law firm maintains its principal office, see Rule 7.3(c)(1).

6. Rule 7.3(b) defines "solicitation" for purposes of Rule 7.3 as:

> [A]ny advertisement initiated by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm that is directed to, or targeted at, a specific recipient or group of recipients . . . the primary purpose of which is the retention of the lawyer or law firm, and a significant motive for which is pecuniary gain. It does not include a proposal or other writing prepared and delivered in response to a specific request of a prospective client.

Thus, in order to constitute a solicitation, the communication must first be an advertisement.

7. The term "advertisement" is defined in Rule 1.0(a) as:

> [A]ny public or private communication made by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm about that lawyer or law firm's services, the primary purpose of which is for the retention of the lawyer or law firm. It does not include communications to existing clients or other lawyers.

A communication to discuss the lawyer or law firm's services (as opposed to merely discussing the client's legal problem, as set forth below in paragraphs 12 and 13) is advertising, as long as the primary purpose of the communication is to secure retention of the lawyer or law firm and the potential

25 The term "computer-accessed communication" is defined in Rule 1.0(c) as:

> [A]ny communication made by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm that is disseminated through the use of a computer or related electronic device, including, but not limited to, web sites, weblogs, search engines, electronic mail, banner advertisements, pop-up and pop-under advertisements, chat rooms, list servers, instant messaging, or other internet presences, and any attachments or links related thereto.

The terms "real time" and "interactive" are explained in Rule 7.3, Comment [9], which states that "[o]rdinary email and web sites are not considered to be real-time and interactive communication," but "[i]nstant messaging, chat rooms, and other similar types of conversational computer-accessed communication are considered to be real-time or interactive communication."

client is not an existing client of the lawyer or law firm. Since we have been told that the purpose of contacting the potential client would be to secure retention, any discussion of the lawyer or law firm's services would constitute an "advertisement." But would it also constitute "solicitation" as defined in Rule 7.3(b), quoted above?[26]

8. The definition of "solicitation" in Rule 7.3(b) makes an important distinction between communications initiated by the lawyer and those initiated by a potential client. That is, solicitation is an advertisement directed at a specific recipient that is initiated by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm. Where a potential client contacts the lawyer to discuss a possible engagement, any response the lawyer makes to the contact does not constitute "solicitation." This distinction is made clear in Comment [2] to Rule 7.3, which says: "A 'solicitation' means any advertisement . . . that is initiated by a lawyer or law firm (as opposed to a communication made in response to any inquiry initiated by a potential client)". This distinction also existed in the former Code of Professional Responsibility between 1970 and 1999. See DR 2-103 (prohibiting a lawyer from seeking professional employment from a person who has not sought advice regarding employment of the lawyer).

9. We note that the final sentence of Rule 7.3(b) states that a lawyer's proposal or other writing in response to a specific request of a prospective client does not constitute "solicitation." We believe the reference to written responses to "requests for proposals" provides a safe harbor, and is not the exclusive means of responding to a request for communication initiated by the client.

10. When a potential client requests contact by a lawyer, either by contacting a particular lawyer or by broadcasting a more general request to unknown persons who may include lawyers, any ensuing communication by a lawyer that complies with the terms of the invitation was not initiated by the lawyer within the meaning of Rule 7.3(b).[27] Thus, if the potential client invites contact by Twitter or email, the lawyer may respond by Twitter or email. But the lawyer could not respond by telephone, since such contact would not have been initiated by the potential client. See N.Y. State 1014 (2014). If the potential client invites contact by telephone or in person, the lawyer's response in the manner invited by the potential client would not constitute "solicitation."

11. In N.Y. State 1014, the inquirer was contacted by a current client (a detainee in a detention center), was given the name and telephone number of a potential client (another detainee), and was told that the potential client would like the lawyer to contact him to discuss his defense. We opined that the prohibition of Rule 7.3 against in-person or telephone solicitation was not applicable, since the contact had been initiated by the potential client. We said:

26 The rules of lawyer ethics have long disfavored certain types of solicitation, because they pose serious dangers to potential clients. As Comment [9] to Rule 7.3 explains:

> [I]n person solicitation poses the risk that a lawyer, who is trained in the arts of advocacy and persuasion, may pressure a potential client to hire the lawyer without adequate consideration. These same risks are present in telephone contact or by real-time or interactive computer-accessed communication and are regulated in the same manner.

27 See N.Y. City 2000-1, which involved an internet-based system in which law firms could respond to requests for proposals of representation, and which concluded that, since the request had been initiated by the potential client, not the lawyer, the lawyer's response would constitute neither advertising nor solicitation. That opinion predates the issuance of the current rules on advertising and solicitation that were promulgated in 2007 and that are discussed in this opinion.

> The provisions of Rule 7.3(a)(1) which prohibit "in-person or telephone" solicitation (with exceptions not here pertinent) are also inapplicable. Solicitation is advertising initiated by or on behalf of a lawyer. Comment 2 to Rule 7.3 further emphasizes the point that to be solicitation the contact must be initiated by the lawyer. The Comment provides that solicitation means an advertisement "that is initiated by a lawyer or law firm (as opposed to a communication made in response to an inquiry initiated by a potential client.)". . . . If upon the initial contact with the potential client it is apparent that the potential client did not request to be contacted by the lawyer, the lawyer must cease the conversation as further contact would constitute proscribed solicitation under Rule 7.3(a)(1).

12. Here, since the potential client initiated the communication through a posting on the internet, any response by the inquirer in the manner invited by the potential client would not constitute "solicitation." We further conclude that a communication that merely discussed the client's legal problem would not constitute advertising either. However, a communication by the lawyer that went on to describe the services of the lawyer or his or her law firm for the purposes of securing retention would constitute "advertising." In that case, the lawyer would need to comply with Rule 7.1, including the requirements for labeling as "advertising" on the "first page" of the post or in the subject line, retention for one-year (in the case of a computer-accessed communication) and inclusion of the law office address and phone number. See Rule 7.1(f), (h), (k).

13. The definition of "advertising" must be applied with some measure of common sense. In a strict sense, every communication between a lawyer and a potential client prior to actual retention is for the "primary purpose" of being retained. But not every email in the back-and- forth between the potential client and the lawyer, such as a discussion of the steps the lawyer would take in a particular case, a response to a particular question from the potential client about the lawyer's experience or the negotiation of the fees that the lawyer would charge in that case, needs to be labeled "Attorney Advertising" and contain the lawyer's law office address. For example, Comment [7] to Rule 7.1 states:

> Communications, such as proposed retainer agreements or ordinary correspondence with a prospective client who has expressed interest in, and requested information about, a lawyer's services, are not advertising. Accordingly, the special restrictions on advertising and solicitation would not apply to a lawyer's response to a prospective client who has asked the lawyer to outline the lawyer's qualifications to undertake a proposed retention or the terms of a potential retention.

In this case, however, we believe that the initial communication between lawyer and client in which the lawyer describes his or her capabilities and experience in response to a broadly disseminated request by the potential client meets both the express terms and the purpose of the definition.

14. Since the inquiry here asks whether the lawyer may reply using the internet website or email, the reply would be in writing and thus compliance with the labeling, retention and address requirements described above in paragraph 12 would be straight-forward. We do not address how those requirements might be applied to a permitted non-written reply in response to the client's request.

Soliciting Clients on Twitter or Reddit

15. The second question asks whether the inquirer may post an invitation on a third-party website, such as Twitter or Reddit, for individuals to contact the lawyer if they have experienced a particular problem. In N.Y. State 1009 we held that a post on a third-party website, such as Twitter or Reddit, is not a real-time or interactive computer-accessed communication. Since that type of invitation does not generally constitute solicitation, the issue is whether the content of the attorney's post could transform it into a solicitation under Rule 7.3(b), thus subjecting the post to the requirements of Rule 7.3.

16. As noted above, Rule 7.3(b) defines "solicitation" as an "advertisement initiated by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm that is directed to, or targeted at, a specific recipient or group of recipients . . . the primary purpose of which is the retention of the lawyer or law firm." Comment [4] to Rule 7.3 explains that an advertisement in a public medium, seeking retention and pecuniary gain, does not become a solicitation simply because it is intended to attract potential clients with needs in a specified area of law. But it does become a solicitation if it "makes reference to a specific person or group of people whose legal needs arise out of a specific incident to which the advertisement explicitly refers."

17. Here, the inquiring attorney has "become aware of a potential case, and wants to find plaintiffs," and the message the attorney intends to post will be directed to, or intended to be of interest only to, individuals who have experienced the specified problem. If the post referred to a particular incident, it would constitute a solicitation under the Rules, and the attorney would be required to follow the Rules regarding attorney advertising and solicitation, s*ee* Rules 7.1 & 7.3. In addition, depending on the nature of the potential case, the inquirer's post might be subject to the blackout period (i.e., cooling off period) on solicitations relating to "a specific incident involving potential claims for personal injury or wrongful death," see Rule 7.3(e).

CONCLUSION:

18. A. Where a potential client posts a message on a website asking to be contacted by a lawyer about a particular legal problem, a New York lawyer may respond in the manner invited by the potential client. A response invited by the potential client does not constitute "solicitation," but a communication about the services of the lawyer or law firm for the purposes of securing retention would constitute "advertising." B. An attorney may post on a website to solicit plaintiffs for a case, unless the post relates to a specific incident involving potential claims for personal injury or wrongful death and is disseminated before the end of the cooling off period in Rule 7.3(e). The communication is subject to the Rules on attorney advertising. If the post referred to a specific incident, it also would constitute a solicitation and Rule 7.3, including the filing requirements of Rule 7.3(c), would apply as well.

OPINION 1050 (03/25/2015)

TOPIC: Legal expenses; Credit Card Processing Fees

DIGEST: A lawyer may charge a client, as an administrative convenience, a nominally greater amount than the processing fees imposed on the lawyer's account by a credit card company in connection with the client's payment by credit card of the lawyer's advance payment retainer, as long as (i) the client receives disclosure of the up-charge and consents to it before the lawyer imposes it, (ii) the amount of the up-charge is nominal, and (iii) total amount of the advance payment retainer and the processing fees (including the up-charge) are reasonable under the circumstances.

RULES: 1.5(a) & (b)

FACTS:

1. A law firm wishes to accommodate clients who want to pay the firm's advance payment retainers by credit card. (For a description of advance payment retainers, see N.Y. State 816 (2007), ¶3.) The law firm wishes to have its clients pay the credit card company's processing fee for such credit card payments. Those processing fees vary from 2.75% to 3.2% of the amount paid. The law firm is concerned that it will not be able to recoup the entirety of the processing fee if it passes along to the client the precise amount of the initial processing fee, since the client is likely to want to pay even the processing fee by credit card.

2. For example, if the client pays an advance payment retainer of $10,000 by credit card, the law firm would pass along to the client for payment the credit card processing fee of 2.75%, i.e., $275.00. If the client wants to pay the amount of that processing fee by credit card as well, then there will be a 2.75% credit card processing fee on the payment of that fee, i.e., $7.56. If the client wants to pay that processing fee on the processing fee by credit card, there will be another processing fee passed along to the client, and so on.

3. The law firm wants to know whether it can charge a single charge for credit card payment of its advance payment retainer that is slightly higher than the actual credit card processing fee. Specifically, it wants to know whether it is ethically permissible to charge its clients a single fee of 3% to cover the credit card company's processing fee of 2.75% and a flat fee of 3.5% to cover the credit card company processing fee of 3.2%. In the example above, the application of that single fee of 3% instead of the triple application of 2.75% would result in the law firm's receiving $300.00 instead of a reimbursement of approximately $283.00 ($275.00, plus $7.56, plus $.21), roughly a $17.00 up-charge ($300.00 payment from client minus $283.00 charged by the credit card company).

QUESTION:

4. May a law firm charge its clients who wish to pay its advance payment retainer by credit card an amount that is greater than the processing fee the credit card company actually imposes on the law firm?

OPINION:

5. For more than 40 years, it has been recognized that in certain circumstances New York lawyers may allow their clients to pay their attorneys' fees by credit card. See, e.g., N.Y. City 2014-3; Nassau County 13-5 (2013); N.Y. State 763 (2003); N.Y. State 362 (1974), as modified by N.Y. State 763 (2003). Those opinions establish that lawyers may accept credit card payments of their fees as long as (i) the amount of the fees is reasonable, (ii) the lawyer complies with the duty to protect the confidentiality of client information, (iii) the lawyer does not allow the credit card company to compromise the lawyer's independent professional judgment on behalf of the client, (iv) the lawyer notifies the client before charges are billed to the credit card and offers the client the opportunity to question any billing errors, and (v) in the event of any dispute regarding the lawyer's fee, the lawyer attempts to resolve all disputes amicably and promptly and, if applicable, complies with the fee dispute resolution program set forth in 22 N.Y.C.R.R., Part 137. See N.Y. State 763 (2003) and nn. 3 & 4.

6. In N.Y. State 763 (2003), this Committee considered whether a collection lawyer could deduct, from a settlement payment due the lawyer's client, charges imposed by a merchant credit card bank on the lawyer when the third party debtor made the settlement payment by credit card. The Committee stated: "With regard to charges by the merchant credit card bank incurred in consequence of the firm's credit card program, such charges may be deducted from the sum remitted to the client if this arrangement is part of the understanding with the client; otherwise these charges should be deducted from the firm's operating account and not passed on the client." N.Y. State 763 also noted South Carolina Opinion 98-08 for the proposition that the attorney may pass on the administrative fee as long as the total fee is "objectively reasonable." See New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") 1.5(a) ("A lawyer shall not . . . charge . . . an excessive . . . fee or expense"); Rule 1.5(b) ("A lawyer shall communicate to a client . . . the basis or rate of the fee and expenses for which the client will be responsible").

7. Since 2003, ethics opinions from bar associations in other states have reached similar conclusions. See, e.g., Hawaii Opinion 45 (2003); Kentucky Opinion 426 (2007); District of Columbia Opinion 348 (2009).

8. Thus, with respect to the credit card company processing fees at issue here, it is clear that the lawyer may pass along for payment by the client the actual amount of the processing fees imposed on the lawyer by the credit card company as long as (i) the client has been advised of those charges and has agreed to pay them in advance of their imposition, and (ii) the processing fees, along with the amount of attorneys' fees paid, are reasonable in amount.

9. Neither N.Y. State 763 (2003) nor the out-of-state ethics opinions cited above have addressed the specific question raised here: If a client wants to pay an advance payment retainer by credit card, may the law firm charge the client more than the processing fee that the credit card company charges the lawyer. We perceive reasons for and against allowing a lawyer to charge the client an "up-charge" exceeding the credit card company's processing fee to the lawyer. On one hand, the additional processing fee may be determined to the penny mathematically, so the lawyer is not compelled to estimate the total out-of-pocket cost to the lawyer. On the other hand, calculating the processing fee (including the processing fee on any financed processing fee) will cause the lawyer to incur an administrative expense.

10. A number of ethics committees have addressed the question of lawyer billing of expenses. In ABA 93-379 (1993), the ABA Committee concluded that the lawyer may recoup expenses reasonably incurred in connection with the client's matter for services performed in-house (such as photocopying, long distance telephone calls, computer research, special deliveries, secretarial overtime, and other similar services) if the charge reasonably reflects the lawyer's actual cost for the services rendered, plus a reasonable allocation of related overhead. ABA 93-379 stated, however, that it is impermissible for a lawyer to charge more than the actual cost of such disbursements, plus overhead, unless the lawyer makes full disclosure to and obtains the agreement of the client to the higher charge and the total charge is reasonable. Similarly, in N.Y. City 2006-3, the New York City Bar ethics committee concluded that, unless the client agrees otherwise in the retainer agreement, a lawyer may not charge the client more than the direct cost associated with the outsourcing, plus a reasonable allocation of overhead expenses directly associated with providing that service.

11. The conclusions of the ABA and New York City opinions are reflected in New York's Comment to Rule 1.5. See Rule 1.5, Cmt. [1] ("A lawyer may seek payment for services performed in-house, such as copying . . . either by charging an amount to which the client has agreed in advance or by charging an amount that reflects the cost incurred by the lawyer, provided in either case that the amount charged is not excessive.")

12. We believe that a similar Rule 1.5 analysis also applies to the lawyer's proposed up-charge. Thus, a lawyer may charge the client more than the processing fee the credit card company imposes on the lawyer as long as (i) the client receives disclosure of the up-charge and consents to it before the lawyer imposes it, (ii) the amount of the up-charge is nominal, and (iii) the total amount of the advance payment retainer and the processing fees charged (including the up-charge) are reasonable in the circumstances. At what point the up-charge becomes excessive is a matter of fact that depends upon, among other things, the amount of the up-charge, the amount of the advance payment retainer, and the client's opportunity to avoid the up-charge entirely by paying the advance retainer by cash or check.

13. The Committee is aware of at least three prior opinions that have disapproved of interest charges in certain circumstances. In N.Y. City 1997-1, the New York City Bar ethics committee opined that, when a lawyer representing a client in a contingency fee matter borrowed money to pay for the client's litigation expenses, the lawyer was prohibited from charging the client interest in an amount greater than the interest charges the lawyer actually incurred. In N.Y. State 729 (2000), which concerned a lawyer's imposition of an interest charge on disbursements the lawyer was advancing on the client's behalf in a contingency fee matter, this Committee said that a lawyer could not pass along to a client a charge for interest that is greater than the charge the lawyer actually incurred (or, if the lawyer did not borrow funds, greater than the lawyer's actual or putative cost of funds). In N.Y. State 754 (2002), this Committee concluded that a lawyer borrowing funds to advance expenses in a contingent fee litigation may pass on to the client the interest the lawyer incurs in such borrowing (implying that the lawyer may not charge more than the actual cost incurred). Both N.Y. State 729 and N.Y. State 754 cited N.Y. City 1997-1.

14. These three opinions do not affect the conclusion here that the lawyer may charge the client a nominal amount over the actual processing fee charged by the credit card company as a matter of administrative convenience, as long as (i) the lawyer discloses the up-charge and the client consents to it in advance of its imposition, (ii) the amount of the up-charge is nominal, and (iii) the total amount of the advance payment retainer and the processing fees charged (including the up-charge) are reasonable in the circumstances.

15. In reaching this conclusion, the Committee assumes three things. First, we assume that up-charging the client for the credit card company's processing fee does not in itself violate the law or the credit card contract between the lawyer, on the one hand, and the credit card company or the bank issuing the credit card, on the other. We are aware that the use of credit cards may subject lawyers to regulations under certain federal and state laws, such as consumer protection and data breach notification statutes, but such requirements of law are outside the scope of this Committee's jurisdiction. See N.Y. City 2014-3 n.1.

16. Second, we assume that the lawyer satisfies the general ethical conditions for accepting credit card payments by clients (see ¶ 5, above).

17. Third, insofar as the lawyer is passing along to the client an up-charge based on the credit card company's processing fee to the lawyer, we assume that an explanation of this up-charge will be included as part of any required written engagement letter under 22 N.Y.C.R.R. § 1215.1. See Rule 1.5(b) and N.Y. State 763, n. 6. This disclosure is especially important with respect to the payment of credit card company processing fees, because the lawyer's imposition of such a charge on the client reverses what we understand to be the normal mercantile practice in New York, when the merchant, not the customer, pays the credit card company's processing fee.

CONCLUSION:

18. A lawyer may, as an administrative convenience, charge a client a nominal amount over the actual processing fees imposed on the lawyer by a credit card company in connection with the client's payment by credit card of the lawyer's advance payment retainer, as long as (i) the client receives disclosure of the up-charge and consents to it before the lawyer imposes it, (ii) the amount of the up-charge is nominal, and (iii) the total amount of the advance payment retainer and the processing fees charged, including the up-charge) are reasonable under the circumstances.

OPINION 1051 (03/25/2015)

TOPIC: Attorney's fees, amending fee agreement, litigation funding

DIGEST: Where a contingent fee agreement provides for the fee to be calculated on the amount of the recovery "by settlement or judgment," whether the lawyer may take a percentage of the amount loaned to the client by a third party is a question of law beyond the jurisdiction of the Committee. A retainer agreement may ethically provide for such a payment ab initio. If it does not, the lawyer may ask the client to amend the retainer agreement to provide specifically for such payment. However any such amendment would be subject to scrutiny under Rule 1.8(a) as a business transaction with a client, because (1) there has been no apparent change of circumstances, other than the fact that the client has determined to pay a litigation funding firm for earlier access to funds, (2) the lawyer apparently would be taking funds from property other than that recovered through the lawyer's efforts in the litigation, (3) the amendment would benefit solely the lawyer, (4) the advance would likely come at a significant cost to the client, and (5) it is likely that the client would be looking to the lawyer to exercise professional judgment on behalf of the client in connection with the amendment.

RULES: 1.5, 1.8(a).

FACTS:

1. The inquirer represents numerous plaintiffs in a mass tort action that has been settled. The settlement establishes a fund to which the various plaintiffs may apply in the future if they should meet specific criteria regarding damages.

2. The settlement fund might not pay out to a particular member of the plaintiff class for years because the settlement covers many currently asymptomatic individuals, and will pay out only if they develop the defined symptoms under the settlement. Some class members may not want to wait to see if they develop the defined symptoms. They are interested in taking an "advance" settlement, rather than risking that they will never qualify for a payout under the settlement.

3. One company is offering an immediate payment to individuals covered by the settlement. That company would lend money to a client (an "advance"), in exchange for any of the proceeds the individual recovers under the settlement, up to the amount of the advance, plus interest. Amounts due under the advance would be secured with a lien on the individual plaintiff's monetary recovery, if any. If the individual never recovered under the settlement, he or she would not owe anything to the lender and could keep the advance.

4. The inquirer's engagement agreement states, "If a monetary recovery is obtained for CLIENT by settlement or judgment, ATTORNEYS will be entitled to compensation for their services in the amount of 25% of the recovery and attorneys shall also be entitled to recovery of costs."

QUESTION:

5. Where an attorney has a retainer agreement with a plaintiff in a lawsuit giving the lawyer a contingent fee based on any recovery "by settlement or judgment," may the attorney take the contin-gent fee from an advance the client has received in exchange for a lien on the plaintiff's monetary recovery?

OPINION:

6. At the outset, we note that this inquiry does not raise, and we do not opine on, the ethical issues that arise in connection with litigation funding. This Committee has addressed such issues in the past. See N.Y. State 666 (1994) (addressing whether a lawyer could properly refer a client to a litigation funding firm); N.Y. State 769 (2003) (addressing whether the attorney could represent a client in negotiating and carrying out a litigation funding agreement and charge the client an additional fee for this service). See also N.Y. City 2011-2 (2011) (concluding that it is not unethical per se for a lawyer to represent a client who enters into a non-recourse litigation financing arrangement with a third party lender, but discussing a number of ethical issues that may arise, including the possible compromise of confidentiality and waiver of attorney-client privilege, and the potential impact on a lawyer's exercise of independent judgment).[28]

7. Rule 1.5 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") provides as follows: "A lawyer shall not make an agreement for, charge, or collect an excessive or illegal fee or expense." Rule 1.8(e) prohibits a lawyer from acquiring a proprietary interest in a cause of action the lawyer is conducting, except that the lawyer may "contract with a client for a reasonable contingent fee in a civil matter."

8. Rule 1.5(c) contains detailed requirements with respect to contingent fee agreements. It provides:

> (c) A fee may be contingent on the outcome of the matter for which the service is rendered, except in a matter in which a contingent fee is prohibited by paragraph (d) or other law. Promptly after a lawyer has been employed in a contingent fee matter, the lawyer shall provide the client with a writing stating the method by which the fee is to be determined, including the percentage or percentages that shall accrue to the lawyer in the event of settlement, trial or appeal; litigation and other expenses to be deducted from the recovery; and whether such expenses are to be deducted before or, if not prohibited by statute or court rule, after the contingent fee is calculated. The writing must clearly notify the client of any expenses for which the client will be liable regardless of whether the client is the prevailing party. Upon conclusion of a contingent fee matter, the lawyer shall provide the client with a writing stating the outcome of the matter and, if there is a recovery, showing the remittance to the client and the method of its determination.

9. Contingent fees in claims and actions for personal injury are also governed by court rules. See, e.g., 22 NYCRR § 603.7 (First Dep't), 22 NYCRR § 806.13 (Third Dep't) (where an attorney's fee depends in whole or in part upon the amount of the recovery, and is equal to or less than the amount contained in the rule's schedule of fees, the fee is deemed to be fair and reasonable).

28 See generally ABA, Commission on Ethics 20/20, Informational Report to the House of Delegates on Alternative Litigation Finance, available at http://www.americanbar.org/content/dam/aba/administrative/ethics_2020/20111212_ethics_20_20_alf_white_paper_final_hod_informational_report.authcheckdam.pdf.

10. The inquirer's retainer agreement entitles the inquirer to payment when "a monetary recovery is obtained for client by settlement or judgment." The interpretation of a fee agreement and the interpretation of the applicable court rules – including whether a monetary recovery through an advance qualifies as "a monetary recovery by settlement or judgment" – are matters of law. This Committee does not answer questions of law. But cf., Knight v. Aqui, 966 F. Supp.2d 989 (N.D. Cal. 2013) (attorney whose fee agreement is silent as to how attorneys' fees shall be paid in the event of a structured settlement is permitted to receive fees only on the same pro rata basis that the client receives compensation); American Law Institute, Restatement of the Law Governing Lawyers, § 35, cmt. e (when a client will receive a structured settlement providing for regular payments over the client's lifetime, a lawyer with a contingent fee agreement is entitled to receive the stated share of each such payment if and when it is made to the client, unless the client-lawyer contract provides otherwise).

11. Any attempt to collect a legal fee that is not authorized is an ethical issue. Any fee that is not authorized by a retainer agreement would be "excessive." See Rule 1.5(a)(prohibiting an "excessive or illegal fee"). Moreover, agreements regarding legal fees are strictly construed against the lawyer. See, e.g., Matter of Kuneicki, 35 A.D. 3d 742, (2d Dep't 2006) ("In cases of doubt and ambiguity, an agreement between a client and the attorney must be construed most favorably to the client".)

12. If the retainer agreement as currently drafted would not be interpreted as including, in the phrase "monetary recovery by settlement or judgment," a loan or advance offered by a third party, then the question is whether the retainer agreement could ethically be amended to authorize such payment.

13. If the inquirer's retainer agreement had provided ab initio for payment of the lawyer's fees and expenses out of a loan or advance secured by an interest in the client's legal claim, such agreement would not have violated Rule 1.5, as long as the fee was not excessive within the meaning of Rule 1.5(a). Whether such a fee would be considered a contingency fee and entitled to the presumption of reasonableness contained in the court rules is a matter of law about which we do not opine.

14. In many instances, it is possible to amend a fee agreement with the concurrence of the lawyer and client. "However, such an amendment raises ethical concerns, because [a] lawyer is often in a position to take unfair advantage of the client." N.Y. State 910 (2012).

15. As we noted in N.Y. State 910, while some amendments to fee agreements may be subject only to Rule 1.5's prohibition against excessive or illegal fees, other amendments are considered a "business transaction with a client" and are also subject to Rule 1.8. In N.Y. State 910, we set out a number of factors that will determine whether the higher scrutiny of Rule 1.8 is warranted.

16. First, we noted that, since the lawyer is the drafter of the fee contract and should be expected to anticipate most changes in circumstances that may occur during the representation, one consideration is whether there has been a material change in circumstances. A second and related factor is the length of time since the contract was entered into, which will affect the reasonableness of the lawyer's failure to anticipate the changed circumstances in the original contract. For example, in N.Y. State 910 we noted that if the representation was expected to be completed within a year, and the contract therefore did not make provision for the law firm's customary annual increases in billable rates, an amendment a year later would be tested under Rule 1.5, and not Rule 1.8. A third factor is the sophistication of the client, and whether the client is a frequent user of legal services and thus is in a position to determine the reasonableness of the proposed amendment. A fourth factor is whether the amendment benefits the client. For example, we noted in N.Y. State 910 that, if the client is no longer able to pay an agreed-upon hourly rate and the contract is amended to provide for a contingent fee, the amendment has been held to be subject to Rule 1.5 rather than Rule 1.8. ABA 11-458 (2011). New York case law often applies higher scrutiny to modifications of retainer agreements that are beneficial to the attorney. See, e.g., Baye v. Grindlinger, 78 A.D.2d 60, 432 N.Y.S.2d 624 (2d Dep't 1989) (as to contracts made between the attorney and the client subsequent to employment which are beneficial to the attorney, it is incumbent on the attorney to show that the terms are fair and reasonable and fully known and understood by the client), Naiman v. N.Y. Univ. Hosps Ctr., 351 F. Supp.2d 257, 264 (S.D.N.Y. 2005) (midstream modifications of retainer agreements must be carefully scrutinized and attorney must show that the terms are fair and reasonable to the client).

17. Applying these factors, we believe a retainer agreement amendment to require that the client pay the lawyer out of the proceeds of any loan taken out by the client should be scrutinized under Rule 1.8(a) as a business transaction between the lawyer and client. First, it is not clear there has been any change of circumstances, other than the fact that the client has determined to pay a litigation funding firm for earlier access to funds. Second, Rule 1.8, Cmt. [16] provides that when a lawyer negotiates a contractual security interest in property other than that recovered through the lawyer's efforts in the litigation, the acquisition of the security interest is a business or financial transaction with a client that is governed by Rule 1.8(a). Similarly, the amendment here would give the lawyer access to the proceeds of the client's advance, which appear to be different from the moneys recovered through the lawyers efforts. Third, the amendment here would benefit solely the lawyer. Moreover, it might come at a significant cost to the client, both because a client who never develops symptoms meriting an award from the settlement fund might otherwise never have to pay the lawyer, and because, if the client does later develop symptoms and obtains an award from the settlement fund, the client will have to pay interest on the amount taken by the attorney as his fee under the amended agreement.

18. The inquiry here does not specify the terms on which the funding firm would make advances to individuals covered by the settlement. Literature on litigation funding firms indicates that such firms often charge 3-5 percent monthly for such advances (and sometimes more).[29] Because many litigation funding firms style their funding as a purchase of an interest in the eventual judgment rather than as a loan, most litigation funding loans are not considered to be "loans" under state law, and the effective interest rate generally is not considered to be "interest" for purposes of state usury laws. Thus, where the retainer agreement provides that the lawyer is entitled to take the contingency fee proportion of any advance arranged from a litigation funding firm, the agreement is essentially requiring the client to pay a high rate of interest in order to provide the lawyer with a portion of the legal fee at an earlier time than might otherwise be the case. For this reason, at least one state that regulates the provision of litigation funding services prohibits the proceeds of the litigation funding from being used for attorneys' fees or costs of litigation. See Okla. S. Supp. 2013, 14A-3-814(A)(8).

29 See Jonathan T. Molot, "A Market Approach to Litigation Accuracy," 2009, paper presented at "Third Party Litigation Funding and Claim Transfer—Trends and Implications for the Civil Justice System," RAND Institute for Civil Justice and UCLA Law policy symposium, RAND Corporation, June 2, 2009; see also Rancman v. Interim Settlement Funding Corp., 789 N.E.2d 217 (Ohio 2003)(financing transaction had return exceeding 180 percent per year). See generally Steven Garber, Alternative Litigation Funding in the United States: Issues, Knowns and Unknowns (Rand Corp. 2010).

19. A key question under Rule 1.8(a) is whether the client "expects the lawyer to exercise professional judgment [in the transaction] for the benefit of the client." That question can turn on a number of factors, including the sophistication of the client and the complexity of the transaction. Here, a critical question for the client in assessing the proposed amendment to the fee agreement is whether the existing fee agreement already permits such a deduction of the fee from the proceeds of the advance, and, if not, whether agreeing to the amendment is in the client's best interest. When the lawyer explains to the client how a court would interpret the existing contract and whether the amendment benefits the client, the client will likely expect the lawyer to be exercising professional judgment for the benefit of the client. In addition, if the fee agreement does not already provide for taking the fee out of the loan proceeds – and the lawyer presumably would be seeking an amendment only if the lawyer concludes that the fee agreement does not already so provide or is not sufficiently clear – the client clearly needs the protections provided by Rule 1.8(a).

20. When Section 1.8(a) is applicable, the amendment must be fair and reasonable to the client and the terms of the transaction must be fully disclosed and transmitted in writing in a manner that can be reasonably understood by the client; the client must be advised in a writing of the desirability of seeking (and be given a reasonable opportunity to seek) the advice of independent legal counsel, and the client must give informed consent, in a writing signed by the client, to the essential terms of the transaction, including whether the lawyer is representing the client in the transaction and whether the lawyer is receiving a referral fee or other compensation from the litigation funding firm. In addition, the lawyer has the burden of demonstrating that the terms of the amendment are fair and reasonable.

CONCLUSION:

21. Where a contingent fee agreement provides for the fee to be calculated on the amount of the recovery "by settlement or judgment," whether the lawyer may take a percentage of the amount loaned to the client by a third party is a question of law beyond the jurisdiction of the Committee. A retainer agreement may ethically provide for such a payment ab initio. If it does not, the lawyer may ask the client to amend the retainer agreement to provide specifically for such payment. However any such amendment would be subject to scrutiny under Rule 1.8(a) as a business transaction with a client, because (1) there has been no apparent change of circumstances, other than the fact that the client has determined to pay a litigation funding firm for earlier access to funds, (2) the lawyer apparently would be taking funds from property other than that recovered through the lawyer's efforts in the litigation, (3) the amendment would benefit solely the lawyer, (4) the advance would likely come at a significant cost to the client, and (5) it is likely that the client would be looking to the lawyer to exercise professional judgment on behalf of the client in connection with the amendment.

OPINION 1052 (03/25/2015)

TOPIC: Compensating clients to rate lawyer on Internet website

DIGEST: A lawyer may give clients a $50 credit on their legal bills if they rate the lawyer on an Internet website such as Avvo that allows clients to evaluate their lawyers, provided the credit against the lawyer's bill is not contingent on the content of the rating, the client is not coerced or compelled to rate the lawyer, and the ratings and reviews are done by the clients and not by the lawyer.

RULES: 7.1(a)-(d), 7.2(a), and 8.4(c)

FACTS:

1. A lawyer would like more of his clients to rate him on Avvo, a website that allows clients to rate their lawyers with one to five stars. To rate a lawyer, a client would visit the Avvo website, look up the lawyer by name, and submit a review. A sample review might say, "I could not be more pleased with Ms. X. She is thorough, honest, caring and available. Her prices are reasonable compared to others. She specializes in elder law and knows her specialty," or "Attorney Z did a great job on my case. He was very upfront about what to expect and he got very good results. Highly recommended." (Many reviews are longer.) Clients also rate the lawyer on a scale of 1 to 5 for five categories: "Overall rating," "Trustworthy," "Responsive," "Knowledgeable," and "Kept me informed," and clients either check or do not check a box saying that they would "recommend" the lawyer. (For more information about Avvo ratings and how they are calculated, see http://www.avvo.com/support/avvo_rating.)

2. After a client writes a review online, the review is read internally at Avvo before it is posted on the website. Once Avvo has approved a review, it will be posted under the heading "Client Reviews" on the attorney's page on the Avvo website and will become part of the attorney's profile. The inquiring attorney is apparently confident that if clients take the time to rate him, he will receive high ratings and positive reviews, which will help to boost his reputation and encourage other clients to hire him. The inquirer therefore wants to offer clients a $50 credit on their bills for legal fees if they rate him on Avvo. The credit would not be contingent on the content of a review, the scores in the ratings, or whether a client checks the box recommending the lawyer to others.

QUESTION:

3. May a lawyer give clients a $50 credit on their legal bills if they rate the lawyer on an Internet website that allows clients to evaluate their lawyers?

OPINION:

4. The inquiry raises issues under several provisions of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"). We take these issues in turn.

A. Rule 7.2(a): Giving a person something of value to recommend the lawyer

5. The first issue is whether giving clients a $50 credit against their legal bills if they rate the lawyer would violate Rule 7.2(a), which provides, in pertinent part, as follows:

> A lawyer shall not compensate or give anything of value to a person or organization to recommend or obtain employment by a client, or as a reward for having made a recommendation resulting in employment by a client . . . .

Rule 7.2(a) also has certain exceptions that do not apply here.

6. Rule 7.2(a) does not apply because the inquirer is asking for a rating, not a recommendation. The inquirer says he will give a $50 credit to any client who rates the lawyer, without regard to the content of the rating and without regard to whether the client recommends the lawyer to others. A client thus remains free to give the lawyer a bad rating and remains free not to check the box saying that she would recommend the lawyer to others. Moreover, the inquirer is not making the $50 credit contingent on whether some future person retains the lawyer as a result of the rating. Thus, the credit is not a "reward" for making a recommendation "resulting in employment by a client."

7. If the inquirer made the credit contingent on receiving a positive review or high scores, or if the inquirer made the credit contingent on being retained by a new client as a result of the rating, then the credit would violate Rule 7.2(a). Those are not the facts before us.

B. Rules 7.1(a), (d) and (e) and Rule 8.4(c): Testimonials from clients

8. Rule 7.1(d)(3) allows lawyers to advertise testimonials from current and former clients – but Rule 7.1(e)(4) requires that "in the case of a testimonial or endorsement from a client with respect to a matter still pending, the client gives informed consent confirmed in writing." The term "testimonial" is not defined in the Rules of Professional Conduct, but the term "advertisement" is defined in Rule 1.0(a) as follows:

> "Advertisement" means any public or private communication made by or on behalf of a lawyer or law firm about that lawyer or law firm's services, the primary purpose of which is for the retention of the lawyer or law firm. It does not include communications to existing clients or other lawyers. [Emphasis added.]

9. A client's freely given review or rating is not an "advertisement" within the definition in Rule 1.0(a) because the review is not made "by or on behalf" of the lawyer.

10. If the inquirer were to coerce or compel a client to rate the lawyer with respect to a pending matter, then the rating (i.e., testimonial) would be "on behalf of the lawyer, and would hence be an "advertisement" subject to Rule 7.1(e)(4). And if the lawyer, rather than the client, were to write the review or fill in the ratings, then they would be "by . . . the lawyer," and would be advertisements under Rule 1.0(a) subject to Rule 7.1(a), which prohibits advertisements that are "false, deceptive or misleading." A rating that purports to be made by a client but was actually made by the lawyer would be deceptive and misleading (and perhaps false as well). See N.Y. State 661 (1994) ("a dramatization using a fictional client testimonial is unethical because it is inherently false, deceptive and misleading").

11. Moreover, a coerced rating would violate Rule 7.1(e)(4) because the lawyer would lack the client's "consent." Consent must be voluntary – it cannot be compelled. But according to the inquirer, clients can freely choose whether to rate the lawyer. The only inducement is a $50 credit to those who do so. That is not coercion or compulsion; it is an incentive. Cf. N.Y. State 873 (2011) (Rules of Professional Conduct do not prohibit an attorney from offering a prize to join the attorney's social network as long as the prize offer is not illegal).

12. Furthermore, Rule 8.4(c) provides that a lawyer or law firm shall not "engage in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation." Even as to testimonials from former clients – which are not subject to Rule 7.1(e)(4)'s requirement of informed consent – a coerced rating, or one written by the lawyer, would constitute not only an advertisement subject to Rule 7.1(a) but also conduct involving deceit and misrepresentation in violation of Rule 8.4(c), attempting to pass off the lawyer's words and opinions as the former client's. See Rule 7.1, Cmt. [6] ("all communications by lawyers, whether subject to the special rules governing lawyer advertising or not, are governed by the general rule that lawyers may not engage in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation"); N.Y. State 873 ¶ 15 (2011) ("Whether or not the prize offer is an advertisement, the inquirer must be honest").

13. Since the inquirer has not asked about advertising the Avvo rating, we do not address whether Avvo ratings are "bona fide professional ratings" within the meaning of Rule 7.1(b)(1), or how other advertising provisions might apply if the inquirer were to advertise his Avvo rating. Nor do we address whether Rule 8.4(c), which prohibits a lawyer from engaging in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation, requires the inquirer to disclose that he has given certain clients a $50 inducement to rate him on Avvo. Finally, we do not address whether the inquirer's plan complies with the Federal Trade Commission's Guides Concerning the Use of Endorsements and Testimonials in Advertising, 16 C.F.R. Part 255. (The FTC Guides are available online at http://1.usa.gov/1CikwjJ.) Whether a lawyer's conduct complies with FTC guidelines is a question of law beyond our jurisdiction.

CONCLUSION:

14. A lawyer may give clients a $50 credit on their legal bills if they rate the lawyer on an Internet website such as Avvo that allows clients to evaluate their lawyers, provided the credit against the lawyer's bill is not contingent on the content of the rating, the client is not coerced or compelled to rate the lawyer, and the ratings and reviews are done by the clients and not by the lawyer.

OPINION 1053 (04/10/2015)

TOPIC: Attorney-Client Privilege; Sign Language Interpreters; Communication; Competence

DIGEST: The scope and application of the attorney-client privilege is a question of law beyond the jurisdiction of this Committee, but we note that courts have repeatedly held that the privilege is not waived by a lawyer's use of an agent to facilitate communication with a client. If use of a sign-language interpreter does not waive the privilege, and use of such an interpreter is necessary for effective communication between the lawyer and client, it is ethically required.

RULES: 1.1, 1.4, 1.6

FACTS:

1. The inquirer works for an organization dedicated, in part, to assuring that persons with disabilities receive the rights afforded to them by federal and state law. In assisting deaf persons to navigate the legal system, the inquirer has encountered lawyers who contend that they cannot represent these individuals because they believe the use of sign language interpreters would violate the attorney-client privilege. The inquirer asks whether a lawyer's use of a sign language interpreter jeopardizes the confidentiality of a communication between lawyer and client.

QUESTION:

2. Is a lawyer's use of a sign language interpreter ethically permitted when it is necessary to communicate effectively with a client?

OPINION:

3. Rule 1.6(a) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") provides, with specific exceptions, that a lawyer "shall not knowingly reveal confidential information . . . or use such information to the disadvantage of a client or for the advantage of the lawyer or a third person." As Comment [3] to this Rule explains, "The principle of client-lawyer confidentiality is given effect in three related bodies of law: the attorney-client privilege of evidence law, the work-product doctrine of civil procedure and the professional duty of confidentiality established in legal ethics codes."

4. The scope and application of the attorney-client privilege is a question of law, and it is beyond the authority of this Committee to resolve questions of law. Nonetheless, the Committee notes that courts have repeatedly held that the attorney-client privilege is not waived by a lawyer's use of an agent to facilitate communication with a client. See United States v. Ackert, 169 F.3d 136, 139 (2d Cir. 1999) ("the inclusion of a third party in attorney-client communications does not destroy the privilege if the purpose of the third party's participation is to improve the comprehension of the communications between attorney and client"); People v. Osorio, 75 N.Y.2d 80 (1989) (communications made to counsel through an agent of either attorney or client to facilitate communication generally held privileged); Stroh v. General Motors Corp., 213 A.D.2d 267 (1st Dept. 1995) (presence of daughter of elderly client during conversations with attorney does not vitiate privilege); see generally American Law Institute, Restatement of the Law Governing Lawyers § 70; see also N.Y. Judiciary Law, art. 12 (providing for the hiring of court interpreters and the appointment of interpreters for deaf parties or witnesses). Nor does the use of a sign language interpreter necessarily violate Rule 1.6's general requirement that a lawyer safeguard a client's confidential information. See Rule 5.3 Comment [2] ("[nonlawyer] assistants, whether they are employees or independent contractors, act for the lawyer in rendition of the lawyer's professional services.")

5. In order to maintain the privilege, the lawyer or law firm should ensure that the interpreter understands the requirement to maintain confidentiality. See Rule 5.3 (A law firm shall ensure that the work of nonlawyers who work for the firm is adequately supervised, as appropriate) and Comment [2] thereto ("A law firm must ensure that such assistants [both employees and independent contractors that act for the lawyer in rendition of professional services] are given appropriate instruction and supervision concerning the ethical aspects of their employment, particularly regarding the obligation not to disclose information relating to representation of the client . . . ."). Rule 5.3 notes that the lawyer may take into account factors such as the experience of the person whose work is being supervised. For example, the lawyer may need to take fewer precautions with a professional interpreter who is subject to a code of conduct than with a family member or friend of the client, who may not understand the requirements for retaining the privilege.

6. If use of a sign-language interpreter would not violate the attorney-client privilege, then when such use is necessary for effective communication between the lawyer and client, it is ethically required. Rule 1.4 governs a lawyer's duty to communicate meaningfully with a client. It includes, inter alia, the responsibility to apprise a client of material developments in the client's matter, to consult with the client about the means by which a client's objectives are to be accomplished, and to comply promptly with a client's reasonable requests for information. Rule 1.4 (a)(1)(iii), (2), and (4). As noted in Comment [1] to Rule 1.4, "reasonable communication between the lawyer and the client is necessary for the client to participate effectively in the representation." Thus, when a lawyer has a client with whom the only means of effective communication is through a sign language interpreter, the lawyer can satisfy the requirements of Rule 1.4 only by engaging this type of interpreter. N.Y. City 1995-12 (foreign language and sign interpreters). Accord, Utah Opinion 96-06 (foreign language interpreters); California Opinion 1984-77 (same).

7. Finally, if a lawyer needs a sign language interpreter to communicate effectively with a client, then, unless the lawyer utilizes such an interpreter, the lawyer would be unable to provide "competent representation" to the client, as required by Rule 1.1. As noted by Comment [5] to Rule 1.1, competent handling of a particular matter includes, inter alia, "inquiry into and analysis of the factual . . . elements of a problem." With many hearing-impaired clients, a lawyer could not effectively engage in the required inquiry if he failed to avail himself of a sign language interpreter. N.Y. City 1995-12. Accord, Utah Opinion 96-06; California Opinion 1984-77.

CONCLUSION:

8. The scope and application of the attorney-client privilege is a question of law beyond the jurisdiction of this Committee, but we note that courts have repeatedly held that the privilege is not waived by a lawyer's use of an agent to facilitate communication with a client. If use of a sign-language interpreter does not waive the privilege, and use of such an interpreter is necessary for effective communication between the lawyer and client, it is ethically required.

OPINION 1054 (04/10/2015)

TOPIC: Choice of law, virtual law office.

DIGEST: If a New York lawyer has been admitted to practice (generally, or for purposes of a proceeding) before the Virginia courts, when the lawyer represents a client in a proceeding in a court in Virginia, the Rules of Professional Conduct to be applied will ordinarily be Virginia's rules. If the lawyer does not represent a client in a proceeding in a court, the rules to be applied will be those of the "admitting jurisdiction" in which the inquirer principally practices, unless the conduct "clearly" has its "predominant effect" in another jurisdiction in which the lawyer is licensed to practice. If the lawyer is permitted to practice in Virginia without being formally admitted there, the lawyer will be deemed to be "licensed to practice" in Virginia for purposes of Rule 8.5(b)(2). However, if the lawyer solicits retention by residents of New York, the lawyer's conduct in connection with such solicitation would have its principal effect in New York, and the disciplinary authorities will apply New York's ethics rules.

RULES: Rules 1.1, 1.4, 1.6(c), 1.15, 5.1, 5.3, 5.5, 7.1(h), 7.3(i), 8.5(b)(1) & (2).

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is an attorney licensed to practice in both the State of New York and the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. He now intends to open a solo law office in Virginia, for the sole purpose of representing veterans and their dependents in the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, the United States District Courts in Virginia, and the Administrative Board of Veterans Appeals.

2. The inquirer seeks to practice in Virginia by using a physical office two days per month, using the street address of the office as his mailing address, having access to a private mailbox at that address five days a week; answering phone calls personally when in the office; forwarding calls to the inquirer's cell phone or to a personal voicemail account attached to the cell phone when he is not in the physical office; and using a recorded message when he is not available to answer a phone call.

3. The inquirer formerly worked for the federal government, working on rulemakings pertaining to veterans' benefits and representing the government on appellate briefs.

4. The inquirer states that he has obtained an advisory opinion from the Virginia State Bar Association's ethics committee, advising that he is permitted to practice from an office address in Virginia, as long as the inquirer (a) limits his practice to federal court and (b) indicates on his letterhead, business cards and website that he is licensed to practice law only in New York and Pennsylvania. The inquirer also states that such opinion would permit the inquirer to operate using a "virtual office."

QUESTION:

5. May a lawyer admitted only in New York and Pennsylvania practice in the federal courts in Virginia and before the Administrative Board of Veterans Affairs from a "virtual office" in Virginia?

OPINION:

6. Under Rule 8.5(a) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"), a lawyer admitted in New York is subject to the disciplinary authority of New York no matter where the lawyer's conduct occurs. However, the rules of conduct that the disciplinary authority will apply will depend on the choice of law rules set forth in Rule 8.5(b). Rule 8.5(b) provides:

> (b) In any exercise of the disciplinary authority of this state, the rules of professional conduct to be applied shall be as follows:
> (1) For conduct in connection with a proceeding in a court before which a lawyer has been admitted to practice (either generally or for purposes of that proceeding), the rules to be applied shall be the rules of the jurisdiction in which the court sits, unless the rules of the court provide otherwise; and
> (2) For any other conduct:
>
> (i) If the lawyer is licensed to practice only in this state, the rules to be applied shall be the rules of this state, and
> (ii) If the lawyer is licensed to practice in this state and another jurisdiction, the rules to be applied shall be the rules of the admitting jurisdiction in which the lawyer principally practices; provided, however, that if particular conduct clearly has its predominant effect in another jurisdiction in which the lawyer is licensed to practice, the rules of that jurisdiction shall be applied to that conduct.

7. We assume for purposes of this opinion that the inquirer has been (or will be) admitted to practice, either generally or for purposes of a particular proceeding, before the federal courts in Virginia. See Rule 5.5 (a lawyer shall not practice law in a jurisdiction in violation of the regulation of the legal profession in that jurisdiction).

8. Clearly, if the inquirer has been admitted to practice before the Virginia courts (either generally or for purposes of a particular proceeding), when the inquirer represents a client in a proceeding in a court in Virginia, then Rule 8.5(b)(1) provides that Virginia's ethics rules will be applied, unless the court rules provide otherwise. For purposes of Rule 8.5(b)(1), the Administrative Board of Veterans Affairs is not a "court." As we noted in N.Y. State 968 (2013):

> As [the inquirer is] asking in part about conduct in connection with a proceeding before an administrative tribunal, the question arises whether such an administrative tribunal is a "court" within the meaning of Rule 8.5(b)(1). The Rules contain a definition of "tribunal," which includes both a "court" and an "administrative agency or other body acting in an adjudicative capacity." Rule 1.0(w). In adopting Rule 8.5, the New York Appellate Divisions declined to adopt a version of Rule 8.5 proposed by the New York State Bar Association that substituted the word "tribunal" for the word "court" in the prior version of this rule. . . . [W]e do not believe we are free to read "court" in Rule 8.5(b)(1) to include administrative tribunals. . . .

> For the same reason, in 2010, the New York State Bar Association amended Comment [4] to Rule 8.5 to replace the word "tribunal" with the word "court." See also N.Y. State 1027 (2014) (canons of statutory construction support the conclusion that the term "court" in Rule 8.5(b)(1) excludes the other types of tribunal listed in Rule 1.0(w)).

9. When the inquirer does not represent a client in a proceeding in a "court," Rule 8.5(b)(2) provides that the ethics rules to be applied will be those of the "admitting jurisdiction" in which the inquirer "principally practices," unless the conduct "clearly has its predominant effect in another jurisdiction in which the lawyer is licensed to practice." Rule 8.5(b)(2) thus recognizes that New York does not have an interest in applying its own rules when the lawyer's conduct has its principal effect in another jurisdiction that has disciplinary authority over the conduct.

10. Here, the inquirer is not formally admitted to the bar in Virginia, the jurisdiction in which he intends to principally practice. However, in N.Y. State 815 (2007), we determined that, if a New York lawyer is permitted to engage in conduct in another jurisdiction without being formally admitted in that jurisdiction, then the lawyer should be deemed to be "licensed to practice" in the other jurisdiction, even though such conduct would constitute the practice of law if the lawyer were practicing in New York.[30] According to the inquirer, the Virginia State Bar Association has opined that he may practice from an office address in Virginia, as long as he limits his practice to federal court, and indicates on his letterhead, business cards and website that he is licensed to practice law only in New York and Pennsylvania. Consequently, the inquirer is deemed "licensed to practice" in Virginia, and the New York disciplinary authorities would ordinarily apply the Virginia Rules of Professional Conduct to his conduct. However, an exception will arise if the inquirer solicits business in New York or Pennsylvania. In that case, the lawyer's conduct regarding the solicitation would clearly have its "predominant effect" in the admitting jurisdiction to which the solicitations are directed, and the disciplinary authorities would apply the rules of that jurisdiction to the solicitations. Cf., New York Rule 7.3(i) (the provisions of Rule 7.3 on solicitation apply to a lawyer not admitted in New York who solicits retention by residents of New York). Whether any ensuing business would also be subject to the rules of such admitting jurisdiction depends upon where such business has its "predominant effect." That is a factual question on which we do not opine.

11. Assuming the inquirer is soliciting business in New York, another question arises: must he have a local office in New York? This question is governed by law and not by the Rules. In N.Y. State 1025 (2014), we noted that Judiciary Law §470 has been interpreted by New York courts to require that attorneys have an office in New York if they practice, but do not live, in New York. See Lichtenstein, 251 A.D.2d 64; Haas, 237 A.D.2d 729; Matter of Larsen, 182 A.D.2d 149 (2d Dept 1992). We also determined that Rule 7.1(h), which requires that every lawyer advertisement include the "principal law office address and telephone number of the lawyer or law firm whose services are being offered," does not provide an independent basis for requiring a physical office in New York.

12. In N.Y. State 1025, we noted the case of Schoenefeld v. New York, 748 F.3d 464 (2d Cir. 2014). There, the Northern District of New York found unconstitutional the interpretation of § 470 requiring 30 N.Y. State 815 was decided under former DR 1-105(B)(2)(b), but the language of that provision is the same as the language of Rule 8.5(b)(2)(ii), so our conclusion would remain the same today. See N.Y. State 1042 (2014); N.Y. State 1041 (2014) (both applying this principle of N.Y. State 815 under Rule 8.5(b)(2)).

a physical office. On appeal, the Second Circuit referred a certified question to the New York Court of Appeals, asking about the minimum requirements necessary to satisfy the requirement for a local office for the transaction of law business. Although the Court of Appeals had not responded when we published N.Y. State 1025, on March 31, 2015, it issued its response, confirming that the statute requires a physical office for the conduct of business. The Second Circuit must now decide whether enforcement of §470 as so interpreted would be constitutional.

13. Assuming the inquirer is soliciting business from New York residents, the inquirer must comply with various duties imposed by the Rules. See N.Y. State 1025 (2014) (listing duties under various Rules, and noting that there is no "virtual law office exception" to any of the Rules).

CONCLUSION:

14. If a New York lawyer has been admitted to practice (generally, or for purposes of a proceeding) before the Virginia courts, when the lawyer represents a client in a proceeding in a court in Virginia, the rules to be applied ordinarily will be the rules of Virginia, unless the court rules provide otherwise. If the lawyer does not represent a client in a proceeding in a court, the rules to be applied will be those of the "admitting jurisdiction" in which the inquirer principally practices, unless the conduct clearly has its predominant effect in another jurisdiction in which the lawyer is licensed to practice. If the lawyer is permitted to practice in Virginia without being formally admitted there, the lawyer should be deemed to be "licensed to practice" in Virginia for purposes of Rule 8.5(b)(2). However, if the lawyer solicits business in New York, the lawyer's conduct in connection with such solicitation would have its principal effect in New York and the disciplinary authorities would apply the rules of New York.

TOPIC: Municipal employee, business transaction with client, personal conflict of interest

DIGEST: The Rules do not prohibit a city's lawyer from purchasing from that city or the city's Urban Renewal Agency (acting as agent for the city) real property owned by the city, if (1) the proposed purchase transaction complies with any applicable statute or regulation governing conflicts of interest of government employees, (2) the lawyer is not responsible for advising the city or the Urban Renewal Agency on legal matters arising in property sales or for supervising other lawyers who are responsible for that advice, and (3) the lawyer is not in a position to use confidential information of the city in connection with the transaction. If the lawyer is (1) responsible for advising the city or the Urban Renewal Agency on legal matters arising in property sales or for supervising other lawyers who are responsible for that advice and/or (2) in a position to use confidential information of the city in connection with the transaction, the lawyer may nevertheless ethically purchase the property and/or use such information with the informed consent of the city-client if the lawyer is reasonably certain that the city is legally authorized to waive a conflict of interest (or consent to the use of confidential information, as applicable) and the city gives informed consent through a process sufficient to preclude any reasonable perception that the consent was provided in a manner inconsistent with the public trust.

RULES: 1.6(a) & (b), 1.7(a)(2), 1.8(a), 8.4(b), 1.11

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is an Assistant Corporation Counsel for a city in New York State (the "City"). As part of the inquirer's job duties the inquirer appears on the City's tax foreclosure matters. Typically, the inquirer files a motion in Supreme Court under Article 11 of the New York Real Property Tax Law, and, once an order is granted, the inquirer enters the order and records a City tax deed. After the City becomes the legal owner of certain properties as a result of the non-payment of taxes, the City markets the property either through the City's Urban Renewal Agency ("URA") or through a public auction. The URA is a public benefit corporation created by the New York State Legislature under Section 553 of the New York General Municipal Law. It provides access to individuals, community organizations and other developers interested in redeveloping properties that have been tax-foreclosed or abandoned or are distressed properties acquired by the City.

2. The inquirer is interested in purchasing a piece of property being sold by the URA. We assume that the URA has its own counsel and is not looking to the inquirer to exercise professional judgment with respect to sale transactions. The inquiry does not state whether the URA has complete discretion with respect to the sale or whether the City has any role regarding the sale or the negotiation of sale terms, and, if so, whether it would be within the inquirer's job duties to advise the City.

QUESTION:

3. May an Assistant Corporation Counsel whose job duties include appearing on the City's tax foreclosure matters purchase a piece of property that was acquired by the City in a tax foreclosure proceeding and that is being sold on behalf of the City by the City's Urban Renewal Agency?

OPINION:

4. At the outset, we note that we do not rule on matters of law. For example, the General Municipal Law contains provisions on conflicts of interest of municipal officers and employees, and authorizes a city to have a code of ethics as well as a board of ethics to render advisory opinions to officers and employees regarding their obligations under the law and any code of ethics adopted by the city. See General Municipal Law, Art. 18. We take no position here on whether the proposed transaction would violate the law. In the event the transaction is illegal and reflects adversely on the lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness as a lawyer, it would violate Rule 8.4(b) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"). See N.Y. State 845 (2010). In discussing the applicable provisions of the Rules, the remainder of this opinion assumes that the proposed purchase transaction does not violate any applicable law.

If the Real Property is Being Sold By or on Behalf of the City

5. The answer to the question posed may differ, depending on whether the Urban Renewal Agency is acting as agent for the City or as owner of the property. We will assume, first, that the URA is acting as agent for the City and that the inquirer would be purchasing the property from the City.

Conflicts of Interest

6. Business transactions between a lawyer and client are governed by Rule 1.8(a), which provides:

> (a) A lawyer shall not enter into a business transaction with a client if they have differing interests therein and if the client expects the lawyer to exercise professional judgment therein for the protection of the client, unless:
> > (1) the transaction is fair and reasonable to the client and the terms of the transaction are fully disclosed and transmitted in writing in a manner that can be reasonably understood by the client;
> > (2) the client is advised in writing of the desirability of seeking, and is given a reasonable opportunity to seek, the advice of independent legal counsel on the transaction; and
> > (3) the client gives informed consent, in a writing signed by the client, to the essential terms of the transaction and the lawyer's role in the transaction, including whether the lawyer is representing the client in the transaction.

7. Rule 1.7(a)(2) more generally governs a lawyer's personal conflicts of interests. It provides:

> (a) Except as provided in paragraph (b) [which contains a number conditions under which an exception may be available, including the informed consent of the client], a lawyer shall not represent a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that . . . (2) there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests.

8. We believe that when Rule 1.8 applies, Rule 1.7(a)(2) is not applicable. This is consistent with the principle of statutory construction that rules governing specific matters supersede more generally applicable rules. See D. Ginsberg & Sons, Inc. v. Popkin, 285 U.S. 204, 208 (1932) ("General language of a statutory provision, although broad enough to include it, will not be held to apply to a matter specifically dealt with in another part of the same enactment."). Rule 1.7 contains the general rules on conflicts of interest, while Rule 1.8, as its title – "Current Clients: Specific Conflict of Interest Rules" – indicates, contains rules governing specific conflicts of interest. In any event, the requirements for client consent to conflicts under Section 1.8(a) are at least as stringent as those under Rule 1.7(b).

9. Purchasing real property from the City constitutes a business transaction with the client. Moreover, the City and the lawyer have differing interests in the transaction, in that the City is interested in receiving the highest price for the transaction, while the lawyer-purchaser is interested in paying the lowest price. Consequently, a key issue in determining whether Rule 1.8 applies is whether the City expects the inquirer to exercise professional judgment for the protection of the client – and we believe the answer to that question depends upon whether the lawyer is responsible for legal advice regarding property sales or supervises other lawyers who are responsible for that advice. If the inquirer is responsible for such advice, or supervises other lawyers who are responsible for that advice, it puts into question whether the client's consent is fully informed. If the inquirer supervises such other lawyers, it also raises the question whether the inquirer would be doing indirectly through subordinates what a lawyer cannot do directly. See Rule 8.4(a).

10. If other lawyers in the City's law department or the URA are responsible for giving legal advice to the City regarding property sales, and if the inquirer does not supervise those lawyers regarding property sales, then Rule 1.8(a) by its terms should not apply.[31]

11. But if the inquirer is responsible for giving legal advice to the City regarding property sales, or supervises other lawyers responsible for giving legal advice to the City regarding property sales, then Rule 1.8(a) prohibits the lawyer from entering into a purchase transaction unless (1) the terms are fair and reasonable to the client, (2) the client is advised to seek the advice of independent legal counsel and (3) the client gives informed consent in writing. Comment [1] to Rule 1.11 warns that statutes and regulations governing government ethics may circumscribe the extent to which a government agency may give consent under Rule 1.11. The inquirer should determine whether the same legal impediment applies to consents under Rule 1.8(a).

31 Rule 1.8(a) applies where the client expects the lawyer to exercise professional judgment in the transaction for the protection of the client. Comment [1] to Rule 1.8 states: "If a lawyer elects . . . to enter into a business transaction with a current client, the requirements of [Rule 1.8(a)] must be met if the client and lawyer have differing interests in the transaction and the client expects the lawyer to exercise professional judgment therein for the benefit of the client. This will ordinarily be the case even when the transaction is not related to the subject matter of the representation . . . ." We believe that a number of factors will determine whether the client expects the lawyer to exercise professional judgment on the client's behalf. These include (i) whether the client has other counsel in the matter, for example, because it is a corporation or other entity with a legal department, (ii) whether the lawyer is responsible for client matters in the subject area, and (iii) whether the client is an individual or an entity and the client's level of sophistication in legal matters. We believe it is more likely that an individual client or one that is not sophisticated in legal matters is more likely to rely on a lawyer that does not represent the client in that matter than would be the case with an institutional client.

12. The requirements of informed consent are set forth in Rule 1.0(j). Until 1992, a long line of ethics opinions had held that the "government" could not consent to a conflict of interest. However, in N.Y. State 629 (1992), we determined that the question of whether the government can consent to a conflict is one of law and that the lawyer may accept consent by a government entity if he or she is reasonably certain that the entity is legally authorized to waive a conflict of interest and the process by which the consent was granted was sufficient to preclude any reasonable perception that the consent was provided in a manner inconsistent with the public trust.

13. If Rule 1.8(a) does not apply, Rule 1.7(a)(2) is implicated. The question under Rule 1.7(a)(2) is whether the lawyer's purchase of property from the City creates a significant risk of adversely affecting the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the City in matters within the realm of the lawyer's job as Assistant Corporation Counsel. This is a question of fact that is beyond the jurisdiction of our Committee. The inquirer must make that determination. If the property purchase would result in such a significant risk, then the lawyer must consider the applicability of Rule 1.7(b)(1)-(3), all of which describe circumstances under which a conflict is non-consentable (i.e. cannot be waived by the client). If the conflict is consentable, then the lawyer must obtain the client's informed consent to the conflict pursuant to Rule 1.7(b)(4).

Our Prior Opinions

14. Two prior opinions of the Committee – both decided under the former Code of Professional Responsibility – are consistent with the analysis above. In N.Y. State 470 (1977), we held it to be improper for a city attorney to purchase a city-owned building when (i) the lawyer's official duties include giving legal advice to the chairman of that city's urban renewal agency and the common council, and (ii) the common council must approve the sale. N.Y. State 470 cites DR 5-104(A) – the predecessor to Rule 1.8(a) – although the gravamen of that opinion, as well as of two additional opinions that it cites, was that the nature of the inquiring attorney's public duties was such that the attorney appeared to have some influence upon the work of the urban renewal agency. Consequently, we opined that the attorney could not be involved in a transaction that would require any action of the agency.

15. Similarly, in N.Y. State 558 (1988), the inquirer was employed by the Department of Social Services, which proposed to sell some property that the agency had acquired, in a public sale by sealed bids that would be reviewed by the Commissioner of Social Services. We opined that, because the statute gave discretion in the bid process to the Social Services Department, which might be looking to the lawyer for the exercise of professional judgment, the lawyer could not participate in the bid process. We also stated that the city could not consent to the conflict, because, as noted in paragraph 12 above, at that time a long line of ethics opinions had held that a government entity could not consent to a conflict of interest. Finally, in N.Y. State 558, we found that the lawyer's interest in purchasing the property would conflict with those of the municipality because the lawyer had access to the municipality's appraisal of the property and therefore had information that would undermine the fairness of the bidding process.

If the Real Property is Being Sold on Behalf of the Urban Renewal Agency

16. If the City has transferred the lien to the URA, then the purchase transaction would not be with the client – the City – and neither Rule 1.8(a) or Rule 1.7(a)(2) would apply.

Use of Confidential Client Information

17. Rule 1.6(a) prohibits a lawyer from knowingly using confidential information of the client to the disadvantage of a client or for the advantage of the lawyer, except as specifically authorized in section 1.6. The inquirer here represents the City in tax foreclosure matters. The inquiry notes that the inquirer files a motion in Supreme Court under Article 11 of the New York Real Property Tax Law, and, after an order is granted, enters the order and records a City tax deed. The inquiry does not state whether, as a result of that role, the inquirer gains any information about the property that would give the inquirer an advantage in an eventual purchase transaction. If that were the case, then the lawyer could use such information only with the informed consent of the client under Rule 1.6(a)(1), and it would be irrelevant whether the seller of the property were the City or the URA.

CONCLUSION:

18. The Rules would not prohibit a city's lawyer from purchasing from that city or the City's Urban Renewal Agency (acting as agent for the city), real property owned by the city, as long as (1) the proposed purchase transaction complies with any applicable statute or regulation governing conflicts of interest of government employees, (2) the lawyer is not responsible for advising the city or the Urban Renewal Agency on legal matters arising in property sales or for supervising other lawyers who are responsible for that advice, and (3) the lawyer is not in a position to use confidential information of the city in connection with the transaction. If the lawyer is responsible for advising the city or the Urban Renewal Agency on legal matters arising in property sales or for supervising other lawyers who are responsible for that advice and/or in a position to use confidential information of the city in connection with the transaction, the lawyer may nevertheless ethically purchase the property and/or use such information with the informed consent of the city-client if the lawyer is reasonably certain that the city is legally authorized to waive a conflict of interest (or consent to the use of confidential information, as applicable) and the City gives informed consent through a process sufficient to preclude any reasonable perception that the consent was provided in a manner inconsistent with the public trust.

OPINION 1056 (06/02/2015)

TOPIC: County clerk; law practice; conflict of interest

DIGEST: Subject to any overriding law or regulation governing the office, a county clerk may engage in the private practice of law provided the clerk does not participate in any way in any matter before the clerk's office in which the clerk is personally and substantially involved in private practice, and avoids use of the public office to obtain special treatment for a private client, to influence a tribunal in favor of a client, or to receive consideration from anyone in the guise of legal fees to influence official conduct.

RULES: 1.11(d) & (f)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is an elected county clerk who intends to continue practicing law while serving in that position. His law practice consists exclusively of representing parties to transactions involving real property. He confines his practice to counties adjacent to the county where he serves as clerk; he does not represent parties in transactions in the county where he serves as clerk.

2. Section 525 of the New York County Law defines the duties of a county clerk as follows:

> 1. The county clerk shall perform the duties prescribed by law as register, and be the clerk of the supreme court and clerk of the county court within his county. He shall perform such additional and related duties as may be prescribed by law and directed by the board of supervisors. 2. He shall provide at the expense of the county, all books, files and other necessary equipment for the filing, recording and depositing of documents, maps, papers in actions, and special proceedings of both civil and criminal nature, judgment and lien dockets and books for the indexing of same as directed or authorized by law.

3. Section 806 of the New York General Municipal Law provides that a county may adopt a code of ethics:

> setting forth for the guidance of its officers and employees the standards of conduct reasonably expected of them. Such code shall provide standards for officers and employees with respect to disclosure of interest in legislation before the local governing body, holding of investments in conflict with official duties, private employment in conflict with official duties, future employment and such other standards relating to the conduct of officers and employees as may be deemed advisable. Such codes may regulate or prescribe conduct which is not expressly prohibited by this article but may not authorize conduct otherwise prohibited. Such codes may provide for the prohibition of conduct or disclosure of information and the classification of employees or officers.

4. Section 808 of the New York State General Municipal Law also permits a county to establish boards of ethics to promulgate standards and to issue advisory opinions to elected officials on the consistency of proposed actions with the county's ethical norms.

QUESTION:

5. Do the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") circumscribe the inquirer's legal practice while serving as county clerk?

OPINION:

6. Rule 1.11(d) states:

> Except as law may otherwise expressly provide, a lawyer currently serving as a public officer or employee shall not:
> (1) participate in a matter in which the lawyer participated personally and substantially while in private practice or nongovernmental employment, unless under applicable law no one is, or by lawful delegation may be, authorized to act in the lawyer's stead in the matter; or
> (2) negotiate for private employment with any person who is involved as a party or as a lawyer in a matter in which the lawyer is participating personally and substantially.

7. The opening phrase of Rule 1.11(d) makes clear that any law or regulation governing the conduct of a current government official has priority over the Rules. The provisions of the General Municipal Law that authorize counties to regulate the conduct of officials are one example of the type of law or regulation that would override any inconsistent provisions of the Rules. Provisions regulating the extent of outside employment by a county official may also appear in the Public Officers Law, the County Law and the Municipal Home Rule Law. This list is not intended to be exhaustive of potentially applicable rules; others may bear on the clerk's ability to engage in law practice. See, e.g., Rules Governing Conduct of Nonjudicial Court Employees, 22 N.Y.C.R.R. §§ 50.1-50.6. Our jurisdiction is limited to opinions on the Rules, and thus we do not address the applicability of these or any other provisions of law to this inquiry.

8. Another provision of Rule 1.11 applies specifically to current government employees. Rule 1.11(f) states:

> A lawyer who holds public office shall not:
> (1) use the public position to obtain, or attempt to obtain, a special advantage in legislative matters for the lawyer or for a client under circumstances where the lawyer knows or it is obvious that such action is not in the public interest;
> (2) use the public position to influence, or attempt to influence, a tribunal to act in favor of the lawyer or of a client; or

> (3) accept anything of value from any person when the lawyer knows or it is obvious that the offer is for the purpose of influencing the lawyer's actions as a public official.

9. In N.Y. State 966 (2013), we discussed Rule 1.11(f)(2) in a situation in which the town clerk of Town A wished to represent a client in the court of Town B at a time when the client also had a matter pending in the Town A court. There we said:

> The applicability of Rule 1.11(f)(2) does not mean that in all cases, the inquirer would be precluded from representing the client's matter before Town Court B. If the inquiring clerk's duties as court clerk would not include any duties in connection with the client's matter before Town Court A (and if the inquirer did not seek in any way other than performance of assigned duties to influence Town Court A), then the Rule would not prohibit representation of the private client in the matter before Town Court B.

[emphasis supplied] Of significance, we then added:

> Moreover, the representation may be permissible even if the inquirer had very limited duties in connection with the client's matter before Town Court A. If the inquiring clerk's duties are solely ministerial, such as assigning docket number to cases, then we believe the clerk would generally not be in a position to influence the tribunal in Town Court A to act in favor of the client represented by the clerk in Town Court B.

10. This reasoning is equally applicable here. The inquirer is clerk of County A and engages in practice solely in transactional matters in Counties B, C, D, and E. The inquirer's work on behalf of clients in those latter counties would not include any matter in County A. Although not precisely posed by the inquiry, by analogy to N.Y. State 966, if the inquirer is counsel in a matter, say, in County C, to a client who also has a matter pending in County A, the inquirer must not seek in any way other than performance of ministerial duties to influence the client's matter in County A.

11. The prohibitions in Rule 1.11(f)(1) and 1.11(f)(3) are straightforward. For instance, a lawyer's use of a county clerk's position, on behalf of a client, to obtain special treatment for a private client before the county board of supervisors would run afoul of Rule 1.11(f)(1) unless the official could make a good faith judgment that the client's interests accord with the public interest. Likewise, under Rule 1.11(f)(3), the maintenance of a private business, whether in law or otherwise, as a vehicle to receive anything of value to influence an official judgment would be inconsistent with Rule 1.11(f)(3).

CONCLUSION:

12. Subject to any overriding law or regulation governing the office, a county clerk may engage in the private practice of law provided the clerk does not participate in any way in any matter before the clerk's office in which the clerk is personally and substantially involved in private practice, and avoids use of the public office to obtain special treatment for a private client, to influence a tribunal in favor of a client, or to receive consideration from anyone in the guise of legal fees to influence official conduct.

OPINION 1057 (06/05/2015)

TOPIC: Withdrawal from representation; confidential information; disclosure to court

DIGEST: The nature and extent of information about a client that a lawyer may ethically reveal on a motion to withdraw as counsel depend on whether the information is protected as confidential information under Rule 1.6. The lawyer should also consider (1) whether withdrawal is mandatory or permissive; (2) whether withdrawal may be accomplished without significant disclosure to the court; (3) whether disclosure is ordered by the court; (4) the circumstances under which the information is to be disclosed (e.g., in open court or in camera); and (5) whether the client consents to the disclosure. The lawyer may test on appeal the validity of a court's order to disclose. Client documents filed with another court in other proceedings will be deemed confidential unless their existence is generally known in the community or in the legal profession.

RULES: 1.2(a) & (d), 1.4(a)(5), 1.6, 1.16(b)(1), (c) & (e), 3.1, 3.3

FACTS:

1. The inquiring lawyer represents a client in pending litigation in state court. The lawyer's client insists that he file what the lawyer considers frivolous petitions, based on allegations made in other litigation filed by the client in federal court against members of the judiciary and another lawyer. The inquirer believes these allegations are not relevant to the matter on which he is providing representation. The inquirer is preparing a request to be relieved as counsel, and asks whether he may use the documents filed by his client in federal court, although the documents may reveal his client to be "incompetent or unstable" and thereby prejudice his client.

QUESTION:

2. When a lawyer is moving to withdraw from representing a client, may the lawyer support the motion to withdraw with documents that the client has filed in a different court, even if using those documents may prejudice the client?

OPINION:

3. In this opinion, we address the information a lawyer may reveal to the court when requesting withdrawal under Rule 1.16 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"). We assume for purposes of this opinion that the lawyer has grounds for withdrawal. If the allegations the client is urging the lawyer to make are indeed frivolous, then filing them would violate Rule 3.1(a), which prohibits a lawyer from asserting an "issue" absent a basis for doing so that is not frivolous, and Rule 3.4(d)(1), which provides that a lawyer appearing before a tribunal shall not "state or allude to any matter that the lawyer does not reasonably believe is relevant . . . ." Rule 1.2(a) requires a lawyer to abide by the client's decisions concerning the objectives of the representation, and to consult with the client as to the means by which they are to be pursued. However, in discussing a client's suggestion that the lawyer engage in conduct that violates the Rules, Comment [2] to Rule 1.16 states: "The lawyer is not obliged to decline [representation] or withdraw simply because the client suggests such a course of conduct; a client may make such a suggestion in the hope that a lawyer will not be constrained by a professional obligation."

4. Rule 1.6(a) prohibits a lawyer from knowingly revealing confidential information unless the client gives informed consent or the disclosure is permitted by Rule 1.6(b), including when permitted or required under the Rules or to comply with other law or a court order.

5. The nature and extent of information about a client that a lawyer may ethically reveal on a motion to withdraw as counsel depend on whether the information is protected as confidential information under Rule 1.6. The lawyer should also consider the following:

(1) whether withdrawal is mandatory or permissive;

(2) whether withdrawal may be accomplished without significant disclosure to the court;

(3) whether disclosure is ordered by the court;

(4) under what circumstances the information is to be disclosed (e.g., in open court or in camera); and

(5) whether the client consents to the disclosure.

Whether the Information Is Protected as "Confidential"

6. Rule 1.6(a) defines and protects certain information as "confidential":

> (a) A lawyer shall not knowingly reveal confidential information, as defined in this Rule, or use such information to the disadvantage of a client or for the advantage of the lawyer or a third person, unless:
> (1) the client gives informed consent, as defined in Rule 1.0(j);
> (2) the disclosure is impliedly authorized to advance the best interests of the client and is either reasonable under the circumstances or customary in the professional community; or
> (3) the disclosure is permitted by paragraph (b).

"Confidential information" consists of information gained during or relating to the representation of a client, whatever its source, that is (a) protected by the attorney-client privilege, (b) likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed, or (c) information that the client has requested be kept confidential. "Confidential information" does not ordinarily include (i) a lawyer's legal knowledge or legal research or (ii) information that is generally known in the local community or in the trade, field or profession to which the information relates.

7. The information at issue here was gained during the representation of the client. It is not clear that the information is protected by the attorney-client privilege, which generally protects only information that the client discloses in seeking legal advice (or that the lawyer discloses in giving legal advice). However, the inquirer believes that its disclosure would be embarrassing or detrimental to the client; consequently, the information falls within part (b) of the definition. The issue here is whether the documents filed in federal court by the client in other proceedings fall within the exception in the second sentence of the definition.

8. The definition of "confidential information" does not include "information that is generally known in the local community or in the . . . profession to which the information relates." Comment [4A] to Rule 1.6 states: "Information is not 'generally known' simply because it is in the public domain or available in a public file." See Rule 1.0(k) (the term "known" denotes actual knowledge, but a person's knowledge may be inferred from circumstances). In N.Y. State 991 (2013) we explained that sentence: "In our view, information is generally known only if it is known to a sizeable percentage of people in 'the local community or in the trade, field or profession to which the information relates.'" But see Jamaica Pub. Serv. v. AIU Ins., 92 N.Y.2d 631 (1998) (Court of Appeals, interpreting DR 5-108(A)(2) [the predecessor to current Rule 1.9(c)(1)], holds that information is "generally known" when it is readily available in such public materials as trade periodicals and filings with State and Federal regulators).

9. Here, we believe that, unless the allegations in the client's other lawsuits were reported in the public media, or unless the client himself has widely publicized the allegations, the documents in the client's other cases do not fall within the exception and therefore constitute confidential information of the client.

Whether Withdrawal Is Mandatory

10. In certain circumstances, withdrawal from a representation is mandatory. See Rule 1.16(b). In others, withdrawal is permissive – the lawyer may but is not required to withdraw from the representation. See Rule 1.16(c). In either case, as required by Rule 1.16(e), the lawyer must take steps, to the extent reasonably practicable, to avoid foreseeable prejudice to the rights of the client.

11. Where withdrawal is not mandatory, there is less of a justification for revealing client confidences. See N.Y. State 681 (1996) (having a basis for permissive withdrawal may not allow the lawyer to withdraw if confidentiality obligations prevent the lawyer from obtaining required court approval).

Whether Withdrawal May Be Accomplished Without Significant Disclosure

12. Comment [3] to Rule 1.16 discusses the extent of disclosure which ordinarily should be required of counsel seeking to withdraw:

> Court approval or notice to the court is often required by applicable law, and when so required by applicable law is also required by paragraph (d), before a lawyer withdraws from pending litigation. Difficulty may be encountered if withdrawal is based on the client's demand that the lawyer engage in unprofessional conduct. The court may request an explanation for the withdrawal, while the lawyer may be bound to keep confidential the facts that would constitute such an explanation. The lawyer's statement that professional considerations require termination of the representation ordinarily should be accepted as sufficient. Lawyers should be mindful of their obligations to both clients and the court under Rule 1.6 and Rule 3.3. (Emphasis supplied)

13. Hence, the Rules anticipate that the court usually will not demand the disclosure of confidential information if the lawyer advises the court that "professional considerations" require withdrawal. But that may not always be the case. Particularly when withdrawal is sought on the eve of trial or there has been a history of dilatory tactics, the court may demand more information about the reason counsel believes that "professional considerations require termination of the representation."

14. Where withdrawal may be accomplished simply on the basis of counsel's statement that professional considerations require it, no more should be disclosed. Accordingly, even where the information would not be deemed "confidential" as defined by Rule 1.6, it should not be disclosed if withdrawal can be accomplished without disclosure.

15. Where withdrawal may not be accomplished simply on the basis of counsel's statement that professional considerations require it, but disclosing more would not be permitted under Rule 1.6(b), the lawyer could not disclose that the client has requested that he file papers that the lawyer believes are frivolous, let alone copies of the client's prior frivolous filings.

Whether Disclosure Is Ordered by the Court

16. In some circumstances, the court may press the lawyer for further explanation that "professional considerations" require the withdrawal. If the court orders the lawyer to disclose information the lawyer believes is confidential, Rule 1.6(b) permits the lawyer to comply to the extent the lawyer reasonably believes necessary without violating his ethical obligation to protect a client's confidential information. Rule 1.6 states in relevant part:

> (b) A lawyer may reveal or use confidential information to the extent that the lawyer reasonably believes necessary: * * * (6) when permitted or required under these Rules or to comply with other law or court order.

17. But even where Rule 1.6 authorizes disclosure of client confidential information as a result of a court order, Comment [14] to Rule 1.6 suggests that disclosure adverse to the client's interest should be no greater than the lawyer reasonably believes necessary to accomplish the purpose. Moreover, if the court does not order disclosure (for example, if it merely states that permission to withdraw will not be granted without more information about the reasons for the motion to withdraw) then the exception in Rule 1.6(b)(6) does not apply.

18. Where a court orders that confidential information be disclosed, the lawyer should seek to protect the information by asking for an in camera examination by the court. In many cases, this will limit the adverse effects of disclosure on the client.

19. Alternatively, the lawyer may ethically decide not to comply immediately with the court's order. Instead, the lawyer may test the validity of the order by appealing. An appeal is not mandatory, but if the lawyer believes the information to be disclosed is protected by the attorney-client privilege, the lawyer should appeal the court order. See, e.g., N.Y. State 681 (1996) (lawyer may disclose "secrets" [such as information embarrassing or detrimental to the client] if ordered by a court to do so, but if information is protected by the privilege, lawyer may have an ethical obligation to appeal court's ruling); N.Y. State 528 (1981) (where lawyer's claim of privilege is rejected by a court ruling or order, lawyer may postpone disclosure until validity of adverse ruling is determined on appeal).

Whether the Client Consents to the Disclosure

20. The final consideration is whether the client gives informed consent to any disclosure. The lawyer cannot meet this element until after the lawyer has adequately explained the material risks of disclosure. If the lawyer does so and the client nevertheless consents to disclosure, then the lawyer may disclose the information in the course of moving to withdraw.

CONCLUSION:

21. The nature and extent of information about a client which a lawyer may ethically reveal on a motion to withdraw as counsel depend on whether the information is protected as confidential information under Rule 1.6. The lawyer should also consider (1) whether withdrawal is mandatory or permissive; (2) whether withdrawal may be accomplished without significant disclosure to the court; (3) whether disclosure is ordered by the court; (4) the circumstances under which the information is to be disclosed (e.g., in open court or in camera); and (5) whether the client consents to the disclosure. The lawyer may test on appeal the validity of a court's order to disclose. Client documents filed with another court in other proceedings will be deemed confidential unless their existence is generally known in the community or in the legal profession.

OPINION 1058 (06/10/2015)

TOPIC: Choice of law; immigration practice

DIGEST: If a lawyer is admitted solely in New York but is authorized by Federal law to practice immigration law in another state, and if the lawyer practices only immigration law and practices only in another state, then the lawyer is not required to maintain an attorney trust account in a New York banking institution unless the other state's Rules of Professional Conduct require the lawyer to do so.

RULES: 1.0(w), 1.15(b); 7.3(i), 8.5(a) & (b)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer was recently admitted to practice in New York but plans to reside and practice solely in Illinois and will engage in a practice limited to immigration law. She inquires about her obligations under Rule 1.15(b) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") regarding client trust accounts.

QUESTION:

2. If a lawyer is admitted in New York but practices solely in Illinois and limits her practice to immigration law, is the lawyer bound by the requirements in New York Rule 1.15(b) to maintain client funds in a banking institution within New York State?

OPINION:

Attorney Trust Accounts

3. Rule 1.15(a) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") provides that a lawyer who "is in possession of any funds or other property belonging to another person, where such possession is incident to his or her practice of law, is a fiduciary, and must not misappropriate such funds or property or commingle such funds or property with his or her own." Rule 1.15(b)(1) provides that, where the lawyer is in possession of funds or property of another person, the lawyer must maintain the funds in a banking institution as defined in the Rule and 22 N.Y.C.R.R. Part 1300.

4. We assume for purposes of this opinion that the lawyer has or will receive funds belonging to the client incident to her practice of law.

Federal Regulations Governing Immigration Practice

5. Federal immigration regulations provide that a person entitled to representation may be represented by a member in good standing of the bar of the highest court of any state, who is not under suspension or otherwise restricted in his or her practice of law, as long as the lawyer is registered to practice with the Executive Office for Immigration Review. See 8 C.F.R. §§ 1001.1(f), 1292.1(a)(1); see also Anna Marie Gallagher, "A primer on immigration court practice," 08–12 Immigration Briefings 1 (2008) (hereinafter "Gallagher") (noting six categories of persons who are permitted to represent parties in the immigration courts); N.Y. State 863 (2011) (discussing lawyer licensed only in Texas who works at law firm in New York State that "exclusively" practices immigration law). The cited federal regulations apparently apply to appearances before the U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Service, the Board of Immigration Appeals, and an Immigration Court or Judge, including any related application, proceeding, practice, and preparation. The full scope of federal law permitting lawyers to practice immigration law is a question of law beyond this Committee's jurisdiction. See N.Y. State 863 (2011).

The New York Choice of Law Rule: Rule 8.5(b)

6. Under Rule 8.5(a), a lawyer admitted in New York is subject to the disciplinary authority of this state no matter where the lawyer's conduct occurs – but that does not necessarily mean that the New York Rules will apply. Rather, the rules of conduct that a New York disciplinary authority will apply will depend on the choice of law rules set forth in Rule 8.5(b). Rule 8.5(b) provides:

> (b) In any exercise of the disciplinary authority of this state, the rules of professional conduct to be applied shall be as follows:
> (1) For conduct in connection with a proceeding in a court before which a lawyer has been admitted to practice (either generally or for purposes of that proceeding), the rules to be applied shall be the rules of the jurisdiction in which the court sits, unless the rules of the court provide otherwise; and
> (2) For any other conduct:
>
> (i) If the lawyer is licensed to practice only in this state, the rules to be applied shall be the rules of this state, and
> (ii) If the lawyer is licensed to practice in this state and another jurisdiction, the rules to be applied shall be the rules of the admitting jurisdiction in which the lawyer principally practices; provided, however, that if particular conduct clearly has its predominant effect in another jurisdiction in which the lawyer is licensed to practice, the rules of that jurisdiction shall be applied to that conduct.

Proceedings Before a Court

7. If the inquirer receives client funds in connection with a proceeding in a court before which the inquirer has been admitted to practice (either generally or for purposes of that proceeding), the rules to be applied will be the rules of the jurisdiction in which the court sits, unless the rules of the court provide otherwise. See Rule 8.5, Comment [2] (observing that a lawyer "may be admitted to practice before a particular court with rules that differ from those of the jurisdiction or jurisdictions in which the lawyer is licensed to practice"). See also Gallagher, supra, at 1 ("There are over 50 immigration courts nationwide where immigration hearings are held").

8. We do not opine on the specific ethical obligations governing immigration lawyers, but we note that the rules governing practice before the United States Citizenship and Immigration Services ("USCIS") state several grounds for imposing discipline on any practitioner who appears before the Board of Immigration Appeals and the Immigration Courts. See 8 CFR Part 1003, Subpart G, entitled "Professional Conduct for Practitioners - Rules and Procedures". However, such rules do not contain any requirements for establishing and maintaining escrow accounts. Consequently, we believe that the escrow rules of the State of Illinois (i.e. the jurisdiction in which the Court sits) would apply.

9. For purposes of applying New York's Rule 8.5(b), the Board of Immigration Appeals is not a "court." As we noted in N.Y. State 968 (2013):

> As [the inquirer is] asking in part about conduct in connection with a proceeding before an administrative tribunal, the question arises whether such an administrative tribunal is a "court" within the meaning of Rule 8.5(b)(1). The Rules contain a definition of "tribunal," which includes both a "court" and an "administrative agency or other body acting in an adjudicative capacity." Rule 1.0(w). In adopting Rule 8.5, the New York Appellate Divisions declined to adopt a version of Rule 8.5 proposed by the New York State Bar Association that substituted the word "tribunal" for the word "court" in the prior version of this rule. . . . [W]e do not believe we are free to read "court" in Rule 8.5(b)(1) to include administrative tribunals. . . .
> For the same reason, in 2010, the New York State Bar Association amended Comment [4] to Rule 8.5 to replace the word "tribunal" with the word "court." See also N.Y. State 1027 (2014) (canons of statutory construction support the conclusion that the term "court" in Rule 8.5(b)(1) excludes the other types of tribunal listed in Rule 1.0(w)).

Matters Not Involving Court Proceedings

10. When the inquirer does not represent a client in a proceeding in a court, Rule 8.5(b)(2) provides that the rules to be applied will be those of the "admitting jurisdiction" in which the inquirer "principally practices," unless the conduct clearly has its "predominant effect" in another jurisdiction in which the lawyer is "licensed to practice." This rule recognizes that New York does not have an interest in applying its own rules where the lawyer's conduct clearly has its predominant effect in another jurisdiction that has disciplinary authority over the conduct.

11. Here, the inquirer is not admitted to the bar in Illinois, the jurisdiction in which the inquirer principally practices. However, in N.Y. State 815 (2007), we determined that, if a New York lawyer is permitted to engage in conduct in another jurisdiction without being formally admitted in that jurisdiction, the lawyer should be deemed to be "licensed to practice" in the other jurisdiction for purposes of DR 1-105(B)(2)(b), the predecessor to Rule 8.5(b)(2)(ii). See also N.Y. State 1054 (2015), N.Y. State 1042 (2014), N.Y. State 1041 (2014) (all applying this principle). If Federal law authorizes the inquirer to practice immigration law from an office address in Illinois, even if not in connection with a "court" proceeding, we believe the New York disciplinary authorities would apply the Illinois Rules of Professional Conduct, unless the inquirer solicits business in New York, in which case the lawyer's conduct in making the solicitation would usually have its predominant effect in New York, which is an admitting jurisdiction, and the disciplinary authorities would apply the New York Rules of Professional Conduct. Cf., Rule 7.3(i) (the provisions of Rule 7.3 on solicitation apply to a lawyer not admitted in New York who solicits retention by residents of New York).

The Illinois Rules of Professional Conduct

12. Our conclusion that New York would apply the escrow provisions of the Illinois Rules of Professional Conduct is consistent with Rule 8.5 of the Illinois Rules of Professional Conduct, which provides as follows:

> (a) Disciplinary Authority. A lawyer admitted to practice in this jurisdiction is subject to the disciplinary authority of this jurisdiction, regardless of where the lawyer's conduct occurs. A lawyer not admitted in this jurisdiction is also subject to the disciplinary authority of this jurisdiction if the lawyer provides or offers to provide any legal services in this jurisdiction. A lawyer may be subject to the disciplinary authority of both this jurisdiction and another jurisdiction for the same conduct.
> (b) Choice of Law. In any exercise of the disciplinary authority of this jurisdiction, the rules of professional conduct to be applied shall be as follows:
> > (1) for conduct in connection with a matter pending before a tribunal, the rules of the jurisdiction in which the tribunal sits, unless the rules of the tribunal provide otherwise; and
> > (2) for any other conduct, the rules of the jurisdiction in which the lawyer's conduct occurred, or, if the predominant effect of the conduct is in a different jurisdiction, the rules of that jurisdiction shall be applied to the conduct. A lawyer shall not be subject to discipline if the lawyer's conduct conforms to the rules of a jurisdiction in which the lawyer reasonably believes the predominant effect of the lawyer's conduct will occur.

13. Thus, under the Illinois rules, the inquirer is subject to discipline in Illinois because the lawyer provides legal services in Illinois, and the Illinois disciplinary authority will apply the Illinois Rules of Professional Conduct if the conduct occurred in Illinois – whether or not in connection with a proceeding before a tribunal in Illinois – unless the predominant effect of the conduct is in a different jurisdiction. Unless the Illinois Rules of Professional Conduct require a lawyer to maintain client funds in a banking institution in a state where she is formally licensed to practice (here, New York), the inquirer need not maintain an attorney trust account in a New York banking institution. (Whether the Illinois Rules of Professional Conduct so require is a question of law beyond our jurisdiction.)

14. There could, however, be disciplinary proceedings in both jurisdictions, because both the New York and Illinois versions of Rule 8.5(a) provide that a lawyer may be subject to the disciplinary authority of more than one jurisdiction for the same conduct. Thus, if the inquirer were to violate the Illinois Rules of Professional Conduct, she could be disciplined by New York, by Illinois or by both states.

CONCLUSION:

15. If a lawyer is admitted solely in New York but is authorized by Federal law to practice immigration law in another state, and if the lawyer practices only immigration law and practices only in another state, then the lawyer is not required to maintain an attorney trust account in a New York banking institution unless the other state's Rules of Professional Conduct require her to do so. OPINION 1059 (06/12/2015)

TOPIC: Disclosure of confidential information, consent by minor clients

DIGEST: Lawyers for minor clients in immigration proceedings may disclose the names and certain procedural information regarding the clients' cases to granting organizations where (1) the information is not privileged and the disclosure would not be embarrassing or detrimental to the clients or (2) the clients or their legal representatives (e.g., parents or guardians) give voluntary, informed consent to the disclosure.

RULES: 1.0(j), 1.6, 1.14

FACTS:

1. The inquirers are legal assistance organizations that receive government grants to represent unaccompanied children in immigration removal proceedings. "Unaccompanied children" for this purpose are persons under sixteen years old who were apprehended by the Department of Homeland Security and were not in the care or custody of a legal guardian or parent at the time of arrest. The governmental granting organizations require that grantees provide data on their clients' cases in an online database created and managed by the Vera Institute of Justice, a private, not-for-profit corporation that carries out research and other projects designed to improve the functioning of the criminal justice system.

2. The data to be entered include the name of the children accepted as clients, the number of hours spent on each client's case, where the attorney represented the child, and various procedural details regarding the conduct of those cases (such as the number of charges that were admitted and that were contested, the relief requested, the types of motions filed, and whether expert testimony was adduced). The term "charges" refers to alleged violations of immigration statutes, such as entering the country without inspection or without possessing a visa at the time of entry. Grantees are also required to input in a narrative field the "results of interviews designed to capture an Unaccompanied Child's understanding of Immigration Proceedings before and after receiving program services."[32]

32 The precise information requested is as follows:

- number of children accepted as clients, identified by name, gender, date of birth, and alien number;
- number of hours spent on each Unaccompanied Child client's case;
- fora in which the attorney represented each Unaccompanied Child (immigration court, the Board of Immigration Appeals, state court, the U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services);
- number of cases in which the Unaccompanied Child did not contest the allegations in the Notice to Appear;
- number of charges contested and the outcome;
- whether the Unaccompanied Child requested immigration relief or relief from removal and the disposition of any such applications;
- number of other court/agency orders sought and the disposition of the orders;
- type of motions filed and disposition of those motions;
- disposition of any appeals filed;
- whether any expert testimony was proffered and/or allowed;
- whether the attorney sought or obtained the appointment of a child advocate for an Unaccompanied Child,
- whether special accommodations (such as testimonial aids, closed hearings, or other means to facilitate the adjudication) were sought or utilized;
- results of interviews designed to capture an Unaccompanied Child's understanding of Immigration proceedings before and after receiving program services.

3. Under the terms of the contract between each governmental granting organization and Vera, Vera is responsible for ensuring that the case-specific data is "redacted and/or anonymized" in order not to disclose any information protected by the attorney-client privilege or by the ethical duty of confidentiality.

QUESTIONS:

4. May attorneys representing children in removal proceedings disclose to the governmental granting organization specified information about each client and matter without violating the duty of client confidentiality?

5. If disclosure requires client consent, may grantee organizations obtain informed consent to disclosure of this information from an immigrant child who is under sixteen years of age?

OPINION:

Disclosing Confidential Information

6. Rule 1.6 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") bars a lawyer from knowingly revealing "confidential information" or using such information for the advantage of the lawyer or a third person, unless the client gives informed consent. There are exceptions, none of which are applicable here.[33]

7. "Confidential information" is defined as information gained during or relating to the representation of a client (a) that is "protected by the attorney-client privilege," (b) that is "likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed," or (c) that the client has requested be kept confidential.[34]

8. This Committee and others have concluded that the disclosure of non-anonymized information about client representations for similar purposes is barred, absent client consent, if the information consists of confidential information. For example, in N.Y. State 485 (1978), we opined that the attorneys in the Juvenile Rights Division of the Legal Aid Society, which represented persons in juvenile delinquency and other Family Court proceedings, could not participate in Vera studies that called for in-depth interviews with defense attorneys that would reveal the clients' confidences or secrets, absent client consent, "even for so worthy a purpose as the Vera study." We cited, among other authorities, ABA Inf. 1287 (1974), which held that a Legal Services Office providing legal representation to poor persons could not reveal the names, addresses and phone numbers of its clients so that they could

33 One of the exceptions is if "the disclosure is impliedly authorized to advance the best interests of the client and is either reasonable under the circumstances or customary in the professional community." The disclosures contemplated here, while they are in the interest of the grantee organizations, which wish to receive payment for the services rendered, are not thereby impliedly authorized to advance the best interests of the client for this purpose. That exception implies a closer connection between the interests of the client and the interests advanced by the disclosure. Another exception is disclosure "to establish or collect a fee," but that does not permit a lawyer to enter into a contract with a third party for payment of fees where the contract requires disclosure, and then rely on this exception to justify the disclosure. See N.Y. State 716 (1999) ("the fact that the insurance company has agreed to pay the lawyers fee does not in itself authorize the lawyer to disclose information to the [insurance company] auditor that would otherwise be protected by DR 4-101 [the predecessor to Rule 1.6]").

34 We will assume in the discussion that follows that the clients have not specifically requested that any of the information at issue be kept confidential.

be interviewed for a research study by an outside non-profit group. The ABA committee noted that the names, addresses and telephone numbers of clients were protected from disclosure "since it might be an embarrassment to the client for any number of reasons to have it revealed that he was a client of the Legal Services Office."

9. Here, with the exception of the last item of data sought (the results of interviews designed to capture the client's understanding of immigration proceedings), the data being sought disclose procedural steps in the course of administrative or court proceedings, and such information is clearly not protected by the attorney-client privilege. Whether disclosure of the information to Vera would be embarrassing or detrimental to the clients depends on the context and the precise nature of the information involved. It is not, however, readily apparent that disclosure to a research organization of the fact that a child is involved in removal proceedings or that a court or administrative body has taken certain procedural steps would be embarrassing or detrimental to the child in the typical case. Those facts will already be known to the parts of U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services most concerned with the clients' cases, so the disclosure here will merely bring it to the attention of Vera, which is required by contract to redact and/or anonymize the data before disclosing it to the granting agencies. Nevertheless, not every case is typical, so the inquirers must weigh in each case whether disclosure would be embarrassing or detrimental to the child.

10. The final item is quite different. Depending on the level of detail required for the answers, reports of interviews designed to capture the client's understanding of immigration proceedings may reveal information that is embarrassing or detrimental to the child (e.g., the child's ignorance or lack of sophistication) and possibly information protected by the attorney-client privilege (e.g., the tactical considerations that counsel discussed with the client). That information would be "confidential information" within the meaning of Rule 1.6(a), so disclosure is barred, absent informed consent. We turn to whether and how a grant recipient can obtain that consent.

Client Consent to Disclosure

11. A minor can consent to disclosure of confidential information if the minor is capable of understanding the risks of disclosure and of making a reasoned judgment. See, e.g., N.Y. City 1997-2; N.Y. State 485; Connecticut Opinion 03-07 (2003); North Carolina Opinion 18 (1998). See also Rule 1.14, Cmt. [1] ("[A] client with diminished capacity often has the ability to understand, deliberate upon and reach conclusions about matters affecting the client's own well-being.").

12. It is not always appropriate to seek consent for disclosure in order to promote interests other than the interests of the client. In this case, the disclosures would primarily promote the research, and presumably monitoring, interests of the governmental granting organizations. But we and other ethics committees have concluded that it is reasonable to seek consent for disclosure of some information to third parties that is necessary for the lawyer to obtain funding or to further research, depending on the nature of the information and the confidentiality protections in place. As the New York City Bar ethics committee has observed, a lawyer may seek consent for disclosure of confidential information to a social services organization if the lawyer "reasonably believes that such disclosures are either in the client's best interests or likely to be a matter of indifference to the client." N.Y. City 1997-2 (information related to the client's expressed intention to harm herself or possible abuse of the child). Similarly, in N.Y. State 69 (1968) we opined that an attorney could, with consent, disclose to the administrator of the county department of social services that paid for the attorney's services information necessary to obtain payment, including the facts of the case and the services proposed for the client, where the administrator made undertakings of confidentiality. Likewise, in N.Y. State 716 (1999) we concluded that it was permissible to obtain client consent to disclose bills and supporting documentation to insurance company auditors responsible for approving the lawyer's bills. Cf. Restatement Third, The Law Governing Lawyers § 60, cmt. h (2000) ("A lawyer may cooperate with reasonable efforts to obtain information about clients and law practice for public purposes, such as historical research, when no material risk to a client is entailed, such as financial or reputational harm.").

13. Here, in the typical case, the information sought would appear to be of relatively limited sensitivity and it will be redacted and/or anonymized before transmission to the granting agencies. To the extent the information qualifies as "confidential information" at all, a lawyer could in most cases reasonably conclude that the risks of harm are very small or nonexistent, so the inquirers would be free to seek consent to disclosure.

14. Even if it is permissible to seek consent for disclosure of information that the lawyer concludes is confidential, however, it may not be possible for the child to give consent. First, very young children will be incapable of giving consent. There is no particular age when children can be said to have capacity to give consent. The New York City Bar ethics committee observed in an opinion dealing with "verbal minors ages twelve or older who affirmatively seek a lawyer's assistance" that such clients "generally will be capable of making considered judgments concerning the representation." N.Y. City 1997-2 (citing, inter alia, Standard for Attorneys and Guardians Ad Litem in Custody or Visitation Proceedings § 2.2 (Am. Academy of Matrimonial Lawyers 1995) for the proposition that there is "a rebuttable presumption that children above the age of twelve are competent"). But the children that are the inquirers' clients may be less capable of making considered judgments than the clients in N.Y. City 1997-2, given that the unaccompanied children who are the inquirers clients are likely to be unfamiliar with American society, or may be more capable of making considered judgments, given their experiences in their home countries and during their unaccompanied trip to the United States. If the children have been released to the custody of a parent or guardian – the inquiry states that "approximately 45% of the children are not released to a parent," leaving approximately 55% who are – the parent or guardian may be able to consent. See Rule 1.14, Cmt. [4] (discussing possibility of looking to parents to make decisions for minor clients, and noting that whether the lawyer should do so may depend on the nature of the matter).

15. Second, the consent must not be accepted until the lawyer has made full disclosure of "information adequate for the person to make an informed decision, and after the lawyer has adequately explained to the person the material risks of the proposed course of conduct and reasonably available alternatives." Rule 1.0(j) (definition of "informed consent"). The extent of the information needed and risks to be addressed will vary both with the nature of the information being disclosed and the sophistication of the child, parent or guardian whose consent is sought. Where the information is relatively innocuous, it may be possible to delegate the task of obtaining consent to nonlegal personnel; but where the information is more sensitive, that may not be possible.

16. Third, the client's consent must be voluntary. As this Committee observed in N.Y. State 490 (1978), lawyers providing services to indigent clients "should be particularly sensitive to any element of submissiveness on the part of their indigent clients; and, such requests should be made only under circumstances where the staff is satisfied that their clients could refuse to consent without any sense of guilt or embarrassment."

CONCLUSION:

17. Whether the inquirers can disclose the information sought by the granting organizations depends, first, on whether the information is protected by the attorney-client privilege or disclosure in a particular case would likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the clients. If the lawyer concludes that the information is protected but that disclosure would not be adverse to the interests of the child, the lawyer may seek the consent of the child or, in some circumstances, the child's parent or guardian, but the consent must be preceded by full disclosure of any risks and benefits and must be fully voluntary.

OPINION 1060 (06/12/2015)

TOPIC: Escrow account; attorney special account; delegation to nonlawyer employee

DIGEST: Law firm may authorize a non-legal staff member to direct its bank to open law firm escrow sub-accounts, and to transfer funds from a sub-account to the master escrow account, in name of a lawyer admitted in New York State and under that lawyer's direction, provided that the lawyer or law firm exercises close supervision over the nonlawyer, and withdrawals from the master escrow account can only be authorized by a lawyer admitted in New York State. In any event, the supervising lawyer retains professional responsibility for the nonlawyer's conduct.

RULES: 1.15(b), (c), (d) & (e); 5.3.

FACTS:

1. A law firm wishes to have a staff member of the law firm, who is not a lawyer, direct a bank to open individual sub-accounts under a master lawyer escrow account maintained by that bank for the law firm. The law firm also wishes to authorize the nonlawyer staff member to direct the bank to transfer funds from any sub-account to the master escrow account.

2. The law firm would permit distributions from the master escrow account to be initiated and authorized only by a lawyer in the law firm licensed to practice in New York. Authority of the nonlawyer staff would be limited to transferring funds from a sub-account to the master escrow account, and the nonlawyer could only make such transfers at the direction of a lawyer licensed to practice in New York. Transfers from the sub-accounts may be made only to the master escrow account. The only authorized method to withdraw funds from the master escrow account or any of the sub-accounts would be at the express direction of a lawyer in the law firm admitted to practice in New York, and upon the signature of a lawyer in the firm admitted to practice in New York. The nonlawyer would have no authority to move funds out of the master escrow account.

QUESTIONS:

3. May a law firm or lawyer ethically authorize and instruct a nonlawyer staff member of the law firm to direct its bank to open individual sub-accounts under a master lawyer escrow account maintained by the bank for the law firm?

4. May the law firm or lawyer ethically instruct the nonlawyer staff member to direct a bank to transfer funds from a sub-account to a master escrow account, from which the funds would be distributed by a lawyer in the law firm, who would execute the checks?

OPINION:

Rule 1.15(e): Requirements for Authorized Signatories on Lawyer Special Accounts

5. Rule 1.15 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") governs the obligations of lawyers with respect to the funds of others that the lawyer has received "incident to the lawyer's practice of law." This includes the following obligations:

- Not to misappropriate such funds. Rule 1.15(a).
- To maintain such funds in one or more special bank accounts. Rule 1.15(b).
- To maintain records of all deposits in and withdrawals from the special bank accounts, that identify the date, source and description of each item deposited, and the date, payee and purpose of each withdrawal or disbursement. Rule 1.15(d)(1)(i)
- To maintain records of the special accounts, including the source of all funds deposited and the persons for whom the funds are or were held. Rule 1.15(d)(1)(ii).
- To make accurate entries in their records of receipts and disbursements, special accounts and ledger books or similar records. Rule 1.15(d)(2).
- To ensure that special account withdrawals (i) are made only to a named payee and not to cash, (ii) are made by check or (with the approval of the party entitled to the proceeds) by bank transfer and – most important here – (iii) that all authorized signatories of a special account are lawyers admitted to practice law in New York State. Rule 1.15(e).

6. There are no comments to Rule 1.15 relevant to the questions presented.

Non-Lawyer employees of law firms

7. Rule 5.3(a) provides that "A law firm shall ensure that the work of nonlawyers who work for the firm is adequately supervised, as appropriate." Rule 5.3(a) further provides that "the degree of supervision required is that which is reasonable under the circumstances," taking into account such factors as the experience of the person whose work is being supervised, the amount of work involved in a particular matter and the likelihood that ethical problems might arise in the course of working on the matter. However, what is reasonable in the circumstances of holding funds under Rule 1.15 may involve a higher standard of care than that required under other rules. For example, Rule 1.15(a) states that a lawyer in possession of funds belong to another person incident to his or her law practice is a fiduciary and Comment [1] to Rule 1.15 explains that the lawyer should hold such funds using the care required of a professional fiduciary. Moreover, as noted in paragraph 9, the lawyer may be responsible for the conduct of a nonlawyer employee that would be a violation of the Rules if engaged in by a lawyer. As noted in paragraph 13, we warned in N.Y. State 693 that, since the responsibility for client funds may not be delegated, the lawyer remains responsible to the client for errors. Finally, the courts, in evaluating the lawyer's care of client funds for disciplinary purposes, may use an exacting standard. See Matter of Galasso, infra (lawyer must use a high degree of vigilance to ensure that the funds [the clients] entrusted are returned to them upon request.)

8. Comment [2] to Rule 5.3 states that a law firm must ensure that nonlawyer assistants are given appropriate instruction and supervision concerning the ethical aspects of their employment, and that a law firm "should make reasonable efforts to establish internal policies and procedures designed to provide reasonable assurance that nonlawyers in the firm will act in a way compatible with these Rules."

9. Violations of the Rules by a nonlawyer employee may subject certain firm lawyers to professional discipline. Rule 5.3(b) provides that a "lawyer shall be responsible for conduct of a nonlawyer employed or retained by or associated with the lawyer that would be a violation of these Rules if engaged in by a lawyer" where the lawyer either (i) has "managerial responsibility in a law firm" or (ii) has supervisory authority over the nonlawyer and knew or should have known of the conduct at issue in time to take reasonable remedial action.

10. These principles were affirmed in Matter of Galasso, 19 N.Y.3d 688 (2012), which involved a disciplinary proceeding against a lawyer for failing to properly supervise a bookkeeper, resulting in the misappropriation of the funds of several clients from an escrow account and the firm's IOLA account. Although Galasso and one of his partners were the only authorized signatories on the special account application, the bookkeeper apparently altered the account documentation to permit electronic funds transfers and to include himself as an authorized signatory.

11. The Court of Appeals in Galasso found several deficiencies in the firm's policies and procedures regarding client funds. For example, the lawyer's practice had been to review monthly financial reports generated by the bookkeeper rather than to review the account statements themselves (which might have disclosed that the bookkeeper was forging checks). In addition, the lawyer did not have personal contact with the bank and did not exercise sufficient oversight of the firm's books and records. Finally, the lawyer ceded an unacceptable level of control over the firm accounts to the bookkeeper, thereby creating the opportunity for misuse of client funds. Indeed, when a client's accountant pointed out a discrepancy in the escrow account, the lawyer did not resolve the discrepancy himself but rather allowed the bookkeeper to resolve it with the bank. The Galasso court stressed that attorneys are not prohibited from delegating tasks to firm employees, but also stressed that any delegation must be accompanied by an appropriate degree of oversight by a lawyer.

Establishing Sub-Accounts in the Special Account

12. No opinions of this Committee directly address the questions presented, but N.Y. State 693 (1997) is instructive. N.Y. State 693 discusses whether a lawyer may allow a paralegal to use a stamp bearing the lawyer's signature to execute checks drawn on a client escrow account. N.Y. State 693 notes that DR 9-102(E) of the Code of Professional Responsibility, the predecessor to Rule 1.15(e), explicitly states that only a lawyer may be a signatory to such a special account. Even so, the opinion notes that the Code "contemplates that lawyers will delegate tasks to nonlawyers," and that, despite restrictive holdings from case authorities that lawyers may not give signatory authority to nonlawyers, a lawyer could ethically authorize a nonlawyer to use the lawyer's signature stamp. Opinion 693 said:

> [W]e believe that it is ethically permissible for a lawyer to authorize a paralegal to make use of the lawyer's signature stamp on checks drawn from a special account at closings under certain conditions and with proper controls. As with the rest of a paralegal's duties at a real estate closing . . . the lawyer must consider in advance how the paralegal will use the signature stamp – including approving the purpose of the anticipated payments to be made by such checks, the nature of the payee and the authorized dollar amount range for each check to be issued – and review afterwards what actually happened to assure that the delegation of authority has been utilized property. [Emphasis added.]

13. N.Y. State 693 warns that the "responsibility for client funds may not be delegated," and that lawyers who authorize nonlawyers to use their signatures thus remain responsible to the client for any errors or misuse of the signature stamp. The opinion concludes that the delegation is permissible despite DR 9-102(E) "so long as the lawyer supervises the delegated work closely" and "exercises complete professional responsibility for the acts" of the nonlawyer.

14. In the inquiry here, the inquirer has assured us that transfers from sub-accounts can be made only to the master escrow account, not outside it, and that withdrawals can only be made by a lawyer licensed to practice in New York. In these circumstances, we believe a lawyer may delegate the two tasks described in the inquiry. Specifically, under procedures approved and closely supervised by the lawyer or law firm, the law firm may authorize a nonlawyer to direct the bank to set up the requested sub-accounts and to transfer funds from a sub-account to the master escrow account. Of course, pursuant to Rule 5.3(b), the supervising lawyer remains professionally responsible for any ethical violations by the nonlawyer.

CONCLUSION:

15. A lawyer or law firm may authorize a non-legal staff member to direct its bank to open law firm escrow sub-accounts and to transfer funds from such an account to the master escrow account in the name and under the direction of a firm lawyer admitted in New York State, provided that the lawyer or law firm exercises close supervision over the nonlawyer, and withdrawals from the master escrow account can only be authorized by a lawyer admitted in New York State. In any event, the supervising lawyer retains professional responsibility for the nonlawyer's conduct.

OPINION 1061 (06/15/2015)

TOPIC: Duty of Confidentiality; Informed Consent; Client Payment History; Law Firm Reporting Client's payment history to database with Client's Informed Consent

DIGEST: Subject to certain conditions, a lawyer may report a client's payment history on a database system that allows lawyers to report on the timeliness of payment of legal bills and gives access to such information to subscribing law firms and their staff members. Such reporting does not violate the Rules of Professional Conduct provided that (i) the lawyer has obtained the client's informed consent, and (ii) the client's consent is not coerced. To obtain the client's uncoerced informed consent, the lawyer should fully explain the material risks of consenting, including the uses to which the information may be put, and the lawyer should take into consideration the sophistication of the client. The lawyer should also inform the client of his/her right to have independent counsel advise on whether the client should consent. A client who has given informed consent to disclose confidential information may later revoke the consent at any time.

RULES: 1.0(j), 1.6(a) & (b), 1.7(b), 1.9(c), 1.16(b) & (c)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer proposes a subscription-based database system or information clearinghouse (the "System"), akin to a credit reporting system, in which lawyers would report information about the payment status of legal bills of a commercial (i.e. non-consumer, non-household use) client.[135] The System would be accessible through a secure website solely to subscribing law firms ("Subscribers") and their constituent lawyers and staff members. Subscribers would be allowed to file reports on the payment histories of their consenting clients and to review reports filed by other lawyers. The purposes of the System are to allow Subscribers to predict a potential client's timeliness of payment of fees (i.e., assess the credit-worthiness of a prospective client) and to incentivize clients to pay legal bills as agreed. The System would identify not only potential problematic credit risks but also good credit risks. Under the System's business model, the Subscriber would have the client sign a consent, allowing the law firm to report the client's timeliness in payment.

2. The System, as proposed, would enable law firms to report a client's payment history using such categories as non-payments, late payments, disputed payments and prompt payments, but it would not report the amount owed by the client. The reporting Subscriber would be required to notify the client when the Subscriber files an adverse report about an unpaid invoice with the System, and the client would be entitled to notify the System if the client disputes the amount or validity of the unpaid invoice.

3. Subscribers would be obligated to treat the payment histories in the System's database as confidential, but would be authorized to use the information in the System in determining whether to accept an engagement or in establishing the financial terms of the engagement, including whether to request or require an advance retainer and in what amount.

35 The inquirer may have chosen the term "commercial" to avoid the application of consumer protection laws such as the Fair Credit Reporting Act. The distinction made by ethics rules, particularly those involving informed consent, is not the same as that made by consumer protection laws. Rather, as noted below, it is based on the sophistication and experience of the client, and all "commercial" clients will not have the same degree of sophistication in, and experience with, legal matters.

4. Subscribers would be required to notify the System if a client disputes an invoice, or if a dispute with a client has been settled. The inquirer has indicated that a negative payment history will not be reported until after an attorney-client relationship has ended.[362]

5. The inquirer has advised that the System's rules mandate that, before accepting an engagement, the System's subscriber must obtain the client's informed, written consent and a limited waiver of confidentiality. The form of consent to be provided to the client upon engagement informs the client that by executing the consent, the client authorizes the lawyer to file a report with the System that contains (a) the client's name, address, state of incorporation, names of principals, officers and directors; (b) dates services were rendered and dates payment were due; and (c) the length of time the invoice was outstanding (with notations such as: "paid as agreed" or "invoice was 60, 90, 120 or 120+ days past due"). In addition, the form of consent informs the client to "feel free" to consult with other counsel regarding the implications of the consent.

QUESTION:

6. May a lawyer participate in a system that reports the payment histories of the law firm's clients to other system subscribers, if the client gives informed consent for the lawyer to make such reports to the system?

OPINION:

7. Rule 1.6 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") describes a lawyer's duty of confidentiality to a current client. Rule 1.6 provides as follows:

> (a) A lawyer shall not knowingly reveal confidential information, as defined in this Rule, or use such information to the disadvantage of a client or for the advantage of the lawyer or third person, unless:
>
> (1) the client gives informed consent, as defined in Rule 1.0(j);
> (2) the disclosure is impliedly authorized to advance the best interests of the client and is either reasonable under the circumstances or customary in the professional community; or
> (3) the disclosure is permitted by paragraph (b).

"Confidential information" consists of information gained during or relating to the representation of a client, whatever its source, that is (a) protected by the attorney-client privilege, (a) likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed, or (c) information that the client has requested be kept 36 The inquirer apparently changed the method of operation of the System after another state's ethics committee opined that, under the ethical rules in its state, a lawyer could not make reports on current clients. Because the inquirer has told us that lawyers would make reports only with respect to former clients, we have not examined whether our Rules would permit such reports with respect to current clients.

confidential. "Confidential information" does not ordinarily include (1) a lawyer's legal knowledge or legal research or (ii) information that is generally known in the local community or in the trade, field or profession to which the information relates.

8. Comment [2] to Rule 1.6, headed "Scope of the Professional Duty of Confidentiality," underscores the importance of a lawyer's duty of confidentiality. It states, in pertinent part:

> [2] A fundamental principle in the client-lawyer relationship is that, in the absence of the client's informed consent, or except as permitted or required by these Rules, the lawyer must not knowingly reveal information gained during and related to the representation, whatever its source. . . . The lawyer's duty of confidentiality contributes to the trust that is the hallmark of the client-lawyer relationship. . . .

9. Rule 1.9 addresses a lawyer's duties to former clients, including the duty of confidentiality. Paragraph (c) of this rule states in pertinent part:

> (c) A lawyer who has formerly represented a client in a matter . . . shall not thereafter:
> (1) use confidential information of the former client protected by Rule 1.6 to the disadvantage of the former client, except as these Rules would permit or require with respect to a current client or when the information has become generally known; or
> (2) reveal confidential information of the former client protected by Rule 1.6 except as these Rules would permit or require with respect to a current client.

The confidentiality obligation to a former client is thus the same as that to a current client, and the same exceptions apply.

Payment History as Confidential Information

10. We have previously addressed whether a client's payment status constitutes confidential information. In N.Y. State 684 (1996), interpreting DR 4-101(B), the predecessor to Rule 1.6(a), the Committee concluded that a client's unpaid account status will almost always constitute a "secret"[337] within the meaning of DR 4-101(B) because it is information "gained in the professional relationship" and because its "is likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed." We therefore found that reporting the client's payment status to a credit bureau would plainly violate the prohibition on using a client secret "to the disadvantage of the client" and for the "advantage of the lawyer."

11. Our conclusion under Rule 1.6 on the facts before us is the same. We see no practical difference between a credit bureau and the System proposed here.

37 The Code defined "secret" as information gained in the professional relationship that is not protected by the attorney-client privilege, but that the client has requested be held inviolate or the disclosure of which would be embarrassing or would be likely to be detrimental to the client. Although the Rules do not use the term "secret," the term "confidential information" includes information gained during or relating to the representation that is likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client and information that the client has requested to be kept confidential. Thus, the term "confidential information" is similar to and slightly broader than the terms "confidences" and "secrets" under the Code.

12. The analysis, however, does not end there, since the Rules contain certain exceptions to confidentiality. Rule 1.6, and therefore Rule 1.9, contains two potentially applicable exceptions to the proscription against disclosure or use of confidential information – information necessary to collect a fee, and information a client has given informed consent to disclose. We will address each exception.

Information Necessary to Collect a Fee

13. Under Rule 1.6(b)(5)(ii), the lawyer may disclose confidential information to the extent the disclosure is "reasonably necessary" to "establish or collect a fee." In N.Y. State 684 (1996), we concluded that reporting the client's delinquent status to a credit bureau did not qualify as the type of disclosure that was "reasonably necessary" to "establish or collect the lawyer's fee" within the meaning of the similar exception under the Code, because the fee can be collected without making such a report. We said:

> [T]o the extent it aids the collection process at all, it would appear to do so only by virtue of its in terrorem effect on the client, arising from the likely adverse impact on the client's credit rating. Such use of a client's secret by a lawyer would plainly violate DR 4-101(B)'s prohibitions on the use of a client's secret "to the disadvantage of the client" and "for the advantage of the lawyer."

14. See also Rule 1.6, Cmt. [14] (disclosure adverse to the client's interest should be no greater than the lawyer reasonably believes necessary to accomplish the purpose); N.Y. State 980 (2013) (Rule 1.6(b)(5) is no license for counsel to reveal any confidential information beyond what is "reasonably believe[d] necessary" to collect the fee.)

15. The inquirer argues that the System is consistent with the principle described in Comment [11] to Rule 1.6, which explains the exception for disclosures necessary to collect a fee, and states: "A lawyer entitled to a fee is permitted by paragraph (b)(5) to prove the services rendered in an action to collect it. This aspect of the rule expresses the principle that the beneficiary of a fiduciary relationship may not exploit it to the detriment of the fiduciary." For example, we have long recognized that lawyers are not compelled to provide free legal services to all clients. See N.Y. State 598 (1989) (client's knowing and substantial failure to satisfy his or her financial obligations to a lawyer would justify lawyer's withdrawal from employment in accordance with DR 2-110(C)(1)(f) – the predecessor to Rule 1.16(c)(5) – which allows a lawyer to withdraw from representation where the client deliberately disregards an agreement or obligation to the lawyer as to expenses or fees). However, our interpretations of the withdrawal rule make it clear that mere nonpayment or late payment is not enough. The client's failure must be conscious rather than inadvertent, and must not be de minimis in either amount or duration. Conversely, a lawyer may withdraw from representing a client who deliberately disregards an obligation to pay a lawyer more than a de minimis amount for more than a de minimis length of time.

Client Consent to Disclosure or Use

16. The duty of confidentiality owed to a client or former client may be waived if a client or former client gives informed consent to disclose the confidential information, confirmed in writing. See Rule 1.6(a)(i) (disclosure permitted if client gives informed consent); Rule 1.9(c)(1)&(2) (disclosure prohibited except as these Rules would permit with respect to a current client); Rule 1.9, Cmt. [9]

("The provisions of this Rule are for the protection of former clients and can be waived if the client gives informed consent . . .").

17. The definition of "informed consent" is pertinent to the inquiry, because Rules 1.6 and 1.9 both refer to it. Rule 1.0(j) defines "informed consent" as:

> the agreement by a person to a proposed course of conduct after the lawyer has communicated information adequate for the person to make an informed decision, and after the lawyer has adequately explained to the person the material risks and reasonably available alternatives to the proposed course of conduct.

18. Comment [6] to Rule 1.0 provides the following guidance regarding informed consent:

> The lawyer must make reasonable efforts to ensure that the client or other person possesses information reasonably adequate to make an informed decision. Ordinarily, this will require communication that includes a disclosure of the facts and circumstances giving rise to the situation, any explanation reasonably necessary to inform the client or other person of the material advantages and disadvantages of the proposed course of conduct, and a discussion of the client's or other person's options and alternatives. In some circumstances it may be appropriate for a lawyer to advise a client or other person to seek the advice of other counsel. . . . In determining whether the information and explanation provided are reasonably adequate, relevant factors include whether the client or other person is experienced in legal matters generally and in making decision of the type involved, and whether the client or other person is independently represented by other counsel in giving the consent.

See also Rule 1.7, Cmt. [18] (informed consent requires that the client be aware of the material and foreseeable ways that the conflict could adversely affect the interests of the client).

19. This Committee declines to opine whether any particular form of disclosure is adequate to obtain informed consent from any particular population of clients. At a minimum, however, informed consent in the circumstances before us would require disclosing that (i) the client's payment history would be available to Subscribers, and that (ii) Subscribers might use the client's payment history to determine whether to accept an engagement or to establish the financial terms of the engagement, including whether to request an advance retainer. Full disclosure may also require informing the client that the waiver would authorize the lawyer to report the client's non-payment pending a dispute over the legal bill (although we are told that the report to the system would note that the bill was disputed).[384] In the event of a later challenge, the burden is on the lawyer to demonstrate that consent was informed.

20. In prior opinions involving collection of fees, this Committee has commented on informed consent to the use of a collection agency, and cautioned that the "lawyer must take care to ensure that the client's consent is uncoerced as well as informed." We have some concern that, as in N.Y. State

38 Under New York's Attorney-Client Dispute Resolution Program, 22 N.Y.C.R.R. Part 137, the lawyer could not sue the client for the unpaid fee without giving the client 30 days' notice of the right to demand fee arbitration. Thus New York disfavors unilateral actions by lawyers to collect legal fees.

684, the lawyer's ability to disclose the client's payment history to the System will have an in terrorem effect on the client, arising from the likely adverse impact of a history of slow or contested payments on the client's ability to hire other counsel on favorable credit terms. But we think that this in terrorem effect simply makes it less likely that the client will consent, rather than indicating that the client's consent is coerced. Coercion may be present, however, if the lawyer refused an engagement unless the client consented to use of the System.

Advance Consent

21. The consent being proposed here is an advance consent. That is, the client is not being asked to consent to a known current disclosure or known use of confidences, but rather is being asked to consent to the lawyer's possible future disclosure or use of those confidences. In N.Y. City 1997-2, the City Bar ethics committee held that "consent to disclosure under particular circumstances for particular purposes may generally be obtained in advance of obtaining client confidences." In determining the effectiveness of the consent, the City Bar said that the client's consent must be given after "full disclosure" and must be "voluntary." N.Y. City 1997-2. Those two factors are also helpful here.

22. Advance consent to disclosure of confidential information is analogous to advance consent to waive a conflict. Comment [22] to Rule 1.7 provides guidance about what information a lawyer must provide to a client to obtain valid consent to a future conflict:

> The effectiveness of advance waivers is generally determined by the extent to which the client reasonably understands the material risks that the waiver entails. At a minimum, the client should be advised generally of the types of possible future adverse representations that the lawyer envisions, as well as the types of clients and matters that may present such conflicts. The more comprehensive the explanation and disclosure of the types of future representations that might arise and the actual and reasonably foreseeable adverse consequences of those representations, the greater the likelihood that the client will have the understanding necessary to make the consent "informed" and the waiver effective. . . . The adequacy of the disclosure necessary to obtain valid advance consent to conflicts may also depend on the sophistication and experience of the client. [Emphasis added.]

See generally Restatement Third, The Law Governing Lawyers ("Restatement of the Law Governing Lawyers") §62 Cmt. c ("When the question concerns the lawyer's duty to the client, the client's consent is effective only if it is given on the basis of information and consultation reasonably appropriate under the circumstances.") A lawyer cannot assume that all "commercial" clients are sophisticated. Many small business clients may not be sophisticated consumers of legal services and may not have experience in negotiating retainer agreements or negotiating waivers of rights bestowed upon them by the Rules.

23. Applying those concepts here, once the client consents in advance to the lawyer's providing otherwise confidential payment information to the System, the question arises whether the client may, at some point thereafter, revoke the consent. Comment [21] to Rule 1.7 states that "a client who has given consent to a conflict may revoke the consent at any time." Similarly, the Restatement of the Law Governing Lawyers takes the view that consent to a conflict can be revoked at any time. Restatement,

§122, Cmt f. ("A client who has given informed consent to an otherwise conflicted representation may at any time revoke the consent."). See N.Y. State 903 (2012) (client who has given consent to a conflict may revoke the consent). In the case of conflicts, the client's revocation of consent enables the client to terminate the lawyer's representation of the client from that point forward.[39]

24. We believe the same restriction applies to a client's advance consent to a lawyer's disclosure of confidential information. If the client revokes consent, the revocation will prohibit the lawyer from making future reports of the client's payment status to the System, but will not require the lawyer to remove any past reports to the System. See N.Y. City 1997-2 ("If the minor client consents in advance to the lawyer's reporting of confidences or secrets concerning abuse or mistreatment, the client may later change his mind and revoke consent, in which event the lawyer must maintain confidentiality."). The City Bar further opined that whether the lawyer may withdraw from representing the revoking client or a conflicting client upon the client's revocation of consent is governed by the rule on withdrawal from representation (now Rule 1.16). Similarly, whether the inquiring lawyer here would have grounds to withdraw from representing a client who revoked consent to allow the lawyer to report the client's late payments would depend on Rule 1.16(b)-(c).

25. Aside from complying with the requirements of the aforementioned Rules, the lawyer must also comply with applicable law, including laws such as the Fair Credit Reporting Act. (We offer no opinion on whether the FCRA or any other law is applicable in these circumstances.)

CONCLUSION:

26. A lawyer may report a client's payment history to a database system that allows lawyers to report on the timeliness of payment of legal bills and gives access to such information to subscribing law firms and their staff members, provided that lawyer has obtained the client's informed consent, and provided that the client's consent is not coerced. In order to obtain the client's informed consent, the lawyer should fully explain the material risks of consenting, including the uses to which the information may be put. In formulating that explanation the lawyer should take into consideration the sophistication of the client, and should inform the client of his/her right to have independent counsel review the consent. In addition, the client who has given informed consent to disclose confidential information may revoke the consent at any time.

(54-14)

39 In the context of conflicts, whether the client's revocation and firing of the lawyer results in the lawyer's disqualification from representing the other client depends on the circumstances, including whether the parties have agreed to permit continued representation adverse to the withdrawing client after a conflict has arisen. See N.Y. 903 (2012) ("When a lawyer jointly represents two co-defendants pursuant to a validly obtained consent to the dual representation and to any future conflicts that might arise between the joint clients, and one of the clients later revokes consent, whether the lawyer may continue to represent the non-revoking client depends upon the circumstances, unless an advance agreement specifies what happens upon revocation of consent."); D.C. Bar Opinion 317 (2002).

OPINION 1062 (06/29/2015)

TOPIC: Financing a law practice; crowdfunding websites.

DIGEST: A law firm may engage in certain types of crowdfunding but not others. Any form of fundraising that gives the investor an interest in a law firm or a share of its revenue would be prohibited. However, in some circumstances a law firm may give the funding source some kind of reward. For example, a law firm may send a funder non-confidential memoranda discussing legal issues (provided the law firm complies with any applicable advertising rules), or may agree that the law firm will provide pro bono legal services to certain charitable organizations, provided that the lawyer complies with Rule 1.1 regarding competence and the representation does not involve conflicts in violation of Rule 1.7 or Rule 1.9.

RULES: 1.1(b), 1.7, 1.9, 5.4(a) & (d), 7.1.

FACTS:

1. The inquiring lawyers, who are recent law school graduates, plan to start a small firm. They need to raise capital to fund the start-up expenses of the new firm for the first few months of operations, such as rent, website development, professional liability insurance, and office supplies.

2. The inquiring lawyers have accumulated substantial student loan debt and aim to avoid further borrowing. They ask whether they may ethically raise start-up funds via internet websites through a method known generally as "crowdfunding."

3. "Crowdfunding" is defined generally as funding a project or venture by raising small amounts of money from a large number of people. It is often used in product development to test a market and refine a product. Philanthropic organizations also use crowdfunding to raise funds. We are aware of five basic approaches to crowdfunding: (1) Donation, (2) Reward, (3) Lending, (4) Equity, and (5) Royalty. In each of the models, the user uses the funding website of a crowdfunding "platform," which charges fees based on the amount of money raised. The platforms have varying focuses, models and fee structures. See generally Crowds Unite, What is Crowd Funding?, available at http://crowdsunite.com/what-is-crowdfunding.

4. The first of the five approaches to fundraising – the lending model – is close to the traditional working capital loan.

5. The second approach, the equity model, is often used for new ventures and provides the funding source an ownership interest in the venture.

6. Similarly, the third approach, the royalty model, which often is used for specific product development and rollout, rewards the investor with a percentage of the sales proceeds from that particular product.

7. The donation model is used most often for philanthropic causes where there is no material or financial return to the contributor.

8. The reward model typically provides the funder with a sample of the product or service being supported by the fundraising effort. It is often used by private ventures to pre-sell product or create a large following for the product.

QUESTION:

9. What are the ethical limitations on using internet-based crowdfunding to raise working capital for a law firm?

OPINION:

10. This Committee expresses no opinion on the business merits of any of the five crowdfunding methods or whether any might succeed in reaching the law firm's fundraising goals. But we comment briefly on each model.

11. The lending model would only increase debt and therefore would not meet the law firm's goal.

12. The donation model may be unattractive to potential donors (since they receive nothing in return and may not wish to support an enterprise designed to make a profit). The donation model might also be unattractive to the law firm, since friends and relatives of the lawyers might be inclined to donate directly to the law firm even if the lawyers were not using crowdfunding, whereas under the donation model their contributions will be diminished by the platform's fees. But we see no ethical issues with the donation model, as long as the lawyers make clear that donors will receive nothing in return and that the law firm is designed to be a profit-making enterprise.

13. Two of the models – the royalty model and the equity model – would clearly violate the Rules of Professional Conduct. The royalty model contemplates the investor receiving a percentage of revenues, and would therefore violate Rule 5.4(a) ("A lawyer shall not share legal fees with a nonlawyer"). Similarly, the equity model violates Rule 5.4(d) (lawyer shall not practice law in a for-profit entity if a non-lawyer owns any interest therein.).

14. The remaining model, the reward model, might fit the law firm's business needs, and the inquiring lawyers have suggested several examples of rewards, including (i) informational pamphlets, (ii) reports on the progress of the firm and (iii) the lawyers' performance of pro bono work for a third-party non-profit legal organization. Whether these rewards would be attractive enough to raise capital requires a judgment that is beyond the jurisdiction of this Committee, but we can comment on the ethical implications of the suggested rewards.

15. Informational pamphlets and progress reports. Informational pamphlets, whitepapers or reports on the firm's progress may be governed by Rule 7.1 ("Advertising"). Materials may not be considered advertising as defined in Rule 1.0(a) if they are "topical newsletters, client alerts, or blogs intended to educate recipients about new developments in the law . . . ." Rule 7.1, Cmt. [7]; N.Y. State 967 (2013) (blog written by an attorney is not an "advertisement" if the primary purpose of the blog is not retention of the attorney). However, the lawyers should take care that their writings on legal topics do not give individual legal advice. See Rule 7.1(r) (without affecting the right to accept employment, lawyer may write for publication on legal topics "so long as the lawyer does not undertake to give individual advice").

16. Pro bono hours. The proposal to offer pro bono hours to a third-party non-profit legal organization raises several issues. In N.Y. State 971 (2013), a lawyer proposed to donate legal services to a charitable organization for auction as a fund-raising device. We discussed the requirement of Rule 1.1(b) that a lawyer accept employment only if the lawyer is, or intends to become, competent to handle the matter. Opinion 971 also discussed the prohibition on undertaking a matter that would involve an impermissible conflict of interest under Rule 1.7 or Rule 1.9. We therefore concluded that the firm's offer of pro bono services must be conditioned on the firm's ability to comply with these ethical constraints. We stressed, however, that the fact these limitations apply does not mean that the lawyer cannot participate. See also N.Y. State 897 (2011) (lawyer may market legal services on a "deal" of the day" or "group coupon" website provided that the advertising is not misleading or deceptive and makes clear that no lawyer-client relationship will be formed until the lawyer can check for conflicts and assess competence to provide the services). The same principles apply to the reward model that the inquiring lawyers are considering here.

CONCLUSION:

17. A law firm may engage in certain types of crowdfunding but not others. Any form of fundraising that gives the investor an interest in a law firm or a share of its revenue would be prohibited. However, in some circumstances a law firm may give the funding source some kind of reward. For example, a law firm may send a funder non-confidential memoranda discussing legal issues (provided the law firm complies with any applicable advertising rules), or may agree that the law firm will provide pro bono legal services to certain charitable organizations, provided that the lawyer complies with Rule 1.1 regarding competence and the representation does not involve conflicts in violation of Rule 1.7 or Rule 1.9.

OPINION 1063 (06/29/2015)

TOPIC: Conflicts; fees paid by third-party payors

DIGEST: When a lawyer accepts payment of legal fees from a third party, the third-party payor is not a client merely by virtue of paying the lawyer's fee. Where the lawyer's fee for representing a son was paid by the client's father and mother, and the lawyer did not give father reason to believe he was a client, the lawyer's representation of mother would not constitute a conflict of interest unless a reasonable lawyer would conclude that the lawyer's interest in continuing to receive fees from the father for representing the son would create a significant risk of adversely affecting the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the mother. But even if such a conflict exists, the lawyer could cure the conflict by obtaining the mother's informed consent to the conflict as long as the lawyer satisfies the terms of Rule 1.7(b).

RULES: 1.7(a) & (b), 1.8(f)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer agreed to represent an 18-year old client ("Son") in a criminal defense matter. When the inquirer initially met the Son at the Town Court, the Son's divorced parents ("Mother" and "Father") were present. Although only Son signed a retainer agreement, each of the client's parents paid one-half of the retainer. The inquirer continues to represent Son.

2. Recently, inquirer agreed to represent Mother in two matters against Father. One is a custody dispute against Father (not involving Son). The other is a support matter against Father in which Son is among the subjects of the support sought. Opposing counsel has protested that, having taken money from Father, it is a conflict of interest for inquirer to represent Mother adverse to Father.

QUESTION:

3. When a lawyer has accepted payment of a legal fee from a client's relative, may the lawyer later accept a representation adverse to the interests of the payor?

OPINION:

4. Many lawyers occasionally accept payment of their clients' legal fees from third-party payors. See New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"), Rule 1.8(f), Cmt. [11] ("Lawyers are frequently asked to represents clients under circumstances in which a third person will compensate them, in whole or in part. The third person might be a relative or friend, an indemnitor (such as a liability insurance company) or a co-client (such as a corporation sued along with one or more of its employees)").

5. It is well-established that when a lawyer accepts payment from a third party to represent a client, the third-party payor is not a client merely by virtue of paying the lawyer's fee. See N.Y. State 716 (1999) (when an insurance company retains a lawyer to represent a policyholder, the client is the policyholder, not the insurance company). See generally American Law Institute, Restatement Third, The Law Governing Lawyers, §14, cmt. c (2000) (paying a lawyer does not by itself create a client-lawyer relationship with the payor if the circumstances indicate that the lawyer was to represent someone else).

6. If a third-party payor is present at an intake interview, the lawyer may sometimes give the impression that the third party is also a client. Many factors might contribute to such an impression by the third party. A lawyer who accepts payment from third parties may therefore wish to inform such persons that the lawyer does not represent them and has no duties to them. The lawyer should also avoid giving legal advice to the third-party payor, and should make clear that the lawyer will not share confidential information with the third-party payor absent informed consent from the client. S*ee* Rule 1.8(f)(3) (lawyer shall not accept fees from third party unless "the client's confidential information is protected as required by Rule 1.6").

7. The remainder of this opinion assumes that the lawyer has not given Father grounds to believe he is a client.

8. Rule 1.8(f) recognizes that, when the lawyer accepts payment of his or her fee from a third party, the interest in being paid might affect the lawyer's independent professional judgment on behalf of the client. Consequently, it prohibits the lawyer from accepting such compensation unless:

> (1) the client gives informed consent;
> (2) there is no interference with the lawyer's independent professional judgment or with the client-lawyer relationship; and
> (3) the client's confidential information is protected as required by Rule 1.6.

9. If these three conditions are fulfilled, the Rules permit the third party payment. See N.Y. State 1000 (2014), in which compliance with Rule 1.8(f) operates to permit payment even by one whose interests are adverse or potentially adverse to those of the client. (Indeed, Opinion 1000 points out that, where legal fees are paid by an indemnitor such as an insurance company, the interests of the indemnitor are often contrary to those of the client.)

10. Unless the inquirer has given the Father reason to believe that he represents the parents as well as the Son, the Father is not a client of the lawyer, by virtue of paying part of the lawyer's fee. Assuming that the lawyer has not indicated to the Father that he is a co-client, and has not otherwise given the Father the impression that he is a client, then the Father is not a client.

11. Conflicts of interest with current clients are governed by Rule 1.7. Rule 1.7(a) prohibits a lawyer from representing a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that (i) the representation will involve the lawyer in representing differing interests, or (ii) there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests. If there is a conflict of interest under Rule 1.7(a), the client may consent to the conflict if the requirements of Rule 1.7(b) are met.

12. Since we assume the Father is not a client, accepting a retainer from the Mother adverse to the Father does not involve "representing" differing interests. Thus is no conflict of interest under Rule 1.7(a)(1). However, a conflict could exist under Rule 1.7(a)(2) if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that the inquirer's interest in continuing to receive fees from the Father for representing the Son would create a "significant risk" of adversely affecting the inquirer's professional judgment on behalf of the Mother. Even if such a personal interest conflict exists, which depends on questions of fact, the inquirer could still represent the Mother if he reasonably believes within the meaning of Rule 1.7(b)(1) that he could provide competent and diligent representation to the Mother, and if he obtains informed consent from the Mother, confirmed in writing, pursuant to Rule 1.7(b)(4). See Rule 1.7, Cmts. [18]-[20].

CONCLUSION:

13. When a lawyer accepts payment of legal fees from a third party, the third-party payor is not a client merely by virtue of paying the lawyer's fee. Where a lawyer's fee for representing a son was paid by the client's father and mother, and the lawyer did not give the father reason to believe he himself was a client, the lawyer's representation of mother would not constitute a conflict of interest unless a reasonable lawyer would conclude that the lawyer's interest in continuing to receive fees from the father for representing the son would create a significant risk of adversely affecting the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the mother. But even if such a conflict exists, the lawyer could cure the conflict by obtaining the mother's informed consent to the conflict as long as the lawyer satisfies the terms of Rule 1.7(b).

OPINION 1064 (07/10/2015)

TOPIC: Former Judge; Conflicts

DIGEST: A lawyer who is a former family court judge is prohibited by Rule 1.12(a) from privately representing a client in a permanent neglect action when the same client appeared before the judge in a previous neglect action and the judge issued an order "upon the merits" to put the subject child in foster care. For the same reason, the former judge is prohibited by Rule 1.12(a) from privately representing a client in a proceeding to modify child support when, as a judge, he or she issued orders upon the merits related to custody and visitation in the same matter and custody and visitation issues will be revisited as part of the application to amend child support. A conflict arising under Rule 1.12(a) cannot be waived even with consent of all parties. However, the Rule 1.12(a) conflict is not imputed to other members of the lawyer's firm if the firm acts promptly and reasonably to implement certain screening measures and no other circumstances in the particular representation create an appearance of impropriety.

RULES: 1.0(l); 1.12(a); 1.12(d)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a retired Family Court Judge and Acting Supreme Court Justice who is now in private practice. A client has asked the inquirer to undertake representation in a permanent neglect action ("permanent neglect action") involving the client's two children. Approximately two years ago, the client made one appearance before the inquirer as a judge in a neglect case ("neglect action") involving one of the client's two children in this same permanent neglect action. The inquirer as judge issued one consent order where the parties before him, including the person who is now his client, stipulated to put the subject child in foster care. The inquirer was the emergency judge that week and the assigned judge was unavailable. Recently, the Department of Social Services ("DSS") filed a petition seeking to terminate the client's parental rights.

2. Separately, the inquirer has been asked to represent an individual (the "Potential Client") in a pending child support proceeding ("support proceeding") in Family Court. The inquirer, as a judge, rendered multiple decisions over a period of two to three years concerning custody and visitation of the Potential Client's children. The inquirer did not issue any orders regarding child support. The non-custodial parent is now attempting to reduce the support award. As a result of the issues raised by the non-custodial parent, the custody/visitation orders issued by the inquirer as judge will now be revisited in the child support determination.

QUESTION:

3. a. May a lawyer ethically represent a client in a permanent neglect action when the client previously appeared before the inquirer, who was then sitting as a family court judge in a neglect proceeding, where the inquirer issued a stipulated order to put the subject child in foster care?

b. May a lawyer ethically represent a client in a child support proceeding (the "support proceeding") when the inquirer, as judge, issued numerous orders related to custody and visitation that will now be revisited as part of the child support determination?

OPINION:

4. Former judges are governed by Rule 1.12 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"). Rule 1.12(a) provides:

> (a) A lawyer shall not accept private employment in a matter upon the merits of which the lawyer has acted in a judicial capacity.

5. A conflict under Rule 1.12(a) is a non-waivable conflict. A lawyer who has such a conflict must be disqualified from the representation, regardless of consent from the client or the adversary. See Rule 1.12, Cmt. [1] ("A former judge or adjudicative officer may not, however, accept private employment in a matter upon the merits of which the judge or adjudicative officer has acted in a judicial capacity and – unlike conflicts for lawyers who have acted in a capacity listed in Rule 1.12(b) – a conflict arising under paragraph (a) cannot be waived.").

6. In order to analyze a former judge's obligations under Rule 1.12, it is necessary to define three terms used in the Rule – "judicial capacity," "matter" and "merits."

"Judicial Capacity"

7. According to Rule 1.12, Cmt. [1], a lawyer acts in a "judicial capacity" within the meaning of paragraph (a) when the lawyer "serves as a judge or other adjudicative officer." However, a judge or adjudicative officer "is not prohibited from acting as a lawyer in a matter where he or she exercised remote or incidental administrative responsibility that did not affect the merits."

8. Comment [1] to Rule 1.12 thus distinguishes between a former judge who has exercised remote or incidental administrative responsibility in a matter that did not affect the merits and a former judge who has acted in a judicial capacity that did affect the merits of a matter. A judge who acted on the merits in the matter is prohibited by New York Rule 1.12(a) from representing a client whether or not the judge participated "personally and substantially" in the matter. This Rule is different from New York's Rule 1.11(a) – applicable to a former government lawyer – and ABA Model Rule 1.12(a) – applicable to a former judge – both of which require personal and substantial participation in the matter.

"Matter"

9. In order to determine whether a Rule 1.12(a) conflict exists in this inquiry, we must consider the definition of "matter," and whether the new representations are part of the same "matter." Under the definition in Rule 1.0(l), the term "matter" includes:

> any litigation, judicial or administrative proceeding, case, claim, application, request for a ruling or other determination, contract, controversy, investigation, charge, accusation, arrest, negotiation, arbitration, mediation or any other representation involving a specific party or parties.

10. Some guidance can be obtained from the comments to Rules 1.9 and 1.11 and the prior ethics opinions of this Committee.

11. The term "matter" is discussed in the comments to both Rule 1.9 and Rule 1.11. Comment [2] to Rule 1.9 states in part that "the scope of a 'matter' for purposes of this Rule depends on the facts of a particular situation or transaction." Comment [10] to Rule 1.11 provides:

> . . . [A] "matter" may continue in another form. In determining whether two particular matters are the same, the lawyer should consider the extent to which (i) the matters involve the same basic facts, (ii) the matters involve the same or related parties, and (iii) time has elapsed between the matters. [Emphasis added.]

Several of our prior opinions have followed these "facts, parties, and time" tests. See N.Y. State 1029 (2014) (discussing the facts, parties and time tests); N.Y. State 904 (same underlying conduct was not, on its own, sufficient to constitute the same "matter"; rather, the extent of a matter depends on a variety of factors, including whether two matters involve the same underlying events, the same or related parties, the same underlying events or related issues, and whether the matters are ongoing at the same time or close in time).

12. In N.Y. State 1047 (2015), the Committee stated: "Although the Definition Section of the Rules contains a definition of 'matter,' it does not define the scope of a single matter, but rather lists more than a dozen different types of matters that are included within the term. See Rule 1.0(l)."

13. In N.Y. State 800 (2006) we provided examples of matters that are heard in the Family Court: "The Family Court hears matters involving children and families, including child protective proceedings, adoption, custody and visitation, support, family offense, guardianship, delinquency, paternity, persons in need of supervision (PINS), and foster care approval and review." See also N.Y. State 894 (2011) ("Rule 1.0(l) defined 'matter' to include a claim or controversy as well as a proceeding.").

14. Applying the facts, parties and time tests to the neglect action and the permanent neglect action, the neglect and the permanent neglect actions appear to be the same matter for purposes of Rule 1.12(a). In terms of "facts," the same underlying events or alleged actions setting forth the grounds for neglect and permanent neglect may be present. Regarding the parties, the client, DSS and the other parent are the same in both the neglect and the permanent neglect proceedings. Regarding time, the petitions are not ongoing at the same time or close in time, but we understand that a permanent neglect petition will typically be commenced after there has been an initial finding of neglect, and that the neglect finding is often referenced in (and a basis for) the permanent neglect petition. These factors taken together suggest that the neglect and permanent neglect actions are the same matter for purposes of Rule 1.12(a).

15. Applying the facts, parties and time tests to the support proceeding and the custody/visitation proceeding, while the parties are the same, at first blush, facts would appear to be different because the judge rendered decisions involving custody and visitation, and not child support. However, we are told that the custody and visitation issues will be revisited in determining the application for reduced child support due to allegations raised by the non-custodial parent. Finally, while at least three years have passed since the former judge's earliest involvement with the custody/child support proceeding, it seems clear that modifying an order in a prior proceeding constitutes part of the same proceeding.

"Merits"

16. The term "merits" is not defined in the Rules, and neither New York courts nor New York ethics opinions have interpreted the term "merits" in the context of Rule 1.12. However, New York courts have interpreted the term "merits" in the context of the doctrine of res judicata, which operates only if there has been a judgment "on the merits." For example, in Pizzuto v. Soriano, 2011 WL 1991964, 2011 NY Slip Op 31287(U) (Sup. Ct. Richmond County 2011), the court said:

> The word "merits", as a legal term, has acquired no precise technical meaning and admits to some latitude of interpretation, but is to be regarded as referring to the strict legal rights of the parties, as contradistinguished from those mere questions of practice which every court regulates for itself and from all matters which depend upon the discretion or favor of the court.

(citing Mink v. Keim, 266 AD 184, 186 (1st Dept. 1943); reversed on other grounds, Mink v. Keim, 291 NY 300 (1943)). In our opinion, that definition is too narrow for Rule 1.12, which should be read to encompass any decision affecting the legal rights of the parties, whether based on substantive law, procedural rules, or matters depending on the court's discretion. Here, we believe that approving a consent order constitutes a determination of the legal rights of the parties, and thus is acting "on the merits."

Interpretations of "On the Merits" in Ohio

17. Our conclusion is supported by authority from another state. The Ohio Board of Commissioners on Grievances and Discipline ("Board of Commissioners") in its Opinion 2005-5 (2005) held that "a divorce or dissolution and any subsequent post-decree matters (such as a modification of child custody, parenting time, child support or defending or initiating a contempt order to enforce a prior court order) are the same matter for purposes of DR 9-101(A) [the predecessor to Rule 1.12]." The Board of Commissioners concluded that it was "improper under DR 9-101(A) of the Ohio Code of Professional Responsibility for a former magistrate, now privately practicing law, to represent a person in post-decree matters (such as modifying child custody, parenting time, or child support, or defending or initiating a contempt order to enforce a prior court order) when he or she served as magistrate in the person's original divorce or dissolution action." After noting that "the words 'matter' or 'merits' were not defined in the Ohio Code of Professional Responsibility," the Board of Commissioners turned to Ohio caselaw. In Disciplinary Counsel v. Christ, 74 Ohio St.3d 308 (1996), a former judge had received a public reprimand for violating DR 9-101(A) when, seven years after granting an uncontested divorce as judge, he privately represented one of the parties to the divorce, filing a Motion to Modify Parental Rights and Responsibilities on the client's behalf. When he was charged with violating DR 9-101(A), the former judge argued that his judicial involvement in the uncontested divorce had been limited to signing the final judgment, an act which the judge considered "perfunctory" rather than "on the merits." However, the Board of Commissioners concluded that the judge had violated DR 9-101(A) because he "did act in his official capacity as a judge, [he] signed the entry, and . . . seven years later [he] represented one of the litigants in a . . . Motion to Modify custody in the same case." Id at 309.

18. Although the Ohio Code of Professional Responsibility has been superseded by the Ohio Rules of Professional Conduct, Opinion 2005-5 is instructive because the language under the Ohio DR 9-101(A) is substantively identical to the language in New York Rule 1.12(a): "A lawyer shall not accept private employment in a matter upon the merits of which he (she) has acted in a judicial capacity."

Screening the Former Judge to Avoid Imputed Disqualification

19. If Rule 1.12(a) disqualifies a former judge from representing a private client, the other lawyers in the firm may nevertheless work on the matter if they are properly screened pursuant to Rule 1.12(d). Rule 1.12(d) provides as follows:

> (d) When a lawyer is disqualified from representation under this Rule, no lawyer in a firm with which that lawyer is associated may knowingly undertake or continue representation in such a matter unless:
> (1) the firm acts promptly and reasonably to:
> (i) notify, as appropriate, lawyers and nonlawyer personnel within the firm that the personally disqualified lawyer is prohibited from participating in the representation of the current client;
> (ii) implement effective screening procedures to prevent the flow of information about the matter between the personally disqualified lawyer and the others in the firm;
> (iii) ensure that the disqualified lawyer is apportioned no part of the fee therefrom; and
> (iv) give written notice to the parties and any appropriate tribunal to enable it to ascertain compliance with the provisions of this Rule; and
> (2) there are no other circumstances in the particular representation that create an appearance of impropriety.

In order for the former judge's firm not to be disqualified, the firm must timely and effectively screen the former judge pursuant to Rule 1.12(d)(1), and must also consider whether the circumstances give rise to any appearance of impropriety pursuant to Rule 1.12(d)(2).

20. Whether the inquirer would violate the Code of Judicial Conduct or any applicable statutes and regulations is beyond the jurisdiction of this Committee. We therefore do not discuss requirements in any of those sources that might apply to the inquiry here.

CONCLUSION:

21. A lawyer who is a former family court judge is prohibited by Rule 1.12(a) from privately representing a client in a permanent neglect action when the same client appeared before the judge in a previous neglect action and the judge issued an order "upon the merits" to put the subject child in foster care. For the same reason, the former judge is prohibited by Rule 1.12(a) from privately representing a client in a proceeding to modify child support when, as a judge, he or she issued orders upon the merits related to custody and visitation in the same matter and custody and visitation issues will be revisited as part of the application to amend child support. A conflict arising under Rule 1.12(a) cannot be waived even with consent of all parties. However, the Rule 1.12(a) conflict is not imputed to other members of the lawyer's firm if the firm acts promptly and reasonably to implement certain screening measures and no other circumstances in the particular representation create an appearance of impropriety.

TOPIC: Imputed Conflicts of Interest; Part-time Prosecutor

DIGEST: The law firm of a part-time prosecutor for Town may represent a client in an Article 78 proceeding against Village, involving actions of Village zoning board or Village planning board, where (i) the Town and Village are separate legal entities and have separate legal departments, (ii) the Town Attorney and his or her staff, including the part-time prosecutor, have no responsibility for prosecuting Village zoning and planning laws, and (iii) the proceeding would not involve Village law enforcement personnel, even though the Town and Village courts have been merged and the Village provides police protection services to both the Village and Town.

RULES: 1.7(a), 1.10(a), 1.11(f)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is an attorney in private practice and a part-time Deputy Town Attorney. As Deputy Town Attorney, his duties include prosecuting violations of the Town Code and Vehicle and Traffic Law (including prosecuting traffic violations written primarily by the Village police force), assisting the Town Council in drafting and interpreting its statutes, and providing legal advice to the Town. The Village has its own Village Prosecutor who is responsible for prosecuting Village zoning laws, building codes and the Village Code, and is supervised by Corporation Counsel. The Town's attorneys, including inquirer, have no responsibilities relating to Village zoning or planning laws. The scope of the Village Prosecutor's work on behalf of the Village is entirely distinct from the scope of the Town Attorney's work on behalf of the Town, and the Town and Village are distinct legal entities. However, the Town and Village have an inter-municipal agreement, which has, in effect, merged the Town and Village courts, and under another such agreement the Village provides police protection services to the Village and Town.

2. The inquirer's firm was asked to represent an individual in an Article 78 proceeding against the Village based upon allegedly improper actions taken by the zoning board or the planning board. The inquirer asks if there is any conflict of interest in his firm's representation of the plaintiff against the Village.

QUESTION:

3. May the law firm of a part-time prosecutor for a Town represent a client in an Article 78 proceeding against a Village to challenge actions of the Village zoning board or Village planning board where the town and village are separate legal entities and have separate legal departments and the Town Attorney and his or her staff, including the part-time prosecutor, have no responsibility for prosecuting Village zoning or planning laws, even though the Town and Village courts have been merged and the Village provides police protection services to both the Village and Town?

OPINION:

4. This Committee interprets the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"). We assume for purposes of this opinion that the proposed representation would not violate any applicable law governing Town officers and their firms. We express no opinion on that issue and urge the inquirer to verify our assumption.

5. Rule 1.7(a) prohibits concurrent representations where a reasonable attorney would conclude that either (1) "the representation will involve the lawyer in representing differing interests" or (2) "there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests." In addition, while lawyers are associated in a firm none of them may knowingly represent a client when any one of them practicing alone would be prohibited from doing so. Rule 1.10(a). Thus, if the inquirer would be prohibited under Rule 1.7 from representing the new client in a proceeding against the Village because he is a part-time Town prosecutor, then, without the consent of the Town and the private client, the inquirer's conflict would be imputed to all the lawyers in the firm such that no lawyer at the firm could represent this individual in a proceeding against the Village.

6. The threshold question here is whether the firm's representation of an individual in a lawsuit adverse to the Village conflicts with the inquirer's representation of the Town. The inquirer makes clear that the attorneys for the Town represent the Town, not the Village. The Village is represented by a Village Prosecutor who is separately supervised by the Corporation Counsel. Further, the scope of the inquirer's duties as a part-time Town attorney (prosecuting Town Code and Vehicle and Traffic law violations, drafting and interpreting Town statutes, and general legal advice and representation of the Town) are distinct from the duties of the Village Prosecutor (prosecuting violations of Village zoning laws, building codes and the Village Code).

7. We recognize that there may be instances where the inquirer's actions on behalf of the Town may further the interests of the Village or may rely on resources that are shared with Village prosecutors. For example, the inquirer prosecutes traffic violations written primarily by Village Police, and litigates on behalf of the Town in the merged Town and Village courts. Such shared resources alone are not, in our opinion, sufficient to give the inquirer a conflict of interest.

8. However, this Committee has issued many opinions setting conditions on the private practice of law by part-time prosecutors. For example, a part-time prosecutor is prohibited from representing criminal defendants in matters where (i) the lawyer is required to appear before a judicial or other official of the locality he or she publicly represents, (ii) the government unit where the lawyer is employed or one of its ordinances is involved, (iii) the charges are similar to those the lawyer prosecutes or (iv) the investigating officers or law enforcement personnel involved are those with whom the lawyer associates as a prosecutor. See N.Y. State 874 (2011); N.Y. State 544 (1982) and the opinions cited therein.

9. Here, the matter is not a criminal matter. Moreover, the lawyer would not be required to appear before a Town judge or official. See C.P.L.R. § 7804(b) (an Article 78 proceeding "shall be brought in the supreme court in the county specified in subdivision (b) of section 506," with exceptions not applicable here). The governmental unit involved is the Village, and the ordinances involved are those of the Village, not the Town. Moreover, the subject matter is not similar to matters the lawyer prosecutes.

10. In N.Y. State 800 (2006), this Committee concluded that a part-time prosecutor was barred from accepting Family Court appointed counsel assignments where the matters involved investigating officers or law enforcement personnel with whom the lawyer was currently working or had previously worked as a part-time prosecutor, because of the possible effect on the lawyer's professional judgment and on the lawyer's future working relationships with such law enforcement personnel.

11. Following the reasoning of Opinion 800, it would be impermissible for the inquirer to represent a client in a matter in which he is likely to be adverse to law enforcement personnel with whom he had worked or is likely to work in connection with his role as a Town prosecutor, and such a conflict would be non-consentable. Ordinarily, however, we would expect that representing a client in a zoning or planning board matter adverse to the Village would not involve adversity to Village law enforcement personnel. Yet even assuming there is no conflict under Rule 1.7(a), the inquirer is prohibited from using any influence he may have as a public official to influence, or attempt to influence, any tribunal to act in favor of the firm's proposed client. Rule 1.11(f).

12. Assuming that the zoning or planning board matter would not involve adversity to Village law enforcement personnel, representation of the private client and the Town would not involve representation of differing interests, and there is no conflict to impute to other lawyers at the inquirer's firm.

CONCLUSION:

13. The law firm of a part-time prosecutor for Town may represent a client in an Article 78 proceeding against Village, concerning actions taken by Village's zoning board or planning board, where (i) the Town and Village are separate legal entities and have separate legal departments, (ii) the Town Attorney and his or her staff, including the part-time prosecutor, have no responsibility for prosecuting Village zoning laws, and (iii) the proceeding would not involve Village law enforcement personnel, even though the Town and Village courts have, in effect, been merged and the Village provides police protection services to both the Village and Town.

OPINION 1066 (07/13/2015)

TOPIC: Loan to client (making or guaranteeing); legal fees

DIGEST: A lawyer may not guarantee repayment of a loan made to a client for the purpose of paying legal fees.

RULES: 1.8(e)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer represents individuals who are charged with drunk driving offenses. Many of the clients have difficulty obtaining funds to pay the firm's required retainer. The inquirer proposes to introduce each such client to a bank to lend the funds. However, many of the clients' credit scores are too low to qualify for a loan.

QUESTION:

2. May the lawyer's firm guaranty the client's obligation to repay a bank for financing, where the financing was incurred to pay the lawyer's retainer?

OPINION:

3. Rule 1.8(e) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") provides: "While representing a client in connection with contemplated or pending litigation, a lawyer shall not advance or guarantee financial assistance to the client" except as provided in subparagraphs (1) – (3). The rule's three exceptions are discussed below.

4. Traditionally there have been two reasons for prohibiting a lawyer representing a client in connection with contemplated or pending litigation from providing financial assistance to the client: (1) such assistance would encourage clients to pursue lawsuits that might not otherwise be brought, and (2) such assistance gives the lawyer a financial stake in the litigation. See Rule 1.8, Cmt. [10]:

> Lawyers may not subsidize lawsuits or administrative proceedings brought on behalf of their clients, including making or guaranteeing loans to their clients for living expenses, because to do so would encourage clients to pursue lawsuits that might not otherwise be brought and because such assistance gives lawyers too great a financial stake in the litigation. These dangers do not warrant a prohibition against a lawyer lending a client money for court costs and litigation expenses . . . because these advances are virtually indistinguishable from contingent fee agreements and help ensure access to the courts.

5. The first reason for the prohibition derives from the common law of champerty and maintenance, which prohibited lawyers from acquiring an interest in the client's litigation because such interests were thought to breed needless litigation. See American Law Institute, Restatement of the Law Governing Lawyers, § 36, Cmt. b. The second is designed to ensure that the lawyer's independent professional judgment on behalf of the client is not affected by a personal stake in the client's matter. It is not clear that either rationale should apply to criminal defense work. Enabling a criminal defendant to defend himself will not result in litigation that would not otherwise be brought. Moreover, the exceptions to Rule 1.8(e) authorize the lawyer to have a financial stake in the litigation to a certain extent.

6. The first issue raised by the inquiry is whether a criminal case is considered to be "litigation" within the meaning of Rule 1.8(e), which prohibits a lawyer from advancing or guaranteeing financial assistance to a client while representing a client in connection with contemplated or pending litigation.

7. The Rules do not define "litigation." Black's Law Dictionary defines "litigation" as a "contest in a Court of Justice for the for the purpose of enforcing a right." Such a right could include that of the People of the State of New York to prosecute a criminal defendant and the right of the defendant not to be summarily punished. Indeed, Comment [23] to Rule 1.7, in discussing the conflict analysis of representing multiple clients in "litigation" notes among its examples "co-defendants in a criminal case."

8. Rule 1.8(e) contains three exceptions:

> (1) a lawyer may advance court costs and expenses of litigation, the repayment of which may be contingent on the outcome of the matter;
> (2) a lawyer representing an indigent or pro bono client may pay court costs and expenses of litigation on behalf of the client; and
> (3) a lawyer, in an action in which an attorney's fee is payable in whole or in part as a percentage of the recovery in the action, may pay on the lawyer's own account court costs and expenses of litigation. In such case, the fee paid to the lawyer from the proceeds of the action may include an amount equal to such costs and expenses incurred.

9. The first exception allows the lawyer to advance court costs and expenses of litigation the repayment of which may be contingent on the outcome of the matter. We believe this would include advances of expenses in a criminal matter, even if repayment is contingent on the outcome of the matter. Rule 1.5(d)(1) prohibits a lawyer from charging a contingent fee for representing a defendant in a criminal matter. As EC 2-20 to the former Code of Professional Responsibility explained, the prohibition resulted from the fact that criminal representation does not create a res with which to pay the fee. However, there is no reason to believe that the drafters of Rule 1.8(e)(1) intended to distinguish between civil and criminal matters. Thus we believe that the first exception allows the lawyer to advance court costs and expenses of litigation, whether the client remains liable for them or repayment is contingent on the outcome of the matter.

10. Rule 1.8(e)(1), however, does not authorize a guarantee of such court costs. Although the drafters did not explain the rationale for this omission, the introductory language of the rule clearly prohibits both advances and guarantees, and Rule 1.8(e)(1) permits only advances of court costs and expenses of litigation and does not specifically authorize guarantees of such costs and expenses. The language of the exceptions in Rule 1.8(e) is the same as that contained in Section 488 of the New York Judiciary Law, which generally prohibits a lawyer from giving valuable consideration to any person as an inducement for hiring the lawyer, except as provided therein. Section 488(2)(c) includes advancing court costs and expenses of litigation on behalf of the client.

11. The second exception applies only in the case of an indigent or pro bono client and the inquiry does not state that the client here is indigent or pro bono.

12. The third exception applies where the fee is a contingency fee, which cannot apply in a criminal matter.

13. Because the introduction to Rule 1.8(e) prohibits a lawyer from advancing or guaranteeing costs and expenses and none of the three exceptions authorizes the guarantee at issue here, the inquirer is prohibited from guaranteeing a loan to the client to pay a bank loan incurred by the lawyer's client to pay the lawyer's fees.

14. If the inquirer helps the client to negotiate a loan from the lender to the client, there are a number of other ethical issues. See N.Y. State 769 (2003) (if a proposed transaction with a litigation financing company is legal, the lawyer may represent a client in negotiating and carrying it out); N.Y. State 666 (1994) (lawyer may refer a client to a lender who would provide economic support to the client during the pendency of the case, provided the lawyer had no interest in the lender, received no payment for the referral, and did not compromise client confidentiality in making the referral); N.Y. City 2011-2 (2011) (when client enters into litigation financing arrangement with a third party lender, lawyer must be cognizant of ethical issues, including compromise of confidentiality, waiver of attorney-client privilege and potential impact on lawyer's exercise of independent professional judgment).

CONCLUSION:

15. A lawyer may not guaranty repayment of a loan made to a client for the purpose of paying legal fees.

OPINION 1067 (07/27/2015)

TOPIC: Prospective clients; confidentiality; duty to inform client of material developments

DIGEST: When a person consults with a lawyer in good faith about possible representation in a matter, the lawyer owes a duty of confidentiality pursuant to Rule 1.18(b) with respect to information the lawyer learns in the consultation, absent the prospective client's consent to disclosure or use. Whether the prospective client's identity, the fact of the consultation, and the subject matter of the consultation constitute confidential information turns on whether the information is protected by the attorney-client privilege, on whether disclosure likely would be embarrassing or detrimental to the prospective client, and on whether the prospective client has asked the lawyer not to disclose the information. Whether the consultation precludes or restricts the lawyer from undertaking representation of another client or continuing to represent another client depends on whether the matters are the same or substantially related and on whether the information the lawyer learned from the prospective client could be "significantly harmful" to the prospective client in the matter.

RULES: 1.4(a), 1.6(a), 1.9(c), and 1.18(a)-(d)

FACTS:

1. Inquirer is a small law firm of three named partners X, Y and Z (the "Law Firm") practicing primarily in the fields of estate planning and administration, trusts and elder law, and related fields. Two partners in the firm, X and Y, have long represented a client ("Father") in a variety of matters, including a protracted and vigorously contested Article 81 proceeding brought by Father's adult child ("Child") over the guardianship of Father's wife. That litigation concluded in Father's favor. The firm continues to represent Father. Z, the third named partner in the Law Firm, took no part in the representation of Father in the guardianship proceeding and was not aware of it until the consultation that lies at the center of the inquiry.

2. Some six months after the guardianship proceeding concluded, Child sought a meeting with Z, ostensibly to discuss possible representation in connection with estate planning for Child. Z holds public seminars on elder law and estate planning from time to time and invites members of the audience to schedule a one-hour meeting with him to discuss individual concerns after the seminar. Child apparently was responding to such an invitation.

3. Z apparently did not check for conflicts before discussing the substance of Child's concerns, and Child did not mention until the end of the consultation that the Law Firm had represented Father in a guardianship proceeding in which Child was Father's adversary (i.e., adverse to the Law Firm's client).

4. Without revealing any information beyond the fact that he had met with Child to discuss possible representation, Z then inquired of his partners whether there had been such a guardianship matter. X and Y confirmed that there had been such a matter involving heated and protracted litigation. The three attorneys agreed that, even if there were no conflict with undertaking planning for Child, they should not accept the representation, and they declined it.

QUESTION:

5. Do the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") require the Law Firm to disclose to Father that his Child had sought to retain the Law Firm in connection with a matter unrelated to the Law Firm's representation of Father? Do the Rules permit such disclosure?

6. Under the Rule, does Z's consultation with Child preclude or restrict the Law Firm from continuing to represent Father?

7. Do the Rules require or permit the Law Firm to inform Child's lawyer in the guardianship proceeding ("W") that Child sought to retain the Law Firm for estate planning?

OPINION:

Law Firm's Duties to a Prospective Client

8. Before addressing the Law Firm's obligations and authority with respect to Father and to Child's own lawyer (W), we must first examine the Law Firm's duties to Child, because Child's information is at the center of this inquiry. Unless Child was acting in bad faith when consulting Z concerning the possibility of representation (a possibility discussed below), Child became a "prospective client" of Z and his firm at the outset of that consultation, see Rule 1.18(a), and is thus entitled to some (albeit not all) of the protections that inure to clients in any client-attorney relationship. In particular, a prospective client benefits from the protection of confidential information, Rule 1.18(b), and protection against the lawyer representing another client with interests materially adverse to those of the prospective client in the same or a substantially related matter if the lawyer received information from the prospective client that could be significantly harmful to the prospective client in the matter, Rule 1.18(c).

9. Our discussion of the Law Firm's duties to Child as a prospective client is premised on the assumption that Child was acting in good faith when consulting Z. Had Child communicated information to Z "unilaterally . . . without any reasonable expectation that . . . [Z was] willing to discuss the possibility of forming a client-lawyer relationship; or . . . for the purpose of disqualifying the lawyer from handling a materially adverse representation on the same or a substantially related matter," Child would not be deemed to be a prospective client and the Law Firm would not owe Child any duties that a lawyer owes to a prospective client. See Rule 1.18(e) (describing two categories of people who are not prospective clients).

10. Rule 1.18(a) defines a prospective client as one "who discusses with a lawyer the possibility of forming a client-lawyer relationship with respect to a matter."

11. Rule 1.18(b) provides that a lawyer who engages in discussion about possible representation with a prospective client "shall not use or reveal information learned in the consultation, except as Rule 1.9 would permit with respect to information of a former client," even if no client-lawyer relationship ensues. [Emphasis added.] Rule 1.9, in turn, provides in pertinent part that a lawyer shall not reveal any "confidential information" of a former client protected by Rule 1.6 except as allowed or required by the Rules with respect to a current client, but Rule 1.9(c) places no restriction upon the revelation or use of non-confidential or "generally known" information. In this regard, it is similar to

Rule 1.6(a) (defining "confidential information" to exclude, among other things, "information that is generally known in the local community or in the trade, field or profession to which the information relates"). Thus, Rule 1.18(b) prohibits a lawyer from using or disclosing prospective client information only if the information is "confidential information" as defined in Rule 1.6, and even then only if the information was "learned in the consultation."

12. Under Rule 1.18(c), a lawyer may also be subject to conflict of interest rules with respect to a prospective client:

> (c) A lawyer subject to paragraph (b) shall not represent a client with interests materially adverse to those of a prospective client in the same or a substantially related matter if the lawyer received information from the prospective client that could be significantly harmful to that person in the matter, except as provided in paragraph (d). If a lawyer is disqualified from representation under this paragraph, no lawyer in a firm with which that lawyer is associated may knowingly undertake or continue representation in such a matter, except as provided in paragraph (d) [stating conditions necessary for screening to be effective]. [Emphasis added.]

13. In the remainder of this opinion, we will first discuss the use of a prospective client's confidential information and then discuss whether the consultation with the prospective client creates a conflict of interest.

Identity of Client and Fact of Consultation as Confidential Information

14. In this inquiry, the identity of the prospective client (Child), the fact of Child's consultation with Z about representation, and the general subject matter of the consultation were all "learned [by Z] in the consultation." Are they pieces of confidential information of the prospective client? Applying the definition of "confidential information" in Rule 1.6, information protected by Rule 1.18(b) may be of three types: (i) information "protected by the client-attorney privilege"; (ii) information that is "likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the [prospective] client if disclosed"; or (iii) "information that the [prospective] client has requested be kept confidential."

15. Whether information is protected by the attorney-client privilege is an issue of law on which we offer no opinion because issues of law are beyond our jurisdiction. For a general discussion of privilege in relation to the identity of a client, the fact of consultation and related matters, see American Law Institute, Restatement of the Law Third, The Law Governing Lawyers, §69, comment g, and Reporter's Note to comment g.

16. Whether use or disclosure of the information concerning the identity of a prospective client, the fact of consultation, and the general subject matter of the consultation would be embarrassing or detrimental to the prospective client, and whether the prospective client has requested or been assured by the lawyer of confidentiality with respect to such information, are questions dependent upon the relevant facts and circumstances. We cannot answer such questions in a particular case. Each lawyer confronted with the issue of whether the identity of a prospective client, the fact of a consultation concerning possible representation, the general subject matter of the representation and like information is confidential will need to make his or her own judgment based on whether the relevant facts satisfy the criteria defining confidentiality.

17. However, if Z concludes that information about Child's identity, consultation with Z about possible representation, and the general subject matter of that consultation, fits under any of the rubrics of confidential information, then Z and, by extension, the other lawyers associated with the Law Firm, are duty bound under the Rules not to disclose such information in whole or in part. We are unable to conclude on the basis of the inquiry that any exception to the general rule of confidentiality contained in Rule 1.6 is applicable to the information at issue in this inquiry.[40]

Law Firm's Disclosure Obligations to its Existing Client

18. We turn now to whether the Law Firm has any disclosure obligations to its client, Father. If the information concerning Child's consultation is not confidential, the Law Firm may, at will, share that information with Father. Rule 1.6(a) – and the derivative Rules 1.9(c) and 1.18(b) – prohibit a lawyer from using or revealing only "confidential information" as defined in Rule 1.6(a). Those Rules do not govern information that is not confidential.

19. A more difficult question is what the Law Firm must do if any of the information disclosed by Child during the consultation is confidential information. If any of it is confidential information, then the inquirer must determine whether any of Child's confidential information would be material to the representation of Father in the matter in which the Firm represents or comes to represent Father. Rule 1.4(a)(1)(iii) obligates a lawyer to inform the client of "material developments in the matter." As the City Bar ethics committee stated in N.Y. City 2005-2 (2005), one client does not have any legitimate expectation that the lawyer will use confidential information of a second client for the benefit of the first client. However, if the information the lawyer has from the second client is so material to the matter in which the firm represents the first client that the lawyer cannot avoid using the information, then the firm will be faced with a dilemma. Here, the firm would have an obligation of confidentiality to the Child under Rule 1.18 with respect to material information that the Law Firm is required under Rule 1.4 to disclose to Father.

20. If, as stated in the Inquiry, the matter upon which Child consulted Z is, in fact, unrelated to the representation of Father, then the information learned by Z in the consultation is unlikely to be material to matters within the scope of the Law Firm's representation of Father, and the Law Firm would have no obligation under the Rules to inform Father of Child's consultation and the representation of the Father would not be affected.

40 Rule 1.6(a)(1) authorizes disclosure or use when the client has given informed consent. Some lawyers routinely ask prospective clients who are exploring the possibility of an engagement to agree to an advance waiver of any conflict that might result from the prospective client sharing confidential information. See Rule 1.7, Cmts. [22]-[22A] (discussing circumstances making it more or less likely that an advance conflict waiver will be deemed valid and effective). See also N.Y. City 2006-2 (2006) (discussing advance conflict waivers, imputation of conflicts and ethical screens under the former Code of Professional Responsibility); Rule 1.18, Cmt. [5] (lawyer may condition conversations with a prospective client on the person's informed consent (i) that no information disclosed during the consultation will prohibit the lawyer from representing a different client in the matter and (ii) that the lawyer may subsequently use information received from the prospective client). Such an advance waiver apparently does not exist here – and even if it did, an advance waiver of conflicts of interest would not necessarily constitute advance consent to disclosure of confidential information to a conflicting client.

Law Firm's Disclosure Obligations to Prospective Client's Lawyer

21. With respect to Child's lawyer (W), the Law Firm has no duty of disclosure. Indeed, if disclosure would undermine Child's relationship with W, then the information would be confidential because disclosure would be detrimental or embarrassing to Child. If the information is confidential, Rule 1.18(b) prohibits the Law Firm from disclosing it to W without Child's informed consent.

Conflicts of Interest Between Prospective Client and Existing Client

22. As noted above, Rule 1.18(c) would apply if (i) the Firm represents or comes to represent the Father in a matter that is the same as, or substantially related to, the matter about which Child sought representation, (ii) the interests of Child in that matter are "materially adverse" to those of Father in the matter in which the Firm represents (or comes to represent) him, and (iii) the information Z obtained from Child in the consultation could be "significantly harmful" to Child in the matter. See N.Y. State 960 (2013) (discussing the meaning of "materially adverse," "substantially related" and "significantly harmful.")

23. Here, the Firm has represented Father in connection with a guardianship proceeding with respect to the Father's wife. The Child apparently sought representation in connection with the Child's own estate planning. Clearly the representations do not concern the same matter. The question is whether a reasonable lawyer would conclude that there is a substantial risk that confidential factual information that would normally have been obtained in the prior representation [in this case, Z's consultation with Child] would materially advance the position of the client [in this case, Father] in the subsequent matter [in this case, the Firm's continuing representation of Father].

24. In N.Y. State 960 (2013), the inquirer had met with a prospective client who had recently purchased a home to discuss filing suit against the seller over substantial structural damage throughout the home, which required repairs by a contractor. Although the prospective client did not hire the lawyer, the contractor later sought to hire the lawyer to bring a lawsuit against the homeowner for the balance due for the repair work. We concluded that the facts presented did not enable us to determine whether any confidences received from the homeowner in the initial consultation were relevant to the contractor's claim for non-payment or to any potential counterclaim by the homeowner against the contractor. Here, since Child was consulting Z about estate planning, it seems less likely that Child would have imparted confidences relevant to the Firm's representation of Father. However, the relevance of confidences imparted by Child are a factual question that is beyond the jurisdiction of this Committee and can only be made by Z.

25. If the interests of Child in any matters in which the Firm represents Father are materially adverse to those of Father, the question under Rule 1.18 is whether the information Z obtained from Child in the consultation could be "significantly harmful" to Child in the matter. We pointed out in N.Y. State 960 (2013) that, even if confidential information obtained by the lawyer in the consultation by the prospective client is somewhat harmful to the prospective client, the information does not disqualify the lawyer from representation against the prospective client. As Professor Simon notes:

> The "significantly harmful" qualification is a radical twist. Whereas a lawyer must not oppose a former actual client in a substantially related matter without obtaining the > former client's informed consent, a lawyer may oppose a former prospective client in a substantially related matter without even seeking the former client's consent as long as the lawyer did not receive information from the prospective client that "could be significantly harmful to that person in the matter." Under Rule 1.9(a), we presume – almost irrebuttably – that a lawyer who formerly represented a client received information from the former client that "could be significantly harmful" to that person in any substantially related matter. Under Rule 1.18(c), we reject that presumption and turn it into a question, an "if" clause, a rebuttable presumption.

Simon's New York Rules of Professional Conduct Annotated 954 (2015 ed.). As in the case of whether the prospective client imparted relevant factual information, the degree of harmfulness of such information is a factual question beyond the jurisdiction of this Committee.

CONCLUSION:

26. When a person consults with a lawyer in good faith about possible representation in a matter, the lawyer owes a duty of confidentiality pursuant to Rule 1.18(b) with respect to information the lawyer learns in the consultation, absent the prospective client's consent to disclosure or use. Whether the prospective client's identity, the fact of the consultation, and the subject matter of the consultation constitute confidential information turns on whether the information is protected by the attorney-client privilege, on whether disclosure likely would be embarrassing or detrimental to the prospective client, and on whether the prospective client has asked the lawyer not to disclose the information. Here, if the Child's consultation with the Law Firm was unrelated to the Law Firm's representation of the Father, then the information learned from Child is unlikely to be material to the firm's representation of Father, but this is a factual determination that can be made only by the lawyer. In that case, the firm would have no obligation to disclose it (and, if it is confidential to Child, no ability to do so without the consent of Child). Moreover, if the information is confidential to Child, then the Law Firm has no obligation to disclose it to Child's lawyer in an unrelated matter, or the ability to do so without the consent of Child. Whether the consultation precludes or restricts the lawyer from undertaking representation of another client or continuing to represent another client depends on whether the matters are the same or substantially related and on whether the information the lawyer learned from the prospective client could be "significantly harmful" to the prospective client in the matter.

TOPIC: Aiding Unauthorized Practice of Law; Accepting Referrals from Nonlawyers; Fee-Splitting

DIGEST: Lawyer may not join with a claims recovery firm in an agreement to offer legal services to the public to be performed by the lawyer and by the claims recovery firm if it is to be done on a systematic and continuing basis, because claims recovery firms are not on the Appellate Division list of approved nonlegal professionals within the meaning of Rule 5.8. Even if the relationship is a "non-exclusive reciprocal referral agreement" within the meaning of Rule 5.8(c), the lawyer must ensure that the relationship does not interfere with the lawyer's independent professional judgment, does not involve improper solicitation of clients, does not involve aiding in the unauthorized practice of law, and does not involve the improper sharing of legal fees. Lawyer may share in contingent fee paid by client to lawyer and nonlawyer but only if (i) the nonlawyer provides substantial assistance in the proceedings (i.e. does not merely sign up clients and pass them on to the lawyer), (ii) the nonlawyer's compensation is commensurate with the nonlawyer's services, and (iii) the lawyer's fee is also commensurate with the lawyer's services (i.e. is not reduced so that the reduction is in effect a referral fee to the nonlawyer).

RULES: 1.0(j), 1.2, 1.4(a), 1.5(a), 5.4(a), (b) & (c), 5.5(b), 5.8(a), 7.2, 8.4(a)

FACTS:

1. A nonlawyer claims recovery firm (the "Claims Recovery Firm") seeks out and provides assistance to businesses that potentially are entitled to class action recoveries based on class actions that have already been settled or otherwise resolved.-

2. After a settlement has been announced, the Claims Recovery Firm provides multiple services. It identifies potential class members and contacts them to make them aware of the settlement. It enters into an agreement with each client and helps the clients assure that all of their eligible business units participate in the claims process. It gives advice to its clients on the documents required in the claims process. When required documents are not available, it negotiates with the claims administrator to use alternative documentation. It prepares, assembles, and submits the client claim packages and documentation. It works with the clients to address any questions raised by claims administrators, and provides responses to the claims administrators. It monitors the claims process and keeps its clients advised with updates on the recovery process and its developments. Upon receipt of payments, it performs an audit to ensure that the payments have not been under-calculated. Finally, it follows up with clients to assure the recovery checks have been deposited. For all these services, the claims recovery firm receives a contingent commission of 33%, which the inquirer believes is "industry-standard" for such services.

3. Under the inquiry here, in the course of identifying class-action settlement recovery opportunities for its clients and potential clients, the Claims Recovery Firm has identified what it believes may be colorable antitrust damages claims, and it proposes to assist its clients in making those claims. It would engage in activities similar to the services it provides in the class action claims context. It would enter into a written agreement with each client under which the Claims Recovery Firm would (1) act as an agent for the antitrust claimant to engage legal counsel (including, perhaps exclusively, the inquirer here) to represent the client, (2) provide services in connection with the antitrust claim, including gathering client documents relevant to analyzing the potential damages sustained as a result of the alleged antitrust violations, (3) receive a contingent commission of one-third of the client's recovery, and (4) pay the law firm's fees, which would be a percentage of the Claims Recovery Firm's contingent commission.

QUESTION:

4. May a lawyer enter into an arrangement with a nonlawyer Claims Recovery Firm in which the Claims Recovery Firm (i) hires the lawyer to represent a client corporation to bring an antitrust claim, (ii) receives a one-third contingent commission out of any recovery, and (iii) pays the lawyer a portion of its commission?

OPINION:

5. Our prior opinions have identified a number of concerns with similar relationships between a lawyer and a nonlawyer firm in the provision of legal services, sometimes known as "multi-disciplinary practice." These issues include compliance with Rule 5.8(a) and the potential for (1) interference with the lawyer-client relationship; (2) improper solicitation of legal business; (3) aiding a nonlawyer in the unauthorized practice of law; and (4) improper sharing legal fees between a lawyer and a nonlawyer. We will analyze each of these potential issues here.

Multi-Disciplinary Practice

6. First, we review the proposed relationship between the Claims Recovery Firm and the law firm. As proposed, the claims recovery firm will refer the client to the law firm and play an essential role in various steps of the representation, subject to an agreement about the respective work obligations and the sharing of a contingent fee of a percentage of the recovery. The inquiry suggests that this will occur for more than one client, that is, it may be conducted on a systematic or continuing basis.

7. Rule 5.8(a) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") prohibits "a contractual relationship with a nonlegal professional or nonlegal professional service firm for the purpose of offering to the public, on a systematic and continuing basis, legal services performed by the lawyer or law firm as well as other nonlegal professional services," unless:

> (1) the profession of the nonlegal professional or nonlegal professional service firm is included in a list jointly established and maintained by the Appellate Divisions pursuant to Section 1205.3 of the Joint Appellate Division Rules;
> (2) the lawyer or law firm neither grants to the nonlegal professional or nonlegal professional service firm, nor permits such person or firm to obtain, hold or exercise, directly or indirectly, any ownership or investment interest in, or managerial or supervisory right, power or position in connection with the practice of law by the lawyer or law firm, nor, as provided in Rule 7.2(a)(1), shares legal fees with a nonlawyer or receives or gives any monetary or other tangible benefit for giving or receiving a referral; and

> (3) the fact that the contractual relationship exists is disclosed by the lawyer or law firm to any client of the lawyer or law firm before the client is referred to the nonlegal professional service firm, or to any client of the nonlegal professional service firm before that client receives legal services from the lawyer or law firm. . . . [Emphasis added.]

8. The second paragraph of Rule 5.8(a)explains that "[m]ulti-disciplinary practice between lawyers and nonlawyers is incompatible with the core values of the legal profession and therefore, a strict division between services provided by lawyers and those provided by nonlawyers is essential to protect those values." Nevertheless, under the three conditions set forth in Rule 5.8(a) and set forth above, a lawyer may have a contractual relationship with a nonlegal professional or nonlegal professional service firm for the purpose of offering to the public, on a systematic and continuing basis, legal services performed by the lawyer or law firm as well as other nonlegal professional services. The first such condition is that the profession of the nonlegal professional or nonlegal professional service firm is included in a list jointly established and maintained by the Appellate Divisions. Claims recovery firms are not included on the Appellate Division list. Consequently, an exclusive relationship with a claims recovery firm is prohibited by Rule 5.8(a). See N.Y. State 992 (2013) (lawyer may not effectively form a partnership with a nonlawyer disability office[41]); N.Y. State. 976 (2013) (lawyer may not enter into an exclusive contractual agreement with a marketing company to provide clients with a forensic mortgage analysis, to pay for referred clients, or to share legal fees); N.Y. State 930 (2012) (lawyer may not enter into an exclusive contractual arrangement with an insurance agency under which the agency would offer its customers both legal and nonlegal services, even if the agency and lawyers are separately paid and do not share in each other's fees, because insurance agencies are not on the professional service provider firms listed under Section 1205.3).

9. Under Rule 5.8(c), however, Rule 5.8(a) does not apply to relationships consisting solely of "non-exclusive reciprocal referral agreements or undertakings" between a lawyer and a nonlegal professional or nonlegal professional services firm. Although this does not seem to be such a relationship, we do not have sufficient facts to rule it out. We have previously opined that a lawyer may enter into a non-exclusive reciprocal referral agreement with a nonlawyer whose profession is not on the list in Section 1205.3. Nevertheless, the issues identified in the opinions cited in paragraph 5 above may apply to such non-exclusive referral relationships.

Interference with the Lawyer-Client Relationship

10. Rule 5.8(a) stresses that one of the reasons for the limitations on multi-disciplinary practice is the risk that it will undermine the tradition of complete professional independence and uncompromised loyalty of lawyers to their clients ("a lawyer must remain completely responsible for his or her own independent professional judgment). This principle is also reflected in Rule 5.4 (Professional Independence of a Lawyer). Rue 5.4(c) warns "Unless authorized by law, a lawyer shall not permit a person who recommends, employs or pays the lawyer to render services for another to direct or regulate the lawyer's professional judgment in rendering such legal services . . . ." Thus, our prior opinions on multi-disciplinary practice stress the importance of the nonlawyer not imposing conditions on the representation that would require the lawyer to compromise his or her exercise of independent professional judgment on behalf of the client. See N.Y. State 705 (1998).

Improper Solicitation of Legal Business

11. One of the concerns when a lawyer has a relationship with a nonlawyer is that the nonlawyer will engage in improper solicitation of the lawyer's services. A lawyer may not allow, assist, or induce a nonlawyer to engage in conduct that the lawyer could not engage in directly. Rule 8.4(a). Thus, since a lawyer may not engage in in-person solicitation of a non-client, so a lawyer may not allow, induce, or assist a nonlawyer to engage in in-person solicitation of business for the lawyer. See N.Y. State 885 ¶ 12 (2011). In N.Y. State 885, we said:

> Non-attorneys are not subject to the New York Rules of Professional Conduct, but a lawyer cannot circumvent either the solicitation or the advertising rules through the indirect use of the nonlawyer's communications. See Rule 8.4(a) ("A lawyer or law firm shall not violate or attempt to violate the Rules of Professional Conduct, knowingly assist or induce another to do so, or do so through the acts of another . . ." (Emphasis added.) For example, if the lawyer had control over the non-attorney or control over the solicitation or advertising, the lawyer might be said to be accomplishing through indirect means what the lawyer could not accomplish directly. The level of control the attorney has depends on many factors, including the amount of business the attorney conducts with the non-attorney and any other connections between the two.

12. The inquirer argues that the arrangement with the recovery agent here is similar to that of an insurer, which engages law firms to represent policyholders. However, the relationship between insurance companies and the lawyers for their insureds has long been authorized by New York's ethics rules because the insurance company is liable under the insurance policy and the insured, under the insurance policy, has expressly authorized the insurer to hire counsel on the insured's behalf to defend covered claims. See N.Y. State 73 (1968) (the assured is the client of the retained attorney and the attorney is obligated to represent him with undivided fidelity regardless of the fact that his fee for legal services is being paid by the insurance company); N.Y. State 109 (a lawyer employed by an insurance company is not violating the spirit or the letter of the provisions of Canons 6 and 35 (pre-1970 predecessors to the Rules concerning conflicting interests and intermediaries); N.Y. State 716 (1999) (when a lawyer defends a policyholder in civil litigation, the client is the policyholder, not the insurance company, even though the insurance company has retained the lawyer pursuant to its contractual duty to defend the policyholder).

13. With respect to solicitation, the lawyer is authorized to accept a retainer from an insurance company under Rule 7.2(b), which authorizes a lawyer to be recommended, employed or paid by a bona fide organization that recommends, furnishes or pays for legal services to its members or beneficiaries, as long as certain specified conditions are satisfied. Two conditions are that (i) the lawyer must treat the member or beneficiary to whom the legal services are furnished, and not the organization, as the client, and (ii) the legal service plan must provide appropriate relief for any member or beneficiary who believes that representation by the counsel furnished by the organization would be unethical. Although the Comments to this Rule refer only to prepaid legal service plans and group legal plans, the rule by its terms applies to counsel furnished by insurance companies to its beneficiaries. See also Rule 1.8, Comment [11].

Aiding in the Unauthorized Practice of Law

14. Rule 5.5(b), which is closely related to Rule 5.8, provides that a lawyer may not aid a nonlawyer in the unauthorized practice of law. The Claims Recovery Firm here, like any business owned by a nonlawyer, is considered a "nonlawyer" with the meaning of Rule 5.5(b).

15. Whether particular conduct constitutes the unauthorized practice of law, which is a crime in New York, is a legal question. See Rule 5.5, Cmt. [2] (definition of "practice of law" is established by law); Judiciary Law §485-a (making certain violations of §§ 478, 474, 486 and 495 a class E felony); Judiciary Law § 495 (No corporation or voluntary association shall (i) practice or appear as an attorney-at-law for any person in any court in this state, (ii) hold itself out to the public as being entitled to practice law, or (iii) furnish attorneys or counsel); Judiciary Law § 478 (unlawful for any natural person (i) to practice or appear as an attorney-at-law in a court of record in this state, (ii) to furnish attorneys or to render legal services, or (iii) to hold himself out in such manner as to convey the impression that he or she either alone or together with any other persons maintains a law office); § 484 (no natural person shall ask or receive compensation for preparing pleadings of any kind in any action brought before any court of record in this state).

16. We do not interpret statutes, so we do not express opinions on what constitutes the unauthorized practice of law. This Committee limits itself to interpreting the Rules of Professional Conduct. When judging whether a lawyer is aiding someone in the unauthorized practice of law, we look at the lawyer's conduct, not the nonlawyer's conduct. Thus, we do not express any opinion on whether the Claims Recovery Firm's conduct would be unauthorized practice of law, either in the class action setting where the firm handles post-liability claims or in the antitrust setting, where the claims recovery firm proposes to identify potential antitrust claims, to engage counsel for the client, and perform other services. However, in our view the activities of the Claims Recovery Firm, particularly in identifying potential antitrust claims, raise serious questions about unauthorized practice of law, and the inquirer should consider them carefully. If the Claims Recovery Firm's activities would constitute the unauthorized practice of law, then there is a question of whether the lawyer's conduct would "aid" the unauthorized practice of law. We conclude that it would.

17. Opinions of this Committee on aiding the unauthorized practice of law have focused on the extent to which the lawyer facilitates the activities of the intermediary. Some opinions have approved the intermediary's role as long as certain conditions are met. In N.Y. State 705 (1998), for example, a nonlawyer tax reduction company's role was to represent property owners in legal proceedings for property tax relief, and to obtain the property owner's written authorization for the tax reduction company to engage counsel to represent the property owner if the first stage of proceedings did not produce a sufficient tax reduction. We held that a lawyer was not barred from accepting an engagement from the tax reduction company pursuant to the property owner's authorization as long as (i) the lawyer's client is the property owner, not the tax reduction company, (ii) the company does not impose conditions on the representation that would require compromising the lawyer's exercise of independent professional judgment on behalf of the property owner, (iii) the property owner, and not the company, makes decisions affecting the merits of the cause, such as whether to settle the action,[42] (iv) the lawyer, not the tax reduction company, makes those decisions that are for the lawyer's determination in the handling of a legal matter, and (v) the arrangement with the tax reduction company does not involve improper solicitation or fee-splitting. Similarly, in N.Y. State 885 (2011), we opined that a lawyer may accept referrals from a nonlawyer property tax reduction firm, but must be retained by the client, not by the tax reduction company. We expressed concern that Section 495(d) of the Judiciary Law (prohibiting the "furnishing" of attorneys or counsel) would prohibit a lawyer from being retained by the non-attorney to provide services to the property owner.

18. Other opinions analyzing the role of an intermediary between lawyers and clients have also warned that a lawyer might be aiding in unauthorized practice. See N.Y. State 976 (2013) (nonlawyer business would provide lien services, including a "forensic" analysis to determine whether clients had legal claims, in which case, they would be referred to the law firm; Committee warns that Company's activities are sufficiently near the borders of legal practice that law firm "should reflect on these matters"); N.Y. State 957 (2013) (nonprofit credit counseling agency proposed to offer legal services programs including filing for bankruptcy protection and advising seniors concerning whether they should join supplemental needs pooled income trusts; Committee warns that if agency is providing legal services, lawyer would be assisting it in the authorized practice of law); N.Y. City 2014-1 (2014) (to determine whether the nonlegal organization is engaged in the unauthorized practice of law, the lawyer would need to evaluate the types of services it provides to its clients in light of the relevant legal authorities that define what it means to engage in the practice of law; if the nonlegal organization is engaged in the unauthorized practice of law, the lawyer's involvement in the contemplated relationship would likely violate Rule 5.5(b)). See also In re Lefkowitz, 47 A.D.3d 326 (lst Dep't 2007) (attorney aided the unauthorized practice of law by representing immigration clients at hearings and interviews where (1) lawyer was paid by nonlawyer entity to represent clients; (2) nonlawyer entity prepared the immigration applications and had the "primary financial and substantial relationship with" the clients; and (3) the work done by the nonlawyer entity "involved some legal analysis").

19. In essence, our litmus test under Rule 5.5(b) is whether a lawyer provides substantial assistance to the nonlawyer engaging in unauthorized practice. See N.Y. State 809 (2007) ("aid" requires a purpose and intent to substantially assist or cause another to commit an act that constitutes the unauthorized practice of law, as opposed to doing something for one's own purposes that incidentally permits the other person to commit that act); N.Y. State 705 (1998) (law firm may be "aid[ing] a nonlawyer in the unauthorized practice of law" if its willingness to accept referrals from a tax reduction company on a regular basis may aid the company's business by giving it assurance that, if a grievance is denied, the company will be able to engage counsel to represent the property owner in 42 The Rules of Professional Conduct provide for independence in the lawyer's professional judgment and control of the lawyer's work by the client; third parties are not permitted to invade either role. Thus, it is for the client and lawyer alone to determine whether a claim should be brought and how; the lawyer may not permit third parties to affect the lawyer's professional judgment. "A lawyer shall not permit a person who recommends, employs or pays the lawyer to render legal service for another to regulate the lawyer's professional judgment in rendering such legal services or to cause the lawyer to compromise the lawyer's duty to maintain the confidential information of the client under Rule 1.6." Rule 5.4(c). The lawyer must abide the "client's decisions concerning the objectives of the representation," and "shall abide a client's decisions whether to settle a matter." Rule 1.2 (emphasis added). The lawyer is bound to inform the client of any "decision or circumstance with respect to which the client's informed consent as defined in Rule 1.0(j) is required by these Rules; any information required by court rule or other law to be communicated to a client; and material developments in the matter including settlement . . . ." Rule 1.4(a)(1) (emphasis added). The lawyer is required to "consult with the client about the means by which the client's objectives are to be accomplished and keep the client reasonably informed about the status of the matter." Rule 1.4(a)(2) and (3) (emphasis added).

Supreme Court proceedings, which may be integral to the company's ability to solicit clients or otherwise to do business).

20. If this were merely a "one-off" referral where the inquirer assumed complete control of the engagement upon receiving the referral, and if the lawyer had an attorney-client relationship only with the referred client, not the claims recovery firm, then there would not be a violation of Rule 5.5. However, if the Claims Recovery Firm's conduct constitutes the unauthorized practice of law, then the lawyer's proposed relationship with the Claims Recovery Firm here would violate Rule 5.5(b). It appears the Claims Recovery Firm's actions would not be possible here absent the active participation of a lawyer. More than merely making the referral, the nonlawyer would provide significant services in connection with handling the legal matter. The lawyer's proposed conduct here would thus cross the line into aiding the Claim Recovery Firm's conduct in violation of Rule 5.5(b).

Fee Splitting with a Nonlawyer

21. Our third concern is potential fee-splitting with a nonlawyer. With three exceptions not applicable here, Rule 5.4(a) states that a "lawyer or law firm shall not share legal fees with a nonlawyer." Our prior opinions regarding fee sharing in situations resembling the one here reach varying results.

22. In N.Y. State 705 (1998), we concluded that a lawyer "may enter into an agreement to represent the property owner for a fee that is paid by the [nonlawyer] agency from funds obtained from the client if the lawyer' fee is allocable to the lawyer's services." We said it followed that "if the lawyer may receive a fee contingent on the amount by which taxes are reduced, the lawyer may receive a fee that is a percentage of the tax reduction company's fee, where that fee is itself a percentage of the amount by which taxes are reduced."

23. In N.Y. State 698 (1998), in contrast, we said that an attorney may not accept a referral of a medical malpractice case from a medical consultant if the consultant required the attorney to agree to a contingent consultant's fee in addition to the attorney's fee (i.e., required the attorney to hire the medical consultant) as a precondition to the referral. The consultant proposed to assist in evaluating and preparing the case, and would charge more than the lawyer's regular consultant, who charged on an hourly basis. We held that this "package deal" violated the rules requiring the lawyer's independence in matters of professional judgment and was a payment for referral. We also stressed the importance of informing the client about the fee arrangement with the medical consultant and the availability of lower-cost alternatives. We cautioned that the lawyer might be obligated to reduce his own fee to avoid charging an excessive fee or unreasonable expenses to the client (which was subject to a statutory limit on medical malpractice fees).

24. A "package deal" may or may not result in charging an excessive fee, but the lawyer cannot reduce the lawyer's normal fee if doing so would be equivalent to paying for a referral. In N.Y. State 885, we opined that an attorney may not reduce the fees the lawyer would ordinarily be paid as part of an arrangement to accept referrals from a nonlawyer who would perform some services if the funds to be received by the nonlawyer significantly exceeded the value of the services actually performed. In essence, the nonlawyer's compensation was an improper fee for the referral, which was prohibited by Rule 7.2(b). Just as a lawyer could not collect a full fee and share part of it with the nonlawyer, so the lawyer could not reduce the fee to free up funds for the client to pay the nonlawyer unless the nonlaw-yer was performing services worth the amount of the reduced fee. See N.Y. State 705 (1998), citing Kenneth L. Gartner, "Acceptance of Referrals from Non-Attorney Firms," 217 N.Y.L.J. 1, 4 (Mar. 25, 1997) (ethics rules do not permit lawyers to accept referrals from nonlawyers who are "signing up clients and passing them on to lawyers, with a fee skimmed off the top").

25. If the Claims Recovery Firm provides substantial assistance in the proceedings and the compensation of the Claims Recovery Firm is commensurate with the services it provides, then the lawyer would not be sharing legal fees with a nonlawyer in violation of Rule 5.4(a) even if the lawyer reduces his fee by the amount of the Claims Recovery Firm's compensation. Likewise, if the Claims Recovery Firm's compensation does not exceed the reasonable value of its services, then the lawyer would not be paying a prohibited referral fee and thus would not be violating Rule 7.2(b). Of course, regardless of the nonlawyer's compensation, the fee for the lawyer's services, whether calculated based on an hourly fee, a contingent fee, or some other formula, and expenses must not be excessive when analyzed using the criteria set forth in Rule 1.5(a). If the client will be compensating the Claims Recovery Firm for services that the lawyer would ordinarily be expected to perform, and if the lawyer is charging a contingent or other non-hourly fee, then the lawyer may have to reduce his fee to avoid an excessive fee. See N.Y. State 885 ("This is especially so where some of the consultant's services may involve work that 'the lawyer himself is professionally obligated to do at no extra cost to the client'"). A lawyer cannot simultaneously charge a full contingent or flat fee and slough off work to a nonlawyer who is also charging for those services.

CONCLUSION:

26. A lawyer may not join with a claims recovery firm in an agreement to offer legal services to the public to be performed by the lawyer and by the claims recovery firm if it is to be done on a systematic and continuing basis, because claims recovery firms are not on the Appellate Division list of approved nonlegal professionals within the meaning of Rule 5.8. Even if the relationship is a "non-exclusive reciprocal referral agreement" within the meaning of Rule 5.8(c), the lawyer must ensure that the relationship does not interfere with the lawyer's independent professional judgment, does not involve improper solicitation of clients, does not involve aiding in the unauthorized practice of law, and does not involve the improper sharing of legal fees. The lawyer may share in a contingent fee paid by the client to the lawyer and nonlawyer but only if (i) the nonlawyer provides substantial assistance in the proceedings (i.e. does not merely sign up clients and pass them on to the lawyer), (ii) the nonlawyer's compensation is commensurate with the nonlawyer's services, and (iii) the lawyer's fee is also commensurate with the lawyer's services (i.e. is not reduced so that the reduction is in effect a referral fee to the nonlawyer).

OPINION 1069 (08/19/2015)

TOPIC: Conflict of interest; simultaneous representation.

DIGEST: Despite the potential for conflict, a lawyer who represents an immigrant child in federal administrative removal proceedings may simultaneously represent the proposed guardian in a state family court proceeding provided that the lawyer reasonably believes he can competently and diligently represent both clients simultaneously, and the lawyer obtains informed consent from each client, confirmed in writing. The lawyer may accept the consent of the child if the lawyer believes (i) the child has the capacity to understand the conflict and to make a reasoned decision to consent, and (ii) the consent is voluntary. While there is no particular age when a child may be said to have such capacity, verbal children aged 12 and older will generally be capable of making such reasoned decisions after the lawyer makes full disclosure of the material risks and reasonably available alternatives.

RULES: 1.0(e), (f) & (j), 1.7(a) & (b), 1.14, 4.2, 4.3

MODIFIES: N.Y. State 274 (1972), N.Y. State 256 (1972)

FACTS:

1. A lawyer represents an immigrant child (the "child") in administrative removal proceedings before a federal Immigration Judge in New York. The object of this representation is to prevent the child from being deported to the child's country of origin.

2. To prevent the child's deportation, the lawyer is assisting the child in pursuing a form of relief from removal known as Special Immigrant Juvenile Status ("SIJS"), defined under 8 U.S.C. § 1101(a)(27)(J)(i)-(iii)(2009).[43] The statute provides that an immigrant who is present in the United States and is under the age of 21 and unmarried can achieve lawful permanent residency by fulfilling the following requirements:

- the immigrant has been declared dependent on a juvenile court located in the United States;
- administrative or judicial proceedings have determined that
  - reunification with one or both of the immigrant's parents is not viable due to abuse, neglect, abandonment, or a similar basis found under State law; and
  - it would not be in the immigrant's best interest to be returned to the immigrant's or parent's previous country of nationality or country of last habitual residence.

3. In New York, the most common way to have a child declared "dependent on a juvenile court" and to seek an administrative or judicial determination on the SIJS requirements of "reunification" and "immigrant's best interest" is to file a petition pursuant to Article 6 of the New York Family Court

43 Avoiding deportation is not the only reason for applying for SIJS status. Without legal immigration status, the immigrant-minor cannot receive working papers, and is ineligible for college financial aid and other government benefits.

Act proposing the appointment of a guardian. The proposed guardian may be a relative, family friend, or anyone who is willing to care for the child and look out for the child's best interests until the child has reached the age of twenty-one. The proposed guardian often is already the caretaker for the child, but needs a court order to have complete control over the care and best interests of the child. See In Re Diaz v. Munoz, 118 A.D.3d 989, 990-991, 989 N.Y.S.2d 52, 54 (2d Dep't 2014).

4. When a proposed guardian retains a lawyer, the lawyer assists the proposed guardian by advising in the preparation of the Family Court petition, filing the petition and other required documentation with the Family Court, and representing the proposed guardian during the Family Court proceedings. The Family Court proceedings often require testimony from both the proposed guardian and the child. The testimony typically revolves around whether the proposed guardian is suitable to be appointed as the guardian.

5. During the guardianship proceedings, the proposed guardian is potentially adverse to the child's parent(s). The proposed guardian is seeking to gain control over decision-making for the child, while the child's parents will be giving up their parental rights. In these proceedings the child is called the "subject child," and is not considered an adverse party. However, the child's interests may be inconsistent with those of the parents or the proposed guardian, or both. To protect the interests of the child, the Court will sometimes appoint an attorney for the child.

6. After the Family Court decides whether to appoint the proposed guardian, the guardian (if the guardian has been approved) or the appointed lawyer for the child (whether or not the guardian has been approved) may make a motion to the Family Court to request a determination called "Special Findings" regarding the child's eligibility for SIJS. If the Family Court determines that the child meets the statutory requirements, the court will issue an Order of Special Findings.

7. After the Family Court proceedings have concluded, the lawyer representing the child before the federal Immigration Judge then takes the final Order of Guardianship and Order of Special Findings from the Family Court and files Form I-360 (Petition for Special Immigrant) with U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services ("USCIS"), a branch of the Department of Homeland Security. If the application is approved by USCIS, the child will receive lawful permanent residency in the United States and the administrative removal proceedings will be terminated.

QUESTION:

8. May a lawyer who represents a child in an administrative removal proceeding in federal Immigration Court act as the lawyer for a proposed guardian of the child in an Article 6 guardianship proceeding in New York Family Court?

OPINION:

9. The focus of the question is whether representing both the proposed guardian in Family Court and the child in Immigration Court would create an impermissible conflict of interest. Conflicts of interest with current clients are governed by Rule 1.7, which provides:

> (a) Except as provided in paragraph (b), a lawyer shall not represent a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that either:

(1) the representation will involve the lawyer in representing differing interests; or

(2) there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests.

(b) Notwithstanding the existence of a concurrent conflict of interest under paragraph (a), a lawyer may represent a client if:

(1) the lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client;

(2) the representation is not prohibited by law;

(3) the representation does not involve the assertion of a claim by one client against another client represented by the lawyer in the same litigation or other proceeding before a tribunal; and

(4) each affected client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing.

10. The issues raised under this inquiry are therefore (1) whether representing the child in one proceeding and the prospective guardian in another would involve the lawyer in representing "differing interests" and, if so, (2) whether the lawyer "reasonably believes" the lawyer can "provide competent and diligent representation" to each client (the child and the proposed guardian), and, if so, (3) whether it is possible to obtain informed consent from the child, who is a minor.

Would the Lawyer be Representing "Differing Interests"?

11. Under the definition of "differing interests" in Rule 1.0(f), "differing interests" include "every interest that will adversely affect either the judgment or the loyalty of a lawyer to a client, whether it be a conflicting, inconsistent, diverse or other interest." Differing interests can arise even if the lawyer does not represent the guardian and the child in the same proceeding.

12. Differing interests may arise in many ways. For example, if the child does not want a guardian appointed, or if the child wants someone other than the proposed guardian to be appointed, then differing interests exist between the child and the proposed guardian, and the lawyer has a conflict of interest under Rule 1.7(a)(1).

13. In many guardianship proceedings, however, we understand that the child and the proposed guardian will share a common goal – the child wishes to have the proposed guardian appointed by the court in order to help defend the immigration proceeding[44] and the proposed guardian desires to be the legally appointed guardian for the child. However, despite the common goal, the child and the proposed guardian may have differing interests that would adversely affect the lawyer's professional judgment.

44 The lawyer must determine that this is truly the child's wish. The lawyer may not substitute his or her judgment for that of the child. See N.Y.S.B.A. Standards, infra, ¶ 26.

14. For example, one potential source of conflict is that the Family Court may require an investigation of the guardian, including the guardian's relationship with the child, the guardian's criminal history, and any allegations of abuse. It is in the child's best interest for this investigation to be thorough, whereas the proposed guardian my want to limit the investigation. Another potential source of conflict is that, as counsel to the guardian, the lawyer needs to advise the guardian of the legal responsibilities that accompany guardianship (e.g. potential responsibility for the costs of the child's health care, or potential liability for damages if the child vandalizes the property of others). The child may want the lawyer to downplay the risks so that the proposed guardian does not become frightened and back out, whereas the proposed guardian presumably wants to understand all of the risks in light of his or her own personal and financial circumstances.

15. In some cases, a reasonable lawyer may conclude that differing interests do not exist (for example, if the proposed guardian has been caring for the child for a long time, and both the child and the proposed guardian want to formalize the existing relationship by obtaining a court appointment for the guardian). Even when the interests of the guardian and the child appear to be consistent, circumstances may change. The family court proceeding currently appears to be one undertaken to advance the child's interests in the federal immigration proceeding. However, this proceeding involves factors upon which the child may have strong and changeable opinions – in particular, allegations of abuse, neglect, abandonment, or similar conduct, against one or both of the child's parents. The possibility of a desired change of course in the future by a child cannot be dismissed out of hand. The lawyer thus must be sensitive to changes that might create differing interests. Such potential changes will be addressed if the family court appoints separate counsel for the child in the family court proceeding.

16. In N.Y. State 836 (2010), we addressed whether a single lawyer could represent both an incapacitated person and his guardian in a proceeding to terminate the guardianship. The attorney had previously represented the incapacitated person (then an "alleged incapacitated person") in connection with the appointment of a guardian. At the time of the inquiry, the parties' interests seemed to be aligned, since both parties said they believed that the guardianship should be terminated. However, we expressed a concern that the guardian might be seeking to escape the responsibilities of the guardianship because he wished to move across the country, even though the incapacitated person would be better served by continuing the guardianship. Consequently, we determined that, in order to undertake the joint representation, the lawyer had to meet the conditions of Rule 1.7(b). We opined that the lawyer could reasonably conclude that he could provide competent and diligent representation to both parties, and that the lawyer could therefore undertake the dual representation, as long as he obtained informed consent from each client, confirmed in writing. Finally, in N.Y. State 836, we warned that obtaining informed consent would require the lawyer to fully inform each party of the possible risks of the dual representation.

17. We reach the same conclusion in this opinion that we did in N.Y. State 836, i.e. in many cases representing the immigrant-child and the prospective guardian will involve representing potentially differing interests, and the lawyer must consider whether he or she can adequately represent both and obtain informed consent.

18. If the inquirer here believes he can adequately represent both the prospective guardian in the family court proceeding and the child in the immigration proceeding, then, in order to undertake the joint representation, the lawyer must comply with the conditions of Rule 1.7(b), including obtaining the consent of both clients, confirmed in writing.

19. We note that some courts and advocacy groups believe that the lawyer should not represent both the guardian and the child in the same proceeding. See Special Immigrant Juvenile Status, A Step-By-Step Guide for Safe Passage Project Volunteer Attorneys (Updated November 23, 2014) ("Safe Passage Project Guide")[45] (taking the position that the same attorney cannot represent both the prospective guardian and the child in the state court guardianship proceeding);[46] Westchester County Family Court, "Frequently Asked Questions" regarding SIJS-related guardianship applications, available on the website of the Office of Court Administration (Court views representation of both the child and the guardian as a conflict of interest. Lawyer for child may assist the guardian in preparing the petition for guardianship, but cannot represent both child and guardian in the guardianship proceeding.[47]). While these groups and courts may believe that it is best practice for the lawyer not to represent both the child and the guardian, and while the conditions in Rule 1.7 may be difficult to meet, the only per se conflict of interest in Rule 1.7 is that in subparagraph (b)(3), which prohibits a lawyer from representing a client who has a claim against another client the lawyer represents in the same proceeding before a tribunal. Representing the child and the guardian does not fall under that per se prohibition; thus the simultaneous representation of the child and the guardian is non-consentable only if it falls under subparagraph (b)(1). This opinion applies in those situations where the lawyer can meet the conditions in Rule 1.7(b)(1), and sets forth additional requirements that apply because the child is a client with "diminished capacity" In our view, if the child has a separate lawyer for the guardianship proceeding, then the impact of any differing interests will be diminished, and a reasonable lawyer could conclude that the lawyer can provide competent and diligent representation to the proposed guardian in the Family Court and to the immigrant-child in the Immigration Court. However, if such representation violated any court rules, it might violate Rule 8.4(d) (lawyer shall not engage in conduct that is prejudicial to the administration of justice).

45 The Safe Passage Project is a 26 U.S.C. § 501(c)(3) not-for-profit corporation housed within New York Law School, which trains pro bono attorneys to represent children in need of immigration assistance. Safe Passage Project Guide, p. 5.

46 The Safe Passage Project Guide states recommends only representing the child, and helping the guardian to fill out certain forms: "It is important to understand is [sic] that you, as an attorney, do not represent the proposed guardian in this proceeding. However, you should talk to the proposed guardian about the process, assist him or her in filling out the paperwork, and discuss what to expect when filing the petition and appearing in Family Court. Nonetheless, the proposed guardian is not your client. If you would like to represent the proposed guardian in the family court proceedings you can choose to do so but you will not be able to represent the youth in the family court. An attorney will be appointed for the youth. But note that you may find your communication and access to the youth is now severely restricted because you will have to communicate through the attorney for the child. We recommend that you remain solely counsel for the youth." Safe Passage Project Guide at p. 19. We note, without opining on the applicability here, that Rule 4.3 prohibits a lawyer from giving legal advice to an unrepresented person other than the advice to secure counsel if the lawyer knows or reasonably should know that the interests of such person are or have a reasonable possibility of being in conflict with the interests of the client.

47 The questions include whether the lawyer may represent the child and prepare the petition on behalf of the proposed guardian. This apparently refers to dual representation in the guardianship proceeding and not to simultaneous representation of the child in the immigration proceeding and the guardian in the family court proceeding. The court answers that it views representation of both the child and the guardian as a conflict of interest: "Although it may be a practice or service of your organization to assist the guardian in preparing the petition for guardianship, you cannot represent both parties. You must make it clear to the Court who you are representing. Therefore, the Court will always assign an attorney for the subject child from the attorneys for children panel. If you choose to act as co-counsel with such attorney, an attorney for the proposed guardian will be assigned."

May a Minor Consent to a Conflict of Interest?

20. Some of our older opinions concluded that a minor cannot consent to dual representation. See N.Y. State 274 (1972) (consent cannot be obtained where one of the parties is an infant); N.Y. State 256 (1972) (an infant cannot consent to dual representation, so if a conflict of interest exists, then dual representation would violate DR 5-101(A)). The opinions do not explain why a minor cannot give consent. Presumably, the principle stems from an assumption that a child does not have the ability to make reasoned decisions. We do not give opinions on matters of law, but we understand that consent by a minor may be voidable at the request of the minor. This is no different from other advance consents to conflicts under the Rules. See Rule 1.7, Cmt. [21] (client who has consented to a conflict may revoke the consent and terminate the lawyer's representation at any time).

21. Nevertheless, when the Rules were adopted in 2009, they included, for the first time, special provisions on clients with "diminished capacity," including as a result of minority. See Rule 1.14. Rule 1.14 does not assume that a child cannot consent to conflicts. See, e.g. Cmt. [1] ("When the client is a minor . . . maintaining the conventional client-lawyer relationship may not be possible in all respects. In particular, a severely incapacitated person may have no power to make legally binding decisions. Nevertheless, a client with diminished capacity often has the ability to understand, deliberate upon and reach conclusions about matters affecting the client's own well-being."); Comment [4] ("whether the lawyer should look to the parents as natural guardians may depend on the type of proceeding or matter in which the lawyer is representing the minor.")

22. In N.Y. State 836 ¶¶ 11-12 (2010), we concluded that the lawyer could obtain consent from the incapacitated person to a dual representation if such person could make a reasoned decision to consent. We said:

> When obtaining informed consent from Client, Lawyer must take special care because Client is presently deemed to be incapacitated and under guardianship. However, three sources – Rule 1.14 [of] our Rules of Professional Conduct, our prior opinion in N.Y. State 746, and New York's Mental Hygiene Law – all support the conclusion that Client may consent to this dual representation despite Client's present legal designation of incapacity. Of course, Lawyer must carefully assess Client's capacity to understand the conflict and to make a reasoned decision whether to consent to the representation despite the conflict. This careful assessment is necessary because if Client's capacity to make reasoned decisions is so diminished that she cannot give informed consent to the dual representation, then Lawyer cannot satisfy the informed consent requirement of Rule 1.7(b)(4). If a lawyer cannot satisfy the informed consent requirement of Rule 1.7(b)(4), then the lawyer cannot undertake the dual representation.

[Footnotes and paragraph numbers omitted.]

23. Similarly, in N.Y. State 1059 (2015), where we were considering whether a lawyer may disclose certain confidential information of an unaccompanied child, we held that a minor can consent to disclosure of confidential information if the minor is capable of understanding the risks of disclosure and of making a reasoned judgment. Nevertheless, we warned that it may not be possible for all children to give consent:

> First, very young children will be incapable of giving consent. There is no particular age when children can be said to have capacity to give consent. The New York City Bar ethics committee observed in an opinion dealing with "verbal minors ages twelve or older who affirmatively seek a lawyer's assistance" that such clients "generally will be capable of making considered judgments concerning the representation." N.Y. City 1997-2 (citing, inter alia, Standard for Attorneys and Guardians Ad Litem in Custody or Visitation Proceedings § 2.2 (Am. Academy of Matrimonial Lawyers 1995) for the proposition that there is "a rebuttable presumption that children above the age of twelve are competent"). But the children that are the inquirers' clients may be less capable of making considered judgments than the clients in N.Y. City 1997-2, given that the unaccompanied children who are the inquirers clients are likely to be unfamiliar with American society, or may be more capable of making considered judgments, given their experiences in their home countries and during their unaccompanied trip to the United States.

24. We stressed in that opinion that the lawyer must make full disclosure of information adequate for the child to make an informed decision, and must adequately explain the material risks of the proposed course of conduct and reasonably available alternatives. We also advised that the extent of the information needed and risks to be addressed would vary both with the nature of the information being disclosed and the sophistication of the child. Finally, we warned that the client's consent must be voluntary. As this Committee observed in N.Y. State 490 (1978), lawyers providing services to indigent clients "should be particularly sensitive to any element of submissiveness on the part of their indigent clients," and such requests should be made only under circumstances where the lawyer is satisfied that the client could refuse to consent without any sense of guilt or embarrassment.

25. We are aware of a number of opinions of New York courts holding that a child may not consent to dual representations. See, e.g. Key v. Arrow Limo Inc., 2014 W.L. 3583893 (Sup. Ct., Kings Co. 2014); Christie v. Kramer, 2012 WL 5898054 (Sup. Ct., Kings Co. 2012). However, these cases involve whether a lawyer may represent both a parent-driver and a child involved in an automobile accident, under circumstances where the lawyer will have to sue the parent on behalf of the child (to benefit from the parent's auto insurance policy) or waive the right to sue the parent. In such cases, the courts have found that the differing interests of the parent and child are so severe that the conflict of interest is non-consentable. We do not believe such is the case here.

26. Even before the adoption of Rule 1.14, the courts recognized the ability of children to make decisions affecting their own interests. In 2007 the Chief Judge of New York made it clear that unless a child is incapable of expressing a preference or clearly and unequivocally lacks the capacity to perceive and comprehend the consequences of his or her decisions, or the child's articulated position would place the child at imminent risk of serious harm, the attorney must not "substitute judgment" in determining and advocating the child's position, even if the attorney believes that what the child wants is not in the child's best interests. Rules of the Chief Judge, § 7.2. See NYSBA Standards for Attorneys Representing Children in New York Child Protective, Foster Care, Destitute Child and Termination of Parental Rights Proceedings (2014) at p. 46:

> The attorney may not use substituted judgment merely because the attorney believes that another course of action would be "better" for the child. Thus, each child should > be assessed individually to determine if he or she has the capacity to make decisions that bind the attorney with respect to fundamental issues such as whether the child wishes to be adopted.

27. The same analysis applies here. The lawyer must assess whether the child has the capacity to make a reasoned decision regarding the potential conflict. Comment [6] to Rule 1.14 advises that the lawyer should consider and balance such factors as (i) the client's ability to articulate reasoning leading to a decision, variability of state of mind and ability to appreciate consequences of a decision; and (ii) the consistence of a decision with known long-term commitments and values of the client. With a child, the age of the child will also be a factor. If the lawyer concludes that the immigrant-child is capable of making a reasoned decision, the lawyer must provide the child with information and explanations suitable to the child's level of understanding.

CONCLUSION:

28. A lawyer who represents an immigrant child in a federal administrative removal proceeding may simultaneously represent a proposed guardian in a state Family Court proceeding provided the lawyer reasonably believes he can competently and diligently represent both clients, and obtains informed consent from each client, confirmed in writing. The lawyer may accept the consent of the child if the lawyer believes (i) the child has the capacity to understand the conflict and to make a reasoned decision to consent, and (ii) the consent is voluntary. While there is no particular age when a child may be said to have such capacity, verbal children aged 12 and older will generally be capable of making such reasoned decisions after the lawyer makes full disclosure of the material risks and reasonably available alternatives.

OPINION 1070 (10/09/2015)

TOPIC: Confidentiality; joint clients; client's file

DIGEST: In a joint representation, there is a presumption that the lawyer will share material information disclosed by one co-client in the matter with the other co-clients. But there are exceptions to this presumption, including where disclosure would violate an obligation to a third party or where the lawyer has promised confidentiality with respect to a disclosure. Normally, a client is entitled to full access to the attorney's file on the matter, with narrow exceptions. However, if the co-client requesting the file asks the lawyer not to disclose the request to the co-clients, and the lawyer believes the request for the file is material to the other co-clients, then the lawyer may not comply and should counsel the requesting client that the lawyer may not honor the request for the file unless the requester authorizes disclosure to the co-clients. Keeping the request confidential is inconsistent with the expectation of joint clients that the lawyer will keep all of them informed of material developments in the case and with the lawyer's duty of loyalty to the other joint clients.

RULES: 1.4, 1.7(a) & (b), 1.15(c)(4)

FACTS:

1. Lawyer A represents four defendants in a litigated contract matter involving real property. One of the joint clients has requested, in writing, that Lawyer A provide to Lawyer B (who is advising the requestor) copies of the client file, including billing statements and records of payments. The written request directed Lawyer A to keep the request in confidence and not to disclose the request to the other joint clients in the matter. There is no express agreement, in the retainer agreement or otherwise, addressing the confidentiality of communications from any joint client vis-à-vis the others.

QUESTIONS:

2. Is a client who is one of several joint clients in a matter entitled to copies of the client file upon request?

3. May lawyer A provide the requested file to the requesting client without advising the other joint clients?

OPINION:

4. The New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") specifically contemplate that a lawyer may represent multiple clients in the same matter, as long as the representation will not involve the lawyer in representing differing interests (unless each client consents to the conflict under Rule 1.7(b)). The potential benefits of multiple representation include reduced legal fees, avoidance of future conflicts, and, in litigation, the opportunity to present a united front.

Confidentiality Among Joint Clients

5. There is a presumption that information disclosed by one co-client in a joint representation matter will be shared by the lawyer with all other clients represented jointly. See Rule 1.7, Cmt. [31]:

> [31] . . . [T]he lawyer has an equal duty of loyalty to each client, and each client has the right to be informed of anything bearing on the representation that might affect that client's interests and the right to expect that the lawyer will use that information to that client's benefit. See Rule 1.4. At the outset of the common representation and as part of the process of obtaining each client's informed consent, the lawyer should advise each client that information will be shared and that the lawyer will have to withdraw if one client decides that some matter material to the representation should be kept from the other. In limited circumstances, it may be appropriate for the lawyer to proceed with the representation when the clients have agreed, after being properly informed, that the lawyer will keep certain information confidential even as among the commonly represented clients.

See also N.Y. State 761 (2003) (stating that the attorney for co-clients must share all material information relating to the representation with the co-clients, unless the co-clients have consented to an alternative arrangement); N.Y. State 778 (2004) (concluding that, in seeking consent to a joint representation, the lawyer should explain the lawyer's obligation, absent each client's agreement to other arrangements, to disclose to one client any confidences and secrets communicated to the lawyer by the other client); Restatement Third, The Law Governing Lawyers §60 cmt. l (sharing of information among co-clients with respect to the matter involved in the representation is normal and typically expected), §75 cmt. d (2000) (presumed intent that there should be no confidentiality between co-clients but co-clients may agree otherwise).

6. The presumption that confidences will be shared among co-clients in a matter is subject to exceptions. For example, in N.Y. State 555 (1984), we noted that disclosure to all joint clients was part of the duty of the lawyer, as a fiduciary, to impart to the client information that the lawyer possesses that is relevant to the affairs as to which the lawyer is employed and that might reasonably affect the client's conduct with respect to such affairs. We warned, however, that there was a recognized exception to this duty of disclosure where disclosure would violate a duty to a third person, citing the Restatement (Second) of Agency § 381 (1957). We found that exception applicable where disclosure would violate a duty undertaken to another client in the same representation. In that case, the lawyer jointly represented two clients, A and B, in connection with partnership affairs. B, in a conversation with the lawyer, advised the lawyer that B was breaching the partnership agreement, but preceded this disclosure with the statement that he proposed to tell the lawyer something "in confidence." The lawyer did not warn B that the lawyer could not receive information from B in confidence. We therefore found that the lawyer had a duty of confidence with respect to the disclosed information.[48] See also N.Y. State 761 (2003) (discussing lawyer's obligation when lawyer receives from one co-client "relevant information that the lawyer is unable to share").

7. In this case, the inquirer apparently did not warn the clients either orally or in the retainer agreement or in a separate consent to joint representation that all confidences would be shared. Since the request for confidentiality of the request for the file was made in writing, the lawyer had no opportunity to prevent the client from giving the information. Consequently, we believe the lawyer is obligated to maintain the confidentiality of the request, unless the communicating client agrees otherwise.

48 N.Y. State 555 also found an exception where disclosure to a co-client "would obviously be detrimental to the communicating client." In N.Y. State 778 n.4 (2004), however, we expressly overruled N.Y. State 555 on that point.

The Client's File

8. Rule 1.15(c)(4) provides that "a lawyer shall . . . promptly . . . deliver to the client . . . the funds, securities or other properties in the possession of the lawyer that the client . . . is entitled to receive." (Emphasis added.) Regarding the property to which the client is entitled, N.Y. State 766 (2010) noted that this is a question of law, but pointed out that, in Sage Realty Corp. v. Proskauer Rose Goetz & Mendelson, 91 N.Y. 30, 34 (1997), the Court of Appeals held that, upon termination of an attorney-client relationship, a client is "presumptively accord[ed] . . . full access to the entire attorney's file on a represented matter with narrow exceptions." See also N.Y. State 970 (2013) (right of executrix of the estate of a deceased client to the client's files). The cost of copying the file is to be borne by the client. Sage Realty, 91 N.Y.2d at 38. The exceptions to entitlement to particular documents in the file are a question of law about which we do not opine.

9. Although N.Y. State 766 was based upon a request from a former client and N.Y. State 970 was based upon a request from a representative of a deceased client, the reasoning is equally applicable to a request from a current client.

10. Under Sage Realty, however, an exception to the general rule of full access to the file arises when the attorney can make "a substantial showing . . . of good cause to refuse." Sage Realty, 91 N.Y.2d at 37. For example, the attorney "should not be required to disclose documents which might violate a duty of nondisclosure owed to a third party, or otherwise imposed by law," or "firm documents intended for internal law office review and use." Id. See also ABA 471 (2015)(although a client normally is not entitled to papers and property that the lawyer generated for the lawyer's own purpose in working on the client's matter, when the lawyer's representation of the client in a matter is terminated before the matter is completed, protection of the former client's interest may require that certain materials the lawyer generated for the lawyer's own purpose be provided to the client).

11. Here, one joint client has requested that Lawyer A deliver the client file to Lawyer B, and that the request not be disclosed to the Lawyer A's other joint clients.

12. We concluded in the preceding section that, where the lawyer accepted information from one co-client on the condition of non-disclosure to other co-clients, the lawyer must honor that condition. However, if the requesting client asked the lawyer not to disclose the request that a copy of the file be sent to another lawyer, and the lawyer in good faith believes that the request for the file is information that would be material to the remaining co-clients (so that not disclosing the request to them would entail a breach of loyalty to those clients), then the requesting client is no longer entitled to a copy of the file. Complying with the request would entail a breach of a duty to the other joint clients to keep them informed of material developments. Rule 1.15(c)(4) applies only to property to which the client is entitled and the communicating client is not entitled to cause a breach by the lawyer of duties to the other co-clients. Thus, we conclude that the inquirer would not be obligated to comply with the request for the file if the request were conditioned on the lawyer's not disclosing the request to the other clients.

13. Consequently, the inquirer should inform the requesting client that, if he or she does not withdraw the request for confidentiality, the lawyer will not be able to provide a copy of the file, but that, if the client authorizes the lawyer to disclose the requesting client's request for the file to the co-clients, the lawyer will provide the file to the requester.

CONCLUSION:

14. In a joint representation, there is a presumption that the lawyer will share material information disclosed by one co-client in the matter with the other co-clients. But there are exceptions to this presumption, including where disclosure would violate an obligation to a third party or where the lawyer has promised confidentiality with respect to a disclosure. Normally, a client is entitled to full access to the client file, with narrow exceptions. However, if the co-client requesting the file asks the lawyer not to disclose the request to the co-clients, and the lawyer believes the request for the file is material to the other co-clients, then the lawyer may not comply and should counsel the requesting client that the lawyer may not honor the request unless the lawyer is permitted to disclose it to the co-clients. Keeping the request confidential is inconsistent with the expectation of joint clients that the lawyer will keep all of them informed of material developments in the case and with the lawyer's duty of loyalty to the other joint clients.

OPINION 1071 (10/09/2015)

TOPIC: Partisan political activities by municipal attorney charged with investigating police misconduct

DIGEST: A municipal attorney may not engage in partisan political activity while employed by an agency that is charged by law to investigate police misconduct, is given the power to compel attendance of witnesses and the production of documents, and is authorized to refer misconduct to the Police Department for administrative prosecution or referral to criminal prosecutors.

RULES: Rule 8.4(d)

FACTS:

1. A municipal charter establishes a Civilian Complaint Review Board, or "CCRB," to investigate complaints against specific types of police misconduct, including the use of excessive or unnecessary force or the abuse of authority. The charter mandates that the mayor appoint members of the public to the CCRB, of which the municipal legislature designates a certain number, and the police department a certain number, with the mayor designating the rest, such that the CCRB majority consists of mayoral or legislative designees. A member of the CCRB need not be a lawyer, but may hold no other public office. Only the police department designees may have a law enforcement background, a restriction that does not apply to the CCRB's staff.

2. The municipal charter requires the police department to cooperate with the CCRB's investigations. The municipal charter and the rules of the CCRB allow the CCRB to investigate complaints against police officers, including the right to review all pertinent documents, to interview witnesses, including the subject(s) of the investigation, and to compel, through compulsory process, the appearance of witnesses and the production of documents. Upon conclusion of its investigation, a panel of the CCRB issues findings and recommendations based on a "preponderance of the evidence" standard. The CCRB's rules provide that the findings may range from "Substantiated," which means that the alleged acts did occur and did constitute misconduct, to other categories such as "Unsubstantiated," "Exonerated," "Unfounded," "Complaint Withdrawn," and the like. A finding that a complaint is "Substantiated" is accompanied by the CCRB's recommendation on disciplinary action, including any interim actions such as suspension or reassignment pending further proceedings.

3. The CCRB has no power to impose a sanction on a police officer; only the mayor- appointed head of the Police Department may do so. The CCRB also has no power to refer misconduct to prosecutorial authorities; again, only the Police Department may do so. When examining a police officer who is the subject of an investigation, the CCRB rules require that the CCRB investigator must notify the subject of his or her constitutional rights, including the right not to testify (which the CCRB must report to the Police Department), and, if the officer chooses to testify, that his or her statements cannot be used in any subsequent criminal proceeding. If during the course of its investigation the CCRB uncovers misconduct outside the scope of the CCRB's jurisdiction (for example, an alleged false statement under oath), then the CCRB may not investigate that misconduct but instead must report the misconduct to the Police Department.

4. By reason of a Memorandum of Understanding ("MOU") between the CCRB and the Police Department, the CCRB administratively prosecutes any "Substantiated" complaint before a Police Department tribunal unless the head of the Police Department determines that such prosecution would be "detrimental" to the Department's disciplinary process. The MOU limits the Department head in making such a determination to those instances in which there are parallel or related criminal investigations or when he or she decides that the "interests of justice" require no further action in light of the absence of any prior disciplinary history on the part of the police officer.

5. CCRB attorneys, who must be trained in the "policies and procedures" of the Police Department's disciplinary standards, prepare the "Charges and Specifications" against the subject officer, and present the evidence in support of a Substantiated complaint at an administrative hearing. The CCRB is required to provide status reports to the Department concerning the prosecution, including any plea bargains, which the CCRB is permitted to negotiate subject to approval of the Department. The tribunal, conducted by a Department hearing officer, may or may not issue a report. Whether or not the hearing officer does so, the CCRB may provide the Police Department with its own report and recommendation.

QUESTION:

6. May an attorney employee of the CCRB engage in partisan political activities?

OPINION:

7. In N.Y. State 675 (1995), we concluded that an Assistant District Attorney may not ethically engage in campaign activities on behalf of an incumbent District Attorney who is seeking re-election. Such prohibited activities included circulating nominating petitions, campaigning at public events, writing letters to the editor and speaking with the media in support of the District Attorney's candidacy. In N.Y. State 683 (1996), upon a request for reconsideration of that opinion, we re-affirmed our conclusion that partisan political activity would be inconsistent with Disciplinary Rule 1-102(A)(5) of the then-applicable N.Y. Code of Professional Responsibility, which is the forerunner of Rule 8.4(d) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules"). Both DR 1-102(A)(5) and Rule 8.4(d), in identical terms, forbid a lawyer to "engage in conduct that is prejudicial to the administration of justice." In N.Y. State 683, we reasoned that, unlike lawyers representing private clients, "prosecutors have a duty to seek justice," and that, in pursuing that duty, "individual prosecutors have a responsibility both to exercise their discretion in a disinterested, nonpartisan fashion and to avoid appearances that they are doing otherwise."

8. In N.Y. State 696 (1997), we concluded that this same restriction is applicable to lawyers employed by a municipality's Department of Investigation, or "DOI." There, the municipal charter required that the DOI Commissioner be a lawyer with at least five years of law enforcement experience. The charter empowered the Commissioner to investigate the "affairs, functions, accounts, methods, personnel or efficiency" of any municipal agency. The duties of an attorney employed by the DOI included issuing subpoenas to compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of records; conducting examinations of individual witnesses and subjects; reviewing relevant records; drafting reports; and coordinating non-legal staff members. The charter required the DOI to refer any alleged criminal misconduct to prosecutorial authorities. We stated:

> Just as is the case with a prosecutor, the actions and non-actions of an Examining Attorney can similarly be perceived as being influenced by partisan political interests if the Examining Attorney is also engaged in partisan political activities.

9. In likening the ethical issues raised in N.Y. State 696 to those of concern in the context of Assistant District Attorneys, we said that, "[a]lthough DOI attorneys do not have the authority to commence criminal proceedings, they are charged with performing investigative functions, including an investigation of criminal activity, and they have been given the subpoena power to compel the production of witnesses and documents. Moreover, if the DOI investigation concerns criminal conduct, it is mandatory that the results of the investigation be forwarded to a prosecuting attorney."

10. Other than in this last respect – that is, the obligation to refer criminal conduct to a prosecutor – the powers of the CCRB attorneys are substantially similar to those of the DOI attorneys at issue in N.Y. State 696. We do not believe that this distinction between the CCRB and DOI attorneys impacts the applicability of our prior opinions here. A CCRB attorney enjoys the same significant investigatory powers as an attorney at the DOI, including the powers to compel testimony, to subpoena documents, to review pertinent records, and to draft reports and recommendations on the products of the inquiry. Like the DOI, the CCRB has no power to impose a penalty, but the charter mandates the CCRB to report its conclusions to the Police Department, which does have the power to impose sanctions and may refer matters of criminal concern to the prosecutorial authorities. The words of N.Y. State 696 are thus equally applicable here: "As an active participant in the incipient but critical stage of the prosecutorial process, particularly in cases where public corruption is concerned, we consider an Examining Attorney at DOI to play a substantial criminal law enforcement role such that the ethical concerns we expressed in Opinion 683 apply to him or her with equal vigor."

11. We recognize that the scope of the CCRB's jurisdiction is narrower than that of a prosecutor or a DOI attorney. Nevertheless, the relationship between the police and members of society is at the core of law enforcement. Although the ultimate authority to regulate that relationship resides in the Police Department and the municipal government, the CCRB plays a critical role in influencing the judgments of those with the final say, and the checks and balances that the charter, rules, and the MOU create are not fully adequate to safeguard against the potential or the perception that political attitudes may affect the decision-making of attorneys who have within their power the ability to instigate (or not) further investigations and to affect (whether adversely or not) the careers and reputations of individuals they are charged with monitoring.

12. Of course, this opinion is subject to applicable law, including the First Amendment.

CONCLUSION:

13. An attorney employed by a municipal agency that is (i) charged by law to investigate police misconduct, (ii) given the power to compel attendance of witnesses and the production of documents, and (iii) authorized to refer misconduct to the Police Department for administrative prosecution or referral to criminal prosecutors, may not engage in partisan political activity.

OPINION 1072 (11/13/2015)

TOPIC: Partnership, multi-jurisdiction

DIGEST: Before entering into a partnership with a foreign lawyer, a New York lawyer must engage in an independent inquiry to confirm that the educational requirements for the foreign lawyer are equivalent to those for a New York lawyer and that such a partnership would not compromise the New York lawyer's ability to uphold the ethical requirements of this State, including those governing attorney-client confidentiality. Both determinations are beyond the jurisdiction of this Committee.

RULES: 5.4(b), 5.8(a), 7.5(d)

FACTS:

Background

1. The inquiring lawyer would like to form a partnership with a Japanese "benrishi," a professional licensed to practice intellectual property law under Japan's Patent Attorney Act (the "Act"). A benrishi may practice patent, copyright, trademark, unfair competition and trade secret law. They may represent clients in administrative and some court proceedings, custom seizure matters, the prosecution of trademark applications and negotiations regarding intellectual property rights.

2. Benrishi differ from patent attorneys licensed to practice patent law in the United States. One significant difference is that benrishi do not need to have a law school degree. The bar exam they must pass focuses on intellectual property law.[49]

3. Benrishi also differ from patent agents in the United States. They may represent clients in court in certain matters, including before the Tokyo High Court concerning appeals from the Japan Patent Office. Further benrishi do not need to have technical backgrounds, although many do.

The Patent Attorney Act

4. The Patent Attorney Act establishes the requirements for benrishi. As translated in an unofficial transaction,[50] the Act describes the role of benrishi (translated as "patent attorneys"[51]) as engaging "in the business of representing others regarding procedures with the Japan Patent Office as pertaining to patents, utility models, designs or trademarks, or international applications or international applications for registration, and procedures with the Minister of Economy, Trade and Industry with regard to application[,] an objection or to any award pertaining to patents, utility models, designs or trademarks, giving expert opinions and handling other affairs pertaining to matters relating to the said procedures," representing clients in certain customs matters, and representing clients in certain alternative dispute resolution procedures. Act, Article 4. Further, benrishi may represent clients in court in certain matters specified by the Act, in some cases only with an attorney,[52] unless otherwise allowed by the court. See Act, Articles 5 & 6.

5. To qualify to become a benrishi, an individual must (i) complete the practical training and (ii) pass the benrishi exam, be an attorney at law or have worked as an examiner or trial examiner at the Japan Patent Office for a total of seven or more years. See Act, Article 7.

6. The practical training consists of a three-month course offered by the Minister of Economy, Trade and Industry (or the designated training agency), on the laws, regulations and practices relating to the business of benrishi. The trainer or leader of the practical training is an experienced benrishi. See Act, Article 16.

7. The benrishi exam consists of a (i) a short answer examination on the law and regulations relating to patents, utility models, designs and trademarks (referred to as "industrial property rights"), treaties on industrial property rights and other laws and regulations necessary for performing the business of a benrishi; (ii) an essay examination on laws and regulations relating to industrial property rights and another topic selected by the examinee from those prescribed by the government; and (iii) an oral examination on the laws and regulations relating to industrial property rights. See Act, Article 10. According to the inquirer, the pass rate on the exam has ranged from under three percent to approximately seven percent. There are also continuing education requirements.

8. Once qualified, an individual submits an application for registration with the Japan Patent Attorneys Association. See Act, Article 18.

9. The Act also regulates certain conduct of benrishi. Relevant here, for example, the Act prohibits disclosure and misappropriation of client secrets without any "justifiable grounds," although the Act does not provide any further guidance on what constitutes justifiable grounds. See Act, Articles 30 & 77.

10. The Act further prohibits a benrishi from taking certain cases that would result in a conflict of interest, including cases in which the benrishi has been consulted by and retained by the adverse party, cases in which the benrishi has been consulted by the adverse party and formed a "relationship of mutual trust" and cases in which the prospective client is adverse to a current client in another matter, unless the current client consents. See Act, Article 31.

11. Violations of the Patent Attorney Act may result in admonition, suspension or prohibition of all business. See Act, Article 32.

12. The Patent Attorney Act also establishes the Japan Patent Attorney Association, and benrishi automatically become members of the Association. The Association's purpose is to guide, communicate with and supervise its members in order to maintain the dignity of benrishi, advance and improve the business of benrishi in consideration of the missions and duties of benrishi, and to engage in the registration of benrishi. See Act, Articles 56 & 60. Further, the Association maintains a Registration Screening Board, responsible for overseeing registration, including denying registration and rescinding or cancelling registration, of benrishi. See Act, Article 70.

52 Although not specified in the text, this reference would appear to be to a Japanese "bengoshi."

QUESTION:

13. May a member of the New York State bar enter into a partnership with a Japanese benrishi?

OPINION:

14. The New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") prohibit partnerships between lawyers and nonlawyers if any of the activities of the partnership consist of the practice of law. See Rule 5.4(b); see also Rule 5.8(a) (noting that multi-disciplinary practice between lawyers and non-lawyers is incompatible with the core values of the legal profession and allowing only for contractual relationships between New York lawyers and non-legal professionals under specific circumstances not applicable here).

15. We previously have noted that this prohibition, seemingly disallowing a partnership with any lawyer not admitted to practice in New York, is tempered by Rule 7.5(d), which recognizes partnerships "between or among lawyers licensed in different jurisdictions." See N.Y. State 658 (1993); see also N.Y. State 542 (1982). We also previously have noted that the reference in Rule 7.5(d) to "lawyers licensed in different jurisdictions" includes lawyers licensed in foreign countries. See N.Y. State 542.

16. However, the mere fact that a foreign "lawyer" is licensed in another country is not by itself sufficient to reach the conclusion that a New York lawyer may permissibly form a partnership with the foreign lawyer. We have previously opined that an inquiry must also be made into (i) whether the foreign country's educational requirements for admission are generally similar to those for New York attorneys and (ii) whether the standards of professional conduct and discipline governing the foreign attorney are essentially compatible with New York's standards. See N.Y. State 542 (1982); N.Y. State 658 (1993).

Educational Requirements for Benrishi

17. In N.Y. State 646, dealing with Japanese bengoshi, we noted that, if a foreign lawyer's educational training is of insufficient rigor, the New York lawyer's partnership with the foreign lawyer might compromise the New York lawyer's ability to uphold the standards of professional conduct applicable in this state. At the time we issued N.Y. State 646, there was no requirement that bengoshi have a law school degree, although they were required to complete a two-year training period and legal apprenticeship at the Legal Training and Research Institute.[53] As noted above, benrishi need not have a law school degree. They must complete a three-month practical training course, and, if they are not bengoshi, must pass the benrishi exam or have worked as an examiner or trial examiner at the Japan Patent Office for seven or more years.

18. In N.Y. State 646, we concluded that the educational requirements for admission to practice law appeared to be no less rigorous in Japan than in the United State. Nevertheless, given the Committee's limited familiarity with Japanese legal practice, we held that "a New York lawyer proposing 53 In N.Y. State 646, we noted that there were various classes of "legal professionals" licensed in Japan to perform different types of work that lawyers perform in the United States, including those that engage in parent and tax practice However, we did not address those other legal professionals in that opinion.

to enter into a partnership with a Japanese lawyer should undertake an independent inquiry to confirm that the partnership will not compromise the New York lawyer's ability to uphold ethical standards."

19. We reach the same conclusion here. When conducting that independent inquiry, the New York lawyer should consider the educational requirements for admission of benrishi and determine whether they are essentially compatible with New York's standards. Cf. 22 NYCRR 521.1 (Regulation as to Licensing of Foreign Legal Consultants) (Appellate Division may license as a foreign legal consultant an applicant who is a member in good standing of a recognized legal profession in a foreign country, the members of which are admitted to practice as attorneys or counselors at law or the equivalent and are subject to effective regulation and discipline by a duly constituted professional body or a public authority).

Standards of Professional Conduct for Benrishi

20. Before a New York lawyer may ethically form a partnership with the foreign lawyer, the New York lawyer must conclude that the partnership would not be likely to compromise the New York lawyer's ability to uphold the standards of professional conduct in this State. See N.Y. State 646 (1993). As we said in N.Y. State 646, of particular concern is the New York lawyer's duty of confidentiality under the Rules: "A New York lawyer's sharing of client confidences with a foreign partner could result in inappropriate disclosures or misuse of those confidences if the foreign partner lacked adequate understanding of, or respect for, this ethical obligation. See id.

21. As noted above, the Act prohibits benrishi from disclosing or misappropriating client secrets without any "justifiable grounds," although the Act does not provide any further guidance on what constitutes justifiable grounds. See Act, Articles 30 & 77.

22. Although it is beyond our jurisdiction to determine whether the ethical standards that apply to benrishi are equivalent to those applicable in New York, we are aware that courts in the U.S. have upheld the application of the attorney-client privilege to benrishi. See Eisai Ltd. v. Dr. Reddy's Laboratories, Inc., 406 F.Supp.2d 341 (S.D.N.Y. 2005)(upholding lower court ruling that American courts should respect as a matter of comity the privilege accorded by Japanese law to benrishi). See also Knoll Pharms. Co. v. Teva Pharms. USA, Inc., No. 01 C 1646, 2004 WL 2966964, at *3 (N.D.Ill. Nov.22, 2004) (holding documents privileged because "under Japanese law, documents reflecting communications between patent agents and clients are exempt from production"); VLT Corp. v. Unitrode Corp., 194 F.R.D. 8, 17-18 (D.Mass. 2000) (holding letter to benrishi privileged where "Japanese law would treat the [letter] as privileged" and where application of the privilege "would not be clearly inconsistent with important policies embodied in federal law" (quotation omitted)); see also Murata Mfg. Co., Ltd. v. Bel Fuse Inc., No. 03 C 2394, 2005 WL 281217, at *2-*3 (N.D.Ill. Feb.3, 2005) (holding, where parties stipulated that Japanese law controlled privilege issue, that Japanese law accorded privilege to benrishi-client communications).

23. Ultimately, however, the New York lawyer who proposes to enter into a partnership with a Japanese benrishi must reach his or her own conclusion that the partnership will not compromise the New York lawyer's ability to uphold New York ethical standards: "[T]he New York lawyer who enters into a partnership with lawyers licensed in Japan or any other foreign country has an obligation to ensure that participation in the law partnership does not compromise the lawyer's ability to abide by the ethical standards of this State, including the standards governing attorney-client confidentiality."

24. If the New York lawyer concludes that the educational requirements for admission are generally similar to those for New York attorneys and that the standards of professional conduct and discipline governing benrishi are essentially compatible to New York's standards, such that a partnership with a Japanese benrishi would not compromise the New York lawyer's ability to uphold the ethical requirements of this State, then the New York lawyer may form a partnership with the benrishi.

25. Finally, any partnership between the New York lawyer and a benrishi would also need to be in conformity with the substantive law of New York and the ethical codes and laws of Japan. See N.Y. State 646 (1993).

CONCLUSION:

26. Before entering into a partnership with a foreign lawyer, a New York lawyer must engage in an independent inquiry to confirm that the educational requirements for the foreign lawyer are equivalent to those for a New York lawyer and that such a partnership would not compromise the New York lawyer's ability to uphold the ethical requirements of this State, including those governing attorney-client confidentiality. Both determinations are beyond the jurisdiction of this Committee.

OPINION 1073 (11/13/2015)

TOPIC: Conflict of interest; defense attorneys serving on a District Attorney's conviction integrity committee

DIGEST: A defense attorney serving on a District Attorney's conviction integrity committee is not prohibited from continuing to engage in the practice of criminal law since that defense attorney is not a member of the District Attorney's firm and is not assuming a prosecutorial role.

RULES: Rules 1.0(h), 1.7(a) & (b), 1.10, 6.4

FACTS:

1. Two criminal defense attorneys have been asked to serve on a committee of a conviction integrity unit established by a county District Attorney. The committee, which also includes members of the District Attorney's office and county police, reviews wrongful conviction claims and then recommends a course of action to the District Attorney. The District Attorney ultimately decides what action to take. The criminal defense attorneys on the committee are unpaid volunteers invited to participate by the District Attorney. They are not under the control of the District Attorney, and they do not have access to information about cases other than those they are reviewing. No member of the committee is permitted to participate in the review of a claim related to a case in which the member was previously involved.

QUESTION:

2. Is a defense attorney serving on a District Attorney's conviction integrity committee permitted to continue to practice criminal law?

OPINION:

3. This Committee has repeatedly opined, under both the current New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") and the prior Code of Professional Responsibility, that a part-time prosecutor who is also in private practice is barred from representing criminal defendants in any New York state court. See, e.g., N.Y. State 859 (2011); N.Y. State 544 (1982). The Committee reasoned "that prosecutors have special responsibilities to the public that render the roles of prosecutor and defense counsel 'inherently incompatible.'" N.Y. State 859. The Committee additionally expressed the concern that the public might perceive that a District Attorney would show favoritism to the clients of a part-time prosecutor. N.Y. State 859; N.Y. State 683 (1996). This Committee has further expanded the part-time prosecutor ban to cover "matters involving law enforcement personnel with whom the lawyer works (or has worked) as a part-time prosecutor." N.Y. State 859.

4. The rationales underlying the part-time prosecutor rule are not sensibly applied to the inquirers' situation. A conviction integrity committee does not carry out the type of prosecutorial function that is "inherently incompatible" with criminal defense practice. Unlike the prosecution of a new case, the task of evaluating the weaknesses in a past conviction is not at odds with the defense function. Indeed, a criminal defense attorney's skills should be well suited to evaluating the strength of a prior conviction. In the same vein, this Committee has previously limited the application of its part-time prosecutor rule to lawyers who serve in a prosecutorial capacity on an ad hoc basis, recognizing that functioning temporarily in a prosecutorial function does not trigger the same inherent incompatibility as a long term assumption of prosecutorial responsibilities. N.Y. State 564 (1984) ("a special district attorney, whose appointment is limited to a particular matter, has only a limited identification with the state, and does not present the same potential for public distrust and suspicion as would a regularly employed prosecutor representing criminal defendants in private practice"); see also N.Y. City Bar Op. 1996-4 (exempting pro bono prosecutorial work from categorical application of part-time prosecutor rule).[54]

5. Even though the inquirers' work on the conviction integrity committee is not prosecutorial in nature, their participation on the committee would, nonetheless, be problematic if it rendered them members of the District Attorney's "firm." For were the inquirers members of that firm, any conflict arising from the more traditional prosecutorial work of the District Attorney's office would be imputed to them. See Rule 1.10(a). But not every association constitutes membership in a firm. See Comment [2] to Rule 1.0(h)(whether an individual is a member of a firm is a fact-specific inquiry); N.Y. City Bar Op. 1996-4 (pro bono attorneys handling appeal for District Attorney's office are not members of the District Attorney's firm); N.Y. State 1036 (2014) (focusing on whether the lawyers in question (1) were presented to the public in a way that suggested they were members of a firm and (2) had mutual access to client information). The inquirers here are unpaid volunteers, they are not under the control of the District Attorney, the decisions of the committee on which they serve are non-binding recommendations, and the inquirers do not have access to information about cases other than those the committee is investigating. Given those facts, the inquirers cannot be considered members of the District Attorney's firm.

6. Based on the above, the Committee concludes that the inquirers are not categorically prohibited from serving on the conviction integrity committee and continuing to represent criminal defendants. Nonetheless, the inquirers must be on the lookout for particular conflicts that may arise from their work on the committee.

CONCLUSION:

7. A defense attorney serving on a District Attorney's conviction integrity committee is not prohibited from continuing to engage in the practice of criminal law since that defense attorney is not a member of the District Attorney's firm and is not assuming a prosecutorial position.

(24-15)

54 Some of the work done by the committee may constitute "law reform activities" and thus be governed by Rule 6.4 ("A lawyer may serve as a . . . member of an organization involved in reform of the law or its administration, notwithstanding that the reform may affect the interests of a client of the lawyer."). For any such work that would "materially benefit" the interests of a client of the inquirers, they "shall disclose that fact to the organization, but need not identify the client." Rule 6.4.

OPINION 1074 (11/13/2015)

TOPIC: Conflict of interest; part-time lawyers working for a Department of Social Services

DIGEST: A part-time lawyer for a county Department of Social Services may not accept appointments as assigned counsel for indigent persons in which the Department of Social Services is involved.

RULES: Rules 1.0(h), 1.7(a) & (b), 1.8(f), 1.10(a)

FACTS:

1. A county Department of Social Services has a legal unit that employs a part-time attorney. In this capacity, the attorney handles paternity and child support matters, liens, Medicaid issues, and guardianships, and on occasion is able to assist others on the Department's legal staff in child abuse and neglect cases. In addition to part-time work at the Social Services Department, the attorney maintains a solo practice in which, among other things, the attorney participates in the County's Assigned Counsel Program representing indigent individuals in criminal matters as well as Family Court proceedings. The attorney wishes to continue to accept assignments in criminal and Family Court matters from the County's Assigned Counsel Program, for which the County pays. The attorney does not intend to accept any such assignments in child abuse and neglect cases.

QUESTION:

2. May a part-time attorney for a county Department of Social Services accept assignments from the same county's Assigned Counsel Program to represent clients at the County's expense in criminal and Family Court matters?

OPINION:

3. In N.Y. State 859 (2011), a part-time lawyer at the Department of Social Services wished to represent, in a criminal proceeding, a private client who was also simultaneously a respondent in what the inquirer described as "unrelated" proceedings involving allegations of child abuse and neglect. Citing a long line of decisions in which this Committee opined that a part-time prosecutor who engages in private practice is ethically barred from representing criminal defendants in any New York state court, we said that a Department of Social Services attorney "is subject to these same principles." N.Y. State 859 (2011). We reasoned that the "role of the Social Services attorney when prosecuting child abuse and neglect proceedings is comparable to the role of the D.A.'s office in criminal prosecutions," because in both "the attorney represents the interests of the state in matters with grave consequences," including the possible loss of liberty. Accordingly, we determined that the proposed representation presented a non-waivable conflict of interest under Rule 1.7 of the N.Y. Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules").

4. Earlier, in N.Y. State 800 (2006), we addressed whether a part-time prosecutor could accept an assignment to represent indigent persons in Family Court proceedings in an adjacent county. There, we concluded that no per se rule prohibited all such assignments, but identified three types of proceedings in which the neighboring part-time prosecutor should not be involved: matters in which the prosecutor was then working or had previously worked with the law enforcement officials involved; juvenile delinquency proceedings; and cases involving Persons in Need of Supervision (known as "PINS" actions). The first of these concerns arose from prior opinions that a currently-serving prosecutor should not accept defense work in which "'investigating officers and law enforcement personnel are those with whom the attorney associates as prosecutor.'" N.Y. State 800 (2006) (quoting N.Y. State 544 (1970)). The other two related to our view that such proceedings were "functionally indistinguishable" from adult criminal proceedings, and thus occasioned the same conflicts that animated the opinions underlying N.Y. State 859. See, e.g., N.Y. State 788 (2005); N.Y. State 657 (1993); N.Y. State 184 (1971); N.Y. State 171 (1970). We also mentioned the special sensitivity required in child abuse and neglect cases. Nevertheless, in the context of part-time prosecutor accepting assignments in a different county, and providing appropriately stringent caveats, we adopted a "facts and circumstances" test to assess whether a conflict exists.

5. We conclude that the same test ought to apply here, with many of the same caveats. We cannot say that the Rules invariably forbid a lawyer to accept the representation of, say, an indigent defendant in a traffic violation merely by virtue of the lawyer's role as a part-time lawyer handling Medicaid, paternity, or child support issues for the Department of Social Services. Likewise, we cannot say that the Rules invariably forbid a lawyer to accept a representation in a Family Court proceeding between, say, two private individuals in which the Department of Social Services has no involvement.

6. The inquiring lawyer does not intend to accept child abuse and neglect cases from the County Assigned Counsel Program. We believe that this decision is well-advised and compelled by the rationale of N.Y. State 800 as falling within the areas that are off-limits to a non-resident part-time prosecutor, which are equally applicable to a resident part-time Department of Social Services attorney. This accords not only with N.Y. State 859 but also with the imputation rules of Rule 1.10, which imputes the conflicts of the lawyer to the entire legal unit of the Department by virtue of the lawyer's part-time affiliation with it. N.Y. State 975 (2013) (imputation in Public Defender's Office); N.Y. State 788 (2004) (same with respect to a DA's office); Rule 1.0(h) (the term "law firm" includes lawyers in "the legal department of a corporation of other organization"); Rule 1.10 (lawyers associated in a firm shall not knowingly represent a client when one of them practicing alone would be prohibited from doing so by Rule 1.7). Thus, the lawyer's involvement in such matters as a private lawyer could lead to the disqualification of the entire legal unit of the Social Services Department.

7. The attorney's work in other Family Court matters depends on the facts and circumstances. The Family Court is the central venue for resolution of disputes that fall within the jurisdiction of the Department of Social Services. The interaction among the Department of Social Services, law enforcement, and the Family Court is a constant fact of life. In N.Y. State 800, we noted:

> The Family Court hears matters involving children and families, including child protective proceedings, adoption, custody and visitation, support, family offense, guardianship, delinquency, paternity, persons in need of supervision (PINS), and foster care approval and review. While certain Family Court matters are more likely to involve related criminal matters, virtually all types of proceedings heard by the Family Court are likely to have some involvement of law enforcement or similar government entities. . . . The local child protective service investigates allegations and the county attorneys present ("prosecute") the case in Family Court. Family offense cases by their nature pose a great risk of criminal charges being brought. In custody and visitation cases, the practices may vary by county, but many Family Courts request reports from > probation departments, in addition to (or instead of) reports from local child welfare officials [i.e., the Department of Social Services]. Child support cases, too, could involve law enforcement and/or prosecution. In these and other cases, the Family Court may also request reports from other governmental agencies. . . .

8. Consistent with N.Y. State 800, we do not see the need to adopt a per se ban on the inquirer's participation in Family Court provided that the matter there does not implicate the concerns set out above. Although it is true that many Family Court proceedings implicate the Department of Social Services, there are certain proceedings there that typically do not. For instance, a couple in a dispute over custody, or the occupancy or possession of marital assets, would not ordinarily excite the interest of the Department of Social Services. This is why we believe that the issue is best left to the facts and circumstances of particular matter, in which the lawyer may assess whether the lawyer's part-time employment in the Department of Social Services would be an issue. If the Department is to play any meaningful role in the Family Court proceeding, then the lawyer should decline the assignment; if not, then we see no reason why the lawyer may not appear in the Family Court on matters in which the Department plays no meaningful role.

9. This same reasoning applies when the County Assigned Counsel Program selects a part-time lawyer for the Social Services Department to defend an indigent person in a criminal case. We can envision certain criminal cases that implicate none of the issues that cause us concern or implicate the conflicts issues that engendered the opinions cited above. Rule 1.7(a)(1) prohibits concurrent representations – that is, here, the lawyer's role at the Department of Social Services and the lawyer's role as assigned counsel in criminal cases – only when the representations involve "differing interests." The question, then, is whether the lawyer's representation qualifies for exemption under Rule 1.7(b).

10. The most important element of the analysis is the lawyer's reasonable belief "that the lawyer may provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client." We cannot negate the possibility that a part-time lawyer for the Department of Social Services may reach such a reasonable belief in undertaking the defense of a criminal defendant provided that the matter is one in which the lawyer is not then working or has not recently worked with the law enforcement officials involved, and does not involve any issue within the jurisdiction of the Department of Social Services. For example, a DWI or a larceny charge against a stranger to the Department, in which none of the law enforcement officials with whom the lawyer works or has recently worked, cannot readily be said to entail the serious issues that a lawyer in the inquirer's position might otherwise raise. But for the lawyer to be engaged in matters within the Department's jurisdiction, which a Family Court appearance would inevitably invoke, or for the lawyer to be required to cross-examine law enforcement officials with whom the lawyer is now engaged as a part-time lawyer at the Department of Social Services or has recently done so, would present exactly the problems that our earlier opinions found impermissible. In all events, the informed consent of the Department of Social Services and of the lawyer's client, confirmed in writing, is essential to the undertaking.

CONCLUSION:

11. A part-time lawyer for a county Department of Social Services may accept appointments as assigned counsel for indigent persons in Family Court and in criminal matters provided that the Department or others in law enforcement with whom the lawyer works are not materially involved. (25-15)

OPINION 1075 (12/01/2015)

TOPIC: Firm Name; Trade Name

DIGEST: A business formed by a retired judge to help lawyers prepare arguments for court may not use a trade name.

RULES: Rules 1.6, 1.7, 7.5(b)

FACTS:

1. Inquirer is a retired judge beginning a new business venture that provides legal consulting services to lawyers preparing arguments for court or other proceedings. Inquirer plans to use her experience to critique and hone a lawyer's presentation prior to his or her appearance in court. She would like to use a trade name for her business.

QUESTION:

2. Do the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") forbid the use of a trade name by a former judge who is beginning a business that will help lawyers prepare their arguments for court or other proceedings?

OPINION:

3. Rule 7.5(b), which is part of the advertising rules, states:

> A lawyer in private practice shall not practice under a trade name . . . or a firm name containing names other than those of one or more of the lawyers in the firm.

4. As we commented in N.Y. State 869 (2011), "The prohibition against trade names is broad, permitting use of little beyond the names of lawyers presently or previously associated with the firm." See In re Shephard, 459 N.Y.S.2d 632, 633 (3rd Dep't 1983) (finding "The People's Law Firm" was a prohibited trade name). Cf. In re von Wiegen, 63 N.Y.2d 163; 470 N.E.2d 838, 481 N.Y.S.2d 40 (Ct. App. 1984), cert. denied, 105 S.Ct. 2701 (1985) (use of phrase "the Country Lawyer" immediately below the lawyer's name constitutes a "motto," not a "trade name"); N.Y. State 948 (2012) (firm name may not include the phrase "The Business Dispute Clinic," but use of the phrase as a motto separate from the firm name may be permissible); N.Y. State 869 (2011) (lawyer's advertising may disclose an area of law in which the lawyer practices, such as tax, but lawyer may not include an area of law in the law firm name).

5. The term "private practice" used in 7.5(b) refers to the "practice of law." The scope of what constitutes the "practice of law" – for example in connection with the unauthorized practice of law – is a legal question, which this Committee is not authorized to answer. See N.Y. State 636 (1992) (business of selling standard will forms is not practice of law unless the forms are individualized). Nonetheless, we are comfortable assuming that the business of advising lawyers how to best prepare for arguments in court in specific cases is the practice of law. See, e.g., N.Y. State 636 (noting, under analogous provision of prior Code of Professional Responsibility, that when a lawyer holding himself out as such performs services or activities that a lawyer might provide to or conduct on behalf of a client, the lawyer will be held to all professional standards).

6. The application of all professional standards to the practice of law means that the inquirer could not advise both sides of a litigation on how best to prepare a specific argument for court without running afoul of Rule 1.7 ("Conflict of Interest; Current Clients") and could not reveal confidences obtained while consulting with each side without running afoul of Rule 1.6 ("Confidentiality of Information"). As we assume that the inquirer's proposed business model involves the practice of law, it is our opinion that she cannot use a trade name for that business.[55]

CONCLUSION:

7. The Rules forbid the use of a trade name by a former judge who is beginning a business that will help lawyers prepare their arguments for court or other proceedings.

(15-15)

55 We do not express an opinion about whether informal consultations between lawyers are likely to involve the practice of law. Cf. ABA 98-411 (concluding that when one lawyer consults with another lawyer and where there is no intent to engage the consulted lawyer's services, no client-lawyer relationship arises and consulted lawyer will not necessarily be bound by Rule 1.6).

OPINION 1076 (12/08/2015)

TOPIC: Email; blind copy of correspondence; communication with client.

DIGEST: A lawyer may blind copy a client on e-mail correspondence with opposing counsel, despite the objection of opposing counsel. Because a lawyer is the agent of the client, sending such a blind copy is not deceptive. However, there are practical reasons why the lawyer should consider forwarding the e-mail correspondence to the client rather than using "bcc".

RULES: 1.4(c) & (b), 4.1, 4.2, 8.4 (b) & (c)

FACTS:

1. Opposing counsel has sent the inquiring attorney an email stating that opposing counsel does not consent to inquiring attorney blind copying inquiring attorney's client on inquiring attorney's emails to opposing counsel.

QUESTION:

2. May a lawyer ethically send the lawyer's client a blind copy of an email to opposing counsel where opposing counsel has objected to such practice?

DISCUSSION:

3. Two opposing lawyers do not have a relationship of confidentiality. Consequently, a lawyer who receives correspondence from opposing counsel is not obligated under the Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") to maintain the confidentiality of those communications. A lawyer does not need the "consent" of opposing counsel to send the client copies of correspondence between the inquirer and opposing counsel. Since a lawyer is an agent of the lawyer's client, opposing counsel should expect that the lawyer may share correspondence relating to the representation with the client.

4. A lawyer is required to communicate regularly with the client on the status of the matter for which the lawyer has been retained. Rule 1.4 (a)(i)(iii) requires the lawyer to inform a client promptly of material developments in the matter. Rule 1.4 (a)(3) requires the lawyer to keep the client reasonably informed about the status of the matter. Finally, Rule 1.4(b) requires the lawyer to provide information that is reasonably necessary for the client to make informed decisions regarding the representation. See also Rule 1.4, Cmt. [4] (lawyer's regular communication with clients will minimize the occasions on which a client will need to request information concerning the representation) and Cmt. [5] (client should have sufficient information to participate intelligently in decisions concerning the objectives of the representation and the means by which they are to be pursued).

5. Traditionally, one method lawyers have used to keep clients reasonably informed of the progress of the matter is to send the client a copy of the correspondence from the lawyer and providing a copy of correspondence received by the lawyer. Before modern technology, the lawyer's own typewritten correspondence was copied by means of a carbon copy. Subsequently, carbon copies were replaced with photocopies. With the advent of e-mail, lawyers also gained the ability to send copies electronically.

6. When the sender of a communication copies others, it is possible to inform the principal recipient of all recipients of copies of the communication. This is often done by indicating the names of recipients at the top or bottom of the communication under the abbreviation "cc:" – which formerly indicated a "carbon copy," but now is often described as a "courtesy copy." It is also possible for the sender to provide copies to others without indicating to the principal recipient that such other recipients exist. This can be done with a "blind copy" or "bcc" on either hard copy communications or e-mails or by forwarding the original e-mail.

Is a Blind Copy Deceptive within the Meaning of Rule 8.4(c)?

7. Under Rule 8.4(c), a lawyer may not engage in "conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation." The term "deceit" is not defined in the Rules, and thus we believe it should be interpreted under common usage, i.e. having a purpose to deceive or give a false impression. See Webster's Third New International Dictionary (unabridged) (2002). The question here is whether the lawyer's failure to indicate to opposing counsel that the lawyer's client is the recipient of a blind copy of correspondence between the lawyer and opposing counsel is intended to or is likely to give opposing counsel the false impression that he or she is the only recipient of the communication.

8. Because the lawyer is the agent of the client,[56] we do not believe that it is deceptive for a lawyer to send to his or her own client copies of correspondence with opposing counsel.[57] Opposing counsel may not reasonably assume that the lawyer will not share communications with his or her principal, the client.

9. Moreover, in the context of e-mails, there are good reasons for the lawyer not to send the client a "cc." E-mails sent as a "cc" indicate the e-mail address of the person copied, and neither the inquirer nor the client may wish to provide this information to opposing counsel. See also the discussion below under Reasons Not to Use either "cc:" or "bcc:" When Copying e-mails to the Client.

Reasons Not to Use Either "cc:" or "bcc:" When Copying e-mails to the Client

10. Although it is not deceptive for a lawyer to send to his or her client blind copies of communications with opposing counsel, there are other reasons why use of the either "cc:" or "bcc:" when e-mailing the client is not a best practice.

11. As noted above, "cc:" risks disclosing the client's e-mail address. It also could be deemed by opposing counsel to be an invitation to send communications to the inquirer's client. But see Rule 4.2, Cmt. [3] (Rule 4.2(a) applies even though the represented party initiates or consents to the communication).

12. Although sending the client a "bcc:" may initially avoid the problem of disclosing the client's email address, it raises other problems if the client mistakenly responds to the e-mail by hitting "reply all." For example, if the inquirer and opposing counsel are communicating about a possible settlement

56 See ALI, Restatement, The Law Governing Lawyers ("a lawyer is an agent, to whom clients entrust matters").

57 This is not a case where one lawyer proposes to send a copy of correspondence to the other lawyer's client without the consent of the other lawyer, which would violate Rule 4.2 (the "no contact" rule). See N.Y. City 2009-1 (if lawyer sent correspondence to opposing counsel with a copy to opposing counsel's client, it would violate the no contact rule).

of litigation, the inquirer bccs his or her client, and the client hits "reply all" when commenting on the proposal, the client may inadvertently disclose to opposing counsel confidential information otherwise protected by Rule 1.6. See Charm v. Kohn, 27 Mass L. Rep. 421, 2010 (Mass. Super. Sept. 30, 2010) (stating that blind copying a client on lawyer's email to adversary "gave rise to the foreseeable risk" that client would respond without "tak[ing] careful note of the list of addressees to which he directed his reply").

CONCLUSION:

13. A lawyer may blind copy a client on e-mail correspondence with opposing counsel, despite the objection of opposing counsel. Because a lawyer is the agent of the client, sending such a blind copy is not deceptive. However, there are practical reasons why the lawyer should consider forwarding the e-mail correspondence to the client rather than using "bcc".

OPINION 1077 (12/09/2015)

TOPIC: Record retention and electronic storage

DIGEST: A law firm may scan original signed retainer agreements into the firm computer system and then destroy the original agreements, provided that the firm maintains the scanned copies for seven years after the events they record.

RULE: 1.15(d)

QUESTION:

1. The inquiring lawyers are in a firm that "has a high volume practice" and receives "thousands of signed retainer agreements" every year. They ask whether they may ethically scan each retainer agreement into the firm's computer system and then destroy the original signed agreement.

OPINION:

2. Rule 1.15(d)(1) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") requires lawyers to maintain certain records for seven years after the events that they record. As to some categories of records, the Rule states that lawyers shall maintain "copies" of those records. See Rule 1.15(d)(1)(iii)-(vii). As to other categories, including certain bank records, the Rule requires that the records be maintained but makes no reference to copies. See Rule 1.15(d)(1)(i), (ii) & (viii).

3. We addressed issues of record retention and electronic storage in N.Y. State 680 (1996). There we interpreted provisions in the Code of Professional Responsibility that were identical to those now applicable under the Rules. We concluded that, as to records for which a lawyer is required to maintain "copies," the lawyer may maintain the records in certain alternative forms, but that, under the provisions not making reference to copies, the lawyer must retain the records in their original form. See also N.Y. State 950 (2012) (storing mail in electronic rather than paper form), N.Y. State 940 (obligation to retain certain documents in original form).

4. The current inquiry relates specifically to retainer agreements. Lawyers are obligated only to maintain "copies" of such agreements. See Rule 1.15(d)(1)(iii) (lawyers must maintain "copies of all retainer and compensation agreements with clients"). Rule 1.15(d)(3) effectively defines the word "copies" for purposes of Rule 1.15(d). Subparagraph (d)(3) states:

> For purposes of Rule 1.15(d), a lawyer may satisfy the requirement of maintaining "copies" by maintaining any of the following items: original records, photocopies, microfilm, optical imaging, and any other medium that preserves an image of the document that cannot be altered without detection.

5. The inquirer proposes to maintain copies of the agreements by scanning them into the firm computer. May the law firm use such a scanning system without being assured that a scanned image of a retainer agreement "cannot be altered without detection"? For the reasons below, we think that complete assurance of that kind is neither available using many standard technologies, nor required by subparagraph (d)(3).

6. In N.Y. 680, we stated that before determining to change the form in which records are maintained, "the lawyer must make certain that the new storage means to be used safeguards the records from inadvertent destruction or alteration at least as effectively as the traditional paper record, and that the new technique will permit the prompt production of accurate, unaltered copies" upon request in connection with disciplinary proceedings. But we acknowledged that "stored electronic data is susceptible of being transferred from an unalterable format to a readily manipulable one," and that even paper copies "are also susceptible of being intentionally altered." Despite that acknowledgement, we concluded that "those documents for which the Rule explicitly permits 'copies' to be retained may be stored in the form of computer images."

7. In any event, we read Rule 1.15(d)(3) to mean that if a lawyer maintains records in some medium other than the specific ones listed – that is, other than original records, photocopies, microfilm, or optical imaging – then that other medium must preserve an image of the document that cannot be altered without detection. But a lawyer using one of the specifically listed forms – "original records, photocopies, microfilm, [or] optical imaging," which would include scanning as proposed in the inquiry here – satisfies the Rule even in the absence of special measures to ensure visibility of alteration.

8. We note two cautions. First, even if scanning or some other optical imaging technology does not preclude all possibility of undetectable alteration, the very requirement that the saved record be a "copy" imposes some standard of fidelity to the original. See N.Y. State 680 (recognizing permissibility of storage by "reliable" electronic means). Second, the obligation imposed by Rule 1.15(d)(3) does not end with the creation of the copy; the storage system must be reliable enough so that the copy is maintained for the required seven years.

CONCLUSION:

9. Lawyers are required to maintain "copies" of all retainer and compensation agreements with clients. A law firm does not violate that requirement if it destroys original retainer agreements after scanning the original signed agreements into its computer system and then maintains the scanned images for the requisite period.

OPINION 1078 (12/16/2015)

TOPIC: Confidentiality

DIGEST: A lawyer does not violate the duty of confidentiality by advising the son of a former client that the lawyer did not draft a will for his deceased father or refer the father to another law firm for will services, and that the lawyer does not possess an original will for the father.

RULES: 1.6(a)

FACTS:

1. The inquiring lawyer represented a father and son in legal matters some years ago. Recently, the son contacted the lawyer and advised that his father died several years ago, leaving a surviving spouse (who is not the son's mother). The son also stated that no estate proceedings had been commenced, no one had been appointed as administrator or executor, and he does not know whether his father left a will. He asked if the lawyer had either drafted a will for his father or referred his father to other counsel to draft a will.

2. The lawyer's records indicate that the lawyer never drafted a will for the deceased father and did not refer the father to other counsel for such purpose. Nor is there an original will in the father's closed file.

QUESTIONS:

3. May the inquiring lawyer advise the son of a former client that the lawyer has no record of drafting a will for the deceased father or of referring him to another law office for such purpose, and that the lawyer does not possess an original will for the father?

4. If the inquiring lawyer may provide this information to the former client's son, must the lawyer require proof of the son's identity and/or a death certificate of the father before providing the information?

OPINION:

5. Rule 1.6(a) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") provides that:

> (a) A lawyer shall not knowingly reveal confidential information, as defined in this Rule, or use such information to the disadvantage of a client or for the advantage of the lawyer or a third person, unless:
> > . . . (2) the disclosure is impliedly authorized to advance the best interests of the client and is either reasonable under the circumstances or customary in the professional community.

The Rule defines "confidential information" as consisting of:

> information gained during or relating to the representation of a client, whatever its source, that is (a) protected by the attorney-client privilege, (b) likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed, or (c) information that the client has requested be kept confidential.

6. In the specific circumstances in this inquiry, the information that the son is requesting is not "confidential information" as defined by Rule 1.6(a). The lawyer's knowledge that the lawyer did not draft a will for a former client, and did not refer him to other counsel for that purpose, may or may not be "information gained during or relating to the representation of a client." However, the requested information is not protected by the attorney-client privilege, which protects communications, not non-communications; it is not "likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed"; and the inquirer has not suggested that it is "information that the client has requested be kept confidential." Therefore, in these limited circumstances, the lawyer may disclose to the former client's son the fact that the lawyer did not draft a will for the former client or refer him to other counsel for that purpose.

7. Even if the information that the lawyer did not draft a will for the deceased father was considered to be "confidential information" within the purview of Rule 1.6(a), it could be disclosed to the surviving son if disclosure is "impliedly authorized to advance the best interests of the client" and is "reasonable under the circumstances." Rule 1.6(a)(2). Here, it may advance the best interests of the former client for the lawyer to make disclosures to the son, because the disclosures may assist the son in ensuring that any final wishes of his father are brought to light, and the disclosures may save the estate further time and expense of investigating in a futile search for a will.

8. If the information being requested is not confidential information, then the lawyer is not obligated to protect it. However, as a matter of prudence, the lawyer may wish to require satisfactory confirmation of the father's death before advising the son that he does not have the father's will and did not draft one for him. The lawyer may also request confirmation of the son's identity if the lawyer never met or does not remember the son from the lawyer's prior representation of the son. Requiring confirmation of the father's death and the son's identity is not mandatory under the Rules but may be prudent under the circumstances.

CONCLUSION:

9. A lawyer may advise the son of a former client that the lawyer did not draft a will for his deceased father or refer the father to another law firm for will services, and that the lawyer's files do not contain an original will for the father.

OPINION 1079 (12/16/2015)

TOPIC: Paralegal; legal assistant; billing

DIGEST: Because New York State does not require paralegals to be certified, the term "paralegal" does not imply certification. Consequently, it is not deceptive for a lawyer to use the title "paralegal" to describe a layperson who assists the lawyer with substantive legal work for which bar admission is not necessary but who is not a graduate of a paralegal program or certified by any certifying body. Nor is it improper to charge for the time of such paralegal in accordance with the lawyer's engagement letter.

RULES: 1.5(a) & (b), 5.3(a), 8.4(c)

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a lawyer who discloses to clients in the retainer agreement that they will be billed for work performed by a "paralegal." The work is performed by a legal assistant who is not a graduate of a paralegal program and is not certified by any certifying body.

QUESTION:

2. May a lawyer who discloses to clients that they will be billed for tasks performed by a paralegal bill clients for work performed by a lay person who is neither a graduate of a paralegal program nor certified by any certifying body?

OPINION:

3. The answer to this inquiry depends on whether it is deceptive to bill for "paralegal" services when the services are performed by a layperson who is not a graduate of a paralegal program or certified by any certifying body. Rule 8.4(c) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") provides that: "A lawyer or law firm shall not engage in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation."

Terminology

4. Comment [2] to Rule 5.3 explains that lawyers "generally employ assistants in their practice, including secretaries, investigators, law student interns and paraprofessionals." The only use of the term "paralegal" in the Rules is in Comment [4] to Rule 1.10, on vicarious disqualification, and the term is not defined anywhere in the Rules. In N.Y. State 255 (1972), however, this Committee defined "paralegal" as "a lay person employed by a lawyer to perform certain law office functions for which legal training and bar admission are not necessary." We also stated that "a lawyer's secretary can be a paralegal employee." See also Rule 5.3, Cmt. [2] (nonlawyer assistants act for the lawyer in the rendition of the lawyer's professional services); ABA Inf. 1185 (1971) (the term "legal assistant" is generally used as connoting a lay assistant to a lawyer). Thus, the Rules do not contain a requirement that a paralegal have any particular training or experience. See also ABA, Model Guidelines for the Utilization of Paralegal Services (2004) (hereafter, the "ABA Guidelines"). According to the ABA Guidelines, the ABA Board of Governors approved a de• nition for the term "legal assistant" in 1986 and amended it in 1997 to read: "A legal assistant or paralegal is a person quali• ed by education, training or work experience who is employed or retained by a lawyer, law of• ce, corporation, governmental agency or other entity who performs speci• cally delegated substantive legal work for which a lawyer is responsible."

5. The ABA Guidelines state that, to comport with current usage in the profession, they will use the term "paralegal" rather than "legal assistant" – but the Guidelines also tell lawyers to be aware that the terms "legal assistant" and "paralegal" often are used interchangeably. The use of the term "paraprofessionals" in Comment [2] to Rule 5.3 indicates that the Rules place greater importance on the role these individuals play than on the name applied to them. Consequently, although the inquiry asks about using the term "paralegal," our answer would apply equally to "legal assistants" and similar terms, and even to a legal secretary performing similar functions.

Lawyer Responsibilities Regarding Paralegals

6. The only requirement in the Rules pertaining to the work of paralegals is that an employing law firm must ensure that the work of nonlawyers who work for the firm is "adequately supervised, as appropriate." Rule 5.3(a). The degree of supervision required is that which is "reasonable under the circumstances, taking into account such factors as the experience of the person whose work is being supervised, the amount of work involved and the likelihood that ethical problems might arise in the course of working on the matter." Id. See also N.Y. State 393 (1975) (degree of responsibility that may be entrusted to individual legal assistants may vary according to their education and experience).

Charging for Paralegal Time

7. Rule 1.5(a) provides that a lawyer may not make an agreement for, charge or collect an excessive fee or expense. Rule 1.5(a) also lists factors that the lawyer should consider in determining what is excessive, including the fee customarily charged in the locality for similar legal services.

8. Nothing in the Rules prohibits charging for the time of paralegals. See ABA Guidelines, Guideline 8 (lawyer may include a charge for the work performed by a paralegal in setting a charge and/or billing for legal services). Cf. Missouri v. Jenkins, 491 U.S. 274 (1989) (in a case under the Federal fee-shifting statute, U.S. Supreme Court upholds awarding fees for the work of paralegals, law clerks, and recent law graduates, because the statutory phrase "a reasonable attorney's fee," must refer to a reasonable fee for an attorney's work product, and thus must take into account the work of paralegals as well as attorneys).

Certification of Paralegals

9. Although many institutions certify paralegals, and some are even approved by the ABA, New York State is among the majority of states that do not require paralegals to be certified. Consequently, in New York, use of the term "paralegal" does not imply certification. It follows that using the title "paralegal" to describe a layperson who is neither a graduate of a paralegal program nor certified by any certifying body is not deceptive. In the past, we have expressed concern about whether the term "paralegal" provides appropriate notice to the public that the work is being or will be performed by a nonlawyer. In past opinions, we have concluded that it does provide appropriate notice. See N.Y. State 640 (1992) (term "paralegal" is sufficient without further qualification to make clear the employee's non-lawyer status). We remain of that view.

CONCLUSION:

10. Because New York State does not require paralegals to be certified, the term "paralegal" does not imply certification. Consequently, it is not deceptive for a lawyer to use the title "paralegal" to describe a layperson who assists the lawyer with substantive legal work for which bar admission is not necessary but who is not a graduate of a paralegal program or certified by any certifying body. Nor is it improper to charge for the time of such paralegal in accordance with the lawyer's engagement letter.

OPINION 1080 (12/22/2015)

TOPIC: Communication with public officials

DIGEST: A lawyer who has been communicating with counsel for a municipality on a matter may not thereafter communicate with a public official with respect to the matter, even if the public official requests such communication, unless the lawyer obtains the prior consent of the municipality's counsel.

RULES: 4.2(a)

FACTS:

1. The inquiring lawyer has represented various clients in the past regarding contested real property assessments. On those prior contested matters the lawyer communicated directly with the municipal assessor (the public official responsible for real property assessments) up to the point at which the attorney for the municipality became involved.

2. Now the inquiring attorney is handling a similar matter involving a contested real property assessment. Because the lawyer and the public official had substantial differences in the similar prior matters, the lawyer in the current matter decided to begin negotiations by communicating initially with the attorney for the municipality. Counsel for the municipality thereafter has made an appearance in the matter. None of the communications involved or will involve matters of policy relating to real property assessments. The assessor has the authority to bind the municipality, including the authority to settle the matter.

3. After the lawyer began the matter by communicating with the attorney for the municipality, the public official contacted the lawyer directly and requested the lawyer to communicate directly with him (the public official) on administrative matters even though the lawyer had already communicated with the attorney for the municipality.

QUESTION:

4. Absent the prior consent of an attorney representing a municipality in a contested real property appraisal, may a lawyer communicate with a public official who is represented by counsel for the municipality once he has communicated about the matter with the municipality's counsel even though the public official has requested direct communication?

OPINION

5. Rule 4.2(a) of the Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") prohibits a lawyer from communicating "about the subject of the representation with a party the lawyer knows to be represented by another lawyer in the matter, unless the lawyer has the prior consent of the other lawyer or is authorized to do so by law." This is commonly known as the "no-contact" rule. Rule 4.2(a) is substantially the same as former DR 7-104(A)(1) of the Code of Professional Responsibility.

6. This Committee first dealt with communications with public officials in N.Y. State 160 (1970). Applying DR 7-104(A)(1), we said that a "governmental unit has the same rights and responsibilities in a controversy as any other corporation or individual." We concluded that "once there is an indication that counsel has been designated by a party, whether a governmental unit or otherwise, with regard to a particular matter, all communications concerning the matter must thereafter be made with the designated counsel, except as provided by law."

7. This apparently unambiguous interpretation of DR 7-104(A)(1) received some gloss in N.Y. State 404 (1975). There, the question was whether the lawyer for the petitioner before a board of education that was split on the matter being reviewed could contact the minority members of the board without the consent of the board's attorney. We noted that the crucial issue was whether an individual member of a public body must be considered an adverse party in connection with a decision he or she opposed. We concluded that they should not, and stated that the "overriding public interest compels that an opportunity be afforded to the public and their authorized representatives to obtain views of, and pertinent facts from, public officials representing them." Absent consent from opposing counsel, however, Opinion 404 said that "communications with members of a public body in an adversary proceeding should be made only in instances where the public official has indicated his or her desire to speak to opposing counsel."

8. Further gloss was added to our interpretation of the no-contact rule in N.Y. State 812 (2007). There, a developer had applied to a planning board for approval of a new shopping center. The planning board had power to issue binding determinations. The developer's attorney asked if he could communicate with members of the planning board about the shopping center, even though the planning board's counsel had not consented to such communication. We said that the no-contact rule prohibited the developer's attorney from communicating with planning board members unless either (1) the planning board members were not "parties" within the meaning of the no-contact rule or (2) the communication was otherwise "authorized by law."

9. As to whether the planning board members were "parties" we applied the standard set out in Niesig v. Team I, 76 N.Y. 2d 363, 374-75 (1990), which had interpreted the no-contact rule in the context of communications between a lawyer and employees of an opposing corporation. Judge Kaye, writing for the majority said:

> The test that best balances the competing interests, and incorporates the most desirable elements of the other approaches, is the one that defines "party" to include corporate employees whose acts or omissions in the matter under inquiry are binding on the corporation (in effect, the corporation's "alter egos") or imputed to the corporation for purposes of its liability, or employees implementing the advice of counsel.

10. Based on Niesig, we concluded in N.Y. State 812 that the no-contact rule prohibits communications with government officials who have authority, individually or as part of a larger body, to bind the government or to settle a litigable matter, or whose acts or omissions gave rise to the matter in controversy. Because the planning board in N.Y. State 812 had the power to issue binding decisions, we concluded that members of the planning board were parties under the no-contact rule.

11. As to whether the communications were "authorized by law," N.Y. State 812 explored the First Amendment right to petition the government. We adopted the approach taken in ABA 97-408 (1997), which had concluded that the "authorized by law" exception permitted counsel to engage in unconsented communications with government officials despite the no-contact rule if three conditions were satisfied: (1) the official has the authority to take or recommend action in the controversy; (2) the sole purpose of the communication is to address a policy issue; and (3) the lawyer seeking to communicate with the government official gives advance notice of the proposed communication to the lawyer representing the government so that the government lawyer has the opportunity to advise his or her client with respect to the communication, including whether to entertain it the communication at all. Rule 4.2, Comment [5] also addresses this issue. For a thorough discussion of ethics opinions relating to communications with public officials under Rule 4.2(a), see Roy D. Simon, Simon's New York Rules of Profession Conduct Annotated 1228-1233 (Thomson Reuters 2015 ed.).

12. Under the facts of N.Y. State 812, we concluded that that the proposed communication fell within the protection of the First Amendment and therefore was permitted.

13. We now apply Rule 4.2(a) and the opinions discussed above to the facts raised in this inquiry.

14. N.Y. State 160 teaches that "once there is an indication that counsel has been designated by a party, whether a governmental unit or otherwise, with regard to a particular matter, all communications concerning the matter must thereafter be made with the designated counsel except as provided by law." Here, counsel for the municipality has been designated by the municipality, and has filed an appearance in the matter. Consequently, all further communications must be with the municipality's counsel (or with the consent of such counsel) except as authorized by law. It does not matter whether the first contact with the government's attorney was initiated by the adverse party's attorney or whether the government official has expressly requested the adverse party to contact him directly.

15. N.Y. State 404 generally creates a narrow exception to the "prior consent" element of the no-contact rule where a public official has indicated his desire to have the lawyer communicate with him directly, and the public official is not an "adverse party" in the matter. But that exception does not apply here as the municipal assessor is an adverse party in the matter. The lawyer for the real property owner must therefore obtain prior consent from the municipality's lawyer before communicating directly with the assessor. In the absence of such consent the lawyer may not communicate with the assessor even though the assessor requests such communication. As noted in Rule 4.2, Comment [2], the no-contact rule "applies even though the represented party initiates or consents to the communication."

16. Because the matter here does not involve municipal policy, N.Y. State 812 does not permit the communications at issue. The real property owner is not attempting to exercise a First Amendment right to petition the government. He is attempting to challenge the assessment of his real property as determined by the municipal assessor and perhaps to settle the matter directly with the assessor who has authority to bind the municipality. N.Y. State 812's three prong test (reflecting the exception for First Amendment rights discussed in paragraph 11 above) is not met here because, even if the property owner's attorney gives advance notice to the municipality's attorney, the "sole purpose of the communication" would not be to address a policy matter.

CONCLUSION:

17. A lawyer who has been communicating with counsel for a municipality on a matter not involving policy may not thereafter communicate with a public official with respect to the matter, even if the public official requests such communication, unless counsel for the municipality gives prior consent. OPINION 1081 (01/08/2016)

TOPIC: Unauthorized practice of law; professional independence; fee splitting.

DIGEST: Lawyers employed by a debt management company may not provide legal services to the company's customers. Whether services are legal services is a question of law that we cannot answer, but if the services are legal services, then the inquirers may be aiding a nonlawyer in the practice of law, allowing a nonlawyer to interfere with their independent professional judgment, sharing legal fees with a nonlawyer, and providing incompetent representation to clients, and they may have a personal conflict of interest. If the services are not legal services and the clients do not believe they are legal services, then the only applicable ethical rules would be those that apply even where the lawyer does not have an attorney-client relationship, such as the prohibition against conduct involving dishonesty.

RULES: 1.1(a), (b) & (c), 1.7(a), 5.2(b), 5.4(a), (c) & (d), 5.5(b), 5.7(a) & (c), 8.4

Modifies N.Y. State 992

FACTS:

1. Two lawyers are employed by a debt management company (the "Company"). The lawyers work under the direction of a nonlawyer who is the managing director of the Company. The main responsibilities of the lawyers are (i) to provide advice to and answer questions from the Company's customers (whom the inquiring lawyers describe as their "clients"); (ii) to contact banks and other credit institutions in an effort to settle customers' outstanding debt for less than the full amount owed; and (iii) counseling customers regarding their rights in litigation. The Company has approximately 700 clients. The lawyers are concerned that they are not able to handle that volume of work, and that consequently their clients will be brought into litigation and risk having judgments taken against them.

2. The Company also has proposed that the salaries of the inquirers be augmented by $100 for each account settled for more than $10,000.

3. The inquirers express concern that they will be unable properly to counsel the Company's clients regarding litigation because of their limited resources and the large number of clients.

QUESTIONS:

4. May a lawyer work for a debt management company where the ratio of debt management clients to debt management company lawyers means that the lawyers may not be able properly to counsel the company's clients?

5. May a lawyer working for a debt management company accept a proposed salary structure in which the lawyer will receive an extra payment for each larger account that the lawyer settles? In particular, would that salary structure constitute impermissible fee sharing?

OPINION:

Are the Debt Management Company's Services Legal Services?

6. Before we can answer the questions posed, it is important to know whether the services provided by the Debt Management Company are legal services, non-legal services, or a combination of the two. See N.Y. State 860 (2011). If any of the services are legal services, then the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") apply. If they are nonlegal services, then some of the Rules may apply, e.g., Rule 8.4 (a lawyer shall not engage in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation), but others may not, e.g., rules that specifically require an attorney-client relationship. And if the services are a combination of legal and nonlegal services, then Rule 5.7(a) determines whether the Rules apply. If the services are a combination and the nonlegal services are not distinct from legal services, then the Rules would apply to the nonlegal services as well as the legal services. See Rule 5.7(a)(1).

7. The Rules do not define "legal services." Comment [2] to Rule 5.5, dealing with the unauthorized practice of law, states, in part: "The definition of the 'practice of law' is established by law and varies from one jurisdiction to another." As we noted in N.Y. State 860 (2011):

> We do not render opinions on matters of law (and defining unauthorized practice is a matter of law), but we note that Ethical Consideration 3-5 of the former Code of Professional Responsibility gave the following helpful guidance: "Functionally, the practice of law relates to the rendition of services for others that call for the professional judgment of a lawyer. The essence of the professional judgment of the lawyer is the educated ability to relate the general body and philosophy of law to a specific legal problem of a client . . . ."

8. Rule 5.7 contains a definition of "nonlegal services" that applies when lawyers or law firms provide "nonlegal services" to clients. Rule 5.7(c) provides:

> (c) For the purposes of this Rule, "nonlegal services" shall mean those services that lawyers may lawfully provide and that are not prohibited as an unauthorized practice of law when provided by a nonlawyer.

9. As we noted in N.Y. State 860, this definition begs the question of what constitutes the unauthorized practice of law, a question of law we cannot answer. It seems likely that some of the activities of the debt management firm, such as negotiating a reduction in the client's indebtedness based on the client's ability to pay (and not on the legal validity of the obligation), do not constitute legal services. Other activities, such as advising clients about legal rights, collections litigation, and litigation risks, probably are legal services. In either case, the inquirers must make the determination. In this connection, the inquirers should consider (among other things) whether the Company's clients are informed (or otherwise are made aware, either expressly or implicitly) that the inquirers are lawyers, whether the advice given to the clients is legal advice, whether the clients believe that they are receiving legal advice, and whether the clients believe that their communications with the inquirers are protected by attorney-client confidentiality. The inquirers should also consider whether they themselves and/or the Company expressly or impliedly inform the credit institutions that they contact on the Company's behalf that they are lawyers.

May the Inquirers Disclaim that They are Providing Legal Services?

10. A second question is whether the Company or the inquirers may disclaim that the Company is providing legal services. N.Y. State 992 (2013) explored business structures in which a lawyer may work with a nonlawyer business person. The lawyer in Opinion 992 was seeking to work with a nonlawyer who planned to establish a "disability office" to help persons with government benefit matters (most of which did not require representation by legal counsel). We concluded that, even if a nonlawyer could perform services without engaging in the unauthorized practice of law, those same services constitute the practice of law when they are performed by a lawyer. See also N.Y. State 938 n.2 (2012) (although disability services may be performed by a nonlawyer, different questions would arise if a lawyer were to participate in providing the services, for example by meeting with customers or editing documents drafted by a licensed hearing representative).

11. N.Y. State 992 also said that a lawyer may not circumvent the Rules of Professional Conduct by performing legal services under a designation indicating that the lawyer is employed in a "nonlegal capacity" even if a nonlawyer may perform the same services. Specifically, Opinion 992 said:

> Where an attorney is engaged, the client has a reasonable expectation that the attorney has the skills and qualifications beyond that of a non attorney representative, is governed by professional conduct rules, and is subject to civil liability for the representation.

12. We believe that the rationale of N.Y. State 992 would not apply, however, if the client understands that the services being provided are nonlegal services and is not aware that such services are being provided by a lawyer. See N.Y. State 832 (2009) (if the shelf corporations were sold over the internet and the attorney was not identified anywhere on the website as a lawyer, and purchasers never communicated with the lawyer directly and had no opportunity to ask for advice, then the lawyer would not be giving legal advice to purchasers); N.Y. State 557 (1984) (when services are performed by a lawyer who holds himself out as a lawyer, they constitute the practice of law). Cf. Rule 5.7 (which recognizes that lawyers may provide legal services in one entity and nonlegal services in a separate entity, and that the nonlegal entity will not be subject to the Rules of Professional Conduct if the legal services and nonlegal services are "distinct" and the lawyer gives an appropriate disclaimer or the disclaimer is unnecessary). Of course, if the services would constitute legal services when performed by a nonlawyer, the Company could not avoid the unauthorized practice of law by disclaiming that they are legal services.

Consequences if the Debt Management Company's Services to Clients are Legal Services

13. If the debt management company's services to clients are legal services, then the Company would be providing legal services in violation of the Judiciary Law, which is a crime in New York. See Judiciary Law § 485-a (making certain violations of Judiciary Law §§478, 484, 486 and 495 a class E felony); Judiciary Law §495 (providing that no corporation or voluntary association shall (i) practice or appear as an attorney-at-law for any person in any court in this state, (ii) hold itself out to the public as being entitled to practice law, or (iii) furnish attorneys or counsel); Judiciary Law §478 (unlawful for any natural person to furnish attorneys or to render legal services); Judiciary Law §484 (no natural person shall ask or receive compensation for preparing pleadings of any kind in any action brought before any court of record in this state).

14. If the Company's services include legal services, the inquirers may also be in violation of several provisions of the Rules, discussed below.

Aiding Unauthorized Practice; Interference with Professional Judgment

15. Rule 5.5(b) prohibits a lawyer from aiding a nonlawyer in the unauthorized practice of law. If the Company is violating statutes or common law prohibiting the unauthorized practice of law, then the lawyers would be violating Rule 5.5(b).

16. Rule 5.4 contains a number of provisions intended to ensure the professional independence of a lawyer. See Rule 5.4, cmt. [1]. Rule 5.4(a) provides that a lawyer "shall not share legal fees with a nonlawyer," with exceptions not applicable here. If the Company's clients are paying the Company for legal services rendered by the inquirers, then the inquirers would be violating Rule 5.4(a). Rule 5.4(c) provides that "a lawyer shall not permit a person who . . . employs . . . the lawyer to render legal services for another to direct or regulate the lawyer's professional judgment in rendering such legal services . . . ." If the lawyers here work under the direction of a nonlawyer, they may be violating Rule 5.4(c). See N.Y. State 1068 (2015) (discussing whether a lawyer could join with a claims recovery firm in an agreement to offer legal services to the public to be performed by the lawyer and the claims recovery firm on a systematic and continuing basis).

Lawyer Workload

17. Rule 1.1 contains provisions to protect clients against incompetence. Rule 1.1(a) states that a lawyer should provide competent representation to a client; Rule 1.1(b), prohibits a lawyer from handling a legal matter that the lawyer knows or should know he or she is not competent to handle; and Rule 1.1(c) prohibits a lawyer from intentionally failing to seek the objectives of the client through reasonably available means permitted by law and the Rules, and from prejudicing or damaging the client during the course of the representation. In N.Y. State 751 (2002), an opinion decided under the former Code of Professional Responsibility, we responded to an attorney for a government agency who believed that more matters were being assigned to individual attorneys than could be competently handled by those attorneys. We cited the Code provisions equivalent to those now in Rule 1.1 and concluded that it was a lawyer's duty to avoid accepting more matters than the lawyer could competently handle and to reduce his or her workload if it had become unmanageable. See also ABA 347 (1981). The obligation of a lawyer to act competently has not changed under the Rules.

18. In N.Y. State 751, we noted that, if the question of whether the lawyer could provide competent representation in light of the lawyer's workload was an arguable question of professional duty, then under the Code's equivalent of Rule 5.2(b), the lawyer could act in accordance with a supervisory lawyer's reasonable resolution of that question. If the supervisor is a nonlawyer, then Rule 5.2(b) would not apply, and the inquirers would need to make their own judgment as to whether they can represent all of their 700 clients competently.

Bonus Compensation

19. If the services provided are legal services, then the proposed bonus compensation proposal also raises questions about conflicts of interest. Under that proposal, the lawyers would receive $100 in additional compensation for each account settled for more than $10,000. That arrangement would create a potential personal conflict of interest for the lawyers under Rule 1.7(a)(2), which prohibits a lawyer from representing a client if "there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial . . . interests." If the additional $100 would encourage the lawyer to settle a matter on terms less favorable to the client in order to qualify for the bonus, then the compensation arrangement would violate Rule 1.7 unless the conflict is consentable under Rule 1.7(b) and the lawyer obtains the client's informed consent, confirmed in writing.

Consequences If the Debt Management Company's Services to Clients are Not Legal Services

20. If the services to the clients of the Company are not legal services, and if neither the inquirers nor the Company holds the lawyers out as providing legal services to the Company's clients, then the provisions of the Rules on aiding in the unauthorized practice of law, fee sharing, interference with professional independence, competence and personal conflicts of interest would not apply. Nevertheless, the lawyers would remain subject to all Rules that do not depend on the existence of a legal representation or an attorney-client relationship. For example, the lawyers could not engage in illegal, dishonest, fraudulent or deceptive conduct and could not state or imply an ability to achieve results using means that violate the Rules or other law. See Rule 8.4(c), (e).

CONCLUSION:

21. Lawyers employed by a debt management company under the direction of a nonlawyer managing director may not provide legal services to the company's customers. If the services are legal services, the inquirers may be aiding a nonlawyer in the practice of law, allowing a nonlawyer to interfere with their independent professional judgment, sharing legal fees with nonlawyers, and providing incompetent representation to clients, and they may have personal conflicts of interest. If the services are not legal services and the clients do not believe they are legal services, then the only applicable ethical rules would be those that apply even where the lawyer does not have an attorney-client relationship, such as the prohibition against conduct involving dishonesty.

OPINION 1082 (01/08/2016)

TOPIC: Unauthorized practice of law

DIGEST: A lawyer may not provide legal services to individuals through a for-profit company in which a nonlawyer has an ownership or controlling interest.

RULES: 1.2(d), 5.4(a) & (b), 5.5(b), 8.4(c)

FACTS:

1. Inquiring lawyer is employed by a for-profit finance company (the "Company") and performs litigation services for the Company, including taking steps to enforce accounts receivable purchased by the Company from third parties.

2. The owner of the Company is a nonlawyer. The owner wants to ensure that in-house lawyers are fully utilized by providing their services to third party debtors, to perform legal services including drafting pleadings, and perhaps appearing in court. The names of the lawyers may or may not appear on the pleadings. None of the prospective defendants will be debtors on any accounts receivable owned by the Company.

3. The Company would charge debtors for these legal services.

QUESTIONS:

4. May a lawyer employed by a company owned by a nonlawyer provide legal services to debtors through the company?

5. May the lawyer "ghost-write" pleadings and other litigation documents, i.e. where the lawyer's name does not appear on the documents?

DISCUSSION:

6. As we noted in N.Y. State 1081 [26-15], several provisions of the New York Judiciary Law prohibit a corporation or voluntary association from practicing law in New York or furnishing legal services. See Judiciary Law §485-a (making certain violations of Judiciary Law §§478, 484, 486 and 495 a class E felony); Judiciary Law §495 (no corporation or voluntary association shall (i) practice or appear as an attorney-at-law for any person in any court in this state, (ii) hold itself out to the public as being entitled to practice law, or (iii) furnish attorneys or counsel); Judiciary Law §478 (unlawful for any natural person to furnish attorneys or to render legal services); Judiciary Law §484 (no natural person shall ask or receive compensation for preparing pleadings of any kind in any action brought before any court of record in this state).

7. What constitutes the practice of law or legal services is a legal question that is beyond our jurisdiction to answer. Here, however, the inquirer has already concluded that drafting pleadings and appearing in court constitute legal services, a conclusion we note is supported by the Judiciary Law.

8. Rule 5.5(b) of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") prohibits a lawyer from aiding a nonlawyer in the unauthorized practice of law. The inquirer's employer constitutes a nonlawyer for this purpose. In addition, aiding the Company in the unauthorized practice of law would also violate Rule 1.2(d), which provides that a lawyer "shall not counsel a client to engage, or assist a client, in conduct that the lawyer knows is illegal . . . ."

9. Rule 5.4(a) prohibits a lawyer from sharing legal fees with a nonlawyer. The in-house lawyers here would be sharing legal fees with a nonlawyer, since clients of the Company would pay the Company for the legal services, and the Company would pay the lawyers. See N.Y. State 942 (2012) (concluding that, if the amount paid by the customer to the non-legal firm is more than the non-legal firm pays the lawyer, it would violate Rule 5.4(a)'s prohibition against sharing legal fees with a nonlawyer). Similarly, Rule 5.4(b) prohibits a lawyer from forming a partnership with a nonlawyer if any of the activities of the partnership consist of the practice of law.

10. If an in-house lawyer were to provide legal services to third parties through the Company, it would make no difference whether the lawyer's name appeared on the documents. The problem would be that the Company is engaging in the unauthorized practice of law. Omitting the lawyer's name from any documents would not cure the problem.

11. Failure to disclose the participation of the lawyer might also violate the lawyer's obligation to be truthful. See Rule 8.4(c) (lawyer shall not engage in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation); N.Y. State 613 (1990) (a lawyer may advise a pro se litigant by preparing pleadings for the litigant to sign and file in an action, but disclosure to the court is required).

12. There may be an alternative structure in which the lawyers could provide legal services to clients and the company could provide nonlegal services. Our Committee has issued opinions involving non-lawyers marketing on behalf of a lawyer. See, e.g. N.Y. State 902 (2012), 976 (2013). We also have issued opinions involving referral relationships between nonlawyers and lawyers. See, e.g. N.Y. State 1068 (2015) (lawyer may not join with a claims recovery firm in an agreement to offer legal services to the public to be performed by the lawyer and nonlegal services by the claims recovery firm if it is to be done on a systematic and continuing basis, because claims recovery firms are not on the list of approved nonlegal professionals established and maintained by the Appellate Divisions within the meaning of Rule 5.8(a). Even if the relationship were a "non-exclusive reciprocal referral agreement" within the meaning of Rule 5.8(c), the lawyers would have to ensure that the relationship did not interfere with the lawyers' independent professional judgment, did not involve improper solicitation of clients, did not involve aiding in the unauthorized practice of law, and did not involve the improper sharing of legal fees.) We will not speculate here on whether there is such alternative structure in which the inquirers could ethically provide services to customers of the finance company.

CONCLUSION:

13. A lawyer may not provide legal services to individuals through a for-profit corporation in which a nonlawyer has an ownership or controlling interest.

(34-15)

OPINION 1083 (01/21/2016)

TOPIC: Conflict of interest; differing interests

DIGEST: A lawyer whose firm represents nursing homes may form a nonprofit corporation for the purpose of accepting judicial guardianship appointments for low-asset nursing home residents who lack the capacity to document their eligibility for Medicaid. But representing the nonprofit in certain matters might present conflicts of interest. Consent to a conflict of interest by both the nonprofit and the nursing home may be possible, but if the matter involved a claim (e.g. regarding quality of care issues) by the guardian against a nursing home that is represented by the inquirer's firm in the matter, the firm could not represent both the guardian and the nursing home, because the conflict would be non-consentable.

RULES: Rules 1.0(f), 1.7(a) & (b), 1.9(a), 1.10(a), 8.4(c).

FACTS:

1. The inquirer is a member of a law firm that represents many nursing home clients. The inquirer proposes to form a nonprofit organization (the "Nonprofit") to accept judicial guardianship appointments for low-asset, long-term nursing home residents ("Incapacitated Persons" or "IPs") who lack the necessary capacity to authorize release of the financial records that are needed to document their eligibility for Medicaid, who do not have family members or others holding a power of attorney to manage the Medicaid application process, and who might be at risk of discharge from the facility for non-payment.[1]

2. The inquirer states that the nonprofit organization would be independent from the inquirer's law firm. Neither the inquirer nor any lawyer or employee in the inquirer's firm would be officers, directors or employees of the Nonprofit. The Nonprofit would be staffed by an administrator, who would oversee the Nonprofit's financial obligations. The Nonprofit also would partner with schools or community organizations that could provide social workers or social work students to perform on-site visits with Incapacitated Persons.

3. The inquirer's representation regarding the Nonprofit's independence from the inquirer's law firm is critical to our analysis. Based on that representation, we assume that the Nonprofit's board of directors, its administrator and its staff will not be controlled, directly or indirectly, by the law firm or any of the firm's nursing home clients and that the employees and agents of the Nonprofit will always act in what they perceive to be the best interests of the Nonprofit and those IP clients for whom it serves as guardian, regardless of the impact their actions might have upon the inquirer's law firm or its nursing home clients.

4. The inquirer states that the petitioner seeking the appointment of a guardian for an Incapacitated Person would be the nursing home where the IP resides. The inquirer's firm would represent the nursing home in seeking appointment of a guardian and be paid by the nursing home for that representation.

1 A not-for-profit corporation organized to act as guardian is eligible for such appointment. See Mental Hygiene Law, §81.19.

5. Guardianships may involve two type of responsibilities – guardianship for property management or guardianship to provide for personal needs. As either property management or personal needs guardian, the guardian must act with the utmost care and diligence and the utmost degree of trust, loyalty and fidelity in relation to the IP.[2]

6. Where the incapacitated person has assets, the Mental Hygiene Law gives the property management guardian a number of powers regarding the management of the IP's property.[3] The property management guardian also has the power to apply for government benefits and to authorize access to or release of confidential records. Access to the IP's financial records is necessary to document that the IP meets the income and asset eligibility requirements for Medicaid benefits in connection with an application to the County Department of Social Services ("DSS") for such benefits.

7. Personal needs guardianship involves providing for the personal needs of the IP, including determining who shall provide personal care or assistance to the IP, choosing the IP's place of abode and making health care decisions where there is no health care proxy.[4] The guardian must visit the IP at least four times a year.

8. The inquirer states that the nursing home petitioner would not "nominate" the Nonprofit as guardian, but would "make the judge aware" that the Nonprofit is available to act as guardian. The Nonprofit would charge the nursing home petitioner a one-time flat fee for accepting an appointment to serve as property management and personal needs guardian for the IP. The fee would be based on the anticipated cost of securing a payment source for the IP's nursing home care (primarily the fees due to the law firm retained to prepare the Medicaid application) plus an amount estimated to be necessary to cover the cost of addressing personal needs issues.

9. We assume that the law firm will advise the judge of the capabilities of the Nonprofit and of potential conflicts of interest between the petitioning nursing home and the Nonprofit, including (i) the Nonprofit's capabilities to act as personal needs guardian, and (ii) how the proposed fee structure provides for personal needs issues. See Rule 8.4(c) (a lawyer or law firm shall not engage in conduct involving deceit or misrepresentation).

10. If the Nonprofit is appointed property management guardian, it might opt to, but would not be required to, hire the inquirer's law firm to prepare and file the IP's application to the DSS for Medicaid benefits.

11. The inquirer identifies three reasons for forming the Nonprofit – one practical and two financial. The practical reason, the inquirer states, is that guardianship judges have complained that they have difficulty finding persons who will accept guardianship appointments in low-asset cases, and the appointments therefore are being made to non-profit organizations. According to the inquirer, the nonprofit organizations accepting such appointments in the inquirer's geographic practice area often do not have the staffing or expertise to fulfill their duties to successfully prosecute a Medicaid application. In these cases, the burden and expense of securing Medicaid funding falls to the nursing home where the IP resides, while the designated non-profit guardian receives court-awarded guardianship fees for performing little or no work.

3 See Mental Hygiene Law § 81.21

12. The financial reasons both stem from the negative economic effects on the inquirer's nursing home clients that result from the current financing system. The first arises from the way the DSS is required to treat, for the purpose of establishing an IP's Medicaid budget, the monthly payment amounts typically awarded to non-profit organization guardians that are paid out of the IP's Social Security benefit payments. Medicaid recipients in nursing homes are responsible for paying the nursing home a certain amount of the nursing home costs each month out of their income, usually out of the monthly Social Security benefit. This amount is termed the recipient's Net Available Monthly Income (NAMI). Medicaid benefits are paid to the nursing home in an amount equal to the difference between the facility's approved Medicaid rate and the NAMI amount. However, the DSS does not disregard guardianship fees that are paid out of the IP's Social Security benefits in determining the Medicaid budget. According to the inquirer, the monthly guardian's fee is typically $450. Thus, on an annualized basis, the nursing home may receive $5,400 (i.e. 12 x $450) less for an IP for whom a guardian has been appointed, compared to nursing home residents whose cost of care is being paid by Medicaid but who do not have guardians.

13. The second financial reason is that, according to the inquirer, where a nonprofit organization guardian is appointed, the social security benefit payment and other income is often paid directly to the non-profit organization, so that it may deduct its monthly court-awarded fee. The non-profit organization is then expected to remit the balance to the nursing home. However, many of the existing non-profit organizations accepting guardianship appointments often fail to pay over or are late in paying over the excess to the nursing home, to the home's financial detriment.

QUESTIONS:

14. If the Nonprofit were appointed property management guardian for an Incapacitated Person who is a resident of a nursing home represented by the inquirer's firm, could the inquiring lawyer or the lawyer's firm accept an engagement from the Nonprofit to prepare and file the Medicaid application for an Incapacitated Person? Does the fact that the inquirer formed the Nonprofit or regularly represents the nursing home constitute a conflict of interest?

15. If the Nonprofit were appointed personal needs guardian for an Incapacitated Person who is a resident of a nursing home represented by the inquirer's firm, could the Inquirer's firm represent the Nonprofit? Would the fact that the firm formed the Nonprofit or regularly represents the nursing home constitute a conflict of interest?

OPINION:

16. The jurisdiction of our Committee is to interpret the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") as they apply to the conduct of lawyers. We therefore make no determinations here on whether the Nonprofit meets the requirements of the Mental Hygiene Law for a guardian of IPs, the provisions of the tax law governing not-for-profits, including their eligibility to receive and retain non-profit status under the Internal Revenue Code, or the provisions of any business corporation law with respect to the governance of the Nonprofit.

Conflicts of Interest

17. The principal conflict rule in the New York Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") governing concurrent representations is Rule 1.7. Rule 1.7(a) provides:

> (a) Except as provided in paragraph (b), a lawyer shall not represent a client if a reasonable lawyer would conclude that either:
> (1) the representation will involve the lawyer in representing differing interests; or
> (2) there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property or other personal interests.

18. Under the definition of "differing interests" in Rule 1.0(f), "differing interests" include "every interest that will adversely affect either the judgment or the loyalty of a lawyer to a client, whether it be a conflicting, inconsistent, diverse or other interest." Comment [8] to Rule 1.7 explains the meaning of "differing interests":

> [8] Differing interests exist if there is a significant risk that a lawyer's exercise of professional judgment in considering, recommending or carrying out an appropriate course of action for the client will be adversely affected or the representation would otherwise be materially limited by the lawyer's other responsibilities or interests. . . . The conflict in effect forecloses alternatives that would otherwise be available to the client. The mere possibility of subsequent harm does not itself require disclosure and consent. The critical questions are the likelihood that a difference in interests will eventuate and, if it does, whether it will adversely affect the lawyer's professional judgment in considering alternatives or foreclose courses of action that reasonably should be pursued on behalf of the client.

Moreover, differing interests can arise even if the lawyer does not represent the two clients in the same proceeding. See Rule 1.7, Cmt. [6] ("a lawyer may not advocate on one matter against another client that the lawyer represents in some other matter, even when the matters are wholly unrelated").

19. Finally, while lawyers are associated in a firm none of them may knowingly represent a client when any one of them practicing alone would be prohibited from doing so. Rule 1.10(a).

20. We assume for purposes of this opinion that each of the inquirer's nursing home clients is a continuing client. Once the inquirer forms the Nonprofit, if the inquirer continues to represent the Nonprofit, the Nonprofit and the nursing homes will be concurrent clients. Similarly, once the Nonprofit has been formed, if the Nonprofit has been named guardian and the Nonprofit seeks to hire the inquirer's firm to prepare a Medicaid application or to pursue matters involving personal care, the Nonprofit and the nursing home would be concurrent clients.

21. If the Nonprofit has not selected the law firm to prepare the Medicaid application, and if the law firm were to do no other work for the Nonprofit, then the Nonprofit would be a former client. The lawyer's ethical duties to a former client are found in Rule 1.9(a), which prohibits a lawyer who formerly has represented a client in a matter from thereafter representing another person in the same or a substantially related matter in which that person's interests are materially adverse to the interests of the former client, unless the former client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing. For example, another client would have a substantially related matter if the other client sought to challenge the creation or tax exemption of the Nonprofit.

The Formation of the Nonprofit

22. As we understand the inquiry, in forming the Nonprofit, the law firm is acting on its own and not on behalf of a client. Consequently the terms of Rule 1.7(a)(1) and 1.9 do not apply. If the firm were construed to be representing the to-be-formed organization, then such Rules would apply. See Scope ¶ [9] ("Whether a client-lawyer relationship exists for any specific purpose can depend in the circumstances and may be a question of fact.").

23. If the law firm has no client in connection with the formation of the Nonprofit, or if the Nonprofit is its only client, the issue under Rule 1.7(a)(2) is whether there is a significant risk the lawyer's representation of the Nonprofit would be adversely affected by the lawyer's interest in remaining in the good graces of his or her nursing home clients. Since we accept the inquirer's representation that the creation of the Nonprofit would be in the interest of nursing home clients, such risk does not arise.

24. It is possible that the law firm could be deemed to be acting on behalf of a nursing home client in forming the Nonprofit. Although the inquirer states that the law firm is acting solely on a pro bono basis in forming the Nonprofit, the objective of forming the Nonprofit is, at least in part, to benefit financially the firm's nursing home clients. If the law firm is deemed to represent one or more nursing home clients in the formation of the Nonprofit, the issue under Rule 1.7(a) would be whether representing one nursing home client in the formation of the Nonprofit and representing other nursing home clients in other matters constituted representation of interests that are "differing." See Rule 1.0(f) (definition of "differing interests"). While this is a question of fact, it seems unlikely that representing one client in the formation of the Nonprofit would involve differing interests from those of the firm's other clients.

Representation of the Nonprofit in Property Guardianship Matters

25. If the law firm is asked to represent the Nonprofit in connection with property management guardianship matters involving a resident of a nursing home represented by the law firm, including preparing and filing a Medicaid application, there is a potential conflict under Rule 1.7(a)(1), in that a reasonable lawyer might conclude that the representation involves the law firm in representing differing interests. The guardian of an incapacitated person must act in the best interests of the incapacitated person, whereas the nursing home may have financial interests that differ from those of the incapacitated person. Whether a reasonable lawyer might so conclude will clearly depend on the factual circumstances. If the IP has limited assets, e.g., below the Medicaid threshold, the interests of the resident and the nursing home in the appointment of a guardian and the successful completion of a Medicaid application would seem to be the same. See N.Y. State 1046 (2015) (the interests of the incapacitated person and the care facility are not always differing).[5] Ultimately, however, the question whether there are differing interests is one of fact that is beyond the jurisdiction of this Committee.

26. Even if there were no differing interests in the matter, there is still a question of whether the lawyer has a personal interest conflict under Rule 1.7(a)(2). As we said in N.Y. State 1046:

> Where the lawyer or the lawyer's firm have a continuing relationship with the Care Facility that is the petitioner under the guardianship proceeding, or into which the Guardian might place the AIP [alleged incapacitated person], the relationship between the law firm and the Care Facility could adversely affect the independent professional judgment of the lawyer in representing the AIP, thus creating a personal interest conflict for the lawyer.

This question is also a factual one that is beyond the jurisdiction of this Committee.

Representation of the Nonprofit in Personal Needs Matters

27. Personal needs matters, such as quality of care issues, treatment decisions and decisions about the IP's place of abode, are more likely to involve differing interests between the guardian, which must exercise the utmost degree of trust, loyalty and fidelity in relation to the incapacitated person, and the law firm's nursing home client. This question, too, is one of fact that is beyond our jurisdiction. But if a facility's violations may lead to substantial monetary penalties or disenrollment from the Medicare or Medicaid programs, or if facilities compete for residents to fill empty beds, and if an injury sustained by a resident caused even in part by noncompliance with government standards and procedures may lead to litigation, then the prospect of conflicting loyalties between the lawyer's nursing home clients and the guardian with respect to personal needs issues would seem to be not insubstantial.

Client Consents to Conflicts

28. A lawyer may sometimes represent a client despite the existence of a conflict, if the conditions set forth in Rule 1.7(b) are met:

> (a) Notwithstanding the existence of a concurrent conflict of interest under paragraph (a), a lawyer may represent a client if:
> (1) the lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client;

5 In N.Y. State 1046, we were asked whether a law firm that regularly represented nursing homes could represent an alleged incapacitated person in the guardianship proceeding where the firm did not represent the nursing home in the guardianship proceeding. Because the guardianship proceeding here would have ended when the Nonprofit has been appointed guardian, the posture is slightly different and the special consent issues discussed there do not arise here. But because the guardian has the duty to act in the best interests of the IP, many of the conflict issues are the same. For example, if, during its research into the IP's finances in connection with the Medicaid application, the law firm discovered that the IP had assets above the Medicaid threshold, there would be a conflict of interest between the Nonprofit as Guardian and the nursing home. The interests of the nursing home in being paid by the resident as a "private pay" patient and the interest of the resident in preserving assets, or even the interest of the guardian in being paid sufficient guardianship fees to cover the costs of serving as guardian, may be differing. See Nina Bernstein, To Collect Debts, Nursing Homes are Seizing Control Over Patients, N.Y. Times, Jan. 25, 2015; Nancy Levitan, Nursing Home Petitioners and Guardianship, N.Y. State Bar Ass'n J. (Sept. 2015).

(2) the representation is not prohibited by law;

(3) the representation does not involve the assertion of a claim by one client against another client represented by the lawyer in the same litigation or other proceeding before a tribunal; and

(4) each affected client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing.

Under Rule 1.7(b), client consent does not cure a conflict of interest if the representation is prohibited by law, if the lawyer could not reasonably believe that he or she will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client, or if the representation involves one client asserting a claim against another client represented by the lawyer in the same litigation or other before a tribunal.

29. Thus, the inquirer and the inquirer's law firm clearly could not represent the guardian with respect to a guardianship matter involving a resident of a client nursing home if (i) the firm did not believe it could provide competent and diligent representation to both the nursing home and the IP, (ii) if the dual representation were prohibited by law, such as the Mental Hygiene Law, or (iii) if the firm represented both the nursing home and the guardian in the same matter and the dual representations involved the assertion of a claim by the guardian against the nursing home or by the nursing home against the guardian, as guardian for the IP. In any such case, the conflict would be non-consentable.

30. Even if the inquirer's firm did not represent the nursing home in such matter, there would still be a question under Rule 1.7(a)(2) whether there is a significant risk that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the guardian might be adversely affected by the lawyer's personal financial interest in remaining in the good graces of the nursing home client. Thus, if the matter involved the assertion of a claim by the guardian against a nursing home client of the law firm, even if the law firm represented only the guardian and not the nursing home in the matter, the question remains (and we do not opine) whether the lawyer could reasonably believe that he or she could provide competent and diligent representation to the guardian.

CONCLUSION:

31. A lawyer whose firm represents nursing homes may form a nonprofit corporation for the purpose of accepting judicial guardianship appointments for low-asset nursing home residents who lack the capacity to document their eligibility for Medicaid. But representing the nonprofit in certain matters might present conflicts of interest. For example, if the nonprofit is appointed property management guardian for an incapacitated person who resides in a nursing home client of the firm and the firm is asked to provide services for the guardian (such as preparing the Medicaid application) there is a potential conflict of interest between the guardian and the nursing home client, but if the incapacitated person has limited assets, the interests of the two clients are unlikely to differ. If the nonprofit is appointed personal care guardian for an incapacitated person who resides in a nursing home client of the law firm, the interests of the guardian and nursing home clients are more likely to differ. Consent to a conflict of interest by both the nonprofit and the nursing home may be possible, but if the matter involved a claim by the guardian against a nursing home client (i.e. regarding quality of care issues) that is represented by the inquirer's firm in the matter, the firm could not also represent the nursing home, because the conflict would be non-consentable.

OPINION 1084 (01/22/2016)

TOPIC: Confidential information; defense attorney's knowledge of co-defendant's innocence; consent to disclose confidential information of deceased former client; implied authorization to disclose DIGEST: Where a defense attorney obtained information from a deceased client that appears to exonerate a co-defendant, that information is protected as confidential, notwithstanding that the client was convicted and there are no pending proceedings against the client or in which the attorney has appeared. Authorization to disclose confidential information may have been expressed by the client, or may be implied when the disclosure is consistent with the client's best interests and is reasonable under the circumstances.

RULES: 1.6(a) & (b) and 1.9(c)

FACTS:

1. While the inquiring attorney was representing a client charged with fraud, the client revealed information to the inquiring attorney that would seem to exonerate a co-defendant. The client was convicted and has since died in prison. There are no pending proceedings in which the attorney has appeared on the client's behalf. The co-defendant has pled guilty, but is now in the process of seeking to vacate her plea and has asked if the inquirer knows anything that could help her. Prior to his death, the client told the inquiring attorney that if he was convicted, he wanted to exonerate his co-defendant.

QUESTION:

2. May an attorney disclose, to a co-defendant of the attorney's now-deceased client information imparted by the client that might exculpate the co-defendant?

OPINION:

3. The nature and extent of information about a non-client that a lawyer may ethically reveal in connection with that non-client's motion to vacate a plea depends on a number of factors, including: (a) whether the information is protected as "confidential" by Rule 1.6; (b) whether, as a matter of law, there is anyone who can waive the privilege or provide an informed consent to disclose the information; and (c) whether such consent was impliedly authorized by the now deceased client.

Whether the Information Is Protected as "Confidential"

4. Rule 1.6(a) defines and protects certain information as "confidential." It provides:

> (a) A lawyer shall not knowingly reveal confidential information, as defined in this Rule, or use such information to the disadvantage of a client or for the advantage of the lawyer or a third person, unless:
> (1) the client gives informed consent, as defined in Rule 1.0(j);

> (2) the disclosure is impliedly authorized to advance the best interests of the client and is either reasonable under the circumstances or customary in the professional community; or
> (3) the disclosure is permitted by paragraph (b).

"Confidential information" consists of information gained during or relating to the representation of a client, whatever its source, that is (a) protected by the attorney-client privilege, (b) likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed, or (c) information that the client has requested be kept confidential. "Confidential information" does not ordinarily include (i) a lawyer's legal knowledge or legal research or (ii) information that is generally known in the local community or in the trade, field or profession to which the information relates.

5. Rule 1.6(b)(1) authorizes disclosure of a client's confidential information "to prevent reasonably certain death or substantial bodily harm." Comment [6B] to Rule 1.6 explains that this paragraph recognizes the overriding value of life and physical integrity. As an example, Comment [6B] says: "Wrongful execution of a person is a life-threatening and imminent harm under paragraph (b)(1) once the person has been convicted and sentenced to death." Incarceration as a result of a fraud conviction is not covered by this exception.

6. Rule 1.9(c) speaks to the confidential information of a former client and states in relevant part:

> (c) A lawyer who has formerly represented a client . . . shall not thereafter . . .
> (2) reveal confidential information of the former client protected by Rule 1.6 except as these Rules would permit or require with respect to a current client.

7. In criminal proceedings, the relative culpability of the defendants is often a matter of great significance when negotiating a plea. Hence, a statement tending to negate the guilt of a co-defendant may well prove disadvantageous to any other defendants who are more culpable. Because the information exonerating the co-defendant was "gained during . . . the representation of a client" and is protected by the attorney-client privilege there can be no doubt that it should be deemed "confidential" within the meaning and protection of Rules 1.6(a) and 1.9(c)(2). See N.Y. State 1057 (2015).[6]

Whether Disclosure Is Expressly Authorized
